Why "Good Enough" Ads Don't Work Anymore

By Anesa K. Chastain Jones - Advertising Insights with Anesa
Oklahoma's Choice Weekly

A lot of businesses are still advertising like it's 2006: one generic ad, pasted everywhere, and hoped for the best. Today, your customers are scrolling past thousands of messages a day. "Good enough" doesn't even get noticed.

What works now has less to do with big budgets and more to do with clarity: knowing exactly who you're talking to, what problem you're solving for them, and where they're actually paying attention. The businesses that win are the ones willing to think a little deeper about their message instead of shouting the same line into every crowd.

Know who you're really talking to "Everyone" is not an audience. When you try to reach everyone, you end up resonating with no one.

A better approach: picture one real person you want this ad to reach. What do they worry about? What annoys them? What would make their week easier or better? Write the ad as if you're speaking directly to that person.

A tire shop talking to "car owners" will sound like every other tire shop. A tire shop talking to "busy parents who can't afford to be stranded on the highway with kids in the backseat" will write a very different, and much more effective ad.

Lead with benefits, not features

Most ads list features:

"Family-owned since 1982."

"State-of-the-art equipment."

"Full line of services."

Those may be true, but they don't answer the only question your reader really cares about: "What's in it for me?"

Translate features into benefits:

"Family-owned since 1982", "Decades of experience you can trust when the unexpected happens."

"State-of-the-art equipment", "Faster, more accurate work, so you're back on the road sooner."

"Full line of services", "One stop instead of three, save time, gas, and headaches."

If your ad doesn't clearly spell out how life gets easier, cheaper, safer, or more enjoyable for the customer, it's not done yet.

Make one clear, simple offer

A common mistake in local advertising is trying to cram everything into one space: every service, every discount, every contact method. The result is a busy ad that looks important but doesn't move anyone to do anything.

Instead, choose one primary offer per ad:

"Book your free estimate this week."

"Call for our May livestock sale schedule."

"Show this ad for 10% off your first visit."

Make that offer obvious, easy, and, when you can, time-bound. If someone reads your ad and can't answer "What should I do next?" in one sentence, the call-to-action needs to be clearer.

Match the ad to where it lives

The same ad shouldn't behave the same way in print, on Facebook, on your website, and on a roadside banner.

In print, people are often sitting and looking you can use a bit more copy and detail. On social, you're fighting for attention mid-scroll, so your hook and visual have to carry the weight in a split second. On your website, the person has already chosen to be there, so now you can slow down and explain, answer questions, and build trust.

You don't need completely different campaigns for every channel, but you should tweak your headline, length, and format so the ad feels at home wherever it's running.

Use AI as an assistant, not the author

AI can help you brainstorm headlines, rewrite a clunky sentence, or generate variations for testing. It's great at getting you from a blank page to a decent draft quickly. But it doesn't know your customers, your town, or your reputation the way you do.

Treat it like a junior assistant who can generate ideas and first drafts, not the final voice of your business. Your job is still to decide: Does this sound like us? Would our customers actually respond to this? Is this something we'd be proud to put our name on?

The combination of human judgment plus AI speed is powerful. Letting AI speak for your business without supervision is just handing your voice to a robot that's never set foot in your community.

When you're ready to move beyond "good enough" ads, we can help. Oklahoma's Choice Weekly works with businesses every week to turn vague messages into clear offers that actually get noticed. To talk about an ad that fits your goals and your budget, contact Oklahoma's Choice Weekly and let's plan your next issue together.
