FROM THE INTRODUCTION

Much thought has been expended, during the War and since, on the fittest way of honouring the dead. They will not come back, and we, who remember them and think of them, like to believe that they will always be remembered. But let us be just to them. They did not ask, when they gave their lives, that their memories should be preserved. There have been nations (there are some to-day) who make divinities of fame and glory. That has never been the habit of thought of the English people. Our dead were content to save England. If they could see Oxford, as Oxford is to-day, with the War won, they would be pleased with that living memorial. Even if they had failed to save England, they well knew (though no one can explain it) that their sacrifice had an absolute value, and was not made in vain. We grope for some sign or token from them, and here and there, far away from the graves where they lie, we find it. Their virtue, which was a live thing, cannot be engraved on stone or printed in a book, but it still is here, to be sought for among other live things. The words Courage and Duty—or rather, the ideas of courage and duty, for Englishmen use the words very sparingly—are enriched by a great bequest. Fellowship and friendship mean more to-day than they meant before the War. The air that children breathe, even when they are at play, now comes to them tonic, from the heights. These things are the touch of live spirits, present or absent. The names here printed in thick type have appeared in many Oxford lists before this. We print them now, with reverence and affection, for the last time, in this final Roll, as a tribute from the University to the dearest of her sons.

INTRODUCTION

The Oxford University Roll of Service contains the names, fourteen thousand five hundred and sixty-one in number, of those members of the University who served in the Military and Naval forces of the Crown during the War. When the War broke out the country was unprepared for it. We had almost completely neglected to produce many of the materials necessary for war. In one thing only we were magnificently provided. We had produced the men. They were so many and so good that they achieved the immense task of forging, during the War itself, the weapon that was to give us victory.

During the eight or nine years before the War there had been a great quickening of military activity in the Universities. Partly, no doubt, this quickening was due to the tension of the political atmosphere and the imminence of the German threat. But it was wisely encouraged by the authorities, and especially by Lord Haldane, who deserves not a little credit for his patient and persevering efforts to enlist the Universities in the cause of national defence. Commissions in the Army were brought within the reach of graduates. Military History was given a recognized position among University studies. A delegacy was appointed to superintend the instruction of Army candidates, and the University contingent of the Officers' Training Corps grew and flourished. In place of the handful of volunteers who in the mid-Victorian era were regarded by their undergraduate fellows as a body of eccentrics, addicted to an unusual form of sport, the University, a year before the War, turned out, for review by Lord French, some twelve hundred Officer Cadets, very much in earnest, and representative of all the best sides of University life.

Then the War came, and trained, or half-trained, or untrained, the University sprang to arms. An American Rhodes scholar who had come to Oxford a year or two before the War once said that he was sorry for those of his countrymen who left Oxford before the outbreak of war, and equally sorry for those of them who made their first acquaintance with Oxford after the War had begun. None of them, he said, could know Oxford. What he had seen, and could never forget, was that quiet life of sport and leisure leaping and passing like a flame. The War began during the Long Vacation, when very few of the undergraduates were in residence. A Committee of the Military Delegacy sat in a dingy little room in Alfred Street to interview all Oxford men who applied for commissions. A torrent of young life surged through that little room, eager, and even gay, light-hearted but not light-minded, fully conscious of all that was involved in the test that was now at hand. More than two thousand candidates were interviewed in August and September 1914. Of these the great majority received commissions. When the University met again in October the number of undergraduates in residence was reduced to about fourteen hundred, of whom about eight hundred were undergoing an intensive course in the Officers' Training Corps. By the end of the year 1917 there were only three hundred and fifteen students in residence. Of these some fifty were Oriental students, twenty-five were refugees, chiefly Serbians, some thirty were medical students, and about a hundred and twenty were members of the Officers' Training Corps, waiting till their age should qualify them for admission to a Cadet Battalion. The military history of Oxford, during the later years of the War, is to be read among the records of the battle fronts, from Flanders to Mesopotamia.

The services of Oxford to the nation and to the national cause cannot be fully stated in this Roll of Service. Many names deserve remembrance which do not appear in this list. Foremost among these come the names of those young officers who were trained, during the progress of the War, in the Cadet Battalions formed at Oxford and quartered in certain of the Colleges. As early as December 1914 it was decided to found here a School of Instruction for young officers. The School got to work in January 1915, and by March of the following year about three thousand young officers had passed through it. Then it was superseded by the two Officer Cadet Battalions, in which candidates for commissions, many of whom had served in the ranks, underwent a very complete course of training, lasting at first for four months and, later on, as the system developed, for seven months. The strength of each battalion was about seven hundred and fifty, and they were quartered by Companies in Keble, Wadham, Hertford, New College, Magdalen, Trinity, Balliol, St. John's, and Worcester. In 1915 there was also formed at Oxford a School of Military Aeronautics, which began by training young officers, but after a little time was changed into a Cadet School, for the training of about a thousand cadets. The cadets and mechanics were housed in Christ Church, Queen's, Brasenose, Exeter, Lincoln, Jesus, Corpus Christi, and Pembroke; they had their aerodrome at Port Meadow and a camp in the University Parks. Certain of the scientific departments of the University were almost wholly devoted to their needs.

The cadets who passed through Oxford under this scheme were invited to consider themselves Oxford men, and accepted the invitation. The work was hard and the discipline strict, but they lived the collegiate life, and enjoyed it. There were competitive sports—boat-races, football, and cricket—among the several Colleges, and a fervent spirit of College loyalty grew up with amazing rapidity. The consequences of this are not easy to forecast. The cadets who passed through Oxford during the War, who lived in the Colleges, and belonged to them, and paid allegiance to them, are about equal in number to the other living members of the University. They have left Oxford, but they have not forgotten her, and she has now a host of enthusiastic champions and friends in every one of the Dominions. They would not wish to deny to their foster mother the right to feel pride in their doings.

Another group of men, most of whom wore no uniform, rendered good service to the cause. The scientific laboratories of the University were put at the disposal of the Government, and worked hard at the problems referred to them. To enumerate their achievements, in Physics, Chemistry, Physiology, and Pathology, would demand a whole volume. All military operations depend for their success on efficiency at the base, and this War more than any earlier war was based on science. The science of wasting and killing has made enormous progress during the War, but it is sometimes forgotten that the science of saving and healing has kept pace with it. To succeed in war a nation must excel in both sciences, and if ever a complete history of the War shall be written the work of Oxford men of science will have an honourable place in it.

Very early in the War the Examination Schools were converted into the Third Southern General Hospital, and Somerville College was given up by its staff and students to become a branch hospital. Oriel College lent one of its quadrangles for the housing of the dispossessed Somerville students ; University College provided additional accommodation for hospital patients ; Merton College gave quarters for the nurses.

Destroying and preserving make up the whole art of war. If any one, suffering from mental fatigue or sensual disgust, is tempted to believe that these processes annul each other, and inevitably make of war a wanton and foolish business, Oxford has supplied him with the remedy for that sickness. The Clarendon Press, during the whole progress of the War, though deprived of the services of virtually all its men of military age, was active in the production of books and pamphlets, most of them written by Oxford men, setting forth the causes and issues of the War—a mine of information, and an armoury of apologetics. This War library, being written to vindicate the British cause, may be called special pleading ; but let it be compared and contrasted with the whole body of apologetics produced by the German Universities. The comparison will prove what cannot be proved by the ordeal of battle, that the failure of Germany, on which the War has now set its seal, was a failure in intelligence and sympathy.

Here then is matter for three more volumes of Oxford War Records. But this Roll of Service comes before and above them all. It prints the names of those who through a long series of academic generations were nourished at Oxford, and who, when the call came, because the call came in the name of charity, gave their bodies to be burned. The gift of those who gave their lives is here specially recorded, and indeed, among the early volunteers, these are in a majority. They were the makers of the new army. They had put away all thoughts of safety. They cared only to maintain their cause, to assert their allegiance, and to make a rule and habit of devotion. The wounds and maims of these and others are not here recorded—it would make too long a tale. Nor are the deeds described by which decorations were won, except the deeds of those, sixteen in number, who were given the Victoria Cross. Soldiers themselves honour the Victoria Cross, because they know that it is one of those rare distinctions which are given to none but the deserving. But they know also, better than civilians, that only a fortunate remnant of those who have deserved the Victoria Cross receive the award. The bravest deeds in war are seldom done in the sight of witnesses; no reporters are present when a post is held to the last man. Too much stress must not be laid on decorations. The honour due to the men on this Roll is due to their likenesses rather than to their differences. They lived and fought together. The bravest of those who wear crosses and ribbons could find his fellow, if all were known, in that obscure company who wear no decoration but the single word Missing inscribed after their names.

Much thought has been expended, during the War and since, on the fittest way of honouring the dead. They will not come back, and we, who remember them and think of them, like to believe that they will always be remembered. But let us be just to them. They did not ask, when they gave their lives, that their memories should be preserved. There have been nations (there are some to-day) who make divinities of fame and glory. That has never been the habit of thought of the English people. Our dead were content to save England. If they could see Oxford, as Oxford is to-day, with the War won, they would be pleased with that living memorial. Even if they had failed to save England, they well knew (though no one can explain it) that their sacrifice had an absolute value, and was not made in vain. We grope for some sign or token from them, and here and there, far away from the graves where they lie, we find it. Their virtue, which was a live thing, cannot be engraved on stone or printed in a book, but it still is here, to be sought for among other live things. The words Courage and Duty—or rather, the ideas of courage and duty, for Englishmen use the words very sparingly—are enriched by a great bequest. Fellowship and friendship mean more to-day than they meant before the War. The air that children breathe, even when they are at play, now comes to them tonic, from the heights. These things are the touch of live spirits, present or absent. The names here printed in thick type have appeared in many Oxford lists before this. We print them now, with reverence and affection, for the last time, in this final Roll, as a tribute from the University to the dearest of her sons.

EXPLANATORY NOTE

The details which have been collected about members of the University in this Roll are given, so far as possible, in the following order :

Date of Matriculation.

Name, Degree, and Distinctions gained before the War

Date of commencement of Service (in brackets).

Rank, Unit, and, in brackets, highest acting rank.

Fields of Foreign Service.

Distinctions gained during the War. (The dates given are those of the Gazettes.)

Mentions in Dispatches.

The following symbols have been employed :

* to denote membership of the University Contingent of the Officers' Training Corps prior to 1915.

‡ to denote Service in the ranks before Commission.

D. to denote mentions in Dispatches.

D. § to denote mentions by the Secretary of State for valuable service in connexion with the War.

The names of those who have lost their lives on Service are printed in heavy type.

The names of some who, after having been accepted for admission to a College, lost their lives in the War before being actually matriculated, have been included in the Roll.
