INTRODUCTION

When the Zondervan Pictorial Bible Dictionary appeared in 1963, under the general editorship of the well-known New Testament scholar Merrill C. Tenney, it quickly established itself as a standard one-volume reference work for the study of Scripture. Almost twenty-five years later, a completely revised edition, which came to be known as the New International Bible Dictionary, was published under the capable direction of J. D. Douglas. The present revision preserves a fundamental continuity with the two previous editions, yet in many important respects it represents a new work.

The most obvious difference is of course its general appearance. Printed in full color throughout, the Zondervan Illustrated Bible Dictionary (ZIBD) includes more than 470 striking photographs and more than 17 freshly produced maps. The new artistic design and use of fonts greatly enhance the attractiveness and clarity of the work.

More substantial, however, are the changes in content. Almost 1,800 new entries have been added, bringing the total to over 7,200 (including many useful cross-references that make it easier for the user to find desired information). Articles dealing with the books of the Bible now include a sidebar with concise information concerning authorship, historical setting, purpose, and contents. Every article has been revised and updated, and although in some cases the changes required were minor, most entries involved thorough revision or even total rewriting. In this process, the editor had the advantage of being able to make use of the revised edition of the Zondervan Encyclopedia of the Bible (ZEB). Particularly in the case of shorter articles, material from ZEB was often transferred (with only minor revisions) to the corresponding ZIBD entries. Thus the one-volume work, while retaining many distinctive features not found in ZEB, may be regarded to some extent as an abbreviated version of its multivolume cousin.

What this means for the reader is the benefit of using ZIBD with greater confidence. One-volume Bible dictionaries often report information or make claims that—because of space limitations or for other reasons—are not properly documented. If an item seems unusual (e.g., a statement is made that contradicts an alternate work of reference), readers may find it quite difficult to verify the information. Users of ZIBD, in contrast, knowing that most of the material is treated more fully in ZEB (which usually includes argumentation, some technical data, and extensive bibliographies), can readily consult the larger work for further details.

Although much of the material in ZIBD can still be traced back to one or both of the previous editions, the changes have been so extensive that attributing articles to individual authors would in most cases prove misleading. Rather than make arbitrary decisions in specific cases, all the entries now appear unsigned. The revising editor and all readers, however, will continue to be indebted to the original writers, whose names appear listed in both of the earlier editions.

All biblical quotations, unless otherwise noted, come from the NIV/TNIV. Because using this dual reference is cumbersome and usually unnecessary, the abbreviation NIV should be assumed to include TNIV; when the latter has a different rendering relevant to the discussion, the difference is noted. Other translations, especially the NRSV, are often noted to indicate alternate interpretations. Quotations of the Apocrypha are taken from the NRSV. Because of the historical significance and continued use of the KJV, attention is given to its distinct name forms, to selected problems related to it (such as words and phrases not easily understood today), and to some of its influential renderings.

For the benefit of readers who are not proficient in the biblical languages, the Goodrick-Kohlenberger numbers are included with individual Hebrew, Aramaic, and Greek words. The transliteration of such words follows the academic style adopted in The SBL Handbook of Style (1999), chapter 5. To aid the user in finding relevant material, thousands of cross-references are included; these are indicated with small caps. Within the body of the articles, cross-references are normally marked only on first mention.

Alphabetization

The entries in this dictionary are alphabetized according to the so-called letter-by-letter system: a parenthesis or a comma interrupts the alphabetizing, but all other punctuation marks and word spaces are ignored (cf. The Chicago Manual of Style, 15th ed. [2003], sect. 18.56–59). Note the order in the following example:

Beth Anoth

Bethany

Beth Ashbea

Some dictionaries and encyclopedias follow the word-by-word method, according to which any punctuation mark or word space also interrupts the alphabetizing. In the example above, they would place “Beth Ashbea” and many other “Beth-” compounds before “Bethany.” Usually these differences do not create obstacles, but in certain cases—when a large number of items or a long article separates similar entries—the user may on first try be unable to find a particular entry where expected. Note the potential confusion in the following example:

sea
sea, brazen Sea, Great sea, molten sea cow sea gull seah seal sea monster sea of glass

Because the article on “seal” extends several paragraphs—so that the entry “sea monster” could pass unnoticed—the reader may infer that “sea gull” is the last “sea” entry. In short, users should not assume that an article is missing if they do not find it on first try.

The only exception to strict alphabetical order is in the case of dual articles that treat the same topic focusing respectively on the OT and the NT. For example, “chronology (OT)” comes before “chronology (NT).”

Proper Names

The representation of Middle Eastern names in English is fraught with difficulties, resulting in a bewildering diversity of spellings (except in the case of widely used names whose English orthography has become conventional). Some writers adopt a precise transliteration, using numerous diacritical markings that distinguish between fairly subtle sound differences; others prefer a greatly simplified system that ignores even important distinctions. The present work seeks a middle ground. For example, in the representation of Arabic names (used for most archaeological sites and modern villages in the Holy Land), vowel length is ignored, but differences in the consonants have been carefully preserved (e.g., h / ḥ / ḥ).

With regard to biblical names specifically, the spelling follows the NIV, but alternate forms are also included (primarily from the TNIV, KJV, and NRSV).

The articles begin with initial parenthetical information that gives the original form in transliterated Hebrew, Aramaic, or Greek, followed by the meaning of the name, if known. Most of these meanings cannot be confirmed definitively, however, and even when there is a reasonable degree of certainty, one cannot be sure what may have motivated the parents to choose a particular name (a characteristic of the child? an event at the time of birth? a parental hope? the desire to honor an ancestor or an important figure by using that person's name? an ascription of praise to God not specifically related to the child? merely the perception that the name had a pleasant sound?).

Pronunciation guides have been provided for all biblical names as well as for selected names found outside the Bible. With relatively few exceptions, the information is taken from W. O. Walker Jr. et al., The HarperCollins Bible Pronunciation Guide (1989), which uses a simple system for indicating English sounds, as shown below. There exists of course a standard pronunciation for a large number of well-known biblical names. Numerous other names, however, are not in common use and thus there is no "accepted" or conventional pronunciation for them. The approach used by Walker and his associate editors gives preference to what would likely be considered a natural English pronunciation (i.e., consistent with how similarly spelled words in English are usually pronounced). Biblical scholars, however, frequently favor a pronunciation that comes closer to that of the original languages, particularly in the case of Hebrew names. Thus for the name Hazor, Walker gives the pronunciation hay'zor, but many biblical students prefer hah-tsor'. In short, then, the pronunciation guides included in this dictionary are not presented as authoritative prescriptions; many of them should be regarded only as reasonable suggestions.

PREFACE TO THE SECOND EDITION (ABBREVIATED)

For more than two decades the Zondervan Pictorial Bible Dictionary has been a best-seller. During that period, however, more background information has become available. Archaeological excavations have been carried out on biblical sites. New books have been written to enhance our understanding of the Bible. A further dimension was added with the publication of the New International Version of the Bible.

These developments are reflected in this revision. The revision has been so thorough, in fact, that the dictionary merits a new name: New International Dictionary of the Bible. There is, for example, a completely new entry on archaeology, and, where necessary, notes have been added to the individual entries dealing with particular sites.

Every reviser is in debt to the original editors and writers and lives with a nagging feeling of presumptuousness in setting out to amend or supersede the work of bygone saints. Why did they say this or that? Did they know something we don't know? This haunting and not-unlikely possibility is a healthy inhibiting factor for brandishers of blue pencils.

This is especially relevant when confronting a presentation that is put a little more forcefully than one would expect in a dictionary of the Bible. In the following pages a reasonable amount of idiosyncrasy has been perpetuated in certain entries; with a certain affectionate indulgence we recognize that that was the way in which some of our elders drew attention to the importance of their topics.

Dictionaries are particularly vulnerable because a writer has to say in a few words what others expand into whole books. Contributors to dictionaries of the Bible are further at risk because some of their subjects lend themselves to controversy. In treating them, mention may be made either of opinions not within the Evangelical tradition or of widely divergent interpretations within that tradition. We hope that this policy will have no adverse effect on anyone's blood pressure. It was, indeed, an eminent physician, Sir Wilfred Grenfell, who reminded us that two men can think differently without either being wicked.

The consulting editors are not to be held accountable for the finished revision. None of them has seen all of it. All of them responded to the initial invitation to comment on what needed to be done. Moreover, all were contributors as well as consultants, and the work has greatly benefited. But someone had to see the work last, so for the final choice of material the revising editor alone is responsible.

In addition to article writers, a number of people worked very hard and lightened the editorial task. Doug Buckwalter and David Lazell shared their expertise in the peculiarly demanding job of adapting some of the omnibus articles to NIV usage. Myra Wilson cheerfully did a mass of accurate typing and checking; Ruj Vanavisut meticulously performed a daunting load of secretarial and kindred chores; Louan and Walter Elwell selflessly provided a second home and library facilities for a traveling editor. For the publisher, Stan Gundry was a model of restraint in letting the editor get on with the project unhindered but was ready to respond promptly to editorial requests.

J. D. DOUGLAS

PREFACE TO THE FIRST EDITION (ABBREVIATED)

Robert A. Millikan, American physicist and Nobel prizewinner, once said that a knowledge of the Bible is an indispensable qualification of a well-educated man. No other single book in the history of literature has been so widely distributed or read, or has exercised so powerful an influence upon civilization. It is the fountainhead of Western culture, and is the sole source of spiritual life and revelation for all Christians. For the development of Christian experience and for the propagation of faith, a study of the Scriptures is absolutely necessary. The history, laws, prophecies, sermons and letters which they contain provide God's estimate of man and His disclosure of Himself through the historic process of revelation culminating in the person of His Son, Jesus Christ.

Understanding the Bible is often difficult for the average reader because of the unfamiliar names of persons, places, and objects to which it alludes. The historical and cultural backgrounds are alien to those of the modern day and presuppose knowledge that is not easily attainable. The function of a Bible dictionary is to render accessible a body of information that will enable one to comprehend the meaning of the text he is reading, and to obtain ready and complete data concerning any related subject.

Within recent years, the need for a new, up-to-date reference work has become increasingly urgent. Fresh discoveries in archaeology, better understanding of the history and geography of the Middle East, and the fruit of multiplied research have provided new insights and interpretations. The advance of the graphic arts has improved greatly the effectiveness of photography, so that the artifacts and inscriptions of the past can be reproduced vividly for public exhibition. Realizing the opportunity for a fresh venture in this field, the Zondervan Publishing House, inspired by the interest and foresight of Mr. Peter deVisser, Director of Publications, has undertaken the task of creating a totally new dictionary, enlisting the cooperation of sixty-five competent scholars in every field from archaeology to zoology. The content includes more than 5,000 entries, among which may be found a number of important monographs on biblical and theological topics. In addition, the dictionary contains an extensive series of articles on Christian doctrines.

This Pictorial Bible Dictionary is a completely new, fully illustrated one-volume work. It is designed to provide quick access to explanatory data, both by the verbal exposition of biographical, chronological, geographical, and historical aspects of the Bible, and by the illustrations related to them. The pictures have been selected for their relevance to the subject matter, for their historical value, and also with an eye to human interest.

The scope of a one-volume dictionary is necessarily limited. The articles are not intended to be exhaustive, nor are they planned primarily for professional scholars. They are gauged for the use of pastors, Sunday-school teachers, Bible-class leaders, and students who desire concise and accurate information on questions raised by ordinary reading. For intensive research, a more detailed and critical work is recommended.

Although the articles are written from a conservative viewpoint, each writer has been free to express his own opinions and is responsible for the material that appears over his signature. There may be minor disagreements between statements by different persons; in such instances there is room for debate, and the contributors have liberty to differ. Uncertainty still exists in some fields, since sufficient data are not available for final conclusions.

Special acknowledgments are due to Dr. Steven Barabas, Associate Editor, who collaborated in preparing articles for publication, and who contributed many himself; to Dr. E. M. Blaiklock, Professor Wick Broomall, Dr. Howard Z. Cleveland, the Rev. Charles Cook, Dr. Carl De Vries, the Rev. Arthur B. Fowler, the Rev. J. P. Freeman, Dr. Guy B. Funderburk, the Rev. Clyde E. Harrington, Dr. D. Edmond Hiebert, the Rev. John G. Johansson, the Rev. Brewster Porcella, Professor Arthur M. Ross, Dr. Emmet Russell, and Dr. Walter Wessel, who, in addition to the initialed articles published under their names, contributed many of the unsigned articles; to Miss Verda Bloomhuff and the Rev. Briggs P. Dingman, who assisted in correction of copy and proof; and to Mrs. Carol Currie and Mrs. Alice Holmes for invaluable secretarial service. The General Editor wishes to express his gratitude to all those scholars named in the list of contributors who have lent their time and counsel to the production of this book.

Aaron. air'uhn (Heb. ʾahărôn H195, derivation uncertain, possibly an Egyp. name; Gk. Aarōn G2). The oldest son of AMRAM and JOCHEBED, of the tribe of LEVI, and brother of MOSES and MIRIAM (Exod. 6:20; Num. 26:59). He was born during the captivity in EGYPT, before PHARAOH's edict that all male infants should be destroyed, and was three years older than Moses (Exod. 7:7). His name first appears in God's commission to Moses. When Moses protested that he did not have sufficient ability in public speaking to undertake the mission to Pharaoh, God declared that Aaron should be spokesman for his brother (4:10-16). So Aaron met Moses at "the mountain of God" (4:27) after forty years' separation, and took him back to the family home in Goshen. Aaron introduced him to the elders of the people and persuaded them to accept him as their leader. Together Moses and Aaron went to Pharaoh's court, where they carried on the negotiations that finally brought an end to the oppression of the Israelites and precipitated the EXODUS from Egypt.

During Moses' forty years in the wilderness Aaron had married ELISHEBA, daughter of AMMINADAB and sister of NAHSHON, a prince of the tribe of JUDAH (Exod. 6:23; 1 Chr. 2:10). They had four sons: NADAB, ABIHU, ELEAZAR, and ITHAMAR (Exod. 6:23).

After the Israelites left Egypt, Aaron assisted his brother during the wandering in the wilderness. On the way to SINAI, in the battle with AMALEK, Aaron and HUR held up Moses' hands (Exod. 17:9-13), in which was the staff of God. Israel consequently won the battle. With the establishment of the TABERNACLE, Aaron became high priest in charge of the national WORSHIP and the head of the hereditary priesthood (see PRIEST).

In character Aaron was weak and occasionally jealous. He and Miriam criticized Moses for having married a Cushite woman (Num. 12:1-2; see CUSH #3). This complaint may have been an intentionally insulting reference to ZIPPORAH. (See Hab. 3:7 for a linking of MIDIAN and Cush; Zipporah is always elsewhere described as a Midianite.) Behind this personal slight lies a more serious threat to Moses' position. Aaron was high priest and thus the supreme religious leader of Israel; Miriam was a prophetess (Exod. 15:20). The great issue was not whether Moses had married a particular person but whether he could any longer be considered the sole, authoritative mouthpiece of God. As Aaron and Miriam said, "Hasn't he [the LORD] also spoken through us?" (Num. 12:2). It is in the light of this basic challenge to Moses' God-given status that we must understand and appreciate the prompt and dramatic response of the Lord (12:4-15).

We may further note that Aaron's own authority as priest did not go unchallenged. It becomes clear that when KORAH and his company (Num. 16) challenged Moses' leadership, Aaron's priesthood too was called into question. By the miraculous sign of the flowering and fruit-bearing staff, the Lord identified Aaron as his chosen priest (17:1-9) and accorded him a perpetual priesthood by ordering his staff to be deposited in the sanctuary (17:10).

When Moses went up Mount Sinai to receive the tablets of the law from God, Aaron acceded to the people's demand for a visible god that they could worship. Taking their personal jewelry, he melted it in a furnace and made a golden calf similar to the familiar bull-god of Egypt. The people hailed this image as the god who had brought them out of Egypt. Aaron did not remonstrate with them but built an altar and proclaimed a feast to the Lord on the next day, which the people celebrated with revelry and debauchery (Exod. 32:1-6). When Moses returned from the mountain and rebuked Aaron for aiding this abuse, Aaron gave this naive answer: "They gave me the gold, and I threw it into the fire, and out came this calf!" (32:24). It may be that Aaron meant to restrain the people by a compromise, but he was wholly unsuccessful. See also CALF WORSHIP.

In the biblical narrative much is made of the consecration of Aaron and his sons as priests. The “dignity and honor” (Exod. 28:2) of their office was expressed in garments of great beauty and significance: the breastpiece, ephod, robe, tunic, turban, and sash. The ceremony of appointment is described in Exod. 29 and enacted in Lev. 8. It involved presenting a sin offering and a burnt offering on behalf of the priests-to-be (Exod. 29:10-14, 15-18), for though they were priests, they were first of all sinners needing the grace of God in atonement (Heb. 5:2-3). See SACRIFICE AND OFFERINGS.

The consecration included three special ceremonies: (1) their ears, hands, and feet were touched with the blood of a ram (Exod. 29:19-20), signifying respectively the hallowing of the mind and of the acts and directions of life—what they would hear, what they would do, where they would go; (2) they were anointed with oil mingled with the sacrificial blood (29:21), symbolizing the grace of God in atonement (blood) and endowment (oil); (3) their hands were filled with some of the fat of the slain beasts along with various sorts of bread, and the whole was lifted up in offering to the Lord (29:22-23). Just as we say that a busy person “has his hands full,” so they consecrated to the Lord the whole business of living—life’s special duties, seen in the fat of the sacrifices, and life’s ordinary cares and needs, seen in the bread. After eight days (Lev. 9:1) Aaron and his sons entered their public ministry, presenting the sin offering, burnt offering, and fellowship offering on behalf of the people. This first act of ministry received divine ratification in the appearing of the glory of the Lord and the fire of God that fell on the offering (9:23-24).

At the end of the wilderness wandering, Aaron was warned of his impending death. He and Moses went up Mount HOR, where Aaron was stripped of his priestly robes, which passed in succession to his son Eleazar. Aaron died at the age of 123 and was buried on the mountain (Num. 20:22-29; 33:38; Deut. 10:6; 32:50). The people mourned for him thirty days.

The Psalms speak of the priestly line as the “house of Aaron” (Ps. 115:10, 12; 118:3; 135:19), and Aaron is mentioned in Hebrews as a type of Christ, who was “called by God, just as Aaron was” (Heb. 5:4-5), though the eternal priesthood of Christ is stated explicitly to be derived from MELCHIZEDEK and not from Aaron (7:11).

Aaronites. air’uh-nīts. This term is used by the KJV in two passages where the Hebrew simply has AARON, but where the reference is clearly to his descendants (1 Chr. 12:27; 27:17; in the former passage the NIV translates, “the family of Aaron”).

Aaron's staff (rod). When KORAH and his confederates challenged the leadership of MOSES and AARON (Num. 16-17, possibly the most important event during the thirty-seven years of wandering described in chs. 15-19), Moses demanded that the staffs of each of the princes of the tribes be given him; and he placed their staffs with Aaron's "before the LORD in the Tent of the Testimony" (17:7). The next day Aaron's staff was found to have budded, vindicating the divine authority of Aaron as high priest (17:8). It was then placed before the ARK OF THE COVENANT in the Holy of Holies to be preserved as a witness against all who might rebel against his authority (17:8-10). (It is possible that the staff was subsequently placed inside the ark, as Heb. 9:4 suggests.)

The staff referred to is very likely the same shepherd's staff Moses was carrying at the time of his call (Exod. 4:2). When turned into a serpent, it became a sign to Moses and Aaron, to Israel, and to Pharaoh of the divine mission and authority of Moses (v. 17). It is twice called "the staff of God" (4:20; 17:9). In the battle with AMALEK the staff was in Moses' hand; and Aaron and Hur supported his arms when he was weary (17:9-13). Moses was commanded to take the staff, and he and Aaron were told to "speak to that rock" (Num. 20:8). Instead of following these instructions implicitly, Moses (evidently with Aaron's support) spoke arrogantly to the people, and Moses lifted up his hand with his staff and smote the rock twice (v. 11), acts of presumption for which he and Aaron were severely punished.

All of the expressions used are natural in view of the significance of the staff. It was called "the staff of God," for it was the symbol of God's authority; it was Moses' staff, because it belonged to him and was carried by him; it was also Aaron's staff, because Aaron at times spoke and acted for Moses.

Ab. ab. The fifth month (July-August) in the Babylonian CALENDAR used by postexilic Israel. This name is not found in the Bible.

Abaddon. uh-bad'uhn (Gk. Abaddōn G3). This Hebrew name, with its Greek equivalent Apollyon, is used once in the NT with reference to the evil angel who reigns over the infernal regions of the ABYSS (Rev. 9:11). The Hebrew noun ʾābaddōn H11, meaning "[place of] destruction, ruin," but variously translated, occurs only in a few poetic passages (Job 26:6; 28:22; 31:12; Ps. 88:11; Prov. 15:11; 27:20).

VASHTI to a royal feast (Esth. 1:10).

Abana. ab'uh-nuh (Heb. ʾābānâ H76, “stony”). Also Abanah. The name of a river that flows through DAMASCUS, mentioned in the Bible only once, when NAAMAN asked, “Are not Abana and Pharpar, the rivers of Damascus, better than any of the waters of Israel?” (2 Ki. 5:12; an alternate reading in the Heb. MSS is AMANA). The Greeks called it the Chrysorrhoas (“golden stream”); it is the same as the modern Barada River. Beginning 23 mi. (37 km.) NW of Damascus in the Antilebanon Mountains, this river makes Damascus, though bordering on a desert, a very lovely and fertile area. It divides into nine or ten branches and spreads out like an open fan into the plain E of Damascus.

Abarim. ab'uh-rim (Heb. ʿābārîm H6305, “the regions beyond”). The region E of the JORDAN (TRANSJORDAN), and specifically a mountain range in NW MOAB that includes Mount NEBO. The Israelites encamped here just before crossing the Jordan, and from one of its peaks MOSES saw the Promised Land (Num. 27:12; 33:47-48; Deut. 32:49; Jer. 22:20).

Abba. ah'buh, ab'uh (Gk. abba G5). An ARAMAIC term meaning “father,” transliterated into Greek in the NT and thence into English. It occurs in three NT prayers (Mk. 14:36; Rom. 8:15; Gal. 4:6) together with the Greek word for “father” (abba ho patēr). It is probable that Jesus used this word also in many of the instances where the Greek Gospels record that he addressed or referred to God as FATHER. Because Jewish children used Abba when speaking to or about their fathers, some have argued that the term should be translated “Daddy.” However, Abba was the standard expression used also by adults, even when referring very respectfully to a rabbi. See also SON OF GOD.

Abda. ab'duh (Heb. ʿabdā ʾ H6272, “servant, worshiper”; possibly short form of OBADIAH, “servant of Yahweh”). (1) Father of ADONIRAM, who was a high official of SOLOMON in charge of forced labor (1 Ki. 4:6).

(2) Son of Shammua and a postexilic chief LEVITE in Jerusalem (Neh. 11:17; called Obadiah son of Shemaiah in 1 Chr. 9:16).

Abdeel. ab'dee-uhl (Heb. ʿabdē ʾēl H6274, “servant of God” [cf. ABDA]). Father of an official named SHELEMIAH; the latter, with two other officials, was instructed by King JEHOIAKIM to arrest BARUCH the scribe and JEREMIAH the prophet (Jer. 36:26).

Abdi. ab'di (Heb. ʿabdî H6279, possibly short form of O_{BADIAH}, “servant of Yahweh”). (1) A _{LEVITE} of the family of _{MERARI} whose grandson _{ETHAN} was made a songmaster by _{DAVID} (1 Chr. 6:44 [Heb. v. 29]).

(2) Father of _{KISH}, a Levite of the family of _{MERARI}; Kish took part in the cleansing and consecration of the temple under King _{HEZEKIAH} (2 Chr. 29:12).

(3) One of the descendants of Elam who agreed to put away their foreign wives (Ezra 10:26).

Abdiel. ab'dee-uhl (Heb. ʿabdî ʾēl H6280, “servant of God” [cf. _{ABDEEL}]). Son of Guni and father of Ahi; the latter was head of a clan in the tribe of _{GAD} that lived in _{GILEAD} and _{BASHAN} (1 Chr. 5:15).

Abdon (person). ab'duhn (Heb. ʿabdôn H6277, “servant” or “servile”). (1) Son of Hillel and the eleventh mentioned judge of Israel in the book of _{JUDGES}. Abdon “judged” Israel eight years, probably from _{PIRATHON} in the hill country of _{EPHRAIM}. The reference to his “forty sons and thirty grandsons, who rode on seventy donkeys” probably signifies the wealth and prominence of his family. Abdon was buried in Pirathon (Jdg. 12:13-15). Nothing is said about his rule. _{JOSEPHUS} suggests that his reign was a peaceful one, and therefore “he had no occasion to perform glorious actions” (Ant. 5.7.15 §273).

(2) Oldest son of Jeiel (KJV, “Jehiel”) and Maacah of _{GIBEON}, included in the two lists of _{SAUL}’s genealogy (1 Chr. 8:30; 9:36). See also _{ABIEL}.

(3) Son of Micah, sent by King _{JOSIAH} with other officials to inquire of _{HULDAH} the prophetess, after the book of the law of the Lord was read before him (2 Chr. 34:20; called Acbor son of Micaiah in 2 Ki. 22:12, 14; Jer. 26:22).

(4) Son of Shashak (1 Chr. 8:23, cf. v. 25), a Benjamite living in Jerusalem, probably in _{NEHEMIAH}’s time (see vv. 1, 28).

Abdon (place). ab'duhn (Heb. ʿabdôn H6278, possibly “service”). One of the four Levitical towns in the territory of _{ASHER} (Josh. 21:30; 1 Chr. 6:74), probably located at modern Khirbet ʿAbdah about 15 mi. (24 km.) S of _{TYRE}; perhaps to be identified with the _{EBRON} of Josh. 19:28 (where some Heb. MSS read “Abdon” instead of “Ebron”).

Abednego. uh-bed'ni-goh (Heb. ʿăbēd nēgô H6284 [Aram. H10524], possibly “servant of [the god] _{NEBO}”). The Babylonian name that _{ASHPENAZ}, chief officer of NEBUCHADNEZZAR king of BABYLON, gave to AZARIAH, one of the three Israelite youths who were companions of DANIEL (Dan. 1:7). The other two were SHADRACH and MESHACH. Daniel and his three friends belonged to the Hebrew royal family and are described as “young men without any physical defect, handsome, showing aptitude for every kind of learning, well informed, quick to understand, and qualified to serve in the king’s palace” (1:3-4). They were to be educated for three years in the “language and literature of the Babylonians.” They determined, however, not to defile themselves with the “royal food and wine”; instead, they ate vegetables and drank water for ten days (vv. 8-14). At the end of this trial period, it was obvious that “they looked healthier and better nourished than any of the young men who ate the royal food” (v. 15). Later, the three youths were appointed provincial administrators (2:49). They also proved to be of stalwart faith and piety, and withstood all pressures to worship the pagan image set up by NEBUCHADNEZZAR. In consequence of this, all three were cast into a fiery furnace, but they were miraculously delivered (3:1-30; see DANIEL, BOOK OF). The NT alludes to them when it mentions the heroes of faith who “quenched the fury of the flames” (Heb. 11:34).

Abel (person). ayˈbuhl (Heb. hebel H2040, “breath, vanity,” or “son, heir”; Gk. Abel G6, also Habel). ADAM and EVE’s second son, who was murdered by his brother CAIN (Gen. 4). “Abel kept flocks, and Cain worked the soil” (4:2). The problem that caused disaffection between the brothers arose when Cain brought a vegetable offering to the Lord, and Abel brought a lamb from the flock. “The Lord looked with favor on Abel and his offering, but on Cain and his offering he did not look with favor” (4:4-5). What this precisely means the Bible does not make clear. Perhaps the Lord had previously made his will known that he must be approached with blood-sacrifice (cf. 3:21); or possibly with this incident between Cain and Abel the Lord revealed that he required such an offering. Two things tend to suggest an earlier revelation of this requirement: first, the Genesis account has “Abel and his offering,” “Cain and his offering,” in each case putting the person first and suggesting that the one came in a correct spirit whereas the other did not. Second, the epistle to the Hebrews suggests the same view: “By faith Abel offered God a better sacrifice than Cain did” (Heb. 11:4; cf. 12:24). How could he have acted in faith if there had not been a prior word from the Lord for him to believe and obey? Cain, by contrast, came in a defiant spirit, as is revealed in his hurt refusal of the Lord’s reminder that the right way was open to him and in his resentful murder of his brother. Thus Abel became the first exemplar of the way of righteousness through faith (Matt. 23:35; Lk. 11:51; 1 Jn. 3:12).

Abel (place). ayˈbuhl (Heb. ʾābēl H64, “meadow”). A name found in various compounds, apparently used to describe the nature of a site or its surroundings. In 2 Sam. 20:18 Abel is the shortened form of ABEL BETH MAACAH. In 1 Sam. 6:18 the KJV reads, “the great stone of Abel,” but the Hebrew text probably means, “the great meadow”; the NIV translates “the large rock,” following a few Hebrew MSS and the SEPTUAGINT (similarly other English versions).

Abel Acacia Grove. See SHITTIM.

Abel Beth Maacah. ayˈbuhl-beth-mayˈuh-kuh (Heb. ʾābēl bêt ma ʿākâ H68 [with spelling variations], “meadow of the house of oppression”). Sometimes translated “Abel of Beth-maacah,” and also known as Abel Maim (2 Chr. 16:4). A town in the extreme N of Palestine, modern Abil el-Qamh, about 12 mi. (19 km.) N of Lake Huleh and a few miles W of the city of DAN, in the tribal territory of NAPHTALI (2 Sam. 20:15; 1 Ki. 15:20). Abel Beth Maacah is mentioned in some early Egyptian sources. SHEBA son of Bicri fled to it when his revolt against DAVID failed. The town was saved from assault by JOAB when, with its proverbial shrewdness, it followed the advice of “a wise woman” that the people sacrifice Sheba (2 Sam. 20:14-22). About eighty years later it was seized by BEN-HADAD (1 Ki. 15:20) and in 734 B.C. by TIGLATH-PILESER, who carried off its inhabitants to ASSYRIA (2 Ki. 15:29).

Excavated area of Abel Beth Maacah (view to the NE).

Abel Keramim. ayˈbuhl-kerˈuh-mim (Heb. ʾābēl kērāmîm H70, “meadow of vineyards”). Also Abel-cheramim. A place in AMMON, E of the JORDAN. JEPHTHAH is said to have “devastated twenty towns from Aroer to the vicinity of Minnith, as far as Abel Keramim” (Jdg. 11:33; KJV, “the plain of the vineyards”). Its location is uncertain, but it was probably S of the JABBOK River, near modern Amman.

Abel Maim. ayˈbuhl-mayˈim (Heb. ʾābēl mayim H72, “meadow of water”). Also Abel-maim. An alternate name for ABEL BETH MAACAH; it occurs only in 2 Chr. 16:4.

Abel Meholah. ayˈbuhl-mi-hohˈluh (Heb. ʾābēl mēhōlâ H71, “meadow of dancing”). The hometown of ELISHA the prophet (1 Ki. 19:16). This is where ELIJAH, returning from HOREB on his way to DAMASCUS, found Elisha and his servants plowing with twelve yoke of oxen. Previously, Abel Meholah had figured in GIDEON’s smashing victory over the Midianite camp in the JEZREEL Valley (Jdg. 7:22). The identification of this town is debated, but during SOLOMON’s reign it was included in the same district as BETH SHAN (1 Ki. 4:12), so many scholars locate it S of Beth Shan and W of the Jordan. Abel Meholah was probably the hometown of “Adriel the Meholathite,” a man to whom SAUL gave his eldest daughter, MERAB (1 Sam. 18:19; 2 Sam. 21:8; NIV, “Adriel of Meholah”). See ADRIEL.

Abel Mizraim. ayˈbuhl-mizˈray-im (Heb. ʾābēl miṣrayim H73, “meadow of Egypt,” apparently a wordplay on ʾēbel H65, “mourning”). A place near the JORDAN River at which the funeral cortège of JACOB stopped to mourn for seven days before proceeding to MACHPELAH to bury the patriarch (Gen. 50:10-11). The site was known as the “threshing floor of Atad,” but it was renamed the “mourning of Egypt” because Pharaoh’s officials, as well as Egyptian chariots and horsemen, took part in the funeral rites (vv. 8-9). The site is often thought to have been E of the river, but the Hebrew phrase rendered “beyond the Jordan” by most versions can mean more generally “the region of the Jordan.”

Abel Shittim. ayˈbuhl-shitˈim (Heb. ʾābēl haššitîm H69, “meadow of the acacias”). A locality in the plains of MOAB where the Israelites camped before entering the Promised Land (Num. 33:49). See SHITTIM.

Abez. ayˈbez. See EBEB.

Abi, Abia(h). ayˈbi, uh-biˈuh. See ABIJAH.

Abi-Albon. ayˈbi-alˈbuhn (Heb. ʔābî-ʔalbôn H50, meaning uncertain). Identified as an Arbathite (meaning prob. that he was from BETH ARABAH), Abi-Albon was a member of DAVID's thirty mighty warriors (2 Sam. 23:31). Many think this form of the name is corrupt, for he is called ABIEL in the parallel (1 Chr. 11:32).

Abiasaph. uh-biˈuh-saf (Heb. ʔābî-ʔāsāp H25, “[my] father has gathered”; spelled ʔebyāsāp H47 in 1 Chr.). Also Ebiasaph. Son (or descendant) of KORAH and descendant of LEVI (Exod. 6:24; 1 Chr. 9:19). The order of succession in Exod. 6:16-24 and 1 Chr. 6:37-38 is Kohath, Izhar, Korah, A/Ebiasaph; but in 1 Chr. 6:22-23 it is given as Kohath, Amminadab, Korah, Assir, Elkanah, Ebiasaph. He is apparently called ASAPH in 1 Chr. 26:1 (cf. LXX).

Abiathar. uh-biˈuh-thahr (Heb. ʔebyātār H59, “father of abundance”). Son of the high priest AHIMELECH. The latter, along with eighty-four other priests, was killed at NOB on SAUL's instructions, after DOEG had told the king that Ahimelech had helped DAVID by inquiring of the Lord for him and by giving him GOLIATH's sword (1 Sam. 22). Abiathar somehow escaped the slaughter and joined David, bringing the oracular EPHOD with him (22:20-23). Subsequently, Abiathar and ZADOK seem to have functioned as joint high priests, an arrangement that continued through David's reign (cf. 2 Sam. 15:24, 27, 29). Abiathar did not, however, give the same loyalty to SOLOMON, but associated himself with the cause of ADONIJAH, the eldest surviving son of David (1 Ki. 1:7, 19, 25). It would appear that, even after the failure of Adonijah's attempt to succeed David, Abiathar was in some way still linked with him, for when Adonijah was executed on suspicion of plotting a coup, Abiathar was banished from Jerusalem (2:22-27). This act terminated the joint priesthood of Zadok and Abiathar (as still referred to in 1 Ki. 4:4), and also fulfilled the prediction, made 150 years earlier, of the end of the priestly rule of the house of ELI (1 Sam. 2:31-35).

Abib. ayˈbib, ah-veevˈ (Heb. ʔābîb H26, “ripened head of grain”). TNIV Aviv. The first month in the Jewish religious CALENDAR (corresponding to March-April), during which the Passover took place (Exod. 13:4; 23:15; 34:18; Deut. 16:1). Abib is the older and presumably Canaanite name for the month of NISAN.

Abib, Tel. See T_{EL} ABIB.

Abida. uh-bi'duh (Heb. אָבִידָא H30, “father of knowledge” or “my father knows/has acknowledged [me]”). Also Abidah (some eds. of KJV at Gen. 25:4). The fourth of the five sons of MIDIAN, who was a son of ABRAHAM by his concubine KETURAH (Gen. 25:4; 1 Chr. 1:33). Abraham gave gifts to the sons of his concubines and sent them to the E while he was still living so that ISAAC's inheritance would not be compromised.

Abidan. uh-bi'duhn (Heb. אָבִידָאֵן H29, “[my] father has judged”). Son of Gideoni; he was a leader who represented the tribe of BENJAMIN as a census taker in the wilderness of SINAI (Num. 1:11; 2:22; 10:24). As one of the twelve tribal princes, he made an offering for his tribe at the dedication of the TABERNACLE in the wilderness. Benjamin's offering was on the ninth day (7:60, 65).

Abiel. ay'bee-uhl (Heb. אָבִי אֵל H24, “my father is God”). (1) A man of BENJAMIN who is mentioned as the father of KISH and the grandfather of King SAUL and ABNER (1 Sam. 9:1; 14:51). It is conjectured that JEIEL in 1 Chr. 8:29 and 9:35, the father of NER, is the same as Abiel. In that case, Abiel (Jeiel) was the grandfather of Kish and the great-grandfather of Saul. Other solutions have been proposed.

(2) One of DAVID's thirty mighty warriors (1 Chr. 11:32), also called ABI-ALBON (2 Sam. 23:31). He was probably a native of BETH ARABAH in the N of Judah (Josh. 15:6) and was therefore known as Abiel the Arbathite.

Abiezer. ay'bi-ee'zuhr (Heb. אָבִי עֶזֶר H48, “[my] father is help”; gentilic אָבִי עֶזְרִי H49, “Abiezrite”). (1) A descendant of MANASSEH, the son of JOSEPH. Abiezer, who settled on the W side of the JORDAN (Josh. 17:2), is probably the same as IEZER (a contraction of Abiezer), regarded as the son of GILEAD (Num. 26:30). If 1 Chr. 7:18 refers to the same individual, he was apparently Gilead's nephew, in which case he may have been considered a son for genealogical purposes. The district of Manasseh inhabited by the Abiezrites (Jdg. 6:34) was the native region from which GIDEON came (6:11). The site of the appearance of the angel of the Lord to Gideon was Ophrah of the Abiezrites (6:24), the town from which Gideon drew his first support of men to fight the Midianites (6:34). See OPHRAH (PLACE).

(2) One of DAVID's military elite, the Thirty; a native of ANATHOTH in BENJAMIN (2 Sam. 23:27; 1 Chr. 11:28). He was one of David's month-by-month army commanders, having his turn in the ninth month (1 Chr. 27:12).

Abiezrite. ay'bi-ez'rit. See ABIEZER.

Abigail, Abigal. ab'uh-gayl, ab'uh-gal (Heb. ʾăbîgayil H28, "[my] father rejoices" or "source of joy"; also ʾăbîgal [1 Sam. 25:32; 2 Sam. 3:3 Ketib; 17:25]). (1) The wife of NABAL, a rich man of MAON in Judah. When Nabal refused to give provisions to DAVID and his men in payment for the protection they had given him, Abigail, a wise and beautiful woman, herself brought provisions to David, persuading him not to take vengeance on her husband. About ten days later Nabal died, and subsequently Abigail became David's wife (1 Sam. 25:2-42). Abigail bore to David his second son, KILEAB (2 Sam. 3:3, called Daniel in 1 Chr. 3:1).

(2) Sister of King David and of ZERUIAH (2 Sam. 17:25; 1 Chr. 2:16-17). David's father, however, was JESSE (cf. 1 Chr. 2:13), whereas Abigail is identified as the daughter of NAHASH. It has been suggested that "daughter of Nahash" might be a textual corruption, or that Nahash was another name for Jesse, or that Jesse married the widow of Nahash; if the latter, Abigail was David's half-sister. Whether or not any of these surmises is true, Abigail and David had the same mother. Abigal became the wife of ITHRA (Jether) and the mother of AMASA, who for a while was commander of David's army.

Abihail. ab'uh-hayl (Heb. ʾăbîḥayil H38, "my father is strength" or "strong father"; the form ʾăbîḥayil H35 [1 Chr. 2:29; 2 Chr. 11:18] may be a variant spelling or a different name). (1) Father of Zuriel; the latter was head of the Levitical house of MERARI (Num. 3:35).

(2) Wife of Abishur son of Shammai (1 Chr. 2:29).

(3) Son of Huri; he was a man of the tribe of GAD who lived in GILEAD (1 Chr. 5:14).

(4) Daughter of DAVID's brother ELIAB. She probably married her cousin JERIMOTH (David's son) and was the mother of MAHALATH, one of the wives of REHOBAM (2 Chr. 11:18). Ambiguity in the Hebrew text leaves open the possibility that Abihail was another wife of Rehoboam (cf. KJV, but the singular in the Heb. of the next two verses suggests that he had only one wife).

(5) Father of Queen ESTHER and uncle of MORDECAI (Esth. 2:15; 9:29).

Abihu. uh-bi'hyoo (Heb. אֲבִיחִי H33, “he is [my] father”). The second of the four sons of AARON and ELISHEBA (Exod. 6:23; Num. 3:2; 26:60; 1 Chr. 6:3; 24:1). Aaron, his sons NADAB and Abihu, and seventy elders went part of the way up Mount Sinai with MOSES at the command of the Lord, and they “saw the God of Israel” (Exod. 24:1, 9-10). Abihu, along with his father and three brothers, was later consecrated as priest (Exod. 28:1; Num. 3:2-3; 1 Chr. 24:1). Abihu and his older brother Nadab were slain by God when “they offered unauthorized fire before the LORD, contrary to his command” (Lev. 10:1-2). Neither Nadab nor Abihu had any sons (Num. 3:4; 1 Chr. 24:2).

Abihud. uh-bi'huhd (Heb. אֲבִיחִיד H34, “[my] father is majesty”). Son of BELA and grandson of BENJAMIN (1 Chr. 8:3; however, some scholars believe that the text should read “the father of Ehud” rather than “Abihud”).

Abijah, Abijam. uh-bi'juh, uh-bi'juhm (Heb. אֲבִי־יָה H31, “[my] father is Yahweh”; also אֲבִי־יָהוּ H32 [2 Chr. 13:20-21] and אֲבִי־יָמ H41 [1 Ki. 14:31—15:1, not in NIV]). KJV also Abia, Abiah. (1) Seventh son of BEKER and grandson of BENJAMIN (1 Chr. 7:8).

(2) Second son of SAMUEL. Along with his older brother JOEL, he was appointed by his father to be a judge in BEERSHEBA (1 Sam. 8:2). However, the brothers took bribes, perverted justice, and incurred the wrath of the people to such an extent that the Israelites came to Samuel and demanded a king (1 Sam. 8:3-6).

(3) According to 1 Chr. 2:24, a woman named Abijah was the wife of HEZRON (grandson of JUDAH by PEREZ) and the mother of ASHHUR, father (or founder) of TEKOA. The MT is difficult, and some of the ancient versions read differently. The RSV rendering, “Caleb went in to Ephrathah, the wife of Hezron his father, and she bore him Ashhur,” involves an emendation of Abijah (אֲבִי־יָה) to “his father” (אֲבִיחִי).

(4) A descendant of AARON who became the head of the eighth priestly division (1 Chr. 24:10). Twenty-four divisions were appointed by lot for the service of the TEMPLE in the time of DAVID. ZECHARIAH, the father of JOHN THE BAPTIST, belonged to the division of Abijah (Lk. 1:5; KJV, “Abia”).

(5) Son of JEROBOAM I of Israel (1 Ki. 14:1-18). He died from illness when still a child, in fulfillment of a prediction by the prophet AHIJAH, to whom the queen had gone in disguise to inquire regarding the outcome of the child's illness. The death was a judgment for the apostasy of Jeroboam.

(6) Son of REHOBOAM and the second king of Judah after the division of the kingdom (1 Ki. 14:31—15:8 [where the Heb. text calls him “Abijam”]; 2 Chr.

12:16—14:1). Abijah made war on Jeroboam in an effort to recover the ten tribes of Israel. In a speech before an important battle in which his army was greatly outnumbered, he appealed to Jeroboam not to oppose the God of Israel, for God had given the kingdom to David and his sons forever. Abijah gained a decisive victory. Prosperity tempted him to multiply wives and to follow the evil ways of his father. He reigned three years.

(7) Mother of HEZEKIAH, king of Judah (2 Chr. 29:1); she was also known as “Abi” (2 Ki. 18:2; see NIV mg.).

(8) One of the priests in the days of NEHEMIAH who sealed the covenant of reform in which the people promised to serve the Lord (Neh. 10:7). Some believe that this is a clan name, connected with the individual listed in 12:4 (see next item).

(9) A priest who returned from Babylon with ZERUBBABEL (Neh. 12:4). In the chronology of the priests given in Neh. 12:10-21, Zicri is listed as next descendant to rule the house of Abijah (12:17).

Abilene. ab’uh-lee’nee (Gk. Abilēnē G9). A region in SYRIA near the Antilebanon mountains (see LEBANON). The area was named after its principal city, Abila (modern Suq Wadi Barada), which lay some 18 mi. (29 km.) NW of DAMASCUS (thus not to be confused with Abila in the DECAPOLIS). LUKE identifies Abilene as the tetrarchy of LYSANIAS when JOHN THE BAPTIST began his ministry (Lk. 3:1). In A.D. 37 this area, with other territories, was given to AGRIPPA I. After his death in 44, Abilene was administered by procurators until 53, when it was conferred on AGRIPPA II. Toward the end of the century, it was made a part of the Roman province of Syria.

Abimael. uh-bim'ay-uhl (Heb. אַבִּימָאֵל H42, possibly “[my] father is truly God”). Son of JOKTAN and descendant of SHEM (Gen. 10:28; 1 Chr. 1:22).

Abimelech. uh-bim'uh-lek (Heb. אַבִּימֶלֶךְ H43, “my father is king” or “father of a king”). TNIV Abimelek. (1) A PHILISTINE king of GERAR, near GAZA. It was at his court that ABRAHAM, out of fear, said that SARAH was his sister. Struck by her beauty, Abimelech took her to marry her but when he was warned by God in a dream, he immediately returned her to Abraham (Gen. 20:1-18). Later, when their servants contended over a well, the two men made a covenant (21:22-34). Some believe that the name Abimelech was a title (comparable to PHARAOH). See also #2 and #4 below.

(2) A second king of Gerar, probably the son of the first-mentioned Abimelech. At his court ISAAC tried to pass off his wife REBEKAH as his sister (Gen. 26:1-11). Abimelech rebuked Isaac when the falsehood was detected. Later their servants quarreled, and they made a covenant between them, as Abraham and the first Abimelech had done.

(3) The son of GIDEON by a concubine (Jdg. 8:31; 9:1-57). After Gideon's death, Abimelech, aspiring to be king, murdered seventy sons of his father. Only one son, JOTHAM, escaped. Abimelech was then made king of SHECHEM. After he had reigned only three years, rebellion broke out against him; in the course of the rebellion he attacked and destroyed his own city of Shechem. Later he was killed while besieging the nearby town of THEBEZ.

(4) A Philistine king mentioned in the title of Ps. 34. He is very likely the same as ACHISH king of Gath (1 Sam. 21:10—22:1), with whom DAVID sought refuge when he fled from SAUL. As mentioned above, it is possible that Abimelech was a royal Philistine title, not a personal name.

(5) Son of ABIATHAR; he was a PRIEST in the days of David (1 Chr. 18:16 KJV, but see NIV mg.). Elsewhere he is called AHIMELECH (24:6), and most scholars believe that the form Abimelech is a scribal error.

Abinadab. uh-bin'uh-dab (Heb. אַבִּינָדָב H44, prob. “[my] father is generous”). (1) The second son of JESSE (1 Sam. 16:8; 1 Chr. 2:13). When GOLIATH challenged the Israelites in the Valley of ELAH and was killed by DAVID (1 Sam. 17), Abinadab and two of his brothers were in SAUL's army (v. 13).

(2) One of the sons of Saul who died with his father and his two brothers on Mount GILBOA in battle with the PHILISTINES (1 Sam. 31:2; 1 Chr. 8:33; 9:39; 10:2).

(3) A man of KIRIATH JEARIM at whose place on a hill the ARK OF THE COVENANT remained after it was returned from the Philistines in the days of SAMUEL (1 Sam. 7:1). His son ELEAZAR was chosen by the city fathers to have charge of the ark. Much later his other sons (or descendants) UZZAH and AHIO were among those who assisted David in his first attempt to bring the ark to Jerusalem (2 Sam. 6:3-4; 1 Chr. 13:7).

(4) The father of one of SOLOMON's sons-in-law (1 Ki. 4:11 KJV). However, the Hebrew ben- ʾăbînādāb ("son of Abinadab") should probably be translated as the personal name BEN-ABINADAB (as in NIV).

Abinoam. uh-bin'oh-uhm (Heb. ʾăbînō'am H45, prob. "father of pleasantness"). The father of BARAK, mentioned in the narrative of Barak's victory over the Canaanites under JABIN and SISERA and in the song of DEBORAH (Jdg. 4:6, 12; 5:1, 12).

Abiram. uh-bi'ruhm (Heb. ʾăbîrām H53, "[my] father is exalted"). (1) One of three men of the tribe of REUBEN who, with KORAH the Levite, led 250 leaders of the Israelites in rebellion against MOSES, declaring that Moses and AARON had exalted themselves "above the assembly of the Lord" (Num. 16:1-3). Abiram and his household, along with Korah's and DATHAN's, were swallowed up alive into the earth as a punishment of God (16:25-33).

(2) Son of HIEL of BETHEL. When Hiel rebuilt JERICHO during the reign of AHAB, "He laid its foundations at the cost of his firstborn son Abiram, and he set up its gates at the cost of his youngest son Segub, in accordance with the word of the LORD spoken by Joshua son of Nun" (1 Ki. 16:34; cf. Josh. 6:26). See SEGUB.

Abishag. ab'uh-shag (Heb. ʾăbîšag H54, possibly "[my] father is a wanderer"). A Shunammite woman who nursed DAVID in his old age (1 Ki. 1:3, 15). After David died, ADONIJAH, SOLOMON's elder half-brother, asked permission to marry her (2:13-18). Solomon evidently interpreted this request as a claim to the throne (cf. 1:5-7), for the household women of a former king were sometimes used for such purposes (cf. ABSALOM's behavior in 2 Sam. 16:20-22). Thus Solomon had Adonijah executed (1 Ki. 2:22-25).

Abishai. uh-bi'shi (Heb. אֲבִישַׁי H57, meaning uncertain; also אֲבִישַׁי H93 in 1 Chronicles). Son of DAVID's sister ZERUIAH, and brother of JOAB and ASAHIEL. He was impetuous and courageous, cruel and hard to his foes, but always intensely loyal to David. Abishai counseled David to kill the sleeping SAUL (1 Sam. 26:6-9). He aided Joab in the murder of ABNER, an act of revenge for the slaying of their brother Asahel (2 Sam. 3:30). He was loyal to David when ABSALOM and SHEBA revolted, and he wanted to kill SHIMEI for cursing David (16:5-14). He defeated a large army of Edomites (1 Chr. 18:12-13). Late in David's life Abishag rescued the king in the fight with Ishbi-Benob, the PHILISTINE giant (2 Sam. 21:17), and he was considered chief of the three top Israelite warriors (23:18-19, although the meaning of the Heb. text is disputed).

Abishalom. See ABSALOM.

Abishua. uh-bish'oo-uh (Heb. אֲבִישׁוּא H55, "[my] father is salvation"). (1) Son of PHINEHAS and great-grandson of AARON (1 Chr. 6:4, 50). An ancestor of EZRA the scribe, Abishua is included in the genealogy of LEVI among the descendants of Aaron serving the altar (Ezra 7:5).

(2) Son of BELA and grandson of BENJAMIN (1 Chr. 8:4).

Abishur. uh-bi'shuhr (Heb. אֲבִישׁוּר H56, "[my] father is a wall [of protection]"). Son of Shammai and descendant of JUDAH through PEREZ and JERAHMEEL; his wife's name was Abihail (1 Chr. 2:28-29).

Abital. uh-bi'tuhl (Heb. אֲבִיטָל H40, "[my] father is dew," or possibly "source of protection"). A wife of DAVID and mother of Shephatiah, the fifth son born to DAVID in HEBRON (2 Sam. 3:4; 1 Chr. 3:3).

Abitub. uh-bi'tuhb (Heb. אֲבִיטוּב H39, "[my] father is good"). Son of Shahraraim by his first wife, Hushim; he is included among the descendants of BENJAMIN, but the precise genealogical connection is not stated (1 Chr. 8:11; cf. v. 8).

Abiud. uh-bi'uhd (Gk. Abioud G10). A son of ZERUBBABEL listed in Matthew's GENEALOGY OF JESUS CHRIST (Matt. 1:13); this name does not occur in the OT.

Abner. ab'nuhr (Heb. ʾabnēr H79, also ʾābînēr H46, “[my] father is Ner [or a lamp]”). Son of NER and cousin (or uncle) of King SAUL. During Saul’s reign, Abner was the commander-in-chief of the Israelite army (1 Sam. 14:50). It was Abner who brought DAVID to Saul following the slaying of GOLIATH (17:55-58). He accompanied Saul in his pursuit of David (26:5) and was rebuked by David for his failure to keep better watch over his master (26:13-16).

At Saul’s death, Abner had ISH-BOSHETH, Saul’s son, made king over Israel (2 Sam. 2:8). Abner and his men met David’s servants in combat by the pool of GIBEON and were overwhelmingly defeated. During the retreat from this battle, Abner was pursued by ASAHEL, JOAB’s brother, and in self-defense killed him (2:12-32).

Soon after this, Abner and Ish-Bosheth had a quarrel over Saul’s concubine, Rizpah. Ish-Bosheth probably saw Abner’s behavior with Rizpah as tantamount to a claim to the throne. This resulted in Abner’s entering into negotiations with David to go to his side, and he promised to bring all Israel with him. David graciously received him; Abner had not been gone long when Joab heard of the affair, and, believing or pretending to believe that Abner had come as a spy, Joab invited him to a friendly conversation and murdered him “to avenge the blood of his brother Asahel” (2 Sam. 3:6-27). This seems to have been a genuine grief to David, who composed a lament for the occasion (3:33-34).

abomination. This English term, applied to that which causes disgust or hatred, occurs frequently in the KJV but only a few times in the NIV and other modern versions (e.g., Prov. 26:25; Isa. 66:3; Dan. 9:27; 11:31; 12:11; cf. “abominable,” Isa. 66:17; Jer. 32:34). The idea is most often expressed in the NIV by the verb detest and the adjective detestable. Two main Hebrew words are involved: (1) šiqqûṣ H9199 is used of idols (e.g., 2 Ki. 23:24; Jer. 7:30), of the gods represented by idols (e.g., 2 Ki. 23:13), of forbidden practices (e.g., 23:24), and generally of anything contrary to the worship and religion of the Lord (e.g., 2 Chr. 15:8; Isa. 66:3; Jer. 4:1). The related noun šeqeṣ H9211 is used of idols in animal form (Ezek. 8:10), of forbidden foods (Lev. 11:10, 13, 42), and generally of anything bringing ceremonial defilement (7:21). (2) The more common term tô ʿēbâ H9359 is applied to wider areas of life. It is used of things related to idols (Deut. 7:25; 27:15) and of the false gods themselves (32:16); but it is used also, for example, of forbidden sexual practices (e.g., Lev. 18:22, 26-27), of prophecy leading to the worship of other gods (Deut. 13:13-14), of offering blemished animals in sacrifice (17:1), and of heathen divination (18:9, 12). Basic to the use of these words, then, is the active abhorrence the Lord feels toward that which challenges his position as the sole abomination of desolation. The interpretation of the references of Daniel to some notable and frightful “abomination that causes desolation” (Dan. 9:27; 11:31; 12:11) has caused much difficulty and difference among interpreters. Many continue to hold that Dan. 11:31 was fulfilled in 165 B.C., when the Seleucid king ANTIOCHUS Epiphanes set up an altar in the Jerusalem TEMPLE and sacrificed a pig on it. But that event could not have exhausted the meaning of the passage, for Matt. 24:15 and Mk. 13:14 make it clear that the Lord Jesus understood the “abomination” as still to come. Some understand the Lord to refer to some horrifying act of sacrilege during the period of the Jewish revolt and the sack of JERUSALEM by the Romans in A.D. 70. It cannot, however, be the entry of the Romans into the Most Holy Place, for the setting up of the abomination is offered by the Lord as a sign to his true followers that they must leave the city without delay to avoid being caught up in its overthrow. Once the city fell to the Romans, the time of flight would be past. It is more likely, therefore, that the reference is to Jewish zealot rebels who actually set up their military headquarters in the Holy Place. Other interpreters, however, understand the Lord to be speaking not of the fall of Jerusalem but of the end-time itself, immediately prior to his own coming; and they link the setting up of the abomination with the appearance and activity of the man of sin (2 Thess. 2:3-4, 8-9).

God of his people, or contradicts his will, whether in the way he is to be worshiped or in the way his people are to live.

Abraham, Abram. ayˈbruh-ham, ayˈbruhm (Heb. ʾabrāhām H90, etymology uncertain, but interpreted as “father of a multitude” [Gen. 17:5, perhaps a play on words]; his original name, used from Gen. 11:26 to 17:5, was ʾabrām H92, possibly short form of ʾābîrām H53, “[my] father is exalted” [see ABIRAM]). Son of TERAH, founder of the Hebrew nation, and father of the people of God, he traced his ancestry back to NOAH through SHEM (11:10-27) and came into the Bible story out of an idolatrous background (Josh. 24:2). After the death of his brother HARAN (Gen. 11:28), Abram moved in obedience to a divine vision (Acts 7:2-4) from UR of the Chaldees in MESOPOTAMIA to the city of Haran in N SYRIA. He was accompanied by his father Terah, his wife and half-sister Sarai (SARAH), and his nephew LOT (Gen. 11:31-32).

Abraham’s renown in the Bible as a man of faith and the father of the people of faith is a direct consequence of the way the Bible tells his story. Like all history writing, the Bible is selective in the facts it records, choosing those that are most significant to bring out the meaning of the events. The Genesis account of Abraham’s life records the development of his FAITH—from the imperfect faith of Gen. 12-13, through the growing faith of chs. 14-17, and on to the mature faith of chs. 18-25.

At age seventy-five (Gen. 12:4) Abram was commanded to leave all and go out into the unknown, sustained only by the promises of God (12:1-3). In faith he obeyed, but with an imperfect obedience. Contrary to the command to leave his “father’s household,” he took his nephew Lot with him, laying the foundation for considerable future trouble (chs. 13; 19). When Abram arrived in Canaan (12:6), God confirmed the promise that this was the land Abram’s descendants would possess (12:7), but the imperfection of Abram’s faith again appeared. Although assured by God that he was in the right place, Abram deserted Canaan for Egypt in a time of famine and, still uncertain whether the Lord could preserve him in trouble, tried to pass off Sarai as his sister, hoping to purchase his own safety at her expense (12:10-20). Yet Abram’s imperfection of faith did not shake the promises of God, who first acted to protect the chosen family in Egypt (12:17-20) and then, when Abram tried to solve family problems (13:7) by dividing up the Promised Land, reaffirmed (13:14-17) that none but Abram and his descendants could inherit the promises.

The fascinating glimpse into the international tensions of the ancient world given in Gen. 14 allows us to see Abram’s growing faith. Clearly he is now more aware of himself as the man separated to God from the world. He first opposed the kings (14:13-16) and then refused the world’s wealth (14:21-24). These are plainly the acts of a man confident in the protection and provision of God. The Lord was not slow to respond in both regards (15:1). But the richness of the divine response provoked Abram to question the point of it all, for he had no son to inherit what the Lord would give him. This leads to that high moment of faith when Abram, fully aware that every human aspect of the situation was against him (Rom. 4:18-21), rested wholly and absolutely on God’s word of promise; this is the faith that justifies (Gen. 15:4-6). But though Abram had leaped onto a pinnacle of faith, he was still only learning to walk in the way of faith.

The Egyptian tomb paintings at Beni Hasan, dating approximately to the period of Abraham, depict Semitic travelers to Egypt.

The Lord confirmed his promises of children and land in a great COVENANT sign (Gen. 15:7-21), but Abram and Sarai, tired of waiting (ch. 16), turned from the way of faith to a human expedient that was permitted—even expected—by the laws of the day: a childless couple might “have children” through the medium of a secondary wife. Poor, mistreated HAGAR fell into this role. Yet the Lord was not diverted from his chosen course: in gentle grace he picked up the pieces of Hagar’s broken life (16:7-16) and reaffirmed his covenant with Abram (ch. 17). In three ways the Lord made his promises more sure. First, he made Abram and Sarai into new people (17:3-5, 15-16). This is the significance of the gift of new names: they are themselves made new, with new capacities. Second, the Lord restated and amplified his spoken promises so as to leave no doubt of his seriousness in making them (17:6-8). Third, he sealed his promises with the sign of CIRCUMCISION (17:9-14) so that forever after Abraham and his family would be able to look at their own bodies and say, “The Lord has indeed kept his promises to me!”

Out of this experience of becoming the new man, Abraham, and having the promises confirmed and sealed, Abraham’s faith grew to maturity. Genesis 17:17—22:19 is the tale of two sons. Abraham deeply loved his sons ISHMAEL and ISAAC (17:18; 21:11-12), yet he was called to give them both up—in faith that the Lord would keep his promises concerning them (21:11-13; 22:1-18). The Lord did not spring these great decisions on Abraham, but prepared him for them by his experience over Lot and SODOM (chs. 18-19). In this connection Abraham would learn two lessons: First, that it is not a vain thing to leave matters in the hand of God—he prayed, and the Lord answered prayer (18:22-33); second, that the Lord really meant the “family” aspect of his promises—even Lot was preserved because the Lord “remembered Abraham” (19:29). To be linked with the covenant man was to come under the sovereign hand of the covenant God. And if Lot, how much more Ishmael, and how very much more the son of promise himself, Isaac! Thus Abraham came to the maturity of faith that enabled him to say (22:5), “We will go...we will worship...we will come back”—knowing that the worship in question involved raising the knife over Isaac.

Quietly the underlining of the maturity of Abraham’s faith proceeds: Sarah was laid to rest within the Promised Land by her husband, who was planning to be buried there himself, awaiting the fulfillment of the promise of possession. Sternly Abraham’s servant was forbidden to move Isaac away from the place of promise (Gen. 24:6-8).

Three main streams of NT thought focus on Abraham as the exemplar of faith. Paul stresses faith as simple trust in the promises of God (Rom. 4:18-22); Hebrews takes note especially of the patience of faith (Heb. 11:8-16; cf. 6:11-13); and James brings out the essential obedience that proves faith to be genuine (Jas. 2:21-23).

Abraham’s bosom (side). A figure of speech used by Jesus in the parable of Lazarus and the rich man to designate the blessedness with which the beggar was honored upon his death (Lk. 16:22-23). The figure derives either from the Roman custom of reclining on the left side at meals—Lazarus being in the place of honor at ABRAHAM’S right, leaning on his breast—or from its appropriateness as expressing closest fellowship (cf. Jn. 1:18; 13:23). Since Abraham was the founder of the Hebrew nation, such closeness was the highest honor and bliss.

abrech, abrek. ayˈbrek (Heb. ʾabrēk H91). A word shouted to warn of the approach of JOSEPH, presumably so proper respect could be shown to him (Gen. 41:43 KJV mg., JB, et al.). The term may be Egyptian, but its derivation and meaning are debated. Proposed translations include “Make way!” (e.g., NIV, NEB), “Bow the knee!” (e.g., KJV, NRSV, as if from Heb. bārak H1384, “to kneel”), and others.

Abronah. uh-brohˈnuh (Heb. ʿabrōnâ H6307, perhaps “crossing, ford”). KJV Ebronah. A camp of the Israelites during their wilderness journey, one stop before EZION GEBER at the Gulf of AQABAH on the border of EDOM (Num. 33:34-35; not mentioned in Deut. 10:6-7). Possible identifications include ʿAin ed-Defiyeh (Heb. Ein Avrona, about 9 mi./14 km. N of Ezion Geber) and ELATH (on the northern shore of the gulf).

Absalom, Abishalom. ab'suh-luhm, uh-bish'uh-luhm (Heb. ʾabšālôm H94 and ʾăbîšālôm H58 [only 1 Ki. 15:2, 10], “[my] father is peace”). Third son of DAVID, born in HEBRON; his mother was MAACAH, daughter of TALMAI king of GESHUR, a small district NE of Lake Galilee (2 Sam. 3:3; 1 Chr. 3:2). The circumstances that brought Absalom into prominence are as follows. AMNON, David’s eldest son and Absalom’s half-brother, raped Absalom’s sister TAMAR (2 Sam. 13:1-19). David, though greatly angered, never punished Amnon (13:21). Absalom nursed his hatred for two years, then treacherously plotted Amnon’s assassination (13:22-29). Absalom fled to his grandfather Talmai and remained with him three years (13:37-38), while David “longed to go to Absalom, for he was consoled concerning Amnon’s death” (13:39). At the end of that time JOAB by stratagem induced David to recall Absalom, but David would not see him for two years more (14:1-24). Then Absalom by a trick of his own moved Joab to intercede with the king and was restored to favor (14:28, 33).

“In all Israel there was not a man so highly praised for his handsome appearance as Absalom,” and for the abundance of his hair (2 Sam. 14:25-27). He had three sons and a daughter, whom he named Tamar after his sister. Absalom now began to act like a candidate for the kingship (15:1-6), parading a great retinue and subtly indicating how he would improve the administration of justice in the interests of the people.

“At the end of four years” (2 Sam. 15:7 NIV, following some versional evidence; KJV “forty,” following MT), Absalom pretended to have a proper motive for visiting Hebron, the capital of Judah when David began his reign and Absalom’s birthplace (3:2-3). There Absalom proclaimed himself king and attracted the disaffected to his standard (15:7-14). David realized at once that this was a serious threat to his throne. He plainly could have chosen to remain in the safety of the all-but-impregnable fortress city of JERUSALEM, but this would have been both strategically a mistake and practically a needless involvement of an innocent population in the harsh realities of a prolonged siege. David did not explain his decision to depart hastily from the city, but what we know of him from the Bible suggests these two motives: first, out in the open country he was in his natural element both as a man and as a soldier; second, he could rally troops to his cause and, as a commander actually in the field—not confined in the city—he could direct operations. But it was a sad and hurried flight, marked by partings from friends and the defection of valued counselors such as AHITHOPHEL. David sent back to the capital the intensely loyal priests, ZADOK and ABIATHAR, that with their sons as messengers they might keep David informed of events. HUSHAI the Arkite also was asked to return and feign loyalty to Absalom, and so help David by “frustrating Ahithophel’s advice” (15:20-37).

Ahithophel advised Absalom to attack David at once, before he could gather a large following (2 Sam. 17:1-4). Hushai advised delay until all the military power of the realm could be gathered under the command of Absalom himself, to make sure they had a force large enough to defeat the warlike David and his loyal soldiers (17:5-14). Absalom actually followed a compromise plan. The armies met in the woods of Ephraim, where Absalom’s forces were disastrously defeated (18:1-8; see EPHRAIM, FOREST OF). Absalom was caught by his head in the branches of an oak, and the mule he was riding went on and left him dangling helpless there. Joab and his men killed him, though David, in the hearing of the whole army, had forbidden anyone to harm him. Absalom was buried in a pit and covered with a heap of stones in the wood where he fell (18:9-17).

David’s great and prolonged grief over the death of his son nearly cost him the loyalty of his subjects (2 Sam. 18:33—19:8). Absalom’s rebellion was the most serious threat to David’s throne, but its significance for the future lay in the weakness already existing in the kingdom in David’s day. Plainly David’s administration was faulty. The ease with which Absalom detached the northern tribes from allegiance to David not only exposed the fact that as a Judahite David was guilty of neglecting the Israelite section of his kingdom, but also, more seriously, showed how fragile were the bonds between Judah and Israel. SOLOMON’S more rigorous administrative methods staved off the inevitable division that needed only the ineptitude of his son and successor REHOBOAM to make it a reality (1 Ki. 12:1-19). In these ways, as much as in its more explicit predictions, the OT prepared the way for Christ. It records the golden days of David; yet the flaws in his character and kingdom give rise to the people’s yearning for great David’s greater Son.

abstinence. This English noun occurs once in the KJV in the context of PAUL’S shipwreck, when the people went without food for a long period (Acts 27:21). The verb abstain occurs a few times in most English versions (usually as the rendering of Gk. apechō G600) and means “to refrain from an action.” The decree of the Council of Jerusalem (15:20, 29) commanded abstinence from “food sacrificed to idols, from blood, from the meat of strangled animals and from sexual immorality,” practices abhorrent to Jewish Christians. PAUL (1 Thess. 4:3) connects abstaining from sexual immorality with SANCTIFICATION. In 1 Thess. 5:22 he exhorts Christians to abstinence “from all appearance of evil” (KJV; NIV, “Avoid every kind of evil”). In 1 Tim. 4:3 he refers to false teachers who commanded believers “to abstain from certain foods, which God created to be received with thanksgiving by those who believe and who know the truth.” PETER exhorts, “Dear friends, I urge you, as aliens and strangers in the world, to abstain from sinful desires, which war against your soul” (1 Pet. 2:11).

Abstinence from eating blood antedates the Mosaic law (see Gen. 9:4) but was rigorously reinforced when the Lord spoke through MOSES. The sacred function of BLOOD within the sacrificial system (Lev. 17:11) made it something set apart from any common use. Israel abstained voluntarily from eating the sinew on the thigh for the reason given in Gen. 32:32. The book of Leviticus defined what animals the children of Israel might not eat, to “distinguish between the unclean and the clean” (Lev. 11:47), and to keep Israel separate from other nations. The priests were forbidden to drink “wine or other fermented drink” while they were ministering (10:8-9). The NAZIRITES were to abstain from the fruit of the vine absolutely. The Recabites (see RECAP) took a similar vow in deference to their ancestor JONADAB (Jer. 35). God’s people are to abstain from participation in idol feasts (Exod. 34:15; Ps. 106:28; Rom. 14:21; 1 Cor. 8:4-13).

Many Christians believe that the injunctions regarding drunkenness and sobriety (1 Cor. 5:11; 6:9-10; Eph. 5:18; 1 Tim. 3:3, 8; Tit. 2:2-4) point to the wisdom of total abstinence from alcoholic beverages (cf. Col. 3:17). Abstinence is not a virtue in itself, but it can be a means to make virtue possible. See also FASTING.

abyss. The Greek term abyssos G12 (originally an adjective, “bottomless, unfathomable,” then a noun, “deep place”) is rendered by the KJV with “the deep” (Lk. 8:31; Rom. 10:7) and “bottomless pit” (Rev. 9:1-2, 11; 11:7; 17:8; 20:1, 3). The NIV treats it as a proper name, “Abyss” (except in Romans). In classical Greek the term was applied to the primeval deep of ancient cosmogonies, an ocean surrounding and under the earth. In the LXX it can refer to the primal waters (Gen. 1:2), but also to the world of the dead (e.g., Ps. 71:20). In later JUDAISM it means also the interior depths of the earth and the prison of evil spirits. The NT writers use it with reference to the world of the dead (Rom. 10:7) or the nether world, the prison of disobedient spirits (Lk. 8:31; Rev. 9:1-2, 11; 11:7; 17:8; 20:1-3). The use of “abyss” in Rom. 10:7 is parallel with the use of “the lower, earthly regions” in Eph. 4:9 (see Ps. 106:28); both contrast the highest heaven and the lowest depth. In Lk. 8:31 the demons had a great dread of the primal abyss; even so, they may have caused themselves to go there when the pigs were drowned in the sea. In Revelation the horror of infinite deeps is intensified. See also ABADDON.

Acbor. akˁbor (Heb. ʿakbôr H6570, “mouse”). TNIV Akbor. (1) Father of BAAL-HANAN, an Edomite king (Gen. 36:38-39; 1 Chr. 1:49).

(2) Son of Micaiah and father of ELNATHAN; King JOSIAH commanded him to go with some others to consult HULDAH the prophetess concerning the newly discovered book of the law (2 Ki. 22:12, 14; Jer. 26:22; called Abdon son of Micah in 2 Chr. 34:20).

accent. This term is used once by the NIV and other versions to render Greek lalia G3282, “talking, speech” (Matt. 26:73). The Greek word likely refers to the dialectical peculiarity of one like PETER, who spoke Jewish ARAMAIC in a way characteristic of GALILEE. “Accent” may be too restricted a rendering, for lalia probably included the peculiar use of words and idioms as well as mere accent or intonation.

acceptance. The act of receiving something or someone with approval; the state of being thus received. In the Bible the most vital need of the person is to be acceptable to God. SIN separates; acceptance is a condition of restoration to God. It is clear that God determines who is acceptable to him, and he it is who provides the means of RECONCILIATION of the estranged. God instituted reconciling SACRIFICES, but sacrifices in themselves are of no use if the worshipers are profane in their manner of life (Isa. 1:11-16). The NT gives the final word on the solution: God provided access to himself through Jesus Christ by his cross (Eph. 2:18; 3:12). Acceptance is, in more personal terms, the equivalent of the idea of JUSTIFICATION, which comes through accepting God’s gift by FAITH (Rom. 5:1-2). We are accepted by accepting God’s gift. Since this is so, believers can offer themselves acceptably to God (12:1); and their spiritual sacrifices, such as acts of praise and well-doing, are acceptable through Christ (Phil 4:18; Heb. 13:15-16; 1 Pet. 2:5). Because God has received believers, moreover, they are to forgive and accept each other in the fellowship of LOVE (Eph. 4:32; 5:2).

access. A word used to translate Greek prosagōgē G4643, which appears three times in the NT (Rom. 5:2; Eph. 2:18; in Eph. 3:12 NIV uses the term “approach”). Commentators are not agreed as to whether the word should be taken in the transitive sense, meaning “introduction,” or in the intransitive sense, meaning “access, personal approach.” In the NT it is always used of the work of Christ. He introduces a person into the royal presence of God. The redemptive blessings that belong to the believer are made possible through Christ, by FAITH.

Accho. See Acco.

Acco. ak'oh (Heb. akkô H6573; Gk. Ptolemais G4767). KJV Accho; TNIV Akko. A Canaanite-Phoenician coastal city, known as Ptolemais in NT times; identified as modern Acre, some 8 mi. (13 km.) N of Mount CARMEL and 30 mi. (50 km.) S of TYRE. The river Belus flows into the Mediterranean Sea close to the town. Acco was in the portion assigned to the tribe of ASHER, but the Hebrews did not drive out the original inhabitants (Jdg. 1:31). In the Hellenistic period it received the name Ptolemais from the Ptolemies of Egypt (see Ptolemy). PAUL stayed there a day with Christian brethren on his way from Tyre to CAESAREA (Acts 21:7). The Crusaders occupied the town and named it St. Jean d'Acre. In modern times it was part of the Turkish empire, except for a time when it was occupied by Egypt, being restored to the Turks with British help. Today it is in the nation of Israel, opposite the larger city of Haifa.

accommodation. A term used in theology to indicate God's act of revealing himself in ways that are compatible with human understanding (see REVELATION). When God spoke, he used the thought forms of the day and not the scientific terminology of a later age. HEAVEN is described in terms of human values: gold, silver, jewels. HELL is described in terms of fire and brimstone. God himself is spoken of as having a face, eyes, ears, mouth, hands, feet, and so on (see ANTHROPOMORPHISM). In no way does this accommodation affect the truth or the religious value of the passage. That which is declared is real, but intelligible to human beings only through their language and in their thought forms (see also ALLEGORY; INTERPRETATION). In a somewhat different sense, one may say that God accommodated himself supremely in the INCARNATION of Jesus Christ.

Achaea. See ACHAIA.

Achaia. uh-kay'uh (Gk. Achaia G938). Also Achaea. The name of a region, later a Roman PROVINCE, in S GREECE that included the Peloponnesus; CORINTH was its capital. The areas N of Achaia were districts of MACEDONIA, and the phrase “Macedonia and Achaia” generally means all Greece (Acts 19:21; Rom. 15:26; 1 Thess. 1:7-8). In Acts 20:2 “Greece” refers specifically to Achaia. In Acts 18:12, GALLIO is accurately called PROCONSUL of Achaia, for CLAUDIUS had just made this region a senatorial province (the governors of imperial provinces were called PREFECTS and later PROCURATORS). Achaia is mentioned in five other NT passages (Acts 18:27; 1 Cor. 16:15; 2 Cor. 1:1; 9:2; 11:10; in Rom. 16:5, KJV has Achaia, but the earliest textual evidence supports ASIA).

Achaia.

Achaicus. uh-kay'uh-kuhs (Gk. Achaikos G939, “belonging to Achaia”). A respected Christian of CORINTH. He is mentioned only in 1 Cor. 16:17 as the third member of a three-man delegation coming to PAUL in EPHESUS with a letter from the Corinthian church (7:1; some MSS also insert the three names of the delegation in 16:15). Their arrival refreshed Paul, and when they returned to Corinth, they may have taken with them 1 Corinthians (cf. the subscription after 16:24 in most MSS).

Achan. ay'kan (Heb. ʿākān H6575, derivation unknown; in 1 Chr. 2:7 the name appears as ʿākār H6580, “Achar,” which means “troubler”; LXX has Achar throughout). Son of Carmi and descendant of JUDAH through ZERAH (one of the twins born to Judah by his own daughter-in-law, TAMAR). Achan was stoned to death for violating the ban (see DEVOTED THING) during the conquest of JERICHO (Josh. 7:1-26). Achan stole 200 shekels of silver, a Babylonian garment, and a wedge of gold weighing 50 shekels, and hid them in the earthen floor of his tent (7:21). JOSHUA had devoted the metals to God (6:17-19). All else was to be destroyed. Because of this one man's disobedience, Israel was defeated at AI. God revealed the reason to Joshua. By a process of elimination Achan was found out. He confessed, and he and his family and possessions were brought down to the Valley of ACHOR.

In spite of some difficulty in understanding the Hebrew text in Josh. 7:25-26, there is little ground for holding that Joshua's command (6:17) was not carried out in the execution of both Achan and his entourage. In the Scriptures the Lord often allows us to see the full significance of our sinful ways. Achan's experience illustrates the biblical revelation that we never sin alone: there is always a family involvement (cf. Exod. 20:5-6) and also a wider pollution touching the whole people of God and bringing them under judgment. Joshua expressed this thought in his epitaph: “Why have you brought this trouble on us?” (Josh. 7:25), allowing the name Achan to slip over into the similar-sounding verb ʿākar H6579, “to trouble, bring disaster.” This in turn became the name of the place itself, Achor, “disaster”; and in 2 Chr. 2:7, Achan himself is referred to as Achar, meaning “troubler, man of disaster.”

Achish. ayʿkish (Heb. ʾākîš H429, possibly from Hurrian akk sha(rur), “the king gives”). A PHILISTINE king of GATH to whom DAVID fled for protection (1 Sam. 21:10-15). Initially, David was fearful and pretended insanity; when Achish repulsed him, he fled. At a later point David again sought refuge with Achish, this time behaving so as to win his confidence (27:1-12). David consented to join Achish against Israel, but when the Philistine lords objected, the king sent him away (29:1-11). He may be the same Achish to whom Shimei’s servant fled many years later (1 Ki. 2:39-40). In the title to Ps. 34 Achish is called ABIMELECH, which may have been a dynastic name of Philistine kings (cf. Gen. 20:2, 22; 26:1, 26).

Achmetha. See ECBATANA.

Achor. ayʿkohr (Heb. ʿākôr H6574, “trouble”). The valley in which ACHAN, apparently with his family, was stoned to death because he had taken forbidden booty (Josh. 7:24-26). The place is often identified with modern el-Buqeʿah, SW of JERICOH. This area certainly suits the symbolic reference in Hos. 2:15, where the transformation of Achor into “a door of hope” typifies the changed expectations of the people of God in the messianic day (cf. Isa. 65:10).

acre. This English term, referring to a unit of area, is used twice (1 Sam. 14:14; Isa. 5:10) to render the Hebrew word šemed H7538, which literally means “yoke.” In both passages the area involved is the average amount a yoke of oxen could plow in a day. What precise measurements are involved is not known, and the translation “acre” is merely conventional. (For the proper name Acre, see ACCO.)

Acropolis. uh-krop’uh-lis (Gk. Akropolis, from akros, “top, extremity,” and polis, “city”). The higher city, citadel, or castle of a Greek municipality; especially the citadel of ATHENS, where the treasury was. The crowning glory of Athens is the Parthenon, usually regarded as the finest exemplar of Greek architecture. During PAUL’s stay in Athens (Acts 17:15—18:1), “he was greatly distressed to see that the city was full of idols” (17:16). The images of gods and of heroes worshiped as gods filled Athens and were inescapably conspicuous on the Acropolis. As Paul stood on Mars’ Hill, before the court of the AREOPAGUS, he could see the temples on the Acropolis directly to the E, and the AGORA (marketplace) below it. Many other towns mentioned in the NT—e.g., CORINTH, PHILIPPI, SAMARIA—had an acropolis, which served as the town’s civic and religious center, while the agora constituted the central shopping plaza.

acrostic. This term (Gk. akrostichis, from akros, “top, extremity,” and stichos, “line” of verse) refers to a poem in which the first letters of consecutive lines or stanzas follow the alphabet or form words. The NT contains no acrostics. The OT, however, contains fourteen acrostic poems, in which the twenty-two letters of the Hebrew alphabet appear in order at the beginning of a line or stanza. This literary form may have been intended as an aid to memory, but more likely it was a poetic way of saying that a total coverage of the subject was being offered—as we would say, “from A to Z.” Acrostics occur in Ps. 111 and 112, where each letter begins a line; in Ps. 25; 34; and 145, where each letter begins a half-verse (cf. Nah. 1:2–10); in Ps. 9; 10; 37; Prov. 31:10–31; and Lam. 1; 2; and 4, where each letter begins a whole verse; and in Lam. 3, where each letter begins three verses. Palm 119 is the most elaborate demonstration of the acrostic method where, in each section of eight verses, the same opening letter is used, and the twenty-two sections of the psalm move through the Hebrew alphabet, letter after letter. It is the genius of Hebrew poetry to allow the demands of the sense to take precedence over the demands of form, and this accounts for “broken acrostics” (there is a letter missing in Ps. 25 and in Ps. 34) or acrostics in which letters are taken out of order (as in Lam. 2:16-17).

Acsah. ak’suh (Heb. aksâ H6578, possibly meaning “anklet”). Also Achsah; TNIV Aksah. A daughter of CALEB who was given in marriage to OTHNIEL, son of Caleb’s younger brother KENAZ (Josh. 15:16-19; Jdg. 1:12-15; 1 Chr. 2:49). The arrangement was made in fulfillment of a promise Caleb had made to give his daughter “to the man who attacks and captures Kiriath Sepher.” The bride persuaded her husband to ask her father for a field. It was given him, but Acsah was not satisfied. Out riding one day, she met Caleb and asked him for springs to water the field. Caleb gave her both the upper and lower springs.

Acshaph. ak’shaf (Heb. akšāp H439, “sorcery, enchanted [place]”). Also Achshaph; TNIV Akshaph. An old (Bronze Age) Canaanite town on the border of the territory given to ASHER at SHILOH (Josh. 19:25) after JOSHUA led the Israelites into northern Palestine against a coalition of kings under JABIN, king of HAZOR. The king of Acshaph, with many other kings, was defeated by Joshua in a battle by the waters of MEROM (11:1-12; 12:20). Acshaph is tentatively identified either with Tell Keisan, c. 6 mi. (10 km.) SE of ACCO, or with Khirbet el-Harbaj, c. 12 mi. (19 km.) S of Acco.

Acts of the Apostles. The book that gives the history of early Christianity from the ASCENSION OF CHRIST to the end of two years of Paul’s imprisonment in Rome.

© Dr. James C. Martin

Aerial view of Herod's palace in Caesarea (looking SE). The Roman Governor, Felix, ordered Paul kept under guard here, where he remained for two years. Porcius Festus then succeeded Felix and took charge over Paul's trial (Acts 23-25).

I. Title of the Book. An early MS has the title “Acts” (Gk. Praxeis, “doings, transactions, achievements”). Other early titles are “Acts of Apostles,” “The Acts of the Apostles,” “Acts of the Holy Apostles.” The book, however, narrates actions and speeches chiefly of PETER and PAUL. There is some information about JUDAS ISCARIOT (Acts 1:16-20), the man chosen to succeed him (1:21-26), JOHN THE APOSTLE (3:1—4:31; 8:14-17), and John's brother, JAMES (12:12). The Twelve, except the betrayer, are listed in 1:13. Acts is not a history of all the apostles; rather, it is a selection from the deeds and words of some who illustrate the progress of first-century Christianity in those phases that interested the author as he was moved by the Holy Spirit. The title “Acts of the Holy Spirit” has often been suggested, and the contents of the book bear out the appropriateness of such a title.

II. Author. Not until A.D. 160-200 do we have positive statements as to the authorship of Acts. From that time onward, all who mention the subject agree that the two books dedicated to THEOPHILUS (Luke and Acts) were written by “Luke, the beloved physician.” Only in modern times have there been attempts to ascribe both books to TITUS or some other author. See LUKE; LUKE, GOSPEL OF.

By writing “we” instead of “they” in recounting events when he was present, the author indicates that he was a companion of Paul. Luke evidently joined Paul, SILAS, and TIMOTHY at TROAS during the second missionary journey and accompanied them to PHILIPPI but did not go on with them when they left there (Acts 16:10-17). The author next indicates that he was in Philippi toward the end of the third missionary journey, when Paul was about to sail for Palestine with the contributions of the Gentile churches for the poor at Jerusalem (20:6 et al.). We do not know whether Luke spent all the interval at Philippi. From this point Luke accompanied Paul to Jerusalem (Acts 20:6—21:18). Nor do we know how Luke spent the two years during which Paul was imprisoned at CAESAREA, but Luke enters the narrative again in 27:1 (“when it was decided that we would sail for Italy”); he continued with Paul, giving us a vivid account of the voyage to Rome.

Acts breaks off abruptly at the end of Paul’s two years of ministry in Rome, when he was enjoying the relative freedom of “his own rented house,” where he “welcomed all who came to see him. Boldly and without hindrance he preached the kingdom of God and taught about the Lord Jesus Christ” (28:30-31). If a later writer had incorporated these “we” sections, he would have named their author to enhance their authority. But the style of the “we” passages cannot be distinguished from the style of the rest of Acts nor from that of Luke’s gospel. The author of Luke and Acts is the author of the “we” sections of Acts and a companion of Paul.

The question remains: Which of the companions of Paul is the author of Acts? He cannot be one of those referred to by name in the “we” sections as distinct from the author. He is not likely to have been one of those named in Paul’s letters written at times other than those included in the “we” sections. Of those named in Paul’s letters written when the “we” author might have been with Paul, early Christian writers chose “our dear friend Luke, the doctor” (Col. 4:14). Luke is not otherwise prominent in the NT. Why should he have been chosen, unless he was the author? The medical language in Acts is not sufficient to prove that the author was a physician, but it is sufficient to confirm other evidence to that effect. Luke was with Paul shortly before the apostle’s expected death (2 Tim. 4:11).

Luke cannot be certainly identified with either of two Christians named LUCIUS (Acts 13:1; Rom. 16:21). There is wide and ancient support for connecting Luke with ANTIOCH in Syria. It is not probable that he was from Philippi. The tradition that he was a painter cannot be traced earlier than the tenth century. From 2 Cor. 8:18 it is possible to infer that Titus was Luke’s brother and that Luke was “the brother who is praised by all the churches for his service to the gospel.” Titus and Luke are named together in 2 Tim. 4:10-11. The conjecture that Luke was the “man of Macedonia” of Paul’s vision (Acts 16:9) is attractive and inherently possible but not certain.

III. Place. The place where Acts was written is not named, though the sudden ending of the book, while Paul is residing at Rome awaiting trial, makes Rome an appropriate choice. The question of place is tied in with that of Luke’s purpose in writing and with the occasion for the publication of the book.

Overview of ACTS

Author: Anonymous, but traditionally attributed to LUKE the physician.

Historical setting: Covers the period from the ASCENSION OF CHRIST (A.D. 30 or 33) to PAUL's imprisonment in ROME (c. 61-63). The book was probably written in Rome soon after the last events narrated, but some date it to the 70s or even later.

Purpose: To provide a historical-theological account of the early CHURCH, focusing on the rapid expansion of Christianity as a result of the powerful outpouring of the HOLY SPIRIT.

Contents: Promise and fulfillment of the Spirit's power (Acts 1-2). Spread of the GOSPEL in JERUSALEM, JUDEA, SAMARIA, and ANTIOCH, with emphasis on the ministry of PETER (chs. 3-12). Spread of the gospel in ASIA MINOR and Europe as far as Rome, with emphasis on the ministry of Paul (chs. 13-28).

IV. Date. Allusions to Acts in the APOSTOLIC FATHERS are too indefinite to compel the setting of a date much before the end of the first century. If Acts is dependent on JOSEPHUS for information, it cannot be earlier than 93. But such dependence is not proved and is highly unlikely. Acts must have been finished after the latest date mentioned in the book (Acts 28:30). The abrupt close indicates that it was written at that time, c. 61 or 62. Luke's Gospel has an appropriate ending; Acts does not. We are not told how the trial of Paul came out. There is no hint of Paul's release or of his death. The attitude toward Roman officials is friendly, and that would not have been the case after the persecution under Nero in 64. The Jewish War of 66-70 and the destruction of Jerusalem are not referred to. Chapters 1-15 accurately picture conditions in Jerusalem before its destruction. It would be attractive to think that Luke's two books were written to inform and influence well-disposed Roman officials in their handling of Paul's case.

V. The Speeches in Acts. Do the speeches report what was actually said? We do not expect stenographic reporting, but Luke is a careful writer, as a comparison of his Gospel with Mark and Matthew shows. The style of the speeches in Acts is not Luke's, but that which is appropriate to each speaker, whether Peter, Stephen, Paul, or even the minor characters such as Gamaliel (Acts 5:34-39), the Ephesian town clerk (19:35-40), and Tertullus (24:2-8). Similarities between the speeches of Peter and Paul are explained by the fact that Paul explicitly preached the same gospel as Peter did. Speeches by the same person are varied in type, each suited to the occasion.

VI. Contents

Introduction. (1) Summary of ground covered by the “former treatise,” especially the resurrection ministry of Jesus, Acts 1:1-11. (2) The period of waiting; a ten-day prayer meeting in the upper room, 1:12-14. (3) The choice of a successor to the betrayer as one of the Twelve, 1:15-26.

A. The Day of Pentecost, the birthday of the church. (1) The occasion and the event, 2:1-13. (2) Peter’s sermon, 2:14-36. (3) The result: the beginning of the church, 2:37-47.

B. Pictures of the first church in Jerusalem. (1) A lame man healed, 3:1-11. (2) Peter’s sermon to the crowd on this occasion, 3:12-26. (3) Attempted suppression of the new church met by prayer-power, 4:1-30. (4) A contrast in givers, 4:31—5:11: Barnabas, the generous giver, 4:31-37, and Ananias and Sapphira, the grudging givers, 5:1-11. (5) Growth of the healing ministry of the church, 5:12-16. (6) Another attempt at suppression of the church met by obedience to God, 5:17-42. (7) An administrative problem solved leads to further advance, 6:1-8. (8) The attempt of the Council (Sanhedrin) to suppress the new leader, Stephen, 6:9-15. (9) Stephen’s defense, 7:1-53. (10) Stephen’s martyrdom, 7:54-60.

C. The gospel spread to all Judea and Samaria, 8:1-25. (1) The stimulus to expansion: Saul as persecutor, 8:1-4. (2) Problems in Samaria, 8:5-25.

D. Three “continental” conversions. (1) From Africa: the eunuch from Ethiopia, 8:26-40. (2) From Asia: Saul of Tarsus, 9:1-31. (Interlude: Peter in W Palestine, 9:32-43.) (3) From Europe: Cornelius of Italy, 10:1-48.

E. The Judean church accepts the mission to the Gentiles, 11:1-30. (1) Peter convinces the Jewish Christians, 11:1-18. (2) The extent of the early mission to the Gentiles, 11:19-21. (3) Barnabas and Saul minister in Antioch of Syria, 11:22-26. “The disciples were called Christians first at Antioch,” 11:26. (4) Response of the church in Antioch to need in Judea, 11:27-30. (5) A further attempt to suppress the Christian movement frustrated by the miraculous escape of Peter from prison, 12:1-19. (Note: The death of Herod, 12:20-23.)

F. Paul’s first missionary journey. (1) The church at Antioch commissions Barnabas and Saul as missionaries to the Gentiles, 12:24—13:3. (2) The mission to Cyprus, 13:4-12. (3) The mission at Antioch in Pisidia, 13:13-50. (4) The mission to Iconium, 13:51—14:5. (5) The mission to Lystra, 14:6-20. (6) The mission to Derbe, 14:20-21. (7) Return through the cities visited and formally established churches, 14:21-25. (8) Furlough in Antioch, 14:26-28.

G. The Council at Jerusalem: Terms of admission of Gentile believers settled, 15:1-29.

H. Paul's second missionary journey. (1) Completion of furlough in Antioch and reporting the council's proceedings, 15:30-35. (2) Paul and Barnabas part, Barnabas to Cyprus, Paul to Cilicia, 15:36-41. (3) The journey to Troas, 16:1-8. (4) Invitation to Europe accepted, 16:9-11. (5) The mission to Philippi, 16:12-40. (6) The mission to Thessalonica, 17:1-9. (7) The mission to Berea, 17:10-14. (8) The mission to Athens, 17:15-34. (9) The mission to Corinth, 18:1-18. (10) Beginning of the mission to Ephesus and the journey to Jerusalem and Antioch, 18:18-23.

I. Paul's third missionary journey. (1) Confirming the disciples in Galatia and Phrygia, 18:23. (2) Apollos at Ephesus, 18:24-28. (3) The mission to Ephesus, 19:1—20:1. (4) Journeyings through Greece and Macedonia to Troas, 20:1-6. (5) The mission to Troas, 20:6-12. (6) The journey to Jerusalem, 20:13—21:16.

J. Paul's arrest and voyage to Rome. (1) Paul in Jerusalem, 21:17—23:30. (2) Paul in Caesarea, 23:31—26:32. (3) The voyage to Rome, 27:1—28:15. (4) Paul in Rome, 28:16-31.

Aczib. ak'zib (Heb. ʾakzîb H424, "lying, deceptive, disappointing"). Also Achzib; TNIV Akzib. (1) A boundary city of the tribe of ASHER on the Mediterranean coast (Josh. 19:29) from which the Asherites were not able to drive out the Canaanites (Jdg. 1:31). In NT times Aczib was called Ecdippa, now identified with modern ez-Zib, 11 mi. (18 km.) N of ACCO.

(2) A city in the SHEPHELAH of JUDAH, listed between KEILAH and MARESHAH (Josh. 15:44). This Aczib is probably to be identified with KEZIB, where SHELAH son of Judah was born (Gen. 38:5), and with COZEBA, whose inhabitants are called "sons of Shelah son of Judah" (1 Chr. 4:21-22). Micah makes a play on the meaning of the name when he says: "Aczib will prove deceptive [ʾakzîb lē ʾakzāb] to the kings of Israel" (Mic. 1:14). It is tentatively identified with modern Tell el-Beida, 20 mi. (32 km.) SW of JERUSALEM (but see LIBNAH).

Adad. See HADAD.

Adadah. ad'uh-duh (Heb. ʿad ʿādâ H6368, derivation uncertain). A city of the tribe of JUDAH on its SE border near EDM (Josh. 15:22). Many scholars emend the text to ʿar ʿārâ and identify the place as AROER (= Khirbet ʿArarah), some 12 mi. (19 km.) SE of BEERSHEBA.

Adah. ay'duh (Heb. ʿādāh H6336, "ornament, adornment"). (1) A wife of LAMECH and the mother of JABAL and JUBAL (Gen. 4:19-21).

(2) The first-mentioned wife of ESAU and daughter of ELON the HITTITE (Gen. 36:2). Adah was the mother of Eliphaz (vv. 4, 10), whose sons in turn are called the sons of Adah (vv. 12, 16). The marriage of Esau and Adah introduced Canaanite blood and influence into ISAAC's family. See also BASEMATH.

Adaiah. uh-day'yuh (Heb. ʿădāyâ H6347 and ʿădāyāhû H6348 [only 2 Chr. 23:1], "Yahweh has adorned" or "pleasing to Yahweh"; see IDDO). (1) A man of Bozath; he was the father of Jedidah and thus grandfather of King JOSIAH (2 Ki. 22:1).

(2) A Levite of the family of GERSHON, ancestor of ASAPH, the temple singer (1 Chr. 6:41; apparently the same as IDDO in v. 21).

(3) The seventh of nine sons of Shimei listed among the Benjamite heads of family living in Jerusalem (1 Chr. 8:21, 28). Shimei (Shema in v. 13) was the fifth son of Elpaal.

(4) Son of Jehoram; a priest and head of family who returned to Jerusalem after the EXILE (1 Chr. 9:12; a fuller genealogy is given in Neh. 11:12).

(5) Father of MAASEIAH; the latter was one of the commanders who helped JEHOIADA destroy ATHALIAH and enthrone Joash (JEHOASH) in Judah (2 Chr. 23:1).

(6) A descendant of Bani. He is listed among those who married foreign women during the exile but put them away during the reformation under EZRA (Ezra 10:29; 1 Esd. 9:30 [KJV, "Jedeus"]). Some believe this is the same individual as #7 below. See also BANI #6.

(7) A descendant of Binnui (Ezra 10:39). See #6 above.

(8) An ancestor of Maaseiah; the latter was a Judahite in Jerusalem in NEHEMIAH's time whose lineage descended through PEREZ (Neh. 11:5).

Adalia. uh-day'lee-uh (Heb. ʾădalyā ʾ H130, meaning unknown). The fifth of the ten sons of HAMAN who were put to death by the Jews (Esth. 9:8).

Adam (person). ad'uhm (Heb. ʾădām H134, "man, human being, humankind"; Gk. Adam G77). In Hebrew this term is both a personal name and a general noun, "mankind." The latter meaning is found over 500 times in the OT. Both usages are found in Gen. 1-3, where Adam as a personal name occurs at 2:20 (for further references see 3:17, 21; 4:25; 5:2-5; 1 Chr. 1:1). As the first and representative man, Adam was made in the IMAGE OF GOD, provided with a garden and a wife, and given work to do (Gen. 1-2). His rejection of God's authority led to the breaking of communion with God (see FALL), his expulsion from the garden, and a life of toil (ch. 3). From the physical descendants of Adam and EVE the human race emerged.

Adam is mentioned nine times in the NT (Lk. 3:38; Rom. 5:14 [twice]; 1 Cor. 15:22, 45 [twice]; 1 Tim. 2:13-14; Jude 14). In all these he is assumed to be the first human being to live on the earth. Paul developed a theology of the identity and role of Jesus through a comparison with the identity and role of Adam (Rom. 5:12-19; 1 Cor. 15:20-22, 45-49). In these comparisons PAUL made use of the double meaning of the Hebrew word for Adam. He also developed a theology of the relationship between man and woman from the details of the Genesis account of Adam and Eve (1 Tim. 2:11-15). Jesus referred to the union of Adam and Eve in MARRIAGE as a union of one FLESH (Matt. 19:4-6 and Mk. 10:6-9, where Gen. 1:27 and 2:24 are cited).

Adam (place). ad´uhm (Heb. ʾādām, “man, human being”). A city in the JORDAN Valley where the second largest river of TRANSJORDAN, the JABBOK, empties into the Jordan River. Here, according to Josh. 3:15-16, the Jordan was dammed, probably by the collapse of the banks (40 ft./12 m. high) along this narrow stretch of the river, allowing Israel to pass over dryshod opposite JERICHO (c. 16 mi./26 km. S of Adam). The site is identified with modern Tell ed-Damiyeh.

Adamah. ad´uh-muh (Heb. ʾādāmāh H142, “ground”). One of the nineteen fortified and fenced cities of NAPHTALI listed in Josh. 19:36. Not to be confused with Adami Nekeb (v. 33) or with Adam (3:16), its location has been disputed, but its position in the list would place it N of the Sea of Galilee. It is often identified with modern Qarn Ḥaṭṭīn, some 5 mi. (8 km.) W of TIBERIAS.

adamant. This English noun, referring to an extremely hard stone (such as diamond), is used twice in the KJV to render šāmîr H9032 (Ezek. 3:9; Zech. 7:12; it also occurs in Jer. 17:1, where KJV has “diamond”). The precise meaning of the Hebrew word is uncertain, and modern versions often render it with “flint.” See also MINERALS.

Adami Nekeb. ad´uh-mi-nee´keb (Heb. ʾādāmî hanneqeb H146, “ground of the pass” or “red pass”). A site on the border of NAPHTALI (Josh. 19:33). The KJV, following the SEPTUAGINT, divides the name into two, Adami and Nekeb. It is probably to be located at Khirbet Damiyeh (or Khirbet et-Tell, just above it), a Bronze Age site 5 mi. (8 km.) SW of TIBERIAS on the W side of the Sea of Galilee, controlling a pass on a caravan route from the area E of Galilee to the plain of Acco.

Adar. ay´dahr (Heb. ʾăḏār H160; Aram. ʾăḏār H10009). (1) The twelfth month (late February to early March) in the Babylonian CALENDAR used by postexilic Israel (Ezra 6:15; Esth. 3:7, 13; 8:12; 9:1, 15-21).

(2) KJV alternate form of ADDAR (Josh. 15:3).

Adbeel. ad´bee-uhl (Heb. ʾadbē ʾēl H118, possibly “languishing for God” or “grief of God”). Third son of ISHMAEL and grandson of ABRAHAM by HAGAR the Egyptian (Gen. 25:13; 1 Chr. 1:29). The descendants of Adbeel should perhaps be identified with the Idibāʾileans, a bedouin Aramean tribe mentioned in the Assyrian records of TIGLATH-PILESER.

Addan. See ADDON.

Addar (person). ad´ahr (Heb. ʾaddār H161, prob. “glorious”). Son of BELA and grandson of BENJAMIN (1 Chr. 8:3), also called ARD (Num. 26:40; in Gen. 46:21, Ard is included among the “sons” [prob. meaning “descendants”] of Benjamin).

Addar (place). ad´ahr (Heb. ʾaddār H162, “glorious” or “threshing floor”). A fortified city on the S border of JUDAH near KADESH BARNEA (Josh. 15:3; KJV, “Adar”). Addar may be the same as HAZAR ADDAR (Num. 34:4), and a possible location is modern ʿAin Qedeis, about 5 mi. (8 km.) SE of Kadesh Barnea.

adder. See ANIMALS.

Addi. ad´i (Gk. Addi G79). Son of Cosam, included in Luke’s GENEALOGY OF JESUS CHRIST (Lk. 3:28).

Additions to Esther and Daniel. See APOCRYPHA.

Addon. ad´uhn (Heb. ʾaddôn H124 [Neh. 7:61] and ʾaddān H150 [Ezra 2:59], meaning unknown). One of five Babylonian places from which certain Jewish exiles returned who were unable to prove their Israelite ancestry (Ezra 2:59 [KJV and other versions, “Addan”]; Neh. 7:61). If Addon here is a place name, its location is unknown. However, the parallel in the APOCRYPHA reads, “The following are those who came up from Tel-melah and Tel-harsha, under the leadership of Cherub, Addan, and Immer” (1 Esd. 5:36 NRSV, following a generally accepted conjectural emendation), and some scholars argue that this reading is original.

Ader. See EDER.

Adiel. ay´dee-uhl (Heb. ʿădî ʾēl H6346, “ornament of God”). (1) A clan leader from the tribe of SIMEON (1 Chr. 4:36). He is listed among those who increased their lands by defeating the people of Gedor during the reign of HEZEKIAH (cf. vv. 38-43).

(2) Son of Jahzerah; his son Maasai was among the priests who returned to Jerusalem after the Babylonian EXILE (1 Chr. 9:12; cf. Azarel in the parallel list in Neh. 11:13).

(3) The father of Azmaveth, who was in charge of the royal treasures of David (1 Chr. 27:25).

Adin. ay´din (Heb. ʿādîn H6350, “luxuriant”). A man whose descendants returned from the Babylonian EXILE. They were among the family heads who sealed the covenant with NEHEMIAH (Ezra 2:15; 8:6; Neh. 7:20; 10:16).

Adina. ad´uh-nuh (Heb. ʿădînā H6351, “adorned”). Son of Shiza and descendant of REUBEN; a tribal chief who was one of DAVID’s mighty warriors (1 Chr. 11:42).

Adino. ad´uh-noh. The KJV has the name “Adino the Eznite” in 2 Sam. 23:8 as a transliteration of the words ʿădînô hā ʿeṣnî. On the basis of the parallel passage (1 Chr. 11:11), modern translations usually emend the words to read ʿôrēr ʾet-ḥānîṭô (NIV, “he raised his spear”).

Adithaim. ad´uh-thay´im (Heb. ʿădîṭayim H6353, meaning uncertain). A city in the SHEPHELAH of Judah (Josh. 15:36). The site is unknown, although some identify it with modern el-Ḥaditheh (see HADID).

adjuration. See CURSE.

Adlai. ad´li (Heb. ʿadlay H6354, perhaps “Yahweh is just”). Father of Shaphat; the latter was herdsman of the royal flocks in the time of DAVID (1 Chr. 27:29).

Admah. ad´muh (Heb. ʾadmâ H144, “ground”). One of the CITIES OF THE PLAIN. Along with SODOM, GOMORRAH, and ZEBOIIM, Admah is mentioned as marking CANAAN’s southern border (Gen. 10:19) and as having been destroyed (Deut. 29:23; Hos. 11:8). With its king SHINAB, Admah is also mentioned as one of the five cities that were attacked by the four eastern kings (Gen. 14:2). Its location is unknown.

Admatha. ad-may´thuh (Heb. ʾadmātā ʾ H148, Pers. name possibly meaning “unconquered”). One of “the seven nobles of Persia and Media who had special access to the king and were highest in the kingdom” (Esth. 1:14). Queen VASHTI was banished by Ahasuerus (XERXES) on their advice.

Admin. ad´min (Gk. Admin G98 [not in NIV]). Son of Amminadab, included in Luke’s GENEALOGY OF JESUS CHRIST, according to some MSS (Lk. 3:33 NRSV; the NIV follows a different reading).

administration. See DISPENSATION.

Adna. ad´nuh (Heb. ʿadnā ʾ H6363, “delight”). (1) The head of a priestly house who returned from EXILE with ZERUBBABEL (Neh. 12:15).

(2) One of the descendants of PAHATH-MOAB who agreed to put away their foreign wives (Ezra 10:30).

Adnah. ad´nuh (Heb. ʿadnah H6367 [1 Chr. 12:20] and ʿadnâ H6365 [2 Chr. 17:14], both meaning “delight”). (1) A soldier from the tribe of MANASSEH who defected SAUL’s army and joined DAVID in ZIKLAG (1 Chr. 12:20).

(2) A military commander of JEHOSHAPHAT’s army (2 Chr. 17:14).

Adonai. ad'oh-ni' (Heb. ʾădōnāy H151 [a pl. form with 1st person sg. pronoun], from ʾādôn H123, a common term for “lord, master”). Also Adonay. A divine name usually translated “the Lord.” When in combination with the Tetragrammaton (YHWH), the NIV renders the phrase “Sovereign LORD.” See JEHOVAH.

Adoni-Bezek. uh-doh'ni-bee'zek (Heb. ʾădōnî bezeq H152, “lord of Bezek”). The title of the king of a town named BEZEK in N Palestine. He was pursued and captured by the tribes of JUDAH and SIMEON; he then suffered the same kind of incapacitation to which he subjected seventy other kings, namely, the amputation of their thumbs and great toes (Jdg. 1:3-7). Judah was probably threatened or attacked by Canaanite forces in the N under Adoni-Bezek, and therefore they turned to meet him before they could begin clearing out their own tribal territory.

Adonijah. ad'uh-ni'juh (Heb. ʾădōniyyâ H153 and ʾădōniyyāhû H154, “my Lord is Yahweh”). (1) The fourth son of DAVID, born at HEBRON; his mother was HAGGITH (2 Sam. 3:2-4; 1 Chr. 3:2). The story of his attempt and failure to seize the crown is told in 1 Ki. 1:5—2:25. AMMON and ABSALOM, David's first and third sons, had died; the second, KILEAB, is not mentioned after his birth and may have died also. Adonijah, as the eldest living son, aspired to the throne. He was a spoiled, handsome lad (1:6), and now he “got chariots and horses ready, with fifty men to run ahead of him” (1:5). He won over JOAB and the priest ABIATHAR, but failed to gain ZADOK the priest, NATHAN the prophet, and David's guard (1:7-8).

Adonijah held a great feast at EN ROGEL, to which he invited “all his brothers, the king's sons, and all the men of Judah who were royal officials, but he did not invite Nathan the prophet or Benaiah or the special guard or his brother Solomon” (1 Ki. 1:9-10). Nathan spoke to BATHSHEBA, SOLOMON's mother, and together they warned David of what Adonijah was doing. David, roused to action, had Solomon proclaimed king at GIHON (1:11-40). Adonijah and his guests heard the shout and the sound of the trumpet (1:41). Immediately Jonathan, the son of Abiathar, brought a full account of what had happened (1:42-48). The guests fled, and Adonijah sought refuge at the altar (1:49-50). Solomon pardoned him, and he returned home (1:51-53). But after the death of David, Adonijah emboldened himself to ask Bathsheba to persuade King Solomon to give him ABISHAG, David's nurse in his last illness, for a wife (2:13-18). This revived Solomon's suspicions, for in ancient times claiming a former monarch's concubines was tantamount to claiming his throne. Solomon had Adonijah killed (2:19-25).

Reconstruction of the tabernacle with the altar out front. Upon hearing of Solomon's rise to the throne, Adonijah went to the tabernacle, which had been set up in Jerusalem, and held on to the horns of the altar until the king made an oath not to put him to death (1 Ki. 1:51).

(2) One of the Levites sent by JEHOSHAPHAT to teach the people in the cities of Judah the law of God (2 Chr. 17:8).

(3) One of the leaders of the people who sealed the covenant in Ezra's time (Neh. 10:16). Some believe he is to be identified with ADONIKAM.

Adonikam. ad'uh-ni'kuhm (Heb. ʾădōnîqām H156, "my lord has risen"). The name of one of the families that returned from EXILE (Ezra 2:13; Neh. 7:18). The descendants of Adonikam are given as 666 in Ezra and 667 in Nehemiah (also in 1 Esd. 5:14). Adonikam is also mentioned in Ezra 8:13 (= 1 Esd. 8:39) and possibly in Neh. 10:16 (if he is the same as ADONIJAH).

Adoniram. ad'uh-ni'ruhm (Heb. ʾădōnîrām H157, "[my] Lord is exalted"; alternately, ʾădōrām H164 [not in NIV; 2 Sam. 20:24; 1 Ki. 12:18] and hădôrām H2067 [not in NIV; 2 Chr. 10:18], possibly meaning "[the deity] Adad/HADAD is exalted"). Son of Abda; an official in charge of forced labor under SOLOMON (1 Ki. 4:6; 5:14). He is also identified with an official at the end of DAVID's reign, and the opening of REHOBAM's, who functioned in the same office and who evidently was known by a contracted form of the name, Adoram (2 Sam. 20:24; 1 Ki. 12:18) or Hadoram (2 Chr. 10:18). Rehoboam sent him on a mission of some kind to the now rebel tribes of Israel (1 Ki. 12:18), who stoned him to death.

Adonis. uh-doh'nis (Gk. Adōnis, from Heb. ʾādôn H123, “lord”). The Syrian deity of vegetation, which wilts under the hot summer sun. He was called Dumuzi or TAMMUZ in MESOPOTAMIA (cf. Ezek. 8:14). In SYRIA and PHOENICIA he was known as ʾadōnī, from which comes his Greek name, Adonis. He was venerated throughout the ANE, Egypt, and Greece. There is a possible reference to the worship of this god in Isa. 17:10, where the “finest plants” may refer to Adonis gardens, as the herbs planted in his honor were called (cf. NEB).

Adoni-Zedek. uh-doh'ni-zee'dek (Heb. ʾādōnî-ʾēdeq H155, “my lord is righteousness”). AMORITE king of JERUSALEM when the Israelites invaded Canaan under JOSHUA (Josh. 10:1, 3). Having heard how JOSHUA had destroyed AI and JERICHO and how GIBEON had made peace with Israel, Adoni-Zedek invited four other Amorite kings to join him in attacking Gibeon. Joshua came to the aid of the Gibeonites, and God defeated the kings, both in battle and with great hailstones. This was the day when Joshua called on the sun and moon to stand still until the people had avenged themselves on their enemies. The kings hid in a cave, which Joshua sealed with great stones. When he had completed the victory, Joshua ordered the kings brought out. He killed them and hanged them on trees until sunset, when they were cut down and buried in the cave where they had hidden. An earlier king of Jerusalem (Salem) bore a name of similar form and almost identical meaning: MELCHIZEDEK, “king of righteousness” (Gen. 14:18-20). Some have thought this detail indicates the continuation of the same dynasty, but even if the dynasty changed, there was some reason why the pre-Davidic kings of Jerusalem thought it important to preserve the name or title.

adoption. The practice of adoption is exemplified in the OT. For example, PHARAOH's daughter adopted MOSES (Exod. 2:10) as her son; HADAD the Edomite married the sister of the Egyptian queen, and their son GENUBATH was brought up “with Pharaoh's own children,” whether formally adopted or not (1 Ki. 11:20); ESTHER was adopted by MORDECAI (Esth. 2:7, 15). These cases were outside Palestine, in Egypt or Persia. Whether adoption was practiced in the Hebrews' own land is not clear. Abram (ABRAHAM) thought of ELIEZER of Damascus as his heir, but God told him otherwise (Gen. 15:2-4). Sarai (SARAH) gave her maid HAGAR to Abram that she might obtain children by her (16:1-3). RACHEL (30:1-5) and LEAH (30:9-12) gave JACOB their maids for a like purpose, a kind of adoption by the mother but not by the father. Jacob adopted his grandsons MANASSEH and EPHRAIM to be as REUBEN and SIMEON (48:5). The case of JAIR (1 Chr. 2:21-22) is one of inheritance rather than adoption. Some have inferred (from Matt. 1:16; Lk.

3:23) that MARY, MOTHER OF JESUS or JOSEPH her husband, or both, were adopted, but there is no clear evidence. LEVIRATE MARRIAGE (Deut. 25:5-6) involved a sort of posthumous adoption of a brother's later-born son.

But none of the OT instances has a direct bearing on the NT usage of the Greek term huiiothesia G5625. PAUL is the only writer to use it, and with him it is a metaphor derived from Hellenistic usage and Roman law. The legal situation of a son in early Roman times was little better than that of a SLAVE, though in practice its rigor would vary with the disposition of the father. A son was the property of his father, who was entitled to the son's earnings. The father could transfer ownership of him by adoption or by a true sale and could, under certain circumstances, even put him to death. An adopted son was considered like a son born in the family. He could no longer inherit from his natural father. He was no longer liable for old debts (a loophole eventually closed). So far as his former family was concerned, he was dead. Modifications of the rigor of sonship were at intervals introduced into Roman law, and a more liberal Hellenistic view was doubtless in the mind of Paul.

In Gal. 4:1-3 Paul states accurately the Roman law of sonship. Then we read that God sent his Son to be born into the human condition under law, and that God's purpose in so doing was "to redeem those under law, that we might receive the full rights of sons" (vv. 4-5). We were not merely children who needed to grow up; we had become slaves of sin and as such needed to be redeemed, bought out of our bondage, that we might enter the new family Christ brought into being by his death and resurrection. Adoption expresses both the redemption and the new relation of trust and love, for "because you are sons, God sent the Spirit of his Son into our hearts, the Spirit who calls out, 'Abba, Father'" (v. 6). The adoption brought us from slavery to sonship and heirship (v. 7).

The same thought appears in Rom. 8:15. The first part of the chapter demonstrates that the adoption is more than a matter of position or status; when God adopted us, he put his Spirit within us, and we became subject to his control. This involves chastisement (Heb. 12:5-11) as well as inheritance (Rom. 8:16-18).

In Rom. 8:23 "our adoption" is spoken of as future, in the sense that its full effects are to be consummated at the time of "the redemption of our bodies." This "redemption" is not the "buying out" mentioned above, but the release, the loosing from all restraints that the limitation of a mortal body imposes. We are part of a suffering creation (8:22). The spiritual body, the resurrection body, pictured in the vivid terms of 1 Cor. 15:35-57, is the object of Paul's longing (2 Cor. 5:1-8; Phil. 3:21). The present effects of God's adoption of us as sons are marvelous, yet they are only a small indication (2 Cor. 1:22; 5:5; Eph.

1:13-14) of what the adoption will mean when we come into our inheritance in heaven.

In Rom. 9:4 Paul begins his enumeration of the privileges of the Israelites with “the adoption.” God says, “Israel is my firstborn son” (Exod. 4:22); “When Israel was a child, I loved him, and out of Egypt I called my son” (Hos. 11:1). MOSES expressed the relationship in this way, “You are the children of the LORD your God” (Deut. 14:1). Israel’s sonship, however, was not the natural relationship by creation, but a peculiar one by a COVENANT of promise, a spiritual relationship by FAITH, under the sovereign grace of God, as Paul goes on to explain in Rom. 9-11. Thus a clear distinction is drawn between the “offspring” of God by creation (Acts 17:28) and the children of God by adoption into the obedience of faith.

With utmost compression of language Paul expresses, in Eph. 1:4-5, God’s action that resulted in his adoption of us and enumerates its effects in vv. 6-12. This action began with God’s ELECTION (“For he chose us in him before the creation of the world....In love he predestined us”), having Jesus Christ as the agent and he himself as the adopting parent. God’s sovereign act is stressed by the concluding phrase of v. 5: “in accordance with his pleasure and will.” Adoption, however, is not a mere matter of position, as is made plain in the statement of the purpose of election: “he chose us...to be holy and blameless in his sight” (1:4).

Adoption is a serious matter under any system of law. As a figure of speech expressing spiritual truth it emphasizes the sovereign and gracious character of the act of God in our salvation, our solemn obligation as adopted sons of our adopting Parent, the newness of the family relationship established, a climate of intimate trust and love, and the immensity of an inheritance that eternity alone can reveal to us.

Adoraim. ad’uh-ray’im (Heb. ʾădôrayim H126, perhaps “[pair of] hills”). One of the fifteen cities fortified by REHOBOAM (2 Chr. 11:9). It is identified with the modern village of Dura in JUDAH, 5 mi. (8 km.) SW of HEBRON. In 1 Maccabees (see APOCRYPHA) and in JOSEPHUS the name appears as Adora.

Adoram. See ADONIRAM.

adoration. See WORSHIP.

adorn. The Greek word kosmeō G3175 (“to arrange, put in order, decorate, embellish”) is used in Scripture in both a literal and a figurative sense. The figurative use can be traced back to the OT (cf. Isa. 61:10). Paul says that slaves are to live in such a way that they will “make attractive” the doctrine of God (Tit. 2:10). The book of Revelation compares the beauty of the new Jerusalem to a bride “beautifully dressed” (Rev. 21:2). Both Paul and Peter urge women not to be overly concerned about personal adornment, but to dress modestly and sensibly, and to be concerned about the beauty of good deeds (1 Tim. 2:9; 1 Pet. 3:5). The words of the apostles harmonize with the general teaching of Scripture that emphasis should be placed upon spiritual beauty rather than upon physical adornment.

Adrammelech. uh-dram´uh-lek (Heb. ʾadram-melek H165 and H166, possibly “the lordship of the king,” but more likely represents an original Adad-Milki, “[the god] HADAD is king”). TNIV Adrammelek. (1) A god of the natives of SEPHARVAIM (possibly Sabraim in E central SYRIA) whom the Assyrians transplanted to SAMARIA after 722 B.C. (2 Ki. 17:31).

(2) A son of SENNACHERIB who, with his brother SHAREZER, murdered their father in the temple of NISROCH (2 Ki. 19:37; Isa. 37-38). Recent discoveries indicate that Sennacherib’s murder was the result of a conspiracy led by his son Arad-Ninlil, who should have been named successor but was bypassed in favor of ESARHADDON, his younger brother. The name Adrammelech may be a (deliberate?) corruption of Arad-Ninlil (the Assyrian script allows other spellings, such as Arda-Mulissu).

This votive gift to Adad or Hadad, regarded as god of the weather, dates about 1300 B.C. (The wavy lines on the top and sides are thought to be thunderbolts.) The god Adrammelech may have been viewed as a manifestation of Adad.

Adramyttium. ad´ruh-mit´ee-uhm (Gk. Adramytteion). Ancient port city of MYSIA in ASIA MINOR. PAUL sailed in a ship of Adramyttium along the coast from CAESAREA in Palestine to MYRA in LYCIA, where an Alexandrian ship bound for Italy took him on board (Acts 27:2, where the name appears in the adjectival form Adramyttēnos G101, “of Adramyttium”).

Adria, Adriatic Sea. ay´dree-uh, ay´dree-a´tik (Gk. Adrias G102). The entire body of water lying between ITALY on the W and the Balkan Peninsula (including GREECE) on the E; it extends into the central Mediterranean to include the waters between CRETE and MALTA, where Paul’s ship encountered the storm on the voyage to Rome (Acts 27:27; KJV, “Adria”; NRSV, “sea of Adria”; NIV, “Adriatic Sea”). Originally the name referred to that part of the gulf between Italy and the Dalmatian coast near the mouth of the Po River, named for the town of Adria (Atria).

Adriel. ay´dree-uhl (Heb. ʿadrî ʾēl H6377, “God is my help”; prob. an Aram. name, equivalent to Heb. AZRIEL). A son of BARZILLAI who lived in ABEL MEHOLAH in the Jordan Valley. SAUL gave his daughter MERAB to Adriel, although he had promised to give her to DAVID (1 Sam. 18:19). Adriel and Merab had five sons, all of whom perished in David's dreadful and sinful acquiescence in the demand of the Gibeonites for scapegoats (2 Sam. 21:8, where most Heb. MSS read "Michal" for "Merab," apparently a scribal error).

Adullam. uh-duhl'uhm (Heb. ʿădullām H6355, "retreat, refuge"). A very ancient city in the SHEPHELAH or lowland, between the hill country of Judah and the sea, 13 mi. (21 km.) SW of BETHLEHEM (Gen. 38:1, 12, 20; Josh. 15:35). Adullam was the seat of one of the thirty-one petty kings conquered by JOSHUA (Josh. 12:15). It was later fortified by REHOBAM (2 Chr. 11:7). Because of its beauty it was called "the glory of Israel" (Mic. 1:15). Adullam was reoccupied on the return from the Babylonian EXILE (Neh. 11:30).

David hid with his family and about 400 men in one of the many limestone caves near Adullam (1 Sam. 22:1-2) at a time when SAUL sought his life. While David was here, three of his "mighty men" risked their lives to fulfill his expressed desire for water from the well of Bethlehem, but David refused to drink it, rightly recognizing that the extreme devotion that put life itself at risk was due to the Lord alone. For this reason he "poured it out before the LORD" (2 Sam. 23:13-17; 1 Chr. 11:15-19).

adultery. Voluntary sexual intercourse between a married person and someone other than his or her spouse. In the OT, the Hebrew verb nāʾap H5537 is applied usually to such an act between a man, married or unmarried, and the wife of another. One of the Ten Commandments forbids it (Exod. 20:14; Deut. 5:18; see COMMANDMENTS, TEN). The punishment for both man and woman was death, probably by stoning (Deut. 22:22-24; Jn. 8:3-7).

From the earliest times, even outside the people of God, adultery was regarded as a serious sin (Gen. 26:10; 39:9). Along with other sexual offenses (e.g., Gen. 34:7; Deut. 22:21; Jdg. 19:23; 2 Sam. 13:12) it is an "outrageous thing" (Jer. 29:23; Heb. nēbālâ H5576, referring to behavior that lacks moral principle or any recognition of proper obligation). MARRIAGE is a COVENANT relationship (e.g., Mal. 2:14), and for this reason it not only imposes obligations on the partners, but also on the community within which they have entered into their solemn, mutual vows. Thus the OT finds adultery a ready figure for APOSTASY from the Lord and attachment to false gods (e.g., Isa. 57:3; Jer. 3:8-9; 13:27; Ezek. 23:27, 43; Hos. 2:4).

While FORNICATION is frequently and severely condemned in the OT, special solemnity attaches to the reproof of adultery, both in the relations of individual men and women and, figuratively, in the relations of the covenant people Israel, conceived of as a wife with God, their spiritual husband. Isaiah, Jeremiah, and Ezekiel use the figure (see references above). Hosea, from his personal experience with an adulterous wife, develops an allegory of God's love for his unfaithful people. Adultery in the marriage relation is reprehensible; how much more infidelity in the behavior of human beings toward a God who loves them with a love that can well be expressed as that of a husband for his wife! Thus the figurative use enhances the literal sense, emphasizing the divine institution and nature of marriage.

The NT uses the corresponding Greek verb moicheuō G3658 (and derivatives). Jesus quotes the seventh commandment (Matt. 5:27-30; 19:18; Mk. 10:19; Lk. 18:20), broadening its application to include the lustful look that betrays an adulterous heart. He teaches that such evils as adultery come from the heart (Matt. 15:19; Mk. 7:21). Dealing with DIVORCE, Jesus declares remarriage of a divorced man or woman to be adultery (Matt. 5:31-32; 19:3-9; Mk. 10:2-12; Lk. 16:18), with one exception (Matt. 5:32; 19:9), the interpretation of which is debated. The PHARISEE in a parable rejoices that he is not an adulterer (Lk. 18:11). Jesus uses the term figuratively of a people unfaithful to God (Matt. 12:39; 16:4; Mk. 8:38). In Jn. 8:2-11, the account of a woman taken in adultery reveals Jesus' insistence on the equal guilt of the man. Without belittling the seriousness of adultery, Jesus exercises the sovereign pardoning power of the GRACE of God, coupled with a solemn injunction against future offenses. Jesus' attitude toward adultery springs from his conception of marriage as God intended it and as it must be in the new Christian society.

Paul names adultery as one of the tests of obedience to the law (Rom. 2:22), quotes the commandment (13:9), uses adultery as an analogy of our relation to God (7:3), says that adulterers "will not inherit the kingdom of God" (1 Cor. 6:9), and lists adultery among works of the flesh (Gal. 5:19). The sanctity of marriage is the point stressed in Heb. 13:4. In Jas. 2:1 the writer uses adultery and murder as examples of the equal obligation of all the commandments of God. In 4:4 adultery is a figure of speech for unfaithfulness to God. Spiritual adultery is condemned in Rev. 2:20-23.

The NT treatment of adultery, following the implications of the OT concept, supports marriage as a lifelong monogamous union. Adultery is a special and aggravated case of fornication. In the teaching of Jesus and the apostles in the NT, all sexual impurity is sin against God, against self, and against others. Spiritual adultery (unfaithfulness to God) violates the union between Christ and his own.

Adummim. uh-duhm'im (Heb. ʾădummîm H147, perhaps meaning "red [rocks]"). A pass about 6 mi. (10 km.) SW of JERICHO that was possibly used as a trade route at an early date. It leads from the JORDAN Valley in the vicinity of JERICHO to the hill country, including JERUSALEM. It was a part of Judah's northern boundary (Josh. 15:7) and was used as a point of reference in establishing the location of GELILOTH on BENJAMIN's southern border (18:17). Adummim is convincingly held to be the scene of Jesus' parable of the Good Samaritan (Lk. 10:30-35).

advent. This English term, which refers to the arrival of someone or something important, is used especially of the coming of CHRIST at the INCARNATION. In Christian liturgy it refers to the period that begins the fourth Sunday before Christmas. The term is also used with reference to the second coming (see ESCHATOLOGY).

advocate. One that pleads the cause of another. The term is commonly used to render Greek paraklētos G4156, found in 1 Jn. 2:1: "My little children, I am writing these things to you so that you may not sin. But if any one does sin, we have an advocate with the Father, Jesus Christ the righteous" (NRSV; the NIV renders, "we have one who speaks to the Father in our defense"). John means that Christ is the legal advocate and intercessor with the Father when one falls into sin. The next verse shows that the basis of the intercession is Christ's propitiatory death for sin. This term occurs four other times in the NT (Jn. 14:16, 26; 15:26; 16:7), but in these passages it is a title given to the HOLY SPIRIT. In all four occurrences the KJV translates it "Comforter," but recent English versions prefer renderings such as "Counselor" (NIV), "Helper" (NASB), "Advocate" (NRSV).

Aeneas. i-nee' uhs (Gk. Aineas G138, "praise"). A resident at LYDDA, bedridden with paralysis for eight years, whom PETER miraculously healed (Acts 9:33-35). His healing caused many to accept Christianity.

Aenon. ee'nuhn (Gk. Ainōn G143, possibly from Heb. ayin H6524, "spring"). A place near SALIM where JOHN THE BAPTIST was baptizing during the time Jesus was ministering in Judea (Jn. 3:22-23). The site of Aenon is debated. Some identify Salim with modern Tell Sheikh es-Selim, about 8 mi. (13 km.) S of BETH SHAN in the JORDAN Valley, but it would seem unnecessary to mention "much water"

(3:23) if Aenon had been close to the Jordan River. Thus other scholars prefer the modern village of Salim a few miles E of Nablus SHECHEM, in which case Aenon can easily be identified with modern ʿAinun, which is near the springs of Wadi Fariʿa. Evidently, John must have moved from “Bethany on the other side of the Jordan” (1:28) to an area W of the Jordan.

aeon. This term, meaning “a long period of time,” does not occur in most English translations of the Bible. However, the corresponding Greek word (aiōn G172, “age”) is found frequently in the NT and also in the SEPTUAGINT (esp. to render Heb. ʿôlām H6409). A common translation in the NT is “world,” in which case its duration in time is involved. Good examples of the meaning of the word as a period of time are Heb. 9:26, where “the end of the ages” is the period ushered in by the first coming of Christ, and Matt. 24:3 and 28:20, where “the end of the age” is its culmination at his second coming. We live in the in-between period (1 Cor. 10:11). “This present age [time]” and “the age [world] to come” are distinguished (e.g., Matt. 12:32; Mk. 10:30). “This [the present] world [age]” (e.g., Rom. 12:2; 2 Tim. 4:10; Tit. 2:12) implies the existence of another world. In Eph. 1:21 “the present age” precedes “the one to come.” Hebrews 6:5 speaks of “the powers of the coming age,” which believers already experience. See WORLD. The Gnostic concept of aeons as beings emanating from and standing between God and the world is foreign to the NT.

affliction. See PERSECUTION; SORROW.

Africa. Although this name does not occur in the Bible, there are numerous references either to the continent in general or more specifically to Roman Proconsular Africa (that is, modern Tunisia, to which were added Numidia and Mauretania). The OT often refers to EGYPT and a few times to ETHIOPIA (e.g., Isa. 45:14; Jer. 13:23). In the NT, Egypt, its Greek city of ALEXANDRIA (Acts 18:24), Ethiopia (8:27), and the port of CYRENE in modern Libya (Mk. 15:21) are mentioned primarily because of the Jewish settlements there. Jesus himself went into Egypt (Matt. 2:13-14), and Jews from Africa were present on the Day of Pentecost (Acts 2:10).

Agabus. ag’uh-buhs (Gk. Hagabos G13, meaning uncertain). One of the prophets from JERUSALEM who came to ANTIOCH of Syria and prophesied that there would be “a severe famine...over the entire Roman world.” The prediction, which came to pass during the reign of Claudius, led Christians at Antioch “to provide help for...Judea...by Barnabas and Saul” (Acts 11:27-30). Years later, a “prophet named Agabus” (almost surely the same man) came down from Jerusalem to CAESAREA and by a dramatic action warned PAUL that he would be put in bonds if he persisted in going to Jerusalem (21:10-11).

Agag. ay’gag (Heb. אָגַג H97, possibly “angry, warlike”). An important king of AMALEK (Num. 24:7). BALAAM prophesied that a king of Jacob (Israel) would surpass Agag. Israel’s oldest enemy following the exodus was Amalek (Exod. 17:8-15), and Balaam foresaw Israel’s future glory in terms of the defeat of the Amalekites under a king whom he identified as Agag. Some believe this prediction was fulfilled when SAUL met Agag in battle and defeated him (1 Sam. 15:1-33, though he only partly obeyed the command to wreak the Lord’s vengeance). It is possible, however, that Agag was a dynastic title.

Agagite. See HAMAN.

agape. Transliteration of the Greek term agapē G27, the more frequent of two NT words for LOVE. It is used in Jude 12 (KJV “feasts of charity”; NIV, “love feasts”) of common meals that cultivated brotherly love among Christians. They may be referred to elsewhere (Acts 20:11; 1 Cor. 11:21-22, 33-34; 2 Pet. 2:13). In Acts 2:46, “broke bread” refers to the LORD’S SUPPER (cf. v. 42), but “ate together” requires a full meal. PAUL rebukes Christians for the abuses that had crept into the love feasts and had marred the Lord’s Supper (1 Cor. 11:20-34). Apparently the Lord’s Supper properly followed, but was distinct from, the love feast.

Agar. See HAGAR.

agate. See MINERALS.

age. See AEON.

age, old. According to the Ten Commandments, attaining old age is the reward of filial obedience (Exod. 20:12). The Mosaic legislation spelled out the respect that should be shown to the aged (Lev. 19:32). Younger men waited till their elders had spoken (Job 32:4). God promised ABRAHAM “a good old age” (Gen. 15:15). When PHARAOH received him, JACOB lamented that he had not lived as long as his ancestors (47:7-9). There are many Hebrew words relating to old age in the OT, showing the honor in which the aged were usually held; yet the gray hairs that were so much respected also had their sorrows (44:29-31). Official positions went to older men or ELDERS (e.g., Exod. 3:16; Matt. 21:23; Acts 14:23). Aged men and women are given sound advice in Tit. 2:2-5. There is a fine picture of old age in Eccl. 12:1-7. Jesus Christ is portrayed with the white hair of old age in Rev. 1:14.

Agee. ay'gee (Heb. ʾāgē H96, derivation uncertain). A HARARITE and the father of SHAMMAH; the latter was one of DAVID's mighty warriors (2 Sam. 23:11).

Aggadah. See HAGGADAH.

agony. This English word is derived from Greek agōnia G75 (itself from agōn G74, "contest, struggle, race"), which is found in the NT only in Lk. 22:44, used to describe the Lord's "anguish" in the Garden of GETHSEMANE (the cognate verb agōnizomai G76 was often used to describe the exhausting struggles and sufferings of athletes and gladiators). It is equivalent to "sorrowful and troubled" in Matt. 26:37 and "deeply distressed and troubled" in Mk. 14:33. Luke alone records that Christ's agony was such that "his sweat was like drops of blood falling to the ground," though Matthew and Mark speak of the change in his countenance and manner and record his words as he spoke of his overwhelming sorrow "even unto death" (cf. Heb. 5:7-8).

Jesus' struggle was in part with the powers of darkness, which were then returning with double force, having retreated after SATAN's defeat at the temptation "until an opportune time" (Lk. 4:13). Chiefly, however, Jesus' agony was caused by the prospect of the darkness on CALVARY, when he was to experience a horror never known before, the hiding of the Father's face, the climax of his vicarious suffering for our sins. The one who knew no sin was to be made sin for mankind (2 Cor. 5:21). The hour was before him when he would cry out in wretchedness of soul, "My God, my God, why have you forsaken me?" The prospect of this dreadful cup caused the struggle in the garden. In this supreme spiritual conflict, the Captain of our salvation emerged triumphant, as is evident in the language of his final victory of faith over the sinless infirmity of his flesh: "Shall I not drink the cup the Father has given me?" (Jn. 18:11).

agora. ag'uh-ruh. Transliteration of a Greek term (agora G59) that refers to a marketplace, usually the center of public life, where people met for the exchange of merchandise, information, and ideas. The agorae of GALILEE and JUDEA were the scenes for many of the healing miracles of Christ (Mk. 6:56). Here the village idlers, as well as those seeking work, would gather (Matt. 20:3). Here the vain and the proud could parade in order to gain public recognition (Matt. 23:7; Mk. 12:38; Lk. 11:43; 20:46). Here also the children would gather for play (Matt. 11:16-17; Lk. 7:32). In Gentile cities, the agorae served also as forums and tribunals. The agora of PHILIPPI was the scene of the trial of PAUL and SILAS (Acts 16:19-21) following the deliverance of a “slave girl who had a spirit by which she predicted the future” (v. 16). In ATHENS Paul’s daily disputations in the agora led directly to his famed message before the AREOPAGUS, the court that met on Mars’ Hill, N of the ACROPOLIS (17:17-34).

agrapha. ag’ruh-fuh. Transliteration of the neuter plural form of Greek agraphos, meaning “unrecorded.” The term does not appear in the NT, but in the ancient church was applied to those sayings of the apostolic church that were not incorporated in the canonical NT. Modern scholars use the term with reference to units of tradition concerning Christ, mostly sayings ascribed to him, transmitted to us outside of the canonical Gospels. The entire collection of agrapha, gathered from all sources, is not large; and when what is obviously apocryphal or spurious is eliminated, the small remainder is of limited value.

Several sources of agrapha may be noted. The best authenticated are those found in the NT outside of the Gospels: four in Acts (Acts 1:4-5; 1:7-8; 11:16; 20:35); two in Paul’s letters (1 Cor. 11:24-25; 1 Thess. 4:15); and one in James (Jas. 1:12).

A second source of agrapha is found in ancient MSS of the NT. Most often, sayings preserved in such documents are of the nature of textual variations: parallel forms or expansions or combinations of sayings found in the canonical Gospels. A few, however, cannot be fitted into this category; the following, for example, is found after Lk. 6:5 in an important fifth-century MS called Codex Bezae: “On the same day, seeing someone working on the Sabbath, he [Jesus] said to him, ‘Man, if indeed you know what you are doing, you are blessed; but if you do not know, you are cursed and a transgressor of the Law.’”

Another source of agrapha is patristic literature. Papias, bishop of Hierapolis (c. A.D. 80-155), was the first of the church fathers to make a collection of the sayings of Jesus not recorded in the Gospels, but very little of his work survives. Agrapha are found in the works of Justin Martyr, Clement of Alexandria, Origen, and a few others. Origen, for example, wrote, “I have read somewhere that the Saviour said...‘He that is near me is near the fire; he that is far from me is far from the kingdom.’”

Still another source of agrapha consists of papyri that have been discovered in Egypt during the past century, especially some found by Oxford scholars B. P. Grenfell and A. S. Hunt at Oxyrhynchus. In some of these documents one agraphon follows another without context, introduced by the simple formula, "Jesus says," as in the following: "Jesus says: Wheresoever there are two, they are not with God, and where there is one alone, I say, I am with him. Lift up the stone, and there shalt thou find me; cleave the wood, and I am there."

Agrapha are found also in the apocryphal gospels, like the Gospel According to the Hebrews and the Gospel According to the Egyptians, but few, if any, of these can be regarded as genuine. The recently discovered (1945 or 1946) Gnostic Coptic Gospel of Thomas, found near Nag Hammadi in Upper Egypt, which is dated around A.D. 150, consists of more than one hundred short sayings of Jesus, the majority of which begin with the words, "Jesus said," or they give a reply by Jesus when asked by his disciples to instruct them on a doubtful point. See also THOMAS, GOSPEL OF. Many sayings ascribed to Jesus are found in Islamic sources, but these traditions are for the most part of no value.

Although the number of agrapha collected by scholars seems imposing, only a very few have anything like a strong claim to acceptance on the grounds of early and reliable source and internal character. Some scholars reject the agrapha completely; others think that they are the remains of a considerable body of extracanonical sayings that circulated in early Christian circles, and that a few of them, at least, may be genuine.

agriculture. The cultivation of plants and care of livestock for crops and products. In the form of horticulture, this activity is as old as ADAM (Gen. 2:5, 8-15). Caring for the Garden of Eden became labor after the curse (3:17-19). Nomad and farmer began to be differentiated with ABEL and CAIN (4:2-4). As animal husbandry took its place along with tillage as part of the agricultural economy, the farmer gained in social status. Yet as late as shortly before the Babylonian exile, nomads still felt a sense of superiority over the settled agricultural people (cf. the Recabites, Jer. 35:1-11).

NOAH is described as "a man of the soil" who planted a vineyard (Gen. 9:20). ABRAHAM and his descendants were nomad herdsmen in Canaan, though ISAAC and JACOB at times also tilled the soil (26:12; 37:7). Recurrent famines and the sojourn in Egypt taught the Israelites to depend more on agriculture, so that the report of the spies regarding the lush growth in Canaan interested them (Num. 13:23; Deut. 8:8). Agriculture became the basis of the Mosaic commonwealth, since the land of PALESTINE was suited to an agricultural rather than a pastoral economy. The soil is fertile wherever water can be applied abundantly. The HAURAN district is productive. The soil of GAZA is dark and rich, though porous, and retains rain; olive trees abound there.

Women from the village of Bet Sahour on the outskirts of Bethlehem harvesting wheat by hand.

The Israelites cleared away most of the wood that they found in Canaan (Josh. 17:18). Wood became scarce; dung and hay heated their ovens (Ezek. 4:12-15; Matt. 6:30). Their WATER supply came from RAIN, from brooks that ran from the hills, and from the JORDAN. Irrigation was made possible by ducts from cisterns hewn out of rock. As population increased, the more difficult cultivation of the hills was resorted to and yielded abundance. Terraces were cut, one above another, and faced with low stone walls. Rain falls chiefly in autumn and winter, November and December, rarely after March, almost never as late as May. The “early” rain falls from about the September equinox to sowing time in November or December, the “latter” rain comes in January and February (Joel 2:23; Jas. 5:7). Drought two or three months before HARVEST meant FAMINE (Amos 4:7-8).

Wheat, barley, and rye (millet rarely) were the staple cereals. “Corn” in the KJV, according to British usage, refers to any grain, not specifically to maize (NIV renders “grain”). The barley harvest was earlier than the wheat harvest: “The flax and barley were destroyed, since the barley had headed and the flax was in bloom. The wheat and spelt, however, were not destroyed, because they ripen later” (Exod. 9:31-32). Accordingly, at the Passover the barley was ready for the sickle, and the wave sheaf was offered. At the Pentecost feast fifty days later, the wheat was ripe for cutting, and the firstfruit loaves were offered. The vine, olive, and fig abounded, and traces remain everywhere of wine and olive presses. Cummin, peas, beans, lentils, lettuce, endive, leek, garlic, onion, cucumber, and cabbage were also cultivated.

The Passover in the month of Nisan (March-April) occurred in the green stage of produce; the Feast of Weeks in Sivan (May-June), to the ripening stage; and the Feast of Tabernacles in Tishri (September-October), to the harvest. See FEASTS. The six months from Tishri to Nisan were occupied with cultivation; the six months from Nisan to Tishri, with gathering fruits. Rain from the equinox in Tishri to Nisan was pretty continuous but was heavier at the beginning (the early rain) and the end (the latter rain). Rain in harvest was almost unknown (Prov. 26:1).

Viticulture (the cultivation of grapes) is pictured in Isa. 5:1-7 and Matt. 21:33-41. Some farming procedures are described in Isa. 28:24-28. The plow was light and drawn by yokes of oxen (1 Ki. 19:19). Oxen were urged on with a spearlike goad, which could double as a deadly weapon (Jdg. 3:31). Fallow ground was broken and cleared early in the year (Jer. 4:3; Hos. 10:1). Seed was scattered broadcast, as in the parable of the sower (Matt. 13:1-8), and plowed in afterward, the stubble of the preceding crop becoming mulch by decay. In irrigated fields, the seed was trodden in by cattle (Isa. 32:20). The contrast between the exclusive dependence on irrigation in Egypt and the larger dependence on rain in Palestine is drawn in Deut. 11:10-12. To sow among thorns was deemed bad husbandry (Job 5:5; Prov. 24:30-32). Hoeing and weeding were seldom needed in their fine tilth. Seventy days sufficed between barley sowing and the offering of the wave sheaf of ripe grain at Passover.

Harvest customs in the time of the Judges are described in Ruth 2 and 3. The sowing of varied seed in a field was forbidden (Deut. 22:9). Oxen, unmuzzled (25:4) and five abreast, trod out the grain on a threshing floor of hard beaten earth, to separate the grain from chaff and straw. Flails were used for small quantities and lighter grains (Isa. 28:27). A threshing sledge (41:15) was also used, probably like the Egyptian sledge still in use (a stage with three rollers ridged with iron, which cut the straw for fodder, while crushing out the grain). The shovel and fan winnowed the grain afterward with the help of the evening breeze (Ruth 3:2; Isa. 30:24); lastly it was shaken in a sieve (Amos 9:9; Lk. 22:31). The fruit of newly planted trees was not to be eaten for the first three years. In the fourth it was offered as firstfruits. In the fifth year it might be eaten freely (Lev. 19:23-25). We have glimpses of the relations of farm laborers, steward (manager or overseer), and owner in the book of Ruth, in Matt. 20:1-16, and in Lk. 17:7-9.

Agriculture was beset with pests: locust, cankerworm, caterpillar, and palmerworm (Joel 2:25 KJV); God calls them "my great army," as destructive as an invasion by human enemies. Haggai speaks of blight, mildew, and hail (Hag. 2:17). Modern development of agriculture in Palestine under the British mandate and since the establishment of the State of Israel, and parallel but lesser development in the country of Jordan, are restoring the coastal plain, the plains of Esdraelon and Dothan, the Shephelah, the Negev, and the Hauran to their ancient prosperity. See also FARMING; OCCUPATIONS AND PROFESSIONS.

Agrippa I. uh-grip´uh (Gk. Agrippas G68). King Herod Agrippa I, referred to simply as Herod in Acts 12, was the son of Aristobulus and Bernice and grandson of Herod the Great. Through friendship with the emperors Caligula and Claudius he gained the rulership first of Iturea and Tracónitis, then of Galilee and Perea, and ultimately of Judea and Samaria. He ruled over this reunited domain of Herod the Great from A.D. 40 until his death in 44 at the age of fifty-four. While owing his position to the favor of Rome, he recognized the importance of exercising great tact in his contacts with the Jews. Thus it was that his natural humanity gave way to expediency in the severe conflict between Judaism and the growing Christian movement. He killed James (brother of John the Apostle), an act that “pleased the Jews,” and imprisoned Peter with the intention of bringing him before the people for execution after the Passover (Acts 12:2-4). Agrippa’s sudden death shortly thereafter, noted in Acts 12:20-23, is fully recorded by Josephus (Ant. 19.8.2 §§343-52). On the second day of a festival held in Caesarea in honor of Claudius, Agrippa put on a silver garment of “wonderful” texture and entered the amphitheater early in the morning. When the sun’s rays shone on his garment, the brilliant glare caused his flatterers to cry out that he was a god. Josephus adds that “the king did neither rebuke them nor reject their impious flattery.” Almost immediately a severe pain arose in his abdomen; five days later he died in great agony.

Agrippa II. uh-grip´uh (Gk. Agrippas G68). King Herod Agrippa II, referred to simply as Agrippa in Acts 25-26, was the son of Agrippa I. Only seventeen at the death of his father, he was thought too young to succeed to the throne. Six years later (A.D. 50), he was placed over the kingdom of Chalcis, which included the right to appoint the high priest of the temple in Jerusalem. In 53 he was transferred to the tetrarchies formerly held by Philip (Iturea and Tracónitis) and Lysanias (Abilene) and given the title of king. After the death of Claudius in 54, Nero added to Agrippa’s realm several cities of Galilee and Perea. When Festus became procurator of Judea, Agrippa went to Caesarea to pay his respects. He was accompanied by his sister Bernice, with whom he was rumored to have an incestuous relationship (the reliability of this rumor is doubtful). It was at this time that Paul appeared before him, as recorded in Acts 25:23—26:32. In the final revolt of the Jews against Rome, Agrippa sided with the Romans in the destruction of his nation in the same cynical spirit with which he met the impassioned appeal of the apostle. Following the fall of Jerusalem in 70, he retired with Bernice to Rome, where he died in 100.

ague. A term used in the KJV (Lev. 26:16) with reference to fever. See DISEASE (under malaria).

Agur. ay'guhr (Heb. ʾāgûr H101, possibly “hireling” or “gatherer”). Son of Jakeh; an otherwise unknown writer of maxims who may have been from a place named MASSA (Prov. 30:1; cf. NIV mg., RSV, NJPS). Agur’s proverbs were written to two unknown men, ITHIEL and UCAL, although the meaning of the text is debated. Most early rabbis and church fathers thought that SOLOMON was designated by the name Agur, but it is difficult to see why he should be referred to by a pseudonym. It has also been conjectured that Agur was the brother of LEMUEL (Prov. 31:1).

Ahab. ay'hab (Heb. ʾah ʾāb H281, “father’s brother” [possibly suggesting that the son is just like the father]). (1) Son of OMRI and seventh king of the northern kingdom of ISRAEL. He reigned twenty-two years, 874-853 B.C. Politically, Ahab was one of the strongest kings of Israel. In his days Israel was at peace with Judah (see JUDAH, KINGDOM OF) and maintained her dominion over MOAB, which paid a considerable tribute (2 Ki. 3:4). He went into battle on three different occasions in later years against BEN-HADAD, king of SYRIA. While he had great success in the first two campaigns, he was defeated and mortally wounded in the third. Not mentioned in the Bible is Ahab’s participation in the Battle of Qarqar in 854/53. The “Monolith Inscription” of the Assyrian king SHALMANESER III contains a description of this battle that the Assyrians fought against a Syrian coalition of twelve kings. Of these, “Hadadezer,” king of Damascus, is named first; Irhuleni of Hamath follows; and in third place is “Ahab, the Israelite.” The inscription states that Ahab commanded 2,000 chariots and 10,000 men. The number of his chariots was far greater than the number credited to any other king.

Successful as he might have been politically, however, Ahab owes his prominence in the OT to the religious APOSTASY that occurred in Israel during his reign. Of him it is said, he “did more evil in the eyes of the LORD than any of those before him” (1 Ki. 16:30). His marriage to JEZEBEL, daughter of the king of the Sidonians, was politically advantageous but religiously disastrous. Jezebel introduced the idolatrous worship of BAAL into Israel as well as the licentious orgies of the goddess ASHTORETH. She also instituted a severe persecution against the followers of the Lord and killed all the prophets of the Lord with the sword, except the one hundred who had been hidden by OBADIAH (18:4; cf. 19:14). At this critical period in the history of Israel, God raised up ELLIAH, whose faithful ministry culminated in the conflict with the prophets of Baal on Mount Carmel (ch. 18).

Ahab's religious corruption was equaled by his love of material wealth and display. He was well known, for example, for his elaborately ornamented ivory palace (1 Ki. 22:39). Not content with what he had, however, he coveted the vineyard of NABOTH, which adjoined his palace at JEZREEL. Naboth refused to sell the land and Ahab was utterly dejected. Seeing his state, Jezebel asked him to remember who was king in Israel, and proceeded unscrupulously to charge Naboth with blasphemy, doing so in the name of the king, who weakly maintained silence. False witnesses testified against Naboth, he was stoned to death, and Ahab took possession of the vineyard. This crime sealed the doom not only of Ahab, but also of his family. The judgment of the Lord was that all of his posterity would be cut off (21:21), even as had been the case with the two previous dynasties, those of JEROBOAM and BAASHA. The ringing condemnatory sentence of Elijah (21:19) was fulfilled to the letter on Ahab's son Joram (JEHORAM, 2 Ki. 9:24-26) and in part on Ahab himself (1 Ki. 22:38). Execution of the sentence was, however, delayed by Ahab's repentance (21:27-29). Ahab also sinned by failing to discern the Lord's will and sparing the defeated Ben-Hadad of Syria (20:20-43). The prediction of his own death (20:42) was fulfilled when he was killed in battle at RAMOTH GILEAD (22:34).

The Black Obelisk of Shalmaneser III (859-824 B.C.), whose conquests resulted in forced tribute by a number of the northern tribes of Israel. Here (side C), five Israelite emissaries bring tribute to the Assyrian empire.

Ahab's character is succinctly summarized by the historian: "There was never a man like Ahab, who sold himself to do evil in the eyes of the LORD, urged on by Jezebel his wife" (1 Ki. 21:25).

(2) Ahab son of Kolaiah, a false (i.e., self-appointed) prophet who, along with a certain ZEDEKIAH, was guilty of immorality and claimed to speak in Yahweh's name among the exiles of Babylon; he is known only from Jer. 29:21-23.

Aharah. uh-hair´uh (Heb. אֲהָרָח H341, derivation unknown). Third son of BENJAMIN (1 Chr. 8:1). The name is probably a scribal corruption of AHIRAM (Num. 26:38).

Aharhel. uh-hahr´hel (Heb. אֲהָרֵחֵל H342, derivation uncertain). Son of Harum and descendant of JUDAH; a clan leader (1 Chr. 4:8).

Ahasai. See AHZAI.

Ahasbai. uh-haz´bi (Heb. אֲחַסְבַּי H335, derivation uncertain). Father of ELIPHELET, who was one of DAVID’s mighty warriors (2 Sam. 23:34). Described as “the Maacathite” (lit., “son of the Maacathite”), Ahasbai may have been from a Judean family named MAACAH (1 Chr. 2:48; 4:19), or from the city of ABEL BETH MAACAH (2 Sam. 20:14), or from the Aramean city of Maacah (2 Sam. 10:6-8). Because the parallel passage reads differently (1 Chr. 11:35b-36a), some scholars suspect scribal corruption.

Ahasuerus. uh-hash´yoo-er´uhs (Heb. אֲחַשְׁוֵרֹשׁ H347, from Pers. hšayāršā, possibly “mighty man”). See XERXES.

Ahava. uh-hay´vuh (Heb. אֲחָוָה H178, meaning unknown). The name of a canal and its surrounding area in BABYLON, mentioned only in Ezra 8:15, 21, and 31 (the parallel passage in the APOCRYPHA has the name “Theras,” 1 Esd. 8:41, 61). No such location has ever been found, and there is little evidence to support the supposition of the older commentators that it was a city. Ahava was the gathering place for the Israelites returning to Jerusalem with EZRA.

Ahaz. ay´haz (Heb. אֲחָז H298, short form of JEHOAHAZ, “Yahweh has taken hold [for protection]”). KJV NT Achaz. (1) Reigning over the southern kingdom of Judah, c. 735-715 B.C., Ahaz was a king of great significance both historically and theologically (see JUDAH, KINGDOM OF). Historically, during his reign and as a result of his policies, the people of God became vassals of ASSYRIA and never again did the throne of DAVID exist in its fully sovereign right. Ahaz began that prolonged period of foreign domination that continued beyond the time of the coming of Christ. The dominant political power changed—Assyria, Babylon, Persia, Greece, Rome—but the vassalage did not. In addition, Ahaz is significant theologically, for his policies involved a denial of the way of faith. The essential cause of the demeaning of the throne of David and its enslavement was unbelief. The message of the reign of Ahaz remains as ISAIAH summarized it: “If you do not stand firm in your faith, you will not stand at all” (Isa. 7:9).

Ahaz is often represented as a weak, ineffective king. This is not the case. He gave his country firm and resolute leadership—but in the wrong direction. In 745 B.C. TIGLATH-PILESER gained the throne of Assyria, the contemporary “super-power”; at once the Assyrians threw off the lethargy of the previous years and began to pursue imperialist policies. The states W of Assyria, particularly ARAM (SYRIA) and ISRAEL (the northern kingdom of the people of God), felt their security threatened and determined on a defensive, military alliance. Desiring a united Palestinian front, these northern powers determined to coerce Judah into their anti-Assyrian bloc.

From the time of JOTHAM, Ahaz’s father, Judah had been under this pressure (2 Ki. 15:37), but it was not until Ahaz’s day that events reached a climax. A large-scale invasion brought the northern powers the successes reported in 2 Chr. 28:5-8, though for reasons no longer clear they failed to capitalize on these achievements by taking JERUSALEM (Isa. 7:1). A further incursion was planned. This time the armies of EDOM and of the PHILISTINES (2 Chr. 28:17-18) also took the field, with the clearly defined objective of bringing the monarchy of David to an end and replacing the Davidic king, perhaps with an Aramean puppet (Isa. 7:6). This threat to the dynasty of David made the events of the reign of Ahaz crucially significant. In the face of the threat we may well ask, What made the people of God secure? How did they keep hold of their God-given possessions and privileges?

Isaiah answered these questions with one word: “Faith.” Those who trust the Lord’s promises will find that he keeps his promises. Isaiah revealed the Lord’s mind: the dreaded threat from the N would come to nothing (Isa. 7:7), whereas trusting in the apparent security of her military alliance with Syria would bring Ephraim (Israel) to a total end (7:8). Only the way of faith would keep Judah secure (7:9). When Isaiah made this appeal to Ahaz, that resolute monarch was already committed to the beginning of a militarist solution. Isaiah reveals him reviewing Jerusalem’s most vulnerable point: its overground water supply that could easily be cut off by a besieging enemy (7:3). King Ahaz could not be moved to the position of simple faith. To the offer of a sign from the Lord of even cosmic proportions (7:10-11) he gave the sort of answer that is often the resort of the outwardly religious man (7:12), and the die was cast.

Ahaz refused the way of faith and embraced instead the way of works—the military-political solution. He showed all his astute hard-headedness in the course he followed. In fear of Assyria, Syria and Israel were threatening him.

What better way to deal with them than to appeal over their heads to Assyria, secure an alliance with the super-power, and leave it to Assyrian armed might to disperse the Syro-Ephraimite armies? This is exactly what Ahaz did (2 Ki. 16:7-8; 2 Chr. 28:16). But he learned the risk of taking a tiger by the tail: once Assyria had disposed of the N Palestine kingdoms it was the turn of Judah, and Ahaz became the first vassal king in David's line.

The Bible makes it clear that Ahaz had prepared the way for his own spiritual downfall by religious apostasy long before the decisive moment arrived (2 Ki. 16:14; 2 Chr. 28:1-4). It comes as no surprise that his decisions to abandon the way of faith opened the door to further and greater religious decline (2 Ki. 16:10-18; 2 Chr. 28:22-23).

(2) Son of Micah and great-grandson of King SAUL (1 Chr. 8:35-36; 9:41-42). Nothing else is known about him.

Ahaz, dial of. See DIAL.

Ahaziah. ay'huh-zi'uh (Heb. ʾāḥazyā H301, also ʾāḥazyāhû H302, "Yahweh has taken hold [for protection]" or "whom Yahweh sustains"; cf. JEHOAHAZ, AHZAI). (1) Son of AHAB and JEZEBEL; eighth king of ISRAEL, reigning only briefly, 853-852 B.C. Ahaziah was a worshiper of JEROBOAM's calves and of his mother's idols, BAAL and ASHTORETH. The most notable event of his reign was the revolt of MOAB, which had been giving a yearly tribute of 100,000 lambs and 100,000 rams (2 Ki. 1:1; 3:4-5). Ahaziah was prevented from trying to put down the revolt by a fall through a lattice in his palace at SAMARIA. Injured severely, he sent messengers to inquire of BAAL-ZEBUB, god of EKRON, whether he would recover. ELIJAH the prophet was sent by God to intercept the messengers and proclaimed to them that Ahaziah would die. The king in anger tried to capture the prophet, but two groups of fifty men were consumed by fire from heaven in making the attempt. A third contingent was sent to seize the prophet but instead implored Elijah to deliver them from the fate of their predecessors (2 Ki. 1:13-14). Elijah then went down to Samaria and gave the message directly to the king, who died shortly afterward. He was succeeded by his brother Joram/Jehoram (1:17; cf. 8:16). See JEHORAM #2.

(2) Son of Jehoram of Judah (see JEHORAM #1) and ATHALIAH; thus grandson of JEHOASHAPHAT and of AHAB, and nephew of Ahaziah of Israel. He was the sixth king of Judah in the divided monarchy (see JUDAH, KINGDOM OF) and reigned only one year (2 Chr. 22:2), c. 842 B.C. In 2 Chr. 21:17 and 25:23, his name appears also as Jehoahaz (a simple transposition of the component parts of the compound name; in 22:6 the KJV, following most Heb. MSS, has Azariah).

According to 2 Ki. 8:26, Ahaziah was twenty-two years old when he began to reign, and his father, Jehoram, only lived to age forty (21:20). However, 2 Chr. 22:2 states that he was forty-two years old when he ascended the throne. Some have thought that this last reference is a scribal error, but it may indicate a coregency. Ahaziah walked in all the idolatries of the house of Ahab, “for his mother encouraged him in doing wrong” (22:3). He sinned also in allying himself with Joram/Jehoram of Israel against Hazael of Syria, going into battle at RAMOTH GILEAD (22:5). Joram was wounded and Ahaziah went to see him at JEZREEL. Here judgment came on him through the hand of JEHU, who fell on Joram and all the house of Ahab. When Ahaziah saw the slaughter, he fled, but “they wounded him in his chariot...he escaped to Megiddo and died there” (2 Ki. 9:27). The account given in Chronicles presents different though not irreconcilable details of his death (2 Chr. 22:6-9). Ahaziah was buried with his fathers in Jerusalem (2 Ki. 9:28). Jehu allowed this honorable burial because Ahaziah was the grandson of Jehoshaphat, who sought the Lord with all his heart (2 Chr. 22:9). Following the death of Ahaziah, his mother Athaliah seized the throne. She killed all the royal sons of the house of Judah except Joash (JEHOASH), Ahaziah’s son, who was hidden by JEHOSHEBA, sister of Ahaziah and wife of JEHOIADA the high priest (22:10-12).

Ahban. ahˈban (Heb. אֲבָנָן H283, derivation uncertain). Son of Abishur and descendant of JUDAH through PEREZ and JERAHMEEL (1 Chr. 2:29).

Aher. ayˈhuhr (Heb. אֲחֵר H338, “another” [possibly indicating a substitute for a sibling who has died]). A Benjamite identified as the father or ancestor of the Hushites (1 Chr. 7:12; see HUSHIM #2). The text is emended by some scholars, but if it is sound, the name may be a contracted form of AHIRAM (Num. 26:38).

Ahi. ayˈhi (Heb. אֲחִי H306, “my brother”; perhaps a contraction of AHIJAH). (1) Son of Abdiel and descendant of GAD; head of a family (1 Chr. 5:15).

(2) Son of SHOMER (KJV, “Shamer”; NRSV, “Shemer”) and descendant of ASHER (1 Chr. 7:34); some read the text not as a name but as אֲחִיָּו, meaning “his brother” (cf. RSV and NIV mg.).

The form Ahi is also used in the composition of many Hebrew names with various possible meanings, such as “brother of” and “my brother is” (where “brother” can be a reference to God).

Ahiah. uh-hi'uh (Heb. אֲחִיָּיָא H308, short form of אֲחִיָּאֵה, “[my] brother is Yahweh”). One of the leaders of the people who sealed the covenant of reform with NEHEMIAH (Neh. 10:26). Here the KJV has “Ahijah,” but in several passages where other versions have “Ahijah,” the KJV reads “Ahiah” (1 Sam. 14:3, 18; 1 Ki. 4:3; 1 Chr. 8:7). No English version seems to be completely consistent in the spelling of this name.

Ahiam. uh-hi'uhm (Heb. אֲחִי אָמ H307, possibly short form of אֲחִי אָמִי “my brother is indeed [Yahweh]”; see אֲבִיָּאֵה #5). Son of Sharar the HARARITE; he was one of DAVID’s mighty warriors (2 Sam. 23:33; called “son of Sacar” in 1 Chr. 11:35).

Ahian. uh-hi'uhn (Heb. אֲחִיָּאֵן H319, possibly “little brother”). Son of Shemida and descendant of MANASSEH (1 Chr. 7:19).

Ahiezer. ay'hi-ee'zühr (Heb. אֲחִי עֶזֶר H323, “my brother is help”). (1) Son of Ammishaddai; in the time of MOSES he represented the tribe of DAN on a number of important occasions (Num. 1:12; 2:25; 7:66, 71; 10:25).

(2) Son of Shemaah of GIBEAH; he and his brother Joash were warriors from the tribe of BENJAMIN who left SAUL and joined DAVID at ZIKLAG (1 Chr. 12:3; cf. v. 1).

Ahiahud. uh-hi'huhd (Heb. אֲחִי הֹד H310, “[my] brother is majesty”). (1) Son of Sheloni and a leader of the tribe of ASHER; he was appointed by MOSES to help divide the land W of the Jordan after the Israelites settled there (Num. 34:27).

(2) The head of a Benjamite family (1 Chr. 8:7). The Hebrew text is difficult; he may have been the son of Ehud (KJV) or of Gera (NIV) or of Heglam (NRSV).

Ahijah. uh-hi'juh (Heb. אֲחִיָּיָא H308, also אֲחִיָּיָאֵה H309, “[my] brother is Yahweh”; see אֲחִיָּאֵה). (1) Son of AHITUB and a priest in the days of SAUL. He was a descendant of ELI through PHINEHAS’s line (1 Sam. 14:3, 18; KJV, “Ahiah”). He is also called AHIMELECH (possibly a short form of Ahijah, 22:9, 11, 20). He was the father of ABIATHAR and served as priest at NOB. Ahijah consulted the oracles of God for Saul on the field at MICMASH (14:18-19). He is the same one who offered the showbread to DAVID when he was hungry and fleeing from Saul (21:1-10).

(2) A Pelonite who was one of David's Thirty, the military élite of the nation (1 Chr. 11:36). However, the parallel list at this point reads, "Eliam the son of Ahithophel the Gilonite" (2 Sam. 23:34; this reading is to be preferred).

(3) A Levite in the time of David who was in charge of the treasuries of the temple (1 Chr. 26:20 KJV, NRSV). The NIV, following the SEPTUAGINT and most commentators, reads ʾăḥêhem ("their brothers") and translates, "Their fellow Levites."

(4) Son of Shisha; he and his brother Elihoreph were secretaries for SOLOMON (1 Ki. 4:3; KJV, "Ahiah").

(5) A prophet from SHILOH who predicted to JEROBOAM that he would reign over ten of the twelve tribes, and that his dynasty would be an enduring one if he did what was right in the eyes of the Lord (1 Ki. 11:29-39; 12:15). However, Jeroboam ignored the condition attached to the prediction, and it fell to Ahijah to foretell not only the death of Jeroboam's son but also the end of Jeroboam's line (14:1-18). The fulfillment of these words continued to roll in during subsequent days (1 Ki. 15:29; 2 Chr. 10:15). "The prophecy of Ahijah the Shilonite" was one of the sources used in the history of Solomon (2 Chr. 9:29).

(6) Father of King BAASHA of Israel; the latter conspired against NADAB, the son of Jeroboam, and then ruled in his place (1 Ki. 15:27, 33; 21:22; 2 Ki. 9:9). He was from the tribe of ISSACHAR.

(7) Son of JERAHMEEL and descendant of JUDAH (1 Chr. 2:25).

(8) Son of EHUD and descendant of BENJAMIN (1 Chr. 8:7; KJV, "Ahiah"). The text is difficult, and some argue that the names Naaman, Ahijah, and Gera are a dittography (from vv. 4-5). Further, both Ahijah (v. 7) and Ahoah (v. 4), as well as Ehi (Gen. 46:21), may be scribal variations for an original reading of AHIRAM (Num. 26:38-40).

(9) One of the leaders of the people who sealed the covenant of reform with NEHEMIAH (Neh. 10:26 KJV; other English versions spell it AHIAH).

Ahikam. uh-hi'kuhm (Heb. ʾăḥîqām H324, "my brother has arisen" [possibly a reference to God as rising for battle]). Son of SHAPHAN; royal secretary during the reign of King JOSIAH and a prominent man in the following decades (2 Ki. 22:12, 14; 25:22; 2 Chr. 34:20; Jer. 26:24; 39:14; 40:5—41:18; 43:6). Josiah made him a member of the deputation to consult with the prophetess HULDAH concerning the Book of the Law. In the reign of JEHOIAKIM, Ahikam protected JEREMIAH from death. Ahikam was the father of GEDALIAH, whom NEBUCHADNEZZAR made governor of the land after the destruction of Jerusalem.

Ahilud. uh-hi'luhd (Heb. אֶחָיִלֻד H314, perhaps “my brother is born”). The father of a certain Jehoshaphat who served as “recorder” during the reigns of DAVID and SOLOMON (2 Sam. 8:16; 20:24; 1 Ki. 4:3; 1 Chr. 18:15). This Ahilud is probably also the one identified as the father of BAANA, one of Solomon’s district governors (1 Ki. 4:12).

Ahimaaz. uh-him'ay-az (Heb. אֶחָיִמָאז H318, perhaps “my brother is wrath”). (1) The father of SAUL’s wife, AHINOAM (1 Sam. 14:50).

(2) Son of ZADOK the high priest (1 Chr. 6:8). During ABSALOM’s rebellion he and JONATHAN, son of ABIATHAR, served as messengers between DAVID and HUSHAI, David’s counselor and spy. They brought to David Hushai’s news that AHITHOPHEL had urged Absalom to make an immediate attack and Hushai’s warning that David should cross the Jordan at once (2 Sam. 15:24-27; 17:15-22). David’s estimate of Ahimaaz appears in his remark at his approach after the battle: “He’s a good man....He comes with good news” (18:27). Ahimaaz announced the victory but evaded the question concerning Absalom’s fate, wishing to spare the feelings of the king. While Ahimaaz was still in David’s presence, another messenger identified as “a Cushite” (see CUSH #3) arrived and unfeelingly broke the news concerning Absalom’s death. Comparing 1 Ki. 4:2 with 1 Chr. 6:8-10, some infer that Ahimaaz died before he attained the priesthood and before the death of his father Zadok, who was succeeded by Ahimaaz’s son, Azariah.

(3) One of SOLOMON’s twelve commissary officers (1 Ki. 4:15). He married BASEMATH, the daughter of Solomon. In contrast to the other officers in the list, the name of this man’s father is missing. Some therefore conjecture that it is the man’s own name that has dropped out of the text and that only the name of his father, Ahimaaz, has remained. If so, this Ahimaaz is probably the same as #2, above.

Ahiman. uh-hi'muhn (Heb. אֶחָיִמָן H317, perhaps “my brother is fortune”).

(1) One of the three sons or descendants of ANAK living in HEBRON when the twelve spies reconnoitered the land in the time of Moses (Num. 13:22; Josh. 15:14; Jdg. 1:10). They were so tall and strong that ten of the spies were terrified of them and persuaded the Israelites not to enter the land that God had promised them. Ahiman was probably the name of an individual and of a clan or group of clans. The three clans were driven out from Hebron by CALEB (Josh. 15:14) and later defeated again by the tribe of JUDAH (Jdg. 1:10).

(2) A Levite in the postexilic period. He was one of the chief gatekeepers of Jerusalem (1 Chr. 9:17). Since he is not included in the parallel list (Neh.

11:19, “Akkub, Talmon and their associates [lit., brothers]”), some emend the text to read אֶחָאֵהֶם, “their brothers.”

Ahimelech. uh-him´uh-lek (Heb. אֶחָמֶלֶךְ H316, “my brother is [the god] Melek” or “my brother is king”). TNIV Ahimelek. (1) Son of AHITUB and father of ABIATHAR, DAVID’s high priest (1 Sam. 21:1-2, 8; 22:9-23; 23:6; 30:7). This priest of NOB gave assistance to David by offering him the showbread (21:6), and when SAUL learned of this aid, it cost Ahimelech his life (22:11-19). AHLIAH (14:3, 18) may be (a) a short form of the name Ahimelech, (b) another name for Ahimelech, or (c) Ahimelech’s father in a fuller genealogy. One of the eight fugitive psalms refers to the evil use of the tongue by DOEG, the Edomite, against Ahimelech (Ps. 52, title).

(2) Son of Abiathar (2 Sam. 8:17; cf. 1 Chr. 18:16), that is, a grandson of #1 above. Most scholars regard this as an inadvertent transposition for “Abiathar the son of Ahimelech.” While such a textual corruption is possible, the detailed account of 1 Chr. 24:3, 6, 31 would seem to rule against it.

(3) A HITTITE who followed David while he was a fugitive in the wilderness hiding from Saul (1 Sam. 26:6).

Ahimoth. uh-hi´moth (Heb. אֶחָמוֹת H315, possibly “my brother is death”). Son of ELKANAH, included in a list of Levites descended from KOHATH (1 Chr. 6:25). He was an ancestor of SAMUEL.

Ahinadab. uh-hin´uh-dab (Heb. אֶחָיָנָדָב H320, “my brother is noble”). Son of Iddo (1 Ki. 4:14) and one of SOLOMON’s “twelve district governors over all Israel, who supplied provisions for the king and the royal household” (v. 7). His district was S GILEAD, and his headquarters, MAHANAIM.

Ahinoam. uh-hin´oh-uhm (Heb. אֶחָיִנֹּם H321, “my brother is delight”). (1) Daughter of Ahimaaz and wife of SAUL (1 Sam. 14:50), thus the first queen of Israel.

(2) A woman from JEZREEL whom DAVID married after Saul took MICHAL from him and gave her to another husband. Ahinoam was probably his first wife, even though his marriage to ABIGAIL is mentioned first (1 Sam. 25:39-44). Three other times they are mentioned together, and Ahinoam is always mentioned first (27:3; 30:5; 2 Sam. 2:2). She was the mother of David’s first son, AMNON, and Abigail was mother of his second (2 Sam. 3:2; 1 Chr. 3:1).

Ahio. uh-hi'oh (Heb. ʾaḥyô H311, perhaps “little brother” or short form of AHIHAH, “[my] brother is Yahweh”). (1) Son of ABINADAB and brother of UZZA (2 Sam. 6:3-4; 1 Chr. 13:7). He went before the cart that carried the ARK OF THE COVENANT from the house of Abinadab to JERUSALEM.

(2) Son of BERIAH and descendant of BENJAMIN, listed among the heads of families living in postexilic Jerusalem (1 Chr. 8:14; cf. v. 28). The NRSV and other versions, however, include him among the sons of ELPAAL.

(3) Son of Jeiel and brother of KISH (1 Chr. 8:29-31; 9:35-37), possibly the uncle of King SAUL (cf. 8:33; 9:39).

Ahira. uh-hi'ruh (Heb. ʾăḥîra H327, possibly “my brother is a friend”). Son of Enan and a leader of the tribe of NAPHTALI in the time of MOSES, whom he assisted in the census (Num. 1:15). He commanded his tribe when on the march (10:27) and made the tribal offering (2:29; 7:78-83).

Ahiram. uh-hi'ruhm (Heb. ʾăḥîrām H325, “my brother is exalted”). Third son of BENJAMIN and grandson of JACOB (Num. 26:38). In 1 Chr. 8:1, where the sons of Benjamin are explicitly numbered, the third name, AHARAH, may be a corrupt form of AHIRAM (cf. also the forms AHOAH in v. 4, AHIJAH in v. 7, and AHER in 7:12). In the Benjamite genealogy found in Gen. 46:21, EHI may be an abbreviated form of Ahram. In this genealogy ten sons of Benjamin are mentioned, but some of them are referred to as more remote descendants in other lists.

Ahisamach. uh-his'uh-mak (Heb. ʾăḥîsāmāk H322, “my brother has supported”). TNIV Ahisamak. Father of OHOLIAB; the latter assisted BEZALEL in building the TABERNACLE and its furniture (Exod. 31:6; 35:34; 38:23).

Ahishahar. uh-hish'uh-hahr (Heb. ʾăḥîšāḥar H328, “brother of the dawn”). Son of Bilhan and descendant of BENJAMIN (1 Chr. 7:10); he was a head of family in the clan of JEDIAEL (v. 11).

Ahishar. uh-hi'shahr (Heb. ʾăḥîšār H329, meaning uncertain). A man who was in charge of SOLOMON's household (1 Ki. 4:6).

Ahithophel. uh-hith'uh-fel (Heb. אֶחִיתוֹפֶל H330, perhaps “brother of foolishness”; the name may have been אֶחִיפֶלֶט, “my brother is deliverance” [cf. ELIPHELET, 2 Sam. 23:34] or אֶחִיבָּאֵל, “my brother is Baal” [cf. ISH-BOSHET], purposely distorted). DAVID’s counselor who joined the conspiracy of ABSALOM. His oracular wisdom was proverbial (2 Sam. 16:23), and it seems clear that he was a mainspring of the rebellion (15:12). Some suggest, in looking for motivation for his treachery, that he was the grandfather of BATHSHEBA, for she was the daughter of Eliam (11:3), and an Eliam, the son of Ahithophel the Gilonite, is listed as one of David’s valiant men (23:34). Thus it is suggested that Ahithophel had a certain bitterness toward David for corrupting his granddaughter and murdering her husband. Others note, however, that the time element seems insufficiently long for Ahithophel to have a married granddaughter at the time of David’s great sin, and that it seems easier to believe that there was more than one man in Israel named Eliam. Furthermore, it seems unlikely that a man such as Ahithophel would conspire against the interests of his granddaughter and her son. His main motivation appears to have been ambition for personal power. His proposal to Absalom that he pursue David immediately with 12,000 men, smiting the king while he was still weary and underprotected, indicates his wisdom and boldness. David’s prayer turned his counsel into foolishness (15:31), for Absalom deferred to HUSHAI’s advice that they take time to muster all Israel against such a mighty man of war as David. Ahithophel, seeing his counsel rejected, realized that the cause of Absalom was lost; he went to his home and hanged himself (17:1-23).

Ahitub. uh-hi'tuhb (Heb. אֶחִיטֹב H313, “my brother is goodness”). (1) Son of PHINEHAS and father of the priest AHIJAH (also called AHIMELECH, 1 Sam. 14:3; 22:9, 11-12, 20).

(2) Son of AMARIAH and father of ZADOK, the high priest during the time of DAVID (2 Sam. 8:17; 1 Chr. 6:7-8; 6:52-53; 18:16; Ezra 7:2). Some argue (on the basis of 1 Chr. 9:11 and Neh. 11:11) that this Ahitub was really the grandfather of Zadok; however, see #3 below.

(3) Son of Amariah II and father of Zadok II (1 Chr. 6:11; 9:11; Neh. 11:11). Some scholars believe that this Ahitub is the same as #2 and that there is confusion in the lists.

Ahlab. ah'lab (Heb. אֶחְלָב H331, possibly “forest” or “fruitful”). A town within the boundaries of ASHER, probably located at Khirbet el-Maḥalib, near the coast, c. 4 mi. (6 km.) NE of TYRE. The tribe of Asher was unable to drive out the Canaanite inhabitants of the town (Jdg. 1:31). Possibly the same as HELBAH and MAHALAB.

Ahlai. ah'li (Heb. אֶחְלַי H333, possibly “the brother is my God” or derived from the interjection אֶחְלָי H332, “O would that!”). (1) Son or daughter of SHESHAN and descendant of JUDAH through JERAHMEEL (1 Chr. 2:31). The name is introduced in the Hebrew with the words, “the sons of Sheshan,” but we are later told that “Sheshan had no sons—only daughters” (v. 34). Ahlai may have been the daughter that Sheshan gave in marriage to his Egyptian servant JARHA (v. 35). The phrase “the sons of Sheshan” may indicate that Ahlai was regarded as the one through whom Sheshan’s line was preserved and as the progenitor of an important Jerahmeelite clan. See also #2 below.

(2) Father of ZABAD; the latter was one of DAVID’s mighty warriors (1 Chr. 11:41). Some argue (on the basis of 2:35-36) that this Ahlai was a woman, an ancestress of Zabad, identical with #1 above.

Ahoah. uh-hoh'uh (Heb. אֲחֹאֵחַ H291, derivation uncertain). Son of BELA and grandson of BENJAMIN (1 Chr. 8:4). It is possible that the name is a scribal error for AHIJAH (cf. v. 7).

Ahoi. uh-hoh'hi (Heb. אֲחֹיִי H292, apparently a gentilic of אֲחֹאֵחַ H291). The NRSV renders 2 Sam. 23:9 literally as “Dodo son of Ahoi,” whereas KJV and NIV, on the basis of the parallel passage (1 Chr. 11:12), have “Dodo [Dodai] the Ahohite.” See AHOHITE.

Ahohite. uh-hoh'hit (Heb. אֲחֹיִי H292, apparently a gentilic of אֲחֹאֵחַ H291). Probably a patronymic used by the descendants of AHOAH. The term is used only in connection with military heroes in DAVID’s time: DODAI (2 Sam. 23:9; 1 Chr. 11:12; 27:14) and ZALMON (2 Sam. 23:28; called ILAI in 1 Chr. 11:29).

Aholah; Aholiab; Aholibah; Aholibamah. KJV forms of OHOLAH; OHOLIAB; OHOLIBAH; OHOLIBAMAH.

Ahumai. uh-hyoo'mi (Heb. אֲחֻמַּי H293, “it is indeed a brother”). Son of JAHATH and descendant of JUDAH through SHOBAL (1 Chr. 4:2). He and his brother LAHAD are referred to as “the clans of the Zorathites” (see ZORAH).

Ahuzam. See AHUZZAM.

Ahuzzam. uh-huh´zuhm (Heb. אֲחֻזָּאם H303, possibly “possessor”). KJV Ahuzam. Son of ASHHUR and descendant of JUDAH (1 Chr. 4:6).

Ahuzzath. uh-huh´zath (Heb. אֲחֻזָּת H304, possibly “possession”). A personal adviser (Heb. mērēʿa, lit., “friend”) of ABIMELECH, PHILISTINE king of GERAR, who with PHICOL, commander of the army, went with Abimelech to make a covenant with ISAAC at BEERSHEBA (Gen. 26:26-31).

Ahzai. ah´zi (Heb. אֲחִזַּי H300, short form AHAZIAH, “Yahweh has taken hold [for protection]”). KJV Ahasai. Son of Meshillemoth, descendant of IMMER, and grandfather (or ancestor) of AMASHSAI; the latter is mentioned among the priestly leaders who resettled Jerusalem in EZRA’s time (Neh. 11:13). Ahzai is probably the same as JAHZERAH (1 Chr. 9:12).

Ai. i, ay´i (Heb. אַי H6504 [always written with the definite article, hāʿay], “the heap” or “the ruin”; also ayyat H6569 [Isa. 10:28] and possibly ayyâ H6509 [1 Chr. 7:28; Neh. 11:31]). (1) A city of central Palestine, E of BETHEL. ABRAHAM pitched his tent between Ai and Bethel when he arrived in Canaan (Gen. 12:8). Ai figures most prominently in the account of the conquest of the land; it was the second Canaanite city taken by the forces under JOSHUA (Josh. 7-8). Having conquered JERICHO, the Israelites felt that a portion of the armies would be sufficient to conquer the much smaller Ai. The Israelite contingent was routed, however. It was then disclosed that ACHAN had sinned in taking articles from the consecrated spoil of Jericho. After Achan had confessed his sin and he and his family had been stoned to death, the Israelites made a second attack, which resulted in the total destruction of the city and the annihilation of all its 12,000 inhabitants. The city, the site of which belonged to the tribe of BENJAMIN following the partition of the land, had not been rebuilt when the book of Joshua was written (Josh. 8:28). It was, however, rebuilt in later days, for men of Ai returned from Babylon with ZERUBBABEL (Ezra 2:28; Neh. 7:32).

The work of Joseph Callaway (1964-72) at Khirbet et-Tell, generally identified with biblical Ai, has shown that no city stood here from the Early Bronze Age destruction in about 2300 B.C. till a pre-Israelite settlement was built in the Early Iron Age (c. 1200 B.C.). Thus it appears that no town existed here in the time of the conquest under Joshua during the Late Bronze Age (c. 1550 to 1200 B.C.). Alternate identifications of Ai have been suggested, such as the nearby sites of Khirbet el-Maqatir and Khirbet Nisya, but few scholars accept these proposals. The discrepancy between the biblical account and the archaeological data remains an unsolved problem.

(2) A town in AMMON mentioned only once (Jer. 49:3); its location is unknown.

Aiah. ay'yuh (Heb. ʾayyāh H371, “falcon”). (1) Son of Zibeon, a HORITE; ancestor of a clan in EDOM (Gen. 36:24 [KJV, “Ajah”]; 1 Chr. 1:40).

(2) Father of Rizpah, a concubine of SAUL; ISH-BOSHETH falsely accused ABNER of having an affair with her (2 Sam. 3:7). Years later her sons were handed over to the Gibeonites by DAVID for hanging (21:8-11).

Aiath. ay'yath. Alternate form of AI (Isa. 10:28).

Aija. ay'juh. Alternate form of AI (Neh. 11:31).

Aijalon. ay'juh-lon (Heb. ʾayyālôn H389, “[place of the] deer”). KJV also Ajalon. (1) A city within the tribal territory of DAN (Josh. 19:42), assigned to the Levite sons of KOHATH (1 Chr. 6:69). It is mentioned most notably in the memorable words of Joshua, “O sun, stand still over Gibeon, / O moon, over the Valley of Aijalon” (Josh. 10:12). SAUL and JONATHAN won a great victory against the PHILISTINES in the vicinity of Aijalon (1 Sam. 14:31). At one stage, the town was inhabited by Ephraimites (1 Chr. 6:69) and at another by Benjamites (8:13). Under the divided kingdom, Aijalon fell to Judah and REHOBAM fortified it (2 Chr. 11:10). In the reign of AHAZ, the Philistines raided the cities of the SHEPHELAH (“lowlands”) and occupied Aijalon (28:18). It is identified with the modern Yalo, about 13 mi. (21 km.) NW of Jerusalem, N of the Jaffa road.

(2) A town within the tribal territory of ZEBULUN, mentioned only once (Jdg 12:12); its location is unknown. The judge ELON is said to have been buried there.

Aijelet Shahar. ay’juh-leth-shay’hahr. KJV transliteration of Hebrew אַיְיֶלֶת הַשָּׁחַר in the title of Ps. 22; NIV understands it as a tune name, “The Doe of the Morning.” Others take the first word in the phrase as related to אֵיָלִיּוֹת H394 in v. 19, meaning “strength” or “help.” If this is correct, the words actually entitle the psalm “Help at Daybreak” suitably, as vv. 22-31 show.

Ain. ayn (Heb. אַיִן H6526, “spring”). (1) A town in the NE corner of Canaan named, no doubt, for the presence of a spring there (Num. 34:11). Some MSS of the VULGATE have fontem Daphnim (“the spring of Daphne”), and the identification of Ain with modern Khirbet Dufna (less than 2 mi./3 km. W of DAN) has support in some rabbinic texts. Some scholars identify Ain with modern Khirbet Ayyun, about 3 mi. (5 km.) E of the S tip of the Sea of Galilee. See also RIBLAH.

(2) A Levitical city in the NEGEV appearing in the Judah/Simeon list (Josh. 21:16, although some emend the text to read “Ashan” on the basis of some MSS of the SEPTUAGINT as well as the parallel list in 1 Chr. 6:59). The name also appears in Josh. 15:32; 19:7; 1 Chr. 4:32 (unless it is combined with the next name and read as EN RIMMON). The site is unknown.

The word Ain (En) is also used in the composition of various place names, such as EN GEDI and ENDOR.

air. In the OT and the Gospels this word is usually found in expressions speaking of the birds or fowl of the air (Job 41:16 is the only exception) and representing words normally translated “heaven.” Elsewhere in the NT it stands for the atmosphere. An ineffective Christian is pictured as a boxer “beating the air” (1 Cor. 9:26). “Speaking into the air” describes unintelligible utterance (14:9). Satan is called “the prince of the power of the air” (Eph. 2:2), that is, the ruler of the demonic beings that fill the air. The rapture of the church will culminate in her meeting the Lord and Savior, Jesus Christ, “in the air” (1 Thess. 4:17).

Akan. ay´kan. (ʿăqān H6826, derivation uncertain). Son of EZER and grandson of SEIR the HORITE; he probably became the progenitor of a clan in EDOM (Gen. 36:27; in 1 Chr. 1:42 most Heb. MSS have JAAKAN [KJV, “Jakan”]).

Akbor. See ACBOR.

Akeldama. uh-kel´duh-muh (Gk. Hakeldamach G192, from Aram. hăqēl dēmā , “field of blood”). KJV Aceldama; other versions, Hakeldama. The field purchased with the money JUDAS ISCARIOT received for betraying Christ (Acts 1:18-19). Matthew, with a fuller account of the purchase, says the priests bought it “as a burial place for foreigners” (Matt. 27:3-10). Acts 1:18-19 is a parenthesis, an explanation by LUKE, not part of PETER’s speech. These verses say that “with the reward he got for his wickedness, Judas bought a field.” The priests apparently bought it in Judas’s name, the money having been his. The field was called “the place of blood” in ARAMAIC. Some think the Aramaic word means “field of sleep,” or “cemetery,” but the meaning “field of blood” is preferable, and it is appropriate because of the manner of Judas’s death, the gruesome details being given in Acts 1:18.

Akhenaten. akh´uh-nah´tuhn (Egyp. “Blessed Spirit of Aten” or “Beneficial to Aten”). Also Akhenaton. The name chosen by Amenhotep IV (1370-1353 B.C.), ruler in the 18th dynasty of EGYPT, when he changed the religion of his country, demanding that all his subjects worship only the sun god under the name Aten (Aton). Politically his reign was disastrous. Internal disorders prevailed, and Egypt’s Asian possessions began to slip away. His external troubles are illustrated by clay tablets found at Tell el-AMARNA, the site of Akhet-Aten, the capital he established. Hundreds of letters from vassal governors in SYRIA and PALESTINE tell of invasions and intrigue and make appeals for help. Many of these tablets refer to invaders called the HABIRU. Some feel that this name designates the HEBREW PEOPLE; others say that it speaks of a non-Semitic people. Akhenaten is credited by many as being the first monotheist and, indeed, the inspiration for the monotheism of MOSES. However, Akhenaten clearly worshiped the SUN itself and not the Creator of the sun.

Akim. ay'kim (Gk. Achim G943). Also Achim. An ancestor of Jesus and descendant of ZERUBBABEL (mentioned only in Matt. 1:14). Some scholars consider this name a shortened form of JEHOIAKIM or of AHIMAAZ. See also GENEALOGY OF JESUS CHRIST.

Akkad. ak'ad (𐎶𐎵 akkad H422, meaning uncertain). One of the cities or districts of NIMROD's kingdom, with BABEL, ERECH, and CALNEH (Gen. 10:10). Babel and Erech are located on or near the lower EUPHRATES, Erech being not far from what was then the head of the Persian Gulf. Calneh, formerly identified with Nippur between Babel and Erech, is thought by many to be, not the name of a city, but a word meaning "all of them" (cf. NRSV) referring to Babel, the capital, and to Akkad and Erech, the chief cities of the northern and southern districts of Babylonia respectively. The location of Akkad is uncertain, though it is thought to be identified with Agade, the chief city of a district of the same name in northern Babylonia, which Sargon I, the Semitic conqueror of the Sumerian Akkadians, made his capital in c. 2350 B.C. The kingdom called Nimrod's had evidently fallen into disorder, and Sargon united the warring city-states under his firm rule. With the help of invaders, first from the NE and then from the NW, Akkadian civilization flourished sporadically and precariously until Semitic AMORITES from the W founded a dynasty at BABYLON about 1894. The most illustrious ruler of this dynasty was HAMMURABI (1792-1750). Sumerian or Akkadian civilization now finally came to an end. As Nimrod cannot be certainly identified with any person otherwise known, so Akkad remains a shadowy city or region.

Akkadian. uh-kay'dee-uhn. The Eastern Semitic language spoken by Assyrians and Babylonians, the oldest written form of which stems from documents composed during the reign of Sargon of AKKAD. The discovery and decipherment of thousands of Akkadian CLAY TABLETS inscribed in the cuneiform (wedge-shaped) script have been of inestimable value for the better understanding of the Semitic languages (including Hebrew and Aramaic), as well as the history, culture, and religions of the ANE.

Akko. See ACCO.

Akkub. ak'uhb (Heb. אַקְקֻב H6822, perhaps “protector” or “protected”). (1) Son of Elioenai and descendant of King JEHOIACHIN, from the line of DAVID (1 Chr. 3:24).

(2) Name of a family of Levitical gatekeepers in the temple after the EXILE (1 Chr. 9:17; Ezra 2:42; Neh. 7:45; 11:19; 12:25).

(3) Name of a family of NETHINIM or temple servants (Ezra 2:45).

(4) A Levite who assisted EZRA in expounding the law (Neh. 8:7-8).

Akrabbim. uh-krab'im (Heb. אַקְרַבִּים H6832, “scorpion”). The “ascent of Akrabbim” (NIV, “Scorpion Pass”) was a mountain pass on the S side of the DEAD SEA (Num. 34:4; Josh. 15:3 [KJV, “Maaleh-acrabbim”]; Jdg. 1:36). It is usually identified with the modern Naqb eṣ-Ṣafa, some 20 mi. (32 km.) SW of the southern tip of the DEAD SEA, but some suggest Umm el-ʿAqarab, on the W side of the Dead Sea. This may be the area where Judas MACCABEE defeated the Edomites (1 Macc. 5:3).

alamoth. al’uh-moth (Heb. ‘ālāmôt H6628, meaning unknown). Probably the name of a musical tune (1 Chr. 15:20; Ps. 46, title). Because the word is possibly related to the Hebrew word for “maiden,” some have thought it may indicate a women’s choir, or musical instruments set in a high pitch, or instruments played by virgins.

Alcimus. al’si-muhs (Gk. Alkimos). High priest in Jerusalem from 163 to 161 B.C.; an opponent of Judas Maccabee and his followers (1 Macc. 7:4-50; 9:1-57; 2 Macc. 14:1-27; Jos. Ant. 12.10).

alcoholism. See DRUNKENNESS.

Alemeth (person). al’uh-meth (Heb. ‘ālemet H6631, possibly “concealment”). (1) Son of BEKER and grandson of BENJAMIN (1 Chr. 7:8; KJV, “Alameth”).

(2) Son of JEHOADDAH and descendant of SAUL through JONATHAN (1 Chr. 8:36; in 9:42, the father’s name is given as JADAH [most Heb. MSS, “Jarah”]).

Alemeth (place). al’uh-meth (Heb. ‘ālemet H6630, possibly “concealment”). A Levitical city in the tribal territory of BENJAMIN (1 Chr. 6:60), also called Almon (Josh. 21:18). Identified with Khirbet ‘Almit, 4 mi. (6 km.) NE of JERUSALEM.

aleph. ah’lef (from Heb. ‘elep H546, “cattle”). The first letter of the Hebrew alphabet (א, transliterated as א), with a numerical value of one. It is named for the shape of the letter, which in its older form resembled the head of an ox.

This letter indicates a glottal stop, which functions as a consonant, but it was later used by the Greeks to represent the vowel alpha, “A.” The letter is also used as the symbol for Codex Sinaiticus, a very important fourth-century Greek biblical MS.

Alexander. al’ig-zan’duhr (Gk. Alexandros, “defender of men”). A name common from Hellenistic times. (1) ALEXANDER THE GREAT. See separate article.

(2) Alexander Balas, pretended son of the Seleucid King ANTIOCHUS IV. He overthrew DEMETRIUS I in 150 B.C. and was in turn supplanted by the latter’s son, Demetrius II, in 145 B.C. These civil wars hastened the decline of Seleucid powers, and provided Jonathan, the brother and successor of Judas MACCABEE, with the opportunity of securing the high priesthood in Jerusalem (1 Macc. 10:1—11:19).

(3) Alexander Jannaeus, ruler of the Jews from 103-76 B.C. See MACCABEE.

(4) Son of SIMON of Cyrene (Mk. 15:21). Alexander and his brother RUFUS are mentioned here presumably because they were known to Mark’s intended readers (in Rome?).

(5) A member of the high-priestly family, mentioned at the inquiry into PETER’s preaching (Acts 4:6); otherwise unknown.

(6) The Jewish spokesman at the time of the riot in EPHESUS (Acts 19:33).

(7) An apostate from the Christian faith who, along with HYMENEUS, was “handed over to Satan to be taught not to blaspheme” (1 Tim. 1:20).

(8) A coppersmith who did PAUL great harm and opposed his message (2 Tim. 4:14).

Alexander the Great. Son of Philip, king of Macedon, and Olympias, an Epirote princess; born 356 B.C. Although not named in the Bible, he appears to be described prophetically in Daniel as the “goat” from the W with a notable horn between his eyes. He came against the ram with two horns, who was standing before the river, defeated the ram, and became very great until the great horn was broken and four notable ones came up from it (Dan. 8:5-8; see DANIEL, BOOK OF). The prophecy identifies the ram as the kings of MEDIA and PERSIA, the goat as the king of GREECE, the great horn being the first king. When he fell, four kings arose in his place (8:18-22).

The empire of Alexander the Great.

The historical fulfillment is striking: Alexander led the Greek armies across the Hellespont into Asia Minor in 334 B.C. and defeated the Persian forces at the river Granicus. Moving with amazing rapidity (“without touching the ground,” Dan. 8:5), he again met and defeated the Persians at Issus. Turning S, he moved down the Syrian coast, advancing to EGYPT, which fell to him without a blow. Turning again to the E, he met the armies of DARIUS for the last time, defeating them in the battle of Arbela, E of the TIGRIS River. Rapidly he occupied BABYLON, then SUSA and Persepolis, the capitals of Persia.

The next years were spent in consolidating the new empire. Alexander took Persians into his army, encouraged his soldiers to marry Asians, and began to hellenize Asia through the establishment of Greek cities in the eastern empire. He marched his armies eastward as far as India, where they won a great battle at the Hydaspes River. The army, however, refused to advance farther, and Alexander was forced to return to Persepolis. While still making plans for further conquests, he contracted a fever. Weakened by the strenuous campaign and his increasing dissipation, he was unable to throw off the fever and died in Babylon in 323 B.C. at the age of thirty-three. His empire was then divided among four of his generals. While Alexander was outstanding as a conqueror, his notable contributions to civilization came via his hellenizing efforts. The fact that GREEK became the language of literature and commerce throughout the “inhabited world,” for example, was of inestimable importance to the spread of the gospel.

Alexandra. al’ig-zan’druh (Gk. Alexandra). Wife of Aristobulus, king of the Jews (104-103 B.C.). Upon his death, she made her brother-in-law, Alexander Jannaeus, king and married him. After he died, Alexandra ruled wisely from 76-67 during a period of peace and prosperity. John Hyrcanus II and Aristobulus II were her sons. See MACCABEE.

Alexandria. al’ig-zan’dree-uh. Founded by Alexander the Great in 332 B.C., this city became the capital of EGYPT during the Hellenistic and Roman periods (to be distinguished from other cities in the ANE that he also named Alexandria). Its harbors, formed by the island Pharos and the headland Lochias, were suitable for both commerce and war. It was the chief grain port for Rome. Its merchant ships, the largest and finest of the day, usually sailed directly to Puteoli, but at times because of the severity of the weather sailed under the coast of Asia Minor, as did the vessel that carried PAUL (Acts 27:6). Alexandria was also an important cultural center, boasting an excellent university. Patterned after the great school at ATHENS, it soon outstripped its model. It was especially noted for the study of mathematics, astronomy, medicine, and poetry. Literature and art also flourished. The library of Alexandria became the largest and best known in the world.

The population of Alexandria had three prominent elements: Jews, Greeks, and Egyptians. The Jews enjoyed equal privileges with the Greeks, so that they became established there. While continuing to regard JERUSALEM as “the holy city,” they looked on Alexandria as the metropolis of the Jews throughout the world. Here the translation of the Hebrew PENTATEUCH into Greek, known as the SEPTUAGINT, was made in the third century before Christ. It became the popular Bible of the Jews of the DISPERSION, generally used by the writers of the NT. At Alexandria the OT revelation was brought into contact with Greek philosophy. The consequent synthesis became of great importance in later religious thought. The influence of Alexandrian philosophy on the thought of the writers of the NT is debatable, but its impact on subsequent theological and biblical studies in the Christian church was great.

Alexandria.

According to tradition, Mark the evangelist carried the gospel to Alexandria and established the first church there (see MARK, JOHN). From this city Christianity reached out into all Egypt and the surrounding countries. A theological school flourished here as early as the second century. Among its great teachers were Clement and Origen, pioneers in biblical scholarship and Christian philosophy.

Allammelech. uh-lam'uh-lek (Heb. allammelek H526, “terebinth of the king”). KJV Alammelech. A town in the tribe of ASHER (Josh. 19:26). It was probably located in the southern part of the tribe’s territory, but the precise site has not been identified.

allegory. This term (derived from the Greek verb allēgoreō, which originally meant “to speak in a way other than what is meant”) can be used simply of an extended metaphor or a narrative that makes use of symbols. To speak allegorically is thus to set forth one thing in the image of another, the principal subject being inferred from the figure rather than by direct statement. In this sense, allegory is a literary device used extensively in Scripture, for example in Isa. 5:1-7 and in the SONG OF SOLOMON (but it should be distinguished from PARABLE). The term often refers, however, to the expression of hidden, mysterious truths by the use of words that also have a literal meaning. Even if the writer did not intend a hidden meaning, the allegorical method is a way of interpreting a poet, a story teller, or a Scripture passage in such a way that the interpreter sees a mysterious meaning the writer may not have intended.

Allegorizing (to be distinguished from the drawing out of spiritual truths from factual presentations) has had broad application in Bible teaching. Alexandrian Jews such as PHILO JUDAEUS were inclined to spiritualize Scripture, sometimes minimizing or even denying the literal meaning. The church fathers followed, reaching a sophisticated approach in the school of Origen and leading to much emphasis on mystical and moral meanings. In the “allegory” in Gal. 4:21-31 Isaac, the child of promise, corresponds to (or typifies) the Christian who is justified in Christ and is free to love and serve his Father; while Ishmael, the child of contrivance, typifies the legalist who is under the law and is bound to serve it and to seek justification in obedience to it. Thus in spite of Paul’s use of the verb allēgoreō in v. 24, the apostle does not downplay the historical meaning, and many believe that the term typology more accurately describes the passage.

Allon. al'on (Heb. ʔallôn H474, "oak"). (1) Son of Jedaiah and descendant of SIMEON (1 Chr. 4:37); included in the genealogy of Ziza, a clan leader.

(2) KJV rendering in Josh. 19:33, where modern translations, correctly, have "the oak" (NRSV) or "the large tree" (NIV).

Allon Bacuth. al'uhn-bak'uhth (Heb. ʔallôn bākût H475, "oak of weeping"). TNIV Allon Bakuth. The burial site of DEBORAH, REBEKAH's nurse, somewhere in the vicinity of BETHEL (Gen. 35:8). Some modern scholars allege that the text confuses this person with the later Deborah, who is described as holding court under a palm tree "between Ramah and Bethel" (Jdg. 4:5).

allotment. This English term is used primarily in reference to the allocation of PALESTINE to the tribes of Israel (Josh. 15-17). Such practice stems, not from the land's originally communal ownership, as is sometimes alleged, but from its divine ownership (Josh. 22:19); the human residents were "aliens" and "tenants" before God (Lev. 25:23). Even as God chose Israel for his INHERITANCE (Exod. 19:5; Deut. 4:20), so he in turn became the "portion" of his people (Ps. 16:5; 73:26). Specifically, he promised to the seed of ABRAHAM the land of Canaan (Gen. 13:15; 17:8; cf. Josh. 21:43) and then provided for its distribution to their tribes and families (Num. 26:53; 33:54). Precise amounts depended upon the size of each group (26:54); but assignments were to be made by lot (26:55-56; cf. Josh. 16:1; 17:1), indicative of God's ultimate control (Prov. 16:33; Isa. 34:17). See LOTS.

Almighty. This English term is often used to render Hebrew šadday H8724, which occurs in the OT forty-eight times (thirty-one of these in the book of Job), either alone or in combination with ʔēl H446, "God." See EL SHADDAL. In the NT the Greek term pantokratōr G4120 occurs ten times (nine of these in Revelation).

Almodad. al'moh'dad (Heb. ʔalmôdād H525, possibly "God is loved"). Eldest son of JOKTAN and descendant of SHEM (Gen. 10:26; 1 Chr. 1:20). He was presumably the eponymous ancestor of a S Arabian tribe, and some believe the name is preserved in el-Mudad, famous in Arabian history as the reputed father of ISHMAEL's wife and as chief of Jurham, supposedly a Joktanite tribe.

Almon. al'muhn (Heb. ʔalmôn H6626, possibly "signpost"). See ALEMETH (PLACE).

Almon Diblathaim. al'muhn-dib'luh-thay'im (Heb. almôn diblātayim H6627, possibly “signpost of the [double] fig cakes”). A stopping place in the wilderness journeys of the Israelites (Num. 33:46-47) in MOAB. It is usually identified with BETH DIBLATHAIM (Jer. 48:22).

alms. Benevolent giving for the relief of the POOR. This term is not found in the NIV, though the practice is of Mosaic legislation and NT injunction. The English word is derived from Greek eleēmosynē G1797, which means “pity,” but is also used in the sense of “charity, donation” (e.g., Matt. 6:2-3; Acts 9:36; 10:2; 24:17). In the OT the law prescribed gleanings from the harvest, the vineyards, and the grain in the corners of the field for the poor (Lev. 19:9-10), stipulating further gleanings from the orchards and olive groves (Deut. 24:10-22). It also protected the rights of the poor and unfortunate concerning wages, working conditions, and pledges, preventing the poor from being deprived of necessary garments or other needs. Almsgiving is set forth in Deut. 15:11: “There will always be poor people in the land. Therefore I command you to be openhanded toward your brothers and toward the poor and needy in your land.”

The righteousness of almsgiving could become somewhat legalistic and professional. The lame man at the Gate Beautiful exemplified professional begging in that daily he “asked...for money” (Acts 3:2-3 NIV; KJV, “to ask alms”). Perversion in receiving alms is seen in a beggar’s cry (if it suggests the idea, “bless yourself by giving to me”) and in benefactors who “announce it with trumpets,” probably to be taken figuratively, and who want “to be seen” by people (Matt. 6:1-2). In JUDAISM almsgiving was of two kinds: “alms of the dish” (food and money received daily for distribution) and “alms of the chest” (coins received on the Sabbath for widows, orphans, strangers, and the poor).

The practice of the NT church was foreshadowed in Jesus’ admonitions: “give to the poor” (Lk. 11:41; cf. 1 Cor. 16:2) and “sell your possessions and give to the poor” (Lk. 12:33; cf. 2 Cor. 8:3). Alms in the NT church were seen in the churches of MACEDONIA, who in “their extreme poverty...beyond their ability...[shared] in this service to the saints” (2 Cor. 8:1-4). True purpose and spirit were shown: “At the present time your plenty will supply what they need, so that in turn their plenty will supply what you need” (8:14). The full measure of ministry, blessings, and ability to give by God’s grace is delineated in 2 Cor. 8 and 9, to be done liberally, prayerfully, and cheerfully. See also Jas. 2:15-16 and 1 Jn. 3:17. A primary function of deacons was to distribute alms (Acts 6).

Aloth. ay'loth (Heb. ʿālôt H6599, meaning unknown). One of the Solomonic districts (1 Ki. 4:16); the Hebrew text can be read as either the phrase “in Aloth” (KJV, NIV) or the name “Bealoth” (NRSV, NJPS). See BEALOTH #2.

alpha and omega. al'fuh, oh-meg'uh. The first and last letters of the Greek alphabet, alpha being roughly equivalent to our letter a, and omega (literally, great o) to our o. The phrase “I am the Alpha and the Omega” occurs at least three times in the NT (Rev. 1:8; 21:6; 22:13), and always with the repeated definite article. It is probable that the occurrences in Revelation were intended as allusions to Isa. 44:6 and 48:12, “I am the first, and I am the last,” asserting the eternal and transcendent greatness of Yahweh. Perhaps also they were intended as allusions to Rom. 11:36 and Eph. 1:10, not in the actual words but in the theological concepts involved. Such language points to the preexistence and eternity of CHRIST and thus constitutes a strong assertion of his divine nature.

Alphaeus. al-fee'uh (Gk. Halphaios G271, from Heb. ḥalpî). (1) The father of Levi (Mk. 2:14), who is identified with the apostle MATTHEW (Matt. 9:9; 10:3). Nothing more is known about him.

(2) Father of JAMES the apostle (Matt. 10:3; Mk. 3:18; Lk. 6:15; Acts 1:13; called “James the younger” in Mk. 15:40); Alphaeus's name is included to distinguish this James from the son of Zebedee who was also brother of John. Some have thought that this Alphaeus is the same as #1, in which case Levi/Matthew and James were brothers. Others have speculated that he is the same person as CLOPAS (Jn. 19:25), on the assumption that MARY the wife of Clopas, who was present at the crucifixion of Jesus with some other women, is the same as Mary the mother of James, who was also present at that time (Matt. 27:56; Mk. 15:40).

altar. A structure used for WORSHIP, especially for offering SACRIFICES. The first altar we read about (Gen. 8:20) was erected by Noah after leaving the ark.

Subsequent altars were built by Abraham (12:7-8; 13:4, 18; 22:9), Isaac (26:25), Jacob (35:1-7), Moses (Exod. 17:15), and Joshua (Josh. 8:30-31). Some of these must have been very simple in structure, as the context of Gen. 22:9 seems to indicate. Most of the altars were built for sacrificial purposes, but some seem to have been largely memorial in character (Exod. 17:15-16; Josh. 22:26-27). Sometimes God stated just how the altar was to be built and of what materials (e.g., Exod. 20:24-26).

With the erection of the TABERNACLE, altars were constructed by the Hebrews for two chief purposes: the offering of sacrifices and the burning of INCENSE. Moses was told to build the altar of burnt offering out of acacia wood, overlaid with BRONZE (Exod. 27:1-2). The shape was a square of five cubits (c. 7.5 ft./2.3 m.), three cubits high (c. 4.5 ft./1.4 m.). At each corner of the altar there was to be a projection or “horn.” This feature is found outside Israel, as in the tenth-century B.C. altar discovered at MEGIDDO. The purpose of the horns is not stated, although apparently it was thought to provide refuge from justice (1 Ki. 1:50-53; but see 2:28-34). A bronze grating was placed in the center of the altar that projected through the opening on two sides. Four rings were fastened to it in which two poles of the same material as the altar were to be placed to carry the altar. Steps leading up to the altar were forbidden (Exod. 20:26). For seven days ATONEMENT was to be made for the altar—apparently to sanctify it for the uses to which it was to be devoted (29:37); it was to be cleansed on the Day of Atonement after the presentation of sin offerings for the high priest and the nation (Lev. 16:19-20). See ATONEMENT, DAY OF.

Certain bronze utensils were made in connection with the altar. There were pans to hold the ashes, shovels for removing the ashes, basins to receive the blood and to convey it to the varied places for sprinkling, three-pronged flesh hooks with which to remove the flesh, and censers for carrying coals from the altar (Exod. 27:3). Once the fire on this altar was kindled, it was required that it burn continually (Lev. 6:13).

The altar of burnt offering was also included in Solomon's TEMPLE, the second temple, and in the temple built by HEROD. Its form was altered to fit into the varying sizes of these structures. Solomon made his altar of bronze, extending its length and width to twenty cubits (30 ft./9 m.) and its height to ten cubits (15 ft./4.5 m., 2 Chr. 4:1). After its construction it had a very interesting history. Because idols had polluted it, King ASA rededicated it (15:8). Later on URIAH the priest removed it from its regular place, in order it seems to make room for another altar that he had patterned after the one King AHAZ had seen in DAMASCUS (2 Ki. 16:11-14). The terrible pollution of spiritual things in the reign of Ahaz led HEZEKIAH to cleanse the altar (2 Chr. 29:12-18). Finally it was repaired and restored to its place by MANASSEH (33:16).

In ZERUBBABEL's temple the altar was built first (Ezra 3:2), supposedly on the exact spot where it previously stood (Jos. Ant. 11.4.1). After it had been desecrated by ANTIOCHUS Epiphanes, it was rebuilt by Judas MACCABEE with unhewn stones (1 Macc. 4:47).

Moses was also commanded by God to make "an altar...for burning incense" (Exod. 30:1), sometimes called "the gold altar" (39:38; Num. 4:11). It was to be a cubit square and two cubits high (1.5 x 1.5 x 3 ft. [45 x 45 x 90 cm.], Exod. 30:2) with horns at each corner. It was made of acacia wood overlaid with pure gold. Around the top of this structure a crown of gold was placed, beneath which were fixed two golden rings, one on each side. Staves of the same construction as the altar were placed through these rings to carry it (30:1-5).

This altar was to be located before the veil that separated the Holy Place from the Most Holy Place, midway between the walls (Exod. 30:6; 40:5). Because of its special location, it was referred to as "the altar before the LORD" (Lev. 16:12). Elsewhere in the Bible it is referred to as "the altar that belonged to the inner sanctuary" (1 Ki. 6:22; cf. Heb. 9:3-4) and "the golden altar before the throne" (Rev. 8:3). Incense was burned on this altar twice each day (Exod. 30:7-8), and the blood of the atonement was sprinkled on it (30:10). The burning of incense on this altar symbolized the offering up of the believers' prayers (Rev. 8:3). It was while ZECHARIAH was officiating at this altar that the angel appeared to him (Lk. 1:10).

There are no altars recognized in the NT church. While Heb. 13:10 is sometimes used to prove the contrary, the context makes clear that Jesus Christ is the true altar of each believer. PAUL mentions in Acts 17:23 the inscription on an altar, "TO AN UNKNOWN GOD," which he saw in ATHENS. See UNKNOWN GOD.

There is good reason to believe that the need for altars was revealed very early as basic in approaching God. The altar played a leading role in all OT worship of the true God, as well as a prominent part in most pagan religions. A careful study of the use of this article of furniture in Israel's worship furnishes us with many spiritual lessons today. It was the place of sacrifice where God was propitiated and where man was pardoned and sanctified. It looked to the great sacrifice that the Son of God was about to make on the cross. The altar of sacrifice, the first thing visible as one approached the tabernacle, spoke loudly to sinners that without the shedding of blood there would be no access to God and no forgiveness of sin (Heb. 9:9, 22).

Al-taschith. al-tas'kith. A word found in KJV in the titles of Ps. 57-59 and 75 as a transliteration of the Hebrew phrase al-tašḥēt, meaning "Do not destroy" (some versions transliterate "Altashheth"). This phrase may form the beginning of an old tune, normally sung at the harvesting of grapes, as described in Isa. 65:8. But DAVID's word about SAUL, "Don't destroy him" (1 Sam. 26:9), and the words of MOSES' prayer (Deut. 9:26) both imply a spirit of trust in the Lord suited to the content of these psalms. The purpose of the title may, therefore, be to indicate the type of praise that follows. See also AIJELETH SHAHAR.

Alush. ay'luhsh (Heb. ālûš H478, meaning unknown). A stopping place of the Israelites in their journey through the wilderness (Num. 33:13-14). Alush was apparently located between DOPKHAH and REPHIDIM, but the site has not been identified.

Alvah. al'vuh (Heb. alwāh H6595, meaning unknown). Descendant of ESAU, listed among the clan chiefs of EDOM (Gen. 36:40; 1 Chr. 1:51; in the latter passage, the KJV and other versions have "Aliah," following the Ketib or variant reading). The name was probably applied to a territory as well. Some identify Alvah with ALVAN.

Alvan. al'vuhn (Heb. alwān H6597, perhaps "tall" or "ascending"). Son of Shobal and grandson of SEIR the HORITE (Gen. 36:23; 1 Chr. 1:40; in the latter passage, the KJV and other versions have "Alian," following most Heb. MSS). Some identify Alvan with ALVAH.

Amad. ay'mad (Heb. am ād H6675, derivation unknown). A town in the tribal territory of ASHER (Josh. 19:26). The site is unknown.

Amal. ay'muhl (Heb. ʿāmāl H6663, possibly “laborer”). Son of Helem, listed among the brave warriors who were heads of families of the tribe of ASHER (1 Chr. 7:35; cf. v. 40).

Amalek. am'uh-lek (Heb. ʿāmālēq H6667, derivation uncertain). Son of ELIPHAZ (by his concubine Timna), grandson of ESAU, and a tribal chief of EDM (Gen. 36:12, 15-16; 1 Chr. 1:36). The name is frequently applied to his descendants. See AMALEKITES.

The Amalekites roamed throughout this region in SE Israel referred to in the Bible as the Desert of Zin.

Amalekite. uh-mal'uh-kit (Heb. ʿāmālēqî H6668, “of Amalek”). A descendant of AMALEK (but see below). The Amalekites were an ancient and nomadic marauding people dwelling mainly in the NEGEV from early in the second millennium to c. 700 B.C.

The first mention of them is among those conquered by KEDORLAOMER in the days of ABRAHAM (Gen. 14:7). MOSES felt their fury in the unprovoked attack on the Israelites at REPHIDIM, for which God decreed continual war and ultimate obliteration (Exod. 17:8-16). JOSHUA and the other spies encountered them in Canaan, and they and the Canaanites repulsed the Israelites at HORMAH (Num. 14:45). During the period of the judges they sided with AMMON and MOAB against the Israelites in the days of EHUD (Jdg. 3:13) and with MIDIAN and other eastern peoples against GIDEON (6:3, 33). Another judge, ABDON, was buried “in the hill country of the Amalekites” (12:15).

During the monarchy, SAUL was commissioned to destroy them utterly but failed to do so and spared their leader, AGAG (1 Sam. 15:8-9). An Amalekite later killed Saul (2 Sam. 1:1-10). David invaded the land of the Amalekites and other ancient inhabitants from SHUR to EGYPT (1 Sam. 27:8) and struck them severely in recovering his wives and property stolen during the raid on ZIKLAG (30:18). They are numbered among nations subdued by him (2 Sam. 8:12; 1 Chr. 18:11). The Simeonites during the time of HEZEKIAH finally exterminated them (1 Chr. 4:43).

Distribution of the Amalekites was primarily in the Negev, SW of the DEAD SEA, but also in the SINAI Peninsula from Rephidim (Exod. 17:8) to the border of Egypt (1 Sam. 27:8); northward at JEZREEL (Jdg. 6:33), PIRATHON (12:15), and at or near JERICHO (3:13); and eastward to Mount SEIR (1 Chr. 4:42). See also Num. 13:29.

The origin of the Amalekites is debated. If Amalek, the grandson of ESAU (Gen. 36:12), is the nation's father, the note in Gen. 14:7 must be seen as proleptic (i.e., the term is used to identify the land that later became the home of the Amalekite descendants of Esau). Accordingly, their description as "first among the nations" in Num. 24:20 can be first in time, first in preeminence, or most likely first to molest liberated Israel (at Rephidim). Arab traditions, late and conflicting, have the Amalekites stem from HAM.

In character the Amalekites were warlike, usually confederate with the Canaanites (Num. 14:45) or Moabites (Jdg. 3:13), but sometimes alone, as at Rephidim (Exod. 17:8) and Ziklag (1 Sam. 10:1). They "cut off all who were lagging behind; they had no fear of God" (Deut. 25:18), and they destroyed crops (Jdg. 6:4).

At Rephidim the Lord said, "I will completely blot out the memory of Amalek from under heaven" (Exod. 17:14), and BALAAM prophesied, "Amalek... will come to ruin at last" (Num. 24:20). Saul failed to destroy the Amalekites, but David reduced them to inactivity, and the Simeonites at Mount Seir "killed the remaining Amalekites who had escaped" (1 Chr. 4:43). Archaeology has produced no evidence of them thus far.

Amam. ay'mahm (Heb. ʾāmām H585, derivation uncertain). An unidentified city in the NEGEV that the tribe of JUDAH received in the allotment of the land (Josh. 15:26).

Amana. uh-may'nuh (Heb. ʾāmānāh H592, perhaps "constant"). Also Amanah. A mountain in the ANTILEBANON range (Cant. 4:8), near the course of the river ABANA (2 Ki. 5:12, where the river too is called "Amana" in a variant reading).

amanuensis. uh-man'yoo-en'sis. This Latin term, meaning “secretary,” is used specifically of someone who takes dictation or copies a MS. Amanuenses were frequently used by writers in antiquity. PETER speaks of being assisted by SILAS in writing a letter (1 Pet. 5:12). When PAUL refers to writing a greeting with his own hand (1 Cor. 16:21; 2 Thess. 3:17; cf. also Phlm. 19 and esp. Gal. 6:10-18), he implies that the rest of the letter was written by a secretary. One of them, TERTIUS, identifies himself in Rom. 16:22. The use of amanuenses may serve to account for stylistic differences between letters that have the same author, but there is debate about how much freedom these secretaries were given in the composition of documents.

Amariah. am'uh-ri'uh (Heb. ʾămaryâ H618 and ʾămaryāhhû H619, “Yahweh has said”). (1) Son of Meraioth and descendant of AARON in the line of ELEAZAR; grandfather (or ancestor) of ZADOK the priest (1 Chr. 6:7, 52).

(2) Son of Hebron and descendant of LEVI in the line of KOHATH; contemporary of David (1 Chr. 23:19; 24:23).

(3) Son of Azariah and descendant of AARON in the line of ELEAZAR; ancestor of EZRA (1 Chr. 6:11; Ezra 7:3).

(4) A chief priest in the reign of JEHOASHAPATH (2 Chr. 19:11); some identify him with #3 above.

(5) A Levite who faithfully assisted KORE in distributing the contributions made to the temple during the reign of HEZEKIAH (2 Chr. 31:15).

(6) One of the descendants of Binnui who agreed to put away their foreign wives (Ezra 10:42 [cf. v. 38 NIV and NRSV]).

(7) A priest who returned to Jerusalem and sealed the covenant under NEHEMIAH (Neh. 10:3). Some believe he is the same as the Amariah who returned from Babylon with ZERUBBABEL (12:2; cf. v. 13).

(8) Son of Shephatiah, descendant of JUDAH, and ancestor of Athaiah (Neh. 11:4).

(9) Ancestor of the prophet ZEPHANIAH and son of Hezekiah, possibly the king (Zeph. 1:1).

Amarna, Tell-el. tel'el-uh-mahr'nuh. Name given to a mound of ruins in EGYPT, halfway between THEBES (present Luxor) and MEMPHIS (near Cairo); it was the site of a major city built by one of the Egyptian pharaohs, Amenhotep (Amenophis) IV, better known as AKHENATEN (c. 1370-1353 B.C.). The city's ancient name was Akhet-Aten (Egyptian ḥt-ʾtn, “the horizon of Aten,” referring to the deified sun disk). In A.D. 1887, a peasant woman, seeking the dust from ancient buildings with which to fertilize her garden, dug in the ruins of Tell el-Amarna. She found some clay tablets, which she pulverized and took to her home. Finally an American missionary stationed at Luxor, Chauncey Murch, heard of this find and notified some cuneiform scholars. After the site producing these tablets had been identified, it was excavated by Sir Flinders Petrie.

© Dr. James C. Martin. The Cairo Museum. Photographed by permission.

This small cuneiform tablet from Tell el-Amarna describes diplomatic correspondence between the Egyptian court and the rulers of neighboring states.

The excavation yielded 320 CLAY TABLETS of varying sizes with Akkadian cuneiform WRITING on both sides. There are now 82 in the British Museum, 160 in Berlin, 60 at Giza Museum, and the rest in private hands. They contain the private correspondence between the ruling Egyptian pharaohs at the time and the political leaders in Palestine. It is believed they reflect the prevailing conditions that existed during the time JOSHUA carried on his campaigns in Palestine. These tablets have cast considerable light on the cultural and historical background to the biblical world. These tablets have also provided valuable linguistic information (e.g., regarding the Egyptian vowel system). In addition, the excavations uncovered much about Egyptian art, architecture, and theology that was previously unknown.

Amasa. uh-may'suh (Heb. ʿāmāsā H6690, possibly short form of AMASIAH, “Yahweh has carried [i.e., protected]”). (1) Son of JETHER (Ithra) and captain of the Israelite army appointed by ABSALOM when the latter attempted to overthrow DAVID's rule in Israel (2 Sam. 17:25; 1 Chr. 2:16-17). ABIGAIL, sister of ZERUIAH and David, was his mother, making him nephew to David and cousin to Absalom. Following the defeat of the rebels under Amasa and the death of Absalom by JOAB in the forest of Ephraim (2 Sam. 18:6-17), David made Amasa captain of the army in place of Joab (19:13). When SHEBA and the men of Israel rebelled, David set three days for Amasa to assemble the men of Judah (20:4). Amasa delayed beyond the set time, so David sent ABISHAI, brother of Joab, and a body of armed men after Sheba. Amasa joined forces with Abishai at "the great rock in Gibeon," where Joab, in feigned greeting, "took Amasa by the beard with his right hand to kiss him" and ran him through with his sword (20:8-10).

(2) Son of Hadlai; he was one of the princes of EPHRAIM who supported ODED the prophet in warning the Israelites not to take captives from Judah (2 Chr. 28:9-15).

Amasai. uh-may'si (Heb. ʿāmāśay H6691, possibly short form of AMASIAH, "Yahweh has carried [i.e., protected]"). (1) Son of ELKANAH and descendant of LEVI in the line of KOHATH (1 Chr. 6:25 [Heb. v. 10]). Somehow he also is linked with the genealogy of the musician HEMAN and thus is listed as the father of Mahath (v. 35 [Heb. v. 20]).

(2) One of the priests appointed by DAVID to blow the trumpets before the ARK OF THE COVENANT when it was brought to Jerusalem (1 Chr. 15:24).

(3) Father of Mahath, a Levite who served in the time of HEZEKIAH's revival (2 Chr. 29:12). Since the Amasai in #1 above also had a son named Mahath, it might appear that they are the same person, but 1 Chr. 6:25 and 35 refer to someone who served much earlier, during the time of SOLOMON.

(4) The "chief of the Thirty," upon whom the Spirit came when he met DAVID at ZIKLAG (1 Chr. 12:18). Some identify him with AMASA, captain of Absalom's army (2 Sam. 17:25), and others with ABISHAI, the brother of JOAB (1 Chr. 11:20; cf. 2 Sam. 23:18; 1 Chr. 2:16; 18:12). The problem would remain, however, in that none of the three (Amasai, Amasa, or Abishai) appears in the lists of the Thirty given in 2 Sam. 23 and 1 Chr. 11.

Amashai. uh-mash'i. KJV form of AMASHSAI.

Amashsai. uh-mash'si (Heb. ʿāmaššay H6692, possibly a scribal error for ʿāmāśay H6691, "Amasai"). KJV Amashai. Son of Azarel and descendant of IMMER; a postexilic priest (Neh. 11:13). Some identify him with MAASAI in the parallel list (1 Chr. 9:12).

Amasiah. am´uh-si´uh (Heb. ʿāmasıyâ H6674, “Yahweh has carried [for protection]”). Son of Zicri; a Judahite commander under JEHOSHAPHAT “who volunteered himself for the service of the LORD” (2 Chr. 17:16).

Amaw. ay´maw (Heb. ʿammô). Also Amau. According to some scholars, this term refers to the land near the EUPHRATES River from which BALAK, king of MOAB, summoned BALAAM to curse Israel (Num. 22:5 NRSV). If this translation is correct, Amaw (or Amae) may be identified with a region in the valley of the river Sajur in N Syria. A few Hebrew MSS, supported by several ancient versions, read AMMON, preferred by some scholars because of this country’s closer proximity to Moab. It is better, however, to read the Hebrew text not as a proper noun, but as the word for “his people” (cf. KJV), thus NIV, “his native land.” See also PETHOR.

Amaziah. am´uh-zī´uh (Heb. ʾāmašyâ H604 and ʾāmašyāhû H605, “strength of Yahweh” or “Yahweh is powerful”). (1) Son of Joash (JEHOASH) and his successor as king of Judah. His mother was a certain Jehoaddin of Jerusalem (2 Ki. 14:2; 2 Chr. 25:1). The length of his reign is given as twenty-nine years in 2 Ki. 14:2, but such a long reign is difficult to reconcile with other data, unless the figure includes a period of coregency with his son Azariah (UZZIAH); thus some scholars date his reign c. 800-783 B.C., others 796-767. Amaziah ascended the throne in the midst of trying circumstances, when his father was murdered by some of his courtiers (2 Ki. 14:5-6; 2 Chr. 25:3-4). He was quite successful against the Edomites in the S along the Jordan Valley but was foolish to challenge the more powerful Jehoash, king of Israel, as a result of which he lost his kingdom (2 Ki. 14:7-14; 2 Chr. 25:17-24). He then fell the victim of a court intrigue and was pursued to LACHISH, where he was murdered. His body was brought back in a funeral cortège, and he was buried in the royal tombs outside the Mount of Zion.

(2) Father of Joshah, a clan leader in the tribe of SIMEON (1 Chr. 4:34; cf. v. 38).

(3) Son of Hilkiah and descendant of LEVI in the line of MERARI (1 Chr. 6:45); he is listed among those who “ministered with music before the tabernacle, the Tent of Meeting, until Solomon built the temple of the LORD in Jerusalem” (v. 32).

(4) A minor figure named Amaziah is mentioned as a priest at the shrine of BETHEL during the reign of the second JEROBOAM. He attempted to deter AMOS from prophesying there and reported the prophet's denunciations to the king (Amos 7:10-17).

ambassador. An official representative of a ruler or government. Ambassadors and envoys are mentioned throughout most of the biblical period (e.g., Num. 20:14; Jdg. 11:12; 2 Chr. 32:31; Isa. 30:4). Disrespect shown to them was regarded as a serious insult to their sovereign and his people, and sometimes led to war (2 Sam. 10). In the NT the term is used only in a figurative sense. PAUL called himself "an ambassador in chains" (Eph. 6:20); he also said, "We are therefore Christ's ambassadors, as though God were making his appeal through us" (2 Cor. 5:20). See MESSENGER.

amber. A yellow translucent fossil tree resin. Deeply colored translucent to transparent varie-ties are prized as gem material and have been used, since prehistoric times, for ornaments. The term amber is used by some English versions to translate a Hebrew word of uncertain meaning (Ezek. 1:4, 27; 8:2; NIV, "metal").

amen. A Hebrew term (׀āmēn H589; cf. Gk. amēn G297) used to express assent. In both Greek and English (and many other languages), this term is a transliteration of a Hebrew adverb meaning "truly, verily," itself derived from a verb meaning "to be reliable, have stability." In the OT it appears with doxologies (1 Chr. 16:36; Neh. 8:6; Ps. 41:13) as an assent by the congregation to laws (Num. 5:22; Deut. 27:15-26), with oaths (Neh. 5:13), with appointments (1 Ki. 1:36), and as a call to divine witness (Jer. 28:6). In the NT it is used in various contexts. For example, it can introduce a solemn saying of Jesus, always in the sense of "I tell you the truth" (KJV, "Verily I say," Jn. 3:5; cf. Ps. 41:13). It is also used following a doxology (Rom. 11:36), following a benediction (15:33), as a concluding particle at the end of most NT books, as an assent to forebodings (Rev. 1:7; 22:20), in reverence to God (Rom. 1:25; 9:5; Rev. 1:18), and as a title of God (Rev. 3:14; cf. Isa. 65:15). The word may indicate the agreement or consent of the congregation to utterances of leaders (1 Cor. 14:16); it is also equated with certainty of the promises of God (2 Cor. 1:20).

amethyst. See MINERALS.

Ami. ay'mi (Heb. ʾāmî H577, “trustworthy”). See AMON #3.

amillennialism. See KINGDOM OF GOD.

Aminadab. See AMMINADAB.

Amittai. uh-mit'i (Heb. ʾāmittay H624, “faithful”). Father of the prophet JONAH, from GATH HEPHER in the tribal territory of ZEBULUN (2 Ki. 14:25; Jon. 1:1).

Ammah. am'uh (Heb. ʾammāh H565, prob. “[water] canal”; cf. METHEG AMMAH). A hill near GIAH in BENJAMIN, somewhere E of GIBEON, where JOAB and ABISHAI halted in their pursuit of ABNER and his forces (2 Sam. 2:24). The site has not been identified.

Amman. ah-mahn'. The capital city of the modern country of Jordan. See RABBAH.

Ammi. am'i (Heb. ʾammî [from ʾam H6639], “my people”). The new name to be applied to Israel in the time of restoration (Hos. 2:1; NIV, “My people”), in contrast to rejected Israel, called LO-AMMI, “Not my people,” the name given to HOSEA's third child by GOMER (1:9; cf. Rom. 9:25-26).

Ammiel. am'ee-uhl (Heb. ʾammî ʾēl H6653, “my kinsman is God”). (1) Son of Gemalli, of the tribe of DAN; one of the twelve spies sent by MOSES into Canaan (Num. 13:12).

(2) Father of MAKIR, in whose house MEPHIBOSHETH was hidden from DAVID (2 Sam. 9:4-5). Makir later befriended David (17:27).

(3) Father of BATHSHEBA, a wife of David and the mother of SOLOMON (1 Chr. 3:5 NIV; the NRSV, following most MSS, has “Bath-shua, daughter of Ammiel”). Elsewhere he is called ELIAM (2 Sam. 11:3; note that the two names have the same meaning, but with the components ʾam and ʾēl reversed).

(4) Sixth son of OBED-EDOM, whose family took care of the South Gate of the TEMPLE and the storehouse in the time of David (1 Chr. 26:5, 15).

Ammihud. uh-mi´huhd (Heb. ʿammîhûd H6654, “my kinsman is glorious” or “my people have majesty”). (1) Father of ELISHAMA; the latter was head of the tribe of EPHRAIM during the sojourn in the wilderness (Num. 1:10; 2:18; 7:48, 53; 10:22). Ammihud is listed in the genealogy of JOSHUA (1 Chr. 7:26).

(2) Father of Shemuel; the latter was one of the leaders of the tribe of SIMEON appointed by MOSES to help divide the land of Canaan (Num. 34:20).

(3) Father of Pedahel; the latter was one of the leaders of the tribe of NAPHTALI appointed by Moses to help divide the land of Canaan (Num. 34:28).

(4) Father of TALMAI, king of GESHUR, to whom ABSALOM fled after the murder of his brother AMNON (2 Sam. 13:37, where “Ammihur” is a variant [Ketib]).

(5) Son of Omri and father of Uthai; listed among leaders from the tribe of JUDAH who were the first to resettle after the EXILE (1 Chr. 9:4).

Amminadab. uh-min´uh-dab (Heb. ʿammînādāb H6657, “my kinsman is noble” or “my people are generous”; Gk. Aminadab G300). (1) Father of NAHSHON; the latter was the head of a family in the tribe of JUDAH (Num. 1:7; 2:3; 7:12, 17; 10:14). Amminadab was also the father of ELISHEBA, the wife of AARON (Exod. 6:23). He descended from PEREZ, Judah’s son (Gen. 38:29; 46:12), was an ancestor of DAVID (Ruth 4:19-20), and is included in the GENEALOGY OF JESUS CHRIST (Matt. 1:4; Lk. 3:33).

(2) The name Amminadab is listed in the MT of 1 Chr. 6:22 (= v. 7 in MT and LXX), possibly by textual corruption, as a son of KOHATH (who was a son of LEVI) and as the father of KORAH. However, according to vv. 37-38 (and in Exod. 6:18, 21; cf. Num. 3:19), Kohath’s son who fathered Korah was IZHAR (the reading of some MSS of the LXX in 1 Chr. 6:22).

(3) The head of the Levitical family of UZZIEL; he helped to bring the ARK OF THE COVENANT to Jerusalem in David’s time (1 Chr. 15:10-12).

(4) According to the SEPTUAGINT, Amminadab was the name of ESTHER’s father, but the MT reading, ABIHAIL, is probably correct (Esth. 2:15; 9:29).

Amminadib. uh-min´uh-dib (Heb. ʿammî-nādîb [from ʿam H6639 + nādîb H5618], “my people are noble” or “my kinsman is generous willing”). A name found only in an obscure passage, “my soul made me like the chariots of Amminadib” (Cant. 6:12 KJV). However, the NIV interprets the term as two common nouns and renders, “my desire set me among the royal chariots of my people” (similarly NRSV, “my fancy set me in a chariot beside my prince”).

Ammishaddai. am-i-shad'i (Heb. ʿammîšadday H6659, “Shaddai is my kinsman”). The father of Ahiezer; the latter was a leader of the tribe of D_{AN} in the wilderness journey (Num. 1:12; 2:25; 7:66, 71; 10:25).

Ammizabad. uh-miz’uh-bad (Heb. ‘ammîzābād H6655, “my kinsman has bestowed”). Son of BENIAH; the latter was one of DAVID’s bodyguards and captain of the elite Thirty, while Ammizabad was in charge of the division led by his father (1 Chr. 27:6).

Ammon. am'uhn (Heb. ʿammôn H6648, derivation uncertain). An ancient nation in TRANSJORDAN; its inhabitants were descendants of BEN-AMMI, one of the sons of LOT born to him by his youngest daughter in the neighborhood of Zoar (Gen. 19:38). See AMMONITE.

Ammonite. am´uh-nit (Heb. ammônî H6649). A descendant of BEN-AMMI (Gen. 19:38). The Ammonites constituted a nation E of the JORDAN River, S of GILEAD, and N of MOAB. They were closely related to the Moabites by ancestry and often appear in Scripture in united effort with them. Because they were also related to Israel (through LOT, nephew of ABRAHAM), the Israelites were told by the Lord not to enter into battle with them as they journeyed toward the land of Canaan (Deut. 2:19). Lot fled from the destruction of the cities of SODOM and GOMORRAH and dwelt in the mountains to the E of the Dead Sea. The land God gave the Ammonites stretched to the N as far as the JABBOK River and to the S to the hills of EDOM. Many years later the Ammonites made war with Israel in order to extend their borders farther W. Although this land never really belonged to the Ammonites, they claimed it and gave this as a reason for their aggression (Jdg. 11:13).

Unable to expand westward and not desiring the desert tract of land on the E, the Ammonites were confined to a small area. Although they were a nomadic people, they did have a few cities, their capital RABBAH (Rabbath-Ammon) being the most famous.

The people were fierce in nature and rebellious and, apart from the period when NAHASH was a friendly ally of DAVID's (2 Sam. 10:2), hostile to Israel. They threatened to gouge out the right eyes of all in JABESH GILEAD (1 Sam. 11:2). They were given to brutal murder (Jer. 40:14; 41:5-7; Amos 1:14). Though related to Israel, they refused to help them when asked, and they joined with Moab in securing BALAAM to curse them (Deut. 23:3-4). Later in Israel's history they united with SANBALLAT to oppose the work of NEHEMIAH in restoring the walls of JERUSALEM (Neh. 2:10-19). In religion the Ammonites were a degraded, idolatrous people. Their chief idol was MOLECH, to whom they were guilty of offering human sacrifices (1 Ki. 11:7).

Because of their sins and especially because they constantly opposed Israel, EZEKIEL predicted their complete destruction (Ezek. 25:1-7). Their last stand seems to have been against Judas MACCABEE (1 Macc. 5:6).

Amnon. am'non (Heb. ʾamnôn H596, "faithful"). (1) Firstborn son of DAVID by AHINOAM (2 Sam. 3:2; 1 Chr. 3:1). He dishonored his half-sister TAMAR and was subsequently slain (2 Sam. 13). See discussion under ABSALOM.

(2) Son of Shimon and descendant of JUDAH (1 Chr. 4:20).

Amok. ay'mok (Heb. ʿamôq H6651, "deep" or "wise"). A leader among the priests who returned from EXILE with ZERUBBABEL and JESHUA; Amok's son or descendant Eber was head of his family in the time of JOIAKIM (Neh. 12:7, 20; cf. v. 12).

Amon. am'uhn (Heb. ʾāmôn H571 [ʾāmōn in 1 Ki. 22:26], "faithful" [Egyp. deity ʾāmôn H572]; Gk. Amōn G321). (1) Son of MANASSEH and fifteenth king of Judah. The brief biblical accounts of Amon (2 Ki. 21:18-26 and 2 Chr. 33:20-25) describe him as an evil king who after only two years of reign (c. 642-640 B.C.) was slain by officials of his household. His son, however, was the illustrious King JOSIAH. Amon is included in Matthew's GENEALOGY OF JESUS CHRIST (Matt. 1:10, where the NRSV reads "Amos," the form found in the earliest Gk. MSS and other important witnesses; because this form is also a variant reading in the SEPTUAGINT, Matthew may have used it deliberately).

(2) Governor of the city of SAMARIA who was ordered by AHAB king of Israel to put MICAIAH the prophet in prison (1 Ki. 22:26; 2 Chr. 18:25).

(3) One of SOLOMON's servants whose descendants returned from EXILE under ZERUBBABEL (Neh. 7:59); called Ami in the parallel passage (Ezra 2:57).

(4) The name of an Egyptian deity who resided at No (meaning "the city," i.e., THEBES, Jer. 46:25; KJV here reads "the multitude of No"). Often spelled Amun or Amen. In Nah. 3:8, "Thebes" is a translation of nō ʾāmôn H5531 (lit., "the city of Amon"; KJV, "populous No"). Since Amon, the king of Judah, bore this name—which is one of relatively few Hebrew names with no Semitic divine element incorporated into it—some scholars have connected him with this Egyptian deity. This supposition is strengthened in the light of the unorthodoxy of Amon's father, Manasseh. The Thebian god Amon, a fertility deity, was often pictured having elements of sacred animals (the ram and the goose). When Thebes became the capital of EGYPT, Amon was connected with Re, the sun god. Amon-Re^c thus came to be worshiped as the supreme god.

Amorite. am'uh-rit (Heb. ʾēmōrî H616, prob. "westerner"). Although this word in the Hebrew occurs always in the singular, it is used collectively of that tribe of people who, according to Gen. 10:16, descended from CANAAN. They were prominent in pre-Israelite days, for it is believed that at one time their kingdom occupied the larger part of MESOPOTAMIA and SYRIA, with their capital at HARAN. The MARI tablets throw a flood of light on them, and some have thought that AMRAPHEL of SHINAR (Gen. 14:1) was one of their kings. When people from the N drove them from this region, they settled Babylonia and brought the entire area under their control, giving to Babylonia one of the richest periods in her history. After several hundred years they were defeated by the HITTITES, and they settled throughout a large portion of Canaan. They may even have ruled in Egypt for a time.

We do know that during their supremacy in Canaan they marched on the kingdom of MOAB and under the leadership of SIHON king of HESHBON subdued a large portion of this land, in which they settled (Num. 21:13, 26-31). JOSHUA speaks of their land as E of the JORDAN (Josh. 24:8), but elsewhere it is described as being on the W shore of the DEAD SEA (Gen. 14:7), on the plain of MAMRE (14:13), and around Mount HERMON (Deut. 3:8). They were apparently a very wicked people, for God told ABRAHAM that his descendants would mete out divine vengeance on them when their iniquity was full (Gen. 15:16). Under MOSES' leadership this judgment was dealt to Sihon and to OG of BASHAN, the kings of the Amorites E of the Jordan. Their territory was subdued and given to the tribe of REUBEN, who held it for 500 years until it fell to Moab. This land was very rich, attractive to both farmers and herdsmen. Joshua met these people in battle in the united campaign of the five Amorite kings of JERUSALEM, HEBRON, MARMUTH, LACHISH, and EGLON (Josh. 10:1-43). These battles (11:1-14), fought by Joshua under divine leadership, ended forever Amorite hostilities against Israel (1 Sam. 7:14; 1 Ki. 9:20-21).

Amos. ay'muhs (Heb. ʿāmōs H6650, “burden-bearer” or “supported [by Yahweh]” [cf. AMASAH]; Gk. Amōs G322). (1) An 8th-cent. B.C. literary prophet. See AMOS, BOOK OF.

(2) According to some MSS of Matt. 1:10, the son of King MANASSEH. See AMON #1.

(3) Son of Nahum, included in Luke's GENEALOGY OF JESUS CHRIST (Lk. 3:25).

Amos, Book of. The third book among the twelve Minor Prophets. The prophet Amos was one of the colorful personalities in an era that saw the rise of several towering prophetic figures. His ministry occurred in the reign of JEROBOAM II (c. 786-746 B.C.), son of King JEHOASH of the JEHU dynasty of Israel. Due to the removal of BEN-HADAD III of SYRIA as a military threat, the northern kingdom had been able to consolidate its hold on DAMASCUS and extend its borders northward to the pass of HAMATH. To the S and E, its territorial acquisitions equaled those of the early kingdom period under DAVID and SOLOMON. Although ASSYRIA was becoming an increasingly serious political threat, its military might under TIGLATH-PILESER III was still a distant prospect when Jeroboam II began to rule Israel.

Overview of Amos

Author: Amos, a shepherd from TEKOA (near BETHLEHEM) who was called to serve as prophet, possibly for only a limited period of time.

Historical setting: Amos received his revelation about the year 760 B.C., during the latter part of the prosperous reign of JEROBOAM II of ISRAEL. His ministry was directed primarily to the northern kingdom, making special reference to the region of SAMARIA and the city of BETHEL.

Purpose: To condemn the IDOLATRY prevalent in Israel and to challenge the social injustice of its wealthy inhabitants.

Contents: The book begins with a general indictment of various nations (Amos 1-2), followed by an extensive condemnation of the northern kingdom of Israel (chs. 3-6) and by predictions of its destruction (chs. 7-9), although the prophecy ends with a promise of restoration (9:11-15).

Jeroboam's forty-year reign was one of great prosperity for the northern kingdom, approaching in character the "golden age" of David and Solomon. With the threat of war removed, a cultural, social, and economic revival took place. The expansion of trade and commerce resulted in a steady drift from country to city, and the small towns in the northern kingdom gradually became overcrowded. But prosperity was accompanied by an almost unprecedented degree of social corruption (Amos 2:6-8; 5:11-12), caused principally by the demoralizing influence of Canaanite B_{AAL} worship, which had been fostered at the local shrines from the time when the northern kingdom had assumed a separate existence.

Archaeological discoveries in Palestine have furnished a dramatic picture of the extent to which this depraved, immoral religion exerted its corrupting influences over the Israelites. Characteristic of the ritual observances were drunkenness, violence, gross sensuality, and idolatrous worship. The effect was seen in the corruption of justice, in wanton and luxurious living, and in the decay of social unity in Hebrew society. The rich manifested no sense of responsibility toward the poor, and instead of relieving their economic distress seemed bent on devising new means of depriving them of their property.

To this perilous situation Amos brought a message of stern denunciation. Although he was not an inhabitant of the northern kingdom, he was painfully aware of its moral, social, and religious shortcomings. Amos lived in the small mountain village of T_{EKOA}, which lay to the S of Jerusalem on the borders of the extensive upland pastures of Judah. By trade he was a herdsman of sheep and goats (Amos 7:14) and was also engaged in dressing the sycamore-fig tree, whose fruit needs to be incised about four days before the harvest to hasten the ripening process. His background was of a strictly agricultural nature, and his work afforded him ample time for meditating on God's laws and their meaning for wayward Israel.

On receiving his call, Amos protested vigorously against the luxurious and careless lifestyle characteristic of S_{AMARIA}, castigated the elaborate offerings made at the shrines of B_{EERSHEBA} and G_{ILGAL}, and stated flatly that ritual could never form an acceptable substitute for righteousness. He asserted the moral jurisdiction of God over all nations (Amos 1:3, 6, 9, 11, 13; 2:1, 4, 6) and warned the Israelites that unless they repented of their idolatry and, following a renewed spiritual relationship with God, commenced to redress social inequalities, they would fall victim to the invader from the E. So great was the impact of this vigorous personality that Amos was accused of sedition by AMAZIAH, the idolatrous high priest of BETHEL (7:10-13). In reply, Amos pointed out that he had no connection with any prophetic order, nor was he linked in any way politically with the house of David. Instead he was called by God to prophesy the captivity of an unrepentant Israel.

The style of his book, though simple, is picturesque, marked by striking illustrations taken from his rural surroundings. His work as a herdsman was clearly not incompatible either with a knowledge of history (Amos 9:7) or with an ability to assess the significance of contemporary political and religious trends. The integrity of his book has suffered little at the hands of modern critical scholars.

Contents

Amos 1-2. The indictment of foreign nations, including Judah and Israel.

3:1—5:17. The condemnation of wicked Samaria.

5:18—6:14. False security exposed; judgment foretold.

7:1—9:10. Five visions illustrate divine forbearance and justice; Amos's reception at Bethel (7:10-17).

9:11-15. Epilogue promising restoration and prosperity.

Amoz. ay'muhz (Heb. ʾāmôš H576, prob. short form of AMAZIAH, "strength of Yahweh"). The father of the prophet ISAIAH (2 Ki. 19:2; Isa. 1:1).

Amphipolis. am-fip'uh-lis (Gk. Amphipolis G315, "city on both sides"). A city of MACEDONIA, situated on a bend of the River Strymon. It was founded by the Athenians in the fifth century B.C. and under the Romans it became the capital of one of the four districts into which Macedonia was divided. It was a military post on the Via Egnatia, 33 mi. (53 km.) SW of PHILIPPI. PAUL passed through it on the way from Philippi to THESSALONICA (Acts 17:1).

Amplias. am´plee-uhs. See AMPLIATUS.

Ampliatius. am´pli-ay´tuhs (Gk. Ampliatos G309; the shortened form Amplias is a textual variant, thus KJV, “Amplias”). A Christian living in ROME to whom PAUL sends greetings and to whom he refers as one “whom I love in the Lord” (Rom. 16:8). His name was common in ancient Rome, especially among slaves and freedmen.

Amram. am´ram (Heb. ʿamrām H6688, “exalted people” or “the kinsman [referring to a deity] is eminent”; gentilic ʿamrāmî H6689, “Amramite”). (1) A Levite, son or descendant of KOHATH; he was the husband (and nephew) of JOCHEBED and the father of MOSES, AARON, and MIRIAM (Exod. 6:18, 20; Num. 3:19; 26:59; 1 Chr. 6:3). The Amramites, descended from him, had special duties in the wilderness TABERNACLE and in the TEMPLE (Num. 3:27; 1 Chr. 26:23).

(2) One of the descendants of Bani who agreed to put away their wives during EZRA’s reforms (Ezra 10:34).

(3) KJV form of Hamran (1 Chr. 1:41; see HEMDAN).

Amraphel. am´ruh-fel (Heb. ʾamrāpel H620, meaning disputed). A member of a league of four kings (Amraphel of Shinar, ARIOCH of Ellasar, KEDORLAOMER of Elam, and TIDAL of Goiim) that fought an opposing league of Palestinian kings (of Sodom, Gomorrah, Admah, Zeboiim, and Bela) and defeated them (Gen.

14). The head of the eastern league was Kedorlaomer, king of Elam. Although identifications of several of these kings have been suggested (e.g., Amraphel = HAMMURABI of Babylon, Tidal = Tudhalia I of Hatti), few scholars have accepted them.

amulet. The prophet ISAIAH speaks of the women of his day as wearing “charms” (Isa. 3:20; NRSV, “amulets”). The Hebrew word there (laḥaš H4318) means “whispering” and is used in Eccl. 10:11 and Jer. 8:17 specifically of snake-charming (cf. the related verb in Ps. 58:4-5). Isaiah sees the existence of those “instructed in whispering” (NIV, “clever enchanter,” i.e., holding whispered communication with the dead, with spirits, or making whispered communication purporting to come from “the other side”) as evidence that society is about to collapse (Isa. 3:3). The same word (in 3:20) also refers to objects, personal ornaments, into which some magic charm has been whispered, supposed therefore to afford protection or some other “lucky” benefit to the wearer. Archaeology has revealed such practices all over the ancient world.

Amzi. am'zi (Heb. ʾamšî H603, “my strength” or short form of AMAZIAH, “strength of Yahweh”). (1) Son of Bani, descendant of LEVI in the line of MERARI, and ancestor of ETHAN, who was a musician in the temple (1 Chr. 6:46 [Heb. v. 31]; cf. v. 44 [Heb. v. 29]).

(2) Son of Zechariah and ancestor of Adaiah; the latter was a priest who returned to Jerusalem after the EXILE (Neh. 11:12).

Anab. ay'nab (Heb. ʿānāb H6693, “[place of the] grape”). A city in the hill country of JUDAH, near DEBIR, from which JOSHUA drove out the ANAKITES (Josh. 11:21; 15:50). The modern site is Khirbet ʿUnnab eṣ-Ṣaghir, some 12 mi. (19 km.) SW of HEBRON.

Anah. ay'nuh (Heb. ʿānā H6704, derivation uncertain). The name of one or more individuals mentioned in Gen. 36:2, 14, 18, 20, 24-25, 29 (cf. also 1 Chr. 1:38-41). The first two references in the MT describe Anah as the daughter of ZIBEON the HIVITE, but the NRSV says son, following several ancient versions. (The NIV translates, “Oholibamah daughter of Anah and granddaughter of Zibeon the Hivite.” This rendering, which assumes that in this clause the second occurrence of bat, “daughter,” also refers to OHOLIBAMAH, leaves open the question whether Anah was her father or her mother.) If this Anah was indeed a man, he is probably the same as the HORITE in Gen. 36:24, identified as a son of Zibeon who discovered some “hot springs” (KJV, “mules”; the Hebrew word is of uncertain meaning) in the desert.

Anaharath. uh-nay'huh-rath (Heb. ʿānāḥārat H637, meaning unknown). A city in the tribal territory of ISSACHAR (Josh. 19:19). It is no. 52 in THUTMOSE III's list, and should probably be identified with Tell el-Mukharkhash (Tel Rekhes), about 8 mi. (13 km.) SW of the southern tip of the Sea of Galilee, close to SHUNEM.

Anaiah. uh-nay'yuh (Heb. ʿānāyā H6717, “Yahweh has answered”). One of the men who stood beside EZRA when he read the law to the people (Neh. 8:4). He is probably the same individual listed among the leaders of the people who sealed the covenant with NEHEMIAH (10:22).

Anak. ay'nak (Heb. ʿānāq H6737, possibly “long-necked”). Descendant of ARBA (Josh. 15:13) and ancestor of the ANAKITES (Num. 13:33 et al.).

Anakim. an'uh-kim. See ANAKITES.

Anakites. an'uh-kits (Heb. anāqîm, apparently gentilic pl. of ʿānāq H6737). Also Anakim. Descendants of ANAK. The Anakites were a tribe inhabiting PALESTINE in pre-Israelite times. The spies compared them to the Nephilim or GIANTS of Gen. 6:4; also they were reckoned among the REPHAITES (Deut. 2:11). Three chiefs of the Anakites were in HEBRON (Num. 13:22) from the time of the spies until CALEB took it (Josh. 15:13-14). Remnants of them remained in the PHILISTINE cities of GAZA, GATH, and ASHDOD (11:21-22).

Anamim. an'uh-mim. See ANAMITES.

Anamites. an'uh-mits (Heb. ʿānāmîm H6723, meaning unknown). A tribe or nation related to the Egyptians (MIZRAIM) and mentioned in the ethnographic lists of Gen. 10:13 and 1 Chr. 1:11. Various suggestions have been made regarding their location (such as CYRENE, the desert of LIBYA, and an area W of ALEXANDRIA), but the identification of the Anamites remains uncertain.

Anammelech. uh-nam'uh-lek (Heb. ʿānammek H6724, perhaps “Anath is queen [lit., king]”). TNIV Anammelek. A deity of the natives of SEPHARVAIM (Sabraim in E central Syria) whom the Assyrians transplanted to SAMARIA after 722 B.C. (2 Ki. 17:31). Some scholars hold that the name should be spelled “Anu-melech” (Anu was the great sky-god of the Sumerians). Others suggest that the name alludes to the Canaanite goddess ANATH. See also ADRAMMELECH.

Anan. ay'nuhn (Heb. ʿānān H6728, possibly “cloud” or short form of ANANIAH, “Yahweh has heard me”). One of the leaders of the people who sealed the covenant with NEHEMIAH (Neh. 10:26).

Anani. uh-nay'ni (Heb. ʿānānî H6730, short form of ANANIAH, “Yahweh has heard me”). Son of Elioenai and descendant of King JEHOIACHIN (1 Chr. 3:24).

Ananiah (person). an'uh-ni'uh (Heb. ʿānānyāh H6731, prob. “Yahweh has heard/answered [me]”). Father of Maaseiah and grandfather of AZARIAH; the latter was an Israelite who helped rebuild the walls of Jerusalem under NEHEMIAH (Neh. 3:23).

Ananiah (place). an'uh-ni'uh (Heb. ʿānānyāh H6732, prob. “Yahweh has heard/answered”). A town in the tribal territory of BENJAMIN occupied by Jews after their return from ^{EXILE} (Neh. 11:32); it is probably modern el-^cAzariyeh (= NT BETHANY).

Ananias. an'uh-ni'uhs (Gk. Ananias G393, from Heb. ḥānanyâ H2863, “Yahweh is gracious”). (1) Husband of SAPPHIRA (Acts 5:1-11). He and his wife pretended to give to the church all they received from a sale of property but kept back part. When PETER denounced his deceit, Ananias fell down dead. The generosity of others (4:32-37) accentuates the meanness of Ananias. Yet lying to the HOLY SPIRIT, rather than greed, was the sin for which he was punished. That his was the first gross act of disobedience within the church justifies the severity of the punishment. Peter prophesied rather than decreed his death, which was a penalty God inflicted.

(2) A disciple at DAMASCUS who, obeying a vision, was the means of healing the sight of Saul of Tarsus (PAUL) and of introducing him to the Christians of Damascus (Acts 9:10-19). In Acts 22:12-16 Paul recalls Ananias's part in his conversion and speaks of him as “a devout observer of the law and highly respected by all the Jews living” in Damascus.

(3) A high priest before whom Paul was tried in Jerusalem (Acts 23:1-5). Paul, whether because of poor eyesight or momentary forgetfulness or Ananias's unpriestly behavior, reviled him, was rebuked, and promptly apologized. Ananias came down to CAESAREA in person to accuse Paul before the Roman governor FELIX (24:1). According to JOSEPHUS, Ananias was sent to Rome in the year A.D. 52 to answer charges of cruelty, but he was acquitted by CLAUDIUS through the efforts of AGRIPPA II the Younger (Ant. 20.6.2-3) and retained office until the year 58. He was a typical SADDUCEE, haughty, wealthy, and unscrupulous (Ant. 20.9.2). Because of his collaborations with the Romans, he was hated by the nationalistic Jews. When the war broke out in 66, he was hunted down and murdered (Jos. War 2.17.9). He has been called one of the most unworthy men to hold the office of “high priest.”

Anath. ay'nath, ah'nath (Heb. ʿānāt H6742, meaning unknown). (1) Father of SHAMGAR; the latter was one of the judges in Israel (Jdg. 3:31; 5:6). It has been suggested that the phrase “son of Anath” is really a military title; others emend the phrase and regard it as a reference to the city of BETH ANATH (1:33).

(2) Anath (or Anat) was also the name of a warrior-goddess worshipped by various nations in the ANE. She is especially prominent in the texts found at UGARIT, where she is referred to as the sister (perhaps not in a literal sense) and consort of BAAL. This goddess is not explicitly mentioned in the OT, although perhaps she is alluded to in the names of various cities (e.g., ANATHOTH, BETH ANATH, BETH ANOTH).

anathema. uh-nath´uh-muh. This English term, borrowed directly from Greek (anathema G353 or anathēma G356, “that which is devoted, dedicated, banned, cursed”), occurs once in the KJV (1 Cor. 16:22), but not at all in most modern versions. The SEPTUAGINT uses the Greek term frequently, though not exclusively, to translate hērem H3051, a noun that occurs almost thirty times in the OT. This word refers primarily to that which is devoted to God, becomes his, and is therefore irrevocably withdrawn from common use. A person so devoted is doomed to death—a death implying moral worthlessness (Lev. 27:28-29; Rom. 3:9; 1 Cor. 12:3; 16:22; Gal. 1:9). See also DEVOTED THING.

anathema maranatha. See MARANATHA.

Anathoth (person). an´uh-thoth (Heb. ʿānātôt H6744, prob. from ANATH). (1) One of the leaders of the people who sealed the covenant along with NEHEMIAH after the return from the Babylonian captivity (Neh. 10:19).

(2) Son of BEKER and grandson of BENJAMIN (1 Chr. 7:8).

Anathoth (place). an´uh-thoth (Heb. ʿānātôt H6743; gentilic ʿannētōtī H6745, “Anathothite,” KJV “Anet(h)othite”). One of the forty-eight cities allotted to the Levites from the territory of the tribe of BENJAMIN (Josh. 21:18). The name may derive from ANATH, a Canaanite goddess, thus suggesting that the city was devoted to the worship of that deity before the Hebrew occupation. Anathoth was the native place of ABIATHAR the priest (1 Ki. 2:26) and JEREMIAH the prophet (Jer. 1:1). Two of DAVID’s distinguished soldiers, Abiezer (2 Sam. 23:27) and Jehu (1 Chr. 12:3), were Anathothites. SOLOMON banished Abiathar to Anathoth for his part in the unsuccessful attempt of ADONIJAH to lay claim to the throne (1 Ki. 2:26). In a prophetic oracle depicting the advance of the Assyrian invaders, ISAIAH speaks of Anathoth as one of the places standing in the path of the invading armies (Isa. 10:30). After the EXILE, 128 men of Anathoth returned in the contingent that came with ZERUBBABEL (Ezra 2:23). The city was settled in the time of NEHEMIAH (Neh. 11:32), and its name apparently lives on in the modern Anata. Ancient Anathoth, however, is usually identified with the nearby site of Ras el-Kharrubeh, 2.5 mi. (4 km.) NE of JERUSALEM, where excavations have revealed settlements from early Israelite times.

Anatolia. a'-nuh-toh'lee-uh (from anatolē G424, “rising [of the sun],” referring to the east). A term equivalent to ASIA MINOR. The Anatolian languages include several that belong to the Indo-European family (e.g., HITTITE) and some that do not (e.g., HURRIAN).

anchor. In ancient times every ship carried several anchors. In successive periods they were made of stone, iron, lead, and perhaps other metals. Each had two flukes and was held by a cable or a chain. The word is used in Acts in connection with PAUL's journey to Rome (Acts 27:13, 17, 29, 30, 40 and Heb. 6:19). The author of Hebrews uses it as a powerful figure for Christian confidence: “We have this hope as an anchor for the soul, firm and secure” (6:19). See ASSURANCE; HOPE.

Ancient of Days. This elegant Semitic expression, which refers simply to someone old, occurs only in Dan. 7:9, 13, and 22. It was probably chosen to contrast God and his kingdom with the temporary limited duration of the four successive kingdoms, under the figures of four wild beasts, which appear earlier in the chapter. The eternal Yahweh of all the universe appropriately defeats them and establishes his own eternal kingdom under the matchless “son of man” and his “saints” who appear in the same scene (vv. 13-14, 22). See DANIEL, BOOK OF; SON OF MAN.

Andrew. an'droo (Gk. Andreas G436, “manly”). The brother of Simon PETER and one of the first disciples of Jesus. Although a native Palestinian Jew, Andrew bore a Greek name. He was the son of Jonah (Matt. 16:17) or John (Jn. 1:42; 21:15-17; see JOHN #4), whose home was in BETHSAIDA in GALILEE (Jn. 1:44; 12:21). Andrew was a fisherman, like his brother, with whom he lived at CAPERNAUM (Mk. 1:29). He was a disciple of JOHN THE BAPTIST, who directed him to Jesus as the Lamb of God. Convinced that Jesus was the MESSIAH, he quickly brought his brother Peter to Jesus (Jn. 1:25-42). Subsequently Jesus called the two brothers to abandon their fishing and take up permanent fellowship with him (Matt. 4:18-19); later Jesus appointed Andrew an apostle (Matt. 10:2; Mk. 3:18; Lk. 6:14; Acts 1:13). In the lists of the apostles his name always appears next to that of PHILIP, who was also from Bethsaida. He is associated with the feeding of the 5,000, where he expressed doubt that the multitude could be fed with the lad's five loaves and two fishes (Jn. 6:6-9), and also with the request of the Greeks to see Jesus (12:22). Andrew was one of the four who asked Jesus about the destruction of the TEMPLE and the time of the second coming. After Acts 1:13 he is never mentioned again. According to tradition he preached in Scythia and suffered martyrdom in Achaia, crucified on an X-shaped cross, now called a St. Andrew's cross.

Andronicus. an-dron´uh-kuhs (Gk. Andronikos G438, “conqueror of men”). A Christian at Rome to whom PAUL sent greetings (Rom. 16:7). The apostle calls him and JUNIAS “my relatives,” though the Greek term (syngenēs G5150) may indicate simply fellow-Jews (cf. 9:3). The apostle says that they became Christians before he did and that they shared imprisonment with him (where or when is not known). They are further described as “outstanding among the apostles,” meaning either that they were held in high esteem by the apostles or that they were themselves distinguished “apostles” (in a wider sense, i.e., early authorized preachers of the gospel).

Anem. ay´nuhm (Heb. ʿānēm H6722, meaning uncertain). One of the Levitical cities of ISSACHAR assigned to the descendants of GERSHON (1 Chr. 6:73). The parallel list reads EN GANNIM (Josh. 21:29). If they are not the same site, Anem may be identified either with ʿOlam, some 8 mi. (13 km.) SE of Mount TABOR or with the nearby location Khirbet ʿAnim.

Aner (person). ay´nuhr (Heb. ʿānēr H6738, meaning unknown). One of three AMORITE brothers, including MAMRE and ESHCOL, allies of ABRAHAM in his pursuit after the four kings who had taken LOT captive (Gen. 14:13, 24). Since Mamre is an old name for HEBRON (Gen. 23:19), and Eshcol is the name of a valley near Hebron (Num. 13:23), it is likely that Aner was also the name of a locality.

Aner (place). ay´nuhr (Heb. ʿānēr H6739, meaning unknown). One of the Levitical cities of MANASSEH assigned to the descendants of KOHATH (1 Chr. 6:70). The parallel list reads TAANACH (Josh. 21:25). If they are not the same site, the location of Aner remains unknown.

Anet(h)othite. an´uh-t(h)oh-thit. See ANATHOTH (PLACE).

angel. A supernatural, heavenly being. The English term is derived from Greek angelos G34 and corresponds to Hebrew mal ʾāk H4855, both meaning “messenger.” Angels are created beings (Ps. 148:2-5; Col. 1:16). Scripture does not tell us the time of their creation, but it was certainly before the creation of man (Job 38:7). They are described as “spirits” (Heb. 1:14). Although without a bodily organism, they have often revealed themselves in bodily form. Jesus said that they do not marry and do not die (Lk. 20:34-36). They therefore constitute a company, not a race developed from one original pair.

According to Scripture, angels are not mere personifications of abstract good and evil but rather personal beings. Although possessed of superhuman intelligence, they are not omniscient (Matt. 24:36; 1 Pet. 1:12); and although stronger than human beings, they are not omnipotent (Ps. 103:20; 2 Thess. 1:7; 2 Pet. 2:11). They are not glorified human beings but are distinct from men and women (1 Cor. 6:3; Heb. 1:14). There is a vast multitude of them. John says that he “heard the voice of many angels, numbering thousands upon thousands, and ten thousand times ten thousand” (Rev. 5:11). They are of various ranks and endowments (Col. 1:16), but only one—MICHAEL—is expressly called an archangel in Scripture (Jude 9). The great hosts of angels, both good and bad, are highly organized (Rom. 8:38; Eph. 1:21; 3:10; Col. 1:16; 2:15).

Angels were created holy (Gen. 1:31; Jude 6), but after a period (of probation?) some fell from their state of innocence (2 Pet. 2:4; Jude 6). Scripture is silent regarding the time and cause of their sin, but it is clear that it occurred before the FALL of ADAM and EVE (for SATAN deceived Eve in the Garden of Eden) and that it was due to a deliberate, self-determined rebellion against God. As a result these angels lost their original holiness, became corrupt, and were confirmed in evil. Some were “sent...to hell,” where they are held in chains until the Day of Judgment (2 Pet. 2:4); others were left free, and they oppose the work of God.

The work of the angels is varied. Good angels stand in the presence of God and worship him (Matt. 18:10; Heb. 1:6; Rev. 5:11). They assist, protect, and deliver God's people (Gen. 19:11; Ps. 91:11; Dan. 3:28; 6:22; Acts 5:19). The author of Hebrews says, "Are not all angels ministering spirits sent to serve those who will inherit salvation?" (Heb. 1:14). They sometimes guide God's children, as when one told PHILIP to go into the desert near GAZA (Acts 8:26); and they bring encouragement, as when one spoke to PAUL in CORINTH (27:23-24). Sometimes they interpret God's will to people (Dan. 7:16; 10:5, 11; Zech. 1:9, 13-14, 19). They execute God's will toward individuals and nations (Gen. 19:12, 13; 2 Sam. 24:16; Ezek. 9:2, 5, 7; Acts 12:23). The affairs of nations are guided by them (Dan. 10:12-13, 20). God uses them to punish his enemies (2 Ki. 19:35; Acts 12:23).

Angels had a large place in the life and ministry of Christ. At his birth they made their appearance to Mary, Joseph, and the shepherds. After the wilderness temptation of Christ they ministered to him (Matt. 4:11); an angel strengthened him in the garden (Lk. 22:43); an angel rolled away the stone from the tomb (Matt. 28:2-7); and angels were with him at the ascension (Acts 1:10-11).

As for the evil angels, it is clear that their principal purpose is to oppose God and to try to defeat his will and frustrate his plans. Evil angels endeavor to separate believers from God (Rom. 8:38). They oppose good angels in their work (Dan. 10:12-13). They hinder our temporal and eternal welfare by a limited control over natural phenomena (Job 1:12-13, 19; 2:7), by inflicting disease (Lk. 13:11, 16; Acts 10:38; 2 Cor. 12:7), by tempting us to sin (Matt. 4:3; Jn. 13:27; 1 Pet. 5:8), and by spreading false doctrine (1 Ki. 22:21-23; 2 Thess. 2:2; 1 Tim. 4:1). They cannot, however, exercise over people any moral power independent of the human will, and whatever power they have is limited by the permissive will of God. The word Satan means "adversary," and Scripture shows him to be the adversary of both God and human beings. All of his many other names show his extremely wicked character.

Scripture shows that good angels will continue in the service of God in the future age, whereas evil angels will have their part in the eternal fire (Matt. 25:41).

angel of the Lord. This phrase (or its equivalent, "the angel of God") occurs frequently in the OT, and in almost every case the angel or messenger is regarded as deity and yet is distinguished from God (Gen. 16:7-14; 22:11-18; 31:11, 13; Exod. 3:2-5; Num. 22:22-35; Jdg. 6:11-23; 13:2-25; 1 Ki. 19:5-7; 1 Chr. 21:15-17). These references show that the angel is the Lord himself adopting a visible form (and therefore a human appearance) for the sake of speaking with people (e.g., Jdg. 13:6, 10, 21). Many students of the Bible regard these appearances as Christophanies, manifestations of the preincarnate Christ. While himself holy as God is holy (e.g., Exod. 3:2-5), the angel expresses the Holy One's condescension to walk among sinners (32:34; 33:3). He is also the executant of divine WRATH (e.g., 2 Sam. 24:16; 2 Ki. 19:35). In all these ways, as we can see from the NT perspective, the angel of the Lord is part of the OT preparation for the Lord Jesus Christ.

anger. The English rendering of at least ten biblical words, of which the most common is Hebrew ʔap H678 (lit., “nose,” thought of as the seat of anger, from its use in hard breathing). The OT condemns anger because it encourages folly and evil (Ps. 37:8; Prov. 14:29) and because vengeance belongs to God (Deut. 32:35). Elsewhere it calls for restraint from those confronted by anger (Prov. 16:14; Eccl. 10:4). In the NT anger is among those emotions that provoke God's WRATH (Eph. 5:6) and is regarded as alien to godliness (1 Tim. 2:8; Jas. 1:19-20). There is righteous anger, however, as when Jesus condemned the misuse of the temple (Jn. 2:12-17), the corruption of others (Mk. 9:42), and lack of compassion (3:5).

Aniam. uh-ni'uhm (Heb. ʔānî ʿām H642, “lament of the people” or “I am kinsman”). Son of Shemida and descendant of MANASSEH (1 Chr. 7:19). Some scholars emend Manasseh's genealogy here on the basis of Num 26:30-32.

Anim. ay'nim (Heb. ʿānîm H6719, possibly “springs”). A city in the hill country of JUDAH (Josh. 15:50). It is identified with modern Khirbet Ghuwein et-Taḥta, 11 mi. (18 km.) S of HEBRON.

animals. This article deals with all kinds of animal life appearing in the Bible, with the exception of birds, which are the subject of a separate entry.

adder. See snake, below.

ant. The two references to ants in Proverbs cite the excellent example given to a sluggard and no doubt other people (Prov. 6:6; 30:25). Study of the ant's behavior will provide wisdom, declares the author, drawing special attention to the ant's wise use of its “little strength” to “store up [its] food” and prepare for the future. The type of ant mentioned here is the harvester ant, found in regions of relative food shortage and therefore dependent on a diet of seeds. There are thousands of species worldwide belonging to this insect family, Formicidae. Most species maintain underground colonies that, like those of bees, work on a division-of-labor principle. Some attend to the cultivation of fungi, others milk the aphids for their secreted honeydew, others guard the colony. Most ants are wingless sterile workers, but the short-lived male has wings.

antelope. A hoofed ruminant of the Bovidae family, the antelope is most often found in Africa. It is included among the permitted edible animals in Deut. 14:5 (KJV wrongly, “wild ox”). Hunting of antelope, using net, is indicated in Isa. 51:20. In Deut. 14:5 KJV also uses the word “pygarg” (which means “white-rumped”) to translate a Hebrew word of uncertain meaning, but thought to refer either to a type of antelope known as the addax, a native of desert areas of northern Africa and the Sudan, or to the ibex. See deer; gazelle; ibex.

ape. The modern use of this word has more specific reference to a species excluding the monkey. The biblical record did not anticipate our contemporary classification when it recorded that King SOLOMON’s fleet journeyed every three years and returned with “gold, silver and ivory, and apes and baboons” (1 Ki. 10:22; 2 Chr. 9:21). It is likely that the rhesus monkey of India is meant by the word “ape.”

ass. See donkey.

baboon. The NIV translation of a Hebrew word that the KJV and other versions render as “peacock” (1 Ki. 10:22; 2 Chr. 9:21; peacocks were for generations an adornment of royal courts.) A large, short-tailed monkey, the baboon is found mainly in Africa, but the Arabian baboon was once considered sacred to the Egyptians. With its doglike appearance, the baboon lives in the wild in large social groups.

The donkey was a common mode of transportation and an important agricultural asset in antiquity.

badger. The species Meles meles is found throughout Europe and northern Asia, while the American badger, Taxidea taxus, is a smaller species. This mainly underground dweller is not found in Bible lands. An uncertain word for the coverings used in the TABERNACLE (Exod. 25:5 et al.) is rendered “badgers’ skins” by the KJV, but modern versions have such translations as “fine leather” (NRSV) and “goatskins” (RSV). Partly on the basis of a cognate Arabic term, many scholars believe that the reference is to a marine species, either the porpoise/dolphin (NASB, NEB, NJPS) or the dugong/sea cow (NIV; but TNIV, “durable leather”). In addition, the NRSV uses “rock badger” for another term that probably refers to the hyrax or coney (Lev. 11:5; cf. Ps. 104:18), which is similar in appearance to a rabbit, but for the absence of a tail and comparatively short legs and ears. The four-toed foot of the coney has earned it the description, “little cousin of the elephant.” Vegetarian, with molars similar to those of the rhinoceros, the coney has a jaw action reminiscent of an animal “chewing the cud,” though its digestive system does not allow for rumination. Although it is timid, the coney is a very active creature. It is found throughout the Middle East and much of Africa.

bald locust. See grasshopper.

bat. The Bible classifies bats as unclean (Lev. 11:19; Deut. 14:18), while Isaiah’s vision of the last days refers to people throwing their various idols made of precious metals to “rodents and bats” (Isa. 2:20). Although since biblical times rumor and legend have given the bat an unfavorable reputation, this only true flying mammal is wonderfully equipped with a natural radar system for locating its prey, usually insects. An estimated two thousand different types of bats are found throughout the world, most of them nocturnal in habit. Some tropical species are fruit-eating, but those found in Bible lands are usually insect-eating. Gregarious creatures—living in great numbers in remote caves, for example—bats are classified with birds in Scripture, as in the Leviticus and Deuteronomy references above.

bear. With a mainly vegetable diet, the bear could have been far more frequently encountered in an afforested Palestine than is sometimes supposed. The bear killed by DAVID (1 Sam. 17:34-37) was the Syrian brown bear, Ursus syriacus, the species referred to elsewhere in the OT. Reference is made to the ferocity of a female bear robbed of her cubs (2 Sam. 17:8), and a readiness to attack humans is indicated in 2 Ki. 2:23-25, when two bears mauled some forty-two youths who had been jeering at ELISHA’s bald head. A bald man was not a common sight, and the attitude of the youths seems to have been more threatening than mere banter. The NRSV refers to the attacking animals as beast. This generic description is derived from some thirteen Hebrew and five Greek words, providing the following criteria: (1) A mammal, not including humans and clearly different from birds and fishes and sometimes from reptiles also (cf. Gen. 1:30). (2) A wild, undomesticated animal, as in Lev. 26:22 and Isa. 13:21; 34:14 (“desert creatures”); Mk. 1:13 refers to the Lord’s time in the desert with “wild animals.” (3) Any of the “inferior” animals, in relation to the Mosaic law’s definition of ceremonially clean or unclean animals or beasts. (4) An APOCALYPTIC symbol of brute force, opposed to God’s rule and thereby to man’s best interests: in Dan. 7:3 four great beasts symbolize four successive world empires (Babylon, Medo-Persia, Greece, and Rome), while in Rev. 13:1-10 a beast coming out of the sea is identified as a world ruler with great, if temporary, authority; many take the beast that comes out of the earth (Rev. 13:11-18) to be ANTICHRIST. (5) The celestial beings that worship God (Rev. 4:6-9 et al.) are referred to as “beasts” by the KJV, but the Greek term is more appropriately rendered “living creatures.”

bee, hornet. The term hornet applies to several species of large social wasps belonging to the family Vespidae. Usually colored yellow and black, the hornet is a medium-sized insect deriving its diet from flies; its paper nest may be above or below ground level and, though basically beneficial to humans, the hornet possesses a severe sting and an evident determination to deliver it when stimulated to do so. Bees—the agents of pollination—have four wings. They may be social or solitary in behavior. Colonies function on what may be described as a division-of-labor system, with as many as fifty thousand members. Expansion is not unlimited, however, and swarms represent waves of emigration from the old hive (which remains in use) to a new home to be created elsewhere. HONEY is made from the nectar collected by bees in their pollination activity, developed in the honey sac of the workers, and stored in the wax cells of the honeycomb. Although there is little evidence that the ancient Hebrews cultivated bees for the manufacture of honey, the link was obvious enough. Bees would be plentiful in any land flowing with milk and honey, as indeed they always have been in Palestine. The abundance of flora in the land insured a large bee community. Biblical references speak of God’s use of the hornet in driving away the enemies of Israel (Exod. 23:28; Deut. 7:20; Josh. 24:12). On occasion, enemies of Israel were compared to a swarm of bees (e.g., Deut. 1:44; Ps. 118:12). Isaiah prophesies about the day when “the LORD will whistle...for bees from the land of Assyria” (Isa. 7:18). SAMSON is said to have found a swarm of bees and honey in a lion’s carcass, a discovery that shaped one of the most famous riddles in history (Jdg. 14:8-19).

behemoth. The graphic description of the behemoth in Job 40:15-24 is often thought to refer to the hippopotamus. Sometimes described as “the river horse of Africa,” the hippopotamus is certainly a herbivorous heavyweight, sometimes reaching four tons (three and one-half metric tons). Despite its ungainly, even lethargic appearance, it is versatile in terms of its environment. It can swim or float, sink to the bottom of the river bed, and run along on the bottom. The species Hippopotamus amphibius is found in Central Africa; the pygmy hippopotamus, Choeropsis liberiensis, is found in Liberia. Like the elephant, the hippopotamus is a source of ivory through the large tusks in its lower jaw. There was extensive trading in ivory in biblical times, with at least a dozen biblical references to its use. King SOLOMON overlaid his IVORY throne with gold (1 Ki. 10:18); King AHAB made great use of ivory in his palace. See also elephant.

camel, dromedary. The importance of the camel to life in Bible lands is confirmed by the many references (over sixty) to it in Scripture. As the original root word is almost identical in Hebrew and Arabic, one may conclude that the camel was well known to the patriarchs, long before the horse came into widespread use. Despite its reportedly grumbling disposition, the camel is well named the “ship of the desert,” with its marvelous adaptation to terrain and climate. It can travel long distances without the need to take in water and can withstand high temperatures while being surefooted in undulating terrain. Of further value to the desert-dweller is the camel’s long life, perhaps forty or fifty years.

Two basic forms are found: the single-humped dromedary and the slower-moving Bactrian camel with its two humps. The dromedary has longer legs and can move considerably faster. With a load that may be up to 400 pounds (182 kg.), the Bactrian camel may cover little more than 30 mi. (50 km.) in a single day; a dromedary, lightly burdened, can cover up to 150 mi. (240 km.). The two forms are thus complementary: the dromedary for personal travel or the fast conveying of important messages, the Bactrian camel for commerce and trade. Earlier translations, especially KJV, referred to dromedaries in 1 Ki. 4:28 and Esth. 8:10, but these are now translated as (swift) horses.

Camels grazing in the Negev during winter.

Camels feature prominently in OT narrative and are included among ABRAHAM'S acquisitions while in EGYPT (Gen. 12:16). When Abraham's servant went out to find a wife for ISAAC in NW MESOPOTAMIA (Gen. 24), the journey was accomplished with ten camels—the encounter with REBEKAH commencing as the camels were watered. Inventory of JACOB'S wealth includes camels (Gen. 30:43), as does that of JOB (Job 1:3; 42:12). The camel was ceremonially unclean (Lev. 11:4), though its milk was utilized (Gen. 32:15). Probably the most familiar biblical reference to the camel is that of Matt. 19:24, in which our Lord compares the difficulty of rich people securing entry into the kingdom of God with that of a camel making its way through the eye of a NEEDLE. Even in our technologically advanced age, the camel remains an important aspect of economy in Bible lands. Its flesh and milk are valued by some inhabitants, together with the use of its hair.

cattle. Cattle are mentioned in the first chapter of the Bible (“livestock” in NIV), symbolic of their importance to the well-being of the human race. Eleven Hebrew and two Greek words are translated to indicate cattle, the species descended from wild members of the family Bovidae, true ruminants with four-chambered stomachs for leisurely and thorough mastication.

Canaan was portrayed as a place of great prosperity, a place flowing with milk and honey—an abundance of cattle and good grazing ground. The patriarchs were accounted wealthy largely on the basis of their ownership of cattle, as in the case of Abraham (Gen. 13:2). Included in Jacob's gift for his brother Esau were “forty cows and ten bulls” (32:15) taken from his own substantial herds. Joseph's destiny was shaped by Pharaoh's dream of seven cows, sleek and fat, succeeded by seven cows, ugly and gaunt (41:1-7), symbolic of years of plenteous harvests followed by bad ones. Joseph's life as prime minister and his relationship to his formerly estranged brothers includes reference to their cattle (45:10; 46:34). Loss of cattle represented a catastrophe, yet the Egyptians did not heed Moses' warning (Exod. 9:1-7) of the destruction of their cattle as part of God's judgment. Later, Moses' defeat of the Midianites brought considerable "plunder" including 72,000 cattle (Num. 31:33).

Calves (young bulls or cows) were valued for food as well as sacrifice. A choice, tender calf was chosen by Abraham in entertaining his three mysterious visitors (Gen. 18:7). Visions given to Isaiah, Ezekiel, and John included the calf, and Jesus concluded the story of the prodigal's homecoming with a great feast—at which a calf was prepared as appropriate to the celebration. Calves used for sacrifice were usually one-year-old males, specified by Moses in Lev. 9:3, 8. Corruption of the sacrificial aspect resulted in occasional lapses into calf worship, similar to that followed by the Egyptians. Moses' anger at witnessing such behavior was so great that he broke the tablets of the law that were in his hands (Exod. 32:19).

Bulls were important in the lives of the people and for the nation, playing a part in the sin offerings for the congregation and in consecration of the Levites and the work of the priests. At times of national and religious revival in the OT, substantial numbers of bulls, as well as rams and lambs, were offered in sacrifice. King Solomon's temple included a molten sea of brass supported by twelve bulls cast in bronze (1 Ki. 7:25). David also made the bull a figure of threat in distress when, hunted by Saul, he wrote, "Many bulls surround me; / strong bulls of Bashan encircle me" (Ps. 22:12).

A heifer is a young cow. It was often used in sacrifice, or at the direct request of the Lord. Abraham killed a heifer on direct instruction (Gen. 15:9), and Samuel was instructed by the Lord to take a heifer for sacrifice. Religious ceremonial law involving the use of a heifer is restricted to Deut. 21:1-9. Ashes of the red heifer were used to remove ceremonial uncleanness, as in purification of the leper or of one who had touched a dead person (Num. 19:9). From the bright perspective of the Christian era, Paul encouraged converts from the Jewish tradition by referring to the fact that Christ's finished work superseded the old forms of sacrifice (Heb. 9:13).

During the creation, God made the livestock according to their kinds (Gen. 1:25). In Exod. 9 the word is used in referring to the disaster that would befall Egypt if Pharaoh refused to permit the Israelites to leave in peace: the plague would fall “on your livestock in the field—on your horses and donkeys and camels and on your cattle and sheep and goats.” In Num. 32 the word “livestock” is synonymous with “very large herds and flocks” (32:1).

Oxen, in addition to their use for food and in religious ceremonies, were important working members of the agricultural community. Six covered carts and twelve oxen were presented to the Lord’s work at the dedication of the tabernacle (Num. 7:3), to “be used in the work at the Tent of Meeting” (7:5). Property rights pertaining to oxen, as well as those relevant to other animals, were defined by the Lord (Exod. 22:1) in recognition of their importance to the well-being of the people. Jesus referred to the care owed to animals (including oxen) in his response to those who attacked him for healing on the Sabbath (Lk. 13:15). There were, even for the strict Sabbatarians, “animal rights” that were to be observed, whatever the day of the week.

Elisha was plowing with twelve yoke of oxen when Elijah encountered him (1 Ki. 19:19), just as Amos was following the plow when he heard the call of God. Although the ox is not especially regarded today as a religious symbol, it should be noted that Ezekiel’s vision of the four celestial living creatures referred to one having the face of an ox (Ezek. 1:10).

The “unicorn” (KJV at Num. 23:22; Deut. 33:17), distinct from the mythological figure of that name, was probably the extinct auroch (NIV and other versions, “wild ox”). When seen in profile, it gave the appearance of having one horn rather than two. A very powerful animal, standing some 6 ft. (2 m.) high, the auroch was once a familiar sight in Bible lands.

coral. Red coral, Corallium nobile, is native to the central and western Mediterranean and was greatly prized in ancient times. Its substance consists of the calcareous skeleton of a branching colony of polyps that remains long after the jellylike body of the polyp has perished and disappeared. Used in the making of jewelry, coral is mentioned in Job 28:18 in a celebrated passage on the value of wisdom. Ezekiel's lament concerning Tyre (Ezek. 27:16) includes reference to trade in coral, which might be expected of a coastal city.

creeping thing. This expression is used by the KJV and other versions to render a Hebrew term referring to small animals and reptiles (the NRSV translates this term "crawling things" in Hab. 1:14). The Genesis account lists only three general groups of land animals: livestock, wild animals, and creeping things (Gen. 1:24; NIV, "creatures that move along the ground"). The term may include most of the invertebrates. The KJV uses the English expression also in the NT to render a Greek word that is better translated "reptile" (Acts 10:12; 11:6; Rom. 1:23).

cricket. See grasshopper.

deer. The family of ruminant mammals, Cervidae, includes deer, elks, reindeer, moose, found worldwide except in Australia. The deer is included in the list of animals that may be eaten (Deut. 14:5) and also in Solomon's list of daily provisions (1 Ki. 4:23). As with other Bible animals, the special qualities of the deer are praised as models for human beings. David's song of praise compares his feet to those of the deer (2 Sam. 22:34). David begins Ps. 42 with a comparison of his soul's thirst for God with that of a deer panting for streams of water. The writer of Lamentations likens the plight of princes to that of deer without pasture (Lam. 1:6). Isaiah's description of the job of the redeemed anticipates the leaping of the lame like a deer (Isa. 35:6).

The doe, the female of the species (traditionally of the fallow deer), "bears beautiful fawns" (Gen. 49:21). Proverbs 5:19 compares the wife of one's youth with "a loving doe, a graceful deer." The Lord inquires of Job, "Do you watch when the doe bears her fawn?" (Job 39:1). The "hart" of KJV was either the red deer of Europe and Asia (Cervus elephus) or the Syrian deer (Cervus barbatus). The former is similar to the American elk, but smaller. Harts are stags or male deer, the word “stag” appearing only in the Song of Songs (Cant. 2:9, 17; 8:14), and then in a lyrical sense. A single hart may weigh as much as 300 lbs. (136 kg.). Every year the six-branched antlers are shed, to be replaced by new ones in due course. See also antelope; gazelle; ibex.

desert creature. A term used in Isaiah’s prophecies against Babylon (Isa. 13:21), Tyre (23:13), and Edom (34:14). Jeremiah’s prophecy against Babylon also refers to desert creatures (Jer. 50:39). No particular species is intended, and the description seemingly applies to a variety of wild creatures, great or small (though primarily the latter), that would be found in places remote from human habitation.

devourer. See grasshopper.

doe. See deer.

dog. Domesticated member of the Canidae family to which the wolf and jackal also belong. The Bible’s forty references to dogs are not complimentary to these UNCLEAN animals. Proverbs 26:11 reflects a contemporary opinion that dogs return to their own vomit. Their readiness to bark at people or animals is alluded to in Exod. 11:7, though here God declares that among the Israelites not a dog will bark at any man or animal. In NT times dogs—often strays—were regarded as nuisances. One licked the sores of the beggar named Lazarus (Lk. 16:21). Job’s reference to his sheep dogs (Job 30:1) suggests that good training could make even these despised animals useful, since he was hardly a man to take chances with his stock. Especially evocative is the Canaanite woman’s plea for help, met when she reminded the Lord that “even the dogs” were permitted to eat the crumbs from the master’s table (Matt. 15:26-27). The KJV and a few other versions use “greyhound” for a rare Hebrew word that possibly means “rooster” (Prov. 30:31).

donkey. This small mammal, genus Equus, with some similarity in appearance to a horse (though usually smaller), has served mankind for thousands of years. It is probably descended from the Abyssinian or Somali wild ass. Among its special characteristics are endurance and sure-footedness, though occasional stupidity is not unknown. Found wild in semidesert regions, the species includes the African and Asian varieties.

Abraham’s journey of testing, with his son Isaac, was made with a donkey (Gen. 22:3, 5). Balaam’s donkey was given the temporary power of speech in order to rebuke the foolish prophet (Num. 22:21-33). In a rhetorical question Job (Job 6:5) asks if a wild donkey would bray if preoccupied with good pasture. Donkeys were a fundamental part of the economy, and a person’s wealth was measured by the number he owned. Sometimes donkeys were acquired in battle as plunder, as when the Israelites captured some 61,000 from the Midianites (Num. 31:34). But Israelites were commanded neither to covet a donkey nor to attempt to plow with a donkey and an ox together (Deut. 5:21; 22:10).

Donkeys undertook heavy work on the farm but were used for personal transportation too. White donkeys were highly prized by their owners, who would in any case be careful of their choice of an animal for a long journey. Jesus' triumphal entry into Jerusalem, celebrated on Palm Sunday in the church calendar, fulfilled the prophecy of Zech. 9:9 as he came "riding on a donkey, on a colt, the foal of a donkey" (Matt. 21:2-7). The donkey did not then have the lowly status it has today but was an appropriate choice for a procession of importance.

The mule is the offspring of a male donkey and a horse mare, and is itself sterile. The Israelites were forbidden to breed mules under a general prohibition on mating different animals (Lev. 19:19), but mules were secured in the course of trading and were used for carrying goods and merchandise, as well as for personal transportation. King David reputedly introduced the use of the mule for riding. That mules might be urged to move quickly if required is indicated in 2 Sam. 13:29, where the king's sons mounted their mules and fled. Absalom was deserted by his mule when his head became caught in the branches of a thick oak (18:9), the mule plodding on while his master remained suspended in midair. Mules ridden by kings, officials, and army officers were chosen with care, but at the best of times the mule might prove unpredictable. In comparatively recent times itinerant preachers used mules as transportation to local engagements.

dragon. This English term is used in some Bible versions to render Hebrew tannîn H9490 (NIV, "monster") in passages that speak of cosmic combat (Job 7:12; Ps 74:13; Isa. 27:1; 57:9; Ezek. 29:3; 32:2; the Heb. word can also mean "snake," Exod. 7:9 et al.). See also Leviathan. In the book of Revelation it stands for Greek drakōn G1532 and designates SATAN (Rev. 12:3-17; 13:1-11; 16:13; 20:2). In a few passages, the KJV uses "dragons" to translate the similar-sounding term tanîm (pl. of tan H9478), which however means "jackals" (Job 30:29; Isa. 13:22; et al.). See jackal.

elephant. The elephant had many practical uses in ancient times, even in battle, as the books of 1 and 2 Maccabees confirm (1 Macc. 1:17 et al.). Some have thought that the elephant, with its instinctive grandeur, may better fit Job's description of behemoth (e.g., "his tail sways like a cedar" [Job 40:17] could possibly refer to the elephant's trunk).

fish. In Gen. 1, Adam is instructed to rule over the fish of the sea, as well as the rest of creation. Many references to fish and the means of catching them are found in the Scriptures. Later, the outline of a fish became symbolic in the early church. Specific species are not mentioned, though the striped mullet (Mugil cephalus) was well known in Bible times, found in the Mediterranean area, and the barbel—represented by various species—was almost certainly known too, being found from British waters eastward to the East Indies.

There is no doubt about the importance of fish in everyday diet. One of the judgments that befell Egypt was the destruction of the nation's fish stock, and during their sojourn in the desert the Israelites grieved for the good fish they had eaten in Egypt (Num. 11:5). The great fish that swallowed JONAH (Jon. 1:17) is not identified by species, though in popular parlance it is thought of as a "whale." Our Lord's miraculous feeding of the 5,000 involved use of five loaves and two fishes (Matt. 14:17). Significantly, the final chapter of John's gospel records Christ's resurrection appearance to the disciples as coinciding with a miraculous draught of fish, caught after the previously daunted fishermen let down their nets at his command (Jn. 21).

flea. Common throughout Bible lands, as elsewhere in the world, the flea is mentioned in 1 Sam. 24:14; 26:20. The flea is any of the Aphaniptera order of small, wingless insects possessing a flattened body and legs highly developed for leaping. An estimated 500 species of fleas present a threat as well as an irritant to mankind, as their bite can transmit disease, more particularly bubonic plague. Endemic typhus is also transmitted by fleas. David's rhetorical question in 1 Sam. 24:14 refers to the folly of pursuing a flea, while 1 Sam. 26:20 compares the task of looking for a flea with that of hunting a partridge in the mountains. With its natural agility and tiny size, the flea is difficult to catch. Some reportedly can jump 13 in. (33 cm.) horizontally and almost 8 in. (21 cm.) vertically.

fly. This widely occurring species includes not only the house fly, but the tsetse fly and the malaria-carrying mosquito. Flies may carry disease by germs on their body or by bloodsucking. True flies have a single pair of functional membranous wings, plus a pair of halteres, that is, small clublike appendages that by rapid movement in flight are the fly's gyro, or balance mechanism.

Ruination of Egypt by flies (Exod. 8:24) was one of God's judgments described (8:20-32) as the plague of flies, following the plague of gnats described in earlier verses. The flies were possibly mosquitoes. In addition to threats to health, flies could also ruin crops. Failure of the olive crop (Deut. 28:40) was due to the olive fly, a pest that deposits its eggs beneath the skin of the ripening olive. The maggot emerging from the egg destroys the fruit. See worm. Such loss is anticipated by Mic. 6:15 in speaking to an unrepentant

Israel, while Habakkuk also refers to the failure of the olive crop (Hab. 3:17), apparently through similar assault. The threat to Egypt prophesied by Jeremiah (Jer. 46:20) is described as “destruction” in KJV, but NIV renders the word as “gadfly”—a biting, pestering nuisance. Socrates was described as “the gadfly of Athens,” suggesting that the ancients were well aware of the gadfly’s persistent attacks.

The gnat, a sharp-biting member of the mosquito family, was used in one of the judgments on Egypt (Exod. 8:16-18), though the reference may be to some kind of sandfly with an especially painful sting. An alternative rendering of the Hebrew is “lice” (so KJV; see also Ps. 105:31). Jesus rebuked the teachers of the law for straining at a gnat but swallowing a camel (Matt. 23:24). Man’s insignificant status is emphasized in Job 25:6 as that of a maggot. In ancient times the fate of corpses, as of unguarded or unfresh food, was obvious enough. Isaiah’s prophecy against the king of Babylon (Isa. 14:11) refers to the presence of maggots in his grave. The narrative of the manna and quail in the wilderness (Exod. 16:20, 24) demonstrates that food could not be stored, except by the grace of God, as when it remained fresh over the Sabbath.

fox. The relatively few references in Scripture are to the common fox of Palestine, Vulpes vulgaris, a wild carnivore of the dog family, living usually on a diet of small animals and fruit, though its European relations may sometimes be found looking into trash cans during daylight hours as well as at night. This natural predator usually lives in burrows, the American red fox being a related species. Damage to vineyards by “the little foxes” (Cant. 2:15) may have been a reference to jackals rather than to foxes. Similarly the 300 foxes caught by Samson in order to pair them for raids on Philistine corn fields, with lit torches tied to their tails (Jdg. 15:4-5), may have been jackals, which would have been more readily caught. Tobiah the Ammonite poured scorn on the rebuilding of the wall of Jerusalem by suggesting that even the tread of a fox would break the stones (Neh. 4:3). The craftiness of the fox was emphasized by our Lord’s description of H_{EROD} Antipas (Lk. 13:32). See also jackal.

frog. Exodus 8 speaks of the plague of frogs, summoned by Aaron from their natural habitat of streams, canals, and ponds. References in Ps. 78:45 and 105:30 recall the plague, and as the frog had some cultic significance to the Egyptians the significance of the plague would not have been overlooked. A tailless amphibian of the order Anura, the frog was represented by two species in Egypt, toads by three. Revelation 16:13 tells of evil spirits with the appearance of frogs, possibly with the plague narrative in mind.

gazelle. Comprising about twelve species, gazelles are medium-sized antelopes inhabiting dry grasslands and desert (Deut. 12:15 et al.; the KJV renderings “roe” and “roebuck” are not correct). The Greek name (dorkas G1520, cf. Acts 9:36 and see DORCAS) is still found in the scientific name of Gazella dorkas, one of the two species found in W Palestine today. The other, much more common, is the Palestine gazelle (G. arabica); this is one of the smallest, standing just over 2 ft. (0.6 m.) at the shoulders. Gazelles are usually of pale brown or sandy color, often with a dark line along the side demarcating the almost white underparts. This provides good camouflage, but their main defense is speed, and the figurative passages outside SONG OF SOLOMON refer to this distinctive (e.g., 2 Sam. 2:18). In Song of Solomon the word is used as a symbol of grace and beauty (Cant. 2:9 et al.). The delicacy of the meat is indicated in Deut. 12:15, 22, coupled with that of the deer. Solomon's list of provisions included gazelles (1 Ki. 4:23). See also antelope; deer; ibex.

grasshopper, locust, cricket, palmerworm. Grasshoppers and locusts are included in the insect family Locustidae, itself part of the order Orthoptera, which includes crickets, katydids, cockroaches, mantids, and walking sticks as well. Grasshoppers are the most frequently mentioned insects in the Bible, and man is sometimes compared to them in terms of his insignificance before great enemies (Num. 13:3) or in the sight of God (Isa. 40:22). In Eccl. 12:5 the grasshopper's painful progress as he “drags himself along” is contained in a passage pointing to human mortality.

Locusts had significance beyond the natural order, often having been sent as a judgment from God (Exod. 10:4). Such visitations could be devastating, and even in our technological age, locust swarms can quickly denude an area of its vegetation. Most species of locust are nonmigratory, but some migrate in great swarms, traveling over great distances if necessary and proving themselves omnivorous consumers of all kinds of vegetation. Where natural food is lacking, they can become cannibalistic and carnivorous. The awesome sight and power of locusts depicted in Rev. 9:3, 7 is beyond anything yet known to human experience. The author of the book knew well the tradition of locusts as a form of judgment from God. Joel's description of utter devastation through a visitation by locusts (Joel 1:4) precedes a passage (2:1-11) in which locusts are described in terms of a great army (the various Heb. terms used in 1:4 and 2:25 are of uncertain meaning, but may refer to various phases of the migratory locust).

Locusts, however, were not without benefit to the human race and represented a useful diet for the poor—that is, in normal times. Edible locusts are listed in Lev. 11:21-22, while the TALMUD provides a description of edible locusts in order that readers could identify them. John the Baptist ate locusts and wild honey (Mk. 1:6), a diet that was not considered unusual by his contemporaries. One of the edible locusts is identified as “katydid” by NIV (Lev. 11:22; KJV and other versions, “bald locust”); this is an insect of the long-horned grasshopper family found in the tropics and in the eastern USA. The same passage refers to the “cricket” (KJV, “beetle”), referring to an insect of the Gryllidae family related to the grasshopper and locust, but with long antennae and an apparent liking for human company.

horse. Most references concern the use of the horse in warfare, though some religious significance is attached to this animal, as in the visions of Rev. 9:17-19; 6:1-8. Domesticated on the plains of Asia more than 4,000 years ago, the horse—a herbivorous hoofed mammal, Equus caballus—was used in the military campaigns of ALEXANDER THE GREAT and was probably introduced into the American continent by conquerors from Europe. Scripture refers to the beneficial use of the horse among its more than 150 references. Joseph exchanged food for horses and for other animals during the great famine in Egypt (Gen. 47:17). A very large company of chariots and horses accompanied the body of Jacob to his last resting place (50:9).

Although horses, with other livestock, perished under the judgment of God (Exod. 9:3), Pharaoh secured further war horses and chariots in order to pursue the departing Israelites (14:23), though the Lord swept them into the sea (14:27-28). David's victories included the acquisition of large numbers of chariots, charioteers, and horses (2 Sam. 8:4; 10:18). Solomon's accumulation of chariots and horses (1 Ki. 10:26) involved importation of horses from Egypt and Kue at considerable expense that, in view of his drift away from his former moral convictions, would have affronted the prophets (Isa. 31).

Isaiah refers to the agricultural use of the horse, that is, for plowing (Isa. 28:24-29). The use of horsemen to convey messages (2 Ki. 9:18) and for royal processions (Esth. 6:8-11) was familiar to the ancients. Ending of the idolatrous use of horses and chariots dedicated to the sun is reported in 2 Ki. 23:11 as Josiah renewed the covenant with God. The sun religion, like the horses, was probably imported from Egypt.

As the stallion is a horse used for breeding purposes, its use in the OT is aligned to the sinful behavior of the people. Jeremiah likens his careless contemporaries to well-fed, lusty stallions considering their neighbors' wives (Jer. 5:8; cf. 50:11). Stallions were large and strong and were used as symbols of enemy power, as in the Lord's declaration that the whole land trembled at the neighing of the enemy's stallions (8:16). The steed is a spirited horse especially chosen for battle, probably for its speed and daring. Deborah's song recites the galloping of the mighty steeds (Jdg. 5:22). We learn that the Israelites used steeds for battle against Egypt (Jer. 46:4) and against the Philistines (47:3).

horse leech. See leech.

hyena. This carnivorous animal allied to the dog was common in Palestine. Isaiah's prophecy against Babylon speaks of hyenas howling in the strongholds of the fallen city (Isa. 13:22)—a fate reserved for the citadels of Edom (34:14). Jeremiah speaks in similar vein against Babylon (Jer. 50:39). The hyena, like the jackal, was associated with desolation and with dwelling among ruins.

ibex. This term may be generally applied to any of several species of mountain goats or wild goats, with their horns curving backward. Included in the list of permitted edible animals (Deut. 14:5; KJV, "pygarg"), the variety known to the people was that of the Nubian ibex, occurring in Palestine as well as in Egypt and Arabia.

jackal. The usual Hebrew term for "jackal" is tan H9478 (always pl. and used in figurative contexts), but šû ʿāl H8785, which most often refers to the fox, can be used with the same meaning (Lam. 5:18; Ezek. 13:4), as can perhaps other terms (cf. Isa. 13:21 NIV; NRSV, "howling creatures"). Jackals are related to foxes and even more closely to domestic dogs. The Palestine species is the oriental jackal (Canis aureus), with head and body 24-30 in. in length, and a tail of up to 12 in.; its color is a dirty yellow mixed with reds and blacks. Jackals usually go about in packs of up to a dozen, feeding mostly at night, and it is interesting that in all cases the Hebrew word is plural. The jackal is basically a scavenger, living rather as a hyena in game country, where it can clean up after the larger carnivores have killed. In contrast, the fox is more solitary, feeding on a wide range of vegetable matter and small animals, and taking less refuse than the jackal. Several times it is prophesied that lands (e.g., Babylon, Jer. 51:37; Edom, Mal. 1:3) shall become the haunt of jackals, which are almost a symbol of desolation (more than half of the passages have this theme). To the casual observer foxes and jackals look very similar, and it is possible that they were often given the same name.

katydid. See grasshopper.

leech. This term occurs only once in the Bible (Prov. 30:15; KJV, “horseleach”), though the meaning of the Hebrew word is uncertain. The leech is of the class of annelids (Hirudinea) living in water or swampy territory. A sucker at either end of its segmented body fixes onto the body of an animal or human, sucking blood. A natural anticoagulant (hirudin) keeps the blood liquid. At one time the use of leeches was thought to have beneficial properties, and a type of leech, Hirudo medicinalis, was well known to physicians of past generations.

leopard. The reference to “mountain haunts of the leopards” (Cant. 4:8) reminds us that these awesome animals were well known in Palestine, as well as in the mountainous regions of Lebanon, at the time of Solomon’s reign. A mammal of the cat family (Panthera pardus) with a black-spotted yellowish coat, the leopard is today found only in Africa and Asia. Its ferocity and intelligence were apparent to dwellers in Bible lands, though, as with the rest of the wayward creation, transformation was promised in the messianic age (Isa. 11:6). Jeremiah regarded the leopard as an instrument of God’s judgment on the wicked (Jer. 5:6), and in a later passage raised the rhetorical question whether a leopard could change his spots (13:23). Several references to the leopard appear in the Bible, including the figurative usage in Dan. 7:6 and Rev. 13:2.

Leviathan. That the Leviathan was strong and probably very large is confirmed by the question put in Job 41:1. The NIV footnote suggests a hippopotamus or elephant, neither of which would be pulled in with a fishhook. Job's cursing (3:8) refers to those who are ready to rouse Leviathan. Crushing the heads of Leviathan (Ps. 74:14) immediately follows reference to the destruction of monsters of the sea. This may echo the song of praise to God following the safe journey of the Israelites through the Red Sea. Crocodiles or other threatening creatures would have been rendered harmless to the Israelites, as the pursuing Egyptians were. Not all allusions to Leviathan concern threatening species, however; Ps. 104:26 refers to its frolicking in the sea. Probably this is the sperm whale, which has been seen in the Mediterranean and which surfaces suddenly before submerging, giving the impression of play activity.

lion. A large carnivore of the cat family (Panthera leo) today found in Africa S of the Sahara and in NW India. In biblical times the lion was far more widespread and was found even in Greece as well as in Asia Minor, Iran, Iraq, and Syria. A social animal, the lion is a member of a group known as a pride and will live in isolation only when old or wounded—conditions in which it is most dangerous to humans. In usual circumstances the lion will not attack them, though “man-eaters” have been known, becoming part of local legends and hunters’ tales.

Daniel's testing in the lions' den (Dan. 6) demonstrates an oriental ruler's use of lions as a means of execution, but it is more importantly an example of protection by the Almighty. Although a wayward prophet was killed by a lion (1 Ki. 13:24-28), this event is told in terms of God's judgment rather than any initiative by a roving lion. A young lion attacked Samson but was speedily dealt with (Jdg. 14:5-6), and David also killed a lion (1 Sam. 17:34-37), both triumphs being ascribed to God's protection.

The power, speed, and ferocity of the lion were compared to those of Israel's foes; and throughout Scripture the lion is used as a symbol of might. Jacob compared his son Judah to a lion (Gen. 49:9), and the Lord Jesus Christ is often called the Lion of the Tribe of Judah (or the Lion of Judah). Daniel described Babylon as a winged lion—a religious symbol used in the ancient pagan world—while Peter warned his contemporaries that the devil prowls around like a roaring lion (1 Pet. 5:8).

lioness. Ezekiel's lament on the princes of Israel refers to the lioness as their mother (Ezek. 19:2), whose cubs might be scattered (Job 4:11). Joel's prophecy (Joel 1:6) speaks of the fangs of the lioness as a characteristic of an invading nation.

lizard. A reptile of the suborder Lacertila, with four legs usually, but some species—like the slow-worm—have none. With scaly skin and long body and tail, the lizard may be small or comparatively large. The species includes the iguana, monitor, and gecko. Leviticus 11:29-30 classifies as unclean any kind of great lizard, the gecko, monitor lizard (NRSV, “land crocodile”), wall lizard, skink (NRSV, “sand lizard”), and chameleon. The most common lizard in Palestine was the Agama stellio, part of a family of dragon lizards. These reptiles are active during the daylight hours, possess crests and dewlaps, and somewhat resemble the iguanids.

The chameleon is any member of the Chamaeleontidae family of reptiles, resembling lizards, but having the interesting characteristic of controlling its color to match its environment. This reptile catches insects by its tongue. Its eyes are able to operate independently of each other. The gecko is a harmless lizard, a member of the Gekkonidae family, found in tropical or subtropical regions. Some geckos are able to move readily on a vertical wall or other smooth surface, using a natural adhesive pad on their feet. Their diet consists of insects. An interesting feature is the gecko's ability to grow a new tail when its old one is broken off by a predator or overinquisitive human being.

The great lizard, another unclean animal, is possibly the Arabian thorny-tailed, color-changing lizard (Uromastix spinipes) common in Egypt and also found in Syria and Arabia. The monitor lizard is a member of the Varanidae family of large carnivorous lizards and is found in Africa, Asia, and Australia, its largest species being the Komodo dragon. It is recognized additionally by its elongated snout, long neck, and forked tongue. The Nile monitor, Varanus niloticus, is the largest four-footed reptile in Africa, with the exception of the crocodile, and may attain a length of 6 ft. (almost 2 m.).

A reptile called the sand lizard, Lacerta agilis, is found in sandy regions in central and western Europe. The NIV identifies the Hebrew word with the skink, some 600 species of which represent the largest family of lizards. Snakelike and found most often in desert regions, their features include a scaly tongue and elongated body, with limbs either of small size or absent altogether. The skink mentioned in Lev. 11:30 was the common skink (Scincus scincus) of Africa. The wall lizard is included in the list of unclean reptiles, but its precise species is uncertain. Small lizards or reptiles living close to human habitation would be commonly found on walls.

moth, butterfly. Both belong to the order Lepidoptera, the moth being distinguished from the butterfly by its nocturnal activity, its threadlike antenna, and wings that wrap around its body (most butterflies fold their wings vertically). Butterflies have two pairs of wings, and most have eye-catching color displays, using their proboscis to suck nectar. America has more than 9,000 species of moths and butterflies. Throughout the world some species have either disappeared or seem to be on the verge of extinction. To counter this problem, at least in part, new work in butterfly farming is occurring.

The moth of Scripture is usually the clothes moth of the large family, Tineidae. Human frailty is like that of the moth (Job 4:19), a sentiment echoed in Job 13:28, where a person's own wasting away is likened to that of a garment eaten by moths (or moth larvae). Psalm 39:11 and Isa. 50:9; 51:8 offer similar reflections. Man's habitation is akin to that of a moth's cocoon (Job 27:18). Insignificant and fragile though it is (Hos. 5:12), the clothes moth is no less able to destroy those transient possessions that people set their hearts on (Matt. 6:19). It lays its eggs at night on wool, fur, feathers, or other materials; when the larvae hatch about ten days later, they immediately start eating the host material.

Silkworms, larvae of the Chinese silkworm moth (Bombyx mori), produce the natural fiber of silk garments known to the ancients and worn by the most wealthy. Silk is included among the cargoes of merchants that in the apocalyptic vision of Rev. 18:12 no one buys any more. Raw silk is derived from the cocoon of larvae that pupate in thick oval, white or yellow silken cocoons. As larvae are easily reared on a commercial basis—if one has the appropriate skills and resources—silk has been a source of wealth to many traders over the centuries. Even in our age of modern fibers, silk remains a symbol of luxury and status.

A lepidopterous larva was probably the “worm” that chewed the vine under which Jonah sat (Jon. 4:7), since such larvae have voracious appetites. Most references to “worm” in Scripture refer to the larvae of flies, generally known as “maggots” (see fly). The rendering “caterpillar” (larva of a butterfly or moth) is used by the NRSV and other versions in some passages (e.g., 1 Ki. 8:37; Isa. 33:4), but the meaning of the Hebrew is uncertain.

pig. The Mosaic law includes the pig (KJV, “swine”) among the unclean animal (Lev. 11:7; Deut. 14:8), but it seems to have been present in considerable numbers in areas of Palestine inhabited primarily by non-Jews. Destruction of a large herd occurred when evil spirits entered them following Jesus’ healing of a demon-possessed man (Mk. 5:1-17; Lk. 8:27-39). The parable of the prodigal son demonstrated the desperate plight of the young man in becoming a pig-feeder (Lk. 15:15), employment degrading to any self-respecting Israelite. Jesus advised against throwing pearls before pigs (Matt. 7:6), as they are likely to be trampled underfoot by the undiscerning creatures. Solomon compared a beautiful woman devoid of discretion with a gold ring in a pig’s snout (Prov. 11:22). Peter speaks of a washed sow returning to wallow in the mud (2 Pet. 2:22).

The domestic pig, member of the Suidae family of hoofed animals, was probably developed from the wild boar of the Orient, with widespread domestication for food and other uses. The sole reference to “boar” is in Ps. 80:13, where the ravaging actions of wild boars are indicated. With its enlarged canine tusk, the wild boar could cause damage to property or crops and inflict wounds on the unsuspecting.

rabbit. The rabbit was classified as unclean (Lev. 11:6; Deut. 14:7) because it did not have a split hoof. The KJV and other versions have the word “hare,” because some think rabbits did not exist in Palestine at the time of the Pentateuch’s composition. At least two species of hare were thought to be present, both members of the order Lagomorpha, though the hare was originally classified as a rodent. Rabbits live in burrows and are born hairless and blind, whereas hares do not use burrows and are born with a coat of hair and with effective vision. The hare also has longer ears and hind legs. Like the rabbit, it is found extensively in Europe.

ram. See sheep.

rat. Like mice, rats followed human exploitation and habitation of previously inhabited areas. Rats are mentioned in the list of unclean animals (Lev. 11:29) and in the narrative of the plague on the Philistines (1 Sam. 6). Isaiah prophesied against those who had followed heathen practices of eating pig's flesh and rats (Isa. 66:17). In these passages the KJV and other versions have "mouse" (or "mice"), one of the many long-tailed rodents of the Muridae family.

red heifer. See cattle.

reptile. See snake.

rock badger. See badger.

rodent. This term is used by the NIV in Isa. 2:20 to translate a Hebrew text of uncertain meaning. Here the KJV and other versions read "moles" (the KJV uses "mole" also at Lev. 11:30 for a word that prob. refers to the chameleon).

roe. See gazelle.

scorpion. Found in the vast, thirsty land of the wilderness journey, the scorpion (Deut. 8:15) is notorious for its venomous sting delivered from its long, segmented tail. The name applies to any of the order Scorpionidae of arachnids of tropical or hot regions. Large pincers at the front of the body, as well as the curving, sting-laden tail, give the scorpion a distinctive and formidable appearance. Rehoboam unwisely threatened to scourge the people with scorpions (1 Ki. 12:11, 14). Followers of Jesus were given authority to tread on scorpions (Lk. 10:19), an authority related to the work of the kingdom of God. In Lk. 11:12 Jesus mentions the scorpion in a rhetorical question.

sea cow. The NIV rendering of a Hebrew term of uncertain meaning (Exod. 25:5 et al.). See discussion under badger.

serpent. See snake.

sheep. This animal is the one most often mentioned in Scripture, perhaps because of its importance in the economy of the age. The most familiar picture of Jesus Christ is probably that of the Good Shepherd; and the most easily recalled parable may be that of the lost sheep.

A ruminant mammal of the Ovidae family, sheep come in many breeds today, some with special advantages for their wool, others for meat. For centuries sheep have been largely domesticated. In Bible lands sheep were kept for their milk more than for their meat. Religious ceremonies included the sacrifice of sheep, and rams' horns were used to summon the congregation. Job's wealth consisted of flocks and herds, including 7,000 sheep (Job 1:3), which were all destroyed by a divinely permitted catastrophe (1:16). The life of shepherds and their flocks is reported in several places (Gen. 29; Exod. 22:1, 4; Num. 31:36).

Sheep were watered at midday, and the well became an important meeting place. Need for water and at least reasonable pasture shaped the shepherd's way of life. His care for his sheep is reflected in Ps. 23. The Bible often refers to bad or good shepherds in terms of their care not merely of sheep but also of their fellow human beings in the eyes of God. Women also served as shepherds, as in the case of seven daughters of the priest of Midian (Exod. 2:16).

Several Hebrew words are translated "ewe," that is, a female sheep. Seven ewe lambs were presented by Abraham to Abimelech (Gen. 21:28-29) to seal the treaty made at Beersheba. Jacob's gift to Esau included two hundred ewes and twenty rams (32:14). Use of a female lamb without defect was permitted as a sin offering (Lev. 4:32). Nathan's parable (2 Sam. 12:3) referred to a man whose "one ewe lamb" was taken from him by a rich and greedy man.

The list of unclean foods in Deut. 14:5 includes "mountain sheep" (KJV incorrectly, "chamois"), a ruminant mammal halfway between a goat and an antelope, found usually in mountainous regions of Europe and SW Asia. The ram, the horned male sheep, was used in breeding. Although most biblical references are to the ram's role in priestly ceremony or sacrifice (Gen. 15:9; Exod. 29; Num. 7), the skipping action of the ram is poetically portrayed by the psalmist (Ps. 114).

slug, snail. The slug is herbivorous and often creates considerable damage to plant life. Like the snail, the slug is a gastropod mollusc, moving on a muscular foot with a natural form of lubrication that appears as a trail of slime. The snail has a spiral protective shell and exists in varying species in salt water, fresh water, and on land. The most common species is that of the garden snail (Helix aspera), to be distinguished from the edible variety (Helix pomatia). The action of the slug or snail is described in Ps. 58:8 (in Lev. 11:30 the KJV also has "snail" for what is prob. a kind of lizard).

snake. Member of the suborder Ophidia of limbless, elongated reptiles, with scaly skin, a forked tongue, and a mouth that opens sufficiently wide to swallow prey (e.g., rodents or eggs). Poisonous snakes carry venom in their salivary glands, delivered through the fangs and acting either on the central nervous system to paralyze or on cells to cause hemorrhages. The snake has special significance in the OT. One of the signs of authority given to Moses was that of his staff turning into a snake when thrown to the ground (Exod. 3:3-4). Venomous snakes invaded the Israelite camp when the people complained about God and Moses. Those affected were healed when they looked at an emblem of a snake cast in bronze by Moses (Num. 21). The symbol of the snake on the staff is today an emblem of healing used by the medical profession.

The proper translation of various Hebrew terms for poisonous snakes is not certain. Jeremiah speaks of “vipers that cannot be charmed” as one of God’s judgments (Jer. 8:17)—an allusion perhaps to the so-called charming of snakes that are actually not “charmed” but controlled more subtly by their masters. Job 20:16 refers to the destruction of the wicked by the fangs of the adder, just as Isa. 59:5 anticipates the infliction of vipers on the wicked. In modern language the viper and adder are the same species, but the scriptural reference is probably to the northern viper, Vipera berus, found also in Africa. Ps. 91:13 assures the godly that they will tread on the cobra and the serpent without any harm, through divine protection. The cobra was doubtless the Egyptian cobra, used throughout Egypt as a religious symbol and attaining a length of more than 8 ft. (2.5 m.). It is found along the coast of N and E Africa, with a subspecies occurring in the Arabian peninsula. Where “cockatrice” is used by the KJV and other translations (Isa. 11:8; 14:29; 59:5; Jer. 8:17), the word was probably associated with a poisonous reptile generally, rather than with specific species.

In the millennial age the cobra and the viper will be the harmless companions of children (Isa. 11:8)—further confirmation of the reconciliation of human beings with the natural order following the creation’s renewal. Isaiah, then, does not anticipate a banishing of such reptiles but their transformation. His prophecy against the Philistines (14:29) involves a viper. The use of the word “asp” in some translations denotes a poisonous reptile, that is, the Egyptian cobra.

Solomon’s wisdom led him to teach about reptiles, as well as mammals, birds, and fish (1 Ki. 4:33). Peter’s remarkable vision included reptiles to be eaten, confirming that nothing God had made could now be called unclean (Acts 10:12; 11:6), symbolizing the now-clean Gentiles in the new covenant.

No single species is identified in the word serpent, but the meaning is that of a crafty and very dangerous creature, albeit a persuasive one. It was a symbol of evil (Gen. 3), but God was able to pierce it (Job 26:13). Paul referred to the cunning of the serpent (2 Cor. 11:3).

spider. A member of the order Araneida of arachnids, many species of which are armed with poison glands for killing prey. The black widow spider and the Australian funnel-web spider are especially dangerous to humans, unlike most species. The spider’s abdomen has two or more pairs of spinnerets that produce the silk thread for webs and cocoons. One who forgets God has hope as fragile as a spider’s web (Job 8:14) and finds his own fabrications useless (Isa. 59:5). Proverbs 30:28 refers to the presence of spiders in kings’ palaces, though NIV here has the word “lizard” rather than “spider.”

sponge. Known scientifically as Porifera, the sponge is a class of the sessile aquatic animal family. A sponge filled with wine vinegar was offered to Jesus on the cross (Matt. 27:48; Mk. 15:36). John notes that a stalk of the hyssop plant was used to lift the sponge to the Lord's lips (Jn. 19:29). Such use of a sponge to provide liquid refreshment was common in biblical times. The sponge would absorb the wine or water in a vessel, then was usually squeezed into the upturned mouth of the user.

stag. See deer.

stallion, steed. See horse.

steer. See cattle.

swine. See pig.

tortoise. KJV rendering of a word that refers to some kind of lizard (Lev. 11:29).

unicorn. See cattle.

weasel. Classed as unclean (Lev. 11:29), the weasel is a small, carnivorous mammal, genus Mustela, resembling a small ermine. Its diet consists of small rodents and its distribution is apparently worldwide.

whale. The KJV translates as "whale" those words rendered by NIV as "great creatures" (Gen. 1:21), "monster of the deep" (Job 7:12), and "monster in the seas" (Ezek. 32:2). The KJV and other versions also use "whale" with reference to the fish that swallowed Jonah (Matt. 12:40; but "great fish" in Jon. 1:17). The whale, a large marine fishlike mammal (order Cetacea), is one of nature's most amazing wonders. One group includes the toothed whales, another the whalebone whales in which teeth are not present, using instead thin, parallel whalebone plates to extract plankton from sea water. Toothed whales include porpoises, dolphins, and sperm whales. Whalebone whales include the blue whale, largest of all mammals.

wild ass. This English term (NIV, "wild donkey") is the usual translation of Hebrew pere ׀ H7230 (Gen. 16:12 et al.), but the name preferred for the biblical or Asian wild ass is onager (Equus onager). It is rightly classed as "half-ass," belonging to a species distinct from the true wild ass of N Africa (E. asinus, from which the donkey is derived). The onager once had a wide distribution, divided into several geographical types, extending from the borders of Europe and Palestine in the W through to India and Mongolia. JOB describes its habitat precisely: "the steppe for its home, the salt land for its dwelling place" (Job 39:6).

wolf. A carnivorous, intelligent mammal, genus Canis, the wolf usually hunts in packs and will readily attack more powerful animals. The N American timber or grey wolf is a subspecies of the European Canis lupus. The behavior of this animal has fascinated many writers. Mentioned thirteen times in Scripture, the wolf would have been a familiar threat to shepherds, especially in Palestine with its forest terrain. False prophets were described as “ferocious wolves” in sheep’s clothing (Matt. 7:15), while Gen. 49:27 declares the tribe of Benjamin to be like the ravenous wolf. Isaiah’s anticipation of the millennium includes the wolf living with the lamb (Isa. 11:6; 65:25).

worm. In every mention of the worm in Scripture, the reference is to the maggot rather than to the earthworm, which is apparently nowhere mentioned in the Bible. Maggots are hatched from eggs laid by flies such as the flesh fly (of the family Sarcophagidae) or the blow fly (of the family Calliphoridae). See fly. The blow fly is well known even to our hygienic times, being the large and noisy fly with blue or green iridescent body. Such flies lay their eggs in the bodies of dead animals, in effect accelerating the decaying process, as the maggots feed on the corpse during their larval period. In that sense they serve a beneficial purpose in the natural process. The presence of worms on the human body, alive (Job 7:5) or dead (Job 17:14; 21:26; Isa. 14:11; 66:24), was a further reminder of the transient nature of life. The condition of hell, warned Jesus, was one in which the worm does not die (Mk. 9:48). See also moth.

Herod AGRIPPA I’s death (Acts 12:23) is described as caused by his being eaten by worms. This demise was probably accomplished by the screw worm, as the adult female fly lays eggs not only on decaying animal matter, but in wounds and sores and even in the nostrils and ears of people and cattle. In severe attacks, in the ancient world especially, infection of the nasal passages by larvae could produce collapse of the septum and palate. Herod’s affliction is not, however, regarded as accidental, but as a judgment arising from his pride and his aspiration to divine status.

anise. See PLANTS.

anklet. An ornament for the ankles, consisting of metal or glass spangles, worn by women. Sometimes anklets were linked together by ankle chains (Isa. 3:20). See also DRESS.

Anna. an’uh (Gk. Anna or Hanna G483, the equivalent of Heb. ḥannâ H2839, “grace”). Daughter of Phanuel of the tribe of ASHER. Widowed after seven years of marriage, she became a prophetess. At the age of eighty-four, when the infant Jesus was brought into the temple to be dedicated, she recognized and proclaimed him as the MESSIAH (Lk. 2:36-38).

Annas. an'úhs (Gk. Hannas G484, shortened form of Hananos = ḥānanyā H2863, "Yahweh is gracious"). A high PRIEST of the Jews from A.D. 6 to 15, and who as long as he lived was the virtual head of the priestly party in Jerusalem. In his thirty-seventh year, he was appointed to this office by QUIRINIUS, governor of SYRIA. He was deposed c. A.D. 15 by Valerius Gratus, governor of JUDEA. His five sons became high priests, and he was father-in-law of CAIAPHAS (Jn. 18:13). Annas and Caiaphas are described as the high priests when JOHN THE BAPTIST began his public ministry (Lk. 3:2), perhaps because as family head Annas was the most influential priest and still bore the title. Therefore when Jesus was arrested, he was led first to Annas (Jn. 18:13), and only later was sent bound to Caiaphas (18:24). Similarly, Annas is called the high priest in Acts 4:6 when Peter and John were arrested, although Caiaphas was probably the actual high priest.

annunciation. This term, though not found in Scripture, is used in theology with reference to the supernatural announcement made by the angel GABRIEL to Mary that she would conceive and give birth (Lk. 1:26-38). (The term is sometimes applied also to two other announcements: the one of Jesus' birth made to Joseph, and the one of JOHN THE BAPTIST's birth made to ZECHARIAH. Moreover, the name Annunciation is used of the festival held on March 25, nine months before Christmas Day, to celebrate the visit of Gabriel to the Virgin Mary.)

Mary, a virgin, was betrothed but not yet married to JOSEPH (see MARY, MOTHER OF JESUS). They lived in NAZARETH, a town of GALILEE. In his message Gabriel assured the frightened Mary that she was highly favored and that the Lord was with her. The young lady was overcome with surprise and fear, not only by the presence of the angel, but also by his message. Gabriel, however, assured her that she had no need to fear. God had chosen her to be the mother of a unique boy: "He will be great and will be called the Son of the Most High" (Lk. 1:32). Her son would be God's Son, and, like David, he would reign over the people of God; yet, unlike David's kingdom, his would be an everlasting kingdom. When Mary asked how this could occur since she was not yet married, Gabriel explained that she would conceive through the direct agency of the HOLY SPIRIT. Like her relative ELIZABETH (who had conceived in her old age and was carrying John the Baptist), she would know the power of God in her life. Overwhelmed by this amazing message, Mary submitted to the will of the Lord, and the angel left her.

anoint. To apply OIL to a person or thing, a practice common in the ANE. Anointing was of three kinds: ordinary, sacred, and medical. Ordinary anointing with scented oils was a common operation (Ruth 3:3; Ps. 104:15; Prov. 27:9). It was discontinued during a time of mourning (2 Sam. 14:2; Dan. 10:3; Matt. 6:17). Guests were anointed as a mark of respect (Ps. 23:5; Lk. 7:46). The dead were prepared for burial by anointing (Mk. 14:8; 16:1). The leather of shields was rubbed with oil to keep it from cracking (Isa. 21:5), but this could be called also a sacred anointing—a consecration to the war in the name of whatever god was invoked to bless the battle.

The purpose of sacred anointing was to dedicate the thing or person to God. JACOB anointed the stone he had used for a pillow at BETHEL (Gen. 28:18). The TABERNACLE and its furniture were anointed (Exod. 30:22-29). Prophets (1 Ki. 19:16; 1 Chr. 16:22), priests (Exod. 28:41; 29:7; Lev. 8:12, 30), and kings (Saul—1 Sam. 9:16; 10:1; David—1 Sam. 16:1, 12-13; 2 Sam. 2:7; Solomon—1 Ki. 1:34; Jehu—1 Ki. 19:16) were anointed, the oil symbolizing the HOLY SPIRIT. They were thus set apart and empowered for a particular work in the service of God. “The Lord’s anointed” was the common term for a theocratic king (1 Sam. 12:3; Lam. 4:20).

The terms MESSIAH and CHRIST mean “the anointed one” (respectively from the Heb. and Gk. verbs meaning “to anoint,” māšaḥ H5417 and chriō G5987). In the OT, Messiah is twice used of the coming Redeemer (Ps. 2:2; Dan. 9:25-26). Jesus was anointed with the Holy Spirit at his baptism (Jn. 1:32-33), marking him as the Messiah of the OT (Lk. 4:18, 21; Acts 9:22; 17:2-3; 18:5, 28). His disciples, through union with him, are anointed with the Holy Spirit too (2 Cor. 1:21; 1 Jn. 2:20).

Medical anointing, not necessarily with oil, was customary for the sick and wounded (Isa. 1:6; Lk. 10:34). Mark 6:13 and Jas. 5:14 speak of the use of anointing oil by disciples of Jesus.

ant. See ANIMALS.

antediluvians. People who lived before the FLOOD (“deluge”). They apparently were familiar with AGRICULTURE (ADAM kept the garden of EDEN, Gen. 2:15; Adam and ABEL tilled the ground, 3:17-19; 4:2), botany (thorns and thistles, 3:18; cypress wood, 6:14; fig tree, 3:7; pitch, 6:14), metallurgy (bronze and iron tools, 4:22), architecture (CAIN built a city, 4:17), and music (harp and flute, 4:21). The hints of government seem to be patriarchal and possibly city states. With regard to religion, SACRIFICES appear to have been established (4:4; 8:20), and NOAH was familiar with “clean” animals (7:2; 8:20). Of the lineage of SETH and ENOSH it is said, “At that time men began to call on the name of the LORD” (4:26). A contrast with the descendants of Cain, who presumably did not call upon God, seems to be implied.

antelope. See ANIMALS.

Anthothijah. an´thoh-thi´juh (Heb. ʿantōtiyyâ H6746, possibly “belonging to Anathoth”). KJV Antothijah. Son of Shashak and descendant of BENJAMIN (1 Chr. 8:24); he is included among the clan chiefs who lived in Jerusalem (v. 28).

anthropology. (1) The study of human beings in relation to history, geography, culture, and so forth. (2) The biblical and theological doctrine regarding the origin, nature, and destiny of human beings. See HUMAN NATURE.

anthropomorphism. A figure of speech whereby the deity is referred to in terms of human bodily parts or human passions. To speak of God’s hands, eyes, anger, or even love is to speak anthropomorphically. Some anthropomorphisms picture God in bodily form and others refer to God as possessing various aspects of human personality. In a sense, it can be argued that only those of the first type are true anthropomorphisms. They speak as if God possessed bodily form, which of course he does not. The second type of anthropomorphism may be called factual description and not a figure of speech at all (though the term anthropopathism is sometimes used specifically with reference to the ascription of human feeling to God). It is the Christian teaching that the living and true God is actually possessed of these personal characteristics, which human beings recognize in themselves as attributes of personality.

antichrist. This word derives directly from the Greek compound antichristos G532, meaning literally “against Christ” or “instead of Christ”; thus it may refer either to an enemy of CHRIST or to one who usurps Christ’s name and rights. The word is found in only four verses (1 Jn. 2:18, 22; 4:3; 2 Jn. 7), but the idea conveyed by it appears throughout Scripture. It is evident from the way John and Paul refer to the antichrists or the Antichrist that they took for granted a tradition well known at the time (2 Thess. 2:6, “you know”; 1 Jn. 4:3, “you have heard”).

The OT gives evidence of a belief in a hostile person or power who in the end time will bring an attack against God’s people—an attack that will be crushed by the Lord or his MESSIAH. Psalm 2 gives a picture of the rebellion of the world kingdoms “against the LORD and against his Anointed One.” The same sort of contest is described in Ezek. 38-39 and in Zech. 12-14. In the book of Daniel there are vivid descriptions of the Antichrist that find their echo in the writings of the apostles (cf. 2 Thess. 2:4 with Dan. 11:36-37; and cf. Rev. 13:1-8 with Dan. 7:8, 20-21; 8:24; 11:28, 30).

In his eschatological discourse Christ warns against the “false Christs” and the “false prophets” who would lead astray, if possible, even the elect (Matt. 24:24; Mk. 13:22). In Matt. 24:15 he refers to “the abomination that causes desolation” spoken of by Daniel.

In 2 Thess. 2:1-12 PAUL gives us a very full description of the working of Antichrist, under the name of “the man of lawlessness,” in which he draws on the language and imagery of the OT. The Thessalonian Christians seem to have been under the erroneous impression that the “day of the Lord” was at hand, and Paul told them that before that day could come two things would have to take place: an apostasy and the revelation of the man of lawlessness, the son of perdition. The “secret power of lawlessness” (2:7) is already at work, he said, but is held in check by some restraining person or power. With the removal of this restraining force, the man of lawlessness is revealed. He will oppose and exalt himself above God and will actually sit in the temple of God and claim to be God. With satanic power he will perform signs and deceitful wonders, bringing great deception to people who reject God’s truth. In spite of his extraordinary power, however, “the Lord Jesus will overthrow [him] with the breath of his mouth” (2:8).

In 1 Jn. 2:18 JOHN THE APOSTLE shows that the coming of the Antichrist was an event generally expected by the church. It is apparent, however, that he is more concerned about directing the attention of Christians to anti-Christian forces already at work (“even now many antichrists have come”). He says that teachers of erroneous views of the person of Christ (evidently referring to GNOSTICISM) are antichrists (1 Jn. 2:22; 4:3; 2 Jn. 7).

In the book of Revelation, the beast of Rev. 17:8 recalls the horned beast of Dan. 7-8. He claims and is accorded divine homage and makes war on God’s people. For a period of three and one-half years he rules over the earth and is finally destroyed by the Lord in a great battle. With his defeat the contest of good and evil comes to its final decision.

Antilebanon. Also Anti-Lebanon. See LEBANON.

antimony. A hard, brittle, and lustrous metallic element (symbol Sb). The term is used twice for Hebrew pûk H7037 in the NRSV and some other versions (1 Chr. 29:2; Isa. 54:11). In both of these instances, the NIV translates “turquoise” (see MINERALS); some believe that the meaning is “hard cement.” The Hebrew word occurs also in two other contexts, where it seems to refer to (black) eye paint (2 Ki. 9:30; Jer. 4:30).

antinomianism. an'ti-noh'mee-uh-niz-uhm. This term (from Gk. anti G505, “against,” and nomos G3795, “law”) refers to a theology that interprets biblical teaching, particularly that of PAUL, to mean that Christians are so wholly in GRACE that they have no obligation to keep the LAW. Because salvation does not come through works but through grace, it is held, moral effort can be discounted. Paul found that this kind of heresy had crept into the church (1 Cor. 5-6). Others had chosen to misrepresent his own teaching on grace (Rom. 3:8), and he pointed out the absurdity of the charge (6:1, 15). From the first century to our own day, some individuals or groups have sought to combine the spiritual life with moral license, but Scripture leaves no doubt that the new life in Christ means death to the old evil desires (Gal. 5:24).

Antioch. an'tee-ok (Gk. Antiocheia G522). (1) Antioch of SYRIA was built in 301 B.C. by Seleucus I (Nicator) and became the capital of the SELEUCID empire, which had been the Asiatic part of the vast empire of ALEXANDER THE GREAT. It was the greatest of sixteen Antiochs he founded in honor of his father ANTIOCHUS. The city was a great commercial center. Caravan roads converged on it from the E, and its situation on the ORONTES River, 15 navigable mi. (24 km.) from the Mediterranean, made it readily available to ships as well. Antioch was set in a broad and fertile valley, shielded by majestic snow-covered mountains, and was called “Antioch the Beautiful and the Golden.” In 65 B.C. the Romans took the city and made it the capital of the Roman province of Syria. Seleucid kings and early Roman emperors extended and adorned the city until it became the third largest in the empire (after ROME and ALEXANDRIA), with a population in the first century A.D. of about 500,000. A cosmopolitan city from its foundation, its inhabitants included many Jews, who were given privileges similar to those of the Greeks. Its citizens were a vigorous and aggressive race, famous for their commercial aptitude, their licentiousness, and their biting wit.

Antioch in Pisidia and Syria.

Byzantine church ruins in Pisidian Antioch; beneath them lie the remnants of an ancient synagogue.

Antioch has an important place in the early history of Christianity. One of the original deacons of the apostolic church was NICOLAS, a proselyte of Antioch (Acts 6:5). The first Gentile church, the mother of all the others, was founded there. Many fugitive Christians, scattered at the death of STEPHEN, went to Antioch and inaugurated a new era by preaching not only to the Hellenist Jews but to “Greeks also” (11:20). The Jerusalem church sent BARNABAS to assist in the work; after laboring there for a while Barnabas summoned PAUL from TARSUS to assist him. After they had worked there for a year, they were sent with relief to the famine-stricken saints in Jerusalem. The disciples were called Christians first in Antioch (11:19-26), a designation probably coming from the populace, who were well known for their invention of nicknames. The church at Antioch sent Paul and Barnabas out on their missionary work (13:1-3), and they reported to this church on their return from the first journey (14:26-27; cf. also 18:22 after the second journey). The Antiochene Christians submitted the question of the CIRCUMCISION of Gentile converts to a council at Jerusalem (Acts 15), winning for the church at large a great victory over Judean narrowness.

After NT times, Antioch gave rise to a school of thought distinguished by literal interpretation of the Scriptures; its best-known representative was John Chrysostom (c. A.D. 345-407). During the third and fourth centuries, ten church councils were held there. The city was taken and destroyed in 538 by the Persians, rebuilt by the Roman emperor Justinian shortly afterward, and in 635 was taken by the Muslims, by whom it has since, except for a brief period, been retained. Today the city is called Antakya, with a population of about 150,000.

In 1916 an announcement was made that Arabs in or near Antioch had found what has come to be known as “The Chalice of Antioch.” It is a plain silver cup surrounded by an outer shell decorated with vines and with the figures of Christ and the apostles; it is set on a solid silver base. The cup was vigorously claimed to be the Holy Grail, used by Jesus at the Last Supper, the figures on the shell interpreted as first-century portraits. But the authenticity of the chalice has been called into question. Serious scholars have virtually proved that at most the cup is a piece of early Christian silver from the fourth or fifth century and had nothing to do with the Last Supper in Jerusalem.

(2) Antioch of PISIDIA, a town in southern ASIA MINOR, was also founded by Seleucus I and named in honor of his father Antiochus. It was in fact situated in PHRYGIA, but not far from Pisidia, and was therefore called Antioch of Pisidia and Pisidian Antioch to distinguish it from another city of the same name in Phrygia. In 25 B.C. it became a part of the Roman province of GALATIA. Soon after, it was made the capital of southern Galatia, and a Roman colony. The Romans made it a strong garrison center to hold down the surrounding wild tribes. Paul and Barnabas preached in the synagogue there on their first missionary journey; but the Jews, jealous of the many Gentile converts that were made, drove the missionaries from the city to ICONIUM and followed them even to LYSTRA (Acts 13:14—14:19). On Paul’s return journey he revisited Antioch to establish the disciples and probably returned on his second (16:6) and third journeys as well (18:23).

Antiochus. an-ti’uh-kuhs (Gk. Antiochos, “opposer, withstander”). A favorite name of the Seleucid kings of SYRIA from 280 B.C. onward. The most significant rulers who bore that name were the following:

(1) Antiochus III (the Great), sixth ruler of the dynasty (223-187 B.C.). By his victory over the Egyptians in 198 Syria gained control of Palestine. He was decisively defeated by the Romans in 190 and thereby lost control over ASIA MINOR. He was murdered by a mob while plundering a temple.

(2) Antiochus IV (Epiphanes), son of Antiochus III and eighth ruler of the dynasty (175-163 B.C.). In his attempt to hellenize the Jews he had a pig sacrificed on the altar in Jerusalem, forbade circumcision, and destroyed all the OT books he could find. These outrages involved him in the Maccabean war in which the Syrian armies were repeatedly defeated by the brilliant Judas MACCABEE (1 Macc. 1:10-64; 3:1-11; et al.).

(3) Antiochus V (Eupator), son of Antiochus IV. He reigned as a minor for two years and then was assassinated.

Antipas. an'tee-puhs (Gk. Antipas G525, possibly short form of Antipatros). (1) The name of several men in the Herodian family, especially a son of Herod the Great who was made tetrarch of GALILEE and PEREA. See HEROD.

(2) In the letter to the church in PERGAMUM, a Christian named Antipas is described as “my faithful witness, who was put to death in your city” (Rev. 2:13). Nothing more is known about him, although later legends arose concerning his martyrdom.

Antipater. See HEROD.

Antipatris. an-tip'uh-tris (Gk. Antipatris G526). The NT city that occupied the site of the OT PHILISTINE town of APHEK, in the Plain of SHARON (1 Sam. 4:1; 29:1). The new city was built by HEROD the Great in 9 B.C. He named it Antipatris in honor of his father Antipater, who had been procurator of JUDEA under Julius CAESAR. The modern name of the ruins is Ras el-Ain. There is only one mention of Antipatris in Scripture, when PAUL was taken following his arrest in Jerusalem from that city to CAESAREA (Acts 23:31). It marked the NW limit of JUDEA.

Antonia, Tower of. A great fortress rebuilt by HEROD the Great for the defense of the TEMPLE area and located at its NW corner. He named it in honor of Mark Antony, his patron. A Roman legion was stationed in the castle to guard against excesses on the part of the people. The Tower of Antonia may have been the site of the PRAETORIUM, where Jesus was tried by PILATE. When PAUL was seized in the temple by the Jews, he was carried to this castle (“the barracks”), from the stairs of which he addressed the people (Acts 21:34-40).

Antothijah. an´toh-thi´juh. See ANTHOTHIJAH.

Antothite. an´tuh-thit. See ANATHOTH (PLACE).

Anub. ay´nuhb (Heb. ʿānûb H6707, meaning uncertain). Son of Koz and descendant of JUDAH (1 Chr. 4:8). There may be a connection between Anub and the town of ANAB.

anvil. The Hebrew term pa ʿam H7193, which has various uses, is found with the meaning “anvil” only in Isa. 41:7, where reference is made to the custom of workmen encouraging one another with their work. The metal anvil was driven into a block of wood or into the ground to keep it stable. It was used by various artificers: blacksmiths, silversmiths, tinsmiths, and shoemakers.

anxiety. See FEAR.

ape. See ANIMALS.

Apelles. uh-pel´eez (Gk. Apellēs G593). A Christian in ROME to whom PAUL sent greetings, referring to him as one who was “approved in Christ” (Rom. 16:10). The reason for the approval is not given, but it is clear that Apelles had been tested and found faithful. The name was a common one among Jews at Rome.

Apharsachite, Apharsathchite, Apharsite. uh-fahr'suh-kit, uh-fahr'-suth-kit, uh-fahr'sit (Aram. ʾāparsēkāy H10061, ʾāparsatkāy H10062, ʾāpārsāy H10060). These terms in the KJV are transliterations of Aramaic words in Ezra 4:9; 5:6; 6:6. They refer to people listed among the signers of a letter in which complaint is made to the Persian rulers against the Jewish rebuilding of the temple. The first two terms are probably variant forms of Old Persian loanwords meaning “investigator” or, more generally, “official.” The third term possibly has the same meaning, but some believe that it should be translated “Persian” (cf. NIV).

Aphek. ay'fek (Heb. ʾāpēq H707 [ʾāpîq in Jdg. 1:31], perhaps “stream-bed” or “fortress”). A place name that appears in widely scattered areas of Palestine. (1) A city of the tribal inheritance of ASHER taken from the Canaanites (Josh. 19:30; Jdg. 1:31 [KJV and other versions, “Aphik”]). The tribe was not able to drive out its inhabitants so they dwelt among them. The city was strategically located on the coastal highway connecting PHOENICIA and EGYPT. It is usually identified with Tell Kurdaneh, near the sources of the River Naʿaman on the Plain of ACCO, 3 mi. (5 km.) inland from the Bay of Haifa.

(2) A site located on the N boundary of the Canaanite territory adjoining “the region of the Amorites” (Josh. 13:4). This Aphek is probably to be identified with modern Afqa (ancient Aphaca) in LEBANON, SE of Jebeil (biblical GEBAL).

(3) One of an important chain of cities on the Plain of SHARON (“level country” or “forested region”). It is to be identified with Tell Ras el-ʿAin at the source of the Yarkon, just NE of JOPPA. Its king was slain by JOSHUA and the Israelites during the conquest of Canaan (Josh. 12:18). The town is elsewhere associated with the PHILISTINES (1 Sam. 4:1; 29:1). In NT times, HEROD the Great built ANTIPATRIS on this site.

(4) A city in the N TRANSJORDAN district of BASHAN. It was near here that BEN-HADAD I and II, the Aramean rulers, were defeated by the Israelites (1 Ki. 20:26-34; 2 Ki. 13:14-25). Some have identified this city with two distinct sites near the E shore of the Sea of Galilee: Fiḡ (Upper Aphek) and ʿEn-Gev (Lower Aphek).

Aphekah. uh-fee'kuh (Heb. ʾāpēqâ H708, perhaps “stream-bed” or “fortress”). One of the cities listed as part of a district of JUDAH (Josh. 15:53). It should probably be identified with Khirbet el-Ḥadab, some 4 mi. (6 km.) SW of HEBRON.

Aphiah. uh-fi'uh (Heb. ʾāpîaḥ H688, perhaps “large forehead” or “sooty”). A Benjamite who was one of SAUL’s ancestors (1 Sam. 9:1).

Aphik. See APHEK.

Aphrah. See BETH OPHRAH.

Aphses. See HAPPIZEZ.

Apiru. See HABIRU.

Apis. ay'pis (Gk. Apis). A fertility god (see FERTILITY CULTS) in the form of a living bull, worshiped by the ancient Egyptians in MEMPHIS (where he was associated with Ptah, a creator god, and with OSIRIS, god of the dead). Some have suggested that the Apis bull inspired the CALF WORSHIP of the Israelites (at Mount Sinai, Exod. 32:4-35, and under JEROBOAM, 1 Ki. 12:28-29). According to some scholars, this god is mentioned at Jer. 46:15 (LXX 26:15), “Why has Apis fled?” (thus NRSV). Such a rendering is based on the SEPTUAGINT, which evidently interpreted the Hebrew verb nishḥap (“was swept away”; NIV, “laid low”) as two words, nās ḥap (“fled Apis”).

Apocalypse. uh-pok'uh-lips'. Alternate name for the book of Revelation. See APOCALYPTIC LITERATURE; REVELATION, BOOK OF.

apocalyptic literature. A type of Jewish (and subsequently Christian) religious writing that developed during the intertestamental period and had its roots in OT prophecy. The word apocalyptic derives from Greek apokalypsis G637 (“uncovering, disclosure, revelation”) and is applied to these writings because they contain alleged revelation of the secret purposes of God, the end of the world, and the establishment of God’s kingdom on earth. The same Greek word is translated “revelation” in Rev. 1:1.

After the days of the postexilic PROPHETS, God no longer spoke to Israel through the living voice of inspired prophecy. The prophetic forecasts of the coming of God’s kingdom and the salvation of Israel had not been fulfilled. Instead of God’s kingdom, a succession of evil kingdoms ruled over Israel: Medo-Persia, Greece, and finally Rome. Evil reigned supreme. The hope of God's kingdom grew dim. God no longer offered words of comfort and salvation to his people.

The apocalypses were written to meet this religious need. Following the pattern of canonical Daniel (see DANIEL, BOOK OF), various unknown authors wrote alleged revelations of God's purposes that explained present evils, comforted Israel in her sufferings and afflictions, and gave fresh assurances that God's kingdom would shortly appear. See ESCHATOLOGY. Many modern critics place Daniel in these times, but there are valid reasons for an earlier date.

The outstanding apocalypses in the first two centuries B.C. are 1 Enoch (or Ethiopic Enoch), a composite book that is notable for its description of the heavenly SON OF MAN; Jubilees, an alleged revelation to MOSES of the history of the world from creation to the end; and the Assumption of Moses. A work known as either 2 Esdras or 4 Ezra (see APOCRYPHA) was written after the fall of Jerusalem in A.D. 70 and reflects that tragedy; the same is true of the Apocalypse of Baruch. The apocalypse entitled 2 Enoch or Slavonic Enoch is of uncertain date. Other apocalyptic writings have been discovered among the DEAD SEA SCROLLS.

Some additional documents are usually included in the discussion of apocalyptic literature although they are not, properly speaking, apocalypses. The Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs (from the 2nd cent. B.C., but with substantial Christian additions) imitate OT predictive prophecy and contain important eschatological materials. The seventeenth and eighteenth Psalms of Solomon, first century B.C., portray the hope of the coming of the Lord's Anointed to establish God's kingdom. The Sibylline Oracles, which follow the pattern of Greek oracular literature, also contain eschatological passages.

Certain characteristics mark these apocalypses. (1) Revelation. They describe alleged revelations of God's purposes given through the media of dreams, visions, or journeys to heaven by which the seer learns the secrets of God's world and the future. (2) Imitation. These writings seldom embody any genuine subjective visionary experiences. Their "revelations" have become a literary form imitating the visions of the true prophets in a thinly veiled literary fiction. (3) Pseudonymity. These books, although actually written close to NT times, are usually attributed to some OT saint who lived long ago. Pseudonymity was used as a means of validating the message of these authors to their own generation. Since God was no longer speaking through the spirit of prophecy, no one could speak in his own name or directly in the name of the Lord. Instead, the apocalyptists placed their "revelations" in the mouths of OT saints. (4) Symbolism. These works employ an elaborate symbolism, similar to that appearing in Daniel, as a means of conveying their predictions of the future. (5) Pseudo-predictive. The authors take their stand in the distant past and rewrite history under the guise of prophecy down to their own day when the end of the world and the kingdom of God were expected shortly to come.

There are distinct similarities but even more important differences between canonical and noncanonical apocalypses. The visions of Daniel provide the archetype that the later apocalypses imitate, and the Revelation of John records visions given to the apostle in similar symbolic forms. Both Daniel and the Revelation contain revelations conveyed through symbolism; but they differ from noncanonical apocalypses in that they are genuine experiences rather than imitative literary works, are not pseudonymous, and do not rewrite history under the guise of prophecy.

The importance of these apocalyptic writings is that they reveal first-century Jewish ideas about God, evil, and history, and they disclose Jewish hopes for the future and the coming of God's kingdom. They show us what such terms as the "kingdom of God," "Messiah," and the "Son of Man" meant to first-century Jews to whom our Lord addressed his gospel of the kingdom.

Apocrypha. Interspersed among the canonical books of the OT in the Latin Vulgate Bible, and thus also in Roman Catholic versions, are certain additional books and parts of books that were first part of the SEPTUAGINT. It is to these that Protestant usage generally assigns the term Apocrypha, indicating that they are not to be regarded as authoritative or canonical (the Gk. adjective apokryphos G649, "hidden," was used originally as a literary term with regard to books considered unsuitable for public reading because of their esoteric content). When these books are included in Protestant versions, they are usually grouped together as fifteen separate books between the OT and the NT. (See also APOCRYPHAL NEW TESTAMENT.)

At the Council of Trent (A.D. 1546) the Roman Catholic Church received as canonical the additional materials in the Vulgate (except for 1 and 2 Esdras and the Prayer of Manasseh) and designated them deuterocanonical, that is, officially accepted as part of the canon on a second or later occasion. That decision was made in contradiction of the best tradition of even the Roman Church itself. It was a reaction to the Reformers, who recognized as divinely inspired and as their infallible rule of faith and practice only those books that were in the canon of the Jews, the group of books that Protestants believe were sanctioned by the Lord Jesus Christ. See CANONICITY. The books that are part of the Apocrypha are the following.

1 Esdras (called 3 Esdras in post-Trentian editions of the Vulgate, where the canonical Ezra and Nehemiah are called 1 and 2 Esdras respectively). Except for the story of the wisdom contest (1 Esd. 3:1—5:6), the contents are a version of the history narrated in 2 Chr. 35:1—36:23, the book of Ezra, and Neh. 7:73—8:12, embracing the period from JOSIAH's Passover to EZRA's reformation. Nothing is known of the author except that he produced it some time before JOSEPHUS, who in his Antiquities strangely prefers it to the canonical record.

2 Esdras (called 4 Esdras in the Vulgate; usually referred to as 4 Ezra). Some call it Apocalyptic Esdras because the central kernel (chs. 3-14) presents seven revelations allegedly given to Ezra in exile, several in visionary form and of largely eschatological import. To this original composed by an unknown Jew, probably near the end of the first century A.D., and later translated into Greek, Christian authors subsequently added some material (chs. 1-2, 15-16). The Jewish original offers its apocalyptic prospects as an answer to the theodicy problem (God's goodness in relation to the evil in the world), acutely posed for Judaism by the fall of Jerusalem in A.D. 70. The Christian addition assigns the casting off of Israel in favor of the Gentiles to Israel's APOSTASY.

Tobit. This romantic tale with religious didactic purpose was composed at least as early as the second century B.C. It is named after its hero, who is pictured as an eighth-century-B.C. Naphtalite carried into exile to NINEVEH. His story becomes entwined with that of his kinswoman Sarah, exiled in Ecbatana. The tragedies of both are remedied through the adventures of Tobit's son Tobias, whom Sarah marries, and all under the angel Raphael's supervision. Prayer, fasting, and almsgiving are stressed but unfortunately in a context of autosoterism (salvation by one's own efforts).

Judith. Like Tobit, this is Jewish historical fiction with a religious moral. It includes elements from two centuries (7th to 5th B.C.) of Israelite fortunes, not always in their proper historical order or setting. Using Jael-like tactics (Jdg. 4:14-22), Judith, a beautiful Jewish woman, saves the besieged town of Bethulia by slaying Holofernes, the enemy commander. Possibly the grotesque anachronisms are intentional; Luther interpreted it as an allegory of Israel's triumphing, under God, over her enemies. The book evidences appreciation of Israel's peculiar theocratic privileges but magnifies a ceremonial piety that would exceed the requirements of Moses. Some think it was composed to inspire zeal during the Maccabean revolt in the second century B.C.

Additions to Esther. The canonical Hebrew text of Esther has 163 verses; the Greek version has 270. The additional material is divided into seven sections and is distributed at the appropriate points throughout the narrative in this way: (1) before Esth. 1:1; (2) after 3:13; (3) and (4) after 7:17; (5) after 8:12; (6) after 10:3. Inasmuch as genuine Esther contains explicit references neither to God nor traditional Jewish religious practices other than fasting (see ESTHER, BOOK OF), it is significant that prayers of MORDECAI and ESTHER and also frequent mention of God are included in the additions. The Greek additions contradict details of canonical Esther and contain other obviously fictional elements. They appeared as an appendix to Esther in the Vulgate and this fusion of disconnected fragments constitutes a "book" in the Apocrypha.

Wisdom of Solomon. The LXX uses this title; the Vulgate, Liber Sapientiae. The author, who identifies himself with the figure of SOLOMON, apparently was an Alexandrian Jew writing in Greek in the first century B.C. or A.D. (some, however, judge the book to be of composite authorship). The influence of Greek philosophy is evidenced by the dependence on logos speculations in the treatment of personified Wisdom and by the acceptance of various pagan teachings: the creation of the world out of preexistent matter; the preexistence of souls; the impedimentary character of the body; perhaps too, the doctrine of emanation. In tracing Wisdom's government of history from Adam to Moses, numerous fanciful and false embellishments of the biblical record are included.

Ecclesiasticus. This second representative of the wisdom style of literature in the Apocrypha is also called, after its author, The Wisdom of Jesus ben Sira(ch). Written in Hebrew, 180 B.C. or earlier, it was translated into Greek for the Alexandrian Jews by the author's grandson c. 130. Ben Sira, apparently a professional scribe and teacher, patterned his work after the style of Proverbs. In it he expounds the nature of wisdom, applying its counsel to all areas of social and religious life. Though often reflecting sentiments of the canonical books, Ben Sira also echoes the ethical motivations of pagan wisdom literature. Moreover, he contradicts the biblical teaching that salvation is through faith alone by writing that almsgiving makes atonement for sin (Sir. 3:30).

Baruch. This pseudepigraphic book was evidently written by several authors at different times. The first part, Bar. 1:1—3:8, dated by some as early as the third century B.C., was probably written in Hebrew, as was possibly also the remainder, which is of later origin. Composed in a prophetic prose, this section purports to have been produced by JEREMIAH's secretary in Babylonian exile and sent to Jerusalem. It is a confession of national sin (in imitation of Daniel's), petitioning for God's mercy. Actually Baruch went to Egypt with Jeremiah, and there is no evidence that he was ever in Babylonia. Beginning at 3:9, the book is poetry. In 3:9—4:4 Israel is recalled to wisdom. In 4:5—5:9 Jerusalem laments her exiled children, but assurances of restoration are offered.

Epistle of Jeremiah (Jeremy). In some Greek and Syriac MSS this "epistle" is found after Lamentations; in others and in the Vulgate it is attached to Baruch and therefore appears as a sixth chapter of Baruch in most English editions. A superscription describes it as an epistle sent by Jeremiah to certain captives about to be led into Babylon (cf. Jer. 29). The true author is unknown and the original language uncertain. A baffling reference to "seven generations" of exile (contrast Jer. 29:10) has figured in speculation as to its date, which was no later than the second century B.C. It ridicules the foolishness of idol worship as represented by the worship of the god B_{EL} and so served as a warning to the Jews and as an accusation against Gentiles.

The Prayer of Azariah and the Song of the Three Children. This is one of the three sections (the other two being Susanna and Bel and the Dragon) added to the canonical Daniel. Between Dan. 3:23 and 3:24 the Greek and Latin versions insert: (1) a prayer of national confession with supplication for deliverance, which Daniel's friend Azariah (cf. Dan. 1:7) offers while he and his two companions are in the fiery furnace; (2) a psalm of praise (dependent on Ps. 148 and 136), uttered by the three; and (3) a narrative framework containing details not warranted by the genuine Daniel. This section is itself perhaps of composite authorship and was probably written in Hebrew.

Susanna. In the Vulgate, Susanna follows canonical Daniel as ch. 13; in Greek MSS it is prefixed to ch. 1. Two crucial word plays at the climax of the tale suggest it was composed in Greek but there is no consensus. Its origin and date are unknown; ALEXANDRIA about 100 B.C. is one theory. The story relates how two Israelite elders in Babylon, their lustful advances having been resisted by Susanna, falsely accuse her of adultery. But young Daniel effects Susanna's deliverance and the elders' doom by ensnaring them in contradictory testimony.

Bel and the Dragon. These fables ridiculing heathenism appear as ch. 13 of Daniel in the Greek and as ch. 14 in the Vulgate. They date from the first or second century B.C.; their original language is uncertain. Daniel plays detective to expose to CYRUS the fraud of the priests who clandestinely consumed the food-offerings of Bel (i.e., MARDUK). After destroying Bel, Daniel concocts a recipe that explodes a sacred dragon. Consigned to a den of lions, Daniel is miraculously fed and delivered.

The Prayer of Manasseh. According to 2 Chr. 33:11-13, when the wicked King MANASSEH had been carried into exile, he repented and God restored him to Jerusalem. Verses 18-19 refer to sources that contained Manasseh's prayer of repentance. The origin of the apocryphal book that purports to be that prayer is unknown; possibly it was produced in Palestine a century or two before Christ. It contains confession of sin and petition for forgiveness. The view is expressed that certain sinless men need no repentance. In Greek MSS the prayer appears in the Odes attached to the Psalter. In the Vulgate it came to be placed after 2 Chronicles.

1 Maccabees. Beginning with the accession of ANTIOCHUS Epiphanes (176 B.C.), the history of the Jewish struggle for religious-political liberation is traced to the death of Simon (136 B.C.). This apocryphal book is our most valuable historical source for that period. It narrates the exploits of the priest Mattathias and of his sons—Judas, Jonathan, and Simon—who successively led the Hasidim to remarkable victories. Judas was given the surname MACCABEE, afterward applied to his brothers and four books (1-4 Maccabees). The author wrote in Hebrew and was a contemporary of John Hyrcanus, son and successor of Simon. According to one theory, the last three chapters were added and the whole reedited after the destruction of the temple.

2 Maccabees. Independent of 1 Maccabees, this history partly overlaps it, extending from the last year of Seleucus IV (176 B.C.) to the defeat of Nicanor by Judas (161). The author states that he has epitomized the (now lost) five-volume history of Jason of Cyrene (1 Macc. 2:23). Both Jason and the Epitomist wrote in Greek. Suggested dates for 2 Maccabees vary from c. 120 B.C. to the early first century A.D. Two introductory letters (1:1—2:18) were perhaps lacking in the first edition. While there are various errors in 1 Maccabees, legendary exaggeration is characteristic of the moralizing in 2 Maccabees. It also includes doctrinal errors such as the propriety of prayers for the dead. (The books of 3 and 4 Maccabees are quite different in character; though included in the LXX, they are not accepted as part of the Apocrypha. See also PSEUDEPIGRAPHIA.)

Apocryphal New Testament. The collective title given to a number of documents, ranging in date from the early Christian centuries to the Middle Ages and even into modern times, all similar in form to the NT books (gospels, epistles, acts, apocalypses) but never finally received into the canon. The Apocalypse of Peter and the Acts of Paul did enjoy a measure of temporary or local CANONICITY, but no others attained even to this level of recognition. It should be noted that whereas the books of the OT APOCRYPHA are recognized in certain branches of the church, with the NT Apocrypha this is not the case. Aside from the two books above, none of these works has ever been accorded recognition or authority in any branch of the Christian tradition. It is important to emphasize this point, since it is sometimes suggested that the canonical NT is the result of an arbitrary selection by the church from a large mass of documents that had an equal claim to recognition. Comparison of the apocryphal NT with the canonical books is in itself sufficient to reveal the inferiority of the former.

Broadly speaking, the NT Apocrypha may be divided into two groups: books intended to propagate a particular kind of teaching, usually heretical; and those intended to make good the deficiencies, as they appeared to a later age, in the canonical reports of the activity of Jesus and his apostles. The significance of this literature does not lie in its content, often merely legendary and fictitious, but in the insights it provides into the popular Christianity of the early centuries, which was often on an entirely different level from the theological speculation and theorizing of the early Fathers. Authentic early historical tradition is scarcely to be expected, and is likely to be found only in the earliest documents, if at all. These writings provide a useful standard of comparison with the canonical books and show the difference between documents still controlled by authentic recollection of events and those in which inventive imagination has been given free rein.

Apocryphal gospels. These may be grouped under three categories. (1) Early texts that unfortunately are for the most part fragmentary. For example, a Gospel of the Egyptians is quoted by Clement of Alexandria, who did not entirely disapprove of it; but since only his quotations are available, it is difficult to assess its character. It may have been the gospel of Gentile Christians in Egypt, while the Gospel of the Hebrews was that of the Jewish Christians; it appears to have been rather more Gnostic in character, and certainly was used by some Gnostic sects. A fragment of the Gospel of Peter, previously known only from references in Eusebius, was found in 1886; it is of interest for its original and unorthodox account of the passion and resurrection of Jesus.

(2) The Gnostic gospels and related documents. A common feature of these is their presentation of revelations given to the disciples by the risen Christ in the period between the resurrection and the ascension, a period extended by the Gnostics from 40 to 550 days (or 18 months). The scene is usually a mountain, often the Mount of Olives; one or more of the disciples meet with Jesus, ply him with questions, and receive his answers. Occasionally there is some kind of visionary experience. Some of these works (such as the Apocryphon of John) are associated with the names of particular disciples; others, like the Sophia Jesu Christi or the Pistis Sophia, have more general titles. An important group is formed by the three “gospels” found at NAG HAMMADI, the Gospel of Truth (a meditation on the theme of the gospel message), the Gospel of Thomas (a collection of sayings), and the Gospel of Philip (sayings and meditations loosely strung together). More recently, a Gospel of Judas has come to light that presents a positive picture of Judas Iscariot.

(3) Infancy gospels and other later texts. These owe their origin to the desire to make up for the apparent deficiencies of the canonical Gospels and fill in the gaps in the story. In them Jesus is depicted as possessing miraculous powers while still a child, and in the Infancy Gospel of Thomas (to be distinguished from the Coptic Gospel of Thomas) he sometimes makes use of them in a way quite incompatible with the character presented in the canonical tradition. The Protevangelium of James is much less crude, and indeed its use of legendary material is comparatively restrained; it was written mainly for the glorification of MARY MOTHER OF JESUS and carries the story back beyond the birth of Jesus to the miraculous birth of Mary herself and her upbringing in the temple.

Apocryphal epistles. These are comparatively few and some are not really epistles. For example, the Latin work Epistle to the Laodiceans is a patchwork of Pauline phrases, although it is found in some MSS of the Bible. The Letters of Paul and Seneca, known already to Jerome, are clearly intended to enlist the prestige and authority of the Roman philosopher in support of the Christian faith. A letter from Corinth to Paul and his reply (sometimes referred to as 3 Corinthians) are now known to have formed part of the Acts of Paul, although they also circulated independently.

Apocryphal acts. These are more extensive and more significant, especially the five major works from the 2nd and 3rd centuries attributed to Andrew, John, Paul, Peter, and Thomas. In general it may be said that these were intended to supplement, rather than to replace, the canonical Acts by providing fuller information about the deeds of the apostles and in particular about their martyrdoms. These works testify to the high regard in which the apostles were held, as guarantors of the authentic gospel message and pioneers of the Christian mission; but at the same time their use of legendary motifs and their delight in miracle for its own sake, as a means of glorifying the apostles, place them in the category of romance rather than of history. The important point, however, is their popularity and their influence on later writings. They were themselves the basis of, and often a quarry for, numerous later works. In time, similar Acts were composed for other apostles also: Philip, Matthew, Bartholomew, Simon and Judas, Thaddaeus, Barnabas.

Apocryphal apocalypses. The early church shared to a large extent in the temper and thought world of Jewish APOCALYPTIC and took over and adapted several of its documents, but there is of course a shift of emphasis, with interest now centering in the return of Christ. The Ascension of Isaiah, for example, derives its title from a vision describing the prophet's ascent through the seven heavens; the work may date from the second century A.D. Also from this century, since it was known to Clement of Alexandria, is the Apocalypse of Peter, which is significant both for the way in which it incorporates ideas of heaven and hell from non-Christian sources and also for its influence on later writing, down through the Apocalypse of Paul and other works to the Divina comedia of Dante. It should be added that not all the works that include "Apocalypse" or "Revelation" in their titles are necessarily apocalyptic in the full sense; and, conversely, revelations of an apocalyptic character sometimes occur in writings that do not bear the title.

Apollonia. ap'uh-loh'nee-uh (Gk. Apollōnia G662). There were several towns of this name. The Apollonia of the NT was in MACEDONIA, on the VIA EGNATIA, c. 27 mi. (43 km.) WSW of AMPHIPOLIS. PAUL and SILAS passed through the town on their way between THESSALONICA and PHILIPPI (Acts 17:1).

Apollos. uh-pol'uhhs (Gk. Apollōs G663, prob. an abbreviated form of Apollōnios). A gifted, scholarly, zealous preacher in the early Christian church (Acts 18:24-28; 19:1; 1 Cor. 1:12; 3:4-6, 22; 4:6; 16:12; Tit. 3:13). A native of ALEXANDRIA, he is initially described as mighty in the Scriptures and eloquent, but knowing only the baptism of John. He came to EPHESUS after PAUL had visited that city on his second missionary journey. There he met AQUILA and PRISCILLA, who had been left there to minister pending the apostle's return. They heard Apollos speak boldly in the synagogue and, observing that he was deficient in his knowledge of the gospel, they "explained to him the way of God more adequately" (Acts 18:26). It is not easy to determine from the brief account in Acts the precise character of his religious knowledge. Before long he went to ACHAIA with letters of recommendation from the Ephesian brothers. When he arrived in CORINTH, "he was a great help to those who by grace had believed. For he vigorously refuted the Jews in public debate, proving from the Scriptures that Jesus was the Christ" (18:27-28).

Apollos's gifts and methods of presenting the gospel were undoubtedly different from those of Paul, and he put the impress of his own mode of thinking on many who heard him. Before long a party arose in the Corinthian church with the watchword, "I follow Apollos" (1 Cor. 3:4). There does not, however, appear to have been any feeling of rivalry between Paul and Apollos. Paul urged Apollos to revisit Corinth (16:12), and he also asked TITUS to help Apollos, apparently then or when he was on his way to Crete (Tit. 3:13). Luther suggested the theory, since accepted by a few scholars, that Apollos wrote the letter to the Hebrews.

Apollyon. See ABADDON.

apostasy. The abandonment of one's religion. The word is seldom found in English translations of the Bible, but it is a description of Israel's rebellion against God (Josh. 22:22; 2 Chr. 29:19; Jer. 2:19). In Greek, where it has the implication of deserting a post, it refers generally to the abandonment of Christianity for unbelief (1 Tim. 4:1; 2 Tim. 2:18), though many believe that this refers to those who had never truly believed (1 Jn. 1:19; cf. Jn. 15:6). The writer of the letter to the Hebrews declares apostasy to be irrevocable (Heb. 6:4-6; 10:26), and Paul applies it eschatologically to the coming of a time of great rebellion against God (2 Thess. 2:3).

apostle. This term derives from Greek apostolos G693, which means literally "one sent out" but usually referred to naval expeditions and sometimes to messengers or ambassadors. In the NT it is a title applied in various ways. First of all, it once describes CHRIST himself (“Jesus, the apostle and high priest,” Heb. 3:1), pointing to Jesus’ role on earth as the ambassador of the Father. Second, the twelve disciples whom Jesus chose to be with him and whom he commissioned and sent out to preach are also called “apostles” (Matt. 10:2; Mk. 3:14; 6:30; Lk. 6:13; 9:10; 11:49; 17:5; 22:14; 24:10). These men (without Judas but with Matthias, Acts 1:26) were primary witnesses of the resurrection of Jesus, and their task was to proclaim the gospel of God, establish churches, and teach sound doctrine (Acts 4:33; 5:12; 5:29; 8:1, 14-18). They did this as they lived in spiritual union with the exalted Jesus through the HOLY SPIRIT promised by Jesus in Jn. 14-16.

Since PAUL met the resurrected and glorified Jesus and was given a commission by him to be the messenger to the Gentiles and the planter of churches in Gentile cities, he called himself an apostle (Rom. 1:1; Gal. 1:1), he defended his right to be known as an apostle (2 Cor. 11-12; Gal. 1), and he was described as an apostle by Luke (Acts 14:14). He believed that suffering was an inescapable part of his apostolic role (1 Cor. 4:9-13; 2 Cor. 4:7-12; 11:23-29), and he held that the church of God was built on Christ as the chief cornerstone and on the apostles as primary foundational stones (Eph. 2:20).

Further, and this information prevents neat and tidy definitions of an apostle, there are others who are called “apostles” in the NT. Included here are fellow-workers of Paul such as BARNABAS (Acts 14:4, 14), SILAS (1 Thess. 2:6), and probably ANDRONICUS and JUNIAS (Rom. 16:7); it is also possible that Paul refers to JAMES, brother of the Lord Jesus, as an apostle in Gal. 1:19, but the meaning of this statement is debated. In any case, these individuals were not of the Twelve (Rev. 21:14) and not on the same footing as Paul, who was uniquely the apostle to the Gentiles.

apostolic age. The period in the history of the Christian church when the apostles were alive, beginning with the Day of Pentecost and ending with the death of the apostle John near the end of the first century. See ACTS OF THE APOSTLES.

Apostolic Council. See COUNCIL.

Apostolic Fathers. A collection of early Christian writings (also referred to as Post-Apostolic or Sub-Apostolic) produced by authors thought to have been associated with the apostles. These documents are significant in that they help to close a gap between the NT and later writers. In addition, the Apostolic Fathers provide information about the Christian church in the period immediately after the apostles. The subjects to which one or another refer include the officers of the church, its form of worship, its sacramental observances, its treatment by the civil government, its system of discipline, its ethical teaching, and its ultimate source of authority. The information needs, of course, to be subjected to the usual critical tests before its value can be ascertained.

Usually included in the collection are the following writings. (1) The so-called epistles of Clement: 1 Clement, written in Rome c. A.D. 95; 2 Clement, which is really a sermon by a different author, perhaps originating in Rome c. 140. (2) The epistles of Ignatius, written c. 115 to six churches and one individual: Ephesians, Magnesians, Trallians, Romans, Philadelphians, Smyrnaeans, Polycarp. (3) Two documents concerned with Polycarp: his letter to the Philippians, c. 115, and the Martyrdom of Polycarp, c. 160. (4) The Didache, probably from Syria c. 90. (5) The so-called Epistle of Barnabas, probably from Egypt, c. 130. (6) The Shepherd of Hermas, from Rome, c. 150. (7) The quotations from Papias of Hierapolis, c. 125. (8) The Epistle to Diognetus.

Codex Sinaiticus, a 4th-cent. MS of the NT that includes two books from the Apostolic Fathers.

apothecary. See OCCUPATIONS AND PROFESSIONS.

Appaim. ap'ay-im (Heb. ṣappayim H691, possibly “little-nosed” or “big-nosed” or “angry”). Son of Nadab and descendant of JUDAH (1 Chr. 2:30-31).

apparel. See DRESS.

appeal. No provision was made in the OT for the reconsideration from a lower to a higher court of a case already tried. Exodus 18:26 shows, however, that MOSES provided for lower and higher courts: “The difficult cases they brought to Moses, but the simple ones they decided themselves.” In Deut. 17:8-13 provision was made for a lower court, under certain conditions, to seek instructions as to procedure from a higher court; but the decision itself belonged to the lower court.

In NT times the Roman government allowed each synagogue to exercise discipline over Jews, but only the Romans had the power of life and death. A Roman citizen could, however, claim exemption from trial by the Jews and appeal to be tried by a Roman court. PAUL did this when he said, “I appeal to Caesar!” (Acts 25:11). In such cases the litigant either pronounced the Latin word appellō, as Paul probably did, or submitted the appeal in writing. In either case the presiding magistrate was under obligation to transmit the file, together with a personal report, to the competent higher magistrate.

Apphia. af´ee-uh (Gk. Apphia G722, prob. a native Phrygian name). A lady included in the salutation of Paul’s letter to PHILEMON, designated “our [lit., the] sister,” probably in the Christian sense, indicating that she was a member of some prominence in the church (Phlm 2; KJV, following the TR, reads “our beloved Apphia”). Some have argued that she was Philemon’s wife; others have suggested that she was his (biological) sister.

Appian Way. ap´ee-uhn. The Via Appia was the first of the paved roads that were the supreme engineering achievement of ROME. It was named after Appius Claudius Caecus, the censor, one of the first clear-cut personalities of Roman history. Begun in 312 B.C., the Appian Way ran from Rome to Capua, with a later extension to Brundisium. Parts of the road are still in use. PAUL must have traveled by it from PUTEOLI to Rome (Acts 28:13-16).

Appius, Forum of. ap´ee-uhs, for´uhm. A forum was the public square or marketplace of an ancient Roman city (cf. the Gk. AGORA), and the Forum of Appius was a traveler’s stop on the APPIAN WAY, about 40 mi. (64 km.) S of ROME, where PAUL was met by Roman Christians on his way to the capital under guard (Acts 28:15).

apple. See PLANTS.

apple of the eye. An English idiom denoting the pupil of the eye, which is precious and, therefore, most carefully guarded. The phrase is used to translate a comparable Hebrew idiom occurring in passages that speak of God’s care of his people (Deut. 32:10; Ps. 17:8; Zech. 2:8) and of the preciousness of the divine law (Prov. 7:2). The KJV uses the phrase also in Lam. 2:18, which refers to the literal eye.

apricot. See PLANTS.

apron. See DRESS.

Aqabah, Gulf of. ah´kuh-bah. Also Aqaba. The NE arm of the RED SEA bounded on the W by the SINAI Peninsula and on the E by the Land of MIDIAN (Arabian Desert). SOLOMON's seaport city of EZION GEBER (see also ELATH) situated on this gulf is said to be on the Red Sea (1 Ki. 9:26). During the wilderness wanderings, the Israelites were ordered to go from KADESH BARNEA into the wilderness by the way to the Red Sea, which most naturally refers to the Gulf of Aqabah (Num. 14:25; Deut. 1:40; 2:1). Similarly, after a second stay at Kadesh Barnea, Israel went by way of the Red Sea to go around EDOM, which lay E of the ARABAH (Num. 21:4; Jdg. 11:16).

aqueduct. A channel, covered or open, cut in the rock; a waterway built of stone and sometimes faced with smooth cement; a waterway carried on stone arches across depressions. Aqueducts are used to convey WATER from reservoirs, pools, cisterns, or springs to the places where it is to be used. Aqueducts may have existed even in pre-Israelite times, and continued to be developed until the excellent work of the NABATEAN period (100 B.C. to A.D. 100). The Roman period shows many fine examples. HEZEKIAH excavated the SILLOAM tunnel (conduit) to bring water into Jerusalem by a way that could not be stopped up in time of siege (2 Ki. 20:20; 2 Chr. 32:30), and this served the purpose of an aqueduct.

Aquila. ak´wi-luh, uh-kwi´luh (Gk. Akylas, "eagle"). A Jewish Christian whom PAUL found at CORINTH on his arrival from ATHENS (Acts 18:2, 18, 26; Rom. 16:3-4; 1 Cor. 16:19; 2 Tim. 4:19). A characteristic feature of Aquila and his wife PRISCILLA is that their names are always mentioned together. All that they accomplished was the result of their unity of spiritual nature and purpose in Christ. Having been among the Jews expelled from ROME, they opened a tentmaking business in Corinth. Because Paul followed the same trade, he was attracted to them. Being in full sympathy with the apostle, they hospitably received him into their home, where he remained for a year and a half. Their willingness to "risk their lives" for him earned the gratitude of all the churches.

APOLLOS and many others were helped by their spiritual insight. Aquila and Priscilla had a “church that [met] at their house.” Priscilla is usually named first, possibly because she became a Christian first, or because she was more active in Christian endeavors, or perhaps for some other unknown reason.

Ar. ahr (Heb. ʿār H6840, possibly “city”). A city in MOAB, E of the DEAD SEA, apparently near the ARNON River (Num. 21:14-15, 28; Deut. 2:9, 18, 29; Isa. 15:1). The suggestion that Ar was the capital of the Moabites is worth noting. Its location is uncertain, and some think the name could refer to a larger region within Moab.

Ara. air’uh (Heb. ʾăṛā H736, possibly “lion”). Son of JETHER (1 Chr. 7:38), listed among the “heads of families, choice men, brave warriors and outstanding leaders” of the tribe of ASHER (v. 40).

Arab (people group). a’ruhb, air’uhb. See ARABIA.

Arab (place). a’ruhb, air’uhb (Heb. ʾăṛāb H742, possibly “ambush”). A city in the hill country of the tribe of JUDAH (Josh. 15:52); the site is uncertain, but it is usually identified with modern Khirbet er-Rabiyeh, 8 mi. (13 km.) SW of HEBRON.

Arabah. air’uh-buh (Heb. ʿăṛābāh H6858, “wilderness”). When this Hebrew word is used with the definite article, as it most frequently is, it refers to the great rift valley running S from the Sea of Galilee, including the JORDAN Valley and the DEAD SEA, and extending all the way to the Gulf of AQABAH. As such, it forms a major geographical area of the land of the Bible and certainly the most important feature of the relief of the land. In the KJV, the word is rendered as the proper name “Arabah” only in Josh. 18:18, elsewhere as “desert,” “plain,” “wilderness.” Modern translations more consistently take it as a proper name. Without the Hebrew definite article, the term can be used to refer to desert steppe land in general (e.g., Job 24:5; 39:6; Isa. 33:9; Jer. 17:6). In the plural it could be applied to certain desert sections within the Arabah as a whole (e.g., Num. 26:3; Josh. 5:10; 2 Sam. 15:28; et al.). The modern terms used are Ghor (“depression”) for the Jordan Valley portion of the Arabah and ʿArabah or Wadi el-ʿArabah for that portion S of the Dead Sea.

The Dead Sea is sometimes also referred to as the “Sea of the Arabah” (Deut. 4:49; Josh. 3:16; 12:3; 2 Ki. 14:25). The name “Wadi Arabah” (Amos 6:14 NRSV; “valley of the Arabah” in the NIV) may refer to the ZERED River, but some scholars locate it NE of the Dead Sea.

Arabia. uh-ray’bee-uh (Heb. ‘ārāb H6851, “desert”; Gk. Arabia G728). A large peninsula of SW Asia consisting of (1) Arabia Petraea, including PETRA and the peninsula of SINAI; (2) Arabia Deserta, that is, the Syrian desert, between the JORDAN Valley and the EUPHRATES River; (3) Arabia Felix, the southern section. The peninsula is bounded N by the Fertile Crescent, E by the Persian Gulf, SE and S by the Indian Ocean, SW and W by the Red Sea. Arabia is an arid steppe, a rocky tableland with enough rainfall in the interior and S to support considerable population, yet with resources so meager they encourage emigration. With water barriers on three sides, expansion was toward the more fertile lands northward, in successive waves of Canaanites, Israelites, Amorites, Babylonians, Assyrians, Arameans (“Syrians”), Idumeans, and Nabateans, all Semitic peoples. They collided with Indo-Europeans pressing down from Asia Minor and Iran. Israel’s proximity to Arabia—with a border ill-defined and difficult to defend, and with a “have-not” population ready to plunder—was a major factor influencing the history of the Hebrew people.

The first mention of Arabia in the Bible by name is in the reign of SOLOMON, when its kings brought gold and spices, either as tribute or in trade (1 Ki. 10:15; 2 Chr. 9:14). Arabians brought tribute to JEHOSHAPHAT (2 Chr. 17:11). They joined the PHILISTINES against JEHORAM, defeating him disastrously (21:16—22:1). At desolate Babylon not even the Arabian nomad would pitch his tent (Isa. 13:20). Isaiah 21:13-17 laid a burden on Arabia. Moral depravity is indicated in Jer. 3:2. The kings of Arabia were involved in judgment on the nations after the Babylonian captivity (Jer. 25:24). Arabia sold cattle to TYRE (Ezek. 27:21). Arabians gave NEHEMIAH trouble when he was rebuilding the walls of Jerusalem (Neh. 2:19; 4:7; 6:1). Arabians were among those present at PENTECOST (Acts 2:11). PAUL went into Arabia, meaning probably the NABATEAN environments of Damascus, soon after his conversion (Gal. 1:17; the belief that he went to Mount Sinai is based on the experiences of Moses and Elijah there and on his mention of “Mount Sinai in Arabia,” 4:25).

Arad (person). a’rad, air’ad (Heb. ‘ārād H6865, possibly “wild ass” or “fugitive”). Son of Beriah and descendant of BENJAMIN (1 Chr. 8:15).

Arad (place). a'rad, air'ad (Heb. ʿārād H6866, meaning uncertain). A settlement in the NE NEGEV, modern Tell ʿArad, some 17 mi. (27 km.) S of HEBRON. Arad occupied an excellent strategic position in the middle of a wide, gently rolling plain. The city was a center of civilization as early as the fourth millennium B.C. and again in Abrahamite times (some argue, however, that this Canaanite Arad should be identified with Tell el-Milh, c. 8 mi./13 km. SW of Tell ʿArad). Near the NW corner of the fortress at Tell ʿArad stood a sanctuary whose design was similar, but not identical, to that of the nearly contemporary Solomonic TEMPLE. The city is mentioned only four times in the OT (Num. 21:1; 33:40; Josh. 12:14; Jdg. 1:16; in the first two passages the KJV takes it incorrectly as the name of a king). According to Num. 21:1-3, the “king” (or chieftain) of Arad joined battle with the Israelites, the latter being victorious and calling the place Hormah (“destruction”). Numerous fragmentary OSTRACA in Hebrew and Aramaic, dating from the tenth to the fourth century, have been discovered at the site; they provide significant paleographical data and make intriguing, but uncertain, historical allusions.

Aerial view of ancient Arad (looking N). The Early Bronze (2600 B.C.) lower city is encompassed by a massive wall. The Israelite fortress is situated on the upper area of the tell.

Arah (person). air'uh (Heb. ʾārāḥ H783, possibly “he wonders” or “ox”). (1) Son of Ulla and descendant of ASHER, included among the “heads of families, choice men, brave warriors and outstanding leaders” (1 Chr. 7:39-40).

(2) Head of a family that returned from the EXILE with ZERUBBABEL (Ezra 2:5; Neh. 7:10; the numbers of those who returned vary in these passages). He is possibly the same person identified as the father of Shecaniah (Neh. 6:18).

Arah (place). air'uh (Heb. ʿārāh H6869, perhaps “bulrush”). Possibly a Sidonian city (Josh. 13:4). The MT reading, mē ʿārâ (MEARAH, KJV, NRSV), should perhaps be vocalized so as to read mē ʿārâ, “from Arah” (so NIV; cf. LXX, “before Gaza,” apparently reading the Heb. as mē ʿazzâ). No city by the name of either Arah or Mearah is known.

Aram. air'uhm (Heb. ʾārām H806, “high, exalted”). (1) One of the five sons of SHEM and the father of Uz, Hul, Gether, and Mash in the Table of Nations (Gen. 10:22-23, cf. 1 Chr. 1:17); regarded as the ancestor of the ARAMEANS. His name is also used for a country or region N of Israel and extending eastward to MESOPOTAMIA (called “Syria” in the KJV and other versions). The major Aramean city was DAMASCUS. For further description see SYRIA; see also ARAM NAHARAIM, MAACAH, PADDAN ARAM, and ZOBAB.

(2) Son of Kemuel and grandson of NAHOR, ABRAHAM’s brother (Gen. 22:20-21).

(3) Son of Shemer and descendant of ASHER (1 Chr. 7:34).

(4) Son of Hezron, included in the GENEALOGY OF JESUS CHRIST (Matt. 1:3-4 KJV, NRSV; Lk. 3:33 KJV [NRSV, “Arni,” following a variant reading]). Here the name represents the Greek Aram, which however refers to RAM (cf. NIV in both passages).

Aramaic. air'uh-may'ik. A NW Semitic language, closely related to HEBREW. Already in Gen. 31:47 Aramaic is mentioned as the language used by LABAN in contrast to JACOB’s use of Hebrew. By the eighth century B.C. Aramaic had become the language of Assyrian diplomacy, and sufficiently different from Hebrew that the people of Jerusalem did not understand the former (2 Ki. 18:26; Isa. 36:11). Some Aramaic place names and personal names occur in the OT, such as TABRIMMON (1 Ki. 15:18) and HAZAEL (2 Ki. 8:8). Aramaic texts in the OT include one verse in Jeremiah (Jer. 10:11, an answer by the Jews to their Aramaic-speaking conquerors who would seduce them to worship idols) and more substantial sections in Ezra and Daniel (Ezra 4:8—6:18; 7:12-26; Dan. 2:4—7:28), reflecting the adoption of this language by the Jews during the Babylonian EXILE and the Persian period. The Jews also adopted the so-called “square” script of Aramaic to write not only Aramaic but also Hebrew, which previously had been written in a Phoenician-type script known as paleo-Hebrew (see WRITING).

In NT times, GREEK was widely used in Palestine and Hebrew was still spoken to some extent, especially in JUDEA. It is generally recognized, however, that Aramaic was predominant, particularly in GALILEE. Almost certainly it was Jesus’ mother tongue, and the NT preserves a number of Aramaic words and phrases spoken by him: ABBA (Mk. 14:36; cf. Rom. 8:15; Gal. 4:6), EPHPTHATHA (Mk. 7:34), ELOI, ELOI, LAMA SABACHTHANI (Matt. 27:46; Mk. 15:34), TALITHA KOU (Mk. 5:41). Aramaic was probably also the language of the early Jewish Christian church, as reflected in the word MARANATHA (1 Cor. 16:22).

Numerous dialects of the language can be distinguished. Examples of Old Aramaic, in various forms, survive in inscriptions dated as early as the tenth century B.C. The language characteristic of the Persian period and used by Ezra and Daniel is known as Official or Imperial Aramaic, subsequent to which a distinction is made between western and eastern dialects. The most important western dialect was Jewish Palestinian Aramaic (prob. Jesus' language), used in the DEAD SEA SCROLLS and in Palestinian rabbinic literature; the NABATEANS and other groups also used a western form of Aramaic. Among the eastern dialects, the most significant were Jewish Babylonian Aramaic (the language of the official TALMUD), Syriac, and Mandaic. Some forms of the language are still spoken today. On the Aramaic Targums, see TEXT AND VERSIONS (OT).

Aramean. air'uh-mee'uhn (Heb. ʾārammî H812). Also Aramaean. A descendant of ARAM. More generally, the Arameans were a desert people who had already settled parts of SYRIA and W MESOPOTAMIA prior to the time of ABRAHAM. Centuries later, some of the groups that lived NE of Israel established kingdoms and formed loose confederacies that frequently interacted with the Israelites, usually as enemies. The most important Aramean city was DAMASCUS. Prominent Aramean kings included several by the name (or title) of BEN-HADAD, as well as HADADEZER and REZON, who were rulers in ZOBAB.

Aramitess. air'uh-mi-tes (Heb. ʾārammîâ, fem. of ʾārammî H812). Term used by KJV with reference to the concubine mother of MAKIR, the father of GILEAD (1 Chr. 7:14; NIV, "Aramean"). See ARAMEAN.

Aram Maacah. air'uhm-may'uh-kuh (Heb. ʾāram ma ʿākâ H807). Alternate name of MAACAH (1 Chr. 19:6).

Aram Naharaim. air'uhm-nay-huh-ray'im (Heb. ʾāram nahārayim H808, "Aram of the [two] rivers"). This name, usually rendered MESOPOTAMIA by the KJV (following the LXX), refers to the same general area as PADDAN ARAM, roughly between the rivers EUPHRATES and HABOR. Aram Naharaim is identified as the place to which ABRAHAM's servant went in search of a wife for ISAAC (Gen. 24:10) and as the home of BALAAM son of Beor (Deut. 23:4). After the death of JOSHUA, Israel was delivered into the hands of CUSHAN-RISHATHAIM king of Aram Naharaim for eight years (Jdg. 3:8-10), and the AMMONITES later hired horsemen and chariots from Aram Naharaim against DAVID (1 Chr. 19:6; cf. title of Ps. 60).

Aram Zobah. air'uhm-zoh'bu (Heb. ʾāram ʕôbâ H809). Alternate name of ZOBAB (Ps. 60, title; cf. 2 Sam. 10:6-8; 1 Chr. 19:6).

Aran. air'an (Heb. ʾārān H814, possibly "wild goat"). Son of Dishan (Gen. 36:28; 1 Chr. 1:42), who was a son of SEIR and a HORITE chief (Gen. 36:20-21). Some scholars believe that Aran is a variant of OREN.

Ararat. air'uh-rat (Heb. ʾārārat H827, meaning unknown). A country in Armenia, a mountainous tableland from which flow the TIGRIS, EUPHRATES, Aras (Araxes), and Choruk rivers. Near its center lies Lake Van, which, like the Dead Sea, has no outlet. Its general elevation is about 6,000 ft. (1,830 m.), above which rise mountains to as high as 17,000 ft. (5,180 m.), the height of the extinct volcano that in modern times is called Mount Ararat and on which the ark is supposed to have rested, though the plural in Gen. 8:4 is indefinite: "On the mountains of Ararat." There the sons of SENNACHERIB fled after murdering their father (2 Ki. 19:37; Isa. 37:38). Jeremiah 51:27 associates the kingdoms of Ararat, Minni, and Ashkenaz with the kings of the Medes as prophesied conquerors of Babylonia. The region is now part of Turkey. The Babylonian name was Urartu.

Araunah (Ornan). uh-raw'nuh, or'nuhn (Heb. ʾărawnâ H779 in 2 Sam., ʾornān H821 in 1-2 Chr., possibly the Hurrian term for “lord”). The JEBUSITE who owned the threshing floor on Mount MORIAH that DAVID purchased in order to erect an altar. Because of David's sin in numbering the people, the land was stricken with a plague. When the plague was stayed, David presented a costly offering to the Lord (2 Sam. 24:15-25; called Ornan in 1 Chr. 21:15-28 [KJV and most versions]). The difference between 2 Sam. 24:24 (50 shekels) and 1 Chr. 21:25 (600 shekels) may indicate that Samuel speaks of an immediate transaction covering what David purchased then and there (perhaps only the oxen?), while 1 Chronicles records the (subsequent?) purchase of the whole site. In 2 Sam. 24:16 the Hebrew text has “the Araunah” and in v. 23, “Araunah the king.” Was Araunah, then, the last Jebusite king of JERUSALEM, permitted to live on in his city after David captured it? This is no more than an interesting conjecture.

Arba. ahr'buḥ (only in the name qiryat ʾarba ʿ H7957, “city of Arba [= four]”). The ancestor of the ANAKITES and the greatest hero of that race. In the book of Joshua he is described as “the greatest man among the Anakites” (Josh. 14:15) and “the forefather of Anak” (15:13; 21:11). He was the founder of the city named for him, on the site of which HEBRON was built (21:11). At the time of the conquest JOSHUA gave CALEB the city of Hebron as his inheritance because of his confidence that God would enable him to drive out the Anakites (14:6-15). See KIRIATH ARBA.

Arbathite. ahr'buḥ-thit (Heb. ʿarbātî H6863). A native of the ARABAH or, more likely, of BETH ARABAH. It is the designation given to ABI-ALBON, one of David's “Thirty” (2 Sam. 23:31, named Abiel in 1 Chr. 11:32).

Arbite. ahr'bit (Heb. ʾarbî H750, apparently gentilic of ʾārāb H742). This term was probably applied to the inhabitants of ARAB in S Judah (Josh. 15:52). The epithet is used to describe PAARAI, one of David's “Thirty” (2 Sam. 23:35). The parallel list reads “Naarai son of Ezbai” (1 Chr. 11:37). See EZBAI.

arbitrate. See MEDIATOR.

arch. This term is used by the KJV incorrectly in Ezek. 40:16-36, which refers rather to the porches of the temple gates.

archaeology. The study of antiquity through material remains (fossils, artifacts). In modern times it has graduated from a treasure hunt into a highly scientific discipline. W. F. Albright once wrote that next to nuclear science, archaeology has become the fastest-growing discipline in the country. Excavation is only one aspect of the total effort of an archaeological enterprise. Geographical regional surveys, geological analyses, evaluation of artifacts, translation of inscriptions, reconstruction of architecture, examination of human remains, identification of art forms, construction of ceramic pottery typology for chronological purposes, and many other highly complex scientific endeavors constitute a major part of the expedition's work. The end result of it all is to enrich our understanding of unknown aspects of ancient civilizations.

I. Biblical Archaeology. G. E. Wright has insisted that biblical archaeology is an armchair variety of general archaeology, but William Dever has correctly emphasized that archaeology is biblical only where and when the scientific methodology of general archaeology uncovers something relative to the Bible. There is no special science or technique available to the biblical scholar. One who digs a biblical site is a biblical archaeologist in the same way that one who digs a classical site is a classical archaeologist. The methods are the same. There are no special methods or aims for biblical archaeology.

Special emphasis should be given to the fact that all reputable archaeology strives for the same total reconstruction of the past and presupposes the same standards of objectivity. As Roland de Vaux pointed out, archaeology cannot prove the Bible. Spiritual truth is of such a nature that it cannot be proven or disproven by the material discoveries of archaeology. The truths of the Bible do not need proving; they are self-evident. But as the Israeli scholar Gaalyah Cornfeld commented in a recent book, "The net effect of archaeology has been to support the general trustworthiness and substantial historicity of the biblical tradition where data are available."

The study of the Bible and the pursuit of archaeology belong together. When Middle-Eastern archaeology began about a century ago, the majority of the excavators were biblical scholars. They recognized the fact that the greatest contribution archaeology could make to biblical studies would be to illuminate our understandings of the cultural settings in which the various books of the Bible were written and which they reflect. That information will, at times, significantly affect our interpretation of relevant sections of the text.

II. The history of Palestinian archaeology. Although some exploration was done as early as medieval times, no real interest was kindled in Middle-Eastern antiquities until after 1600, when cuneiform documents from Persepolis reached Europe. Napoleon took a team of scholars with him in 1798 to study the antiquities of Egypt once he had conquered it. One of his officers discovered the Rosetta Stone, whose identical inscription in three languages unlocked the mystery of Egyptian hieroglyphs and opened the history of Egypt. Palestine was explored in the mid-1800s by Edward Robinson, Charles Warren, C. R. Conder, H. H. Kitchener, and others. A British officer named Henry Rawlinson found a trilingual inscription at Behistun, Persia, that unlocked the mysteries of cuneiform, and this “Rosetta Stone of Persia” further heightened interest in the lands of the Bible.

Although exploration of Palestine had been remarkably well done by the end of the nineteenth century, excavation was quite rare and virtually worthless. Systematic excavation got underway only after 1870 when Heinrich Schliemann discovered in Troy on the W coast of Turkey that the mounds dotting the horizon all over Bible lands were actually the remains of ancient cities successively destroyed and rebuilt, one on top of another. Lack of understanding about these mounds had reflected itself in Bible translations prior to that time. In Josh. 11:13 the KJV says: “But as for the cities that stood still in their strength, Israel burned none of them save Hazor only.” The word “strength” renders Hebrew tēl H9424 (in Arabic spelled tell), a word whose meaning was unknown at that time. Schliemann’s work showed that the word rather meant “mound,” and modern versions translate the phrase correctly: “the cities that stood on their mounds” (NRSV).

Nevertheless, his work was still of little influence in Palestinian excavation. He realized that these mounds consisted of strata, layers of civilization superimposed one on the other like layers of cake, but he did not know how to date them other than the obvious fact that the oldest ones were at the bottom. It remained for Sir Flinders Petrie to provide the means of dating these strata that has remained our most important method until the present time. In Egypt he became familiar with ceramic pottery that could be dated by tomb inscriptions. In his work in Israel in 1890 he discovered that the same forms of pottery could be found in various strata of his excavation at Tell el-Hesi (in SW Palestine, c. 16 mi./26 km. E of GAZA). He observed that the pottery styles changed from layer to layer and that he could date the strata by the changing forms, in much the same way that automobiles can be dated by their changing styles. His work was supplemented by that of W. F. Albright at Tell Beit Mirsim in 1926-32, and an extensive ceramic typology was published that has become a standard basis of comparison for Palestinian archaeologists. This has proven to be the single most important method of dating ancient sites, because the pottery is virtually indestructible and was so easily made that people never bothered to take it when they moved.

III. The future of Palestinian archaeology. Albright trained a generation of archaeologists, both American and Israeli, and work today continues at a feverish pace both by his students and those whom they have trained. These in turn are training a new generation. The “new archaeology,” which became prominent in the 1970s, sought to go beyond the concern these scholars had with structures and chronology by attempting to reconstruct the total picture of the society that lived in a given period of history. Such an approach to excavation requires a vast array of expertise, and expeditions are regularly staffed now with such specialists as paleoethnobotanists, geologists, architects, ceramicists, numismatists, stratigraphers, historians, linguists, photographers, geographers, and the like. The days of treasure hunting are over; excavations have become scientific expeditions.

Archaeology is a rapidly developing science. Its potential for significant contribution to the interpretation of the Bible is well established and the future is bright for the discipline. There is much that remains to be done. Paul Lapp estimated in 1963 that of a total of 5,000 sites in Palestine there had been scientific excavations at about 150, including only 26 major excavations. Of the more than 5,000 mounds located in Iraq, ancient Babylonia, and Assyria, fewer than 30 major excavations are documented in Beek’s Atlas of Mesopotamia (1962), less than 1 percent of the total sites. Yigael Yadin estimated that at the rate of his normal excavation progress at HAZOR in Galilee it would take 8,000 years to thoroughly excavate the site. Hazor covers about 200 acres in its upper and lower sections. How long would it take to thoroughly excavate the 8,000 acres of CAESAREA Maritima?

IV. Recent contributions of archaeology to the study of the Bible.

A. Old Testament. Until recently it was commonly believed that ABRAHAM lived in the Middle Bronze Period (c. 2000-1500 B.C.), but an electrifying new discovery in Syria in 1974 at Tell Mardikh (EBLA) caused Noel Freedman to place him in the Early Bronze period, at a time when Ebla was at its height of power and influence. A royal library was found here consisting of perhaps 20,000 clay tablets, 80 percent of which were written in Sumerian and the rest in an unknown Semitic language akin to Hebrew that is now called Eblaite. Located halfway between modern Aleppo and Hama, at the top of the Fertile Crescent, the city was in the heart of Abraham’s ancestral home territory of HARAN and flourished in c. 2200 B.C. Names similar to those in the Bible (e.g., Eve, Noah) appear in the texts.

This ostracon from Arad is a letter that reads in part: "To Eliashib. And now, issue from the wine 3 baths. And Hananyahu has commanded you to Beer-Sheba with 2 donkeys' load and you shall wrap up the dough with them. And count the wheat and the bread ..."

The impact of archaeology can also be illustrated by reference to the controversial question of the date of the EXODUS. A thirteenth-century B.C. date has been indicated by destruction levels that date to that century in excavations of Hazor, Jericho, Ai, Lachish, and other sites mentioned in the book of Joshua. John Bimson argued in a publication in 1978 that neither the archaeological nor the biblical evidence militates against an early date. His selectivity in handling archaeological data, however, has limited the influence of his book among archaeologists. A growing trend sees the exodus not as an event but as a series of events beginning with some sort of violent intrusion followed by a more socioeconomic upheaval of people within the land. Both Yigael Yadin and Yohanan Aharoni held such a view. The early date has also been argued, among others, by Eugene Merrill, who points out that the thirteenth-century evidence of destruction is irrelevant because the Bible does not really say Joshua destroyed these cities, only that he conquered them and reused them. He considers Hazor an exception to this policy (Josh. 11:13). Therefore he does not expect to find destruction levels associated with Joshua's conquest. But it should be pointed out that Jericho was burned (6:24)! The more daring views of Norman Gottwald and Robert Boling, that the conquest was not a military invasion at all, are so at variance with the straightforward reading of the biblical text that they will not likely secure a large following. To call it merely an economically based sociological upheaval is inadequate.

The period of the monarchy has been significantly touched by the excavations at Hazor, Megiddo, Jerusalem, and Gezer. These cities, which were renovated by Solomon (1 Ki. 9:15), have been found to have unique water systems, and all but Jerusalem have unique city gates. Jerusalem has not been thoroughly excavated, however, because it continues to be a living city. The water systems consist of hidden underground springs outside the city walls. Water is brought through a secret tunnel into the city to a pool that is reached by a stairway. The gates have four protruding sections facing each other from two separate structures, producing three compartments within, and are unique in ancient Palestine. Excavations on Mount Ophel by Yigal Shiloh in the early 1980s have produced a part of the city wall just S of the temple mount that may belong to Solomon, extending below and not into sixth-century-B.C. buildings as Kathleen Kenyon had previously thought when she first excavated the wall and dated it to the time of Nehemiah.

Asher Kaufmann has found convincing evidence of foundational cuttings for the temples of Solomon and Zerubbabel/Herod on the NW corner of the temple platform. The cuttings coincide with the 16.7-inch (42.8-cm.) cubit used in the construction of the first temple and the 17-inch (43.7-cm.) cubit used in the second temple. These line up the Most Holy Place with the modern Golden Gate, solving a previously inexplicable problem of the misalignment of this gate in relation to the current Dome of the Rock, which has been assumed to sit over the temple site. In 1983 James Fleming published his discovery of another gate beneath this one belonging either to the second or tenth centuries B.C., possibly built by Solomon.

A stunning discovery was made in 1980 during the excavation of a sixth-century-B.C. burial cave in Jerusalem. It was a silver amulet, 3.82 in. (9.8 cm.) long, containing the ancient Hebrew name of God (Yahweh) inscribed on it. Although the name is found more than 6,800 times in the OT, this is the first time that the name has been found in excavations in Jerusalem.

In 1977 the tomb of Philip II of Macedon was found in Vergina, Greece, containing the bones, armor, and gold diadem of this king. His son ALEXANDER THE GREAT made Greek the universal language of the empire, the language in which the books of the NT were originally written. The lid of his golden casket was decorated with the golden sunburst, symbol of the Macedonian kings.

Equally important but not so recent are a number of finds that significantly contribute to our understanding of the OT. A number of discoveries have greatly weakened the Wellhausen theory of the evolutionary development of the Israelite religion. This theory advocated that Moses could not have written the PENTATEUCH because neither language nor the concept of law had yet developed to the advanced stage represented in the law of Moses. In refutation of this, James Pritchard has published in ANET four law codes found in Mesopotamia that are older than those of Moses and are almost identical in the casuistic ("if...then") portions. The Ur-Nammu Law Code was produced by the founder of the third dynasty of Ur and builder of the best preserved ziggurat in Mesopotamia. He ruled from 2112 to 2095 B.C. Twenty-nine laws are extant. The Eshunna Code found in a suburb of Baghdad (also called the Code of Bilalama) was published by Bilalama, who reigned about 1950 B.C. Sixty laws are extant. The Lipit Ishtar Code was produced by this fifth ruler of the dynasty of Isin who ruled from 1864 to 1854. Thirty-eight laws are extant. The Hammurabi Code dates from his reign, 1728 to 1686, and there are 282 laws inscribed on a stela preserved in the Louvre in Paris. All of these are casuistic in nature, like the Book of the Covenant in Exod. 21-24. No apodictic laws ("You shall not...") have yet been found in the Middle East corresponding to Exod. 20.

An account of the FLOOD, called the Gilgamesh Epic, was found in 1853 in the midst of a long and beautiful Babylonian poem, excavated as a part of ASHURBANIPAL's library in NINEVEH. It contains remarkable parallels to the biblical account, such as a warning of the coming flood, the building of an ark, the flood coming, the ark resting on a mountain, and birds being sent out to find land. The hero of the story corresponding to the biblical Noah is Utnapishtim who, like Noah, offers a sacrifice after the flood. Pritchard dates the original composition of the work to c. 2000 B.C. The story is found in many ancient languages including Assyrian, Hittite, Hurrian, and Sumerian.

The period of the patriarchs has been illuminated by the discovery in 1925 of approximately one thousand clay tablets at Nuzi in Mesopotamia, written in Akkadian cuneiform and dating to the fifteenth century B.C. Even though they were written about three centuries after the patriarchal period, they are generally acknowledged to reflect much older material, throwing light on customs that existed in the very region inhabited by the family of Abraham. There are parallels to numerous customs mentioned in Genesis, such as the importance of the patriarchal blessing that Isaac gave Jacob, the giving of a handmaid to one's husband as Sarah gave Hagar to Abraham, the transfer of a birthright as Isaac did from Esau to Jacob, the proof of ownership of property by the possession of one's family idols (explaining why Rachel stole her father's teraphim). These indicate that the appropriate setting for the stories told in Genesis is the second millennium B.C. and not the first, as some radical critics claimed.

For the period of the exodus and conquest much of the older evidence has been reevaluated by later digs and better dating techniques, though, as discussed above, there is still no substantial agreement about either the nature or date of these events. Garstang's dates for Jericho and Hazor have been shown to be wrong by Kenyon and Yadin respectively, while work in the past seventy years at other sites mentioned in Joshua—such as Gibeon, Ai, Azekah, and Lachish—have yielded dates for destruction levels later than most readings of the biblical data will easily warrant. Kenyon dated the fall of Jericho earlier than the usual late date (13th cent. B.C.) but much later than the early date (15th cent.). Both archaeological methodology and the handling of biblical chronology are still imperfect, and the results yielded are less than certain.

Our understanding of the religion of the Canaanites at the time of the conquest has been greatly increased by the discovery of ancient Ugarit (RAS SHAMRA) in 1928 and its subsequent excavation. A library was found there by Claude Schaeffer dating to the period of the city's greatest literary and cultural achievements (1600-1200 B.C.), and written in what we now call Ugaritic. It testifies to the depraved nature of Canaanite religion at this time, including the boiling of a goat kid in its mother's milk, a practice warned against in Exod. 23:19 and 34:26 and which probably lies at the heart of the kosher laws. In addition to considerable information about the Canaanite idol BAAL, against whom strong invectives are made in the Bible, there appears also the astonishing fact that the chief deity of the Canaanites was named EL, the same name used by the Jews for their God. Help is being found in this library for correcting our misimpressions of some words in our Hebrew Bibles.

Considerably more information was gained about the various cities of Palestine about the time of the exodus and conquest by the discovery of the AMARNA Letters dating to the reign of Amenhotep IV (Akhenaten) and his father in the late fourteenth century B.C. These clay tablets, written in the Babylonian language, were found in Tell el-Amarna, Egypt, in 1887. They refer to a marauding class of people called Habiru, who may possibly be the Hebrews, though this is not certain.

In the fifth year of the Pharaoh Merneptah (c. 1223-1211 B.C.) he commemorated his military achievements over the eastern Mediterranean by setting up a black granite stela with an extensive inscription containing among other references these words: "Canaan is plundered with every evil; Ashkelon is taken; Gezer is captured...Israel lies desolate." This is the earliest reference to Israel in antiquity.

Important references to people mentioned in the Bible have been found in the centuries following the monarchy. The divided kingdom after SOLOMON (9th to 6th centuries B.C.) was affected by Syrians, Moabites, Assyrians, and Babylonians, all of whom left witness of their relation to biblical events in official monuments. The ninth-century MOABITE STONE, erected by Mesha, king of Moab, was found at Diban in Jordan in 1868. It contains references to OMRI, king of Israel (2 Ki. 3). The Zakir Stele, also ninth century, found in 1907 S of Aleppo, commemorates a victory of Zakir, king of HAMATH, over BEN-HADAD. The Assyrian sources have been shown to be basically reliable, as have those of the Neo-Babylonian period. Historical texts from these two empires have been found in Nineveh, Nimrud, Ashur, and Babylon. The Kurkh Stele, erected in the mid-ninth century, contains the name of AHAB the Israelite (1 Ki. 16:29). The Black Obelisk of SHALMANESER III not only contains the name of "Jehu, son of Omri," a king of Israel (2 Ki. 10:28-29) in the late ninth century, but also has a depiction of him bowing before Shalmaneser. Jehu is bearded and wears a sleeveless mantle over a long fringed and girded tunic. This is the only contemporary depiction of any Israelite king.

In the eighth century B.C. the Annals of TIGLATH-PILESER III mention that King MENAHEM paid tribute, the amount being clearly stated in 2 Ki. 15:19-20. This document also refers to a certain Azriau of Yaudi, probably Azariah (UZZIAH) of Judah (2 Chr. 26:6-15). The Nimrud Tablet of the same century claims that Tiglath-Pileser set HOSHEA over Israel after PEKAH was deposed (2 Ki. 15:29-31). A slab inscription from the SE palace at Nimrud states that Jehoahaz (long form of AHAZ) of Judah paid tribute to Tiglath-Pileser (16:8). There is frequent mention in this century of Israel, called “the House of Omri,” in the various inscriptions of SARGON II (722-205).

SENNACHERIB, his successor (705-681), left a fascinating reference to a Jewish king in the Taylor Prism, which says that “Hezekiah the Jew [lit. Judean]” resisted the Assyrian monarch and “he himself I shut up like a caged bird within Jerusalem” (cf. 2 Ki. 18:13-14). Interestingly the prism makes no mention of the actual conquest of Jerusalem. The reason is that he never conquered it. He lost 185,000 troops by the hand of God during the siege, and he went back to Nineveh (19:35-36). The Bull Inscription, however, boasts that Sennacherib “laid waste the district of Judah [Iaudi] and made the overbearing and proud Hezekiah, its king, bow submissively at my feet.” A slab inscription found at Nineveh claims, “I overthrew the wide district of Judah. I imposed my [yoke-] ropes upon Hezekiah, its king.” The Annals of Assyria, which detail the exploits of ESARHADDON (681-669), successor of Sennacherib, mention the subservience of “Manasseh, king of Judah” (2 Ki. 21). Esarhaddon is mentioned in 2 Ki. 19:37; Isa. 37:38; Ezra 4:2.

One of the most important documents of the period is the Babylonian Chronicle, containing a running and probably contemporary record of the exploits of the Babylonians in Syria, Palestine, and other countries. It states that “the Babylonian king [Nebuchadnezzar]...on the second day of the month of Adar [March 16, 597 B.C.] took the city and captured the king [Jehoichin]” (2 Ki. 24:12-13). This gives a firm date for OT and Babylonian chronology. CYRUS the Persian, who conquered the Babylonians in October of 539, left a clay cylinder inscribed in cuneiform that tells of his decree allowing conquered peoples to rebuild their cities and religious shrines. This is consistent with the biblical record of the return of the Jews from Persia to Palestine in the books of Ezra and Nehemiah.

B. New Testament. HEROD the Great was king of the Jews when Jesus was born. He was the greatest builder in Jewish history, having completed projects in twenty different sites in Palestine and thirteen outside the land. Extensive remains of his program have been found in recent excavations that supplement what we already know about him. At CASEAREA Maritima portions of his wall around the city have been found since 1972, including the northern gate. His harbor and about a hundred vaulted warehouses stretching along the harbor have been discovered in underwater excavation. The high-level aqueduct and the small theater in which he dedicated his newly built city have long been identified. An inscription bearing the name of Pontius PILATE was found in the theater.

Herod's desert palace at Herodium, S of BETHLEHEM, has been shown to have seven levels in the large donut-shaped mound. The lower palace has an esplanade and large square pool found by Ehud Netzer. The esplanade leads to a building complex that Netzer thinks may contain the tomb of Herod. A unique circular pavilion with concentric walls stood in the middle of a pool, its unique design appearing in Palestine only in Herod's building projects, for example, in the middle level pavilion at Masada's northern palace and in the frigidarium (unheated bathing pool) of the Roman bath in his palace at JERICO. A portion of a similar structure has been found in the area just N of the Damascus Gate in Jerusalem which Netzer thinks may be the family tomb of Herod. This structural oddity may have influenced the design of the similar edifice in Hadrian's villa outside Rome. Yadin's excavation of Masada, on the W side of the Dead Sea, revealed a massive complex of buildings constructed by Herod, consisting of casemate walls, a northern palace in three tiers, a large bathhouse, a swimming pool, many huge cisterns, warehouses, and a dining hall later converted into a synagogue.

Volunteers excavate the area of the Essene Gate in Jerusalem.

In the 1970s Herod's winter palace at Jericho was found by Ehud Netzer and Eric Meyers and was extensively excavated, revealing a large reception hall with an adjoining apse leading to a large Roman bath. Included in the complex was the older Hasmonean winter palace containing many pools, including the large one in which Herod had Aristobulus drowned. It also contained several of the oldest mikvehs (Jewish pools for ritual bathing) yet found in Palestine (2nd cent. B.C.).

Evidence of his work in Jerusalem is seen in the tower still standing in the Jaffa Gate, which Titus left to show the greatness of the city he had conquered. A considerable portion of the Herodian courses of stone undergirding his expansion of the temple mount have been exposed, including some monoliths that weigh 400 tons (364 metric tons). The arches holding up the southern end of the temple mount are Herodian, not Solomonic.

Excavations at CAPERNAUM have revealed that the synagogue there is not earlier than the fourth century A.D. but that it was built over a first-century synagogue whose basalt stone floors and walls have been found directly beneath the floor of the fourth-century prayer hall. This no doubt was the synagogue that Jesus attended while in Capernaum with Simon Peter. The house of PETER may have been located immediately S of the synagogue, built of the same basalt stone found in the earlier synagogue. A large room in the center of the house has evidently been venerated since the mid-first century when the pottery found in the room ceased to be domestic. The walls were plastered about this time, the only excavated house in Capernaum so done. On the wall 130 graffiti in several languages mention Jesus as Lord and Christ, among other things. The room was designated by an arch and then covered in the fourth century by a square Byzantine church building, over which a fifth-century octagonal church was built with a mosaic floor that remained there until the recent excavations.

In Jerusalem the pool of BETHESDA (Jn. 5:2) has been excavated just inside the eastern Lion Gate, and farther to the S the pool of SILOAM (9:7) is easily identified by HEZEKIAH's tunnel connecting it with the GIHON Spring. Thirty steps leading up to the temple mount through the southern gates of Hulda, 200 ft. (60 m.) in width, have been found along with adjacent houses from the time of Christ. Underground walkways and aqueducts have been excavated in this area dating to the same period. A portion of an aqueduct built by Pontius Pilate has recently been found in Bethlehem; this aqueduct brought water to Jerusalem from S of Hebron. The stone pavement on which Jesus stood before Pilate (Jn. 19:13) is almost certainly to be identified with the courtyard of the Fortress of ANTONIA, beneath the Sisters of Zion Convent. Excavations of Kathleen Kenyon have shown that the modern Church of the Holy Sepulchre, the probable site of the crucifixion and burial of Jesus, was outside the first-century city wall. Ancient burials for everyone but kings and high officials were outside the walls.

In 1947 the DEAD SEA SCROLLS were found on the NW shore of the Dead Sea in a number of caves, deposited there by a sect of Jews generally identified as ESSENES. Their walled community nearby was excavated from 1953 to 1956, revealing several large cisterns used for baptisms and for storage of water brought in by aqueduct from the cliffs to the west. It is possible that JOHN THE BAPTIST was acquainted with this sect in his earlier life. They not only baptized, but, like John, used Isa. 40:3 to justify their being in the wilderness. He preached in this area and baptized Jesus not far away. Ten of eleven caves found produced tens of thousands of fragments of ancient books including some of every book of the OT. A full copy of Isaiah was found dating to the second century B.C., the oldest copy of a book of the Hebrew Bible. The Essenes' documents were produced between 200 B.C. and A.D. 50. The community, consisting of perhaps 200 members, was destroyed by the Romans about A.D. 68.

In recent decades many papyri containing books of the NT dating into the third and even the second century A.D. have been found, such as the Bodmer II papyrus of the complete Gospel of John, the Chester Beatty papyri of Paul's letters, and the John Rylands fragment of Jn. 18 (which dates to the early 2nd cent., making it the oldest surviving piece of any book of the NT). A third-century Greek inscription of Rom. 13:3 was found in 1972 in excavations at Caesarea Maritima. It is part of a mosaic floor belonging to a building that was constructed in the third century and destroyed in the seventh.

In 1945 a complete library was discovered at NAG HAMMADI, Egypt, that contains many apocryphal NT books along with other books related to the religion of second-century Gnostic sects. Originally produced in Greek, they were translated into Coptic in the fourth century. These documents are extremely valuable for studying the milieu of early Christianity. Gnostic-type groups constituted a challenge to mainline Christianity in these early centuries, replacing the biblical emphasis on faith with that of a special kind of knowledge (gnosis; see GNOSTICISM). They seem to have prompted the finalizing of the limits of the NT canon.

An important discovery bearing on the chronology of the NT was reported privately by Jerry Vardaman, who has found coins with an accession date of A.D. 56 for FESTUS, before whom Paul appeared (Acts 25:1; unfortunately, Vardaman has not published his material). Very important is the older discovery of the GALLIO inscription in Delphi, Greece, which places this proconsul in Greece in the spring of 51, and thus PAUL's arrival there about eighteen months earlier (18:11).

An inscription dating probably to the middle of the first century A.D. was found in the pavement NE of the large theater in Corinth, reading ERASTUS. PRO. AED/S.P. STRAVIT. It means that Erastus, in return for his aedileship (an aedile was a Roman official in charge of public works), laid the pavement at his own expense. Unabbreviated it would read "Erastus pro aedilitate sua pecunia stravit." This must refer to the same Erastus whom Paul mentions as “treasurer of the city” of Corinth, for whom Rom. 16:23 was undoubtedly written! Also found in excavations at Corinth is the bema (referred to in a Latin inscription in Corinth as rostra), the tribunal or platform where Paul would have stood before Gallio (Acts 18:12-17).

Excavations in EPHESUS have revealed the 22,000-seat theater where an irate crowd assembled to express opposition to Paul’s attack on ARTEMIS, the patron goddess of the city (Acts 19:29). Her temple was one of the seven wonders of the ancient world. Two magnificent statues of Artemis were found, illuminating references to her in Acts 19:24-25.

Luke’s accuracy as a witness to the historical circumstances of early Christian missionary activity is indicated by the discovery of an inscription, now in the British Museum, that stood in an arch at the W end of the Egnatian Way in THESSALONICA. It begins “In the days of the politarchs ...,” using a word for Roman officials that critics said Luke had mistakenly used in Acts 17:6, since it has not been found anywhere else in Greek literature. A number of inscriptions have now been found that contain the word.

archangel. See ANGEL.

Archelaus. ahrˈkuh-layˈuhs (Gk. Archelaos G793). Son of Herod the Great; he succeeded his father as ruler of IDUMEA, SAMARIA, and JUDEA in 4 B.C., but was deposed by the Roman government in A.D. 6. Archelaus is mentioned once in the NT (Matt. 2:22). See HEROD.

archers. Bowmen, hunters, or warriors with bow and arrows. ISHMAEL is the first man so named in the Bible (Gen. 21:20). JOSEPH is represented as victor in a battle of archery (49:23-24). Archery played a part in a crisis in the relations of DAVID and JONATHAN (1 Sam. 20:17-42). PHILISTINE archers mortally wounded SAUL (1 Sam. 31:3; 1 Chr. 10:3). It is said of the sons of Ulam, descendants of BENJAMIN, that they “were brave warriors who could handle the bow” (1 Chr. 8:40). JOSIAH was killed by archers (2 Chr. 35:23), and JOB compared his troubles to being surrounded by archers (Job 16:13). Archers are mentioned elsewhere (e.g., Isa. 21:17; 22:3; Jer. 50:29). Light-armed, mobile, effective at a distance, archers were valuable in any ARMY, and their skill was no less useful in hunting.

Archevite. ahrˈkuh-vit (Aram. ʔarkēwāy H10074, gentilic derived from a place name; cf. Heb. ʔerek H804). This term in the KJV transliterates a name referring to people from the Babylonian city of ERECH (Uruk). Along with the Persians, Babylonians, Elamites, and others, they were transplanted by ASHURBANIPAL (Osnappar) to the cities of SAMARIA and other parts of the province (Ezra 4:9-10).

Archi. ahr´ki. See ARKITE.

Archippus. ahr-kip´uhs (Gk. Archippos G800, “master of the horse”). A Christian at COLOSSE, conspicuous as a champion of the gospel, a close friend (or perhaps the son or brother) of PHILEMON, an office-bearer in the church (Col. 4:17; Phlm. 2). Because of the spiritual laxity at Colosse (like LAODICEA, Rev. 3:14-19), it is not surprising to find that PAUL exhorts this fellow soldier to maintain his zeal and fidelity.

Archite. See ARKITE.

architecture. The art or science of building. As a form of art, architecture is the effort to make a building aesthetically pleasing as well as useful. It must be classified as an abstract art, for it is the least representational of all the arts. For example, an artist who wished to portray the Madonna and Child could hardly use architecture as his medium; some architects, especially in modern times, have indeed attempted to use symbolism in order to make it representational, but even this is greatly limited. Architecture could further be described as the most social of the arts, since a building is usually designed for more than one person, whether it is a church, a railroad station, or a home. The sole exception probably would be the monument or tomb that is intended simply to contain the remains of a single individual.

The materials of architecture in antiquity were wood, clay, brick (formed of clay, whether sun-baked or kiln-fired), and stone. In general, local availability determined the material used. It is well known that wooden beams were exported from LEBANON (the famed “cedars of Lebanon”) to practically all parts of the ANE; likewise the beautiful and distinctive rose granite was exported from the quarries at Aswan in Upper Egypt to many lands to be used for columns and statues, but these are notable exceptions.

One of the earliest materials for building is known as “wattle and daub,” formed by driving stakes into the ground and interlacing reeds or flexible twigs to form the framework, and then covering both sides with clay. When the clay had dried in the sun it was quite permanent and required only a periodic coat of plaster to preserve it. Wattle-and-daub walls have been found dating back to the earliest period of building, namely the late Neolithic period. Buildings of this material can be included under the subject of architecture only in the broadest sense of the word, however, for they give little indication of any aesthetic quality.

Clay bricks seem to have been invented by the Obeid people in PERSIA before they descended to the Mesopotamian plain early in the fourth millennium B.C. The temple of Abu Shahrein (known in ancient times as Eridu) in S Mesopotamia and that at Tepe Gawra in N Mesopotamia (both from the early part of the fourth millennium) can clearly be described as architectural buildings, incorporating several features that became characteristic of Mesopotamian architecture. We mention here only the use of the buttress, designed not so much to strengthen the construction as to break up the monotonous expanse of a clay-brick wall.

The Giza pyramids and sphinx are representatives of early Egyptian art and architecture.

In Egypt early builders experimented not only with clay and brick but also with wood, and then they made a remarkable transition to stone masonry. The genius traditionally connected with this new building technique was Imhotep, the designer and builder of the Step Pyramid at Saqqara in the time of Zoser (or Djoser) of the 3rd dynasty (c. 2780 B.C.). From an examination of the remains at Saqqara there seems to be little doubt that the builders were seeking to imitate wood through the medium of stone. We find simulated hinges, boards carved in stone doors that obviously could not function, and other features that would be useful in wood but only ornamental in stone.

In the same building compound at Saqqara are found such remarkable features as the proto-Doric column (which seems to have been formed in stone after the pattern of papyrus bundles), the cornice, corner posts, and other architectural elements. The columns, it should be added, are not freestanding but are an integral part of the stone building; yet they cannot properly be identified as pilasters, since they have all of the other features of the column. Fluting is not only concave in the customary Doric manner but also convex, and the capitals appear to be papyrus and palm leaves, which compare to the acanthus leaves of the Corinthian columns of Greek architecture of a much later period. If the columns were freestanding, the fluting would number from fourteen to twenty around the circumference of the column, which compares to twenty flutes in the classical Doric order.

One of the early problems to be faced in building was the construction of the roof, and the solutions led to two main forms of architecture: trabeated and arcuated. The trabeated form is designed and constructed using horizontal beams supported by vertical posts, commonly called “post and lintel.” The arcuated form makes use of various modifications of the arch. In the trabeated form the length of span between vertical supports is limited by the strength of the material used for the lintel. If, for example, the lintels were constructed of stone, as in ancient Egypt, it was only by using stone of great thickness that a span of any reasonable length could be obtained; as a result the space between columns in Egyptian temples is not much greater than the diameter of the columns. Wooden beams, on the other hand, permitted more useful space between the uprights. With the modern invention of structural steel and reinforced concrete, the span reaches probably its greatest limit.

An attempt to solve this problem resulted in the development of the arch. The first step was probably the corbelled vault, which is formed by stepping out successive courses of brick or stone beyond the supporting wall or column to meet similar corbelling from the adjacent vertical support. Corbelled vaults can be found at Ur in Mesopotamia as early as the Early Dynastic Period (c. 3000-2340 B.C.) and in Egypt as early as the tombs of the 3rd dynasty (c. 2780-2680) at Reqaqnah and Beit Khallaf. To judge from predynastic drawings from Egypt, the true arch may have developed from the practice of bending reeds, which had been erected vertically to form side walls, so they would join overhead to form a roof. The arch, which is but a refinement of corbelling to effect a curved line rather than a steplike appearance, is found also in some of the buildings of Ur. However, the arch does not seem to have been used successfully in large buildings until the Roman period and is generally attributed to the Etruscans. A modification of the corbelled vault, in which the stones form the sides of a triangle coming to an apex overhead, is found in Mycenaean tombs at Mycenae and Ugarit, dating from the fifteenth or fourteenth century B.C.

Unusual styles of architecture include the pyramid-shaped building. The ZIGGURAT in Mesopotamia is generally believed to be the representative of a mountain; it was built of clay brick with exterior staircases or a sloping ramp and probably a shrine at the top. One of the best preserved has recently been excavated at Choga Zambil, 23 mi. (37 km.) SE of Susa in Iran. The pyramids in Egypt were built as tombs and were constructed of stone, having an inner room or rooms. The Egyptians developed great precision in squaring and orienting their pyramids.

The Levant (the lands on the eastern shore of the Mediterranean) exhibited very poor architecture in the early second millennium B.C., and what little there is of quality can be traced to external origins. Original architecture does, however, seem to have developed in N Syria, the most characteristic being the bit ḫilani, a temple or palace compound that incorporates a portico and a throne room with their long axis parallel to the façade, behind which are small rooms, probably bedrooms and a storeroom. This pattern was developed in the second millennium but became characteristic of the early first millennium B.C. One feature of N Syrian architecture that should be mentioned is the use of a zoomorphic (animal form) base to support a column and often a human figure for the column itself.

Among the Israelites architecture does not seem to have been developed as an art or a skill; rather, Phoenician craftsmen were brought in to build Solomon's PALACE and TEMPLE. Phoenician elements appear to be present also in the buildings of subsequent Israelite periods; it is difficult to classify these, however, for the Phoenicians made use of many techniques and styles, some of which can be traced to Cyprus and Egypt. Their use of metal work in architecture (e.g., the columns in front of Solomon's temple) was possibly derived from Asia Minor. See PHOENICIA.

The HITTITES made use of stone foundations, often using large stones, at first rough but later dressed; characteristically the first course was set with the long dimension vertical. The upper portions of their buildings were frequently built of sun-dried brick strengthened by wooden beams, a type of architecture that can be found in the same areas of Asia Minor to the present time.

Late Assyrian architecture is perhaps best understood through the excavations of the palace of SARGON II at Khorsabad (720-704 B.C.). Regularity and a notable use of symmetry in the buildings are characteristic. Much of the work was still of clay brick, with the use of glazed bricks (a technique that had been imported by the Mitanni from Crete) to protect the exterior or exposed surfaces, as well as to lend a decorative element.

Persian architecture seems to have developed the use of the cyclopean foundation, which may have come from the Urartians in the region of Lake Van. This use of huge stones, sometimes with drafting around the edges, is comparable to the well-known Herodian use of large stones; particularly true of Taht-i-Sulayman N of Pasargadae in Iran, the foundation stones there could easily be mistaken for those at Ramat el-Khalil near HEBRON, a town built by HEROD several centuries later. The Persians apparently brought in the Ionic column from the Greek world and developed and used it widely. The base of Persian columns is characteristically Ionic with fluting; the double volute or spiral at the capital is likewise Ionic, but the columns are more slender and graceful. Some idea of the gracefulness of Persian columns may be gained from the fact that the ratio of the height to the diameter, which in Egyptian columns is rarely more than six to one and which attained a maximum of ten to one in the Corinthian order, is twelve to one in the Hall of XERXES at Persepolis. Likewise the distance between the columns, which in Egypt is rarely much more than one diameter and in Greek architecture from one to slightly less than three diameters, in Persian buildings is between three and one-half and seven diameters. This gave the halls a sense of spaciousness not found in other large buildings of antiquity. One feature of the capital of the Persian column is unique, namely the use of a stylized bull with a head at either end, the heads serving to support the longitudinal beams, while the hollow of the back supported the transverse beams.

The supreme achievement in architecture is admittedly the Periclean architecture of GREECE (460-400 B.C.). This is the Doric order characterized by simplicity and symmetry. There are certain optical refinements, among which may be mentioned the use of entasis (a slight convexity in columns to avoid the impression of hollowness that straight lines would give), similarly a slight convexity of long horizontal lines (to avoid the appearance of sagging), deviation from perpendicular at the corners of the building and from exact intervals of spacing between the columns (to avoid the appearance that the end columns are leaning outward and that the central columns are too close together). We can clearly see the developments of the Doric order if we consult first of all the Temple of Apollo at CORINTH (about the 6th cent.), then the great temple of Poseidon at Paestum in Italy (early 5th cent.). The Ionic order achieved its classical form during this same period, having originated along the Asiatic coast of the Aegean Sea. The Corinthian order developed toward the end of the fifth and the beginning of the fourth century and reached its zenith in the Greco-Roman period a few centuries later.

Roman architecture owed much to the Greeks but adopted some elements from the Etruscans; among the latter is principally the arch. In general we may say that Roman is not as subtle, but at the same time it is more utilitarian. The Greeks had developed the skill of masonry to a high degree of perfection and fit marble blocks together with remarkable accuracy without mortar or cement. The Romans, on the other hand, developed the use of pozzolana, a volcanic earth that was mixed with lime to make a hydraulic cement. Using this as mortar, they were able to bond courses of stone without exact precision in masonry, increase the span in arches, and build two-story structures. Roman architecture, even more than Greek, included memorial arches and columns, amphitheaters, theaters, forums (or marketplaces), and many other forms familiar to us from the numerous remains of the Roman world to be found all over the Middle East.

Arcturus. ahrk-toor'uh. One of the brightest stars in the sky, found in the constellation Boötes. It is the KJV rendering of two Hebrew terms (in Job 9:9; 38:2) that are now usually understood as a reference to the constellation of the Great Bear (Ursa Major or Big Dipper). See ASTRONOMY.

Ard. ahrd (Heb. ʔard H764, possibly “hunchbacked”; gentilic ʔardî H766, “Ardite”). Listed among the “sons” of BENJAMIN in Gen. 46:21, but identified more specifically as a son of BELA and therefore as Benjamin’s grandson in Num. 26:40, which also describes him as head of the Ardite clan; called ADDAR in 1 Chr. 8:3.

Ardon. ahr'don (Heb. ʔardôn H765, possibly “hunchbacked”). Son of CALEB (apparently by AZUBAH) and descendant of JUDAH (1 Chr. 2:18).

Areli. uh-ree'li (Heb. ʔar ʔēlî H739 [possibly variant of ʔārî ʔēl H791; see ARIEL], gentilic ʔar ʔēlî H740, “Arelite”). Son of GAD and ancestral head of the Arelite clan (Gen. 46:16; Num. 26:17).

Areopagite. See DIONYSIUS.

Areopagus. air'ee-op'uh-guhs (Gk. Areios pagos G740, “hill of Ares,” also known as “Mars’ Hill”; Ares was the Gk. god of war, corresponding to Mars in the Roman pantheon). A large, irregular outcropping of limestone about 380 ft. (115 m.) high. It lies NW of the ACROPOLIS, to which it is connected by a low, narrow saddle, and overlooks the AGORA, the marketplace of classical and Hellenistic ATHENS. Areopagus is also the name of the council that met on Mars’ Hill, a court dating back to legendary times, and in NT days still charged with questions of morals and the rights of teachers who lectured in public. Its importance was enhanced under the Romans. PAUL was brought to the Areopagus to be examined regarding his teaching (Acts 17:19-22). Before these “solid citizens,” the bulwark of civic and religious conservatism, Paul met the mocking taunts of the EPICUREANS and the STOICS, adherents of two of that day’s most popular philosophies. His address is today more widely read than any of the writings of the philosophers and is almost the only means by which we remember the Council of Areopagus. Paul’s mission in Athens produced numerically scant results, and the founding of no church is recorded; but DIONYSIUS the Areopagite, one of the members of this honorable court, and a woman named DAMARIS were among those who “became followers of Paul and believed” (17:34).

Looking from the Acropolis in Athens, we see the Areopagus (the limestone outcrop also known as Mars' Hill) with the agora or market place below it. (View to the N.)

Aretas. air´uh-tuhs (Gk. Haretas G745, from Nabatean Harīʾat). A NABATEAN king whose deputy sought to apprehend PAUL at Damascus (2 Cor. 11:32; cf. Acts 9:24). The name (or title?) was borne by several rulers. The king mentioned in the NT was Aretas IV, whose daughter was married to HEROD Antipas for a time.

Argob. ahr´gob (Heb. ʾargōb H758 and H759, prob. “mound”). (1) A region in BASHAN (Deut. 3:4, 13-14; 1 Ki. 4:13) in the kingdom of OG containing “sixty cities,” but possibly distinguished from the “settlements of Jair” (see HAVVOTH JAIR), which belonged to GILEAD (cf. Num. 32:41; Jdg. 10:4; 1 Ki. 4:13). The precise location of Argob is uncertain, but it probably covered the southern part of Bashan.

(2) An uncertain text (2 Ki. 15:25) leaves the question open whether the names Argob and Arieḥ refer to men or places. If they are men, it cannot be determined whether they were fellow-conspirators with PEKAH or victims slain with PEKAHIAH. If they are places, Argob would be the region discussed above (#1), and Arieḥ may be a reference to Havvoth Jair.

Aridai. air´uh-di (Heb. ʾāriday H767, a Persian name of uncertain meaning). One of the ten sons of HAMAN who were put to death by the Jews (Esth. 9:9).

Aridatha. air´uh-day´thuh (Heb. ʾārīdātā H792, a Persian name of uncertain meaning). One of the ten sons of HAMAN who were put to death by the Jews (Esth. 9:8).

Arieh. air´ee-uh (Heb. ʾaryēh H794, “lion”). Possibly a man who was assassinated along with PEKAHIAH and Argob (2 Ki. 15:25). For other interpretations of the text, see ARGOB #2.

Ariel (person). air´ee-uhl (Heb. ʾārī ʾēl H791, possibly “lion of God”; see also ARELI). (1) One of the leaders sent by EZRA to IDDO and to the temple servants (NETHINIM) in CASIPHIA, with an order to bring attendants for the house of God (Ezra 8:16-17).

(2) In 2 Sam. 23:20 the NRSV, following the SEPTUAGINT, states that Benaiah son of Jehoiada “struck the two sons of Ariel of Moab.” However, the Hebrew term here (ʾāriēl H738) is possibly not a proper name, and the NIV translates, “two of Moab’s best men [KJV, lionlike].”

Ariel (place). air´ee-uhl (Heb. ʾārī ʾēl H790, possibly “altar hearth of God” or “lion of God”). A symbolical designation for JERUSALEM (Isa. 29:1-2, 7), possibly suggested by metonymy as the place where the altar of God with its worship was located. Those who identify this name with “God’s hearth” suppose that the word comes from a root ʾrh “to burn.” Various commentators, following the Aramaic TARGUM, favor this view and point to Ezek. 43:15-16, where the term refers to an altar of four cubits with four horns on its corners. Others argue that the word means “God’s lion” (cf. 2 Sam. 23:20; Isa. 33:7). Less likely is the meaning “the light of God.”

Arimathea. air´uh-muh-thee´uh (Gk. Harimathaia G751). Also Arimathaea. The native town of JOSEPH, a member of the SANHEDRIN who, after the crucifixion, obtained the body of Jesus and placed it in his own unused tomb (Matt. 27:57-60; Mk. 15:43; Lk. 23:50-53; Jn. 19:38). Arimathea is mentioned in the NT only in connection with this story. The exact site is uncertain, but it is thought to be identical with the modern Rentis, 20 mi. (32 km.) NW of Jerusalem, in the hills of the SHEPHELAH area. It may be the same as the OT RAMATHAIM, where the prophet SAMUEL lived (1 Sam. 1:1).

Arioch. air´ee-ok (Heb. ʔaryôk H796, meaning unknown; in Daniel, Aram. ʔaryôk H10070). (1) King of ELLASAR and an ally of KEDORLAOMER king of ELAM, who with three other kings led a punitive expedition against the kings of the CITIES OF THE PLAIN (Gen. 14:1, 9). Attempts to identify Arioch (e.g., with Eri-Aku king of Larsa) have not been successful.

(2) Captain of the king’s guard at BABYLON under NEBUCHADNEZZAR (Dan. 2:14-25). He was commanded to execute the “wise men” who had failed to interpret the royal dream.

Arisai. air´uh-si (Heb. ʔârîsay H798, Persian name of uncertain meaning). One of the ten sons of HAMAN who were put to death by the Jews (Esth. 9:9).

Aristarchus. air´is-tahr´kuhs (Gk. Aristarchos G752, “best ruler”). A Macedonian Christian from THESSALONICA, one of PAUL’s travel companions. In EPHESUS, he and GAIUS were seized by the mob and rushed into the theater (Acts 19:29). Subsequently, Aristarchus was one of the delegates from the Thessalonian church accompanying Paul to Jerusalem with the collection (20:4); he was present also when the apostle left CAESAREA headed for ROME. Paul himself refers to Aristarchus as a “fellow prisoner” and “fellow laborer” (Col. 4:10; Phlm. 24).

Aristobulus. air´is-tob´yuh-luhs (Gk. Aristoboulos G755, “best adviser”). A Christian in ROME to whose household PAUL sent greetings (Rom. 16:10). There is a tradition that he was one of the seventy disciples and that he preached in Britain.

Arkite. ahr´kit (ʕarqî H6909 and ʔarkî H805). This name serves as the rendering of two different Hebrew words. (1) The first term refers to an inhabitant of the Phoenician town of Arka/Irqata (modern Tell ʕArqa, about 12 mi./19 km. NE of Tripoli, Lebanon, and about 4 mi./6 km. from the Mediterranean Sea). Arkites are mentioned in the genealogy of NOAH as descendants of CANAAN (Gen. 10:17; 1 Chr. 1:15).

(2) The other term (spelled “Archite” by KJV and other versions) refers to a clan mentioned in connection with the allotment of the descendants of JOSEPH; these Arkites inhabited ATAROTH, between BETHEL and Lower BETH HORON (Josh. 16:2; KJV, “Archi”). Its most famous member was HUSHAI, the adviser of DAVID and later of ABSALOM (2 Sam. 15:32; 16:16; 17:5, 14; 1 Chr. 27:33).

ark of bulrushes. Term used by the KJV to describe the small PAPHYRUS basket made for the infant MOSES, in which he was floated on the NILE in order to escape detection by the Egyptians (Exod. 2:3). Only this basket and the ARK OF NOAH are called by the name tēbâ H9310, which is possibly an Egyptian loanword for “box” or “coffin” (the usual word in Heb. for “box” or for the ARK OF THE COVENANT being ʾărôn H778). No description is given of the shape or construction of the basket, except that it was daubed with waterproofing substances (NIV, “tar and pitch”). It was made with some sort of cover over the top (cf. v. 6); this feature could account for the name “ark” even if the general shape was that of the papyrus boats of the Nile.

ark of Noah. A vessel that God ordered NOAH to build for the purpose of preserving through the time of the FLOOD a remnant of the human race, together with two each of all animals (Gen. 6:14-16). God told Noah what to bring into it (6:18-21), and Noah obeyed (6:22—7:10). The ark floated during the flood (7:11—8:3), then came to rest “on the mountains of Ararat” (8:4). After Noah abandoned the ark (8:18-19), what happened to it is unknown, despite many traditions and expeditions. We do not even know on which peak of the mountains in the land of Ararat the ark grounded. The ark of Noah is referred to in Matt. 24:38 and Lk. 17:27 in a warning of coming judgment; in Heb. 11:7 its construction is an example of faith; and in 1 Pet. 3:20 “the days of Noah while the ark was being built” are held up as an example of the long-suffering of God, followed by disaster for the disobedient and salvation for the few who entered the ark.

ark of the covenant. Also called ark of the testimony. A wooden chest containing the tablets of the law, resting in the TABERNACLE and later in the TEMPLE. God directed MOSES (Exod. 25:10-22; Deut. 10:2-5) to make the ark of acacia (shittim) wood, of precise dimensions, and to overlay it with pure gold within and without, with a crown of gold about it. Rings of gold at the corners, as well as gold-covered staves to put through the rings, were made to carry the ark. Moses placed inside the ark the stone tablets on which the commandments were written. An atonement cover of gold, with two winged cherubim of gold, covered the top of the ark. Moses made the ark after the golden calf was destroyed (Deut. 10:1, “at that time”) and set it up in the tabernacle (Exod. 40:20).

The ark went before Israel in the wilderness journeys “to find them a place to rest” (Num. 10:33). The ark was instrumental in the crossing of JORDAN on dry land under JOSHUA (Josh. 3) and in the capture of Jericho (4:7-11). Joshua prayed before the ark after the defeat at Ai (7:6) and after the subsequent victory at Mount EBAL with the ark present (8:33). In the days of ELI the ark was in the tabernacle at SHILOH (1 Sam. 3:3). Eli's sons took it into battle against the PHILISTINES, who captured it; because of this tragedy it was said, "The glory has departed from Israel" (4:3-22). The Philistines held the ark until a plague convinced them that it was too dangerous to keep, and they ceremoniously sent it back to BETH SHEMESH (5:1—6:16). The men of this place also suffered a plague for looking into the ark, and it was removed to KIRIATH JEARIM (6:19-21). Here it was treated with due respect, kept in the house of ABINADAB under the care of his son ELEAZAR (7:1-2).

Reconstruction of the ark of the covenant.

DAVID brought the ark to JERUSALEM, after some misadventures (2 Sam. 6; 1 Chr. 13 and 15). When URIA said to David, "The ark and Israel and Judah are staying in tents" (2 Sam. 11:11), he may have meant that the ark had been taken by the army into the field or merely that the ark was in a tent (the tabernacle) just as the armies of Israel and Judah were in tents. At the time of ABSALOM's rebellion, ZADOK and the LEVITES carried the ark out of Jerusalem, but David had them take it back (15:24-29). The priests brought the ark into SOLOMON's temple (1 Ki. 8:3-9). There was nothing in it at this time "except the two stone tablets that Moses had placed in it at Horeb" (8:9).

Before the ark was made, Moses directed that a pot of MANNA be kept before the Lord (Exod. 16:32-34) and Heb. 9:4 says that the "ark contained the gold jar of manna, Aaron's staff that had budded, and the stone tablets of the covenant," though it need not be understood to imply that these were the contents of the ark throughout its history. JEREMIAH, writing after the destruction of Jerusalem by NEBUCHADNEZZAR, prophesied that in time to come the ark would no longer be of significance for worship (Jer. 3:16). Psalm 132:8 speaks of the ark poetically as representing the strength of the Lord. Hebrews 9 uses the tabernacle and all its furnishings, including the ark, as an analogy in explaining salvation by the high priesthood of Christ. After the destruction of the first temple, there is no evidence as to what happened to the ark, but only highly speculative tradition and conjecture. SYNAGOGUES, from our earliest knowledge of them to the present, have had arks in the side wall toward Jerusalem; the scrolls of the Law are stored in them behind a curtain.

The ark was set in the very heart of the tabernacle, the Most Holy Place (Exod. 26:34), symbolizing its central significance in Israel. When the high priest, once each year (Lev. 16:15; Heb. 9:7), penetrated to the innermost shrine, he came into the very presence of the God of Israel (Exod. 30:6; Lev. 16:1-2). That presence, however, was not visibly expressed in any image form (Deut. 4:12), but by the presence of the law of the Lord, that is, the stone tablets and the atonement cover (“mercy seat”) that was over them. In other words, the ark by its contents declared the divine holiness by which all stand condemned and by its form (specifically the atonement cover) declared the divine redeeming mercy through the shed blood.

arm. In the Bible, the upper human limb is often used as a figure for personal, active power. Thus the Lord lays “bare his holy arm” (Isa. 52:10), rather as we might say of someone about to undertake some task, “he rolled up his sleeves.” The Lord’s arm (53:1) is figurative of his personal intervention. In particular, the figure of the “arm” looks back to what the Lord did at the EXODUS (Exod. 6:6; Deut. 4:34; 5:15; Isa. 51:9-11).

Armageddon. ahr´muh-ged´uhn (Gk. Harmagedōn G762, usually derived from Heb. har H2215 and mēgiddô H4459, “mountain[s] of Megiddo”). Also Har-magedon. A name found only in Rev. 16:16 for the final battleground between the forces of good and the forces of evil. The Valley of JEZREEL (Plain of Esdraelon) at the foot of Mount MEGIDDO was the scene of many decisive incidents in the history of Israel: the victory over SISERA sung by DEBORAH and BARAK (Jdg. 5:19-20); GIDEON’s defeat of MIDIAN (6:33); SAUL’s death at the hands of the PHILISTINES (1 Sam. 31; cf. 2 Sam. 4:4); JOSIAH’s death in battle with Pharaoh NECO (2 Ki. 23:29-30); AHAZIAH’s death when he fled there (9:27). The town of Megiddo guarded the pass that formed the easiest caravan route between the Plain of SHARON and the Valley of Jezreel, and the low mountains around were silent witnesses of perhaps more bloody encounters than any other spot on earth, continuing down to recent times. Hence the appropriateness of this place for the vast conflict pictured in Rev. 16.

Armenia. ahr-mee´nee-uh. An upland region in western Asia (SE of the Black Sea and SW of the Caspian Sea), earlier occupied by the kingdom of Urartu (see ARARAT). “Armenia” is used by the KJV to render Hebrew ʾārāraʿ H827 (only 2 Ki. 19:37 = Isa. 37:38), referring to the place where the two sons of SENNACHERIB, king of Assyria, escaped after murdering their father.

armlet. An ornamental band circling the upper arm, as a bracelet would do on the lower arm or wrist. The English term is used by some versions to render Hebrew ʾeṣ ṿādâ H731 (Num. 31:50; 2 Sam. 1:10; for the latter passage, NIV renders “band”). The NRSV uses the term also in Isa 3:20 for Hebrew ṣē ṿādâh H7578 (NIV, “ankle chains”). See also BRACELET.

Armoni. ahr-moh´ni (Heb. ʾarmônî H813, “palatial” [i.e., born in a palace] or “my citadel”). One of the two sons of SAUL by his concubine RIZPAH (2 Sam. 21:8). DAVID delivered the brothers (and five grandsons of Saul) to the Gibeonites (see GIBEON) to satisfy their vengeance (vv. 1-9).

armor. See ARMS AND ARMOR.

armor-bearer. A personal servant who carried additional weapons for the commanders of Israel’s armies. Armor-bearers are mentioned some eighteen times in the OT with reference to such commanders as ABIMELECH (Jdg. 9:54), JONATHAN (1 Sam. 14:7-17), King SAUL (1 Sam. 16:21; 31:4-6), and JOAB (2 Sam. 18:15; 23:37; 1 Chr. 11:39). Another of their duties was to slay those wounded in the onslaught of their masters. While the chieftains threw the heavy javelins and shot the arrows, the armor-bearers used clubs and thick swords to dispatch the enemy wounded.

armory. A place where military equipment is stored. The development of BRONZE and IRON weapons, and the introduction of the HORSE and CHARIOT in WAR, necessitated a specialized division of labor for both armorers and their arsenals. One important location was the “Palace of the Forest of Lebanon” (1 Ki. 7:2-12; 10:16-17). Certain arms were stored in the temple compound (2 Ki.

11:10), and in the later days of the commonwealth, arsenals were located around Jerusalem (2 Ki. 20:13; Neh. 3:19). See ARMS AND ARMOR.

arms and armor. These are mentioned often in the Bible, both literally and as illustrative of spiritual conflicts. Here only hand weapons and body armor are considered, not chariots or machines used in siege.

I. Offensive weapons. The sword is the first offensive weapon mentioned in the Bible: “A flaming sword flashing back and forth to guard the way to the tree of life” (Gen. 3:24). The common Hebrew term is hereb H2995. A sword for punishment is ascribed to God (Exod. 5:3; 22:24). Figurative and literal are united in the phrase, “a sword for the Lord and for Gideon” (Jdg. 7:20); GIDEON’s men were executing the judgment of God. In NT Greek the more common word is machaira G3479, referring to a short sword, dagger, or saber (Matt. 26:27-53; Rom. 8:35; 13:4); figuratively, PAUL speaks of “the sword of the Spirit” (Eph. 6:17). Another Greek term, rhomphaia G4855, originally referring to a large, broad sword, occurs with symbolic meaning once in Lk. 2:35 and six times in the book of Revelation (e.g., Rev. 1:16).

A rod, a stick loaded at one end, could be used as a weapon (Ps. 2:9). The sling was a band of leather, wide in the middle to receive a stone. With the ends held together, it was swung around the head, then one end was released so that the stone could fly to its mark (1 Sam. 17:40, 49; Jdg. 20:16; 2 Ki. 3:25). The bow is first mentioned as used in hunting (Gen. 27:3), and the practice of archery is described in 1 Sam. 20:20-22, 35-40. In the NT the bow is mentioned only once (Rev. 6:2). The spear (lance, javelin) was a sharp-pointed instrument to be thrust or thrown (Josh. 8:18; Jdg. 5:8; 1 Sam. 17:7; 18:11; Ps. 68:30). Spearmen are mentioned in Acts 23:23, and a Roman lance pierced the body of Jesus on the cross (Jn. 19:34). Flame-tipped darts were used also (Eph. 6:16).

II. Defensive armor. Shields were either small and round (Gen. 15:1; Jdg. 5:8; Heb. māgēn H4482) or large (1 Sam. 17:7, 41; Heb. šinnāh H7558), and were sometimes used for display (2 Chr. 9:16). The NT Greek term is thyreos G2599 referring to a long, oblong shield (Eph. 6:16). Helmets (1 Sam. 17:5; Isa. 59:17), sometimes of bronze (1 Sam. 17:38), protected the head (Eph. 6:17; 1 Thess. 5:8). The coat of mail or scale armor is mentioned in 1 Sam. 17:5 and elsewhere; the Hebrew term can refer to a breastplate (Isa. 59:17). The NT has several figurative or symbolic references to the breastplate (Eph. 6:14; 1 Thess. 5:8; Rev. 9:9, 17). Greaves, for protection of the legs, are mentioned only in 1 Sam. 17:6. The description of a heavily armed soldier in Eph. 6:11-18 is evidently drawn from Paul’s intimate contact, as a prisoner, with Roman guards. The phrase “whole armor” renders Greek panoplia G4110, a technical term for such armament. Note also the detailed description of the armor of GOLIATH (1 Sam. 17:4-7).

army. A large body of personnel armed and organized for warfare. The Hebrew term gēdūd H1522 generally refers to a band of light troops going out on forays (1 Sam. 30:8; 2 Sam. 22:30), though in the time of King AMAZIAH it was used of his great army of 300,000 chosen men of Judah and Benjamin with, at first, 100,000 mercenaries from the northern kingdom (2 Chr. 25:9; cf. vv. 5-6). These were drafted and put under colonels and captains. The very common Hebrew word ḥayil H2657, meaning “power” and often implying valor, is translated “army” in numerous contexts (Exod. 14:4 et al.). Another frequent term, šābā H7372, often translated “host” (as in the KJV phrase “the LORD of hosts”), may be used to highlight the vast number of the soldiers. When used of God’s army, the “soldiers” may be people (Exod. 7:4), angels (Ps. 103:21), or even locusts (Joel 2). The corresponding Greek word stratia G5131 in the NT is used of angels (Lk. 2:13) and of stars and planets (Acts 7:42).

The armies of Israel, when directed and led by God, were uniformly successful (Josh. 1:3; 5:14), but when men like SAUL (1 Sam. 15) and Amaziah (2 Chr. 25:14) refused to listen to God, defeat and death followed. For some reason, God did not want Israel to use or to depend on cavalry (Deut. 17:16; 20:1; Isa. 31:1). In the days of the judges, God raised up from time to time men of special ability to save Israel when the people had suffered for their apostasies and had been brought to repentance. These judges saved Israel from foreign oppressors and they varied greatly in character, from the godly DEBORAH (Jdg. 4-5) to the rather erratic champion SAMSON (ch. 14-16). Israel’s armies down to Solomon’s time were composed mostly of footmen, armed with swords, spears, bows and arrows, and slings, and protected by small shields. They were led by a judge, general, or king.

Numbers 1 contains a military census of Israel at SINAI just after the EXODUS, and Num. 26 records a second census taken forty years later in the plains of MOAB. According to the plain sense of the English versions, the number of military men was immense: over 603,000 at the exodus and nearly as many at the Jordan. These figures imply a total population of something like three million men, women, and children, accompanied by herds and flocks. It is hard to picture them drinking at a common spring, even a large one. The Hebrew word for “thousand” (elep H547) can also refer to a tribal subdivision or “clan,” and such a meaning would make the numbers more comprehensible (e.g., Num. 1:21 could read “forty-six families, five hundred men” instead of “46,500”). This approach also would explain the remarkable numerical phenomenon that in all the twenty-four numbers recorded, in the hundreds’ digits we have not a single “zero,” “one,” “eight,” or “nine.” The trouble with this theory, however, lies in the totals: if elep here means “family,” the total in Num. 1:46 would become “598 families, 5,500 men” instead of “603,500 men.”

Israel, on the condition of obedience (Deut. 28:1-7), could have become the paramount power of the earth; but when the nation had gone into hopeless APOSTASY, God began to raise up great universal world powers to overturn Israel (Dan. 2; Ezek. 21:27), preparing for the coming of our Lord. The Babylonians with their hordes were overthrown by the Persians, originally a hardy race whose armies were mostly cavalry; but when the Persian king XERXES (Esth. 1) attempted to invade Europe, he was defeated. The book of Esther tells of his great “feast” of six months, which was really a military council preparing for his invasion of GREECE in 480 B.C. The eastern army was defeated by the Greeks with their phalanxes of heavily armed infantry, arranged closely in ranks and files. The Greek armies, in turn, were conquered by ROME. The Romans had a genius for government and for military organization, and the various NT references mention their “commanders” (Acts 21:31), whom we would call colonels, and their “centurions” (10:1), implying their organization into legions and armies. Jesus hints at a possible angelic army divided into legions like the Roman army (Matt. 26:53). The smallest group mentioned in reference to the Roman army is the “quaternion” (Acts 12:4 KJV), comprising only four soldiers.

Arnan. ahr’nuhn (Heb. ʾarnān H820, possibly “ibex” or “quick”). A descendant of DAVID through Hananiah, son of ZERUBBABEL (1 Chr. 3:21). According to the NRSV (which follows LXX), Arnan was the son of Rephaiah and the father of Obadiah, but the precise relationship is left ambiguous by the NIV (following the MT, which says lit., “the sons of Rephaiah, the sons of Arnan, the sons of Obadiah”).

Arni. ahr’ni (Gk. Arni G767 [not in NIV]). Son of Hezron, included in Luke’s GENEALOGY OF JESUS CHRIST (Lk. 3:33 NRSV). However, the Lukan genealogy is textually uncertain at this point. The NIV, following many MSS, reads “Ram” (KJV, “Aram”; see Matt. 1:3; Ruth 4:19; 1 Chr. 2:9-10). See ARAM #4.

Arnon. ahr’nuhn (Heb. ʾarnôn H818, possibly “rushing [stream]”). The swift “roaring stream” and the valley of the same name that descend to the E side of the DEAD SEA a little N of its center. The river begins in the hills of N ARABIA, flows NW a while, and then turns westward to descend precipitously into the Dead Sea, emptying at about the lowest point on the earth’s surface. It is now a “wadi,” implying that it is dry most of the year. It is first mentioned as the boundary between MOAB and the AMORITES in the time of MOSES (Num. 21:13); Israel encamped on its N side so as not to invade Moab. In Jdg. 11:18-26 JEPHTHAH tells the AMMONITES how Israel had held the land N of the Arnon for 300 years previous to this time (c. 1560-1260 B.C.). For all those years, and for a long time after, the Arnon was the S boundary of the tribe of REUBEN. In the days of King JEHU (9th cent. B.C.), HAZAEL king of Aram overpowered Israel E of the Jordan as far as Arnon (2 Ki. 10:32-33). Today the Arnon (Wadi el-Mujib) flows through the kingdom of Jordan.

Looking NE into the valley of the Arnon River (Wadi el-Mujib).

Arod. air´od. See ARODI.

Arodi. air´uh-di (Heb. אֲרֹדִי H771; gentilic אֲרֹדִי H772, “Arodite”). Son of GAD and eponymous ancestor of the Arodite clan (Gen. 46:16; Num. 26:17; in the latter passage, the KJV and other versions, following the MT, have “Arod,” but “Arodi” is supported by several ancient versions).

Aroer. uh-roh´uhr (Heb. אֲרֹעַר H6876, prob. “juniper”; gentilic אֲרֹעַרִי H6901, “Aroerite”). (1) An ancient city E of the JORDAN on the N bank of the river ARNON about 14 mi. (23 km.) from the DEAD SEA and known as אֲרֹעַר in modern times. Initially it indicated the southern limit of the AMORITE kingdom of SIHON and was taken by Israel under MOSES (Deut. 2:36; 3:12; 4:48; Josh. 12:2). Aroer was evidently repaired by the descendants of GAD (Num. 32:34) before being assigned to REUBEN (Josh. 13:7, 16; Jdg. 11:26; cf. 1 Chr. 5:8). It was one of twenty towns that JEPHTHAH took from the AMMONITES (Jdg. 11:33). JOAB’s census for DAVID began at Aroer (2 Sam. 24:5). In the days of JEHU, HAZAEL, the powerful Aramean king, took the city from Israel (2 Ki. 10:33). Also about this time, MESHAI, king of MOAB, “built Aroer and...made the highway in the Arnon (valley)” (MOABITE STONE, line 26; see ANET, 320). Aroer evidently remained Moabite until the time of Jeremiah, who prophesied against it (Jer. 48:18-20).

(2) A city near RABBAH (Josh. 13:25; Jdg. 11:33). The site has not been positively identified; some think it is the same as #1 above.

(3) A city in the NEGEV some 20 mi. (32 km.) SE of BEERSHEBA and known today as Khirbet ‘Ar‘arah. David shared his Amalekite spoils with the people of Aroer (1 Sam. 30:28). Two sons of “Hotham the Aroerite” were among David’s mighty warriors (1 Chr. 11:44); however, some argue that the allusion here is to a site in TRANSJORDAN (thus #1 or #2 above).

Arpachshad. ahr-pak’shad. See ARPHAXAD.

Arpad. ahr’pad (Heb. ʾarpād H822, meaning uncertain). KJV also Arphad (Isa. 36:19; 37:13). The name of a province and its chief city located in the northern region of SYRIA near the city of HAMATH, with which it is invariably associated in the Bible. The modern Tell er-Refad, 25 mi. (40 km.) N of Aleppo, most probably marks the site today. The city was overrun by the Assyrians in 740 B.C. under TIGLATH-PILESER III and in 720 B.C. by SARGON II. The inability of Arpad and Hamath to withstand such attacks led to the Assyrian claim that Israel too would not be able to stand (2 Ki. 18:34; 19:13; Isa. 10:9; 36:19; 37:13).

Arphad. ahr’fad. See ARPAD.

Arphaxad. ahr-fak’sad (Heb. ʾarpakšad H823, derivation uncertain; Gk. Arphaxad G790). Also Arpachshad. Son of SHEM and grandfather of EBER (Gen. 10:22-24; 11:10-13; 1 Chr. 1:17-18, 24; Lk. 3:36). The birth of Arphaxad is the first recorded birth after the FLOOD. Many suggestions have been made concerning the nation of which he was the progenitor. One reasonable proposal is that his name should be linked to the CHALDEANS.

art. The application of human skills to produce a pleasing effect. The word is also used in a broader sense with reference to the good and the useful, but the narrower meaning, referring to the beautiful, is more common. The six major arts are music, dance, architecture, sculpture, painting, and literature.

It is difficult to date the beginning of art. If some human being found pleasure in the shape of a stone axe or flint sickle, this might be described as the beginning of art. By any definition, the line drawings in the cave of La Madelaine from the Old Stone Age seem to be art. Architecture might be traced to the first building of a house, although some effort at an aesthetic quality should be added to the utilitarian value in order for the building to qualify as “art.” Artistic attempts can be found in the early temples in MESOPOTAMIA from the fourth millennium B.C. and in EGYPT only slightly later. Sculpture is found in Mesopotamia and Egypt as early as the beginning of the third millennium. Literature must be placed before the time of writing, for the folk stories and legends had already taken on forms that gave pleasure to the hearers in the preliterate period—again toward the end of the fourth millennium. To judge from wall paintings in Egypt, music and dance must go back to about the same time. Hence it seems reasonable to date the beginning of art in historical cultures to some time in the fourth millennium. The origin of the arts may be intended in Gen. 4:21-22, where JUBAL and TUBAL-CAIN are mentioned.

The arts can be classified as spatial (architecture, sculpture, painting) and temporal (music, literature), with the dance extending over both categories. Spatial art can be seen as a whole before the parts become meaningful; temporal art on the other hand must be seen or heard in the parts before the whole is comprehended. The temporal forms therefore require a greater use of the memory on the part of the observer, and a certain amount of repetition and interpretation on the part of the artist. Music and in many cases literature might be called aural arts, whereas the others are visual arts.

Various geometric and floral designs are exhibited on this artistic ossuary from Jerusalem that may be as early as the 1st cent. B.C.

In each of the arts, categories of matter, form, and content can be distinguished. Matter involves all the material available to the artist to select, arrange, and use for the purpose intended; form involves all the ways in which the artist can organize the material; content involves what is actually expressed when the work of art is finished. The artist's innate ability is discernible in the selection of matter and form; it would be ludicrous if an artist were to attempt to present a sunset at sea by sculpturing in marble, or a thunderstorm by a piccolo solo.

It becomes increasingly apparent, as we think on the subject of art, that something of the IMAGE OF GOD as Creator is to be found in humans as artists. Artists create. In fact, some authors claim that there is no art in nature and no art without the creativity of the artist.

Each art has certain limitations imposed on it. Music and dance can convey certain emotional messages, but in spite of the saying that "music is the universal language," it is seriously limited in the intellectual message it can convey. Sculpture and painting can convey messages from the visible world but are more limited in conveying ideas or emotions. Literature is by far the most communicative of all the arts and can be used to convey conceptual, emotional, and other ideas. In keeping with this fact is the presentation of God's revelation through the medium of literature.

In Israel, probably because of the commandment against representational art (Exod. 20:4), there were no great contributions to the arts of painting or sculpturing. The major architectural work in Israel—the TEMPLE—is a notable exception, yet even that was constructed with some help from Phoenician craftsmen. References to dance in the OT are extremely limited and afford no information on the form or content. The development of music in Israel, on the other hand, is noteworthy; and to judge from the titles we may assume that many of the psalms, if not all, were sung to music and accompanied by musical instruments. Literature, however, was the most thoroughly developed art in Israel and reached a level not surpassed in all antiquity. See also DANCING; MUSIC AND MUSICAL INSTRUMENTS.

Artaxerxes. ahr'tuh-zuhrk'seez (Heb. ṣartaḥšāštā H831; Aram. ṣartaḥšāštē H10078; from Pers. Artakhshathra, "Arta's Kingdom"). There were three Persian kings with the name (or title?) of Artaxerxes, but external evidence indicates which of the three was NEHEMIAH's patron. The Elephantine papyri show that in 408 B.C. SANBALLAT was an old man whose work as governor of SAMARIA was to all intents and purposes in the hands of his two sons. This means that the Artaxerxes in whose reign Nehemiah lived must have been Artaxerxes I Longimanus (464-424), since obviously Sanballat was then in the prime of life. EZRA came to Jerusalem in 458, that is, the seventh year of Artaxerxes I (Ezra

7:7), and Nehemiah in 445, the twentieth year of the same reign (Neh. 2:1; 5:14; 13:6). Prior to these events, the Persian king had for a time halted the rebuilding of JERUSALEM (Ezra 4:7-23; 6:14).

Artemas. ahr'tuh-muhs (Gk. Artemas G782, contracted form of Artemidōros, “gift of Artemis”). One of two men whom PAUL contemplated sending as a replacement for TITUS on CRETE (Tit. 3:12). He must have been a coworker of considerable ability and experience. Tradition makes him bishop of LYSTRA.

Artemis. ahr'tuh-mis (Gk. Artemis G783, meaning uncertain). Identified with the goddess Diana by the Romans, Artemis was worshiped throughout the Greek world. Her sphere was the uncultivated earth, the forests, and the hills. Homer gave her the title, “lady of wild things,” the virgin huntress, armed with bow and arrows. “Artemis of the Ephesians” is mentioned only in Acts 19:24-35 (“Diana” in KJV). Her silver “shrines” (19:24) were little “temples” containing an image of Artemis as imagined by the Asiatics, a combination of the Greek virgin goddess with the many-breasted and lewd Semitic moon goddess ASHTORETH. For the Ephesians, Artemis was the great Asiatic nursing mother of gods, men, animals, and plants, and was the patroness of the sexual instinct. Her images, instead of being artistically beautiful like those of the Greeks, were ugly, more like the lascivious images of India and Tyre and Sidon. Her special worship was centered in the great temple at EPHESUS, probably because of the discovery of a very interesting aerolite that supposedly fell from heaven (19:35). The feasts of Artemis, “who is worshiped throughout the province of Asia and the world” (19:27), were commercialized, and among the silversmiths there was a large industry in making shrines and idols for the worship of this goddess. The preaching of PAUL interfered with this commerce and aroused violent opposition. It seems that Paul and his companions had preached the gospel from the positive side instead of directly attacking the idolatry, for the city clerk testified that they “neither robbed temples nor blasphemed our goddess” (19:37).

artificer, artisan. See OCCUPATIONS AND PROFESSIONS.

Arubboth. uh-ruhb'oth (Heb. ʾārubbôt H749, from a word referring to a lattice or window). KJV Aruboth. A town in one of the twelve administrative districts from which provisions for SOLOMON's household were obtained by BEN-HESED, an official of Solomon's court (1 Ki. 4:10, mentioned with “Socoh, and all the land of Hephher”). The site is now identified by various scholars with Khirbet el-Hammam, 17 mi. (27 km.) NW of SHECHEM and thus within the hill country of MANASSEH. The name may be preserved in the nearby town of Arrabeh.

Aruboth. See ARUBBOTH.

Arumah. uh-roo'mah (Heb. אֲרֻמָּה H777, “lofty”). The town in which ABIMELECH, the son of Jerub-Baal (GIDEON), lived after he had been driven from SHECHEM (Jdg. 9:41; NRSV also reads “Arumah” as a conjecture in v. 31). The site is identified with modern Khirbet el-Ormah, 5 mi. (8 km.) SE of Shechem.

Arvad. ahr'vad (Heb. אַרְוַד H770, derivation uncertain; gentilic אַרְוַדִּי H773, “Arvadite”). The most northerly town in PHOENICIA, situated on a rocky island called now Ruad (opposite the coastal town of Tartus, Syria). The island lies a short distance off the Syrian coast directly opposite CYPRUS. In Greek and later sources it is called Arados/Aradus. In ancient times it was heavily built over to spite its diminutive size of less than a mile in circumference. There are remains of the sea walls with immense stones 12 ft. (3.6 m.) long and 10 ft. (3 m.) high, indented with deep grooves, perhaps for tying up boats. Arvad ruled over much of the neighboring coast for centuries. Although few surface remains are extant, various scenes of the town appear on Assyrian reliefs. Arvad is mentioned only twice in the OT as a place that supplied sailors and soldiers for TYRE (Ezek. 27:8, 11). Its inhabitants, the Arvadites, are also mentioned in the Table of Nations as descendants of CANAAN (Gen. 10:18; 1 Chr. 1:16).

Arza. ahr'zuh (Heb. אֲרָצָה H825, perhaps “pleasing” or “woodworm”). The steward of ELAH, king of Israel, at the palace in TIRZAH, where ZIMRI murdered the king during a drinking debauch (1 Ki. 16:9-10).

Asa. ay'suh (Heb. אָסָא H654, perhaps “healer” or “gatherer”). (1) Third king of Judah, reigning from 911/10 to 870/69 B.C. (1 Ki. 15:9-24; 2 Chr. 14-16). He was the first of the five kings of Judah (Asa, Jehoshaphat, Joash, Hezekiah, Josiah) who were outstanding for godliness, and he deserves special credit considering his idolatrous ancestors. He was the son of ABIJAH and grandson of REHOBOAM. Asa's grandmother was MAACAH (2 Chr. 15:10; lit., “mother”), a daughter of ABSALOM and a confirmed idolatress who greatly influenced Judah toward idolatry. Asa began his reign by deposing his wicked and powerful grandmother and by destroying a fearful, impure image that she had set up. He then drove out the male shrine prostitutes and destroyed idols that his fathers had worshiped (15:12), commanding the nation of Judah to seek the Lord God of their fathers (14:4).

In the early peaceful days of his reign, he gathered into the temple the dedicated things that he and his father had dedicated to the Lord (1 Ki. 15:15). Then about 897 B.C. ZERAH the Ethiopian came against him with an immense force. The Lord helped Judah defeat them at MARESHAH in the west-central part of Judah, because Asa trusted the Lord (2 Chr. 14:9-15). In 2 Chr. 15:1-13 we see how the Lord approved and encouraged Asa in his faith and in his work of reformation. Later, c. 895/94, BAASHA of the northern kingdom made war against Judah. The people this time did not put their whole trust in the Lord, but Asa bribed BEN-HADAD of Aram (SYRIA) to break his league with Baasha so as to draw off the forces of Israel. This Ben-Hadad did, but the Lord, through his prophet Hanani, rebuked Asa for trusting in politics rather than in God (1 Ki. 15:16-22; 2 Chr. 16:1-10). In the thirty-ninth year of his reign Asa was taken with a severe disease of the feet, and because he trusted his physicians rather than the Lord, he died two years later (2 Chr. 16:11-14).

(2) Son of Elkanah and father of Berekiah, listed among the Levites who resettled in their towns after the EXILE (1 Chr. 9:16).

Asahel. as'uh-hel (Heb. ʿăśāh ʾēl H6915, “God has made”; cf. ASAIAH). (1) Son of ZERUIAH (DAVID's sister) and brother of JOAB and ABISHAI (1 Chr. 2:16). As one of David's thirty mighty men (2 Sam. 23:24), he was made commander of a division of 24,000 soldiers in David's army (1 Chr. 27:7). Asahel was noted for bravery and fleetness (2 Sam. 2:18; 23:24). In the Battle of GIBEON he pursued ABNER, the commander of ISH-BOSHETH's troops, to kill him. Abner was aware that the hour had arrived for David to lead the nation, and that contention among the military leaders could only be a detriment to the best interests of the nation; thus he slew Asahel, after warning him, in vain, to forbear (2 Sam. 2:18-23).

(2) A Levite sent by King JEHOSHAPHAT to instruct the people throughout the realm in the law of MOSES (2 Chr. 17:8).

(3) A Levite overseer of the temple who supervised the offerings during the reign of HEZEKIAH (2 Chr. 31:13).

(4) The father of a certain Jonathan who opposed EZRA the scribe when the latter told those who had returned from the EXILE to divorce their non-Jewish wives (Ezra 10:15).

Asahiah. as'uh-hi'uh. KJV alternate form of ASAIAH (2 Ki. 22:12, 14).

Asaiah. uh-zay'yuh (Heb. ʿăšāyâ H6919, “Yahweh has made”; cf. ASAH^{EL}). (1) Son of Haggiah and a descendant of MERARI. He is listed among the Levites whom DAVID put in charge of the MUSIC in the tabernacle. He also had a part in bringing the ARK OF THE COVENANT from the house of OBED-EDOM to Jerusalem (1 Chr. 6:30; 15:6, 11).

(2) A clan leader of the tribe of SIMEON (1 Chr. 4:36). He assisted in dispossessing the inhabitants of GEDOR during the reign of HEZEKIAH (vv. 38-40).

(3) An official under King JOSIAH; he was part of the deputation sent by the king to consult HULDAH the prophetess regarding the book of the law found by HILKIAH (2 Ki. 22:12, 14 [KJV, “Asahiah”]; 2 Chr. 34:20).

(4) The firstborn of the SHILONITES; he and his family were among the first to resettle in Judah after the Babylonian captivity (1 Chr. 9:5 NIV and most versions; the TNIV reads “Shelanites” on the basis of Num. 26:20).

Asaph. ay'saf (Heb. ʾaāsāp H666, “gatherer” or “[God] has added”). (1) A LEVITE descended from GERSHON, appointed over the service of praise in the time of DAVID and SOLOMON (1 Chr. 16:5; 2 Chr. 5:12). He led the singing and sounded cymbals before the ark and apparently set up a school of music (Neh. 7:44). Twelve psalms are credited to Asaph (Ps. 50; 73-83). This accreditation does not necessarily imply authorship (see PSALMS) and may mean no more than that these psalms constituted an Asaphic collection, begun by the great man and then prolonged over the years by the Asaph singers. The psalms themselves cover a long span of time, for psalms like 74 are best understood in an exilic context. The psalms of Asaph have certain points in common: God as Judge (50:3-4; 75:8; 76:8-9), a call to true spirituality reminiscent of the prophets (50:7, 14-15, 22-23; 81:8-10), the use of history to teach spiritual lessons (78), the Lord as Shepherd (74:1; 77:20; 79:13; 80:1). These psalms have a deep and contemplative nature.

(2) The father of Joah, who was the recorder under King HEZEKIAH (2 Ki. 18:18; Isa. 36:3, 22).

(3) An officer under ARTAXERXES Longimanus of Persia (465-445 B.C.) who was designated as the keeper of the king's forest in Palestine (Neh. 2:8).

(4) The name Asaph in 1 Chr. 26:1 is probably an abbreviation or a scribal error for Ebiasaph (cf. LXX and 9:19; see ABIASAPH).

(5) The earliest Greek MSS read “Asaph” in the Matthean GENEALOGY OF JESUS CHRIST (Matt. 1:7-8), but the reference is certainly to ASA (a secondary reading found in most witnesses). It is not clear why Matthew would have spelled the name as he did.

Asareel. uh-sair´ee-uhl. See ASAREL.

Asarel. as´uh-rel (Heb. אָסָר אֵל H832, possibly “God has bound [with a vow]” or “God has filled with joy”). KJV Asareel. Son of Jehallelel and descendant of JUDAH (1 Chr. 4:16).

Asarelah. as´uh-ree´luh (Heb. אָסָר אֵלָה H833, possibly “God has bound [with a vow]” or “God has filled with joy”). One of the sons of ASAPH who assisted their father in the prophetic ministry of MUSIC (1 Chr. 25:2; RSV, “Asharelah”). The pattern into which the sons of Asaph fall in 1 Chr. 25:9-14 indicates that Jesarelah, who was the head of the seventh company of temple musicians appointed by lot under David (v. 14), should be identified with Asarelah.

Tower of the Church of the Ascension on the Mount of Olives. (View to the N.)

ascension of Christ. The EXALTATION of the eternal Son, in his assumed and glorified humanity, from earth to heaven in order to sit at the right hand of the Father as coregent. The witness of the NT to the ascension of CHRIST is of three kinds. First, there is the descriptive material in Mk. 16:19; Lk. 24:51; Acts 1:9-11. Second, there is the prophetic or anticipatory reference found in Jn. 6:62; 20:17. Third, there is the reference that assumes that Christ is ascended and exalted and therefore proclaims his present exalted position or future coming in glory (Eph. 4:8-11; Heb. 4:14; 6:19-20; Rev. 12:1-6). Much of the latter teaching is molded in the light of Ps. 110:1, 4. Ascension presupposes bodily RESURRECTION, for it was in his body that Jesus went up to heaven. The term exaltation covers both resurrection and ascension, while session means his sitting at the Father's right hand. The position of the exalted Jesus has often been portrayed in biblical imagery as that of King (= Lord) of the universe and church, Priest of the people of God, and Prophet to the people of God and the world. The HOLY SPIRIT is sent by the Father in the name of the Lord Jesus so that he comes bearing the virtues and characteristics of Christ and so is the Paraclete (Jn. 16:5-14). As Jesus ascended into heaven, so he will return from heaven to judge the world (Acts 1:11).

ascent. This English term is used a number of times in the Bible, especially in the description "song of ascent" (see ASCENTS, SONG OF). It also occurs in the KJV and other versions with reference to mountain passes (Num. 34:4; Josh. 15:7; et al.). The Hebrew word is used in other contexts as well, such as 2 Ki. 20:9-10, where HEZEKIAH is told that his sundial would go back ten "degrees" (KJV; the NIV has "steps"); see DIAL.

ascents, song of. A description that occurs in the titles of Ps. 120-34 (KJV, "Song of degrees"). There is uncertainty about its origin. Some Jewish authorities attributed it to the use made of fifteen steps leading to the court of women in the TEMPLE. The Levitical musicians performed with these steps as the stage. Some scholars attribute the title to the way in which the thought advances from step to step, as seen in Ps. 121:4-5 and 124:1-4, but not all the songs have this characteristic. The most logical explanation is that the title was given to the series of hymns because they were used by pilgrims going up to the three annual pilgrimage FEASTS of Jerusalem.

These lovely pilgrim songs should be studied in groups of three. In each group, the first psalm finds the pilgrim far away (e.g., Ps. 120, he feels himself an alien in Kedar; Ps. 129, still among enemies); the second in each triad concentrates on the Lord's power to preserve, whatever the vicissitudes of the way; and the third is a psalm of arrival and security in ZION. In this way the whole "pilgrim hymnbook" is vibrant with the theme of going up and going home to the Holy City.

asceticism. Although this word is not used in the Bible, the concept is found frequently. In the positive sense of self-discipline, asceticism normally occurs in the OT in connection with particular circumstances such as repentance (1 Sam. 7:6) or religious regulations (Lev. 10:9; Num. 6:1-8). In the NT, however, self-discipline affects the whole lifestyle, calling for renunciation of everything that hinders discipleship (Matt. 19:21-22; Mk. 10:29-30). Self-control is listed as a fruit of the Spirit (Gal. 5:23). It is demanded of the contestant (1 Cor. 9:25), of church elders (Tit. 1:8), and of Christians generally (2 Pet. 1:6), who must not let the “good things” of this world rob them of the best things. The term asceticism, however, more frequently has a negative connotation, referring to severe self-denial and austerity, and the Bible condemns regulations that involve a “harsh treatment of the body” (Col. 3:20-23; cf. 1 Tim. 4:3). Both within and outside the Christian church, asceticism has often been fueled by a nonbiblical, dualistic philosophy that views the body in negative terms, for example, as a prison from which the soul needs to be released.

Asenath. as’uh-nath (Heb. āsēnat H664, “she belongs to [the goddess] Neit”). Also Aseneth. Daughter of POTIPHERA, priest of ON. The PHARAOH gave her to JOSEPH as a wife, and she became the mother of EPHRAIM and MANASSEH (Gen. 41:45, 50; 46:20). Asenath is a subject of interest in Jewish tradition, especially in the apocryphal work Joseph and Asenath, according to which she renounced her heathen religion and became a worshiper of Yahweh when she married Joseph.

Aser. See ASHER.

Ashan. ay’shuhn (Heb. āšān H6941, prob. “smoke,” perhaps suggesting a desolate place). A town in the SHEPHELAH originally assigned to the tribe of JUDAH (Josh. 15:42; possibly the same as BOR ASHAN, 1 Sam. 30:30). Later it was either transferred to SIMEON or considered a border town (Josh. 19:7); it was also designated a Levitical city of refuge (1 Chr. 6:59). The location of Ashan is uncertain, but some identify it with modern Khirbet Asan, 1.5 mi. (2 km.) NW of BEERSHEBA.

Asharelah. ash’uh-ree’luh. See ASARELAH.

Ashbea. See BETH ASHBEA.

Ashbel. ash´bel (Heb. אַשְׁבֵּל H839, derivation disputed; gentilic אַשְׁבֵּלִי H840, “Ashbelite”). Second son of BENJAMIN (1 Chr. 8:1; listed as third in Gen. 46:21) and the progenitor of the Ashbelite clan (Num. 26:38).

Ashchenaz. ash´kuh-naz. See ASHKENAZ.

Ashdod. ash´dod (Heb. אַשְׁדּוֹד H846, perhaps “fortress”; gentilic אַשְׁדּוֹדִי H847, “Ashdodite”; Gk. Azōtos G111). One of the five chief cities of the PHILISTINES; the other four were GAZA, ASHKELON, GATH, and EKRON (Josh. 13:3; KJV, “Ashdothite”). Three of them were on or near the coast, and Ashdod was the northernmost of them, about 10 mi. (16 km.) N of Ashkelon. These cities were assigned to the tribe of JUDAH, but Judah failed to drive out the inhabitants “because they had iron chariots” (Jdg. 1:19). Ashdod was a center of DAGON worship, and when the Philistines thought to honor the ARK OF THE COVENANT by placing it in their temple (1 Sam. 5:1-7), God cast down and destroyed their idol. The Philistines found by careful testing that their plagues (ch. 5-6) were from God, so they sent back the ark with a guilt offering. UZZIAH, king of Judah early in the eighth century B.C., conquered the city (2 Chr. 26:6). Amos predicted Ashdod’s destruction (Amos 1:8). About the year 711, SARGON II of ASSYRIA took it (Isa. 20:1). In Jeremiah’s prophecy (Jer. 25:15-29) Ashdod was to drink with the nations “this cup filled with the wine” of God’s wrath. Zephaniah prophesied the destruction of the Philistines (Zeph. 2:4), and Zechariah said that “foreigners will occupy Ashdod” (Zech. 9:6). In NEHEMIAH’s time (c. 444) the men of Ashdod combined with others to hinder the Jews (Neh. 4:7-9). Failing in this, they tried intermarrying with them (13:23-24) to produce a mongrel race, but Nehemiah foiled them. In the SEPTUAGINT and in the NT Ashdod is called by its Hellenistic name, “Azotus.” PHILIP the evangelist found himself there after the Holy Spirit had taken him away from the ETHIOPIAN EUNUCH (Acts 8:40).

Ashdodite, Ashdothite. ash´duh-dit, -thit. See ASHDOD.

Ashdoth Pisgah. See PISGAH.

Asher. ash´uhr (Heb. אָשֶׁר H888, “happy, fortunate”; gentilic אָשֶׁרִי H896, “Asherite”; Gk. Asēr G818). KJV NT Aser. (1) Son of JACOB by ZILPAH, the handmaid whom LABAN gave to LEAH his daughter; his name reflects Leah’s happiness at his birth. Asher was born at PADAN-ARAM (in the plain of MESOPOTAMIA) during Jacob's service with Laban (Gen. 30:13). We know little of his personal history except the names of his five children (46:17).

(2) The tribe that descended from Asher (Num. 1:13 et al.). Jacob had predicted, "Asher's food will be rich; / he will provide delicacies fit for a king" (Gen. 49:20), and MOSES said of this tribe, "Most blessed of sons is Asher; / let him be favored by his brothers, / and let him bathe his feet in oil" (Deut. 33:24). The Asherites were given the territory along the Mediterranean in the NW corner of Palestine (Josh. 19:24-31), but they failed to drive out the inhabitants of SIDON, ACCO, and other Canaanite towns (Jdg. 1:31-32). The tribe does not figure prominently in Israelite history, and it is not even referred to in the list of DAVID's tribal officers (1 Chr. 27:16-22). The prophetess ANNA was from the tribe of Asher (Lk. 2:36).

(3) According to some scholars, Asher in Josh. 17:7 may be a reference to a town rather than to the tribe. If so, the site is unknown.

Asherah. uh-shihr'uh (Heb. ʾāšērâ H895, derivation uncertain). A Canaanite deity, goddess of the sea and the consort of EL; the same Hebrew term can also refer to the sacred wooden poles associated with her cult (usually masc. pl. form ʾāšērîm, but sometimes fem. pl. ʾāšērôt). The KJV translates this word with "grove," following the SEPTUAGINT. These poles were associated with incense stands (Isa. 17:8), altars (Jer. 17:2), high places (2 Chr. 17:6), and other images (2 Chr. 34:4). It is twice called an "abominable image" (NRSV, 1 Ki. 15:13; 2 Chr. 15:16; NIV, "repulsive Asherah pole"). Prior to the discovery of Ugarit (RAS SHAMRA), the deity Asherah was sometimes confused with ASHTORETH (Astarte). In the Ugaritic texts, however, Asherah (Athirat) is described as the progenitress of several gods, including BAAL, who was also associated with her (cf. Jdg. 3:7; 6:26-30; 1 Ki. 18:19; 2 Ki. 23:4). Asherah is not mentioned in connection with the PATRIARCHS, but the Israelites were commanded to cut down or burn the Asherim of the Canaanites; they also were forbidden to plant any tree as an Asherah beside the altar of the Lord (Exod. 34:13; Deut. 12:3; 16:21). Unfortunately, the Israelite invaders appropriated for their own religious worship the "high places" of the Canaanites and also adopted Asherah (1 Ki. 14:23; 2 Ki. 17:10, 16; Isa. 17:8; 27:9; Jer. 17:2; Mic. 5:13-14). GIDEON was told to destroy his father's Asherah pole (Jdg. 6:25-26). The deity is not associated with the kings of the monarchy, but later, after the kingdom split, she is mentioned in connection with both the northern and southern kingdoms. King MANASSEH even introduced Asherah into the temple at Jerusalem (2 Ki. 21:3, 7); subsequently, JOSIAH brought the image out of the temple and burned it (23:4).

Asherim. uh-shihr´im. See ASHERAH.

Asherite. ash´uh-rit. See ASHER.

Asheroth. uh-shihr´oth. See ASHERAH.

ashes. The expression “dust and ashes” (e.g., Gen. 18:27) is a play on words (Heb. āpār H6760 and ēper H709) and alludes to the origin of the human body from the ordinary chemical elements. It contrasts the lowliness of mortals with the dignity of God. Ashes were sprinkled over a person, or a person sat among ashes, as a sign of MOURNING (2 Sam. 13:19; Job 2:8). The word is often united with SACKCLOTH to express mourning (Jer. 6:26). The lovely expression “beauty [pē ēr H6996] for ashes” (Isa. 61:3 KJV) is also a play on words. Another word for ashes (dešen H2016) is used for the remains of the burnt offering (e.g., Lev. 6:10-11). See SACRIFICE AND OFFERINGS.

Ashhur. ash´uhr (Heb. āšḥûr H858, possibly “black”). KJV Ashur. Son of HEZRON, descendant of JUDAH, and “father of Tekoa,” which probably means that he was the founder or leader of the village of TEKOA (1 Chr. 2:24; 4:5; the name Ashhur is not to be confused with ASSHUR.)

Ashima. uh-shi´muh (Heb. āšîmā H860, possibly Aram., “the name”). A deity worshiped by the inhabitants of HAMATH who had settled in SAMARIA (2 Ki. 17:30). Some have thought that the name is a corruption of ASHERAH, the Canaanite mother goddess. Others associate Ashima with Eshmun, the chief god of SIDON. It is also possible that the name could designate any of the Semitic goddesses thought to be consorts of BAAL. (In Amos 8:14, the NRSV reads, “Those who swear by Ashimah of Samaria,” which involves a slight emendation of the Hebrew.)

Ashkelon. ash´kuh-lon (Heb. āšqēlôn H884, meaning uncertain; gentilic āšqēlônî H885, “Ashkelonite” [Josh. 13:3; KJV, “Eshkalonite”]). One of the five chief cities of the PHILISTINES, situated on the Mediterranean sea coast about midway between ASHDOD and GAZA (the other two cities in the Philistine pentapolis were ASHDOD and GATH). Ashkelon was taken by the tribe of JUDAH shortly after the death of JOSHUA (Jdg. 1:18), but was retaken by the Philistines and remained in their hands through much of the OT period. In the eighth century B.C. Amos denounced the city for its complicity with P^{HOENICIA} and E^{DOM} in their warfare on Israel (Amos 1:6-8). Zephaniah, writing in the dark days before the captivity of Judah (Zeph. 2:4, 7) and looking far into the future, saw the restoration of Judah with the Jews occupying the desolate ruins of Ashkelon. Zechariah, writing about 518, prophesied that Ashkelon would see the destruction of T^{YRE} and then that Ashkelon itself would be destroyed (Zech. 9:5). Apparently it was rebuilt, for H^{EROD} the Great was born there and Roman ruins have been found. During the Crusades, it came to life again, and Richard Coeur de Lion held court there. Later the town reverted to the Saracens. Archaeological remains are sparse: a ruined and overgrown Byzantine church, a quadrangle with some preserved columns and foundation walls of an odeum (tiered council chamber) attributed to Herod the Great by the excavators, some statues belonging to the façade of the odeum, and a third-century A.D. painted tomb. The oldest evidence of occupation here is from the area near the beach and dates to c. 2000 B.C.

Figurine of a kneeling worshiper discovered at Ashkelon.

Ashkenaz. ash´kuh-naz (Heb. אַשְׁכְּנַז H867). KJV also Ashchenaz. Son of GOMER and grandson of JAPHETH (Gen. 10:3; 1 Chr. 1:6). He was the eponymous ancestor of a people mentioned by Jeremiah in association with ARARAT and MINNI (Jer. 51:27). Probably Ashkenaz is to be identified with the SCYTHIANS, a people who had settled near Lake Urmia in the region of Ararat (Urartu) in the time of Jeremiah. The name Ashkenaz is used also with reference to Germany in medieval Hebrew, and thus today the term Ashkenazi refers to Yiddish-speaking Jews from central and northern Europe (in contrast to Sephardi [see SEPHARAD], which designates someone who descends from the Jews who lived in Spain).

Ashnah. ash´nuh (Heb. אֲשֵׁנָה H877, derivation uncertain). (1) A town in the SHEPHELAH of JUDAH, listed between ZORAH and ZANOAH (Josh. 15:33); it should perhaps be identified with modern Aslin, near the edge of the maritime plain of Judah.

(2) Another town of Judah, also in the Shephelah, but apparently farther S, between IPHTAH and NEZIB (Josh. 15:43); this Ashnah may be the same as modern Idna, some 8 mi. (13 km.) WNW of HEBRON.

Ashpenaz. ash´puh-naz (Heb. אֲשַׁפְּנַז H881, perhaps Old Pers., “[keeper of the] inn”). The name (or title) of the chief official in NEBUCHADNEZZAR’S court, responsible for bringing to Babylon certain Hebrew youths for training (Dan. 1:3; NRSV, “palace master”; lit., “chief of his eunuchs” [see EUNUCH]).

Ashriel. ash´ree-uhl. See ASRIEL.

Ashtaroth. ash´tuh-roth (Heb. אַשְׁתָּרֹת H6958, from the name of the Canaanite goddess, Ashtoreth; gentilic אַשְׁתְּרָתִי H6960, “Ashterathite”). (1) A city in northern TRANSJORDAN, near ancient EDREI and N of the village of JAIR; home of OG, king of BASHAN (Deut. 1:4 [KJV, “Astaroth”]; Josh. 9:10; 12:4; 13:12). After the Israelite conquest, Ashtaroth was allotted to the half-tribe of MANASSEH and settled by the descendants of MAKIR (13:31). It was then given to the Levite clans descended from GERSHON (1 Chr. 6:71; cf. also Josh. 21:27, where BE ESHTARAH may be a scribal mistake for Ashtaroth). One of DAVID’S mighty men was Uzzia the Ashterathite. Most scholars identify Ashtaroth with ASHTEROTH KARNAIM, modern Tell Ashtarrah, some 20 mi. (32 km.) E of the Sea of Galilee.

(2) The KJV and other versions use the form Ashtaroth to transliterate the plural of ASHTORETH, the Canaanite goddess (Jdg. 2:13 et al.). The NRSV has “Astartes,” while the NIV renders it “Ashtoreths.”

Ashterathite. ash'tuh-ruh-thit. See ASHTAROTH.

Ashteroth Karnaim. ash'tuh-roth-kahr-nay'im (Heb. ʿaštērōt qarnayim H6959). A city inhabited by the REPHAITES, located on the KING'S HIGHWAY and sacked by four kings under the leadership of KEDORLAOMER in ABRAHAM'S time (Gen. 14:5). Some have taken the name as meaning “Ashtoreth of the two horns,” finding support for this interpretation in art work from GEZER and BETH SHAN that depicts a female goddess with two horns. It seems much more probable, however, that the name refers to the city of ASHTAROTH and was so designated because of its proximity to the city of KARNAIM (modern Sheikh Sa'd, c. 23 mi./37 km. E of the Sea of Galilee; see Amos 6:3).

Ashtoreth. ash'tuh-reth (Heb. ʿaštōret H6956). The OT Hebrew name of the Canaanite goddess otherwise known as Astarte (from Gk. sources), and corresponding to the Mesopotamian deity Ishtar. The plural form ʿaštārōt, referring to the idols representing her, is transliterated as Ashtaroth in the KJV and other versions (Jdg. 2:13 et al.). Her male consort was apparently BAAL, and the two were worshiped with lewd fertility rites. In Jdg. 2:11-23 we are told that the Israelites forsook their God and served “Baal and the Ashtoreths.” The prophet SAMUEL brought about a great revival, but before Israel could be saved from the PHILISTINES, they had to give up Ashtoreth and turn to the Lord (1 Sam. 7:3-4). Israel kept fairly close to the Lord through the times of Samuel, SAUL, and DAVID, as well as the early days of SOLOMON, until that “wise” man lost his wisdom by marrying various heathen women for political reasons. They succeeded in turning his heart from the Lord to worship of the Ashtoreth and other idols (1 Ki. 11:4-8). These idols remained more than three and a half centuries till JOSIAH defiled and demolished them (2 Ki. 23:13-14).

Ashur. See ASHHUR and ASSHUR.

This cuneiform text is known as the Autobiography of Ashurbanipal; it recounts his early life and education prior to being crowned king.

Ashurbanipal. ash'uh-ran'uh-puhl (Assyr. Aššur-bān-apli, “Ashur has created an heir”). King of ASSYRIA, 669 to c. 626 B.C. He was grandson of the famous SENNACHERIB and son of ESARHADDON. Ashurbanipal, or, as he was known to the Greeks, Sardanapalus, was contemporary with several kings of Judah: MANASSEH, JOTHAM, and JOSIAH. Modern scholars have reason to be grateful to Ashurbanipal because he was a lover of learning and collected a great library of cuneiform tablets in NINEVEH (over 22,000 in number) that have given to us most of what we know of Babylonian and Assyrian literature. It is generally thought that Hebrew ʾosnappar H10055 (Ezra 4:10; KJV, “Asnapper”; NRSV, “Osnappar”) corresponds to Ashurbanipal.

Ashuri. ash'uh-ri (Heb. ʾāšûrî H856). Also Ashurite. The name of a region or of a people group in N Israel over whom ISH-BOSHETH, son of SAUL, ruled in his brief reign of two years (2 Sam. 2:9). If the term refers to a place, its location is unknown. It is unlikely that the name refers to the Assyrians (who had not yet occupied any part of Canaan) or to the Arabian ASSHURITES (Gen. 25:3; these inhabited regions outside of Israel). The TARGUM interprets the name as a reference to the tribe of ASHER, and some scholars agree by emending the text to read “Asherites.”

Ashurite. ash'uh-rit. See ASHURI; ASSHURITES.

Ashvath. ash'vath (Heb. ʾāšwāt H6937, perhaps “blind” or “unintelligent”). Son of Japhlet and descendant of ASHER (1 Chr. 7:33).

Asia. ay'zhuh (Gk. Asia G823, derivation uncertain). The ancient Greeks used this term in a general way to refer to the lands E of them, that is, the blunt peninsula later known as ASIA MINOR, as well as the countries beyond it. In the NT, however, this name refers invariably to a Roman province that comprised nearly one-third of the W end of Asia Minor. Asia was the richest and best endowed part of the great peninsula. It contained the whole western coastline and the adjacent islands. Its great cities were ancient seats and centers of Hellenic and Hellenistic civilization, with its science, philosophy, and literature. Its capital was EPHESUS, where PAUL labored; in this city too JOHN THE APOSTLE administered the group of Christian communities to which he wrote his letters. Most of the cities of Asia have disappeared, but SMYRNA (Rev. 2:8-11) remains a great city even now (called Izmir, in modern Turkey). PHILADELPHIA remained till the Middle Ages.

Asia Minor. The Greek phrase hē mikra Asia (the Little Asia) was first used after NT times to denote the westernmost part of the Asian continent, that is, the peninsular mass between the Aegean Sea and the EUPHRATES River, and roughly equivalent to modern Turkey. It is also known as Anatolia (from Gk. anatolē G424, “rising [of the sun],” i.e., “east”) and as the Levant (though the latter term usually includes the other countries bordering on the eastern Mediterranean Sea). In the second millennium B.C., the heartland of Asia Minor was the center of the great HITTITE empire, but the area was also home to various other people groups. During the first millennium B.C., it was frequently the scene of wars and political changes. By NT times, it had been organized into provinces under the Roman empire. See separate articles for the regions within Asia Minor mentioned or alluded to in the Bible: ASIA (which in the NT refers only to the westernmost Roman province), BITHYNIA, CAPPADOCIA, CARIA, CILICIA, GALATIA, LYCIA, LYDIA (PLACE), MYSIA, PAMPHYLIA, PISIDIA, PHRYGIA.

Asiarch. ay'zhee-ahrk (Gk. Asiarchēs G825). This word is used in some Bible versions as a straight transliteration of the Greek term in Acts 19:31 (NRSV, “officials of the province of Asia”; cf. also NIV). Similar officials are found in other provincial contexts. Little is known about this office, although it appears possible that the title was permanent, and that once a citizen had held the office, he continued to bear the honorary title. It is likely that a number of Asiarchs were in EPHESUS at the time of PAUL’s clash with the guild of the silversmiths. Perhaps they functioned collectively, with the year’s incumbent performing the duties of the office.

Asiel. as´ee-uhl (Heb. אָסִיִּל H6918, prob. “God has made”). A Simeonite whose great-grandson, Jehu, is listed as a clan leader in the days of King HEZEKIAH (1 Chr. 4:35; cf. vv. 38-43).

Asnah. as´nuh (Heb. אֲסָנָה H663, perhaps “thornbush”). The head of a family of temple servants (NETHINIM) who returned from the EXILE with ZERUBBABEL (Ezra 2:50).

Asnapper. See ASHURBANIPAL.

asp. See ANIMALS.

Aspatha. as-pay´thuh (Heb. אֲסַפְתָּא H672, a Pers. name of uncertain meaning). One of the ten sons of HAMAN who were put to death by the Jews (Esth. 9:7).

Asriel. as´ree-uhl (Heb. אֲסִרִּי־עֵל H835, meaning uncertain; gentilic אֲסִרִּי־עֵלִי H834, “Asrielite”). Son of GILEAD, great-grandson of MANASSEH, and eponymous ancestor of the Asrielite clan (Num. 26:31; Josh. 17:2). In 1 Chr. 7:14 (KJV, “Ashriel”) he is described as the son (NIV, “descendant”) of Manasseh through an Aramean concubine.

ass. See ANIMALS.

assembly. See CONGREGATION.

Asshur. ash´uhr (Heb. אַשּׁוּר H855, meaning uncertain). KJV and TNIV Ashur; KJV also Assur. One of the three sons of SHEM (Gen. 10:22; 1 Chr. 1:17; not to be confused with an Israelite named ASHHUR). His name was borne also by the patron deity, people, territory (cf. Gen. 2:14), and capital city of ASSYRIA (out of almost 140 occurrences of the name in the OT, all but half a dozen or so are usually rendered “Assyria” or “Assyrians”). Asshur son of Shem was considered to be the founder of the Assyrian nation, whose king list refers to the earliest founders as tent-dwellers in the southern and western deserts (cf. Gen. 10:11). The name of the national god (often spelled Ashur) is not found in the Bible, although some see allusions to it (e.g., Num. 24:22-24; Ps. 83:8). It occurs as an element in many personal names (e.g., ASHURBANIPAL, ESARHADDON) and may well account for the name given to the capital city. The ruins of the city of Asshur (modern Qalāʿat Sherqat) lie c. 56 mi. (90 km.) S of Mosul (NINEVEH) on the W bank of the TIGRIS River, bordering the great desert.

Asshurim. ash´uh-rim. See ASSHURITES.

Asshurites. ash´uh-rits (Heb. ʾaššûrim H857). Also Ashurites, Asshurim. An Arabian tribe descended (along with the LETUSHITES and LEUMMITES) from ABRAHAM and KETURAH through DEDAN (Gen. 25:3). They are not related to ASSHUR and the Assyrians.

Assir. as´uhr (Heb. ʾassîr H661, possibly “captive”). (1) Son of KORAH and descendant of LEVI (Exod. 6:24; 1 Chr. 6:22).

(2) A son of Ebiasaph (see ABIASAPH) and grandson of #1 above (1 Chr. 6:23, 37). Some scholars believe these genealogical lists are textually corrupt and that there was only one Assir.

(3) According to the KJV, a son of Jeconiah (i.e., JEHOIACHIN, 1 Chr. 3:17), king of Judah. Most scholars, however, regard the Hebrew word here not as a proper name, but as an adjective (cf. NIV, “Jehoiachin the captive”).

Assos. as´os (Gk. Assos G840). Also Assus. Modern Behramkoy, seaport of MYSIA in ASIA MINOR on the N coast of the gulf of Adramyttium, 7 mi. (11 km.) from the island of Lesbos to the S near Methymna, and 20 mi. (32 km.) S of TROAS (Acts 20:13-14). The ship with LUKE and others sailed from Troas around Cape Lectum, while PAUL walked the shorter way (20 mi./32 km.) overland to Assos, where he reached the ship in time for her arrival that evening at MITYLENE, a port on the SE coast of Lesbos.

Assur. as´uhr. See ASSHUR.

assurance. The Christians’ confidence that God is their Father and Christ their Savior and Lord. Thus they know that what the gospel declares about Jesus is true and that in Jesus they have a new relationship with God. The term assurance can also refer to the external evidence supporting that confidence.

FAITH as belief in, trust of, and commitment to God through Jesus Christ carries with it a certain assurance. This is because true faith includes the acceptance of God's own testimony concerning himself and his relation to a sinner (Acts 17:31; 1 Cor. 2:10-13; 1 Thess. 2:13). Thus the believer approaches the Father in prayer and worship with humble conviction and "full assurance" (Gk. plērophoria G4443, Heb. 10:22; cf. 6:11; Col. 2:2). In fact the Christian is "fully persuaded" that God is what he says he is and does what he claims to do (Rom. 4:21; cf. 8:38; 2 Tim. 1:12).

There is also the internal witness of the HOLY SPIRIT bringing the knowledge that the believer is truly a child of God (Rom. 8:15-16) as well as the external testimony of a changed life (1 Jn. 2:3-5, 29; 3:9-14, 18-19; 4:7). Because of the presence of the indwelling Spirit, assurance in the new COVENANT is of a much deeper order than in the old covenant. However, assurance was a reality for believers within the Mosaic covenant (Isa. 32:17).

The Assyrian Empire.

Assyria. uh-sihr'ee-uh. Originally a land between the upper TIGRIS and Zab rivers, with its capital first at ASSHUR, later at NINEVEH. Assyria was taken over in the third millennium B.C. by Semites from ARABIA. First mentioned in the Bible in Gen. 2:14, Assyria and the Assyrians are frequently named, sometimes as Asshur (KJV, Assur). By 1900 B.C. Assyrian traders had a colony in HITTITE territory, at Kanish in ASIA MINOR. In the thirteenth century Assyrian military expeditions crossed the Euphrates, and by 1100 they reached the Mediterranean. But Assyria was not strong enough to maintain their advance.

By 1000 the Aramean kingdom of ZOBAB reached the EUPHRATES, but DAVID conquered Zobah and stopped its invasion of Assyria, an irony of history enabling Assyria to become strong. The tenth century B.C. was one of powerful and systematic advance. Assyria rounded out its borders N and E, conquered Babylonia (see BABYLON), and advanced westward through Aramean territory to the Mediterranean. Under SHALMANESER III the Assyrians turned toward Palestine. In 853 they were defeated at Qarqar but claimed a victory over BEN-HADAD of DAMASCUS and a coalition including AHAB, king of Israel. They failed to follow up their effort.

Assyrian human-headed winged bull and protective spirit (c. 710 B.C.). These enormous figures guarded one of the gates into the citadel of Khorsabad; the weight of one of them has been estimated at sixteen tons.

After the religious revival under ELIJAH and ELISHA, the coalition of Israel with SYRIA broke up. When JEHU gained the throne (2 Ki. 9-10), Shalmaneser III seized the opportunity to claim tribute from Jehu and to weaken Damascus. Internal difficulties kept Assyria from further Palestinian inroads for nearly a century, until shortly after the middle of the eighth century B.C., when TIGLATH-PILESER III invaded the W, divided the territory into subject provinces, and exchanged populations on a large scale to make rebellion more difficult. In 733-732 he conquered GALILEE, the Plain of SHARON, and GILEAD, making both Israel and Judah pay tribute (15:29; 16:9). Isaiah prophesied that this attempt to subjugate Judah would eventually fail. Shalmaneser V besieged Samaria for three years. He died during the siege, and his successor SARGON II took the city in 721 and carried its more prosperous citizens into exile, replacing them with colonists from other provinces of his empire (17:6-41).

For nearly a century thereafter, Assyria was troubled from all sides—from Babylon, Elam, the Medes, Phrygia, and Egypt. Yet Sennacherib nearly captured Jerusalem in 701-700 B.C. (2 Ki. 18:13—19:37; Isa. 36-37), the danger ending only when “the angel of the Lord went out and put to death a hundred and eighty-five thousand men in the Assyrian camp,” an event followed by the assassination of Sennacherib by his own sons. Manasseh, king of Judah, paid tribute to Assyria, except during a short rebellion for which he was carried to Babylon but released after he sought the Lord (2 Chr. 33:11-13). The last quarter of the seventh century saw the fall and decline of the Assyrian empire and its subjugation by the Chaldean conquerors of Babylonia with the Medes. Nineveh was taken in 612. For a short time Babylonia replaced Assyria as the great power. The prophets Elijah, Elisha, and Isaiah are largely concerned with Assyria; several other prophets—Jeremiah, Ezekiel, Hosea, Micah, Nahum, Zephaniah, and Zechariah—refer to it. Jonah was actually sent to prophesy to Nineveh, and the revival he unwillingly promoted saved the city from destruction for a long period of time.

Assyrian kings during the centuries in which Assyria had its closest contact with Israel and Judah, with approximate dates for their reigns (all B.C.) from the list found at Khorsabad in Mesopotamia, are as follows:

Shalmaneser III	859-824
Shamshi-Adad V	823-811
Adad-Nirari III	810-783
Shalmaneser IV	782-772
Ashur-dan III	771-754
Ashur-Nirari V	753-746
Tiglath-Pileser III	745-727
Shalmaneser V	726-722
Sargon III (II)	722-705
Sennacherib	705-681
Esarhaddon	681-669
Ashurbanipal	669-627
Ashur-eti-ilani	627-623
Sin-shum-lishir	623-623
Sin-shar-ishkun	623-612

Assyrian art, architecture, and technology were successively influenced by Sumerians, Akkadians, and Babylonians and early attained high levels, exciting the admiration and imitation of AHAZ, king of Judah (2 Ki. 16:10-13). Literature was largely utilitarian—legal, historical, commercial, scientific, pseudoscientific, and religious—but it exists in abundance, notably the library of ASHURBANIPAL, consisting of thousands of clay tablets. The Assyrians early added to their worship of the primitive national god Asshur the Babylonian deities with their cultic apparatus. Wherever they influenced Israel and Judah, the effort was demoralizing, as the historical books of the Bible and the prophets bear abundant witness.

Astaroth. as'tuh-roth. See ASHTAROTH.

Astarte. as-tahr'tee. NRSV form of ASHTORETH.

astrologer. This term is used in the NIV and other English translations of Daniel to render the Hebrew word kaśdîm H4169 (Dan. 2:2 et al.; Aram. kaśdāy H10373 in 2:10 et al.), which could also be translated “Chaldean” (cf. NRSV and see CHALDEA). In the same passages, the KJV uses “astrologer” as a translation of ʾaššāp H879 (Aram. ʾāšap H10081), which means “enchanter.” In addition, both the KJV and the NIV use “astrologers” to represent a difficult Hebrew phrase in Isa. 47:13 (lit., “dividers of heaven”). The MAGI from the east mentioned in Matt. 2:1 (magos G3407) were high-ranking Persian priests expert in ASTROLOGY and other occult arts.

astrology. The observation of the sun, moon, planets, and stars for the purpose of determining the character of individuals and the course of events. In warning his people against Canaanite superstition (Deut. 18:10-13), Moses made no reference to astrology or any sort of fortune-telling by means of the stars, for it was essentially a Babylonian or Mesopotamian profession, though it later came into Palestine. Although the term ASTROLOGER appears several times in the English Bible (e.g., Dan. 2:2; 5:7 NIV), the only unequivocal references to the practice and its practitioners are found in Isa. 47:13 (“those stargazers who make predictions month by month”) and in Jer. 10:2 (where people are urged not to be “terrified by signs in the sky”). It was a characteristic of Babylonian wisdom, as well as Egyptian, to ponder the movement of the stars, taking note of variations and conjunctions, so as to predict events on earth. See also ASTRONOMY.

astronomy. The study of celestial bodies and phenomena. While the word astronomy is not found in the Bible, there are many passages that refer to some aspects of the subject. God is recognized as the maker of the stars (Gen. 1:16) as well as the one who knows their number and names (Ps. 147:4). In the beautiful poem of Ps. 19 the psalmist asserts that the heavenly bodies (referring to the stars) show forth the glory of their Creator. A reference is made also to the sun as one of the heavenly bodies.

There are hundreds of biblical references to stars, sun, moon, and planets. When God wished to tell ABRAHAM how numerous his descendants would be, he took him out and showed him the stars. Then God said, “Look up at the heavens and count the stars—if indeed you can count them” (Gen. 15:5). The Bible refers in a most striking manner to the height of the stars—that is, to their distance from the earth: “Is not God in the heights of heaven? And see how lofty are the highest stars!” (Job 22:12). Another reference to the great height of the stars is found in Isa. 14:13, “I will ascend to heaven; I will raise my throne above the stars of God.” The implication here is that it must be a very great distance to the stars, but it was not until recent times that scientists became aware of the astonishing distances involved.

It appears that the biblical writers were aware that the stars differ greatly from each other. PAUL, writing to the church at CORINTH, says, “The sun has one kind of splendor, the moon another and the stars another; and star differs from star in splendor” (1 Cor. 15:41). This has been verified by the astronomers. Not only do stars have different colors, but they also differ widely in size, in density, in temperature, and in total amount of light emitted. The sun, around which the earth revolves, is an average star. While it is over one million times as large as the earth, there are some stars that are one million times as large as the sun. On the other hand, there are other stars smaller than the planet Mercury.

One of the many sins of the children of Israel was that of worshiping idols. They wanted to worship also the sun, the moon, and the stars. In Deut. 4:19 they were warned not to indulge in such worship. In spite of such warnings, sun worship prevailed many times. ASA and JOSIAH, kings of Judah, found it necessary to take away the sun images that had been kept at the entrance to the temple. See IDOLATRY; SUN.

While there is little evidence in the Bible that the Hebrew people had indulged very much in the study of astronomy, it is clear that they recognized a sublime order in the movements of the heavenly bodies. They observed carefully the daily rising of the sun, its majestic movement across the sky, and its final setting in the west. This is vividly portrayed in the story of the battle with the AMORITES as recorded in Josh. 10, when the sun stood still in the middle of the sky. Many theories have been proposed in an attempt to give a scientific explanation to this “long day of Joshua.” None is completely satisfactory, and they will not be discussed here. It is sufficient to add that this is one of many miracles recorded in the Bible to show us that God is the ruler and sustainer of the universe.

More remarkable than the long day of Joshua when the sun apparently stood still, is the story of the return of the shadow on the sundial of AHAZ. In this case the Lord gave King HEZEKIAH a sign saying, “I will make the shadow cast by the sun go back the ten steps it has gone down on the stairway of Ahaz” (Isa. 38:8). This is, indeed, a remarkable miracle. If taken literally, it means not only that the earth stopped rotating on its axis, but that it reversed its direction of rotation for a short time. Again the scientists have no answer to explain such an event.

Babylonian text (164-163 BC) recording an observation of Halley's comet to about 22-28 September, 164 BC.

There are a number of allusions in the Bible to eclipses of the sun and of the moon. In Isa. 13:10 it is stated, “The rising sun will be darkened,” while in Joel 2:31 we have the statement, “The sun will be turned to darkness and the moon to blood.” These two descriptions accord quite well with observations of eclipses of the sun and of the moon. As the shadow of the moon sweeps across the face of the sun it appears that the sun is turned to darkness. When the earth comes directly between the sun and the moon, there is an eclipse of the moon. When the eclipse is complete, it is still possible to see the surface of the moon, due to the fact that the atmosphere of the earth bends the light rays from their straight line path. Thus sunlight is bent somewhat as it passes the earth; it is then reflected by the moon and returned to the earth. Just as the sun appears to be red when it is setting, due to the passage of the light through more atmosphere, so the eclipsed moon appears strange in color. The Bible uses the apt expression “turned...to blood” to describe this astronomical phenomenon.

Calculated eclipses of the sun that occurred in Palestine during OT times are as follows: July 31, 1063; August 15, 831; June 15, 763; May 18, 603; May 28, 585. Very likely the prophets Amos and Joel witnessed the eclipse of August 15, 831. Such an eclipse is vividly described by Amos: “I will make the sun go down at noon and darken the earth in broad daylight” (Amos 8:9).

The subject of ASTROLOGY has been connected with astronomy since early times. The reference in OJdg. 5:20 no doubt refers to the influence of the stars in the lives of people. The writer states, “From the heavens the stars fought, from their courses they fought against Sisera.” However, the Hebrew people seemed to have had little to do with the subject. In the book of Daniel there are repeated statements made concerning the astrologers. It is to be noted that Daniel and his three friends, though closely associated with astrologers, are always mentioned as keeping themselves separated and undefiled. Again and again when the magicians and the astrologers were unable to perform a task, it was Daniel who was able to do important things for the king. Thus it is apparent that the Bible condemns the pseudoscience of astrology.

Probably the most fascinating part of biblical astronomy concerns the star of BETHLEHEM. This story is told in the second chapter of Matthew. When the wise men from the E came to Jerusalem they asked, “Where is the one who has been born king of the Jews? We saw his star in the east and have come to worship him” (Matt. 2:2). Even King HEROD was greatly disturbed over the news, and he inquired of them diligently at what time the star appeared. This star seemed to be their ever-present guide, for it is stated that “the star they had seen in the east went ahead of them until it stopped over the place where the child was” (2:9).

The question is: What kind of a star can continually guide travelers to a definite point on the earth? Many answers have been proposed. One is that this was an unusual conjunction of bright planets (the coming together on the same meridian at the same time of two or more celestial objects). Another theory is that this star was a nova (an explosion that makes a star look suddenly much brighter), although it is unclear how such a bright star could serve as a guide to the wise men. Still another theory is that this was the planet Venus at its greatest brilliance, but these MAGI knew the movements of the planets, and therefore the bright appearance of Venus would hardly have served as a guide to lead them to the Christ child.

Evidently here is another of the many biblical miracles that modern science is unable to explain. This miraculous appearance, which is called a star, aroused the curiosity of the wise men to such an extent that they followed it for many miles until finally it pointed out the exact place where they wished to go.

There is much evidence in the Bible that some of the constellations were known to the writers. The Lord asked Job, “Can you bind the beautiful Pleiades? / Can you loose the cords of Orion?” (Job 38:31; cf. also v. 32; 9:9; Isa. 13:10; Amos 5:8). One constellation that has a special significance to some Christians is Cygnus (the flying swan), also known as the Northern Cross. Its six stars form a huge Roman cross in the summer sky, about the size of the Big Dipper. This constellation sinks westward in the sky until at Christmas time it stands upright just above the horizon in the NW. Some see rich symbolism in the fact that the star Deneb at the top of the cross, where the head of Christ was, is a super-giant, while the one at the bottom, Albireo, where his feet were, is a beautiful telescopic double-star.

In the last chapter of the last book of the Bible, the Lord Jesus is called “the bright Morning Star” (Rev. 22:16). Evidently the writer, the apostle John, had frequently waited for the morning light and had watched for the bright morning star, which is usually a planet. Its beauty had greatly inspired him, so he used this striking figure for the Lord Jesus Christ. Many Christians watch for his coming as people of old have watched for the morning and have seen the bright stars of the morning!

Asuppm. uh-suhp´im (pl. of ʾāsōp H667). KJV transliteration of a Hebrew word that is more correctly interpreted as a common noun (1 Chr. 26:15, 17); the phrase of which it is a part is rendered “storehouse” by the NIV and other versions (the Heb. word occurs also in Neh. 12:25, where KJV renders it with “thresholds”).

Aswan. as-wahn´. See SYENE.

asylum. See CITIES OF REFUGE.

Asyncritus. uh-sin´kri-tuhs (Gk. Asynkritos G850, “incomparable”). A Christian in ROME, named with four other men, to whom PAUL sent greetings (Rom. 16:14). Mentioned first, he may have been the leader of this group of believers.

Atad. ay'tad (Heb. ʾāṭād H354, “thornbush”). A threshing floor where the funeral cortège of JACOB stopped on its way northward to HEBRON (Gen. 50:10-11). Here the Egyptians mourned seven days for Joseph's father, and therefore the place was given the name ABEL MIZRAIM, “mourning [or meadow] of the Egyptians.” A geographical problem is seen in the statement that Atad was “beyond the Jordan” (NRSV), since the direct route from Egypt to HEBRON would be W of the river. It is possible that the cortège followed an old trade route through the Sinai peninsula or that the phrase should be translated “near the Jordan” (NIV). The site has not been identified.

Atarah. at'uh-ruh (Heb. ʾăṭārāh H6499, “crown”). The second wife of JERAHMEEL and the mother of Onam, mentioned in the genealogy of JUDAH (1 Chr. 2:26).

Ataroth. at'uh-roth' (Heb. ʾăṭārôt H6500, “crowns,” or perhaps “[cattle] pens”). (1) One of the towns built by the descendants of GAD in the TRANSJORDAN (Num. 32:3, 34) along with DIBON and AROER. It is mentioned by King MESHA on his MOABITE STONE (lines 10-14) as being the city where “the men of Gad had always dwelt.” The site is usually identified with Khirbet ʿAṭṭarus, 9 mi. (15 km.) NW of Dibon.

(2) A border town of the tribe of EPHRAIM, part of the territory of the ARKITES (Josh. 16:2, 7). It was apparently located between BETHEL and Lower BETH HORON, but the precise site has not been identified. Some believe that the town mentioned in v. 2 is the same as ATAROTH ADDAR in v. 5, but that the Ataroth of v. 7 was a different town on the NE boundary of Ephraim (perhaps modern Tell Sheikh edh-Dhiab or Tell el-Mazar, but see JOKMEAM).

(3) The KJV reads “Ataroth, the house of Joab” in 1 Chr. 2:54, but this phrase is better rendered as one proper name, ATROTH BETH JOAB (cf. NIV; some have suggested translating it, “the crowns [i.e., chiefs] of the house of Joab”).

Ataroth Addar. at'uh-roth-ad'uhr (Heb. ʾaṭrôt ʾaddār H6501, “crowns of Addar” or “[cattle] pens at the threshing floor”). A town included in the boundary lists for the tribes of EPHRAIM and MANASSEH (Josh. 16:5; 18:13; the S boundary of the Joseph tribes coincides with the N boundary of BENJAMIN). The precise location is uncertain, though one suggestion is Khirbet Raddana, about 9 mi. (15 km.) NNW of Jerusalem. Some believe that this town should be identified with ATAROTH #2.

Ater. ay'tuhr (Heb. ʾāṭēr H359, perhaps “binder” or “crippled”). (1) The ancestor of a family that returned from the Babylonian captivity with ZERUBBABEL (Ezra 2:16; Neh. 7:21). The unusual Hebrew expression (lit., “the sons of Ater [belonging] to Hezekiah”) can be rendered “of Ater, namely of Hezekiah” (cf. NRSV), which might indicate that Hezekiah was an older family name; the NIV translates, “of Ater (through Hezekiah).” Ater was among those who sealed the covenant of NEHEMIAH (Neh. 10:17; in this passage, Ater and Hezekiah are listed as though they were two distinct individuals).

(2) Ancestor of a family of temple gatekeepers who returned from exile with Zerubbabel (Ezra 2:42; Neh. 7:45).

Athach. ay'thak (Heb. ʾātāk H6973, derivation uncertain). TNIV Athak. A city in the S foothills of the tribal territory of JUDAH to which DAVID sent booty taken from the AMALEKITES (1 Sam. 30:30). The site is unknown, unless the name is a variant (or scribal corruption) of ETHER, as some scholars believe.

Athaiiah. uh-thay'yuh (Heb. ʾātāyâ H6970, perhaps “Yahweh has shown himself superior”). Son of Uzziah and descendant of PEREZ; he was one of the Judahites who after the return from the Babylonian captivity lived in Jerusalem (Neh. 11:4).

Athak. See ATHACH.

Athaliah. ath'uh-li'uh (Heb. ʾātalyâ H6975 and ʾātalyāhû H6976, possibly “Yahweh is exalted”). One woman and two men in the OT bore this name. (1) The wife of JEHORAM, king of Judah, and daughter of AHAB, king of Israel (2 Ki. 8:18). She is called OMRI'S “daughter” (2 Ki. 8:26; 2 Chr. 22:2), which probably should be understood to mean “granddaughter.” The union between Athaliah and Jehoram was a marriage of political convenience with disastrous spiritual results. Athaliah inherited the unscrupulous nature of her mother JEZEBEL. Her influence over her husband and her son AHAZIAH was for evil. She was responsible for introducing into Judah the worship of the Phoenician BAAL. After the death of Ahaziah, Athaliah became the only woman to reign over Judah in OT times. She put to death all Ahaziah's sons except Joash (JEHOASH), who was hidden by JEHOSHEBA, sister of Ahaziah and wife of JEHOIADA the priest. Then, in the seventh year of her reign, Jehoiada conspired to put Joash on the throne. Coming into the temple to see what the excitement meant, Athaliah found that the coronation had already taken place. She was allowed to leave the temple, that it might not be defiled with her blood, but was killed as she went out the door (2 Ki. 11:1-20; 2 Chr. 22:10—23:21).

(2) Son of Jeroham and descendant of BENJAMIN; he is listed among the heads of families who lived in Jerusalem (1 Chr. 8:26).

(3) Descendant of Elam and father of Jeshaiiah; the latter is listed among those who returned with EZRA from the Babylonian captivity (Ezra 8:7).

Atharim. ath'uh-rim (Heb. ʾăṭārîm H926, derivation uncertain). According to Num. 21:1, the Israelites, during their wilderness wanderings, were attacked by the Canaanite king of ARAD “along the road to Atharim.” Following some ancient versions, the KJV incorrectly translates, “the way of the spies.” Atharim may have been a town in the NEGEV, but the site is unknown. The road in question must have been a significant route, and it probably went from KADESH BARNEA N through AROER and ARAD and on to HEBRON.

Athens. ath'inz (Gk. Athēnai G121). Chief city of the ancient city-state of Attica and capital of modern GREECE. The city was named after its patron goddess Athene. Centered around a rocky hill called the ACROPOLIS, the city is 4.5 mi. (7 km.) from the sea. Two walls, 250 ft. (76 m.) apart, connected the city with its harbor (Peiraeus). According to tradition, the city was founded by Cecrops, who came from Egypt about 1556 B.C. The city was ruled by kings until about 1068, when archons (magistrates) began to rule. Two of the most famous archons were Draco, who in c. 620 issued laws “written in blood,” and Solon, who in 594 gave the state a constitution. The Athenians defeated the Persians at Marathon in 490 and again in 480 at Salamis. They then built a small empire, with a powerful fleet for its support.

The period of Athens' greatest glory was during the rule of Pericles (459-431), who erected many beautiful public buildings in the city and under whose administration literature and art flourished. The Peloponnesian War (431-404) ended with the submission of Athens to Sparta. Later wars sapped the strength of Athens. Philip of Macedon crushed the city in 338. In 146 the Romans made it a part of the province of ACHAIA. The city was the seat of Greek art, science, and philosophy, and was the most important university center in the ancient world, even under Roman sway. Although politically conquered, it conquered its conquerors with its learning and culture.

Athenian forum and Stoa of Attalus. (View to the N.)

PAUL visited the city on his second missionary journey and spoke to an interested but somewhat disdainful audience (Acts 17). He reminded them of their altar inscribed with the words “TO AN UNKNOWN GOD,” which he had seen in the city, and declared that he could tell them about this God. He made some converts in the city, but there is no record of his establishing a church there or of his returning on any later occasion. From Athens he went to CORINTH, where he remained for a year and a half, establishing a strong church.

Athlai. ath’li (Heb. ʿatlāy H6974, prob. short form of ATHALIAH, “Yahweh is exalted”). One of the descendants of Bebai who agreed to put away their foreign wives in the time of EZRA (Ezra 10:28).

atonement. In early English, this term (from at one, i.e., in agreement) meant “reconciliation,” the bringing together into harmony of those who have been separated, enemies. Such a term brings a basic biblical concept into focus, but at the same time it leaves unanswered the really crucial questions: What has caused the separation? What has brought about peace? How has it been accomplished?

In the OT, atonement is mainly expressed by the verb kāpar H4105, whose root meaning is apparently “to cover over.” In secular use, for example, NOAH “covered over” the woodwork of the ark with pitch (Gen. 6:14). The noun related to this verb, kōper H4111, is mainly used of the ransom price that “covers” an offense—not by sweeping it out of sight but by making an equivalent payment so that the offense has been actually and exactly paid for (e.g., Exod. 30:12; Num. 35:31; Ps. 49:7; Isa. 43:3). Perhaps arising from this use of the noun, certain forms of the verb (the Heb. piel and pual stems) came to be set aside to express only the idea of removing offense by equivalent payment and so bringing the offender and the offended together. The means of atonement—the actual price paid as equivalent to the sin committed—was the sacrificial BLOOD, the life laid down in death.

The ritual of the Day of Atonement should be studied, and in particular the part played by the two goats (Lev. 16:15-17, 20-22). The Lord wanted his people to know the significance of what had happened in secret when the high priest sprinkled the blood on the “mercy seat” or “atonement cover” (Heb. kappōret H4114). Therefore he commanded the ceremony of the live goat so that they might actually see their sins being laid on another and see their sins being borne away never to return again. See also ATONEMENT, DAY OF; LAYING ON OF HANDS.

In Christian theology, atonement is the central doctrine of faith and can properly include all that Jesus accomplished for us on the cross. It was a vicarious (substitutionary) atonement. On the Day of Atonement, the goat that was substituted was not as valuable as a person; but God in his matchless grace provided a Substitute who was infinitely better than the sinner, absolutely sinless and holy, and dearer to the Father than all creation. “The wages of sin is death” (Rom. 6:23) and “God made him who had no sin to be sin for us, so that in him we might become the righteousness of God” (2 Cor. 5:21).

There are two opposite facts that the ingenuity of the theologians could not have reconciled without God’s solution: First, that God is holy and he hates sin, and that by his holy law sin is a capital crime; and second, that “God is love” (1 Jn. 4:8). So the problem was, “How can God be just and at the same time justify the sinner?” (cf. Rom. 3:26). John 3:16 tells us that God so loved that he gave—but our blessed Lord was not just a means to an end, he was not a martyr to a cause. In the eternal counsels of the Trinity, he offered himself to bear our sins (Rev. 13:8). He voluntarily set aside the divine trappings of omnipotence, omniscience, and glory (Phil. 2:5-8), that he might be truly human, becoming the babe of Bethlehem. For some thirty-three years he perfectly fulfilled the law on our behalf (Matt. 5:18) and then paid the penalty for our sins in his death for us on the cross. Our Lord’s work of atonement looks in three directions: toward sin and Satan (1 Pet. 1:18-19), toward us (Rom. 5:6-11), and toward the Holy Father (1 Jn. 2:2).

Atonement, Day of. Theologically and spiritually, the Day of Atonement is the center of LEVITICUS, “the book of holiness.” The sixteenth chapter gives the law for the Day of Atonement. The divinely inspired commentary on this chapter is found in Heb. 9:1—10:25. Israel had two beginnings for its years, six months apart. In the first month (approx. March-April) on the fourteenth day, they ate the Passover as a memorial of the events leading to the ^{EXODUS} from Egypt; half a year later, in the seventh month (approx. September-October) on the tenth day (Lev. 16:29), they afflicted their souls and the priest made atonement for them. The Jews now celebrate their New Year's Day (Rosh Hashanah) on the first day of the seventh month, and the Day of Atonement (Yom Kippur) on the tenth day.

The purpose of the Day of Atonement seems to have been at least fourfold: first, to show God's hatred of sin, that the "wages of sin is death" (Rom. 6:23) and that "without the shedding of blood there is no forgiveness" (Heb. 9:22); second, to show the contagious nature of sin, for even the Most Holy Place had to be cleansed "because of the uncleanness and rebellion of the Israelites, whatever their sins have been" (Lev. 16:16); third, to point forward by three types to the death of "the Lamb of God," our blessed Savior; and fourth, by its repetition year after year to signify that the way into the very presence of God had not been made manifest before the death of Christ (Heb. 9:7-9). When our Lord offered himself on Calvary, the veil of the temple was torn (Mk. 15:38), and God signified that from that moment on we were under a new covenant—a covenant of grace, not of law. "For the law was given through Moses; grace and truth came through Jesus Christ" (Jn. 1:17). The OT ceremonies were but symbols and types and shadows: the NT records the realities. In OT times God was teaching his people by "kindergarten" methods—godliness brought health, long life, and prosperity; sin brought quick, visible, corporeal punishment. Today, under grace, we look back to Calvary, when the great Day of Atonement took place once for all.

Atroth. See ^{ATROTH SHOPHAN}.

Atroth Beth Joab. at'roth-beth-joh'ab (Heb. ʿatrôt bêṯ yôḏāb H6502, "crowns [or cattle pens] of the house of Joab"). Apparently a village near ^{BETHLEHEM} listed among the descendants of Salma in the genealogy of ^{JUDAH} (1 Chr. 2:54; KJV reads, "Ataroth, the house of Joab"). However, the words could be translated, "the chief ones of Joab's clan," and be taken as a description of the Netophathites or of the towns of Bethlehem and ^{NETOPHAH}. See also ^{ATAROTH}.

Atroth Shophan. at'roth-shoh'fan (Heb. ʿatrôt šôpān H6503, "crowns [or cattle pens] of Shophan"). A city of the Gadites built in the territory conquered from ^{SIHON} (Num. 32:35). The KJV reads, "Atroth, Shophan," as though two places are meant (cf. Vulg. MSS, Etrothet Sophan). Some scholars identify the site with Rujm ʿAttarus, which is less than 2 mi. (3 km.) NE of A_{TAROTH} of GAD.

Attai. atʿi (Heb. ʿattay H6968, perhaps “timely, ready”). (1) Son of Jarha (an Egyptian slave) and descendant of JUDAH through JERAHMEEL (1 Chr. 2:35-36).

(2) A warrior, sixth in rank among the brave and skillful Gadite officers who served DAVID at ZIKLAG (1 Chr. 12:9).

(3) A son of REHOBAM by his favorite wife MAACAH; grandson of SOLOMON (2 Chr. 11:20).

The seaport of Attalia.

Attalia. atʿuh-liʿuh (Gk. Attaleia G877). A seaport in PAMPHYLIA in the S of ASIA MINOR. Returning to ANTIOCH OF SYRIA from their missionary journey, PAUL and BARNABAS embarked at Attalia (Acts 14:25-26), where they had presumably landed earlier, on their way from PAPHOS to PERGA (13:13). The city was founded by Attalus II of PERGAMUM between 165 and 138 B.C., and subsequently passed under Roman domination. Attalia later became a Roman colony, and today, with the name Andaliya (Antalya, Adalia), it is one of the principal seaports of Turkey.

Augustan Cohort. This term is used by some Bible versions to render the Greek speira Sebastē, which corresponds to Latin cohors Augusta and occurs in Acts 27:1 with reference to troops commanded by “a centurion named Julius” (KJV, “Augustus’ band”; NIV, “Imperial Regiment”). A COHORT was normally a tenth part of a LEGION and was itself divided into six centuries, each under a CENTURION. The cohorts, therefore, comprised 600 men; in the auxiliary troops the cohorts were the basic unit of division and each numbered 500 or 1,000 men. They were commanded by prefects or tribunes, and so it is uncertain why in the present instance the cohort was led by a centurion. See also ITALIAN REGIMENT.

Marble bust of Augustus Caesar. Discovered at Pergamum (modern Bergama).

Augustus Caesar. aw-guhs'tuhs see'zuhr (Gk. Augoustos Kaisar G880 + G2790). Augustus was the honorific title conferred in 27 B.C. on Octavian (Gaius Octavius, 63 B.C. to A.D. 14), the adoptive heir of Julius CAESAR, who, by the hindsight of history, is called the first of the Roman “emperors.” Early in his life Octavian became influential through his great-uncle Julius Caesar. He was studying quietly in Illyria when he heard of Caesar’s murder in 44. Hastening to Italy, he learned that Caesar had adopted him and made him his heir. Thus in his early manhood, by skillful manipulation of his friends, he conquered his rival Antony at Actium. The beginning of the Roman empire may be reckoned from that date—September 2, 31 B.C. By his adoption he had become “Caesar,” and then the Roman senate added the title “Augustus.” Although he preserved the forms of a republic, he gradually assumed all the power into his hands. He reigned till his death on A.D. 14. Augustus Caesar is mentioned just once in the NT as the emperor under whose reign Jesus was born (Lk. 2:1).

author. This English word, only in the sense of “one who begins or originates,” is sometimes used to render Greek archēgos G795 (“founder, prince, originator”) in several NT passages with reference to CHRIST. The writer of Hebrews calls Jesus the author of our salvation and of our faith (Heb. 2:10 [KJV, “captain”]; 12:2 [in both passages, NRSV has “pioneer”]). It is significant that Peter refers to Jesus as “the author of life” in a context dealing with his death and resurrection (Acts 3:15, truly a fulfillment of Isa. 53:10-12). The Greek term appears frequently in the SEPTUAGINT with the sense “leader, prince,” a meaning found at least once in the NT, again with reference to Jesus (Acts 5:31). Some scholars argue that all the passages in which the word occurs speak of Jesus not so much as originator, but rather as the eschatological trail blazer who leads his people to salvation, faith, and life.

authority. The legal and/or moral right to exercise power, or power that is rightly possessed. In the Bible God is presented as the ultimate, personal authority and the source of all authority. All exercise of authority in the created order, by angels or human beings, is therefore subordinate and derivative. The important statements of Daniel (Dan. 4:34-35; cf. 2:21; 7:13-14) and Paul (Rom. 13:1) point to the sovereign, final, and incontestable authority of God, Creator, Judge, and Redeemer over and in his creation. Thus, the Lord exercises power as the One with authority.

In the life of the people of Israel, the Lord exercised his authority through the authority he gave to king, priest, and prophet. It was the duty of the king to reign in righteousness and justice, of the priest rightly to order the worship and service of God, and of the prophet to declare the word of the sovereign Lord, whether the people would or would not hear. When the word of the Lord came to be written down as Scripture, it was seen as authoritative because of its source (see Ps. 119).

Since Jesus was uniquely sent by God, he has authority; and since he was anointed by the Holy Spirit in order to perform the ministry of MESSIAH, he has power. Authority (Gk. exousia G2026) and power (dynamis G1539) are related concepts (see Lk. 4:36, “with authority and power he gives orders to evil spirits”). Jesus is a man under authority and with authority (Matt. 8:9; 7:29; Mk. 1:27); he empowers his disciples to cast out demons (Matt. 10:1; Mk.

3:15); he does what only God can do—he forgives sins (Matt. 9:6); he has control over nature (Mk. 4:41); he exercises power over death (Jn. 10:18); and as the resurrected Lord he has all authority in earth and heaven (Matt. 28:18). As those who believed that Jesus had been exalted to the right hand of the Father, the apostles developed the theme of the authority of Jesus, presenting him as coregent of the Father and possessing authority over the whole cosmos (Eph. 1:20-23; Phil. 2:1-11; Col. 2:9-10). He is the “Lord of lords and King of kings” (Rev. 17:14).

The NT also recognizes other forms of authority as delegated by God and Christ. There is the authority of the state (Rom. 13:1-7), of the apostles as unique pillars of the church and recipients of divine revelation (Lk. 6:13; Eph. 2:20), and of the husband as head of the family (1 Cor. 11:3). In each case the exercise of power is to be within the will of God, and the one exercising authority must be mindful that God is Judge. The possession of authority and power by SATAN (Lk. 22:53; Col. 1:13) has been abused and will be punished.

Authorized Version. See BIBLE VERSIONS, ENGLISH.

Ava. See AVVA.

avarice. See GREED.

Aven. ay´ven (Heb. ʔāwen H225, “emptiness, wickedness”). This name appears by itself only once in the NIV, “the Valley of Aven,” probably the plain between the LEBANON and Antilebanon ranges (Amos 1:5). Elsewhere it occurs as part of another name, BETH AVEN. In the KJV and NRSV the name also occurs in Hos. 10:8 in what appears to be a derogatory reference to Beth Aven; however, some scholars prefer to take the word here as a common noun (cf. NIV, “The high places of wickedness”). Finally, the KJV uses the name in Ezek. 30:17 (following the MT), but it is better to interpret the Hebrew as a reference to ON, that is, HELIOPOLIS (thus NIV).

avenger. The Hebrew word gō ʔēl (participle of the verb gā ʔal H1457, “to loose, set free, vindicate, deliver as kinsman”) has a two-sided application of its basic meaning. At heart it is a very gracious word: it refers to the “next of kin” who possesses the right to take on himself whatever need may have overwhelmed his kinsman or kinswoman. We see this at its human best in the book of RUTH (Ruth 3:12-13; 4:2-10) and at its highest when the Lord himself is called our gō ʾēl (Isa. 43:14). But there is a darker side. Suppose someone has committed the ultimate crime against us and we lie dead through murder. What then? The gō ʾēl comes to take our part and to exact the vengeance that the law demands (Num. 35:11-34). This is how the word that means “redeemer” also means “avenger.” OT law was rightly dominated by the concept of equality: an exact equivalence between crime and punishment. It expressed this in characteristically vigorous terms—for example, “eye for eye” (Exod. 21:23-24; Lev. 24:20; Deut. 19:21). We should note that these passages all refer to punishments imposed by courts of law and are not rules for private conduct. In the case of murder, where life must be taken for life, the next of kin took up the dreadful duty, carefully circumscribed in his actions by the clear OT distinction between capital murder and accidental manslaughter and by the limitation of vengeance to the murderer only (Deut. 24:16).

Avim, Avites. See AVVIM; AVVITES.

Avith. ayʾvith (Heb. ʿăwîṯ H6400, possibly “ruin”). The royal city of a king of EDOM named Hadad son of Bedad (Gen. 36:35; 1 Chr. 1:46). Site unknown.

Aviv. ah-veevʾ. See ABIB.

Avva. avʾuh (Heb. ʿawwā H6379, possibly “ruin”). KJV Ava. A city conquered in the eighth century B.C. by SHALMANESER V of ASSYRIA; its inhabitants were then resettled in SAMARIA (2 Ki. 17:24; cf. v. 31). It is probably identical with IVVAH, but the site has not been identified.

Avvim. avʾim (Heb. ʿawwîm H6399, possibly “ruins”). KJV Avim. (1) A town near BETHEL allotted to the tribe of BENJAMIN (Josh. 18:23). Because the form can be interpreted as a gentilic, however, many scholars believe that it refers to a people group, perhaps the inhabitants of AI or AIATH.

(2) Alternate form of AVVITES in NRSV and other versions.

Avvites. avʾits (Heb. ʿawwîm H6398; see also AVVIM). Also Avims, Avites, Avvim, Avvites. (1) The inhabitants of some villages in the S coastal region who were conquered by the people of CAPHTOR (Deut. 2:23); they are later mentioned as continuing to live among the PHILISTINES or just S of them (Josh. 13:3).

(2) The inhabitants of AVVA (2 Ki. 17:31).

awe. See FEAR.

Awel-Marduk. See EVIL-MERODACH.

awl. A sharp, piercing tool (Exod. 21:6; Deut. 15:17).

awning. This English term is used once with reference to a ship's covered deck, probably to protect the passengers from the sun (Ezek. 27:7). The awning was made of "blue and purple" woven material.

ax, axhead. Various Hebrew words are translated "ax" ("axe") in the English versions. The one term specifically meaning "ax" in the modern sense is garzen H179, a bronze or iron implement for hewing wood, skiving stone, or using as a weapon (Deut. 19:5; 20:19; 1 Ki. 6:7 [NIV, "chisel"]; Isa. 10:15). The word qardôm H7935 (Jdg. 9:48; 1 Sam. 13:20, 21; Ps. 74:5; Jer. 46:22) is perhaps better translated "adze" (i.e., with a curved blade at right angles with the handle). The word "axhead" in 2 Ki. 6:5 translates Hebrew barzel H1366, "iron" (cf. also Deut. 19:5, "the head"). In the NT, the common Greek term axinë G544 is found twice (Matt. 3:10 = Lk. 3:9).

axle. See WHEEL.

ayin. i'yin (Heb. ʿayin H6524, "eye, fountain"; cf. such place names as AIN and EN GEDI). The sixteenth letter of the Hebrew ALPHABET (א), transliterated as ʿ, with a numerical value of seventy. It is named for the shape of the letter, which in its older form resembled an eye. Its sound probably involved a contraction of the pharynx (as in Arabic).

Ayyah. ah'yuh (Heb. ʿayyâ H6509, "heap, ruin"). The possessions of the tribe of EPHRAIM are described as including "Shechem and its villages all the way to Ayyah and its villages" (1 Chr. 7:28). Here the KJV has GAZA, which reflects the reading of many ancient MSS; if correct, it would refer to an otherwise unknown site in the hill country (certainly not the PHILISTINE Gaza). Those who prefer the reading Ayyah often identify it with A_I (cf. esp. Neh. 11:31, where English versions use the form “Aija”) or with modern Turmus ʿAjja (near SHILOH).

Azal. ayʾzuhl (Heb. ʾāṣal, prob. “noble”). An unknown place not far from JERUSALEM (Zech. 14:5; NIV, AZEL). Some scholars emend the text (e.g., RSV, “the side of it”).

Azaliah. azʾuh-liʾuh (Heb. ʾālyāhû H729, “Yahweh has reserved” or “Yahweh has been noble”). The father of SHAPHAN the secretary, who brought to JOSIAH’s attention the book of the law that HILKIAH the high priest had found in the temple (2 Ki. 22:3; 2 Chr. 34:8).

Azaniah. azʾuh-niʾuh (Heb. ʾāzanyâ H271, “Yahweh has heard”). The father of Jeshua, who was one of the Levites that affixed their seals to the covenant of NEHEMIAH (Neh. 10:9).

Azarael, Azareel. azʾuh-rayʾuhl, azʾuh-reeʾuhl. See AZAREL.

Azarel. azʾuh-rel (Heb. ʿāzar ʾēl H6475, “God has helped”; cf. AZRIEL and AZARIAH). KJV Azareel (Azarael in Neh. 12:36). (1) One of several Korahite warriors who joined DAVID at ZIKLAG (1 Chr. 12:6; cf. vv. 1-2). These soldiers may have been Levites from the family of KORAH, but some argue that the reference is to a different Korah or even to a locality in the tribe of BENJAMIN.

(2) Son of HEMAN, the king’s seer (1 Chr. 25:18, called UZZIEL in v. 4 [note that King Azariah is usually called UZZIAH]). The fourteen sons of Heman, along with the sons of ASAPH and JEDUTHUN, were set apart for the ministry of music.

(3) Son of Jehoram; he was an officer over the tribe of DAN during David’s reign (1 Chr. 27:22).

(4) A descendant of BINNUI, listed among those who had married foreign wives (Ezra 10:41). Instead of “the descendants of Binnui” (10:38, following LXX), the KJV follows the MT and reads “Bani, and Binnui.”

(5) Son of Ahzai and descendant of IMMER; Azarel’s son, AMASHSAI, was one of the priests who came to live in Jerusalem after the exile (Neh. 11:13).

(6) One of the musicians who took part in the procession when the wall of Jerusalem was dedicated (Neh. 12:36); perhaps identical with #5 above.

Azariah. az´uh-ri´uh (Heb. ʿăzaryāhû H6482 and ʿăzaryâ H6481, “Yahweh has helped”; cf. AZAREL, AZRIEL). The name Azariah is one of the most common in the OT, being attributed to approximately thirty persons, although in some cases it is difficult to distinguish between them.

(1) King of Judah, more frequently known as UZZIAH (2 Ki. 14:21; 15:1, 6-8, 17, 23, 27; 1 Chr. 3:12; cf. AZAREL #3, who is also called UZZIEL).

(2) Son (grandson?) of ZADOK, listed among the chief officials under SOLOMON and called “the priest,” possibly indicating that he was the high priest at that time (1 Ki. 4:2); maybe the same as #6 or #7 below.

(3) Son of NATHAN and an official in the court of SOLOMON (1 Ki. 4:5); possibly Solomon’s nephew (cf. 2 Sam. 5:14).

(4) Son of Ethan and descendant of JUDAH (1 Chr. 2:8).

(5) Son of Jehu and descendant of Judah (1 Chr. 2:38-39).

(6) Son of AHIMAAZ and grandson of Zadok (1 Chr. 6:9; for this and the following items, note that 6:1-81 corresponds to MT and LXX 5:27—6:66). It is thought by some that the statement, “it was he who served as priest in the temple Solomon built in Jerusalem” (v. 10b), applies to him. If so, he may be the same as #2 above.

(7) Son of Johanan and grandson of #6 above (1 Chr. 6:10). If the comment that he served as priest in Solomon’s temple applies to him, this Azariah may be the same as either #2 above or #14 below. Some think, moreover, that he should be identified with #19.

(8) Son of Hilkiah and descendant of Zadok, included in several genealogies (1 Chr. 6:13-14; 9:11; Ezra 7:1; Neh. 11:11).

(9) Son of Zephaniah, listed in the genealogy of KOHATH (1 Chr. 6:36).

(10) Son of Oded and a prophet during the reign of ASA; he inspired the king to destroy the idols and to renew the temple worship (2 Chr. 15:1-15).

(11) Son of JEHOSHAPHAT (2 Chr. 21:2, where NIV and NJPS distinguish between Azariah and AZARIAHU); when JEHORAM, also son of Jehoshaphat, became king, he killed all his brothers, including Azariah (v. 4).

(12) Son of JEROHAM and a commander in the Judean army that deposed ATHALIAH and enthroned Joash/JEHOASH (2 Chr. 23:1).

(13) Son of Obed and a colleague of #12 above (2 Chr. 23:1).

(14) The chief priest who protested King Uzziah's intrusion into the priest's office (2 Chr. 26:17, 20); possibly the same as #18 below.

(15) Son of Jehohanan (Johanan), a leader in Ephraim who protested against the capture of Judeans by the Israelite army, supplied them with food and clothing, and released them (2 Chr. 28:12).

(16) Father of Joel, who was a Kohathite that served during HEZEKIAH's reign (2 Chr. 29:12); possibly the same as #18 below.

(17) Son of Jehallelel; he was a Merarite who served during HEZEKIAH's reign (2 Chr. 29:12).

(18) The high priest under HEZEKIAH (2 Chr. 31:10, 13); possibly the same as #14 or #16 above.

(19) Son (or descendant) of Meraioth and an ancestor of Ezra (Ezra 7:3).

(20) Son of Maaseiah; he was a priest who assisted NEHEMIAH in building the wall (Neh. 3:23).

(21) A companion of ZERUBBABEL in the return from the EXILE (Neh. 7:7).

(22) A man who stood to the right of EZRA as he read the law (1 Esd. 9:43, not mentioned in the parallel passage, Neh. 8:4).

(23) A Levite who assisted Ezra in instructing the people in the law (Neh. 8:7).

(24) A priest who signed Nehemiah's covenant (Neh. 10:2); apparently the same as Ezra (12:1).

(25) A participant in the dedication of the rebuilt wall of Jerusalem (Neh. 12:32).

(26) Son of HOSHAIAH and a leader in the group who opposed Jeremiah's counsel (Jer. 43:2; cf. 42:1 NRSV, following LXX [MT, JEZANIAH]).

(27) One of DANIEL's three companions, renamed ABEDNEGO, whom Nebuchadnezzar condemned to the fiery furnace (Dan. 1:6, 7, 11, 19; 2:17; 3:12-30).

Azariah. az'uh-ri'uh-hyoo (Heb. ʿāzaryāhû H6482, "Yahweh has helped"). KJV and other versions, Azariah. Son of JEHOSHAPHAT (2 Chr. 21:2). See AZARIAH #11.

Azaz. ay'zaz (Heb. ʿāzāz H6452, prob. short form of AZAZIAH, "Yahweh is strong"). Son of Shema and descendant of REUBEN; his son BELA and other Reubenites settled in a large area of TRANSJORDAN (1 Chr. 5:8).

Azazel. See SCAPEGOAT.

Azaziah. az´uh-zi´uh (Heb. ʿăzazyāhû H6453 “Yahweh is strong”). (1) One of the Levites assigned to play the harp when the ARK OF THE COVENANT was brought to Jerusalem (1 Chr. 15:21).

(2) Father of HOSHEA; the latter was an officer over the tribe of EPHRAIM during the reign of DAVID (1 Chr. 27:20).

(3) One of the temple supervisors under CONANIAH, who was in charge of the contributions during the reign of HEZEKIAH (2 Chr. 31:13).

Azbuk. az´buhk (Heb. ʿazbûq H6443, derivation unknown). The father of a certain man named Nehemiah; the latter ruled part of BETH ZUR and helped the better-known NEHEMIAH rebuild the wall of JERUSALEM (Neh. 3:16).

Azekah. uh-zee´kuh (Heb. ʿăzēqâ H6467, possibly “hoed [ground]”). A town in NW Judah, mentioned as a place to which JOSHUA pursued the kings at the battle of Gibeon (Josh. 10:10-11). The town is mentioned in a few other passages (e.g., Josh. 15:35; 1 Sam. 17:1; 2 Chr. 11:9). Azekah was one of the last towns to fall to NEBUCHADNEZZAR before he attacked Jerusalem c. 588 B.C. (Jer. 34:7). In LACHISH letter # 4, Hoshaiiah, who commanded a garrison N of Lachish, informed his superior Yoash at Lachish that he could no longer see the signals (fire or smoke) from Azekah N of his post. This indicated that Azekah had already fallen. After the EXILE the city was reoccupied (Neh. 11:30). Azekah is identified with Tell Zakariyeh, a triangular mound that rises about 350 ft. (105 m.) above the Valley of ELAH, some 15 mi. (24 km.) NW of HEBRON.

Azel. ay´zuhl (Heb. ʾāšēl H727, “noble”). (1) Son of Eleasah and descendant of King SAUL through JONATHAN (1 Chr. 8:37-38; 9:43-44).

(2) NIV form of AZAL.

Azem. See EZEM.

Azgad. az´gad (Heb. ʿazgād H6444, possibly “Gad is strong”). Ancestor of a family that returned from the EXILE. They returned in two contingents, one with ZERUBBABEL (Ezra 2:12; Neh. 7:17) and the other with EZRA (Ezra 8:12). Azgad (or a descendant representing the clan) was among those who signed NEHEMIAH's covenant (Neh. 10:15).

Aziel. ay'zee-uhl (Heb. ʿāzî ʾēl H6456, prob. "God is [my] strength"). One of the Levites who played the lyre when the ARK OF THE COVENANT was brought to Jerusalem (1 Chr. 15:20; called JAAZIEL in v. 18; some also identify him with the first JEIEL listed in 16:5).

Aziza. uh-zî'zuh (Heb. ʿāzîzā H6461, "strong one," or short form of AZAZIAH, "Yahweh is strong"; see AZAZIAH). One of the descendants of Zattu who agreed to put away their foreign wives in the time of EZRA (Ezra 10:27).

Azmaveth (person). az'muh-veth (Heb. ʿazmāwet H6462, possibly "Mot [Death] is fierce"). (1) A member of DAVID's military elite known as the Thirty; he was apparently from BAHURIM (2 Sam. 23:31, "the Barhumite"; 1 Chr. 11:33, "the Baharumite").

(2) The father of two warriors named JEZIEL and PELET, from the tribe of BENJAMIN. Both men were ambidextrous stone slingers and archers. They joined David at ZIKLAG while David was fleeing from SAUL (1 Chr. 12:3). He may be the same man as #1 above.

(3) Son of Jehoaddah (or Jarah/Jadah) and descendant of King SAUL through JONATHAN (1 Chr. 8:36; 9:42).

(4) Son of Adiel and supervisor of the royal treasuries in Jerusalem during David' reign (1 Chr. 27:25).

Azmaveth (place). az'muh-veth (Heb. ʿazmāwet H6463, possibly "Mot [Death] is fierce"). A town in the Judean hills listed between ANATHOTH and KIRIATH JEARIM in postexilic census lists (Ezra 2:24; called "Beth Azmaveth" in Neh. 7:28). This village supplied some of the singers for the dedication of the temple (Neh 12:29). It has been identified with modern Hİzmeh, c. 5 mi. (8 km.) NNE of Jerusalem.

Azmon. az'mon (Heb. ʿašmôn H6801, "strong" or "[place of] bones"). A site on the S border of the tribe of JUDAH (Num. 34:4; Josh. 15:4). Its location is uncertain, but it was probably not far from KADESH BARNEA.

Aznoth Tabor. az´noth-tay´buhr (Heb. ʾaznôt tābôr H268, possibly “peaks of Tabor”). A place in the SW border of the tribe of NAPHTALI, evidently in the area of Mount TABOR (Josh. 19:34); some scholars identify it with Khirbet el-Jebeil, about 3 mi. (5 km.) N of the mountain.

Azor. ay´zor (Gk. Azōr G110). Son of Eliakim, included in Matthew’s GENEALOGY OF JESUS CHRIST (Matt. 1:13-14).

Azotus. See ASHDOD.

Azriel. az´ree-uhl (Heb. ʾazrî ʾēl H6480, “God is my help”; cf. AZAREL, AZARIAH). (1) A chief of the half-tribe of MANASSEH, E of the Jordan; he and six other men are described as “brave warriors, famous men, and heads of their families” (1 Chr. 5:24).

(2) Father of JERIMOTH; the latter was an officer over the tribe of NAPHTALI in the reign of King DAVID (1 Chr. 27:19).

(3) Father of Seraiah; the latter was one of the officers sent by King JEHOIAKIM to arrest JEREMIAH and BARUCH (Jer. 36:26).

Azrikam. az´ri-kuhm (Heb. ʾazrîqām H6483, “my help has arisen”). (1) Son of Neariah and descendant of DAVID through ZERUBBABEL (1 Chr. 3:23); scholars differ regarding the precise way to reconstruct this genealogy.

(2) Son of Azel and descendant of SAUL through JONATHAN (1 Chr. 8:38; 9:44). Perhaps the same as #4 below.

(3) Son of Hashabiah and descendant of LEVI through MERARI (1 Chr. 9:14; Neh. 11:15).

(4) A high-ranking official during the reign of AHAZ. Described as “the officer in charge of the palace,” Azrikam was slain in battle by ZICRI, a warrior from Ephraim (2 Chr. 28:7).

Azubah. uh-zoo´buh (Heb. ʾăzûbāh H6448, “forsaken”). (1) Daughter of Shilhi, wife of king ASA, and mother of King JEHOASHAPHAT (1 Ki. 22:42; 2 Chr. 20:31).

(2) Wife of CALEB son of HEZRON; she was apparently the mother of Jeshar, Shobab, and Ardon (1 Chr. 2:18-19 NIV). The Hebrew text is very difficult, and some believe that she was Caleb's daughter. It is also possible that J^{ER}IOTH was not a second wife but another name for Azubah.

Azur. See A^{ZZ}UR.

Azzah. See G^{AZ}A.

Azzan. az'uhn (Heb. ʿazzān H6464, “strong” or “[God] has shown strength”). Father of P^{AL}TIEL; the latter was a leader from the tribe of ISSACHAR, chosen to help distribute the territory W of the Jordan among the various tribes who settled there (Num. 34:26).

Azzur. az'uhr (Heb. ʿazzur H6473, possibly “helper”). (1) Father of H^{AN}ANIAH; the latter was a false prophet from G^{IB}EON in the days of King Z^{ED}EKIAH (Jer. 28:1; KJV, “Azur”).

(2) An Israelite leader who sealed the covenant with N^{EH}EMIAH after the return from Babylon (Neh. 10:17).

(3) Father of J^{AA}ZANIAH; the latter was one of a group of Israelite leaders against whom E^ZEKIEL was told to prophesy (Ezek. 11:1; KJV, “Azur”).

Baal (deity). bay'uhl, bah-ahl' (Heb. ba'al H1251, "owner, lord"). This Hebrew word appears in the OT with a variety of meanings. Originally it was not a proper noun, but later it came to be so used. Sometimes it is used in the primary sense of "master" or "owner" (as in Exod. 21:28, 34; Jdg. 19:22; Isa. 16:8). Since the Hebrew husband was regarded as the literal owner of his wife, ba'al was the common term for "husband" (as in Exod. 21:3; 2 Sam. 11:26; Hos. 2:16). Most often, however, the word refers to a Semitic deity. Baal became the proper name for the most significant god in the Canaanite pantheon or company of gods. He was the presiding deity in many localities. Its plural form, Baalim, may be used of the different manifestations or attributes of the one Baal or may indicate that in popular thought local Baals came to have independent existence. The Baals were the gods of the land, owning and controlling it; and the increase of crops, fruits, and cattle was under their control. The farmer was completely dependent on them. Some Baals were greater than others. Some were in control of cities, as Melkart of TYRE. The name Baal occurs as early as the HYKSOS period (c. 1700 B.C.). The AMARNA letters and the RAS SHAMRA texts (c. 1400) make Baal a prominent Semitic deity, and in the latter texts the name is not only applied to local gods but is also used as the name of a distinct god Baal.

Baal was worshiped on high places in MOAB in the time of BALAAM and BALAK (Num. 22:41). In the period of the judges there were altars to Baal in Palestine (Jdg. 2:13; 6:28-32); and in the time of AHAB and his wife JEZEBEL, the daughter of the heathen king of the Sidonians, the worship of the Lord in the northern kingdom was almost supplanted by that of Baal. The struggle between Baalism and the worship of the true God came to a head on Mount Carmel when the prophet ELIJAH met the priests of Baal and had 450 of them killed (1 Ki. 16:32; 18:17-40). The cult quickly revived, however, and prospered until crushed by JEHU (2 Ki. 10:18-28). Jezebel's daughter ATHALIAH, wife of King JEHORAM of Judah, gave the worship of Baal a new impulse (2 Chr. 17:3; 21:6; 22:2). When she was overthrown, the temple of Baal at Jerusalem was destroyed and the chief priest killed before the altar (2 Ki. 11:18). Before long, however, there was another revival of the worship of Baal (2 Chr. 28:2; 2 Ki. 21:3). JOSIAH again destroyed the temple of Baal at Jerusalem and caused the public worship of the god to cease for a time (2 Ki. 23:4-5). The prophets of Israel, especially Jeremiah, often denounced Baal worship (Jer. 19:4-5).

Incense and sacrifice—even human sacrifice—were offered to Baal (Jer. 7:9; 19:5), but the worship of Baal was chiefly marked by fertility rites. The main function of Baal was thought to be to make the land, animals, and people fertile. To prompt the god to perform these functions, worshipers themselves performed human sexual acts of fertility, and the Baal shrines were staffed with male and female attendants for this purpose. The same function of prompting Baal to do what is sought from him is seen in 1 Ki. 18:26, 28. The priests desired fire from heaven and tried to represent this by making blood pour down their bodies, hoping that Baal might see and perform a similar action himself.

Bronze statuette of a storm-god, probably Baal, with bull and serpent; discovered at Hazor (1500-1000 B.C.).

Since the term ba'al means simply “lord, master,” in early years the title Baal seems to have been used for the God of Israel, Yahweh. When the Lord’s people came into Canaan, they naturally thought of him as the “possessor” and “lord” of the land—as indeed he was. Even DAVID applied the name to Yahweh (2 Sam. 5:20). But later it was seen that this opened the door to thinking of the God of Israel as though he were only a Canaanite Baal, and the practice was dropped. We see this change in the alteration of certain names, such as JERUB-BAAL to Jerubesheth (Jdg. 6:32; 2 Sam. 11:21; see also ISH-BOSHETH and MEPHIBOSHETH).

Baal (person). bay’uhl, bah-ahl’ (Heb. ba'al H1252, “owner, lord”). (1) Son of Reaiah and descendant of REUBEN through Joel; Baal’s son Beerah was a clan leader deported by TIGLATH-PILESER (1 Chr. 5:5-6).

(2) Son of Jeiel and descendant of BENJAMIN (1 Chr. 8:30; 9:36).

Baal (place). See BAALATH #2.

Baalah. bay´uh-luh (Heb. ba ʿālāh H1267, “lady, mistress”). (1) An alternate name for KIRIATH JEARIM, first mentioned in connection with the border designating the territory of JUDAH (Josh. 15:9-10; 1 Chr. 13:6). Baalah may have been an ancient Canaanite name reflecting the worship of a goddess (see BAAL).

(2) One of the “southernmost towns of the tribe of Judah in the Negev toward the boundary of Edom” (Josh. 15:29; cf. v. 21). The site is unknown, though it has been variously identified with BAALATH BEER, BALAH, BEALOTH, and BILHAH.

(3) Mount Baalah was a ridge on the N border of Judah, NW of EKRON (Josh. 15:11); it is often identified with a hill known today as Mughar (cf. BAALATH #1).

Baalath. bay´uh-lath (Heb. ba ʿālāt H1272, “lady, mistress”). (1) One of the towns included in the territory allotted to the tribe of DAN (Josh. 19:44); the site is usually identified with modern el-Mughar (cf. BAALAH #3). It is probably the same city that was later rebuilt by SOLOMON (1 Ki. 9:18; 2 Chr. 8:6; but some believe that these verses refer to Baalah #3).

(2) The NIV, following a SEPTUAGINT variant, reads “Baalath” in 1 Chr. 4:33 (NRSV and other versions, “Baal,” following the MT). The name is evidently an alternative form of the Simeonite border town of BAALATH BEER.

Baalath Beer. bay´uh-lath-bee´uhr (Heb. ba ʿālat bē ʿēr H1273, “mistress of the well”). A border town, possibly the shrine of a goddess, in the southern part of the territory allotted to the tribe of SIMEON; it may be the same as “Ramah in the Negev” (Josh. 19:8; but see RAMAH #4). It is elsewhere called Baal (1 Chr. 4:33, where NIV has “Baalath,” following a LXX variant). Its location is uncertain; see BAALATH #2.

Baalbek. bay´uhl-bek (from Baal of Beqaʿ, “Lord of the Valley”). A city in LEBANON about 40 mi. (64 km.) NW of DAMASCUS and the same distance ENE of Beirut, celebrated for its magnificence in the first centuries of the Christian era and famous since then for its ruins. The Greeks named it Heliopolis, “city of the sun” (to be distinguished from HELIOPOLIS in Egypt). Baalbek is not mentioned in the Bible, but it became a place of importance after it was made a Roman colony. Chief of the ruins is the great Temple of the Sun, 290 ft. (90 m.) x 160 ft. (50 m.), built of incredibly huge stones from nearby quarries. The city was completely destroyed by earthquake in A.D. 1759. The Prussian government undertook its excavation in 1902.

Baal-Berith. bay’uhl-bi-rith’ (Heb. baʿal bērît H1253, “lord of the covenant”). A god worshiped by Israel after the death of GIDEON (Jdg. 8:33). ABIMELECH, Gideon’s son, took seventy pieces of silver from the house of this god to hire followers in his time of rebellion (9:4). It is possible that Baal-Berith and EL-BERITH (9:46) are alternate ways of referring to the same god, but some scholars believe that two different sanctuaries with two distinct deities were found in SHECHEM. The idol was undoubtedly worshiped by the Shechemites during, and particularly after, Gideon’s time.

Baale of Judah. bay’uh-lee. The KJV rendering of a place name in 2 Sam. 6:2 (NRSV, “Baale-judah”). The NIV correctly interprets it to mean “Baalah of Judah,” that is, KIRIATH JEARIM, the place from which DAVID left to bring up the ARK OF THE COVENANT to Jerusalem (6:2). See BAALAH #1.

Baal Gad. bay’uhl-gad’ (Heb. baʿal gād H1254, “lord of fortune”). A Canaanite town, located “in the Valley of Lebanon below Mount Hermon”; it marked the northern extremity of JOSHUA’s conquests (Josh. 11:17; 12:7; 13:5; cf. the last reference with Jdg. 3:3, which suggests a connection between this town and Mount BAAL HERMON). The exact location is unknown, but it should be near the Damascus road on the NW slope of Mount HERMON.

Baal Hamon. bay’uhl-hay’muhn (Heb. baʿal hāmôn H1255, “lord [or possessor] of abundance”). A place mentioned in the Song of Songs as a fertile region where SOLOMON had a vineyard (Cant. 8:11). The context would indicate that its fruit was exceptionally fine. The location of Baal Hamon is not known, and some have thought that the language is only a poetic expression, not a reference to a real vineyard.

Baal-Hanan. bay’uhl-hay’nuhn (Heb. baʿal ḥānān H1257, “Baal [or the master] has been gracious”). (1) Son of Acbor and one of “the kings who reigned in Edom before any Israelite king reigned”; he was Shaul’s successor (Gen. 36:38-39 [cf. v. 31]; 1 Chr. 1:49-50).

(2) A man from GEDER who was in charge of DAVID’s “olive and sycamore-fig trees in the western foothills” (1 Chr. 27:28).

Baal Hazor. bay’uhl-hay’zor (Heb. baʿal ḥāṣôr H1258, “lord of the court”). A location near the border of EPHRAIM where ABSALOM’s sheepshearers had gathered (2 Sam. 13:23). It was here that Absalom planned a feast for his brothers, also inviting his father DAVID, who did not accept. In this remote place marked by rugged limestone slopes, Absalom avenged the rape of his sister TAMAR by having AMNON killed. It was possibly a mountain home, being more than 3,000 ft. (915 m.) above sea level. The site is identified with Jebel el-Aṣur, some 5 mi. (8 km.) N of BETHEL.

Baal Hermon. bay’uhl-huhr’muhn (Heb. baʿal ḥermôn H1259, “lord of Hermon [consecrated place]”). A mountain that marked the S border of the land occupied by the HIVITES, whom God had left to test Israel (Jdg. 3:3). It also marked the N border of the half-tribe of MANASSEH (1 Chr. 5:23). This last reference associates Baal Hermon closely with SENIR and Mount HERMON; it may be one of the peaks comprising the mountain. See also BAAL GAD.

Baali. bay’uh-li. KJV transliteration of Hebrew baʿlî (“my BAAL,” that is, “my master”), a name used by some in HOSEA’s day to describe God (Hos. 2:16). Because of this name’s pagan associations, God preferred and demanded that he be called ʾîšî (“my husband”), which emphasized the COVENANT relationship he had established between his people and himself.

Baalim. bay’uh-lim. KJV transliteration of Hebrew habbēʿālîm, which is the plural form of BAAL with the definite article (Jdg. 2:11 et al.).

Baalis. bay’uh-lis (Heb. baʿālîs H1271, possibly “the lord is salvation”). King of AMMON in the early sixth century B.C. (Jer. 40:14). He sent ISHMAEL son of Nethaniah to kill GEDALIAH, the governor of Israel appointed by NEBUCHADNEZZAR, king of Babylon. The murder occurred soon after Jerusalem was captured (41:1-2). Baalis is probably to be identified with Baʿal-yiṣʿa (“the lord is salvation”), whose name is found in a seal discovered in 1984 at Tell el-Umeiri, near Amman.

Baal Meon. bay'uhl-mee'on (Heb. ba'al mē'ôn H1260, "lord of the dwelling [or of refuge]"). A city built by the tribe of REUBEN across the JORDAN (Num. 32:38; 1 Chr. 5:8). It is described as one of the glorious cities on the frontier of MOAB (Ezek. 25:9). Baal Meon is also called BETH BAAL MEON (Josh. 13:17), BETH MEON (Jer. 48:23), and probably BEON (Num. 32:3). MESHA, king of Moab, claimed to have built Baal Meon, making a reservoir for it (MOABITE STONE, line 9; Beth Baal Meon is also mentioned on line 30; see ANET, 320-21). Possession must have passed alternately between Moab and Israel several times in its history. The city is identified with modern Ma'in, about 10 mi. (16 km.) E of the DEAD SEA and 3 mi. (5 km.) SW of MEDEBA.

Baal Peor, Baal of Peor. bay'uhl-pee'or (Heb. ba'al pē'ôr H1261, "lord of Peor"). The "Baal of Peor" was a local deity (see BAAL) worshiped by the Israelites while encamped at SHITTIM in MOAB (Num. 25:3-5). The heinous nature of the sin, which involved licentious practice with Moabite women (Num. 25:1-2), was not soon forgotten, as is clear from subsequent references (Ps. 106:28; Hos. 9:10). The same Hebrew name is used as a place name equivalent to Mount PEOR (Deut. 4:3; Hos. 9:10). In some passages, it is ambiguous whether the single name Peor refers to the deity or to the place (cf. Num. 25:18; 31:16; Josh. 22:17). See also BETH PEOR.

Baal Perazim. bay'uhl-pi-ray'zim (Heb. ba'al-pērā'îm H1262, "lord of breaches [i.e., breach-maker]"). A name given to the place where DAVID smote the PHILISTINES after he was made the king of Israel (2 Sam. 5:20; 1 Chr. 14:11). The place was so named because the Lord "broke out" (Heb. pāraz H7287) against David's enemies there. It is thought to be the same place that Isaiah calls "Mount Perazim" (Isa. 28:21). Baal Perazim is perhaps to be identified with modern ez-Zuhur, 4 mi. (6 km.) SW of JERUSALEM.

Baal Shalishah. bay'uhl-shal'uh-shuh (Heb. ba'al šālîšâ H1264, "lord of Shalishah [third part?]"). The home of the unnamed man who brought to ELISHA twenty loaves of barley bread and some heads of new grain by which 100 people were fed (2 Ki. 4:42). The location of the site is uncertain, partly depending on what is meant by GILGAL (v. 38).

Baal Tamar. bay'uhl-tay'mahr (Heb. ba'al tāmār H1265, "lord of the palm tree"). The place where the Israelites awaited the pursuing Benjamites when the nation went to war to punish the tribe of BENJAMIN for the violent rape and death of a Levite's concubine (Jdg. 20:33). Its precise location is not known, but it was near GIBEAH of Benjamin (some 3 mi./5 km. N of JERUSALEM) on the way to BETHEL (another 8 mi./13 km. farther N).

Baal-zebub. bay'uhl-zee'buhb (Heb. ba'al zēbûb H1256, "lord of the flies"). The name under which BAAL was worshiped by the PHILISTINES of EKRON (2 Ki. 1:2, 3, 6, 16). ELIJAH rebuked AHAZIAH for consulting this god to find out whether he would recover from his illness. The name is peculiar and various explanations have been proposed (e.g., that he protected his worshipers from flies); others have argued that it was originally Baal-Zebul (perhaps from Heb. zēbul H2292, "lofty dwelling") and that it was deliberately distorted by Hebrew scribes as a way of mocking pagan worship. The name appears as "Beelzebul" in NT MSS (Matt. 10:25 et al.), but probably for a different reason; see BEELZEBUB.

Baal Zephon. bay'uhl-zee'fon (Heb. ba'al šēpōn H1263, "lord of the north"). A place near which the Israelites encamped just before they crossed the RED SEA (Exod. 14:2, 9; Num. 33:7). The site is unknown, though some scholars believe that Baal Zephon was an earlier name for the city of TAHAPANHES.

Baana. bay'uh-nuh (Heb. ba'ānā H1275, perhaps "son of oppression"). (1) Son of AHILUD; he was one of twelve district governors of SOLOMON commissioned to supply provisions for the royal household (1 Ki. 4:12). He may have been a brother of Jehoshaphat the recorder (v. 3).

(2) Son of HUSHAI; he was another of Solomon's district governors (1 Ki. 4:16; KJV, "Baanah").

(3) Father (ancestor?) of a certain ZADOK who helped to repair the walls of Jerusalem under the supervision of NEHEMIAH (Neh. 3:4); possibly the same as BAANAH #3.

Baanah. bay'uh-nuh (Heb. ba'ānā H1276, perhaps "son of oppression"). (1) Son of Rimmon; he and his brother RECAB were captains in the army of ISH-BOSHETH, king of Israel during the time when DAVID was king of Judah in HEBRON. Baanah and his brother plotted to unify the kingdom under David. They journeyed to Ish-Bosheth's house and, arriving when the king was taking his noontime nap, eluded the doorkeeper and murdered the king in his bed. They took his severed head to David in Hebron expecting commendation and probably advancement from the king. David, however, angrily accused them of murdering an innocent man in his sleep. He ordered them killed, their hands and feet severed, and their bodies publicly hung by the pool in Hebron (2 Sam. 4:2-12).

(2) A man of NETOPHAH and father of HELED (Heleb); the latter was one of David's renowned Thirty (2 Sam. 23:29; 1 Chr. 11:30).

(3) A leader who returned with ZERUBBABEL to Judah after the EXILE (Ezra 2:2; Neh. 7:7). He is probably to be identified with the Baanah who affixed his seal to the covenant of NEHEMIAH (10:27), and the same as BAANA #3.

Baara. bay'uh-ruh (Heb. ba ʿārā [⋄] H1281, possibly "passionate"). One of the three wives of SHAHARAIM, a Benjamite who lived in MOAB (1 Chr. 8:8). It is possible that Shaharaim divorced Baara and HUSHIM because they did not bear him any children.

Baaseiah. bay'uh-see'yuh (Heb. ba ʿăšêâ H1283, derivation uncertain). An ancestor of ASAPH, the Levite musician (1 Chr. 6:40 [MT v. 25]).

Baasha. bay'uh-shuh (Heb. ba ʿšā [⋄] H1284, meaning uncertain). Son of Ahijah, of the tribe of ISSACHAR. Baasha became the third king of Israel by assassinating NADAB, when that king, the son of JEROBOAM, was directing the siege of GIBBETHON in the land of the PHILISTINES. Baasha exterminated the house of Jeroboam and made TIRZAH his capital. He ascended the throne in the third year of ASA, king of Judah (1 Ki. 15-16), and carried on a long war with him. About the sixteenth year of Asa, Baasha began to fortify RAMAH, 5 mi. (8 km.) N of JERUSALEM, in order to blockade the northern frontier of Judah. He was prevented from completing this work by BEN-HADAD, king of DAMASCUS, whom Asa had hired (1 Ki. 15:16-21; 2 Chr. 16:1-6). Asa then tore down Baasha's defenses, and for his own protection built up the bulwarks of GEBA (between Ramah and Jerusalem). Baasha continued the calf worship begun by Jeroboam, and JEHU the prophet threatened him and his house with a worse fate than Jeroboam's. After a reign of twenty-four years he died a natural death and was succeeded by his son ELAH, who, along with every member of the house of Baasha, was killed by ZIMRI.

babbler. In the NT, the Greek term spermologos G5066 (lit., "picker up of seeds," but applied to those who scavenge for information) occurs only in an offhand remark attributed to the EPICUREAN and STOIC philosophers who listened to PAUL's address on the AREOPAGUS and accused him of being a charlatan (Acts 17:18). The translation "babbler" is also used by the NRSV to render a Hebrew phrase that means literally “one who opens his lips” (Prov. 20:19); moreover, the KJV uses it incorrectly to render another phrase (“master of the tongue”) that really means “charmer,” apparently with reference to a pagan shaman (Eccl. 10:11). The NIV uses the verb “babble” to render Greek battalogeō G1006, with reference to the meaningless PRAYER of pagans (Matt. 6:7).

Babel, Tower of. bayˈbuhl (Heb. bābel H951, from Akk. bāb-ilī, “gate of God”). An expression not found in the Bible, but used popularly for the structure built in the plain of SHINAR, as the story is told in Gen. 11:1-9. The men of Shinar intended to build a tower that reached “to the heavens,” but the Lord frustrated them by confusing their tongues. The author of Genesis assumes that before this the whole human species was a single tribe moving from place to place and speaking one language. The event took place not very long after the flood.

The remains of large towers called ZIGGURATS can be found at the sites of many ancient cities in MESOPOTAMIA. These sacred temple-towers were built in steplike stages of brick and asphalt, usually with a shrine at the top. The Tower of Babel was, however, not a temple-tower but simply a tower, apparently the first one ever attempted. The ziggurats may have been imitations of this tower. It is not known for certain whether the ruins of the Tower of Babel are still extant. There are rival claimants for the honor.

baboon. See ANIMALS.

baby. This English term is sometimes used literally in the Bible to denote an infant or very young child (e.g., Exod. 2:6; Ps 8:2; Lk. 1:41; 2:12). Its figurative use in the NT may reflect the imagery of spiritual REGENERATION (new birth): young Christians, as well as believers who are undeveloped or stunted in their spiritual growth, are referred to as “babes in Christ” (1 Cor. 3:1 KJV; NIV, “infants”) and as “newborn babies” (1 Pet. 2:2). Just as human babies can assimilate only milk, not solid food, so spiritual infants can grasp only fundamental or basic doctrines (cf. also Heb. 5:12-14).

The Babylonian Empire.

Babylon. bab´uh-luhn (Heb. bābel H951, from Akk. bāb-ilī, bāb-ilāni, “the gate of god[s]”; Gk. Babylōn G956). Capital of the land of Babylonia, from which the land takes its name. Though not the oldest city in that region, it soon became the most important from the standpoint of both size and influence. Babylon was situated in central MESOPOTAMIA on the river EUPHRATES, some 50 mi. (80 km.) S of modern Baghdad, capital of Iraq. A huge plantation of palm trees added to the beauty of the ancient city, and a permanent water supply assured fertility for the surrounding areas. It was within easy reach of the Persian Gulf and, being situated on an important caravan-trade route, was in contact with all the most important cultural centers of the ANE.

The date of its foundation is still disputed. The connection between AKKAD, CALNEH, ERECH, and Babylon (Gen. 10:10) indicates a period at least as early as 3000 B.C. Babylon may have been founded originally by the Sumerians, and an early tablet recorded that Sargon of Akkad (c. 2400) destroyed Babylon and took some of its sacred earth to his own capital city, Akkad. Whatever the date of its foundation, the earliest archaeological levels of the mound that once was stately Babylon come from the first dynasty period, that is, the nineteenth to sixteenth centuries B.C.

The history of Babylon is complicated by the fact that it was governed by rulers from several lands who were successively engaged in struggles for its capture and retention. It was the scene of many a decisive battle, its magnificent buildings plundered in various periods and its walls and temples leveled from time to time. Yet this apparently indestructible city rose from its ruins on each occasion more splendid than before, until during the reign of NEBUCHADNEZZAR II (c. 605-562 B.C.) it was probably the largest and most elaborate city in the ancient world. All that now remains of its former glory is a series of mounds some 5 mi. (8 km.) in extent, lying mostly on the left bank of the Euphrates.

The political history of Babylon was bound up with that of Babylonia and ASSYRIA, though from the beginning of the eighteenth century B.C. (about the period of TERAH's migration from UR, Gen. 11:31) until the time of the Assyrian regime (ninth to sixth centuries), Babylon was the dominant influence in Mesopotamia. Under HAMMURABI (c. 1704-1662), the last great king of the first dynasty, the Babylonian empire stretched from the Persian Gulf to the middle Euphrates and upper TIGRIS regions. Archaeological discoveries have brought to light many of the achievements of this remarkable scholar-statesman, the most interesting of which is his celebrated legal code. His attempts to unify and organize social life led him to collect and expand existing minor law codes. The resulting legislation was of a most comprehensive nature, and Hammurabi ordered it to be incised on a basalt column and placed in the temple of Shamash, god of justice, for all to see. This column is in every sense a monument of ancient jurisprudence. It was carried away as a trophy by invading Elamites (see ELAM) in a surprise raid during the twelfth century and was unearthed only in A.D. 1901 at SUSA by J. de Morgan.

The first dynasty of Babylon fell about 1596 B.C. when the HITTITE king Mursilis I advanced from Anatolia (ASIA MINOR) with an army and sacked the city. For about 300 years Babylon was at the mercy of the Kassites who lived to the N, the Elamites, and other warlike nomadic people. An early Assyrian monarch named Tukulti-Ninurta I (c. 1250) occupied Babylon and took the sacred statue of MARDUK, patron deity of the city, to ASSHUR. From the end of the tenth century Babylon became a vassal of Assyria, controlled by the kings of NINEVEH. Occasionally the vassal ruler revolted and attempted to form a new dynasty in Babylon, but by the time of TIGLATH-PILESER III of Assyria (c. 745-727) Babylon was completely under Assyrian control. This redoubtable monarch (known as Pul in 2 Ki. 15:19 and 1 Chr. 5:26) attacked the northern kingdom of Israel, carried away captives from Gilead, Galilee, and Naphtali (2 Ki. 15:29), demanded booty, and reduced Israel to a series of provinces.

Reconstruction of the Ishtar Gate at Babylon.

One of the more vigorous vassal rulers of Babylon who revolted against Assyria was Mardukapal-iddin (c. 722-711 B.C.), the MERODACH-BALADAN of 2 Ki. 20:12-13 and Isa. 39:1. He endeavored to organize a coalition against his overlord SARGON II (c. 722-705) and sought the kingdom of Judah as an ally. ISAIAH dissuaded HEZEKIAH from such a course on the ground that it would be futile. A small stone tablet has been unearthed in Babylonia depicting Merodach-Baladan as a stout man with the long curled hair and beard typical of Babylonian men. He held a scepter in his left hand, and on his head he wore a conical helmet quite unlike the usual Assyrian crown. Merodach-Baladan's schemes were ended by Sargon, who subdued him with difficulty and occupied the throne of Babylon.

Sargon was succeeded by his son SENNACHERIB (c. 705-681 B.C.), who employed vassal princes to keep Babylon in subjugation. When this device failed, he attacked the city and sacked it in 689, removing the statues of its gods to Assyria. It was left to his son ESARHADDON (c. 681-669) to repair the damage and restore the city, perhaps at the instigation of his mother, who was apparently of Aramean descent. When Esarhaddon died, his kingdom was divided between his two sons. One of them, ASHURBANIPAL (c. 669-626), the last great Assyrian ruler, reigned in Nineveh while his brother Shamash-Shumukin occupied the throne of Babylon. They quarreled bitterly, and in 651 Ashurbanipal attacked and burned Babylon. His brother was killed, and a vassal was appointed to succeed him. Toward the end of Ashurbanipal's life this man became increasingly rebellious, and from 631-612 the influence of Babylon increased to the point where NABOPOLASSAR founded an independent dynasty in 626, known as the neo-Babylonian, or Chaldean, regime.

Under Nabopolassar (c. 626-605 B.C.) and his son Nebuchadnezzar II (c. 605-562), ancient Babylon attained the height of its splendor. While both men were notable military strategists they were also individuals of cultural interests, and they set about rebuilding the old Babylonian empire so as to make it the most splendid and notable of all time. Military expeditions brought numbers of captive peoples to Babylonia, and these were employed as artisans and craftsmen on the vast reconstruction projects. As a result of the energy and imagination of Nabopolassar and his son, the influence of Babylon far outstripped that of Nineveh, and in 616 the Babylonians began a military campaign against the middle Euphrates region that ended in the destruction of the Assyrian empire.

Nabopolassar first marched to the Balikh River and sacked a number of towns but returned to Babylon the same year. In 615 B.C. he set out to attack Asshur, and after a year's siege the city capitulated. A revolt in the central Euphrates region delayed a further attack on Assyria, but in 612 a combined force of Babylonians and Medes marched against Nineveh, captured it, and burned it to the ground. The remnant of the Assyrian forces fled to HARAN (PLACE) in NW Mesopotamia, and despite their attempts to ally with Egypt they were decisively defeated in 610, ending the power of the Assyrian regime.

A battle at CARCHEMISH in 605 B.C. against the Egyptians gave the Babylonian forces a decided military advantage, and Nabopolassar determined to occupy S Palestine, probably intending to use it as an advance base for a subsequent attack on Egypt. Nebuchadnezzar directed the operation on the death of Nabopolassar in 605, and in 597 the first attack on Judah took place. This was followed by others in 586 and 581, when several thousand inhabitants of Judah were sent to Babylon as captives. This group joined other previously enslaved peoples, supplementing the already large labor force employed on the gigantic tasks of reconstruction and expansion current in the empire.

Once Nebuchadnezzar felt reasonably secure, he devoted an increasing amount of attention to the expansion of cultural interests in imperial territory, and more particularly in Babylon. His objective was to make this capital the most notable city in the world, and to this end he constructed new canals and navigable waterways, erected magnificent buildings, and laid out extensive parks. A number of travelers who visited Babylon at this time have left their impressions of the city. The description furnished by Herodotus in particular clearly indicates his amazement at the city's great size and splendor.

According to this notable historian of antiquity, the city occupied an area of about 200 sq. mi. (518 sq. km.) and was built on both sides of the Euphrates. It was protected by a double defensive brick wall reinforced with towers. Outside the city wall, about 60 ft. (18 m.) distant, was an additional defensive wall of burnt bricks set in bitumen. The outer portion of the twin walls extended over 17 mi. (27 km.) and was constructed under Nebuchadnezzar, while his predecessors were responsible for other parts of the fortification. Excavations at the mound have shown that the earliest attempt at constructing a defensive system goes back to the nineteenth century B.C.

According to cuneiform sources, access to the city was gained by eight gates, four of which have been excavated. Probably the most impressive of these is the Ishtar gate, located at the northern end of the mound. To reach it one passed down part of the great stone-paved processional street that was about 3,000 ft. (937.5 m.) in length. It was decorated on either side with figures of lions passant in enameled brick. Assyrian art was at its height at this period, and the craftsmanship and execution of these animals indicate an advanced degree of artistic skill. The Ishtar gate was also decorated with animals, consisting of about a dozen rows of bulls and mythological dragons placed alternately. The decor was executed predominantly in blue and brown enamel and was done in the time of Nebuchadnezzar.

Babylonian weight of 166 grams. The inscription (in Old Persian, Elamite, and Babylonian) gives the names and titles of Darius I (521-486 B.C.).

When the city was at the height of its influence, there were more than fifty temples in Babylon. When some of these were excavated, they were found to be in a reasonably good state of preservation. The temple of Ninmah, goddess of the underworld, was built by Ashurbanipal near the Ishtar gate. The ground plan indicated that when the city was approached from the N, a vestibule led into a larger courtyard, the S end of which was decorated with pillars. Beyond these was an antechapel, while to the S of this area was the shrine of the deity; this shrine contained among other structures an elevated platform designed to support a statue of the goddess. In addition there were living quarters for the priests and stairways that gave access to other parts of the building. A great number of terra-cotta figurines were uncovered at the site but proved to be of little importance.

The southern citadel that was adjacent to the processional street comprised a huge complex of buildings whose main sections were the work of Nabopolassar and Nebuchadnezzar. Several blocks of buildings and courtyards finally led to the royal palace, many of whose rooms were ornately decorated with blue enameled bricks incorporating motifs similar to those used in Greece at a later time. The living quarters provided for the royal family, the court officers, and the retinue of servants, and displayed the grandeur and pomp characteristic of an eastern court.

In this complex was situated one of the seven wonders of the world, the celebrated “hanging gardens” of Babylon. They actually consisted of terraces supported on huge masonry arches, on which carefully tended gardens had been laid out at different levels. Most probably they were designed and executed under Nebuchadnezzar, who had married a Median princess and perhaps intended the raised gardens to be a comforting reminder of her mountainous homeland. They included many species of Babylonian and Persian plants in addition to the palm trees that were a characteristic feature of Babylonia at that time. Water was raised to these elevated terraces by a number of mechanical hoists. The interesting feature of these raised gardens was that they were visible above the tops of the buildings, providing a welcome contrast of greenery against an otherwise unrelieved expanse of white roofs or blue sky.

In an enclosed area SW of the Ishtar gate was the huge ZIGGURAT of Babylon, which was closely linked with the temple of Marduk lying immediately to the south. A ziggurat was a staged or terraced tower crowned with a small shrine dedicated to a particular deity. The structure was generally erected on a mound or artificial brick platform, presumably to serve as a protection against floodwaters. Sometimes the term ziggurat is used to include the platform as well as the tower itself. This great staged tower of Babylon may have been the original Tower of BABEL (Gen. 11:1-9), modified by subsequent reconstruction and additions, although efforts to prove so have been unsuccessful. From archaeological and other sources it appears that it was a seven-story building of sun-dried mud brick faced with kiln-dried brick. An eighth story probably consisted of a small shrine dedicated to Marduk, and in the time of Nebuchadnezzar it was faced with blue enameled bricks. Access to the various levels was gained by means of stairways or ramps. The ground plan of the ziggurat was approximately 300 ft. (90 m.) square, and the structure as it stood in the sixth century B.C. exceeded 300 ft. (90 m.) in height.

The associated temple of Marduk consisted of an annex leading to the principal building. In the latter were a number of chapels devoted to deities other than Marduk, but his shrine was by far the most ornate, richly decorated with gold, alabaster, cedar-wood paneling, lapis lazuli, obsidian, and other semiprecious stones. Much of this work was done in the sixth century B.C.

Nebuchadnezzar died in 562 B.C., and during the next five years three kings, one of whom was EVIL-MERODACH (2 Ki. 25:27), occupied the throne until NABONIDUS came to power in 556. Nabonidus was a mystic who had antiquarian interests, and after a short rule he made his son Bēl-šar-ušur (Belshazzar) regent while he retired to Teima (see TEMA) in ARABIA. After nine years he returned to Babylon only to witness the overthrow of the city by CYRUS in 539. This conqueror did not pillage Babylon, but acted respectfully toward the shrines and deities of the land. Enslaved populations were liberated, including the captive Hebrews, and Cyrus, “king of Babylon,” set about building up his vast Persian empire. See PERSIA.

DARIUS I (c. 521-485 B.C.) continued the political tendencies begun by Cyrus, but in later years the center of influence of the Achaemenid regime moved from Babylon to Persepolis and Ecbatana. When the Persian empire fell to ALEXANDER THE GREAT in 330, Babylon was destroyed. Alexander intended to reconstruct the great ziggurat, and ordered the rubble removed from the site, but at his death in 323 the task was left unfinished. Although remaining an inhabited site, Babylon declined still further in importance under the PARTHIANS (c. 125 B.C.).

Babylon is mentioned several times in the NT. One controversial passage is at the end of 1 Peter: “She who is in Babylon, chosen together with you, sends you her greetings” (1 Pet. 5:13). This statement appears to be a greeting from a “sister church” (so NRSV), but what city is in view? Although some have thought that Mesopotamian Babylon is in view, there is no evidence that PETER ever visited this city; moreover, it would seem an extraordinary coincidence for Mark and Silvanus, Paul’s companions, to have been in Mesopotamia also. Most scholars take this verse as a reference to ROME, indicating the place in which the letter was written. See PETER, FIRST LETTER OF.

In the book of Revelation, “Babylon” is described as a great city that was to fall dramatically, as had Mesopotamian Babylon (Rev. 14:8; 16:19; 18:2, 10, 21). It was the “mother of prostitutes,” the very antithesis of the new Jerusalem, and as such the fount of all earth’s abominations (17:5). Some have interpreted this apocalyptic city as an extension of that Mesopotamian metropolis (just as they would posit the heavenly Jerusalem to be described in terms of an extended Palestinian Jerusalem), but the name of Babylon is clearly stated to be a “mystery” that is to be allegorically interpreted (17:5, 7). Most commentators see Rome as fulfilling all the characteristics of the Babylon of Revelation. Faced by that city’s opposition to the kingdom of God, it would be natural for Jews and Christians alike to see in the new world power of Rome a “Babylon” such as had oppressed Judah. Since God had overthrown the Mesopotamian city and delivered his people, in the same way the downfall of the Roman empire could be envisaged.

Babylonian captivity. See EXILE.

Baca, Valley of. bay`kuh (Heb. bākā › H1133, “balsam tree” or “weeping”). TNIV Baka. This name occurs only in Ps. 84:6, which says of those who trust in God and are blessed: “As they pass through the Valley of Baca, / they make it a place of springs.” The name possibly refers to a plant that exuded gum or that dripped tear-like drops of moisture. In any case, the psalmist appears to use this name, not in reference to an actual geographical location, but as a symbol of the pilgrim’s affliction.

Bacchides. bak`uh-deez (Gk. Bakchidēs). A SELEUCID official who figures prominently in the book of 1 Maccabees. As general, Bacchides was required to conduct a number of campaigns against Judas MACCABEE and his followers. The first one took place when the Seleucid king Demetrius sent Bacchides to Judea to establish ALCIMUS as high priest; the general succeeded in this task, but in the process alienated many (1 Macc. 7:5-20). In a second campaign Bacchides attacked with a large force that killed Judas and dispersed the Jewish army (9:1-18). The Jews elected Jonathan, Judas’s brother, as their leader, and two years later Demetrius sent Bacchides against Jonathan. The siege proved unsuccessful and Bacchides withdrew permanently from Judea, providing a basis for a truce (9:57-63).

backsliding. This English term occurs especially in the book of Jeremiah (Jer. 2:19; 3:22; 5:6; 14:7). In these and similar instances, the relevant Hebrew terms were used when Israel turned away from the true and living God to worship the heathen nature gods and idols, usually referred to with the name BAAL. See APOSTASY. The term “backsliding” does not appear in the NT, but the idea is implied (Mk. 4:16, 17; Lk. 9:62; Gal. 3:1-5; 1 Tim. 5:15; 2 Tim. 4:10; Rev. 2:4; 3:17). The NT concept carries with it the idea that those who once made profession of the Christian faith have turned aside or have reverted to a life of sin and spiritual indifference.

badger. See ANIMALS.

bag. This term is used in English versions of the Bible to translate various Hebrew and Greek nouns. The most common Hebrew word is kîs H3967, used especially of a “weight bag” (e.g., Deut. 25:13; Isa. 46:6). A frequent Greek noun in the NT is pēra G4385, which probably refers to a knapsack (e.g., Matt. 10:10; it is distinguished from ballantion G964, “purse,” in Lk. 22:35). See also PURSE.

bagpipe. See MUSIC AND MUSICAL INSTRUMENTS.

Baharum. buh-hair’uhm. See BAHURIM.

Baharumite, Barhumite. buh-hair’uh-mit, bahr-hyoo’mit (Heb. baḥărûmî H1049, barḥumî H1372). Apparently, two alternate ways of designating someone from BAHURIM (1 Chr. 11:33; 2 Sam. 23:31).

Bahurim. buh-hyoor’im (Heb. baḥûrîm H1038, possibly “[village of] young men”). NRSV also Baharum (in 1 Chr. 11:33). A village in the territory of BENJAMIN, often identified with modern Ras et-Temim, just NNE of the Mount of OLIVES, on the N side of the Roman road to JERICHO from JERUSALEM. Bahurim is mentioned in several historical passages (2 Sam. 3:16; 16:5; 17:18-20). Bahurim happened to be the home of SHIMEI, who ran along the ridge throwing stones at DAVID and cursing the king (19:16; 1 Ki. 2:8). This town also had some loyal supporters of David, for an unnamed woman concealed David’s spying messengers in a well at Bahurim (2 Sam. 17:18-20). Further, one of David’s elite military heroes, AZMAVETH, was apparently a native of this town (2 Sam. 23:31, “the Barhumite”; 1 Chr. 11:33, “the Baharumite”).

Bajith. bay’jith (Heb. bayit H1074, “house”). Also Bayith. According to the KJV and other versions, this is the name of an otherwise unknown city, mentioned alongside DIBON (Isa. 15:2). The Hebrew text is difficult, and many scholars take the word as a common noun (cf. NIV and NRSV).

Bakbakkar. bak-bak’uhr (Heb. baqbaqqar H1320, meaning uncertain). One of the Levites who ministered in the temple after the return from the EXILE (1 Chr. 9:15; possibly identical to BAKBUKIAH).

Bakbuk. bakˈbuhk (Heb. baqbûq H1317, possibly short form of BAKBUKIAH). The head of a family of temple servants (NETHINIM) who returned from the EXILE with ZERUBBABEL (Ezra 2:51; Neh. 7:53).

Bakbukiah. bakˈbuh-kiˈuh (Heb. baqbuqyâ H1319, perhaps “Yahweh has emptied, poured out”). A Levite who served after the EXILE; he is described as an associate of MATTANIAH, the director of worship (Neh. 11:17; 12:9). In another reference (12:25), Bakbukiah and Mattaniah are grouped with the gatekeepers, so it is not certain whether the same persons are meant. See also BAKBAKKAR, baker. See OCCUPATIONS AND PROFESSIONS.

Balaam. bayˈluhm (Heb. bilˁām H1189, possibly “devourer, glutton”; Gk. Balaam G962). Son of Beor from the city of PETHOR on the EUPHRATES, a diviner with a remarkable history (Num. 22:22—24:25; 31:8, 16; Deut. 23:4; Josh. 13:22; 24:9; Neh. 13:2; Mic. 6:5; 2 Pet. 2:15; Jude 11; Rev. 2:14). Balaam figures when the Israelites pitched their tents in the plains of MOAB after their victory over SIHON and OG. BALAK, the king of the Moabites, sent an embassy of elders of Moab and MIDIAN to Balaam, offering to reward him if he would curse the Israelites. After looking to God about the matter, he replied that God had forbidden him to comply with the request. Balak then sent some messengers of a higher rank with more alluring promises. This time God permitted Balaam to go, cautioning him, however, to deliver only the message God gave him. On his way to Balak, Balaam had this command strongly impressed on his mind by the strange behavior of his donkey and his encounter with the angel of the Lord.

Balak took Balaam to BAMOTH BAAL, from which a part of the camp of the Israelites could be seen. To Balak’s disappointment, Balaam pronounced a blessing on the Israelites instead of a curse. Surprised and incensed at the words of the diviner, Balak thought that a fuller view of the camp of Israel might change his disposition. He took him to the top of Mount PISGAH, but the only result was further blessing instead of cursing. Balaam compared the children of Israel to a lion who will not lie down until he has eaten his prey. In desperation Balak now suggested that the issue be tried from a third locality. They went to the top of PEOR, and there the Spirit of God came on Balaam and caused him to declare not only that God would bless Israel, but that he who blessed her would be blessed and he who cursed her would be cursed. In his bitter disappointment, Balak angrily reproached Balaam and ordered him to go home without the promised reward. Before he left, Balaam reminded the king that at the very beginning he had said that no amount of money could make him give anything other than the commandment of the Lord. He then uttered a last prophecy—the most remarkable so far—in which he foretold the coming of a star from Jacob and a scepter out of Israel that would defeat Israel's enemies, including Moab.

Nothing else is said of Balaam until Num. 31. There the seer, who had failed to turn away the Lord from his people, tried before long to turn the people from the Lord. He knew that if he succeeded in this, the consequences to Israel would be just as Balak had desired, God's curse on Israel. By his advice the Israelites were seduced into idolatry and all the vile abominations connected with it. In the judgment that followed, no fewer than 24,000 Israelites perished, until it was evident that the nation abhorred idolatry as a great crime against God. By God's command Israel brought vengeance on her seducers, the Midianites; and in the universal slaughter Balaam also perished.

In the NT Balaam is several times held up as an example of the pernicious influence of hypocritical teachers who attempt to lead God's people astray (2 Pet. 2:15; Jude 11; Rev. 2:14). No Bible character is more severely excoriated. The experience of Balaam brings into focus some basic elements in the biblical understanding of God's rule in the world. First, we see how the Lord overrules man's sinful will and desire to bring his own purposes to pass. Balaam already knew God's will (Num. 22:12-13). The fact that he responded to the second deputation (22:15) with a reference to abundant reward (22:18) and a renewed approach to the Lord indicates not a sincere desire to do God's will but a determination if at all possible to do his own. It is in this light that we should understand what is expressed as a divine directive (22:20): Balaam hears from the Lord only what he wants to hear. But when he went to Balak, all he could do was what the Lord determined he should do. It is the Lord who reigns. Second, we ought to note that against all odds the Lord's promises prevail: Balak may wish to reverse them, and Balaam, if only he could, might try to overturn them, but the promises stand. It is to highlight this truth that Balaam is brought before us in a manner that challenges the promise to Abraham (Num. 22:6; cf. Gen. 12:3). But in any event it is not the word that Balaam speaks but the people's attitude to the descendants of Abraham that is decisive: Balak is unable to hurt them; Balaam and the Midianites perish. Third, we learn that the Lord guards his people from overwhelming threats of which they are not even aware. Balaam certainly possessed a mysterious power (Num. 22:6) and, without their knowledge, it was to be directed against Israel from the hills overlooking their camp. But the Lord turned the curse into a blessing and they knew nothing about it until long after (31:8). This is the truth expressed in 1 Cor. 10:13.

Balac. See BALAK.

Baladan. bal´uh-duhn (Heb. bal ʾădān H1156, Akk. Apla-iddin, “[God] gave a son”). The father of MERODACH-BALADAN king of BABYLON (2 Ki. 20:12; Isa. 39:1). His name is not attested outside the Bible.

Balah. bay´luh (Heb. bālāh H1163, possibly “old”). A town within the territory of JUDAH that was allotted to the tribe of SIMEON (Josh. 19:3; cf. v. 1). See BAALAH #2.

Balak. bay´lak (Heb. bālāq H1192, “devastator”; Gk. Balak G963). Son of Zippor and king of MOAB when Israel emerged from the wilderness to enter Canaan. Having seen what the Hebrews had done to the AMORITES, he attempted to prevent Israel’s advance by hiring BALAAM to curse them (Num. 22-24). He built altars at three different sites for the purpose, but each attempt failed. He remains throughout Hebrew history as an example of the folly of attempting to thwart Yahweh’s will (Josh. 24:9; Jdg. 11:25; Mic. 6:5; cf. Rev. 2:14 [KJV, “Balac”]).

balance. The English word is from the Latin bilanx and means “having two scales.” The balances of the Hebrews consisted of a horizontal bar, either suspended from a cord that was held in the hand or pivoted on a perpendicular rod. Scales were suspended from the ends of the bar, one for the object to be weighed, the other for the weight. At first the weights were of stone. Weighing with such balances could be accurately done, but the system was liable to fraud, so that in the OT there is much denunciation of “dishonest scales” (Mic. 6:11).

baldness. Natural baldness is seldom mentioned in the Bible. It was believed to result from hard work (Ezek. 29:18) or disease (Isa. 3:17, 24). Baldness produced by shaving the head, however, is frequently referred to. It was done as a mark of mourning for the dead (Lev. 21:5; Isa. 15:2; 22:12; Mic. 1:16). Shaving the head as a sacrifice to the deity was the custom of the heathens in the land, and the Israelites were strictly forbidden to practice it (Lev. 21:5; Deut. 14:1). The custom among neighboring nations of shaving all but a small patch in the center of the head was also forbidden (Lev. 19:27; 21:5). When a NAZIRITE completed his vow, the shaven hair was offered as a sacrifice to the Lord (Num. 6:18; cf. Acts 18:18; 21:24).

balm. An aromatic resin perhaps obtained in GILEAD (Gen. 37:25; Jer. 8:22; 46:11) and exported from Palestine. It was used as an ointment for healing wounds (Jer. 51:8). It came from a small tree not now found in Gilead, and perhaps it never grew there. See also PLANTS.

balsam. See PLANTS.

Bamah. bay'muh (Heb. bāmāh H1196, "high place"). This name occurs only in Ezek. 20:29, where the prophet is instructed to ask the Israelites, with scorn and an apparent word play, "What [mā] is the high place [habbāmā] to which you go [habbā'îm]?" Then follows the comment, "And its name is called Bamah to this day" (lit. trans.). The location of this HIGH PLACE is not known, although some scholars speculate that it may be a reference to a prominent center of worship such as the one at GIBEON (cf. 1 Ki. 3:4).

Bamoth, Bamoth Baal. bay'moth, bay'moth-bay'uhl (Heb. bāmôt H1199, bāmôt ba'al H1200, "high places of Baal"). A place in TRANSJORDAN, N of the ARNON River, where the Israelites stopped (Num. 21:19-20). Bamoth is probably the shortened form of Bamoth Baal (22:41). This Moabite town probably was named for the special cultic installation found at this spot, where King BALAK brought the prophet BALAAM to curse Israel. Subsequently, the tribe of REUBEN was assigned this city as part of its inheritance (Josh. 13:17). The precise location is not known, but most fix it on the W edge of the Transjordanian plateau, S of Mount Nebo (see NEBO, MOUNT).

ban. See DEVOTED THING.

band. This English term has various meanings and translates several Hebrew nouns and verbs. For example, the noun ḥāšûq H3122 is used with reference to the silver rings (KJV, “fillets”) put on the posts of the TABERNACLE (Exod. 27:10 et al.). The very different meaning “a group of people” is often expressed in Hebrew with the term gēdûd H1522, which usually refers to a raiding party (Gen. 49:19 et al.). In the NT, the KJV uses English “band” to render the military Greek noun speira G5061 (e.g., Jn. 18:3; NIV, “detachment”). Other Hebrew and Greek terms may be rendered with “band” or its synonyms in various English translations.

Bani. bay’ni (Heb. bānî H1220, possibly a short form of BENAIAH). This name, which was popular in the postexilic period, is easily confused with others that have a similar form (e.g., Binnui), and it may have also been used as a clan name; the items included here may therefore not correspond precisely with the number of individuals referred to in the Bible.

(1) “Bani the Gadite” was one of DAVID’s Thirty, the military elite of its time (2 Sam. 23:36 NRSV and other versions). The NIV, however, has “the son of Hagri” on the basis of the parallel passage (1 Chr. 11:38). See HAGRI.

(2) Son of Shemer, descendant of LEVI through MERARI, and ancestor of ETHAN; the latter ministered with music in the TABERNACLE during the time of David (1 Chr. 6:46).

(3) Descendant of JUDAH through PEREZ and ancestor of Uttai; the latter was among the first to resettle in Jerusalem after the EXILE (1 Chr. 9:4).

(4) The ancestor of a large group that returned from the EXILE with ZERUBBABEL (Ezra 2:10; called Binnui in Neh. 7:15).

(5) Ancestor of Shelomith; the latter accompanied EZRA as a representative from Babylon (Ezra 8:10, on the basis of LXX and of 1 Esd. 8:36; KJV, following the MT, omits the name).

(6) In the list of exiles who had married foreign women, the (clan?) name Bani occurs three times according to the MT (Ezra 10:29, 34, 38). The first two occurrences may refer to the same family head. The third occurrence probably reflects a scribal mistake, so that the name Bani should be emended to “descendants of” (Heb. bēnê; so NIV and NRSV, following LXX).

(7) A Levite whose son Rehum helped to repair the wall of Jerusalem (Neh. 3:17).

(8) A LEVITE who along with others assisted Ezra in expounding the law of God (Neh. 8:7). He is probably the same person mentioned twice among those who led the people in confession and worship (9:4a, 5; the Bani mentioned in 4b, if not a textual corruption, is a different individual).

(9) One of the Levitical representatives who signed the covenant of NEHEMIAH (Neh. 10:13).

(10) One of the leaders of the people who signed the covenant of Nehemiah (Neh. 10:14).

(11) Father of Uzzi; the latter, who was “chief officer of the Levites in Jerusalem” after the return from the exile, is also described as “one of Asaph’s descendants, who were the singers responsible for the service of the house of God” (Neh. 11:22).

banking. An early form of banking business was first established in Israel only after the EXILE. Previously, people generally buried their treasures and valuables (Josh. 7:21; cf. Matt. 13:44; Lk. 19:20). Functions associated with banking, however, are recorded throughout the Bible. Money could be received on deposit, loaned out, and exchanged for smaller denominations or for foreign money. Israelites were not permitted to charge each other INTEREST (Exod. 22:25) but could lend with interest to Gentiles (Deut. 23:20).

banner. A standard or ensign, generally on a high pole or carried on a staff, to represent a cause or to indicate a rallying point for battle. Banners were used in ancient times for military, national, and ecclesiastical purposes very much as they are today. In connection with Israel’s wilderness journey we read, “The Israelites are to camp around the Tent of Meeting some distance from it, each man under his standard with the banners of his family” (Num. 2:2). The word occurs frequently in the figurative sense of a rallying point for God’s people (Isa. 5:26; 11:10; Jer. 4:21).

banquet. The Hebrews, like other peoples of the ANE, were very fond of social feasting. At the three great religious feasts, which all males were expected to attend, the family had its feast. Sacrifices were accompanied by a feast (Exod. 34:15; Jdg. 16:23-25). There were feasts for birthdays (Gen. 40:20; Job 1:4; Matt. 14:6), marriages (Gen. 29:22; Matt. 22:2), funerals (2 Sam. 3:35; Jer. 16:7), laying of foundations (Prov. 9:1-5), vintage (Jdg. 9:27), sheep-shearing (1 Sam. 25:2, 36), and on other occasions. A banquet always included wine drinking; it was not simply a feast in our sense. At a large banquet a second invitation was often sent on the day of the feast, or a servant brought the guests to the feast (Matt. 22:2-14; Lk. 14:17-24). The host provided robes for the guests; these were worn in his honor and were a token of his regard. Guests were welcomed by the host with a kiss (Lk. 7:45), and their feet were washed because of the dusty roads (Gen. 18:4; Jdg. 19:21; Lk. 7:44). The head was anointed (Ps. 23:5; Lk. 7:46), and sometimes the beard, the feet, and the clothes were also anointed. The head was decorated with garlands (Isa. 28:1). The guests were seated according to their respective rank (1 Sam. 9:22; Lk. 14:8), the hands were washed (2 Ki. 3:11), and prayers for blessing on the food were said (1 Sam. 9:13; Matt. 15:35; Lk. 22:17). The PHARISEES made hand washing and the blessing of food burdensome rituals. The feast was put under the superintendence of a “governor of the feast,” usually one of the guests, whose task it was to taste the food and the drinks and to settle about the toasts and amusements. The most honored guests received either larger portions or more choice ones than the rest (Gen. 43:34; 1 Sam. 9:23-24). Portions were sometimes sent to friends not attending the feast (2 Sam. 11:8; Neh. 8:10). Often the meal was enlivened with music, singing, and dancing (2 Sam. 19:35; Lk. 15:25), or with riddles (Jdg. 14:12). A great banquet sometimes lasted seven days, but excess in eating and drinking was condemned by the sacred writers (Eccl. 10:16-17; Isa. 5:11-12).

baptism. The significance of the Greek verb baptizō G966 often has been obscured by a lack of exegetical clarity and by forced interpretation. Its true meaning can be found only in its usage and its theological significance. Its antecedent meaning involves the Judaic usage in OT times and the practice of JOHN THE BAPTIST. Its incipient meaning lies in CHRIST’S own baptism and his interpretation of it. Its formal meaning is to be found in its apostolic interpretation, particularly by PAUL.

The idea of ceremonial washing, or cleansing, appears repeatedly in the Mosaic laws of purification (e.g., Exod. 29:4, 17; 30:17-21; 40:12, 30; Lev. 1:9, 13; 6:27; 9:14; 11:25; 14:8-9, 47; 15:5-27; 16:4-28; 17:15-16; 22:6; Num. 8:7; 19:7-21; 31:23-24; Deut. 21:6; 23:11). It is clear that later JUDAISM incorporated this connotation of cleansing and purification into its idea of the new covenant relation and used baptism as a rite of initiation, as reflected in the practices of the Qumran sect (see DEAD SEA SCROLLS).

While later Judaism certainly attached a deeply pietistic significance to the cleansing act, John the Baptist, who followed in this tradition, infused into the ritual act of initiation and purification an ethical quality that baptism had not had before. His was a moral community of penitent souls seeking personal righteousness, and he associated with the act of baptism the imperative necessity for a thorough change in the condition of the soul, manifested in a remission of sins through REPENTANCE. His fervent exhortation to repent and flee from the wrath to come (Matt. 3:7-8) was not a mere invitation to a religious ceremony, but was, rather, an indication of the change brought on by the act of baptism itself. The meaning of the act was deepened. Baptism was transformed from a rite to which one submitted oneself to a positive moral act initiated by the individual as a decisive commitment to personal piety.

John's baptism was, nevertheless, only transitory—his baptism of repentance was but preparatory to a baptism of identification. The meaning and efficacy of baptism can be understood only in the light of the redemptive death and resurrection of Christ. Christ referred to his death in the words, "I have a baptism to undergo" (Lk. 12:50), and in the question, "Can you drink the cup I drink or be baptized with the baptism I am baptized with?" (Matt. 20:22; Mk. 10:38). Here the noun baptisma G967, which indicates the state or condition, is used instead of baptismos G968, which applies to Jewish rites and refers only to the act itself. The term baptisma, used only in the NT and in Christian writings, never refers to the act alone but always incorporates into its meaning the entire scope of the redemptive significance of the incarnate person of Christ.

Ritual purification pool used by the Qumran community.

John's baptism of Jesus, therefore, connects the act of water baptism with the meaning of the salvation events through Jesus's own person and work. To the act of water baptism Jesus added the promise of the baptism with the HOLY SPIRIT, the means by which his redemptive work is applied to human beings (Matt. 3:11; Mk. 1:8; Lk. 3:16; Acts 1:4-5; 11:16). Using the initiatory and purificatory meaning found in water baptism, Christ made spiritual baptism (by the Holy Spirit) synonymous with the actual application of the virtues of his death and resurrection to sinners.

The apostolic writers, particularly Paul, related Spirit baptism to the whole of the redemptive act. The act of water baptism symbolizes cleansing, but Spirit baptism gives the believer entry into the righteousness of Christ through an identification with Christ himself. Through Spirit baptism the redeemed sinner is incorporated into the spiritual BODY OF CHRIST, not merely as an act of initiation but as a state or condition of personal righteousness. It is, therefore, the only access to identification with the redeeming Christ.

Baptism may, therefore, be regarded from two perspectives. Subjectively, the baptism by the Holy Spirit brings the believer into positive relationship to God; symbolically, water baptism is the objective manifestation of the believer's acquiescence in that relationship. Its subjective significance is represented in the NT by many analogies. It is regarded as the means of participation in the death and resurrection of Jesus. In Rom. 6:3-5, Paul relates the actual spiritual condition of his readers to such a participation in Jesus' death and resurrection through Spirit baptism. "Do you not know that all of us who have been baptized into Christ Jesus were baptized into his death? We were buried therefore with him by baptism into death, so that as Christ was raised from the dead by the glory of the Father, we too might walk in newness of life." This identification has reference not merely to the death of Christ, in which the believer has also died to sin, but to the resurrection of Christ, in which the believer has found "newness of life." Spirit baptism is, therefore, an entry into the new life in Christ—a passage from the old creation into the new creation. This involves not merely forgiveness of sins but also an impartation of the life and righteousness of Christ to the believer (2 Pet. 1:4). The believer is "in Christ," and Christ is in the believer. Moreover, the identification effected through Spirit baptism cleanses the believer through the blood of Christ (Tit. 3:5-6). Thus, Spirit baptism is the incorporation of the believer into Christ's righteousness and an infusion of that righteousness into the believer.

Its symbolic significance is depicted in its objective form. While much debate has focused on the varying interpretations of the forms of baptism, each form (immersion, sprinkling, or pouring) is clearly associated with the concept of cleansing and identification, which are the two integral parts of Spirit baptism. Many believe that immersion depicts more clearly the symbolic aspect of baptism since its three steps—immersion (going into the water), submersion (going under the water), and emersion (coming out of the water)—more closely parallel the concept of entering into the death of Christ, experiencing the forgiveness of sins, and rising to walk in the newness of Christ's resurrected life. Others argue that Rom. 6 is not the only passage that speaks of baptism; elsewhere Paul uses the symbolism of drinking (1 Cor. 12:13) and of being clothed (Gal. 3:27).

The genius of Christian baptism, however, is to be found not merely in its symbolic significance but in its actual effect in the life of the believer. Spirit baptism is always vitally related to FAITH. Only through responsive faith to the regenerative work of Christ does the soul participate in Spirit baptism and, simultaneously, in vital union with God. Subsequently, the symbolic form of baptism (water baptism) should also be related to, and on the basis of, personal faith, as a public commitment to the person of Christ.

While much recent emphasis among evangelicals has been on the “symbol only” concept of baptism, and while the NT pointedly abstains from ascribing a sacramental value to the act itself, a renewed emphasis on Spirit baptism will restore to its proper place a much neglected aspect of this doctrine. No statement of the doctrine can be a truly biblical one if it fails to emphasize that beyond the symbolic and commemorative act performed by a person there is also the Holy Spirit’s inward operation. Spirit baptism brings the regenerated person into a redemptive relationship through his participation in and identification with the death, burial, and resurrection of Christ and the subsequent infusion of the merits of that death and resurrection into the life of the believer, by which he may live as one dead to sin but alive to God (Rom. 6:11).

baptism for the dead. In the midst of his discussion of the RESURRECTION, the apostle PAUL argues: “Now if there is no resurrection, what will those do who are baptized for the dead? If the dead are not raised at all, why are people baptized for them?” (1 Cor. 15:29). Opinion concerning the meaning of this verse has been divided since early times, and there can be few passages of Scripture concerning which the views of modern commentators are so bewilderingly diverse. Only a selection of the more important views can be given: (1) Vicarious baptism to benefit those who died unbaptized. (2) Baptism for the sake of the dead, that is, in order to secure reunion with Christian relatives after death. (3) Baptism on account of the dead, that is, because of the witness in life of Christians martyred for the faith, such faith leading to the conversion and subsequent baptism of others. (4) Baptism to take the place of the dead, that is, to make up their number and so, perhaps, to hasten the second coming by assisting the completion of one of its preconditions. (5) Baptism over the dead, that is, over their graves, to express solidarity with them if they are Christian believers; if they are not, to involve them in salvation by this ritual. (6) Ceremonial ablution because of defilement through contact with a dead body. (7) Prayer for the dead described figuratively as baptism for them, comparable to the way “sacrifice” is sometimes spiritualized as prayer in the NT. (8) Death for the dead: the death of Christians regarded as redemptive and as securing salvation for the dead, and described as baptism because this symbolizes death. (9) Baptism to wash away mortal sins. (10) Baptism to confess the resurrection of the dead, because it symbolizes death and resurrection. (11) Baptism to secure benefit after death, because the thought of death has hastened the act of baptism. (12) Baptism “on account of the apostles,” whose suffering makes them “truly dead.”

The issue is anything but simple to decide. A number of the above interpretations are very forced, especially in their understanding of the Greek. Number 10 is popular because it presents no theological problems, but is grammatically suspect. Number 2 has been strongly advocated by some scholars. Number 1 still seems much the most natural. The postapostolic heretical sect of the Marcionites certainly practiced vicarious baptism, although possibly in misinterpretation of this passage. It does not seem likely that Paul was expressing approval of the practice; rather, he was only seeking to show the inconsistency of those who follow the practice while doubting or denying the resurrection.

baptism of the Holy Spirit. This phrase is sometimes used today in the sense of a “second blessing,” an in-filling of the HOLY SPIRIT subsequent to, and quite distinct from, conversion, and usually regarded as a deeper spiritual experience, ushered in by spiritual phenomena, such as glossolalia (see TONGUES, GIFT OF). Without discussing the rightness or wrongness of the view in question, it would seem to be more proper to describe such an experience or state by using a different biblical phrase, “filled with the Holy Spirit” (Acts 2:4 et al.). In biblical usage “baptism of the Holy Spirit” is more general and somewhat different, as will be seen from the examination of the texts.

The origins of the phrase probably go back to JOHN THE BAPTIST, who contrasted his own preparatory rite of water baptism, a mere token of REPENTANCE, with the Spirit-baptism that will be given by the “more powerful” one who is to succeed him (Lk. 3:16 and parallels). Since the baptism of Christ is the pattern of all Christian baptism, it is not surprising that Lk. 3:21-22 shows the “baptism of the Spirit” being fulfilled (doubtless in a very special sense) in the case of CHRIST himself, after his water baptism at the hands of John. In addition, Christ is recorded having said to NICODEMUS, “no one can enter the kingdom of God unless he is born of water and the Spirit” (Jn. 3:5).

Later references to this concept are surprisingly few. It is clear from Acts 1:5 that the promise of “baptism of the Spirit” was to be fulfilled for the first disciples at PENTECOST. In the account of that day, however, and on subsequent occasions in the NT, the phrase used is “filled with the Holy Spirit” (Acts 2:4; 9:17). This event was apparently something that could happen repeatedly to the same group (cf. 2:5; 4:8, 31). One clear instance of the original metaphor is in 1 Cor. 12:13, “we were all baptized by one Spirit.” Here Paul, by the wording, must be appealing to the universal spiritual experience of all true Christians, not to something unusual belonging to a minority. “Filling with the Spirit,” by contrast, appears to be something that can take place repeatedly.

Bar-. bahr (Aram. bar H10120, “son, descendant”). This form occurs in English Bibles only as a prefix in patronymics. For example, Acts 13:6 refers to a Jewish sorcerer in PAPHOS who was named BAR-JESUS, that is, “the son of Jesus [= Joshua].” The same pattern is found in several other names, such as BARABBAS, BARNABAS, and BARTHOLOMEW.

Barabbas. buh-rab’uhs (Gk. Barabbas G972, from Aram. bar ʾabbā , “son of Abba [= the father]”). A criminal chosen by the Jerusalem mob, at the instigation of the chief priests, in preference to Christ, to be released by PILATE on the feast of the Passover. Matthew calls him a notorious prisoner, and the other evangelists say he was arrested with others for robbery, sedition, and murder (Matt. 27:16; Mk. 15:15; Lk. 23:18; Jn. 18:40). The custom here mentioned of releasing a prisoner on the Passover is otherwise unknown. The reading “Jesus Barabbas” for his full name in Matt. 27:16-17 was found by Origen in many MSS and is attested in other witnesses; it is possibly due to a scribe’s error in transcription.

Barachel. See BARAKEL.

Barachias. See BEREKIAH.

Barak. bair’ak (Heb. bārāq H1399, “lightning”; Gk. Barak G973). Son of Abinoam, from KADESH in the tribal territory of NAPHTALI. Barak became a significant part of Israel’s history during the period of the judges when he was summoned by DEBORAH, the prophetess, to lead volunteers from ZEBULUN and Naphtali against the forces of JABIN, king of the Canaanites, who was located at HAZOR (Jdg. 4:1-24). For twenty years Israel had been oppressed by the Canaanites. The farm lands were plundered; traffic almost ceased; and the fighting men of Israel were disarmed, so that not a shield nor a spear was to be seen among them. Barak raised an army of 100,000 men, mostly from a few faithful tribes. They encamped on Mount TABOR, where wooded slopes would protect them against the chariots of the Canaanites. The army of Israel routed Jabin's 800 iron chariots and heavily armed host in the plain of JEZREEL (ESDRAELON). A heavy rainfall caused the alluvial plain to become a morass in which the Canaanite army found it impossible to move. Sisera abandoned his chariot and ran away on foot. Barak pursued him and found him dead; he had been killed by Jael in her tent. A peace of forty years followed. In Heb. 11:32 Barak's name appears among those who achieved great things through faith. The period of the judges is probably to be dated from 1200 B.C., with Deborah and Barak c. 1125.

Barakel. bair'uh-kuhl (Heb. barak ʾēl H1387, "God blesses"). Father of ELIHU, who was the last of the friends to reason with JOB (Job 32:2, 6). Barakel is also described as "the Buzite" (BUZ was a country in the eastern part of ARABIA).

barbarian. In English this term has a negative connotation, indicating that a person or culture is "uncivilized," lacking in refinement. The Greek word barbaros G975, however, simply meant "foreign," that is, "non-Greek." PAUL uses it in this sense in Rom. 1:14, where the combination of "Greeks" and "barbarians" means the whole human race. Similarly, in 1 Cor. 14:11 Paul uses the word to describe one who spoke in an unintelligible foreign tongue (NIV, "foreigner"); and in Acts 28:2, 4 it is applied to the inhabitants of the island of MALTA (NIV, "islanders"; NRSV, "natives"). In Col. 3:11 the word refers to those who did not belong to the cultivated Greek race, and its occurrence in this type of context leads easily to a pejorative use.

barber. See OCCUPATIONS AND PROFESSIONS.

Bar Cochba. See BAR KOKHBA.

Barhumite. bahr-hyoo'mit. See BAHARUMITE.

Bariah. buh-ri'uh (Heb. bārîaḥ H1377, possibly "fugitive"). Son of Shemaiah and descendant of DAVID through SOLOMON (1 Chr. 3:22).

Bar-Jesus. bahr-jee'zuhs (Gk. Bariēsous G979, from Aram. bar yēšûa ܒܪ ܝܫܘܥ, “son of JOSHUA”). A “Jewish sorcerer and false prophet” at PAPHOS on CYPRUS who became temporarily blind when PAUL denounced him (Acts 13:6-11). He opposed the preaching of the gospel for fear of losing his influential position with the governor. Paul’s empowered denunciation, exposing his character and deeds (vv. 10-11), defeated the opposition. Luke’s added words, “But Elymas the sorcerer (for that is what his name means)...” (v. 8), are obscure; possibly the simple meaning is that Bar-Jesus was his Jewish patronymic while ELYMAS was his personal Greek name.

Barjona. bahr-joh'nuh (Gk. Bariōna G980, from Aram. bar yônâ, “son of Jonah”). A family name identifying Simon PETER by his father, JONAH (Matt. 16:17 KJV; modern versions translate “son of Jonah”). In Jn. 1:42 and 21:15-17 Peter is called the “son of John.”

Bar Kokhba. bahr-kohk'buh (Aram. bar kôkbā ܒܪ ܟܝܬܒܐ, “son of the star”). Also Bar Cochba. Sobriquet given to Simon ben Kosiba, leader of the Jews in their disastrous second war with Rome, A.D. 132-135. This revolt was apparently precipitated by Emperor Hadrian’s move to found a non-Jewish city, Aelia Capitolina, on the site of JERUSALEM. Bar Kokhba proclaimed an independent Jewish state and issued coinage struck from defaced Roman currency; it took the Romans three years to stamp resistance down. The rebel headquarters were in the wadis and cliffs where the Judean wilderness breaks into the DEAD SEA. In this area is found an inaccessible cave-complex where the rebels hid and were finally starved to death or committed suicide. The cave was lined in one part by baskets of bones. A basket was found containing a bundle of PAPYRUS documents, women’s sandals, and farm and household implements. Among the letters cached in a remote rear corner of the cave were some apparently from Bar Kokhba himself. His name may have been given him as a messianic allusion to Num 24:17, but later rabbis were critical of him and apparently came up with a different sobriquet, Bar Koziba, meaning “son of a lie.”

Barkos. bahr'kos (Heb. barqôš H1401, “son of Kos”). The ancestor of some temple servants (NETHINIM) who returned from the EXILE with ZERUBBABEL (Ezra 2:53; Neh. 7:55).

barley. See PLANTS.

barn. In ancient Palestine, grain was usually stored in dry CISTERNS in the ground, but sometimes in buildings. God promised to send a blessing on the barns of the Israelites if they obeyed him (Deut. 28:8; cf. Prov. 3:10). The Greek term apothēkē G630 occurs several times in the Gospels, once metaphorically in JOHN THE BAPTIST's eschatological warning (Matt. 3:12; Lk. 3:17), elsewhere in the teachings of Jesus (Matt. 6:26; 13:30; Lk. 12:18, 24).

Barnabas. bahr'nuh-buhs (Gk. Barnabas G982, possibly from Aram. bar nēbû + â, "son of prophecy"; Luke gives the meaning "son of encouragement" [Acts 4:36] not as a scientific etymology but as an indication of character). A noted member of the early Jerusalem church and an active missionary to the Gentiles. His original name was JOSEPH, while the surname Barnabas marked his ability to comfort and encourage (or perhaps his skills in exhortation). Barnabas was a LEVITE from CYPRUS who in the early days of the church sold a field and gave the proceeds to the support of the poorer members of the church in Jerusalem (4:37). Later, when the church hesitated to receive Saul (PAUL) into their fellowship, Barnabas removed their fears by speaking in the apostle's behalf (9:27). He is also described as "a good man and full of the Holy Spirit and faith," traits that early brought him into leadership (11:24).

After the start of the work at ANTIOCH in Syria, the church in Jerusalem sent Barnabas there to give the work direction. After laboring in that city for some time, he went to TARSUS and brought back Paul as his associate (Acts 11:22-26). At the end of a year the two men were sent to carry alms from the infant church to the believers at Jerusalem, who were suffering from famine (11:27-30). Returning from Jerusalem, they were ordained as missionaries and, accompanied by John Mark, proceeded on a mission to the Gentiles (13:2-5; see MARK, JOHN). Barnabas and Paul together are referred to as APOSTLES (14:14). Together the two men labored at Cyprus, Antioch in Pisidia, Iconium, Lystra, and Derbe. Initially, the leadership is ascribed to Bar-nabas, but Paul seems to have taken the lead after the events in Cyprus ("Paul and his companions," 13:13). At LYSTRA, after a cripple was healed, the inhabitants worshiped Barnabas as ZEUS, and Paul, the chief speaker, as HERMES (14:8-28). After their return to Antioch, the church sent them to the council at Jerusalem (15:2). They were commissioned to carry the decrees of the council to the churches in SYRIA and ASIA MINOR (15:22-35).

The beginning of a difference between the two men is suggested by Paul in Gal. 2:13, where he says that Barnabas went along with PETER in the latter's inconsistent course. This was followed by a more serious break when, after Paul had suggested a second missionary journey, he refused to take along Barnabas's cousin Mark on the ground that he had left them on their first journey. The two men separated, Barnabas going with Mark to Cyprus, and Paul to Asia Minor (Acts 15:36-41). The mutual affection of the two evangelists did not cease, however. Paul's allusions to Barnabas in his letters shows that he continued to hold his former associate in high esteem (1 Cor. 9:6; Gal. 2:1, 9, 13; Col. 4:10).

After the apostolic period, Barnabas was still regarded highly. Some early church leaders attributed to him the authorship of the letter to the HEBREWS. A work that came to be known as the Epistle of Barnabas (included among the APOSTOLIC FATHERS) was produced in the first decades of the second century, but this document is anonymous and much of its content is inconsistent with NT teaching.

barrenness. To be a wife without motherhood has always been regarded in the E not merely as a matter of regret, but also of reproach and humiliation. Notice SARAH's sad laughter of despair (Gen. 18:12), HANNAH's silent pleading (1 Sam. 1:10-17), and RACHEL's passionate alternative of children or death (Gen. 30:1; cf. also REBEKAH, 25:21). It is significant that the mothers of the Hebrew race were by nature sterile (Gen. 11:30; 25:21; 29:31), and therefore God's special intervention showed his favor to Israel (cf. also ELIZABETH, Lk. 1:7, 36). Barrenness was removed by the mercy of God, often through prayer (Gen. 25:21; 1 Sam. 1:12; cf. Ps. 113:9; Lk. 23:29). ISAIAH compared the nation of Israel with a barren woman who will sing because of the promise of children (Isa. 54:1), and PAUL appealed to that promise to illustrate the principle of freedom from the law (Gal. 4:27).

Barsabas. See BARSABBAS.

Barsabbas. bahr'suh-buhs (Gk. Barsabbas G984, possibly from Aram. bar sã ˆ bā ˆ, "son of the elder"). KJV Barsabas. A patronymic of two early Jewish Christians, possibly brothers. (1) JOSEPH, surnamed JUSTUS, who must have had a close acquaintance with Jesus, since he was one of the two men nominated to succeed JUDAS ISCARIOT in the apostolic band (Acts 1:23).

(2) JUDAS, a Christian prophet who, along with SILAS, was sent to ANTIOCH of Syria with the decision of the Jerusalem conference (Acts 15:22, 32).

Bartholomew. bahr-thol'uh-myoo (Gk. Bartholomaios G978, from Aram. bar talmay, "son of Talmay"). One of the twelve apostles. His name immediately follows that of PHILIP in the lists of Jesus' disciples in the Synoptic Gospels (Matt. 10:3; Mk. 3:18; Lk. 6:14; in Acts 1:13 the name of THOMAS comes between them). John never mentions Bartholomew, while the Synoptic Gospels and Acts never mention NATHANAEL, who according to Jn. 1:45-46 was led to Christ by Philip. Thus it is reasonable to infer that Bartholomew was Nathanael's surname, although we have no conclusive proof for this view. Bartholomew figures in some early Christian traditions, but these are not reliable.

Beneath this modern asphalt road lies the ancient Jericho road on which Jesus probably met blind Bartimaeus. (View to the E.)

Bartimaeus. bahr'tuh-mee'uhs (Gk. Bartimaios G985, possibly from Aram. bar timay, "son of Timai"). Son of Timaeus. A blind man healed by Jesus as he went out from JERICHO on his way to JERUSALEM shortly before Passion Week (Mk. 10:46-52). A similar account is given by Luke (Lk. 18:35-43), except that he reports the miracle as occurring before Jesus reached Jericho, and the blind man's name is not given. Matthew, for his part, tells of Jesus healing two blind men on the way out of Jericho (Matt. 20:29-34). On the surface the stories seem irreconcilable, but various explanations have been proposed. For example, some have speculated that a blind man made his request as Jesus approached Jericho, but Jesus did not heed him, perhaps to test his faith; later, when Jesus left Jericho, the blind man was accompanied by another and both were healed. Neither this solution nor other suggestions have proved to be fully persuasive.

Baruch. bair'uhk (Heb. bārûk H1358, "blessed"). (1) Son of Neriah and devoted friend of JEREMIAH (Jer. 32:12 et al.). His brother was Seraiah, King ZEDEKIAH's staff officer (51:59). Baruch served as Jeremiah's secretary (36:4). A man of unusual qualities, he might have risen to a high position if he had not thrown in his lot with the prophet (45:5). Jeremiah dictated his prophecies to Baruch, who read them to the people (36:5-8). King JEHOIAKIM, on hearing the opening sentences of the prophecy, became greatly angered and burned the scroll. He ordered the arrest of Baruch and Jeremiah, but they escaped. Baruch rewrote the prophet's oracles with additions (36:27-32). In the reign of Zedekiah, during the final siege of Jerusalem, Jeremiah bought his ancestral estate in ANATHOTH. Since he was at that time a prisoner, he placed the deed in Baruch's hands and testified that Israel would again possess the land (ch. 32). JOSEPHUS (Ant. 10.9.1) says that Baruch continued to live with Jeremiah at MIZPAH after the fall of Jerusalem. After the murder of GEDALIAH, the leaders accused him of unduly influencing Jeremiah when the latter urged the people to remain in Judah (Jer. 43:3), a fact that shows how great Baruch's influence was thought to be over his master. He was taken to Egypt with Jeremiah (43:6). After that, all reliable records about him cease. Jerome preserves a tradition that he died in Egypt soon after his arrival. Other traditions say that he was taken by NEBUCHADNEZZAR to BABYLON after this king conquered Egypt and that he died there twelve years later. The high regard in which Baruch was held is shown by the large number of spurious writings that were attributed to him (see APOCRYPHA; PSEUDEPIGRAPHIA).

(2) Son of Zabbai; he aided NEHEMIAH in rebuilding the Jerusalem walls by repairing the section from the ANGLE to the house of the high priest, ELIASHIB (Neh. 3:20).

(3) A leader who affixed his seal to Nehemiah's covenant (Neh. 10:6).

(4) Son of Colhozeh and a descendant of JUDAH through PEREZ (Neh. 11:5).

Baruch, Book of. See APOCRYPHA.

Barzillai. bahr-zil'i (Heb. barzillay H1367, "made of iron"). (1) An aged and wealthy Gileadite of ROGELIM who, with others, brought provisions to DAVID and his army at MAHANAIM while they were fleeing from ABSALOM (2 Sam. 17:27). After David defeated Absalom and was returning to Jerusalem, Barzillai escorted him over the Jordan but, because of his age, declined the king's invitation to come and live at the capital. In his place he sent his son, KIMHAM (19:31-39). When SOLOMON was about to become king, David urged him to show kindness to Barzillai's sons in recognition of their father's loyalty (1 Ki. 2:7).

(2) A Meholathite whose son, ADRIEL, married SAUL's daughter, MERAB (2 Sam. 21:8; KJV, "Michal," following MT); Adriel's five sons were given over to the GIBEONITES to avenge Saul's blood guilt (v. 9).

(3) Father or ancestor of a family of priests who returned from the EXILE with ZERUBBABEL (Ezra 2:61-63; Neh. 7:63-64). The family members could not trace their genealogy to prove they belonged to the priesthood. Barzillai had taken his name from his wife's family when he married a descendant of Barzillai the Gileadite (see #1 above); it has been suggested that by adopting a nonpriestly family name he compromised the priestly status of his own family.

Basemath. bas'uh-math (Heb. bāšēmat H1412, "fragrant"; cf. IBSAM, MIBSAM). KJV Bashemath (in 1 Ki. 4:15, Basmath). (1) A wife of ESAU and daughter of ELON the HITTITE (Gen. 26:34). Esau's marriage to a Canaanite brought great bitterness to ISAAC and REBEKAH. Another of Esau's wives, ADAH, is also identified as a daughter of Elon the Hittite (36:2). Some believe that Adah was Basemath's sister. Others argue that 26:34 is corrupt and should read Adah rather than Basemath. See also #2 below.

(2) A wife of Esau, identified as the daughter of ISHMAEL and the sister of NEBAIOTH (Gen. 36:3). She is apparently the same as MAHALATH, who is described in identical terms earlier (28:6-9).

(3) Daughter of SOLOMON and wife of AHIMAAZ; the latter was an officer in charge of providing food for the king's household one month of the year (1 Ki. 4:15). The only other daughter of Solomon mentioned in the Bible is TAPHATH, who was also married to a district governor (v. 11).

Bashan. bay'shuhn (Heb. bāšān H1421 [always with the definite article], "smooth plain"). The fertile tract of country on the E side of the upper JORDAN, adjacent to the Sea of Galilee (see GALILEE, SEA OF). Although it is impossible to determine its exact boundaries, Bashan appears to have been bounded by Mount HERMON on the N, SALECAH on the E, GILEAD on the S, GESHUR and MAACAH on the W. The YARMUK River coursed through the southern area. Bashan included the regions of ARGOB (Deut. 3:4) and GOLAN (4:43, also a city), and the cities of EDREI (3:1), KARNAIM (1:4), ASHTAROTH (Josh. 9:10), and Salecah (Deut. 3:10). In the Greek period its cities included Hippos, Dion, Gamala, and Seleucia. JOSEPHUS identifies Bashan with Gaulanitis and Batanea (cf. Ant. 4.5.3 with 1 Ki. 4:13; and Ant. 9.8.1 with 2 Ki. 10:33). In the days of ABRAHAM it was occupied by a people called the REPHAITES (Gen. 14:5). OG, the last king of the race, was defeated and killed by the Israelites at Edrei in the time of MOSES (Num. 21:33-35; Deut. 3:1-7). The entire district was assigned to the half-tribe of MANASSEH (Deut. 3:13). SOLOMON taxed the land (1 Ki. 4:13). It was lost to Israel in the wars with the Arameans (1 Ki. 22; 2 Ki. 8:28; 10:32, 35). TIGLATH-PILESER incorporated Bashan into the Assyrian empire (2 Ki. 15:29). It was included in the kingdom of HEROD the Great and then belonged to PHILIP, Herod's son. It was celebrated for its cattle (Ps. 22:12), its breed of sheep (Deut. 32:14), and its oak trees (Isa. 2:13; Ezek. 27:6).

basin. This English term is used in the NIV normally as a translation of Hebrew kiyyôr H3963, traditionally rendered “laver.” Other English versions also use “basin” to translate mizrāq H4670 (NIV, “sprinkling bowl”); this was a vessel for pouring or scattering a considerable amount of liquid in one motion, and one can picture a broad shallow basin from which the blood of the sacrifice cascades upon the sides or top of the altar (Exod. 29:16, 20; Lev. 1:5-6, 7:2; Num. 4:14; 1 Ki. 7:40; Jer. 52:18-19; Zech. 9:15). The same type of vessel was used for wine consumption (Amos 6:6) and for meal oil offerings by rulers (Num. 7:13-14). In the NT the only reference to a basin is the occasion when Jesus washed the disciples’ feet (Jn. 13:5; Gk. nīptēr G3781).

basket. Several kinds of baskets are mentioned in the OT, but we cannot tell from their names their differences in size, shape, and use. They were made of various materials—leaves, reeds, rushes, twigs, or ropes. Some were small enough to be carried in the hands; others had to be carried on the shoulder or head or on a pole between two persons. They were used for a variety of purposes: for carrying fruit (Deut. 26:2); bread, cake, and meat (Gen. 40:17; Exod. 29:2-3); clay to make bricks, and earth for embankments (Ps. 81:6). In the NT two kinds of baskets are referred to. The kophinos G3186 (Matt. 14:20; Mk. 6:43; Jn. 6:13) was a relatively small basket that could be carried on the back to hold provisions. Twelve of these baskets were used to gather the food that remained after the feeding of the 5,000. The spyris G5083 must have been considerably larger, since it was used to let PAUL down from the wall at DAMASCUS (Acts 9:25). Seven of these were needed to gather the food that was left after the feeding of the 4,000 (Matt. 16:9-10).

Basmath. See BASEMATH.

bastard. KJV rendering of Hebrew mamzēr H4927 (Deut. 23:2 [NIV, “one born of a forbidden marriage”]; Zech. 9:6 [NIV, “foreigners”]) and Greek nothos G3785 (Heb. 12:8 [NIV, “illegitimate children”], used figuratively of those who reject God’s authority and discipline).

bat. See ANIMALS.

bath. See WEIGHTS AND MEASURES.

bathing. The act of bathing in the ordinary, nonreligious sense, whether for physical cleanliness or refreshment, is not often mentioned in the Scriptures. The average Hebrew had neither the water nor the inclination for bathing. In most cases “bathe” means partial washing. Public baths of the Greek type were unknown among the Hebrews until Greek culture invaded Palestine under ANTIOCHUS Epiphanes (c. 168 B.C.). The dusty roads of Palestine made frequent washing of the feet necessary, and this was always done when staying at a house (Gen. 18:4; 19:2; Jn. 13:10). In the Bible bathing stands chiefly for ritual acts—PURIFICATION from ceremonial defilement because of contact with the dead, defiled persons or things, or things under the ban. Priests washed their hands and feet before entering the sanctuary or making an offering on the altar (Exod. 30:19-21). The high priest bathed on the Day of Atonement before each act of expiation (Lev. 16:4, 24). In the time of Christ, the Jews washed their hands before eating (Mk. 7:3-4). According to JOSEPHUS, the ESSENES practiced daily bathing for ceremonial reasons.

Bath Rabbim. bath-rab’im (Heb. bat-rabbîm H1442, “daughter of a multitude”). A gate in the Transjordanian city of HESHBON; the beautiful eyes of a woman are compared to the pools near this gate (Cant. 7:4).

Bathsheba. bath-shee’buh (Heb. bat-šeba [◁] H1444, prob. “daughter of abundance”; in 1 Chr. 3:5 she is called bat-šûa [◁], [see BATH-SHUA], which can be interpreted as “daughter is salvation” but more probably is a textual or orthographic variant of Bathsheba). Daughter of ELIAM (Ammiel in 3:5) and wife of URIAH the HITTITE, a soldier in DAVID’s army. During Uriah’s absence in the wars David used his royal authority to commit adultery with her (2 Sam. 11). Bathsheba became pregnant and Uriah was then treacherously killed by David’s order. After a period of mourning, David married her, but the Lord was displeased and their child died soon after birth (11:27—12:23). Subsequently, David and Bathsheba had four sons, including SOLOMON (2 Sam. 5:14; 1 Chr. 3:5). With the help of the prophet NATHAN she defeated the plot of ADONIJAH to usurp the kingdom and succeeded in having David choose Solomon as his successor (1 Ki. 1:11-35). She was a woman of resourcefulness and energy and retained her influence over David until his death. Her sons Nathan and Solomon were both ancestors of Jesus Christ through different genealogical lines (Matt. 1:6; Lk. 3:31).

Bathshua. bath-shoo'uh (Heb. bat-šûa ♀, perhaps “daughter is salvation”). Also Bath-shua. (1) According to some scholars, she was the Canaanite wife of JUDAH who bore him three sons, ER, ONAN, and SHELAH (1 Chr. 2:3; cf. NRSV, NJPS). Others, however, prefer to translate the phrase as “the daughter of Shua” (cf. KJV, NIV; see also Gen. 38:2, 12), in which case we do not know her given name. See SHUA #1.

(2) Alternate form of BATHSHEBA (1 Chr. 3:5 KJV and other versions).

battering ram. See WAR.

battle. In ancient times a trumpet signal by the commander opened each battle (Jdg. 7:18) and, when necessary, called the soldiers away from the fight (2 Sam. 2:28; 18:16). When the army drew near the battle, a priest or the commander encouraged the soldiers by reminding them of God's presence and help. The fainthearted were exempted (Deut. 20:8). Military science was relatively simple. A force was usually divided into two attacking divisions, the one in the rear serving as a reserve or as a means of escape for the leader in case of defeat. Spearmen probably formed the first line, bowmen or archers the second, and slingers the third. Horses and chariots were not used by Israel until quite late. Most of the fighting was done by footmen. Sometimes the battle was preceded by duels between individuals, and these on occasion determined the outcome of the battle (1 Sam. 17:3-10; 2 Sam. 2:14-16). Night attacks and ambushes were often resorted to (Jdg. 7:16; Josh. 8:2). See also ARMS AND ARMOR; WAR.

battlement. See PARAPET.

Bavai. bay'vi (Heb. bawway H1002 [not in NIV]). Son (or descendant) of Henadad; he was the ruler of one of the half-districts of KEILAH and helped repair the wall of Jerusalem under NEHEMIAH (Neh. 3:18 KJV; RSV, “Bavvai”). The MT reading, however, is probably a scribal error for BINNUI (cf. v. 24).

bay. (1) With the meaning “inward extension of the sea,” this English term is used with reference to the N and S ends of the DEAD SEA (Josh. 15:2, 5; 18:19). In the NT it is used once with reference to an inlet on the island of MALTA where PAUL’s ship foundered (Acts 27:39; KJV, “creek”); the site is identified as the traditional Bay of St. Paul, c. 8 mi. (13 km.) NW of the town of Valetta.

(2) With the meaning “reddish-brown,” the term bay is used by the KJV to describe the fourth group of horses in Zechariah’s vision (Zech. 6:3, 7). The Hebrew term here actually means “strong” (cf. NIV), but the context leads many scholars to interpret the word as referring to a color.

bay tree. See PLANTS.

bazaar. This term is used by some English Bibles in 1 Ki. 20:34, which states that a defeated BEN-HADAD allowed King AHAB to set up “market areas” (NIV) in the streets of DAMASCUS.

Bazlith. baz’lith. See BAZLUTH.

Bazluth, Bazlith. baz’luhth (Heb. bašlûṭ H1296 and bašlîṭ H1297 [not in NIV], possibly “onion”). Also Bazlith (in Neh. 7:54). Ancestor of a family of temple servants (NETHINIM) who returned from the EXILE with ZERUBBABEL (Ezra 2:52; Neh. 7:54).

bdellium. A substance mentioned in Gen. 2:12 and Num. 11:7, variously taken to be a gum or resin (cf. NIV), a precious stone, or a pearl. It was the same color as MANNA and was found like gold and the onyx stone or the beryl in the land of HAVILAH. The Greeks gave the name bdellium to a gum obtained from a tree growing in Arabia, Babylonia, India, and Media.

Bealiah. bee’uh-li’uh (Heb. bē ʿalyâ H1270, “Yahweh is Lord”). One of a score of ambidextrous warriors, kinsmen of SAUL from the tribe of BENJAMIN, who joined DAVID at ZIKLAG in opposition to Saul (1 Chr. 12:5; cf. vv. 1-2).

Bealoth. bee’uh-loth (Heb. bē ʿālôt H1268, “ladies” [from ba ʿal H1251, “lord”]). (1) A city in the extreme S of the tribe of JUDAH (Josh. 15:24). Its precise location is unknown, but it is sometimes identified with BAALAH and with BAALATH BEER.

(2) A city in the N of Israel, associated with the tribe of ASHER and included in the list of SOLOMON's administrative districts (1 Ki. 4:16 NRSV). Many scholars understand the Hebrew to mean "in Aloth" (cf. NIV). In either case, however, the location is unknown.

beam. Used in the OT to refer to beams used in constructing the upper floors and roofs of buildings (1 Ki. 7:3) and to the beam of a weaver's loom (Jdg. 16:14). Jesus uses the term in a figurative sense in Matt. 7:3 and Lk. 6:41 (NIV "plank" in both cases) in contrast to a mote, in order to show how inconsistent it is to criticize minor faults in others when ours are so much greater.

beard. With Asiatics a badge of manly dignity, in contrast to the Egyptians, who usually shaved the head and the face. As a sign of mourning, it was the custom to pluck it out or cut it off. The Israelites were forbidden to shave off the corners of their beards, probably because that act was regarded as a sign of paganism (Lev. 19:27). To force a man to cut off his beard was to inflict on him a shameful disgrace (2 Sam. 10:4-5).

beaten gold, beaten silver. The phrase "beaten gold" is used by some English versions in descriptions of ornamental and military hardware, referring to gold inlay and overlay (1 Ki. 10:16-17; 2 Chr. 9:15-16; NIV, "hammered gold"). Some believe, however, that the word rendered "beaten" or "hammered" indicates "to be alloyed, mixed." In the case of the phrase "beaten silver," which occurs only once (Jer. 10:9; NIV, "hammered silver"), the verb is a different one and certainly means "to stamp, hammer." Ancient cultures were well aware of the unusual malleability of silver. An important use of thin leaves of silver was the incrustation of idols (cf. Isa. 30:22; Hab. 2:19). Some parts of the TABERNACLE court were overlaid with silver (Exod. 38:17). See MINERALS.

beaten oil. The KJV and other versions use this rendering for a Hebrew phrase that probably refers to OIL obtained from the first pressing of the olives, that is, the best quality, before the addition of water needed to extract the lower grades (Exod. 29:40 et al.; NIV, “oil from pressed olives”).

beating. See SCOURGE.

Beatitudes. bee-at´uh-tyoods (from the Lat. beatus, “blessed, happy,” used in the Vulg. to render Heb. ʾašrê H897 and Gk. makarios G3421). This term, referring to a state of bliss, is not found in the English Bible, but declarations of blessedness occur frequently in the OT (e.g., Ps. 32:1-2; 41:1; 65:4), and the Gospels contain isolated beatitudes by Christ (Matt. 11:6; 13:16; 16:17; 24:46 [with the Lukan parallels]; Jn. 13:17; 20:29). Most frequently, however, “the Beatitudes” is the title given to Jesus’ initial declarations in the SERMON ON THE MOUNT (Matt. 5:3-11; cf. Lk. 6:20-22).

The Beatitudes do not describe separate types of Christian character. Rather, they set forth qualities and experiences that are combined in the ideal character. In Matthew there are nine beatitudes and no woes; Luke has four beatitudes and four corresponding woes. In Matthew all the sayings except the last are in the third person; in Luke they are in the second. In Matthew all the blessings except the last are attached to spiritual qualities; in Luke they relate to outward conditions of poverty and suffering. Luke omits the third, fifth, sixth, and seventh beatitudes of Matthew. Some scholars profess to find a gradation in the order in which the Beatitudes are recorded. Much has been written on the grouping of the Beatitudes, but no grouping is generally accepted.

Beautiful Gate. A gate of the TEMPLE built by HEROD the Great and renowned for its splendor. This name occurs only in the NT, which mentions it as the place where PETER and JOHN THE APOSTLE healed a lame man (Acts 3:2, 10). Some uncertainty exists concerning the identification of the gate, but the evidence seems to favor the Nicanor Gate, which according to rabbinic literature was made of bronze that “shone like gold.”

Bebai. bee´bi (Heb. bēbay H950, possibly “child”). (1) The ancestor of an Israelite family that returned from the EXILE with EZRA (Ezra 2:11; 8:11; 10:28; Neh. 7:16).

(2) A leader of the people who affixed his seal to the covenant of NEHEMIAH (Neh. 10:15).

Becher. See BEKER.

Bechorath. See BECORATH.

Becorath. bi-kor´ath (Heb. bēkôrat H1138, “firstborn”). KJV Bechorath; TNIV Bekorath. Son of Aphiah, descendant of BENJAMIN, and ancestor of King SAUL (1 Sam. 9:1). Because the form of the name is feminine, some believe Becorath was the daughter of Aphiah.

bed. In the East, in ancient times as now, the very poor slept on the ground, their outer garments serving as both mattress and blanket. The law, therefore, did not allow such a garment to be kept in pledge after sunset, or the man would be without covering (Deut. 24:13). In more advanced conditions a rug or a mat was used as a bed. At first it was laid on the floor, usually near a wall; later it was put on an elevation, either a raised part of the floor or a bedstead, which gave rise to the expression “go up on a bed” (cf. Ps. 132:3 Heb.). Beds on raised platforms along the walls of a room were covered with cushions and used as sofas during the day. The mats from such beds were rolled up and put away in a closet or another room for the day. The bedroom where Joash (JEHOASH) was hidden was not a chamber for sleeping but a storeroom in which bedding was kept (2 Ki. 11:2). Still later, in some cases, a mattress took the place of the mat, and a pillow was also used, along with a blanket of some kind. Bedsteads must have been used occasionally, for the giant O_G had one made of iron, a marvel in those days (Deut. 3:11). The very wealthy had more elaborate and ornamented bedsteads. Amos speaks of “beds inlaid with ivory” (Amos 6:4), and in Esth. 1:6 we read of “couches of gold and silver.” Such bedsteads were sometimes further furnished with posts and a canopy (Cant. 3:10), and they had rich coverings (Prov. 7:16).

Bedad. bee´dad (Heb. bēdad H971, “alone”). Father of King H_{ADAD} of E_{DOM} (Gen. 36:35; 1 Chr. 1:46).

Bedan. bee´dan (Heb. bēdān H979, derivation uncertain). (1) Son of Ulam and descendant of M_{ANASSEH} through M_{AKIR} (1 Chr. 7:17).

(2) A judge in Israel, according to the KJV and Hebrew text of 1 Sam. 12:11, where Bedan is listed along with three prominent judges (J_{ERUB-BAAL}, J_{EPHTHAH}, and S_{AMSON}). Since such a leader is nowhere else mentioned, most modern versions of the Bible emend the text to B_{ARAK}, following some early versional evidence. A few scholars, however, interpret Bedan here as a shortened form of A_{BDON} (Jdg. 12:13); other suggestions have been proposed.

Bedeiah. bi-dee´yah (Heb. bēdyā H973, possibly “branch of Yahweh”). One of the descendants of Bani who agreed to put away their foreign wives (Ezra 10:35).

bedouin. (from Arab. badāwī [pl. badāwīn], “dessert dweller”). Often capitalized. An Arab belonging to a nomadic tribe. In ANE studies, the term is applied specifically to nonsedentary societies that specialized in camel breeding. Some of these societies acquired considerable power and may accurately be described as “bedouin states,” though they usually lasted for only a few generations. One group that evolved into a more permanent statehood was that of the N_{ABATEANS}. See N_{OMAD}.

bee. See A_{NIMALS}.

Beeliada. bee´uh-li´uh-duh (Heb. bēʿelyādā H1269, “the lord [Baal] knows”). A son of D_{AVID}, born at Jerusalem (1 Chr. 14:7). The name was apparently changed to ELIADA (“God knows,” 2 Sam. 5:16; 1 Chr. 3:8) when the term BAAL became distasteful because of its associations with idolatry.

Beelzebub, Beelzebul. bee-el’zi-buhb, -buhl (Gk. Beelzeboul G1015, derivation uncertain). The traditional spelling Beelzebub, which comes from the VULGATE (also attested in the Syriac tradition), links this name with BAAL-ZEBUB, “lord of the flies.” Most Greek MSS of the NT, however, spell it Beelzebul (a few have Beezebul). In the Gospel of Matthew, the term is used first by Jesus (Matt. 10:25), but evidently because the name had been applied to him by the Jewish leaders. In another context, Jesus is accused of casting out DEMONS by the power of Beelzebub (12:24; cf. Mk. 3:22). Here Beelzebub is further defined as the prince of demons, indicating that Jesus himself is regarded as a demon. Jesus answers his accusers by showing the inconsistency of what they say (Matt. 12:25-27; Lk. 11:18-19). It is uncertain whether the term referred to the prince of demons and thus became synonymous with SATAN (as would appear from Matt. 12:26-27), or whether it was applied to a lesser prince in the demonic hierarchy.

Beer. bee’uhr (Heb. bē ʿēr H932, “well, cistern”). (1) A stopping place for the wandering Israelites probably N of the River ARNON in MOAB (Num. 21:16). Yahweh provided water there for the people. The BEER ELIM of Isa. 15:8 may be the same place, but the site has not been identified.

(2) The place to which JOTHAM fled after declaring the parable in which he denounced his brother ABIMELECH’s violent seizure of power (Jdg. 9:21). Some have thought that this site should be identified with modern el-Bireh, c. 7 mi. (11 km.) NW of BETH SHAN.

beer (drink). See WINE.

Beera. bee’uh-ruh (Heb. bē ʿērā ʾ H938, “well, cistern”). Son of Zophah and descendant of ASHER (1 Chr. 7:37). He is listed among the “heads of families, choice men, brave warriors and outstanding leaders” (v. 40).

Beerah. bee’uh-ruh (Heb. bē ʿērâ H939, “well, cistern”). Son of Baal; he was a leader of the tribe of REUBEN who was taken into exile by TIGLATH-PILESER, king of Assyria (1 Chr. 5:6).

Beer Elim. bee'uhr-ee'lim (Heb. bē ʿēr ʿêlîm H935, “well of Elim [mighty trees]”). A city of MOAB (Isa. 15:8); perhaps the same as BEER (Num. 21:16).

Beeri. bee'uhr-i (Heb. bē ʿērî H941, apparently a gentilic of BEER). (1) Father of JUDITH, one of ESAU's wives; he is identified as a HITTITE (Gen. 26:34).

(2) Father of the prophet HOSEA (Hos. 1:1).

Beer Lahai Roi. bee'uhr-luh-hi'roi (Heb. bē ʿēr laḥay rō ʾî H936, possibly “the well of the Living One who sees me”). A spring in the desert, by the road to SHUR, between KADESH and BERED (Gen. 16:14, cf. v. 7), where the angel of the Lord appeared to the fleeing Egyptian slave girl HAGAR. Later this NEGEV site was visited by ISAAC (24:62; 25:11). Some have thought that Beer Lahai Roi may be identified with modern ʿAin el-Muweileh, about 50 mi. (80 km.) SW of BEERSHEBA.

Beeroth. bee'uh-roth (Heb. bē ʿērôt H940, “wells, cisterns”; gentilic bē ʿērôtî H943, “Beerothite”). One of four Canaanite towns whose inhabitants succeeded in deceiving Israel by making a covenant with them (Josh. 9:17). When the deceit was discovered, they were made slaves by the Israelites (9:22-23). They were apparently HIVITES (9:7), and their village was located in the territory assigned to the tribe of BENJAMIN (18:25; 2 Sam. 4:2). The murderers of ISH-BOSHETH (2 Sam. 4:2) and JOAB's armor-bearer (23:37) came from Beeroth; and Beerothites returned from Babylon after the EXILE (Ezra 2:25). The location of the town is disputed; one possibility is modern el-Bireh, about 8 mi. (13 km.) N of JERUSALEM.

Beeroth-bene-jaakan. bee'uh-roth-ben'i-jay'uh-kuhn (Heb. bē ʿērôt bēnê-ya ʿāqān, “the wells of the sons of Jaakan”). One of the stations during the wilderness wanderings of the Israelites, on the way to MOSERAH (where AARON died) and near the border of EDOM (Deut. 10:6 NRSV). The KJV renders it “Beeroth of the children of Jaakan,” while the NIV has “the wells of the Jaakanites,” and the TNIV, “the wells of Bene Jaakan.” The name could apparently be shortened to BENE JAAKAN (Num. 33:31). The site must have been near Mount HOR, but the precise location is unknown; some have suggested modern Birein. See also JAAKAN.

Beerothite. bee´uh-ruh-thit. See B_{EE}ROTH.

Beersheba. bee´uhr-shee´buh (Heb. bē ʾēr šeba *ḥ*937, “the well of seven” or “the well of swearing”). The most southerly town of the Hebrews, hence the nation’s practical boundary line; “the river of Egypt” (Wadi el-ʿArish, Gen. 15:18) was only about 60 mi. (100 km.) to the south. In the days of the conquest of Canaan, it was allotted to the tribe of SIMEON (Josh. 19:2). The familiar expression “from Dan to Beersheba” is used to designate the northern and southern extremities of the nation of Israel (2 Sam. 3:10; 17:11; 24:2).

HAGAR wandered in the wilderness of Beersheba when she fled from her mistress SARAH (Gen. 21:14). ABRAHAM made a covenant with the PHILISTINE princes here (21:32), and he made this his residence after the “offering up” of ISAAC (22:19). Here God appeared to JACOB and promised his continued presence when Jacob was on his way down into Egypt to be reunited with his son JOSEPH (46:1). ELIJAH the prophet sought refuge in Beersheba from the terror of the wicked JEZEBEL, wife of King AHAB of Israel (1 Ki. 19:3). The prophet AMOS rebuked the idolatrous tendencies he saw infiltrating the religious life of Beersheba from BETHEL and from DAN (Amos 8:14). The town is identified with modern Tell es-Saba^c.

Be Eshtarah. bee-esh'tuh-ruh (Heb. bē ʿeštērâ H1285, possibly “house of ASHTORETH”). Also Beeshterah. One of the cities given to the LEVITE clans descended from GERSHON within the territory of the half-tribe of MANASSEH on the E side of the Jordan (Josh. 21:27). However, this form may be a scribal mistake or an alternate name for ASHTAROTH (see the parallel passage, 1 Chr. 6:71).

begotten. The Hebrew and Greek verbs for “beget” (yālad H3528; gennaō G1164) are frequent in both the literal sense (Deut. 23:8) and the metaphorical (Job 38:28, referring to the deposit of dew). Modern versions often use phrases such as “become father” to render these verbs. The Hebrew word is used in Ps. 2:7 (quoted in Acts 13:33; Heb. 1:5; 5:5) of God’s relationship to the messianic king. In the NT, the literal sense is still common (e.g., Matt. 1:1-16), but the metaphorical use is greatly extended, especially when used to describe the relation of the believers to God (Jn. 1:13; 1 Pet. 1:3; et al.), so that Christians are regarded as “children” of God (e.g., Jn. 1:12). See also ONLY BEGOTTEN.

behavior. See OBEDIENCE; SANCTIFICATION.

beheading. The OT records several instances of a man's head being cut off after his death (1 Sam. 17:51; 2 Sam. 4:7, 12; 20:22). The term is used with reference to HEROD Antipas's execution of JOHN THE BAPTIST (Matt. 14:10; Mk. 6:16, 27; Lk. 9:9) and in the description of "the souls of those who had been beheaded because of their testimony for Jesus and because of the word of God" (Rev. 20:4).

Beker. bee'kuhr (Heb. beker H1146, "young camel"; gentilic bakrî H1151, "Bekerite"). Also Becher. (1) Son of BENJAMIN and grandson of JACOB (Gen. 46:21; 1 Chr. 7:6). This name and also Gera and Rosh are missing in the parallel list (Num. 26:38-40), possibly because they died childless. See also #2 below.

(2) Son of EPHRAIM and founder of a family called Bekerites (KJV, "Bachrites," Num. 26:35). Since he is called BERED in the parallel passage (1 Chr. 7:20), some scholars argue that the name Beker here is a scribal error and that it belongs a few verses later in the Benjamite genealogy (Num. 26:38-40). If so, this Beker would be the same as #1 above.

Bekorath. See BECORATH.

Bel. bel (Heb. bēl H1155, "lord" [cognate of ba'al H1251; see BAAL]). The Sumerian equivalent of Bel was En, a title of Enlil, the god of wind and storm and one of the original triad of Sumerian deities (see SUMER). With the rise to supremacy of BABYLON, its chief god MARDUK took over the attributes of Enlil, and so was given Bel as an honorific title, which gradually superseded Marduk in ordinary use (Isa. 46:1; Jer. 50:2; 51:44).

Bela (person). bee'luh (Heb. bela' H1185, perhaps "devourer" or "eloquent"; gentilic bal'î H1188, "Belaite"). (1) Son of BEOR and an early king of EDMO; his capital city was Dinhabah, otherwise unknown (Gen. 36:32-33; 1 Chr. 1:4-44). Cf. also BELA (PLACE).

(2) Son of BENJAMIN (prob. his firstborn), grandson of JACOB, and eponymous ancestor of the Belaite clan (Gen. 46:21 [KJV, “Belah”]; Num. 26:38-40; 1 Chr. 7:6-7; 8:1-3). The lists of Benjamin’s sons display some striking differences; Bela’s name is the only one that occurs in all four passages.

(3) Son of Azaz and descendant of REUBEN through JOEL (1 Chr. 5:8).

Bela (place). bee’luh (Heb. bela ^c H1186, possibly from a root meaning “devour”). Alternate name for ZOAR, one of the five cities that joined forces against KEDORLAOMER (Gen. 14:2, 8).

Bel and the Dragon. See APOCRYPHA.

Belial. bee’lee-uhl (Heb. bēliyya ^{al} H1175, “worthlessness, wickedness”; Gk. Beliar G1016). A KJV epithet of scorn and disdain that appears often throughout the OT, especially in the phrase “sons of Belial” (Deut. 13:13 et al. [NIV, “wicked men”]). The Hebrew word is probably not a name but a term that combines two common Hebrew words meaning “without” and “to profit,” thus “worthlessness”; and “son of” is an idiom indicating a person’s characteristic or membership in a group. It is therefore equivalent to our “good-for-nothing.” NABAL receives such a description from the lips of ABIGAIL, his wife (1 Sam. 25:25 KJV). The apostle PAUL employs the term once (2 Cor. 6:15; the only place where the term appears in the NIV) where Belial (Beliar) stands as opposed to Christ, thus approaching the diabolical status of ANTICHRIST.

bell. See MUSIC, MUSICAL INSTRUMENTS.

bellows. An ancient device for fanning the flames of the fires of the smelting furnace (Jer. 6:29). The Egyptian type of bellows was operated by the feet, as one alternately trod on two inflated skins. This created a forced draft by means of reed tubes tipped with iron; the air thus jettisoned into the glowing fire caused the flames to burn more brilliantly and hotly. As each skin was exhausted of its supply of air, the workman would raise it by a cord attached for that purpose and inflate the skin again. This process was then repeated as many times as was necessary.

belly. This English term renders several Hebrew words that occur with a variety of meanings. The abdominal region of human beings was described as beten H1061 (Jdg. 3:21, 22; Ps. 17:14; Prov. 13:25; et al.), a word that also was used of the womb (e.g., Ps. 22:9; 139:13) or the abdomen (distended in a woman undergoing the “jealousy ordeal,” Num. 5:21-27) or figuratively of the locale of the emotions (e.g., Isa. 16:11; Jer. 4:19; Hab. 3:16). In NT Greek the word koilia G3120 was used of the stomach or intestines (Matt. 12:40; 15:17) or, following the SEPTUAGINT, of the womb (Lk. 1:41-44; Jn. 3:4; Gal. 1:15). Metaphorically, it could be used of the HEART (Jn. 7:38). See also BODY.

Beloved Disciple. The “disciple whom Jesus loved” is referred to only in the Gospel of John, but never identified by name. He is mentioned in the following passages: Jn. 13:23; 19:26-27; 20:2; 21:7, 20, 24. In addition, 18:15 and 19:35 are also usually taken to refer to the Beloved Disciple. This figure is represented as the one “who testifies to these things and who wrote them down” (21:24; cf. vv. 20-23), suggesting that he is the (primary) author of this gospel. See JOHN, GOSPEL OF.

Who was the Beloved Disciple? Several views are held: (1) He was not a particular disciple of Jesus, a man of flesh and blood like Peter, but an ideal figure representing any true disciple of Christ. (2) He was LAZARUS, of whom it is said three times in the Gospel of John that Jesus loved him (Jn. 11:3, 5, 36). (3) He was an otherwise unknown Jerusalem disciple of Jesus connected with the high priest. (4) Some modern writers speculate that the Beloved Disciple was an otherwise unidentified Christian leader who may or may not have been a true disciple of Jesus, but who became the head of the so-called Johannine Community. (5) He was JOHN THE APOSTLE.

Both internal and external support is given for the last view. He must have been one of three apostles who are described in the Gospels as having been particularly close to Jesus—PETER, JAMES, and John. He cannot have been Peter, with whom he is contrasted (Jn. 21:20-21), or James, who was martyred early in the apostolic period, long before the Gospel of John was written (Acts 12:2). In the Lukan writings, moreover, Peter and John appear together (Lk. 22:8; Acts 3:1; 8:14), as Peter and the Beloved Disciple do in the fourth gospel. Most important, if the Beloved Disciple is not John, then John is not mentioned at all in this gospel, which would be very strange indeed. It seems most likely that John is identifying himself indirectly through this figure.

Belshazzar. bel-shaz'uhr (Heb. bēl šaššar H1157 and Aram. bēlša ššar H10109, probably from Babylonian Bēl-šar-ušur, “[the god] BEL has protected the king”). King of BABYLON, known for the writing on the wall that appeared during a great banquet and that predicted his fall (Dan. 5; 7:1; 8:1). Belshazzar was the son of, and coregent with, NABONIDUS (556-539 B.C.), the Chaldean ruler at the time of the capture of Babylon by the Persians. For many years Belshazzar was regarded as a fictitious literary creation of a postexilic author; now, however, it is well authenticated through archaeological studies that Belshazzar was a historic personage. In Dan. 5 he is referred to as the son of NEBUCHADNEZZAR (vv. 2, 11, 13, 18, 22), a description that conforms with general Semitic usage where one’s descendant is often referred to as his “son.”

Nebuchadnezzar died in 562 B.C., after a forty-two-year reign, and was followed in quick succession by Amel-Marduk (562-560, referred to as EVIL-MERODACH in Jer. 52:31 and 2 Ki. 25:27). He was replaced by Nergal Shar-usar (Nergal-Sharezer) who reigned from 560 to 556. He was succeeded by Labashi-Marduk, his weak son, who reigned but a few months and was then overthrown by revolution. One of the conspirators, Nabonidus (Nabonaid), then ascended the throne. Though a revolutionary, he was still a man of culture and religious zeal for the gods of Babylon. He is sometimes called “the world’s first archaeologist.” Nabonidus is thus the last true king of BABYLON and the father of Belshazzar. Nabonidus made Belshazzar coregent when he retired to Arabia, presumably to consolidate the weakening empire. The Nabonidus chronicle was written after the capture of Babylon in 539 B.C. CYRUS of Persia declares how he was able to take the city without a struggle. He describes his leniency toward the population, regarding himself as an “Enlightened Despot” and executioner of the will of the gods. His estimation of the character of Belshazzar is exceedingly low, not at all out of harmony with that represented by the biblical account.

Regarding the latter account, Belshazzar’s miserable doom came about at the end of, and largely as a consequence of, a drunken orgy held October 29, 539 B.C. (Dan. 5). Suddenly the fingers of a man’s hand appeared, writing in fiery letters a message that Belshazzar could not decipher but which he still recognized as ominous. After the failure of his advisers to decipher the “cryptogram,” he followed the suggestion of the queen mother and summoned the venerable Hebrew prophet DANIEL. After verbally castigating Belshazzar, Daniel interpreted the message (“You have been weighed on the scales and found wanting”). The judgment was swift and inevitable. Babylon fell to the Medo-Persians, Belshazzar was killed, and DARIUS in the name of Cyrus took the throne.

Belteshazzar. bel'ti-shaz'uhr (Heb. bēlṭēša ʾšzar H1171 [Aram. H10108], possibly from Babylonian [*Bēl-]*balāṭsu-uṣur, “[may BEL] protect his life”). The Babylonian name given to DANIEL (Dan. 1:7; 10:1; used mostly in the ARAMAIC section of the book, as follows: 2:26; 4:8-9, 18-19; 5:12). Not to be confused with the name BELSHAZZAR.

Ben (person). ben (Heb. bēn H1202 [not in NIV] “son”). According to the MT, a LEVITE musician (1 Chr. 15:18; cf. KJV). Most modern versions, following the SEPTUAGINT (cf. also the MT, v. 20), omit this name.

Ben (prefix and idiom). ben (Heb. bēn H1201, “son of”; also in the pl. construct, bēnê; in Aram. bar H10120; cf. bat H1426, “daughter”). A Hebrew term prefixed to many names or otherwise used to indicate a wide variety of states and relationships. among the most important are these: (1) Actual sonship—by far the most frequent usage—including the more general relationship of children, both male and female, to parents (Gen. 3:16). (2) The relationship of descendants, however far removed (e.g., “the children of Israel”). (3) Membership in a profession or group, such as “son of a prophet” probably meaning “belonging to a prophetic guild” (Amos 7:14), or “daughter of a foreign god” meaning “an idolatrous woman” (Mal. 2:11). (4) Nonliving objects, such as “sons of flame” meaning “sparks” (Job 5:7), or “daughter of the eye” as equivalent to the English “apple of the eye” (Ps. 17:8). (5) An outstanding feature or characteristic of a person, animal, or thing, as in “sons of wickedness” meaning “wicked men” (2 Sam. 3:34), or “son of scourgings” meaning “deserving to be beaten” (Deut. 25:2), or “son of fat” meaning “fertile” (Isa. 5:1).

Ben-Abinadab. ben'uh-bin'uh-dab (Heb. ben-ʾăbînādāb H1203, “son of ABINADAB”). A son-in-law of SOLOMON and one of the twelve district governors who supplied provisions for the king and his household; he was in charge of the territory around the port city of DOR (1 Ki. 4:11; KJV, “The son of Abinadab”).

Benaiah. bi-nay'yuh (Heb. bēnāyāhû H1226, prob. "Yahweh has built"). A popular name, particularly among the LEVITES. (1) Son of Jehoiada and commander over the KERETHITES and Pelethites, a special unit from DAVID's earlier days (2 Sam. 8:18; 20:23). He is described as "a valiant fighter," a native of KABZEEL, who through a number of daring exploits distinguished himself as one of David's mighty warriors and was put in charge of the king's bodyguard (2 Sam. 23:20-23; 1 Chr. 11:22-25; 27:5-6). Because he did not take part in the attempted usurpation of ADONIJAH (1 Ki. 1:8), he was among those chosen to make arrangements for the proclamation of SOLOMON as king (1:32-40). Under the new king, Benaiah replaced JOAB as head of the army (2:35; 4:4) and executed Adonijah (2:25), Joab (2:29), and SHIMEI (2:46).

(2) An Ephraimite warrior from the town of PIRATHON and one of David's Thirty (2 Sam. 23:30; 1 Chr. 11:31). He became army commander for the eleventh month and had 24,000 men in his division (1 Chr. 27:14).

(3) A clan leader in the tribe of SIMEON (1 Chr. 4:36). He is listed among those whose families increased greatly during the days of King HEZEKIAH and who dispossessed the Hamites (see HAM) and MEUNITES near GEDOR (vv. 38-41).

(4) A Levite appointed to the second order of singers and assigned to play the lyre with others "according to alamoth" (1 Chr. 15:18, 20; 16:5).

(5) One of the priests assigned to blow the trumpets regularly before the ARK OF THE COVENANT (1 Chr. 15:24; 16:6).

(6) Father of Jehoiada; the latter succeeded AHITHOPHEL as royal counselor (1 Chr. 27:34).

(7) Grandfather of Jahaziel and descendant of ASAPH (2 Chr. 20:14); possibly the same as #4 above.

(8) A supervisor under CONANIAH and SHIMEI, who were ordered by King Hezekiah to prepare storerooms in the temple (2 Chr. 31:13).

(9) Father of Pelatiah; the latter was one of the evil leaders of the people in EZEKIEL's time (Ezek. 11:1, 13).

(10-13) Four different Israelites listed among those who had taken foreign wives in the days of EZRA (Ezra 10:25, 30, 35, 43).

Ben-Ammi. ben-am'i (Heb. ben-ammî H1214, possibly "son of my people"). Son of the younger daughter of LOT (Gen. 19:38) whom she conceived through her own father following the destruction of SODOM. He was the progenitor of the AMMONITES. See also MOAB.

Ben-Deker. ben-dee´kuhr (Heb. ben-deqer H1206, “son of Deker [piercing]”). One of the twelve district governors who supplied provisions for SOLOMON and the royal household; he was in charge of the second administrative district in the northern part of the SHEPHELAH, roughly the area of southern DAN (1 Ki. 4:9; KJV, “The son of Dekar”).

Bene Berak. bin´ee-bihr´ak (Heb. bēnê-bēraq H1222, “sons of Barak [lightning]”). One of the towns originally allotted to the tribe of DAN (Josh. 19:45), but the Danites were unable to occupy the territory (v. 47). It is identified with the modern el-Kheiriyeh, 4.5 mi. (7 km.) E of JOPPA.

benediction. A prayer in which divine blessings are invoked or in which there is recognition that such blessings are present. See BLESS.

Benedictus. ben´uh-dik´toohs (Latin term used to translate Greek eulogētos G2329, “blessed, praised”). The name given to ZECHARIAH’s thanksgiving hymn at the birth of JOHN THE BAPTIST (Lk. 1:68-79), because the first line in the Latin Vulgate reads, Benedictus Dominus Deus Israel, “Blessed be the Lord God of Israel.”

benefactor. This term represents Greek euergetēs G2309, “well-doer,” which could function as a title sometimes assumed by kings (e.g., PTOLEMY III, 247-242 B.C.) and sometimes conferred by them upon outstanding citizens as a reward for some unusual service. The concept was of cultural importance and provides the background for various words in the NT that describe people who qualify for special recognition. The specific Greek term, however, occurs only once in the NT: when a dispute arose among the apostles as to which of them was to be regarded as the greatest, Jesus rebuked them, saying that those in authority over the Gentiles were called benefactors, but that the apostles should humbly serve others (Lk. 22:25).

Bene Jaakan. ben´ee-jay´uh-kuhn (Heb. bēnê ya‘āqān H1223, “sons of Jaakan”). One of the stations during the wilderness wanderings of the Israelites, near the border of EDOM (Num. 33:31-32; cf. Deut. 10:6). See also BEEROTH-BENE-JAAKAN; JAAKAN.

Ben-Geber. ben-gee´buhr (Heb. ben-geber H1205, “son of Geber [strength]”). One of the twelve district governors who supplied provisions for SOLOMON and the royal household; he was in charge of the sixth district in central TRANSJORDAN, with RAMOTH GILEAD as its capital (1 Ki. 4:13; KJV, “The son of Geber”). This territory, initially part of MANASSEH, was later what remained of DAVID’s Aramean conquests.

Ben-Hadad. ben-hay´dad (Heb. ben-hădad H1207, “son of HADAD [thunderer]”). The name or title of three (according to some scholars, two) Aramean kings. See SYRIA.

(1) Ben-Hadad I, son of TABRIMMON and grandson of HEZION, ruled in DAMASCUS and was a contemporary with ASA, king of Judah from 910 to 869 B.C. (1 Ki. 15:18-20). At the request of Asa, Ben-Hadad severed his alliance with BAASHA of Israel and aligned himself with the southern kingdom. Though his assistance was of temporary value, the price that Asa was obliged to pay for such aid was tremendous, as Ben-Hadad not only gained control of the treasures of Asa’s kingdom but was able through his alliance to extend his territory into the Hebrew kingdoms themselves.

(2) Ben-Hadad II (1 Ki. 20:1-34; 2 Ki. 6:24; 8:7-9) was in all probability the son of Ben-Hadad I (although some scholars argue that that they are one and the same person; others have proposed that Ben-Hadad II and III are the same). Ben-Hadad II should likely be identified with Adad-ıdri (Hadadezer) of Damascus, who is mentioned in Assyrian records. He was contemporary with AHAB of Israel (873-853 B.C.), against whom he waged war, laying siege to the newly constructed capital, SAMARIA. Because of the ungracious terms of surrender demanded by Ben-Hadad, Ahab refused to capitulate. With divine aid, Ahab was able to rout the Syrian army utterly at the battle of APHEK. Ahab spared the life of Ben-Hadad, thus never fully realizing the victory that otherwise would have been his.

(3) Ben-Hadad III (796-770 B.C.) was son of the usurper HAZAEL, hence not in direct line (2 Ki. 13:3). His name was adopted from the illustrious kings before him. He was a contemporary of AMAZIAH of Judah and JEHOAHAZ of Israel. He reduced the fighting personnel of Israel till it was “like the dust at threshing time” (13:7). JEHOASH son of Jehoahaz was able to defeat Ben-Hadad on three different occasions and to recover the cities of Israel (13:25; cf. Amos 1:4-5; Jer. 49:27).

Ben-Hail. ben-hay´uhl (Heb. ben-ḥayil H1211, “son of strength”). One of the princes sent by King JEHOSEPHAT to teach the law of the Lord in the cities of Judah (2 Chr. 17:7).

Ben-Hanan. ben-hay´nuhn (Heb. ben-ḥānān H1212, “son of grace”). Son of Shimon and descendant of JUDAH (1 Chr. 4:20).

Ben-Hesed. ben-hee´sed (Heb. ben-ḥesed H1213, “son of mercy”). One of the twelve district governors who supplied provisions for SOLOMON and the royal household; he was in charge of the third district, NW of SHECHEM in the western territory of MANASSEH (1 Ki. 4:10; KJV, “The son of Hesed”).

Ben-Hinnom. See HINNOM, VALLEY OF.

Ben-Hur. ben-huhr´ (Heb. ben-ḥûr H1210, “son of Hur”). One of the twelve district governors who supplied provisions for SOLOMON and the royal household; he was in charge of the first district, the hill country of EPHRAIM (1 Ki. 4:8; KJV, “The son of Hur”).

Beninu. bi-ni´nyoo (Heb. bēnînû H1231, possibly “our son”). One of the Levites who affixed their seals to the covenant with NEHEMIAH (Neh. 10:13).

Benjamin. ben´juh-muhn (Heb. binyāmîn H1228, “son of the right hand”; gentilic ben-yēmîn H1229, “Benjamite” or “Benjaminite”). Youngest son of the patriarch JACOB (Gen. 35:16-18). His mother RACHEL did not survive the difficulties of childbirth, and just before she died she named the baby Ben-Oni (“son of my sorrow”), but Jacob gave him the name Benjamin (“son of my right hand”). Of all the children of Jacob, he alone was born in Palestine, between EPHRAIM and BETHEL. Together with his brother JOSEPH, he appears as a special object of parental love and devotion, no doubt, in part at least, because of the sad circumstances surrounding his birth. He seems to have played no part in the sale of Joseph into Egypt. The intercession on the part of JUDAH in behalf of Benjamin (44:18-34) is one of the most moving speeches in all of literature. No doubt the brothers had been softened in their attitude as they had observed the continued suffering of their father over the fate of Joseph, whom he believed irrevocably lost. At the time of Jacob’s descent into Egypt, Benjamin is reported to have had ten sons (46:21; puzzling differences appear in the other lists, Num. 26:38-40; 1 Chr. 7:6; 8:1-2). Jacob's blessing suggests that Benjamin was to have a fruitful life (Gen. 49:27). See also BENJAMIN, TRIBE OF.

(2) Son of Bilhan and great-grandson of Benjamin son of Jacob (1 Chr. 7:10).

(3) One of the descendants of Harim who agreed to put away their foreign wives in the time of EZRA (Ezra 10:32).

(4) An Israelite who helped repair the wall of Jerusalem (Neh. 3:23); probably the same Benjamin as the leader who took part in the dedication of the wall (12:34). He may be the same as #3 above.

Benjamin, tribe of. Named for Jacob's youngest son. On the basis of the first census taken after the EXODUS, the tribe numbered 35,400; at the second census, it numbered 45,600 (Num. 1:37; 26:41). Later, in the division of territory by JOSHUA among the twelve tribes, Benjamin was assigned the portion between JUDAH on the S and EPHRAIM on the N (Josh. 18:11-28). Benjamin thus occupied a strategic position commercially and militarily. Benjamin loyally participated in DEBORAH's rebellion against SISERA (Jdg. 5:14). The civil war with Benjamin constitutes a sad and strange story (Jdg. 19-20).

King SAUL, son of Kish, came from this tribe (1 Sam. 9:1-2). After the death of Saul there was tension and actual fighting between the forces of DAVID and the men of Benjamin. ISH-BOSHETH, Saul's weak son, was set up as David's rival (2 Sam. 2:8). SHIMEI of Bahurim, who cursed David, was a Benjamite (16:5, 11). At the time of the schism after the death of SOLOMON, however, the Benjamites threw in their lot with the tribe of Judah and followed the Davidic house, as represented by REHOBAM, against JEROBOAM in the north. Saul of Tarsus (PAUL) was a member of the tribe of Benjamin (Phil. 3:5).

Benjamin Gate. One of the city gates of preexilic JERUSALEM (Jer. 37:13; 38:7). Its name may suggest that it led to the tribal territory of BENJAMIN, but its location is uncertain. Proposed identifications include the MUSTER GATE at the N end of the city's E wall (Neh. 3:31), the SHEEP GATE at the E end of the N wall (3:32), and the Upper Benjamin Gate into the TEMPLE (Jer. 20:2; cf. 2 Ki. 15:35; Ezek. 9:2).

Benjaminite, Benjamite. ben'juh-muh-nit, ben'juh-mit. Alternate gentilic forms of BENJAMIN.

Beno. bee'noh (Heb. bēnô H1217, “his son”). Son of Jaaziah and descendant of LEVI through MERARI (1 Chr. 24:26-27). The text is difficult, and some scholars emend it; others believe it is not a proper name and should rather be translated “his son” (cf. NRSV mg.).

Aerial view of the tribal region of Benjamin, including Jerusalem, looking NE toward Jericho.

Ben-Oni. ben-oh'ni (Heb. ben-ônî H1204, “son of my sorrow”). The name RACHEL gave to her son at birth; later JACOB changed it to BENJAMIN (Gen. 35:18).

Ben Sira(ch). ben-si'ruh(k). See APOCRYPHA.

Ben-zoheth. ben-zoh'heth (Heb. ben-zôhēt H1209, “son of Zoheth”). Son (or descendant) of Ishi, included in the genealogy of JUDAH (1 Chr. 4:20).

Beon. bee'on (Heb. bē'ôn H1274). A town in TRANSJORDAN within the tribal territory of REUBEN (Num. 32:1), probably to be identified with BAAL MEON.

Beor. bee'or (Heb. bē'ôr H1242, possibly “burning”; Gk. Beōr G1027). (1) Father of BELA; the latter was an Edomite king before Israel became a monarchy (Gen. 36:32; 1 Chr. 1:43).

(2) Father of the seer BALAAM, who was summoned by BALAK to curse Israel (Num. 22:5; 24:3, 15; 31:8; Deut. 23:4; Josh. 13:22; 24:9; Mic. 6:5; 2 Pet. 2:15 [variant BOSOR]).

Bera. bihr´uh (bera ¢ H1396, derivation uncertain). The king of SODOM who, with four allies, rebelled against KEDORLAOMER (Gen. 14:2; cf. vv. 8, 10-11, 17, 22).

Beracah. ber´uh-kuh (Heb. bērākāh H1389, “blessing”). KJV Berachah; TNIV Berakah. (1) One of the ambidextrous Benjamite warriors, kinsmen of SAUL, who joined DAVID at ZIKLAG (1 Chr. 12:3; cf. v. 2).

(2) An area in the Judean wilderness near TEKOA where King JEHOSHAPHAT and the men of Judah celebrated their victory against a Transjordanian coalition (2 Chr. 20:26). The precise identification is uncertain, but most scholars locate it between BETHLEHEM and HEBRON.

Berachah. See BERACAH.

Berachiah. See BEREKIAH.

Beraiah. bi-ray´yuh (Heb. bērā yā H1349, “Yahweh has created”). Son of Shimei and descendant of BENJAMIN (1 Chr. 8:21).

Berakah. See BERACAH.

Berakiah. See BEREKIAH.

Berea. bi-ree´uh (Gk. Beroia G1023). Also Beroea. A city in SW MACEDONIA (Acts 17:10-15; 20:4). Lying at the foot of Mount Bermius, situated on a tributary of the Haliacmon, its origins appear lost in the mists of time, but it was counted in the third of the four divisions of the empire of ALEXANDER THE GREAT. By NT times Berea had become a desirable city, one of the most populous centers of Macedonia. The apostle PAUL and his party visited Berea on the second missionary journey. Here they found some open-minded people who were willing to study the teachings of Paul in the light of the Scripture. This happy situation was disrupted, however, when Jews from THESSALONICA arrived, turning the Bereans against the message and forcing Paul to flee to ATHENS. Silas and Timothy remained there briefly instructing the true believers. A Christian from Berea, SOPATER, accompanied Paul back to Jerusalem at the end of the apostle's third journey.

Berechiah. See BEREKIAH.

Bered (person). bihr'ed (Heb. bered H1355, possibly "coolness"). Apparently son of SHUTHELAH and grandson of EPHRAIM (1 Chr. 7:20), but the text is difficult, especially when compared with the alternate Ephraimite genealogy (Num. 26:35). Some believe the name should be emended to BEKER, that is, Ephraim's son.

Bered (place). bihr'ed (Heb. bered H1354, possibly "cool [well]"). A settlement or region in the NEGEV near KADESH (Gen. 16:14). HAGAR stopped in this area with her son ISHMAEL when they were met by the angel of the Lord at the well called BEER LAHAI ROI. Its location is unknown, though some identify it with a mountain SE of Kadesh.

Berekiah. ber'uh-ki'uh (Heb. berekyâ H1392 and berekyâhû H1393, "Yahweh has blessed"; Gk. Barachias G974). Also Berachiah and Berechiah (OT), Barachiah and Barachias (NT). (1) Son of ZERUBBABEL and descendant of DAVID through SOLOMON (1 Chr. 3:20), possibly born in Palestine (see HASHUBAH).

(2) Father of ASAPH the musician (1 Chr. 6:39; 15:17).

(3) Son of a certain Asa; he was a LEVITE who returned to Judah from Babylon and settled among the Netophathites (1 Chr. 9:16; see NETOPHAH).

(4) A doorkeeper for the ARK OF THE COVENANT at the time of David's restructuring of the Levitical service (1 Chr. 15:23). Possibly the same as #2 above.

(5) Son of Meshillemoth; he was one of the leaders in Ephraim who opposed the bringing of captives from their countrymen in Judah into Samaria in the days of AHAZ (2 Chr. 28:12).

(6) Son of Meshezabel and father of MESHULLAM; the latter was one of the priests that helped to repair the wall of Jerusalem under NEHEMIAH, and whose daughter married TOBIAH's son, Jehohanan (Neh. 3:4, 30; 6:18).

(7) Son of IDDO and father of the prophet ZECHARIAH (Zech. 1:1, 7; Matt. 23:35).

Beri. bihr'î (Heb. bērî H1373, perhaps a gentilic of BEER). Son of Zophah and descendant of ASHER (1 Chr. 7:36). The name is not mentioned in the parallel genealogies (Gen. 46:17-18; Num. 26:44-47). Beri has no connection with the BERIITE clan (Num. 26:44) or with the BERITES (2 Sam. 20:14).

Beriah. bi-ri'uh (Heb. bērî ʿâ H1380, possibly “prominent”). (1) Son of ASHER and father of Heber and Malkiel; ancestral head of the BERIITE clan (Gen. 46:17; Num. 26:44; 1 Chr. 7:30-31).

(2) Son of EPHRAIM, who gave him the name Beriah “because there had been misfortune in his family” (1 Chr. 7:23; apparently a play on Heb. rā ʿāh H8288, “evil”). Other sons of Ephraim had been put to death by the people of GATH (vv. 21-22).

(3) Son of ELPAAL and descendant of BENJAMIN; he and his brother SHEMA, heads of families in AJJALON, put to flight the inhabitants of Gath (1 Chr. 8:13, 16).

(4) Son of SHIMEI and descendant of LEVI through GERSHON; both he and his brother Jeush had few sons, “so they were counted as one family with one assignment” among the Levites (1 Chr. 23:10-11).

Beriites. bi-ri'its (Heb. bērî ʿî H1381, gentilic of bērî ʿâ H1380). An Asherite clan (Num. 26:44). See BERIAH #1.

Berites. bihr'its (Heb. bērîm H1379, derivation uncertain). Apparently an Israelite clan that joined SHEBA in his rebellion against DAVID (2 Sam. 20:14). Many scholars, however, believe the name is a scribal error and read “Bichrites” (cf. NRSV). See BICRI.

Berith. See EL-BERITH; see also COVENANT.

Bernice. buhr-nees' (Gk. Bernikē G1022, “bringer of victory”). Three times in the book of Acts reference is made to Bernice (Acts 25:13, 23; 26:30), Herod AGRIPPA I's eldest daughter (12:1), who was born in A.D. 28. According to JOSEPHUS (Ant. 19.5.1; 20.7.1-3), she was first married to a certain Marcus, and after his death she became the wife of Herod of Chalcis, her own uncle. When the latter died (A.D. 48), Bernice returned home to share the household of her brother AGRIPPA II, leading to rumors about an incestuous union, for which there is no real evidence (to meet the scandal, Bernice married another petty monarch, Polemon II of Olba in CILICIA, but the union did not last long). Bernice was present in CAESAREA when Agrippa II listened to PAUL's noble defense. Later, she shared with her brother the self-sacrificing endeavor to prevent the outbreak of the great rebellion of A.D. 66, confronting the mad procurator Gessius Florus at peril of her life. During the Jewish war she cultivated the goodwill of VESPASIAN, and the latter's son, TITUS, subsequently took her as his mistress for a time.

Berodach-Baladan. See MERODACH-BALADAN.

Beroea. See BEREIA.

Berothah. bi-roh'thuh (Heb. bērôtâ H1363, perhaps "well"; cf. BEEROTH). In Ezekiel's vision, Berothah is one of the places marking the N boundary of Israel, near the border between DAMASCUS and HAMATH (Ezek. 47:16). This city was once thought to be the site of modern Beirut (which lies on the coast), but the more likely identification is with Bereitan, about 30 mi. (50 km.) NW of Damascus. It is probably the same as BEROTHAI.

Berothai. bi-roh'thi (Heb. bērōtay H1408, possibly "my well"). A city belonging to the Aramean king HADADEZER and from which DAVID took a great quantity of bronze (2 Sam. 8:8). The parallel passage reads CUN (1 Chr. 18:8), but that is probably a different place. Most scholars identify Berothai with BEROTHAH.

Berothite. bihr'uh-thit. KJV form of Beerothite; see BEEROTH.

beryl. See MINERALS.

Besai. bee'si (Heb. bēsay H1234, derivation uncertain). Head of a family of temple servants (NETHINIM) who returned from the EXILE with ZERUBBABEL (Ezra 2:49; Neh. 7:52).

Besodeiah. bes'uh-dee'yah (Heb. bēsōdyâ H1233, "in the council of Yahweh"). Father of Meshullam; the latter helped to repair the OLD GATE besom. This English term, which refers to a broom made with twigs, is used by the KJV in one passage (Isa. 14:23; NIV, “broom”), where the prophet is portraying a figurative sweeper with which God will sweep away Babylon.

Besor. bee’sor (Heb. bēśôr H1410, derivation uncertain). A wadi or ravine D^AVID crossed in pursuit of the A^MALEKITES, who had just raided Z^IKLAG (1 Sam. 30:9-10, 21). Here David left 200 of his men who were too exhausted to pursue the Amalekites further. It is identified with Wadi Ghazzeh, one of the largest rivers in the N^EGEV. It flows NW from the highlands to the coast, below G^AZA.

Betah. bee’tuh (Heb. beṭaḥ H1056 [not in NIV], “security”). A city belonging to the Aramean king H^ADAD^EZER and from which D^AVID took a great quantity of bronze (2 Sam. 8:8 KJV and other versions). On the basis of some Greek MSS and the parallel passage (1 Chr. 18:8), the NIV emends the text to T^EBAH.

Beten. bee’tuhn (Heb. beṭen H1062, “womb”). A town in the territory of the tribe of A^SHER (Josh. 19:25). Some scholars identify the city with Khirbet Ibtin, about 11 mi. (18 km.) SSE of A^CCO.

beth (letter). beth (from bayit H1074, “house”). The second letter of the Hebrew alphabet (ב), with a numerical value of two. It is named for the shape of the letter, which in its older form resembled the outline of a house. Its sound corresponds to that of English b (following a vowel, it later became spirantized, with a sound similar to that of English v).

Beth- (name element). beth. This form (construct of the noun bayit H1074) is used as the initial element of numerous place names. Although its literal meaning is “house,” usually the sense is more general, “place.” For example, the name B^ET^H E^MEK probably means simply “valley-place.”

Bethabara. beth-ab’uh-ruh (Gk. Bēthabara). According to the KJV (following the TR), the place across the J^ORDAN where J^OH^N T^HE B^AP^TI^ST ministered (Jn. 1:28). However, the majority of MSS, including the earliest witnesses, read B^ET^HANY.

Beth Anath. beth-ay'nath (Heb. bêt-ʿănāt H1117, “house of [the goddess] ANATH”). A fortified city in the territory assigned to the tribe of NAPHTALI (Josh. 19:38). The Naphtalites failed to dislodge its inhabitants, but they enslaved the Canaanites living in this pagan town (Jdg. 1:33). The location of Beth Anath is uncertain, but some scholars place it about 15 mi. (24 km.) SE of TYRE.

Beth Anoth. beth-ay'noth (Heb. bêt-ʿănôt H1116, possibly “house of [the goddess] Anath [pl. form]”). A town in the hill country of the tribe of JUDAH (Josh. 15:59). It was probably an archaic Canaanite altar and shrine (see ANATH). It is identified with modern Khirbet Beit ʿAnun, some 3 mi. (5 km.) NE of HEBRON.

Bethany. beth'uh-nee (Gk. Bēthania G1029, possibly from bêt ʿāniyyâ, “house of the poor,” or bêt ʿănānyāh, “house of Ananiah”). (1) A village less than 2 mi. (3 km.) SE of JERUSALEM, on the E side of the Mount of Olives and on the road to JERICHO (Mk. 11:1; Lk. 19:29; Jn. 11:18). MARY, MARTHA, and LAZARUS lived in Bethany, and it was there that Lazarus was raised from the dead. It seems generally to have served as Jesus' abode when in JUDEA (Matt. 21:17; Mk. 11:11). Bethany also was the home of Simon the leper, in whose house our Lord was anointed with the alabaster jar of ointment at the hands of a woman (Mk. 14:3-9; Lk. 7:36-50; cf. Jn. 12:1-8). According to Luke, the ASCENSION OF CHRIST took place near Bethany (Lk. 24:50-51). Bethany still exists as a settled town today and is known as el-ʿAziriyeh, “the place of Lazarus.” The traditional tomb of Lazarus is marked. Cf. also ANANIAH (PLACE).

(2) A place E of the JORDAN where JOHN THE BAPTIST ministered and where his confrontation with the delegation of priests and Levites from Jerusalem took place (Jn. 1:28, where the KJV has BETHABARA). Considerable debate surrounds the identification of this site, though a strong possibility is the traditional location at the Wadi el-Kharar, some 6 mi. (10 km.) E of Jericho. Some scholars believe that this Bethany should be identified with #1 above.

Beth Arabah. beth-air'uh-buh (Heb. bêt hā'ārābā H1098, “house of the ARABAH [desert]”) A town belonging to the tribe of JUDAH on its N boundary with the tribe of BENJAMIN (Josh. 15:6, 61; 18:18 [the last reference involves an emendation based on the LXX]). However, Beth Arabah is also included among the possessions of Benjamin (18:22); it is possible that the town changed hands at some time by an incident not recorded in the text. Beth Arabah is usually identified with the modern Arab village of ʿAin el-Gharabeh, located in the wilderness about 4 mi. (6 km.) SE of JERICHO, on the N bank of the Wadi Qelt.

Beth-aram. beth-air'uhm. KJV form of BETH HARAM.

Beth Arbel. beth-ahr'buhl (Heb. bêt ʾarbē l H1079, “house of Arbel”). An Israelite town devastated by a certain SHALMAN (Hos. 10:14). There is no other mention of either this town or the king. Beth Arbel is usually identified with the modern Irbid, which is situated on a crossroads in northern TRANSJORDAN, c. 20 mi. (32 km.) SE of the S tip of the Sea of GALILEE.

Beth Ashbea. beth-ash'bee-uh (Heb. bêt ʾāšbēa ʿ H1080, “house of Ashbea”). A town of unknown location; it was home to some clans of linen workers that descended from JUDAH through SHELAH (1 Chr. 4:21). The KJV interprets the Hebrew as referring not to a town but to a family (i.e., the linen workers “of the house of Ashbea”).

Beth Aven. beth-ay'vuhn (Heb. bêt ʾāwen H1077, “house of trouble [or idolatry]”). A town belonging to the tribe of BENJAMIN on its N boundary; it was near AI, to the E of BETHEL and just to the W of MICMASH (Josh. 7:2; 18:12; 1 Sam. 13:5; 14:23). The precise location is disputed, but a likely site is Tell Maryam, some 7 mi. (11 km.) NE of JERUSALEM. The prophet HOSEA, however, appears to use the name in a derogatory way as a reference to Bethel (Hos. 4:15; 5:8; 10:5; cf. also the wordplay in the Heb. of Amos 5:5). See also AVEN.

Beth Azmaveth. See AZMAVETH (PLACE).

Beth Baal Meon. beth-bay'uhl-mee'on (Heb. bêt ba'al mē'ôn H1081, “house of the lord of the dwelling”). A town within the tribal territory of REUBEN in TRANSJORDAN (Josh. 13:17), probably to be identified with BAAL MEON. Both names occur in the MOABITE STONE.

Beth Barah. beth-bair'uh (Heb. bêt bārâ H1083, “house of Barah”). A place near the JORDAN River; GIDEON instructed the men of EPHRAIM to seize that area so as to head off the fleeing army of MIDIAN (Jdg. 7:24). Because the Hebrew construction is unusual, some scholars emend the text so that it reads, “up to the fords of the Jordan.” Others have attempted to link the place with BETHABARA, but the site remains unidentified.

Beth Bieri. beth-bihr'ee-i. KJV form of BETH BIRI.

Beth Biri. beth-bihr'i (Heb. bêt bir î H1082, “house of Biri”). KJV Beth-birei. An unidentified town inhabited by descendants of SIMEON (1 Chr. 4:31); apparently a postexilic name for BETHLEBAOTH (Josh. 19:6).

Beth Car. beth-kahr' (Heb. bêt kār H1105, “house of pasture”). TNIV Beth Kar. A town of unknown location, but apparently to the W of MIZPAH, in the territory of the tribe of BENJAMIN; the Israelites pursued the PHILISTINES all the way to an area near this town (1 Sam. 7:11).

Beth Dagon. beth-day'gon (Heb. bêt-dāgôn H1087, “house of [the god] Dagon”). (1) A site in the SHEPHELAH or lowlands of JUDAH (Josh. 15:41). The exact location of the site is unknown. A town by that name is mentioned in extrabiblical sources, but the biblical Beth Dagon is probably a different site.

(2) A border city in the territory of the tribe of ASHER and E of Mount CARMEL (Josh. 19:27). The location is unknown, although some identify it with modern Tell Regeb, about 5 mi. (8 km.) SE of Haifa.

Beth Diblathaim. beth'dib-luh-thay'im (Heb. bêt diblātayim H1086, “house of [double] fig cakes”). One of the cities of MOAB against which JEREMIAH announced judgment (Jer. 48:22). The town is mentioned in the MOABITE STONE, which suggests it was situated between MEDEBA and BETH BAAL MEON. It is probably the same location as ALMON DIBLATHAIM (Num. 33:46-47). Some scholars identify the town with modern Khirbet Deleilat esh-Sherqiyeh, about 21 mi. (34 km.) SE of Amman, Jordan.

Beth Eden. beth-ee´duhn (Heb. bêṭ-eden H1114, prob. “house of delight”). An Aramean principality (see SYRIA) against which AMOS prophesied (Amos 1:5; KJV, “house of Eden”). Known as Bit-Adini in Assyrian sources, it was situated in the watershed of the EUPHRATES and thrived after the collapse of the great powers in the ninth-eighth century B.C. SENNACHERIB boasted that his Assyrian forefathers had destroyed “the people [children] of Eden,” probably a reference to the same place (2 Ki. 19:12 = Isa. 37:12; perhaps also Ezek. 27:23).

Beth Eked. beth-ee´kid (Heb. bêṭ-ēqed H1118, possibly “binding-house”). A place on the way from JEZREEL to SAMARIA where JEHU executed some relatives of King AHAZIAH (2 Ki. 10:12, 14). Targum Jonathan interprets the words not as a proper name but as a description, “meeting house [of the shepherds]” (so also KJV, “shearing house”). It probably does refer to a town, however, and some scholars have identified it with modern Beit Qad, a few miles SSE of JEZREEL, but this location is disputed.

Bethel (deity). beth´uhl (Heb. bêṭ-ēl H1078, “house of God”). A W Semitic deity attested with various names in extrabiblical literature. A probable biblical reference is Jer. 48:13, where Bethel stands in parallelism with CHEMOSH. However, no notice is ever given to the presence of this god in the northern tribes, so it is possible that, as is likely in Amos 5:5, the name Bethel is given, by metonymy, with reference to the golden calf found in the city. In Zech. 7:2, the KJV renders the name as “the house of God,” but a reference to the Jerusalem temple is very unlikely. The Hebrew text may reflect the personal name Bethel-sharezer (see SHAREZER); some modern versions (e.g., NAB, NEB, NJPS) have adopted this interpretation, but others (e.g., NIV, NRSV) understand the text as a reference to the town (or inhabitants) of Bethel.

Bethel (place). beth´uhl (Heb. bêṭ-ēl H1078, “house of God”). (1) A town originally known as LUZ, 12 mi. (19 km.) N of JERUSALEM (Gen. 28:19), and a short distance W of AI. ABRAHAM stopped near this spot on his way to the NEGEV and offered a sacrifice (12:8; 13:3). JACOB called Luz “Bethel” (28:10-22), since God met him here and confirmed the Abrahamic covenant to him. Jacob revisited this town when he returned from PADDAN ARAM in response to the command of God (35:1). He built an altar and worshiped, calling the place EL BETHEL (“the God of Bethel,” 35:7). Here Jacob buried DEBORAH, the nurse of REBEKAH (35:8). It was a logical stopping place, for it lay on a well-known route running from the Plain of ESDRAELON to BEERSHEBA.

Bethel seems to have been a Canaanite city originally, and after the conquest by JOSHUA it was given to the tribe of BENJAMIN (Josh. 18:21-22). JOSEPH's descendants, under the guidance of the Lord, went up against Bethel and took it (Jdg. 1:22-26). It remained on the southern border of EPHRAIM. During the period of the judges, because of the wickedness of the tribe of Ephraim, the Israelites marched against them. They stopped at Bethel to ascertain God's will (20:18). The ARK OF THE COVENANT was kept there at this time (20:26-28). SAMUEL went to this city from time to time to conduct business and to worship (1 Sam. 7:16; 10:3).

At a later period, after the kingdom was divided, JEROBOAM, in order to nullify the influence of JERUSALEM as the center of religious activity for the people, chose Bethel as one of the two centers in which he set up golden calves (1 Ki. 12:26-30). Here he sacrificed to the calves and placed priests to minister in the high places (12:32). See CALF WORSHIP. Because of these and other sins, Amos cried out against this city (Amos 3:14; 4:4-6). Hosea too pronounced judgment on Bethel, even calling it BETH AVEN, "the house of trouble" (Hos. 4:15). An Israelite priest returned here to teach the people resettled in the area by ASSYRIA (2 Ki. 17:27-28). They combined worship of their heathen gods with worship of the Lord (17:33). It was not until JOSIAH became king that this idolatry was removed from Bethel and the true worship of the Lord established (23:15-23). When the Jews returned from the Babylonian captivity, Ezra and Nehemiah both record that some returned to Bethel (Ezra 2:28; Neh. 7:32) and, as one might suppose, they are listed as Benjamites (Neh. 11:31). Bethel is also mentioned in the APOCRYPHA as being fortified by BACCHIDES (1 Macc. 9:50).

Most scholars identify Bethel with the modern village of Beitin, which was excavated by Albright and Kelso intermittently from 1934 to 1961. City walls from the Middle Bronze Age (2200 to 1550 B.C.), the time of the patriarchs, were found. In the Late Bronze Age (1550-1200) there were well-built houses here with much imported pottery. In the thirteenth century a destruction layer of ashes and burned bricks testifies to its demise, which some attribute to Joshua.

(2) Another city in S Judah (1 Sam. 30:27) is also called Bethel. See BETHUEL.

Beth Emek. beth-ee'mik (Heb. bêṯ hā'ēmeq H1097, "house of the valley"). A town on the northern border of the tribe of ASHER (Josh. 19:27). It is usually identified with modern Tell Mimas, about 5 mi. (8 km.) NE of ACCO.

Bether. bee-thuhr' (Heb. beter H1441, possibly "cutting, piece"). The KJV and other versions take the Hebrew word as a proper name in Cant. 2:7 and render the text, “the mountains of Bether.” Although there is some evidence for the existence of a town by that name, it is doubtful that Song of Solomon is referring to it, so many scholars take the word as a reference to a plant-name or to a fragrance (cf. 8:14, “spice-laden mountains”). According to a different interpretation, the phrase can be translated “the rugged hills” (NIV; similarly NRSV, “the cleft mountains”).

This view of the wall that divides the northern and southern pools of Bethesda reveals bedrock (lower right of photo) that was part of the original pool dating as early as the 3rd cent. B.C. (View to the NW.)

Bethesda. buh-thez´duh (Gk. Bēthesda G1031, possibly from Aram. bēt ḥisdā , “house of mercy”). A spring-fed pool at JERUSALEM, near the SHEEP GATE and surrounded by five porches (Jn. 5:2; the variant reading BETH-ZATHA is accepted by the NRSV; another variant is BETHSAIDA). Sick people waited to step down into these waters, which were thought to have healing properties. Here Jesus healed a man who had been sick for thirty-eight years (5:1-16; note that v. 4 is omitted by most other modern versions because some early MSS and versions omit it). In A.D. 1888, while the church of St. Anne in NE Jerusalem was being repaired, twin reservoirs were discovered, one 55 ft. (17 m.) long and the other 65 ft. (20 m.). The former one was spanned by five arches with five corresponding porches. The Crusaders regarded this as the site mentioned by John and built a church over it, with a crypt imitating the five porches and an opening in the floor to get down to the water.

Beth Ezel. beth-ee'zuhl (Heb. bēt hā-ēṣel H1089, possibly "house of proximity," i.e., "nearby place"). A town against which MICAH prophesied (Mic. 1:11). The imprecation is against the enemies of Judah and refers to various sites mostly in the SHEPHELAH. The location of Beth Ezel is uncertain.

Beth Gader. beth-gay'duhr (Heb. bêt-gādēr H1084, "house of stone wall"). A place name appearing as part of JUDAH's genealogical list (1 Chr. 2:51, "Hareph the father [i.e., founder, ruler] of Beth Gader"). Some scholars identify it with GEDER. The town was probably in the vicinity of the other towns listed, such as BETHLEHEM, but its precise location is unknown.

Beth Gamul. beth-gay'muhl (Heb. bêt gāmûl H1085, "house of recompense"). One of the cities of the tableland of MOAB against which JEREMIAH prophesied (Jer. 48:23). Some have identified it with Khirbet el-Jemeil, c. 5 mi. (8 km.) E of AROER.

Beth Gilgal. beth-gil'gal (Heb. bêt haggilgāl H1090, "house of Gilgal [circle]"). One of the villages around JERUSALEM from which singers came to celebrate the dedication of the wall rebuilt after the EXILE (Neh. 12:29; KJV, "the house of Gilgal"). It is often identified with the better-known town of GILGAL, which lies c. 4 mi. (6 km.) SE of JERICO, but some scholars argue that Beth Gilgal was probably closer to Jerusalem.

Beth-haccerem, Beth-haccherem. beth-hak'uh-rem. See BETH HAKKEREM.

Beth Haggan. beth-hag'uhn (Heb. bêt haggān H1091, "house of the garden"). A town S of the Valley of JEZREEL toward which AHAZIAH fled when pursued by JEHU (2 Ki. 9:27; KJV, "the garden house"). It is identified with modern Jenin, 11 mi. (18 km.) SE of MEGIDDO.

Beth Hakkerem. beth-hak´uh-rem (Heb. bêṭ-hakkerem H1094, “house of the vineyard”). Also Beth-haccerem, Beth-haccherem. The chief city of a district in JUDAH; its ruler, MALKIJAH, repaired the DUNG GATE as the wall was rebuilt after the EXILE (Neh. 3:14). It was a suitable location for a signaling station (Jer. 6:1). Some scholars have identified the city with ʿAin Karim, c. 6 mi. (10 km.) W of JERUSALEM, but a more likely site is Ramat Raḥel, a high hill less than 3 mi. (5 km.) SSW of Jerusalem.

Beth Haram. beth-hair´uhm (Heb. bêṭ hārām H1099, “house of high place”). KJV Beth-aram. A town allotted to the tribe of GAD (Josh. 13:27); it is doubtless the same as Beth Haran (Num. 32:36). Taken from the Amorites, it held a high point E of the JORDAN River in the Jordan valley and was fortified by the tribe of Gad to protect their families and cattle while they shared with the other tribes in the conquest W of Jordan. The site is identified with the modern Tell Iktanu, 8 mi. (13 km.) NE of the mouth of the Jordan.

Beth Haran. beth-hair´uhn. Alternate form of BETH HARAM.

Beth Hoglah. beth-hog´luh (Heb. bêṭ-ḥāglâ H1102, “house of Hoglah [partridge]”). One of fourteen cities assigned to the tribe of BENJAMIN (Josh. 18:21). It was located in the ARABAH on the S boundary of the tribe (18:19), which is also the N boundary of JUDAH (15:6). Beth Hoglah should possibly be identified with modern Deir Ḥajlah, 3.5 mi. (5.5 km.) SE of JERICHO.

Beth Horon. beth-hor´uhn (Heb. bêṭ-ḥôrôn H1103, “house of a caves”). The name of twin towns belonging to the tribe of EPHRAIM and assigned to the Kohathites (Josh. 16:3, 5; 21:22; 1 Chr. 7:24; 2 Chr. 8:5). Beit ʿUr el-Foka (“the upper”) is c. 800 ft. (245 m.) higher than Beit ʿUr et-Taḥta (“the lower”). Built by a woman named SHEERAH (1 Chr. 7:24), Beth Horon lay on the boundary line between BENJAMIN and Ephraim (Josh. 16:3, 5), on the road from GIBEON to AZEKAH (10:10-11).

For centuries a strategic route into the heart of JUDEA went up from JOPPA (modern Jaffa) on the coast through the Valley of AIJALON (modern Yalo), ascending through the two Beth Horons to Gibeon (4 mi./6 km. distant) on its way to Jerusalem. It was in this valley that Joshua commanded the sun and moon to stand still while he fought the AMORITE kings in his defense of the Gibeonites. He chased these five kings over the pass to Beth Horon (Josh.

10:10-13). Along this route the PHILISTINES fled after they had been defeated at MICMASH (1 Sam. 14:31), and it was there that Judas MACCABEE overthrew the army of Seron, a SELEUCID commander (1 Macc. 3:13-24). The importance of the Beth Horon pass as a key route into Palestine explains the fortification of its towns by SOLOMON (2 Chr. 8:5). It is no longer important, but great foundation stones can be seen there yet today.

Beth Jeshimoth. beth-jesh'uh-moth (Heb. bêt hayšîmôt H1093, “house of deserts”). A city in the plains of MOAB; it had been ruled by SIHON king of the AMORITES and was allotted to the tribe of REUBEN (Num. 33:49 [KJV, “Beth-jesimoth”]; Josh. 12:3; 13:20). It is described as one of the glorious cities on the frontier of Moab (Ezek. 25:9). Beth Jeshimoth is identified with Tell el-Azeimeh, about 4 mi. (6 km.) from the NE end of the DEAD SEA.

Beth-jesimoth. See BETH JESHIMOTH.

Beth Kar. See BETH CAR.

Beth-leaphrah. beth'li-af'-ruh. See BETH OPHRAH.

Beth Lebaath. beth'li-bay'oth (Heb. bêt lēbā'ôt H1106, “house of lionesses”). One of the cities “taken from the share of Judah” and assigned to the tribe of SIMEON (Josh. 19:6; cf. v. 9). It is probably the same as LEBATH (15:32; cf. v. 21); and in the Chronicler's parallel list, it is apparently referred to as BETH BIRI, possibly its postexilic name (1 Chr. 4:31). Its precise location in the NEGEV is unknown.

Bethlehem. beth'li-hem (Heb. bêṭ leḥem H1107, "house of bread"; gentilic bêṭ-hallaḥmî H1095, "Bethlehemite"). (1) A town 5 mi. (8 km.) SW of JERUSALEM, 2,550 ft. (780 m.) above sea level, in the hill country of JUDEA on the main highway to HEBRON and EGYPT. In JACOB's time it was called EPHRATH ("fruitful") and was the burial place of RACHEL (Gen. 35:16, 19; 48:7). Little is known of the origin of the town, though in 1 Chr. 2:51 SALMA the son of CALEB is described as the "father [i.e., founder or first Israelite leader] of Bethlehem." Bethlehem may have been the home of IBZAN, the tenth judge (Jdg. 12:8-10, but see #2 below); it certainly was the home of ELIMELECH, father-in-law of RUTH (Ruth 1:1-2), and of Ruth's husband BOAZ (2:1, 4). Here their great-grandson DAVID kept his father's sheep and was anointed king by SAMUEL (1 Sam. 16:13, 15). Hence it was known as "the city of David" (Lk. 2:4, 11). It was once occupied by a PHILISTINE garrison (2 Sam. 23:14-16), later fortified by REHOBAM (2 Chr. 11:6).

In JEREMIAH's time (Jer. 41:17) the caravan inn of KIMHAM (see 2 Sam. 19:37-40) near Bethlehem was the usual starting place for Egypt. The inn mentioned in Lk. 2 must have been a similar one and some have speculated that it was the same. Here the MESSIAH was born (Matt. 2:1; Lk. 2:1-7), for whom this town that was "small among the clans of Judah" (Mic. 5:2) achieved its great fame. Its male children under two years of age were murdered in HEROD's attempt to kill the King of the Jews (Matt. 2:16).

Justin Martyr, a Christian writer in the second century, said that our Lord's birth took place in a cave close to the village. Over this traditional manger site the emperor Constantine (A.D. 330) and Helena his mother built the Church of the Nativity. Rebuilt more sumptuously by Justinian in the sixth century, it still has part of the original structure and is a popular attraction for tourists today. The grotto of the nativity is beneath a crypt, c. 39 ft. (12 m.) long, 11 ft. (3.5 m.) wide, and 9 ft. (3 m.) high, hewn out of the rock and lined with marble. A rich altar is over the supposed site of the Savior's birth. Modern Bethlehem is a village of fewer than 10,000 inhabitants. The slopes abound in figs, vines, almonds, and olives. The shepherds' fields are still seen to the NE.

(2) A town within the tribal territory of ZEBULUN (Josh. 19:15). Some believe that this Bethlehem, and not the one in Judah, was the home and burial place of IBZAN the judge (Jdg. 12:8, 10). The town, modern Beit Lahm, is about 7 mi. (11 km.) NW of NAZARETH, and some remains have been found indicating its importance in earlier times.

Bethlehem, Star of. See ASTRONOMY.

Beth Maac(h)ah. See ABEL BETH MAACAH.

Beth Marcaboth. beth-mahr´kuh-both (Heb. bêt-hammarkābôt H1096 and bêt markābôt H1112, “house of [the] chariots”). TNIV Beth Markaboth. One of the cities “taken from the share of Judah” and apportioned to the tribe of SIMEON (Josh. 19:5, cf. v. 9; 1 Chr. 4:31). It is probably the same town as MADMANNAH, which appears in its place in the corresponding list (Josh. 15:31).

Beth Meon. beth-mee´on (Heb. bêt mē`ôn H1110, “house of habitation”). A town in the Moabite plateau against which JEREMIAH prophesied judgment (Jer. 48:23). It is probably to be identified with BAAL MEON.

Beth Millo. beth-mil´oh (Heb. bêt millô` H1109, “house of Millo [filling]”). (1) A place associated with SHECHEM (Jdg. 9:6, 20; KJV, “the house of Millo”) and usually identified with “the tower of Shechem” (9:46-49). Some think it may refer to an area of earth fill and thus to the foundation of the upper city, which would have been inhabited by priests and soldiers.

(2) A place near JERUSALEM, “on the road down to Silla,” where King Joash (JEHOASH) was assassinated by his officials (2 Ki. 12:20; KJV and other versions, “the house of Millo”). It may have been a prominent building in an area of Jerusalem known as the MILLO.

Beth Nimrah. beth-nim´ruh (Heb. bêt nimrâ H1113, perhaps “house of a leopard”). A town allotted to the tribe of GAD (Num. 32:36; Josh. 13:27), also called simply Nimrah (Num. 32:3). Taken from the AMORITES, it was fortified by the Gadites to protect their families and cattle while they shared with the other tribes in the conquest W of Jordan. The ancient city is identified as Tell el-Bleibil, some 10 mi. (16 km.) NE of JERICHO.

Beth Ophrah. beth-of´ruh (Heb. bêt lē`aprâ H1108, “house of dust”). A town in the SHEPHELAH mentioned in Micah’s lament (Mic. 1:10; KJV, “the house of Aphrah”; NRSV and other versions, “Beth-leaphrah”). Since the expression is clearly a play on words (“in the dusty place roll in the dust”), some think it may be an allusion to another city, such as OPHRAH or BETHEL.

Beth-palet. See BETH PELET.

Beth Pazzez. beth-paz'iz (Heb. bêṭ paṣṣē H1122, “house of dispersion”). A city included in the territory of the tribe of ISSACHAR (Josh. 19:21). It was located to the E of Mount TABOR, but the site has not been identified.

Beth Pelet. beth-pee'lit (Heb. bêṭ peleṭ H1120, “house of escape”). One of the “southernmost towns of the tribe of Judah in the Negev toward the boundary of Edom” (Josh. 15:27 [KJV, “Beth-palet”]; cf. v. 21). It was rebuilt and inhabited by the people of JUDAH after their return from EXILE in Babylon (Neh. 11:26 [KJV, “Beth-phelet”]). HELEZ the Paltite, one of DAVID’s famous Thirty, was likely from this city (2 Sam. 23:26). It is perhaps to be identified with Tell es-Saqati, about 6 mi. (10 km.) NNE of BEERSHEBA.

Beth Peor. beth-pee'or (Heb. bêṭ pē'ôr H1121, “house of Peor”). A city in MOAB that was assigned to the tribe of REUBEN (Josh. 13:20). Before entering the land of Canaan, the Israelites encamped in the valley near Beth Peor, where MOSES committed laws to them; in this same valley God buried him (Deut. 3:29; 4:46; 34:6). The name of the city may have been originally Beth Baal Peor and was likely the place where BAAL PEOR was worshiped as patron deity (Num. 25:3, 5, 18; see also PEOR). Possible identifications are Khirbet esh-Sheikh-Jayil and Khirbet 'Ayun Musa, both of them a short distance N of Mount NEBO.

Bethphage. beth'fuh-jee (Gk. Bēthphagē G1036, from Aram. bêṭ paggē , “house of unripe figs”). A village on the Mount of OLIVES and near BETHANY. As Jesus approached this town on his way to JERUSALEM, he sent two of his disciples to procure a colt in preparation for the TRIUMPHAL ENTRY (Matt. 21:1; Mk. 11:1; Lk. 19:29). The site is generally identified with the present Kafr et-Tur, just W of Bethany.

Beth-phelet. See BETH PELET.

Beth Rapha. beth-ray'fuh (Heb. bêṭ rāpā H1125, “house of Rapha [healing]”). Son of Eshton and descendant of JUDAH; he is described as one of “the men of Recah” (1 Chr. 4:12).

Beth Rehob. beth-ree´hob (Heb. bêṭ-rēḥôḇ H1124, “house of Rehob [street]”). An Aramean town or principality near the city of LAISH (DAN) in the extreme N of Palestine (Jdg. 18:28). It is probably the same as the REHOB that marked the northern limit of the spies’ inspection of Canaan (Num. 13:21). When the AMMONITES prepared to fight against King DAVID, they hired 20,000 Aramean mercenaries from this area and from the nearby kingdom of ZOBAB (2 Sam. 10:6; see SYRIA). The area was probably located between Dan and Zobah, but the precise location has not been identified Bethsaida. beth-say´uh-duh (Gk. Bēthsaida G1034, from Heb. bêṭ ṣaydâ, “house of hunting [fishing]”). A town on the N shore of the Sea of GALILEE. The Gospel of John clearly states that PHILIP the disciple was from Bethsaida, the city of ANDREW and PETER (Jn. 1:44; 12:21). Apparently Jesus visited the town at this early point in his ministry (cf. 1:43). Bethsaida was the scene of the feeding of the 5,000 (Lk. 9:10-17). Both Matthew and Mark wrote of the scene of this feeding as a “solitary place” without naming it (Matt. 14:13; Mk. 6:31-32). Confusion arises from Mark’s account, which first reports the event and then adds, “Immediately Jesus made his disciples get into the boat and go on ahead of him to Bethsaida” (6:45). Furthermore, John introduces his account of the same event by saying that “Jesus crossed to the far shore [presumably the E side] of the Sea of Galilee” (Jn. 6:1). Elsewhere John speaks of “Bethsaida in Galilee” (12:21). Tradition places the feeding of the 5,000 at ʿAin et-Tabghah, 1.5 mi. (2 km.) W of CAPERNAUM, but there are serious problems with this identification despite the presence of the Chapel of the Multiplication of the Loaves and Fishes at that site. It is generally agreed from the texts that Bethsaida is somewhere near the N end of the Sea of Galilee, but probably on the E side of the JORDAN’s mouth.

After Jesus’ trip toward TYRE and SIDON, he returned to the area of GALILEE, where he healed a deaf mute, fed the 4,000, argued with the PHARISEES, and then came again to Bethsaida (Mk. 8:22). He healed the blind man brought to him and from there went N to CAESAREA PHILIPPI with his disciples. Apparently Jesus’ ministry was less than successful in Bethsaida in spite of the feeding of the 5,000; both that town and KORAZIN were cursed (Matt. 11:21-22; Lk. 10:13). The only other reference to Bethsaida in the Bible is as a textual variant (Jn. 5:2, where the original reading is prob. BETHESDA).

Excavation of a site thought by some to be ancient Bethsaida. The view is to the SE, and the Sea of Galilee is visible on the top right.

Some scholars argue that the Gospels refer to two different towns named Bethsaida, one E and the other W of the Jordan. It is true that the name, being a fitting description of a fishing village, could refer to several towns on this productive lake, but it is not necessary to adopt such a solution. Bethsaida is often identified with modern el-ʿAraj, which is right on the lake and just E of the Jordan’s mouth. It has a harbor and thus meets most of the specifications, but some argue that it does not fit the evidence from JOSEPHUS. About a mile N of el-ʿAraj, and connected by what was a fine road, is another site bearing the simple name of et-Tell (“the mound”). This location is near the Jordan and has evidence of being a larger city complete with wall, aqueduct, and fine buildings. This identification would solve most of the questions presented in the Gospels as well as those in ancient secular sources.

Beth Shan. beth-shan’ (Heb. bêṭ-šē ʾān H1126 [byt šn in Samuel], “house of quietness”). Also Beth-shean. A town allotted to the tribe of MANASSEH, but within the territory of ISSACHAR; the Manassites were not able to drive the Canaanites out of this town (Josh. 17:11-12; Jdg. 1:27). It lay 14 mi. (23 km.) S of the Sea of GALILEE, overlooking the Plain of ESDRAELON. After SAUL died on Mount GILBOA, the PHILISTINES fastened his body to the wall of Beth Shan and put his armor in the temple of the ASHTORETHS as trophies of their victory (1 Sam. 31:8-12). Later the men of JABESH GILEAD stole the bones of Saul and his sons from the street of Beth Shan, but DAVID recovered them and gave them a proper burial (2 Sam. 21:12-14).

The uplifted hill of Beth Shan inhabited during the OT period towers over the Greco-Roman and Byzantine ruins of Scythopolis. (View to the NNE.)

Today the site of the city is a mound, called Tell el-Husn (“Mound of the Fortress”), located near the Arab village of Beisan. Excavations have yielded rich finds, dating the history of the city from 3500 B.C. to the Christian era. A stratification of eighteen levels of debris and ruined houses can be seen as evidence of repeated destructions and eras of rebuilding. Because of its commanding location, it was fortified with double walls and was a strong Egyptian outpost from the fifteenth to the twelfth centuries. Temples and monument inscriptions by three pharaohs were discovered and date back to this time. The excavators have shown that Beth Shan was destroyed between 1050 and 1000, the approximate time of King David, who may have been responsible for its destruction. Four Canaanite temples were unearthed at the site, one of which has been identified with the “temple of the Ashtoreths” (1 Sam. 31:10), and another with the temple of DAGON where the Philistines fastened Saul’s head (1 Chr. 10:10). In SOLOMON’s reign Beth Shan was included in one of his commissary districts (1 Ki. 4:12). A Roman theater, erected about A.D. 200, still stands, and the remains of a synagogue from the fourth century have been found.

Beth Shemesh. beth-sheh’-mish (Heb. bêṭ šemeš H1127, “house of the sun”). A place name, apparently applied to several towns where a shrine to the sun-god was consecrated in pre-Israelite times. (1) In Upper GALILEE. A Canaanite town in the tribal inheritance of NAPHTALI (Josh. 19:38); it maintained its independence during the period of the judges (Jdg. 1:33), probably until the reign of DAVID (cf. 2 Sam. 24:6-7). The biblical association of BETH ANATH with Naphtali's Beth Shemesh (Jdg. 1:33) points to a location in central upper Galilee, possibly Khirbet Tell er-Ruweisi, about 17 mi. (27 km.) NE of ACCO.

(2) In Lower Galilee. Another town by this name appears near the border of the tribal territory of ISSACHAR (Josh. 19:22). Of the various suggestions for its identification, the most likely is Khirbet Sheikh esh-Shamsawi, which would place Beth Shemesh on the northern side of Issachar's district near the border with Naphtali, about 3 mi. (5 km.) SW of the S tip of the Sea of Galilee.

(3) In JUDAH. The most prominent Beth Shemesh in biblical history was the one on the northern boundary of Judah's tribal inheritance (Josh. 15:10). It was also known as IR SHEMESH (Josh. 19:41) and Mount HERES (Jdg. 1:35). The city served as a landmark on the N boundary of Judah (Josh. 15:10), but under the name Ir Shemesh its territory was apparently assigned to DAN, who were unable to occupy it. The town itself was given to the descendants of AARON (Josh. 21:16; 1 Chr. 6:59). When the ARK OF THE COVENANT was returned to Israel by the PHILISTINES, it was brought via the SOREK Valley to Beth Shemesh (1 Sam. 6). SOLOMON's second administrative district included Beth Shemesh (1 Ki. 4:9). The town figures in other biblical narratives (2 Ki. 14:8-14; 2 Chr. 25:17-24; 28:18). Beth Shemesh is identified with a large mound known as Tell er-Rumeileh, some 16 mi. (26 km.) W of JERUSALEM. Excavations have revealed six levels of occupation, the third of which dates to the time of SAUL and DAVID (1200-1000 B.C.). Implements of the late Canaanite and early Israelite period have been discovered here, such as pottery, weapons, and jewelry. Quantities of Philistine pottery indicate their domination of the Israelite population and also suggest a later Philistine occupancy (2 Chr. 28:18). Copper smelters and houses with underground cisterns were also found.

(4) In EGYPT. The Hebrew phrase bēt šemeš occurs also in Jer. 43:13 (cf. KJV), but the NIV renders it "the temple of the sun"; the reference may be to ON, that is, HELIOPOLIS (cf. NRSV).

Beth-shemite. beth-shem'it (Heb. bēt-šimšî H1128). Term used in the KJV and other versions with reference to a certain Joshua, in whose field the ARK OF THE COVENANT was set (1 Sam. 6:14, 18; NIV, "Joshua of Beth Shemesh"). See BETH SHEMESH #3.

Beth Shittah. beth-shit'uh (Heb. bēt haššitâ H1101, "house of Shittah [acacia]"). The place near the border of ABEL MEHOLAH to which the routed army of MIDIAN fled before GIDEON (Jdg. 7:22). The site was probably located SE of BETH SHAN, perhaps on the E side of the JORDAN.

Beth Tappuah. beth-tap'yoo-uh (Heb. bêt-tappûah H1130, “house of [the clan of] Tappuah” or “place of the apple trees”). A town in the hill country of JUDAH; its district included HEBRON and seven other cities (Josh. 15:53). The site is identified with the modern village of Taffuh, 3.5 mi. (5.5 km.) NNW of Hebron. It stands on the edge of a high ridge that overlooks fertile terraces below.

Beth Togarmah. beth'toh-gahr'muh (Heb. bêt tôgarmâ H1129, “house of Togarmah”). A place in “the far north” that exchanged horses and mules for the merchandise of TYRE and that had military connections with GOG (Ezek. 27:14; 38:6). It was probably located in what is modern Armenia. See also TOGARMAH.

Bethuel (person). bi-thyoo'uhl (Heb. bêtû ʿēl H1432, possibly “man of God”). Son of NAHOR (ABRAHAM's brother) and father of REBEKAH and LABAN (Gen. 22:22-23; 24:15; et al.). He is referred to as “the Aramean from Paddan Aram” (25:20; cf. also 28:5). See PADDAN ARAM.

Bethuel (place). bi-thyoo'uhl (Heb. bêtû ʿēl H1433, derivation uncertain, but cf. previous item; also bêtûl H1434 [Josh. 19:4]). A town occupied by the clan of SHIMEI, descendant of SIMEON (1 Chr. 4:30). In a parallel list that describes the inheritance of Simeon within the territory of JUDAH, it is spelled Bethul (Josh. 19:4). It appears to be the same as KESIL (Josh. 15:30), and perhaps it occurs once in the alternate (or textually corrupt?) form “Bethel” (1 Sam. 30:27). Its precise location is unknown, although one proposal is Khirbet el-Qarjetein, a ruin some 12 mi. (19 km.) S of HEBRON.

Bethul. beth'uhl. See BETHUEL (PLACE).

Beth-zatha. beth-zay'thuh (Gk. Bēthzatha, possibly from Aram. byt zyt , “house of the olive”). According to some Greek MSS, Beth-zatha was the name of the pool in JERUSALEM where Jesus healed a lame man (Jn. 5:2; this textual variant is accepted by the NRSV and other versions). The pool may have been given the name Beth-zatha (either initially or subsequent to NT times) because of its connection or proximity to a suburb of Jerusalem that had a similar name. However, the NIV takes BETHESDA as the original reading in John.

Beth Zur. beth-zuhr' (Heb. bêṭ-šûr H1123, "house [or place] of rocks"). A town in the hill country of JUDAH (Josh. 15:58), apparently founded by MAON, a descendant of CALEB (1 Chr. 2:45). Beth Zur was one of fifteen cities REHOBAM fortified for the defense of the southern kingdom (11:7). After the EXILE, the town is described as a half-district ruled by a certain Nehemiah son of Azbuk (Neh. 3:16). Beth Zur was an important military stronghold where Judas MACCABEE defeated the Greek army under Lysias (1 Macc. 4:28-34). Beth Zur is identified with Khirbet et-Ṭubeiqah, which is about 4.5 mi. (7 km.) N of HEBRON.

Betonim. bet'uh-nim (Heb. bēṭōnîm H1064, "pistachio nuts"). A town in the AMORITE territory of JAZER allotted to the tribe of GAD (Josh. 13:26). It is usually identified with modern Khirbet Batneh, about 16 mi. (28 km.) NE of JERICHO, across the JORDAN.

betrothal. See MARRIAGE.

Beulah. byoo'luh (Heb. bē'ûlâ H1241, "married"). This name, as a transliteration of the Hebrew, occurs once in some English translations of the Bible, such as KJV and NIV (Isa. 62:4; NRSV, "Married"). In this passage God promises Israel that she will no longer be called Azubah (Deserted) but Hephzibah (My Delight is in Her); and her land will no longer be called Shemamah (Desolate) but Beulah (Married). The marriage relationship is often used in the Bible to portray God's relationship with his people (Isa. 54:5; Ezek. 16; 23; Hos. 1-3; et al.).

bewitch. A term used in most English versions to render the Greek verb baskainō G1001 (Gal. 3:1), which meant, among other things, "to cast a spell." PAUL's use of such a strong metaphor indicates the seriousness of the error espoused by the GALATIANS. The English word is also used twice by the KJV to render existēmi G2014 in the context of Simon's sorceries (Acts 8:9, 11); however, this Greek verb is better translated "to amaze."

Bezai. bee'zi (Heb. bēšay H1291, prob. short form of bēšal ʾēl H1295, "in the shadow of God"; see BEZALEL). (1) Ancestor of an Israelite clan that returned from the EXILE (Ezra 2:17; Neh. 7:23).

(2) One of the leaders who affixed their seals to the covenant of NEHEMIAH (Neh. 10:18). He was probably the head of the clan mentioned in #1 above.

Bezaleel. See BEZALEL.

Bezalel. bez'uh-lel (Heb. bēʾal ʾēl H1295, “in the shadow of God”). KJV Bezaleel. (1) Son of Uri and a descendant of JUDAH through PEREZ (1 Chr. 2:20). Bezalel was the chief artisan and foundryman of the TABERNACLE. He was appointed to this task by Yahweh, who filled him with the Spirit to perform the work. His special gift included the detailed technical skills for metallurgy, casting, engraving, jewelry making, and wood carving (Exod. 31:2-5; 35:30-33; 36:1-2; 37:1; 38:22; 2 Chr. 1:5).

(2) One of the descendants of PAHATH-MOAB who agreed to put away their foreign wives (Ezra 10:30).

Bezek. bee'zik (Heb. bezeq H1028, possibly “scattering”). A town where the tribes of JUDAH and SIMEON conquered the Canaanites under ADONI-BEZEK (Jdg. 1:4). Some scholars locate the town in S Palestine, in the territory allotted to Judah, but it is probably the same Bezek where King SAUL mustered his troops to fight the AMMONITES at JABESH GILEAD (1 Sam. 11:8). It is thus to be located in the mountains of GILBOA and identified with modern Khirbet Ibziq, 13 mi. (21 km.) NE of SHECHEM.

Bezer (person). bee'zuhr (Heb. beʾer H1310, possibly “gold ore”). Son of Zophah and descendant of ASHER (1 Chr. 7:37).

Bezer (place). bee'zuhr (Heb. beʾer H1311, possibly “gold ore” or “fortress”). A Levitical city in the region of the tribe of REUBEN assigned to the descendants of MERARI (Josh. 21:36; 1 Chr. 6:78). It was also one of the three CITIES OF REFUGE appointed by MOSES on the E side of the Jordan (Deut. 4:43; Josh. 20:8). According to the MOABITE STONE, Bezer was one of the towns King MESHA fortified c. 830 B.C., possibly the same as BOZRAH of MOAB (Jer. 48:24, as opposed to Bozrah of EDOM). It is often identified with modern Umm el-ʿAmad, 8 mi. (13 km.) NE of MEDEBA.

Bible. The collection of books recognized and used by the Christian church as the inspired record of God's revelation of himself and of his will to mankind.

I. Names. The English word Bible is derived from the Greek word biblion G1046, a diminutive form of byblos (also biblos G1047), which refers to the bark of the PAPHYRUS plant, used widely for writing material. Thus the term meant first "a strip of papyrus," then "document, scroll, book." The plural biblia ("books") was naturally used of the collection of holy writings, but it was sometimes mistaken for the feminine singular, which has an identical form, hence "books" became "the book" (Bible). In the NT, the OT is usually referred to as "the Scriptures" (Matt. 21:42; 22:29; Lk. 24:32; Jn. 5:39; Acts 18:24), "Scripture" (Acts 8:32; Gal. 3:22), and "holy Scriptures" (Rom. 1:2; 2 Tim. 3:15). The plural term biblia serves as a reminder that the Bible is a collection of books, while its use in the singular suggests that behind these many books there lies a wonderful unity.

The names "Old Testament" and "New Testament" have been used since the close of the second century A.D. to distinguish the Jewish and Christian Scriptures. The OT is composed of books produced by writers under God's COVENANT with Israel; the NT contains writings of the apostles (members of God's new covenant people). The term Novum Testamentum occurs first in Tertullian (A.D. 190-220); the Latin word testamentum is used to render Greek diathēkē G1347, which in classical usage meant "a will, testament" but in the SEPTUAGINT and in the NT was used to translate the Hebrew word bērît, "covenant."

II. Languages. Most of the OT was written in the HEBREW LANGUAGE, spoken by the Israelites in Canaan before the Babylonian captivity. After the return from exile, Hebrew gave way to ARAMAIC, a related dialect generally spoken throughout SW Asia. A few parts of the OT are in Aramaic (Ezra 4:8—6:18; 7:12-26; Jer. 10:11; Dan. 2:4—7:28). The ancient Hebrew text consisted only of consonants, since the Hebrew alphabet had no written vowels. Vowel signs were invented by the Jewish Masoretic scholars in the sixth century A.D. and later.

Except for a few words and sentences, the NT was composed in GREEK, the language of ordinary conversation in the Hellenistic world. The difference between NT Greek and classical Greek used to be a cause of bewilderment to scholars, but the discovery, since the 1890s, of many thousands of papyrus documents in the sands of Egypt has shown that the language of the NT is the Koine ("common"), that is, the form of Greek generally spoken in the Mediterranean world in the first century. The papyri have thrown a great deal of light on the meaning of many NT words.

III. Compass and Divisions. The Protestant Bible in general use today contains sixty-six books, thirty-nine in the OT and twenty-seven in the NT. The thirty-nine OT books are the same as those recognized by the Palestinian Jews in NT times. The Greek-speaking Jews of this period, on the other hand, made use of a larger number of books, and the Greek OT (LXX), which passed from them to the early Christian church, contained, in addition to the thirty-nine books of the Hebrew canon, a number of others, of which seven—Tobit, Judith, Wisdom, Ecclesiasticus, Baruch, 1 and 2 Maccabees, plus the two so-called additions to Esther and Daniel—are regarded as canonical by the Roman Catholic church, which therefore has an OT canon of forty-six books. See APOCRYPHA. Jews today consider canonical only the thirty-nine books accepted by Protestants.

The books in the Hebrew Bible are arranged in three groups: the Law, the Prophets, and the Writings. The Law comprises the PENTATEUCH. The Prophets consist of eight books: the Former Prophets (Joshua, Judges, Samuel, and Kings) and the Latter Prophets (Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, and the book of the Minor Prophets). The Writings are the remaining books: Psalms, Proverbs, Job, Song of Songs, Ruth, Lamentations, Ecclesiastes, Esther, Daniel, Ezra-Nehemiah, and Chronicles. The total is traditionally reckoned as twenty-four, but these correspond to the Protestant thirty-nine, since in the latter reckoning the Minor Prophets are counted as twelve books, and Samuel, Kings, Chronicles, and Ezra-Nehemiah as two each. In ancient times there were also other enumerations, notably one by JOSEPHUS, who held twenty-two books as canonical (after the number of letters in the Hebrew alphabet), but his twenty-two are the same as the twenty-four in the traditional reckoning.

In the LXX both the number of books and the arrangement of them differ from the Hebrew Bible. The books of the Apocrypha are all late in date and are in Greek, though some of them had a Hebrew origin. The more scholarly of the church fathers (Melito, Origen, Athanasius, Jerome) did not regard the Apocrypha as canonical, although they permitted their use for edification.

The Protestant OT follow in general the grouping found in the LXX. It has, first, the five books of the Pentateuch; then the eleven historical books, beginning with Joshua and ending with Esther; after that what are often called the poetical books (Job, Psalms, Proverbs, Ecclesiastes, and the Song of Songs); and finally the Prophets, first the so-called Major Prophets (including Daniel) and then the Minor Prophets.

All branches of the Christian church are agreed on the NT canon. The grouping of the books is a natural one: first the four Gospels; then the remaining historical book of the NT, the Acts of the Apostles; after that the letters to the churches, first the letters of Paul and then the General Epistles; and finally the Revelation.

IV. Text. Although the Bible was written over a period of approximately 1,400 years, from the time of MOSES to the end of the first century A.D., its text has come to us in a remarkable state of preservation. It is of course not identical with the text that left the hands of the original writers. Scribal errors have crept in. Until the invention of printing in the middle of the fifteenth century, all copies of the Scriptures were made by hand. There is evidence that the ancient Jewish scribes copied the books of the OT with extreme care. The recently discovered DEAD SEA SCROLLS, some going as far back as the second and third centuries B.C., contain either whole books or fragments of all but one (Esther) of the OT books; and they bear witness to a text remarkably like the Hebrew text left by the Masoretes (from A.D. 500 on). The Greek translation of the OT, the Septuagint, was begun about 250 B.C. and completed one or two centuries later. Although it differs in places from the Hebrew text current today, it is also a valuable witness to the accuracy of the OT text. See TEXT AND VERSIONS (OT).

In the NT the evidence for the reliability of the text is almost embarrassingly large and includes more than 5,700 Greek MSS (many fragmentary), numerous versions, and many thousands of scriptural quotations in the writings of the church fathers. The superabundance of textual evidence for the NT, some of which dates to the second century, may be appreciated when it is realized that very few MSS of most ancient Greek and Latin classical authors have survived, and those that have survived are almost all late in date. Among the oldest MSS of the Greek NT that have come down to us are the John Rylands fragment of the Gospel of John (c. 125); Papyrus Bodmer II, a MS of the Gospel of John dating c. 200; the Chester Beatty Papyri, consisting of three codices containing the Gospels and Acts, most of Paul's Letters, and the Revelation, dating from c. 200; and codices Vaticanus and Sinaiticus, both produced c. 350. See TEXT AND VERSIONS (NT).

V. Chapters and Verses. The books of the Bible originally had no chapter or verse divisions. For convenience of reference, Jewish scribes were the first to divide the OT into sections; similarly, some early NT MSS have sectional markings. The chapter divisions we use today were made by Stephen Langton, archbishop of Canterbury, who died in 1228. The division of the NT into its present verses is found for the first time in an edition of the Greek NT published in 1551 by a printer in Paris, Robert Estienne (Stephanus), who in 1555 also brought out the first edition of the entire Bible (Vulgate) to appear with our present chapters and verses. The first English Bible to be so divided was the Geneva edition of 1560.

VI. Translations. The Old and New Testaments appeared very early in translations. Most of the OT was translated into Greek (the LXX) between 250 and 150 B.C., and other translations in Greek, Jewish Aramaic, and Syriac appeared some time later. The NT began to be translated into Latin and Syriac c. 150 and into Coptic shortly after. In subsequent centuries versions appeared in the Armenian, Gothic, Ethiopic, Georgian, Arabic, Persian, and Slavonic languages. The Bible, in whole or in part, is now available in more than 2,300 different languages and dialects. Many languages have been reduced to writing in order that the Bible might be translated into them in written form, and this work still goes on in many lands.

VII. Message. Although the Bible consists of many different books written over a long period of time by a great variety of writers, most of whom did not know one another, it has an organic unity that can be explained only by assuming, as the book itself claims, that its writers were inspired by the Holy Spirit to give God's message to men and women. The theme of this message is the same in both Testaments, the redemption of sinners. The OT tells about the origin of sin and the preparation God made for the solution of this problem through his own Son, the Messiah. The NT describes the fulfillment of God's redemptive plan; the four Gospels telling about the Messiah's coming; the Acts of the Apostles describing the origin and growth of the church, God's redeemed people; the Epistles giving the meaning and implication of the incarnation; and the Revelation showing how some day all of history will be consummated in Christ. The two Testaments form two volumes of one work. The first is incomplete without the second; and the second cannot be understood without the first. Together they are God's revelation to people of the provision he has made for their salvation. See also OLD TESTAMENT; NEW TESTAMENT.

Bible versions, English. In the earliest days of English Christianity the only known Bible was the Latin Vulgate, made by Jerome between A.D. 383 and 405. This version could be read by the clergy and by monks, the only ones who were familiar with the language. In the medieval period, however, there were some attempts at producing English translations of portions of the Bible.

Early efforts. In 670 Caedmon, a monk at Whitby, produced in Old English a metrical version of some of the more interesting narratives of the OT. The first straightforward translation of any part of the Bible into the language of the people was the Psalter, made in about 700 by Aldhelm, the first bishop of Sherborne in Dorset. Some parts of the NT were translated into English by Bede, the learned monk of Jarrow, author of the famous Ecclesiastical History of the English Nation. According to a letter of his disciple Cuthbert, Bede was still engaged in translating the Gospel of John into English on his deathbed. It is not certain whether he completed it, but, unfortunately, his translation has not survived.

King Alfred (871-901) produced during his reign English versions of parts of the Old and New Testaments, including a part of the Psalter. Some Latin Gospels that survive from this period have written between the lines a word-for-word translation of the text into English, without regard to the idiom and usage of the vernacular. From the same period come what are known as the Wessex Gospels, the first independent Old English version of the Gospels. Toward the end of the tenth century Aelfric, archbishop of Canterbury, translated parts of the first seven books of the OT, as well as parts of other OT books.

For nearly three centuries after the Norman Conquest in 1066 the uncertain conditions of the language prevented any real literary progress, but some MSS of translations of parts of the Bible into Anglo-Norman French survive. About the beginning of the thirteenth century an Augustinian monk named Orm (Ormin) produced a poetical version of the Gospels and the Acts of the Apostles called the Ormulum. From the first half of the fourteenth century there survive two prose translations of the Psalter, done in two different dialects; and from the end of the fourteenth century, a version of the principal NT letters, apparently made, however, not for the use of the common people but for monks and nuns. There was no thought as yet of providing ordinary layfolk with the Bible in their own tongue. It was Wycliffe who first entertained this revolutionary idea.

John Wycliffe. Born in Yorkshire about the year 1320, Wycliffe stands out as one of the most illustrious figures of the fourteenth century. This was a period of transition, neither the Middle Ages nor the Reformation—a kind of middle ground between the two. The old order was struggling with the new. Throughout the whole of this century the prestige of the Roman Catholic church was very low. The “Babylonian Captivity” of the popes at Avignon (1309-1378) was followed by the “Great Schism,” when for forty years there were two rival popes, one at Rome and the other at Avignon. In the struggle between the papacy and the English parliament over the papal tribute, Wycliffe sided with the parliament. The outstanding Oxford theologian of his day and an ardent ecclesiastical reformer, he is called the “Morning-star of the Reformation.” He was convinced that the surest way of defeating Rome was to put the Bible into the hands of the common people, and he therefore decided to make such a translation available. Under his auspices, the NT came out in 1380 and the OT two years later.

It is uncertain exactly how much of the translation was done by Wycliffe himself. A number of scholars worked with him on the project, and one of them, Nicholas Hereford, did the greater part of the OT. The translation was made from the Latin, not from the original languages. Since printing was not known, copies were made by hand and were naturally very expensive (about 170 are in existence at present). It was not printed until 1850, when the Oxford Press published it. The original MS in the handwriting of at least five different men is preserved in the Bodleian Library at Oxford.

To help him in his efforts for reform, Wycliffe organized a kind of religious order of poor preachers, called Lollards, whom he sent throughout England to preach his doctrines and to read the Bible to all who wished to hear. Foxe reports that the people were so eager to read it that they would give a whole load of hay for the use of the NT for one day. There was opposition to Wycliffe on the part of the church, but contrary to his own expectations, he was permitted to retire to his rectory of Lutterworth, where he quietly died in 1384. Twelve years later, however, his bones were disinterred and burned, and the ashes scattered over the river that flows through Lutterworth. His translation has indelibly stamped itself on our present-day Bible. Some of the familiar expressions that are first found in his version are “strait gate,” “make whole,” “compass land and sea,” “son of perdition,” “enter thou into the joy of thy Lord.”

From Wycliffe to Tyndale. Four years after Wycliffe’s death his secretary, John Purvey, issued a careful revision of his translation, introduced with an interesting prologue and accompanied by notes. The church, however, did not approve of the new Bible. In 1408 a decree, known as the “Constitutions of Oxford,” was issued forbidding anyone to translate or read any part of the Bible in the vernacular without the approval of his bishop or of a provincial council. Six years later a law was enacted that all persons who should read the Scriptures in their own language should “forfeit land, catel, life, and goods from their heyres for ever.” Nicholas Hereford and John Purvey were imprisoned. The public demand for the Bible continued, however, in spite of the severe penalties attached to its circulation.

The fifteenth century was one of the great epochs of human history. In that century there lived such men as Columbus, Galileo, Frances Bacon, Kepler, and Marco Polo. Another great man of the time was the inventor of printing, Gutenberg, who in 1454 brought out in Germany the first dated printed work, a Latin Psalter, and two years later the famous Gutenberg Bible in the Latin Vulgate. After the capture of Constantinople in 1453, Christian scholars were compelled to leave the capital of the Eastern empire, where for a thousand years Greek learning had flourished. They brought with them to Western Europe many Greek MSS, which led to a revival of interest in biblical studies and made it possible for Erasmus to issue in 1516 the first printed edition of the Greek NT. At the beginning of the sixteenth century Greek was for the first time introduced as a subject of study in the universities of Oxford and Cambridge. By 1500 most of the countries of Europe had the Scriptures in the vernacular. England, however, had only scattered copies of the Wycliffe MS version, the language of which had by then become obsolete. The Constitutions of Oxford were still in force. England was ready for a new translation of the Bible, from the original languages.

William Tyndale. This great figure in the history of the English Bible was born about the year 1494 and spent ten years studying at Oxford and Cambridge. Soon after leaving Cambridge, while working as a chaplain and tutor, he said in a controversy with a clergyman, "If God spare my life, ere many years I will cause a boy that driveth a plough to know more of the Scripture than thou dost." This became the fixed resolve of his life. In his projected translation he tried to get the support of the bishop of London, but without success. A wealthy London cloth merchant finally came to his support, but after six months, in 1524, Tyndale left for the Continent because, he said, he "understood at the last not only that there was no room in my lord of London's palace to translate the NT, but also that there was no place to do it in all England, as experience doth now openly declare." He was never able to return to England. He seems to have visited Luther at Wittenberg, and then went to Cologne, where he found a printer for his NT. A priest discovered his plan, and Tyndale was obliged to flee. In Worms he found another printer, and there, in 1525, 3,000 copies of the first printed English NT were published. By 1530 six editions, numbering about 15,000 copies, were published. They were all smuggled into England—hidden in bales of cotton, sacks of flour, and bundles of flax.

As soon as Tyndale's NT reached England, there was a great demand for it: by the laity that they might read it, and by the ecclesiastical authorities that they might destroy it! A decree was issued for its destruction. Bishops bought up whole editions to consign to the flames. As a result, only a few imperfect copies survive. Tyndale's English NT began a new epoch in the history of the English Bible. It was not a translation from the Latin, as Wycliffe's had been, but from the original Greek, the text published by Erasmus. With each successive edition, Tyndale made corrections and improvements. So well did Tyndale do his work that the KJV reproduces about 90 percent of Tyndale in the NT. After the completion of the NT, Tyndale started to bring out a translation of the OT from the Hebrew text, but he lived only to complete the Pentateuch, Jonah, and probably the historical books from Joshua to 2 Chronicles. After ten years on the Continent, mostly in hiding, he was betrayed in Antwerp by an English Roman Catholic and was condemned to death for being a heretic. He was strangled and his body burned at the stake. His last words were a prayer, "Lord, open the King of England's eyes." But Tyndale had won his battle. Although his NT was burned in large quantities by the church, it contributed greatly toward creating an appetite for the Bible in English. The government, moreover, began to see the wisdom and necessity of providing the Bible in English for common use. The break with the papacy in 1534 helped greatly in this development.

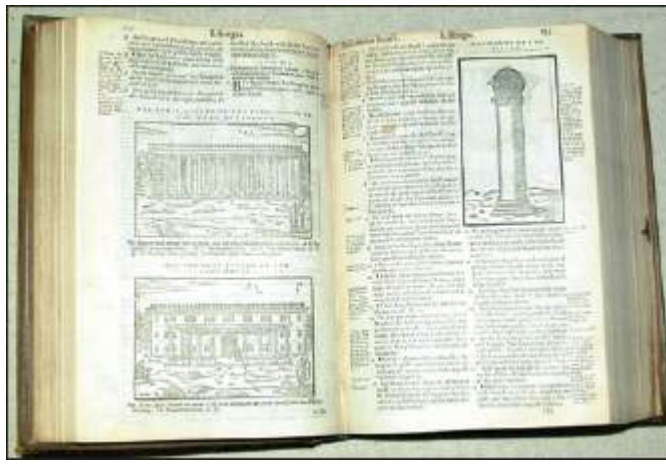

Miles Coverdale. While Tyndale was imprisoned in Belgium, an English Bible suddenly appeared in England in 1535. It had come from the Continent.

The title page stated that it had been translated out of the German and Latin into English. This Bible was a rendering by Miles Coverdale, although in the NT and in those parts of the OT done by Tyndale, it was no more than a slight revision of the latter's work. It was the first complete printed Bible in the English language. It was not translated from the Hebrew and Greek, for in the dedication (to Henry VIII) Coverdale says that he used the work of five different translators. His version of the Psalms still appears in the Book of Common Prayer, used daily in the ritual of the Church of England. Two new editions of Coverdale's Bible appeared in 1537, the title page containing the significant words, "Set forth with the King's most gracious license." So within a year of Tyndale's death, the entire Bible was translated, printed, and distributed, apparently with royal approval.

Thomas Matthew. In 1537 another Bible appeared in England, this one by Thomas Matthew (a pen name for John Rogers, a former associate of Tyndale's), who was burned at the stake by Queen Mary in 1555. The whole of the NT and about half of the OT are Tyndale's, while the remainder is Coverdale's. It bore on its title page the words, "Set forth with the king's most gracious license." This Bible has the distinction of being the first edition of the whole English Bible actually to be printed in England. So now two versions of the English Bible circulated in England with the king's permission, Coverdale's and Matthew's, both of them heavily dependent on Tyndale.

The Great Bible. The next version to appear was a revision of the Matthew Bible, done by Coverdale. The printing was begun in Paris, but the Inquisition stepped in and the work was completed in England. It appeared in 1539 and was called the Great Bible because of its large size and sumptuousness. In his revision Coverdale made considerable use of the Hebrew and Greek texts then available. Subsequent editions were called Cranmer's Bible because of a preface he wrote for it in which he commended the widespread reading of the Scriptures and declared that they were the sufficient rule of faith and life. At the foot of the title page were the words, "This is the Bible appointed to the use of the churches." This makes explicit an order that was issued in 1538, while this Bible was being printed, that a copy of it was to be placed in every church in the land. The people cordially welcomed the Great Bible, but its size and cost limited it largely to use in churches.

The later years of Henry VIII were marked by a serious reaction against the Reform movement. In 1543 Parliament passed an act to ban the use of Tyndale's NT, made it a crime for an unlicensed person to read or expound the Bible publicly to others, and restricted even the private reading of the Bible to the upper classes. Three years later Parliament prohibited the use of everything but the Great Bible. In London large quantities of Tyndale's NT and Coverdale's Bible were burned at St. Paul's Cross.

The Geneva Bible (1560).

In the brief reign of Edward VI, who succeeded his father Henry VIII in 1547, no new translation work was done. However, great encouragement was given to the reading of the Bible and to the printing of existing versions, and injunctions were reissued that a copy of the Great Bible be placed in every parish church.

The Geneva Bible. With the accession of Mary in 1553, hundreds of Protestants lost their lives, among them some men closely associated with Bible translation, like John Rogers and Thomas Cranmer. Coverdale escaped martyrdom by fleeing to the Continent. Some of the English Reformers escaped to Geneva, where the leading figure was John Calvin. One of their number, William Wittingham, who had married Calvin's sister, produced in 1557 a revision of the English NT. He and his associates then undertook the revision of the whole Bible. Appearing in 1560, the work is known as the Geneva Bible, but it also received the nickname "the Breeches Bible" from its rendering of Gen. 3:7, "They sewed fig tree leaves together, and made themselves breeches." The Geneva Bible enjoyed a long popularity, going through 160 editions, 60 of them during the reign of Queen Elizabeth alone, and continued to be printed even after the publication of the KJV in 1611.

The Bishops' Bible. Queen Elizabeth, who succeeded Mary Tudor as queen, restored the arrangements of Edward VI. The Great Bible was again placed in every church, and people were encouraged to read the Scriptures. The excellence of the Geneva Bible made obvious the deficiencies of the Great Bible, but some of the Geneva Bible's renderings and the marginal notes, which reflected the influence of John Calvin, made it unacceptable to many of the clergy. Archbishop Parker, aided by eight bishops and some other scholars, therefore made a revision of the Great Bible, which was completed and published in 1568 and came to be known as the Bishops' Bible. It gained considerable circulation, but the Geneva Bible was far more popular and was used more widely.

Rheims-Douai Version. This Roman Catholic work was produced by Gregory Martin, who with a number of other English Romanists left England at the beginning of Elizabeth's reign and settled in NE France, where in 1568 they founded a college. The NT, published in 1582, was done while the college was at Rheims, and hence is known as the Rheims NT; but the OT was not published until 1609-10, after the college had moved to Douai, and hence it is called the Douai OT. The whole work is often referred to as the Douay-Rheims Bible or simply as the Douay Bible. The preface warned readers against the then-existing "profane" translations and blames Protestants for casting what was holy to dogs. Like Wycliffe's version, this one was made not from the original languages but from Latin, and is therefore only a secondary translation. The main objection to it is its too close adherence to the words of the original Latin and the too great Latinizing of the English. It included the APOCRYPHA and contained a large number of notes, most of them to interpret the sacred text in conformity with Roman Catholic teaching and to reply to the arguments of the Reformers. The Douay Bible in use today is not the same as the one made by Gregory Martin, but is a thorough revision made of it between 1749 and 1763 by Bishop Richard Challoner. It was first authorized for use by American Roman Catholics in 1810.

King James (or Authorized) Version. When Elizabeth died in 1603, the crown passed to James I, who had been king of Scotland for thirty-six years as James VI. Several months after he ascended the throne of England he called a conference of bishops and Puritan clergy to harmonize the differences that existed in the church. At this conference John Reynolds, President of Corpus Christi College, Oxford, a leader of the Puritan party in the Church of England, suggested that a new translation of the Bible be made to replace the Bishops' Bible, which many people found unacceptable. The proposal pleased the king, who violently disliked the Geneva Bible; a resolution was passed to produce a new translation from the original Hebrew and Greek, without any marginal notes, for the use of all the churches in England.

Without delay King James nominated fifty-four of the best Hebrew and Greek scholars of the day. Only forty-seven actually took part in the work, which did not begin until 1607. They were divided into six groups: three for the OT, two for the NT, and one for the Apocrypha. Two of the groups met at Oxford, two at Cambridge, and two at Westminster. Elaborate rules were laid down for their guidance. When a group had completed its task, its work was submitted to twelve men, two from each panel. Final differences of opinion were settled at a general meeting of each company. In cases of special difficulty, learned men outside the board of revisers were consulted. Marginal notes were used only to explain Hebrew and Greek words and to draw attention to parallel passages. Italics were used for words not found in the original but necessary to complete the sense.

The revisers, who received no financial remuneration for their work, completed their task in two years; nine more months were devoted to a revision of their work by a special committee consisting of two members from each group. In 1611 the new version was published. Although the title page described it as “newly translated out of the original tongues” and as “appointed to be read in churches,” neither statement is entirely in accord with the facts. The work was actually a revision of the Bishops’ Bible on the basis of the Hebrew and Greek; and it was never officially sanctioned by king, Parliament, or the church. It did not win immediate universal acceptance, taking almost fifty years to displace the Geneva Bible in popular favor. In the course of time slight alterations were made, especially in spelling, to conform to changing usage, but these were all done piecemeal by private enterprise. Its excellence is shown by the fact that for almost three centuries it was virtually the only version used in the English-speaking Protestant world, for both public and private reading.

Revisions of the King James Version. During the second half of the nineteenth century a substantial revision of the KJV was seen as necessary for a number of reasons: (1) in the course of time some words had become obsolete, (2) a number of Greek MSS were discovered that were older than those available to the KJV translators, and (3) scholars’ knowledge of the biblical languages and ancient culture had improved considerably. The English Revised Version (RV) had its origin in 1870 when, at the Convocation of Canterbury of the Church of England, a committee was appointed to invite outstanding Hebrew and Greek scholars, irrespective of religious denomination, to join in revising the KJV. Eventually a committee of fifty-four was formed, divided into two groups of twenty-seven each—one for the OT, the other for the NT. American scholars were also invited to cooperate, and they formed two groups corresponding to the British groups. It was agreed that American suggestions not accepted by the British revisers be recorded in an appendix to the published volume and that the American revisers give their moral support to the new Bible and not issue an edition of their own until at least fourteen years later.

The revisers were guided by a number of rules, the most important being that they were to make as few alterations as possible in the text of the KJV, while basing their translation of the NT on a different Greek text. Altogether the Greek text underlying the revised NT differed in almost 5,800 readings from the Textus Receptus (the edition used by the KJV translators), but the vast majority of these differences do not affect the translation—and those that do require no change in established Christian doctrines. The English text of the NT contains about 36,000 changes, most of which however involve expressing the same meaning in a more understandable style. The new Bible differed from its predecessors also in printing poetical passages in the OT as poetry and in grouping verses into paragraphs according to sense units.

The NT was published in 1881, the OT in 1885. The work occupied the NT translators for about 40 days each year for ten years, while the OT group was occupied for 792 days over a period of fourteen years. The revisers gave their time and labor without charge. When they completed their work, they disbanded. Although the new version was widely accepted (three million copies being sold within the first year), it did not meet with immediate approval, nor did it ever surpass the KJV for supremacy among Bible translations; the English of the RV was not sufficiently readable to replace the time-honored KJV. Though not part of the original project, the Apocrypha was published in 1895.

The American scholars who cooperated with the English revisers on the RV were not entirely satisfied with it. The suggested changes printed in the appendix represented only a part of the changes they wanted made; and the English revisers retained a large number of words and phrases whose meanings and spellings were regarded as antiquated. These revisers also retained words that were English but not American in meaning. For these and other reasons the American scholars did not disband when the RV was published, but their own work, known as the American Standard Version, was not published until 1901. The ASV was regarded by many as being on the whole superior to the RV, and it was used widely, especially for study purposes, during much of the twentieth century.

The Revised Standard Version (RSV) was a revision of the ASV, the NT appearing in 1946 and the OT in 1952. Sponsored by the International Council of Religious Education, it was the work of thirty-two American scholars who worked in two sections, one dealing with the OT, the other with the NT. It was designed for use in public and private worship. In this version the language is modernized; direct speech is regularly indicated by the use of quotation marks; and the policy is followed (as already done to some extent in the KJV) of using a variety of synonyms to translate the Greek words where it is thought to be advisable. The RSV became very popular, especially in mainline Protestant denominations, and Catholic editions appeared in 1965 (NT) and 1966 (complete Bible), while a new edition in 1973 was accepted as a “common Bible” for Catholic, Protestant, and Orthodox Christians alike.

Many conservative Christians, however, objected to some of the features of the RV (e.g., “young woman” rather than “virgin” in Isa. 7:14). These concerns led to the production of the New American Standard Bible (NASB). This translation was prepared by fifty-eight originally anonymous (but now acknowledged) scholars under the auspices of the Lockman Foundation of La Habra, California. The NT appeared in 1963 and the whole Bible in 1971.

Based on the ASV, the NASB is the most consistently literal of major English versions produced over the last half century. Examples include its use of italicization of English words that do not have Greek or Hebrew parallels and the identification of historical present tense verbs in the NT with an asterisk. An updated edition was released in 1995 that removed some archaic language, increased readability, and removed the archaic “thees” and “thous” with reference to deity.

The New King James Version (NKJV), a direct revision of the KJV, was sponsored by Thomas Nelson Publishers of Nashville, Tennessee. More than 130 evangelical scholars produced this work over a seven-year period. The NT appeared in 1979 and the whole Bible followed in 1982. The primary distinction of the NKJV is its textual basis, utilizing the Textus Receptus, the edition of the Greek NT behind the KJV (almost all other modern translations use the critical text derived from older Greek MSS). While updating archaic words, the NKJV consciously seeks to retain the literalness, cadence, style, and idiom of the KJV.

After the initial publication of the RSV in 1952, its translation committee continued to meet every few years to consider future changes and to make minor corrections to the text. In 1974 the National Council of Churches, which held the copyright to the RSV, authorized a new revision. The complete Bible of the New Revised Standard Version (NRSV) was published in 1990. Like its predecessors, the NRSV is a “formal-equivalence” version, but not slavishly so, being more sensitive to Greek and Hebrew idiom than other literal versions. It is widely used in academic and scholarly circles. The NRSV was also the first English version to introduce consistent gender-inclusive language for masculine generic terms in Hebrew and Greek.

The English Standard Version, published in 2001, is a light revision of the RSV (less than 5% changed) that seeks to move the latter in a more conservative and evangelical direction. In addition to “correcting” RSV readings viewed by some as liberal the ESV removes “thees” and “thous,” updates other archaic language, and at times moves the text in a slightly more literal direction. The ESV also adopts a moderate (though sometimes inconsistent) use of gender-inclusive language.

Other Modern Versions. The discovery at the end of the nineteenth century of many thousands of Greek papyri in the sands of Egypt, all written in the everyday Greek language of the people, had a revolutionary influence on the study of NT Greek. The language of the NT had hitherto presented a vexing problem because it was so different from classical Greek. Now it was shown to be the colloquial language of Greek-speaking people in the first century. Many felt, therefore, that the NT should be translated into today’s everyday speech, not in stilted and antiquated English. These developments created a keen interest in bringing out fresh translations of the NT in the spoken English of today. As a result, numerous modern-speech versions have been produced, both by individuals and by groups of scholars.

The first of these to appear was The Twentieth Century New Testament: A Translation into Modern English Made from the Original Greek (Westcott and Hort's Text); published in 1902, it was the work of about twenty translators whose names were not given. In 1903 R. F. Weymouth brought out The New Testament in Modern Speech; it was thoroughly revised in 1924 by J. A. Robertson. James Moffatt, the well-known Scottish NT scholar, brought out The Bible: A New Translation in 1913-14. The American counterpart of Moffatt was The Complete Bible: An American Translation (1927, rev. 1935); the NT first appeared in 1923 and was the work of E. J. Goodspeed, while four scholars, headed by J. M. Powis Smith, did the OT. The New Testament: A Translation in the Language of the People, by C. B. Williams, came out in 1937. The New Testament in Modern English (1958), by J. B. Phillips, is one of the most readable of the modern-speech translations. The Amplified New Testament (1958), which gives variant shades of meaning, was followed in 1961 by The Amplified Old Testament; it was the work of Frances E. Siewert and unnamed assistants. The Holy Bible: The Berkeley Version in Modern English (1959) was the work of Gerrit Verkuyl in the NT and of twenty American scholars in the OT. Kenneth Wuest's The New Testament—An Expanded Translation appeared complete in 1961. Also in 1961 The Simplified New Testament appeared, a new translation by Olaf M. Norlie.

During this period a number of new Roman Catholic versions were brought out also. The New Testament of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ (1941) was a revision of the Rheims-Challoner NT sponsored by the Episcopal Committee of the Confraternity of Christian Doctrine; therefore it was called the Confraternity Version. It was followed by the translation of the OT in four successive volumes (1948-69), which represented, not a revision of Douai-Challoner, but a new version from Hebrew. It seemed unreasonable to have a secondary version of the NT alongside a primary version of the OT; but when it was decided to make a new translation of the NT from Greek it was also decided to undertake a thorough revision of the whole Confraternity Version. This revision appeared in 1970 under the new title, the New American Bible. The Westminster Version of the Sacred Scriptures appeared under the editorship of Cuthbert Lattey—the NT in 1935, followed by parts of the OT. It was discontinued after Lattey's death in 1954. R. A. Knox's translation from the Latin Vulgate (NT, 1941; OT, 1949; rev. 1955) is a literary masterpiece and retains the charm of a period piece. The Jerusalem Bible (1966), a scholarly and widely appreciated translation, follows the pattern of the French Bible de Jerusalem (1956), produced by the Dominican faculty of the Biblical and Archaeological School in Jerusalem; a revision, the New Jerusalem Bible, appeared in 1985.

The standard English version for Jewish readers during most of the twentieth century was entitled The Holy Scriptures According to the Masoretic Text, published in 1917 under the auspices of the Jewish Publication Society (thus known as JPS). The style was very similar to that of the KJV. A revision, entitled Tanakh, was published in stages (Torah, 1962; Prophets, 1978, Writings, 1982) and released as a whole in 1985. This work is a highly respected version that utilizes the best of Jewish scholarship and a contemporary and idiomatic style.

The New English Bible (NEB) was a completely new translation, not a revision of previously existing versions. The first suggestion for this project came in 1946 from the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland, but it was the joint effort of all the major religious denominations (with the main Bible Societies) in the British Isles, apart from the Roman Catholic church. C. H. Dodd was the general director of the whole translation. The translators were assisted by a panel of advisers on literary and stylistic questions. The NT came out in 1961; the complete Bible (including the Apocrypha), in 1970. As with most earlier translations, this also was greeted with a mixture of praise and criticism. Criticisms of substance were brought under consideration, leading to the Revised English Bible (REB), which appeared in 1989.

The year 1971 saw the completion of The Living Bible, a paraphrase into simple English, the work of one man, Kenneth N. Taylor. It attained widespread popularity, especially among young people, but its free approach also received criticism. In response, the New Living Translation came out in 1996 (rev. 2004), a committee project involving some ninety evangelical scholars from various denominations. Although based on Taylor's work, it is not a paraphrase but a genuine translation that uses "functional equivalence." This term, previously known as "dynamic equivalence," has as its purpose producing the same effect on readers today as the Hebrew and Greek texts produced on the original readers or hearers. The first consistent attempt at a functional-equivalence translation, however, was the Good News Bible, completed in 1976 (the NT had been published ten years earlier under the title Today's English Version or Good News for Modern Man). It has proven to be a very popular version.

The Holman Christian Standard Version, which appeared in 2004, was produced by the Sunday School Board of the Southern Baptist Convention. Intended to serve as an alternative to the NIV (see below), the HCSB is more literal than the NIV but less so than other formal-equivalence versions. It is described as striving for "optimal equivalence" or "precision with clarity." Though following the critical Greek text, the HCSB is unique among modern versions in supplying many alternate readings from the Textus Receptus and the Majority text in its footnotes.

The most widely accepted modern English translation is the New International Version, the work of a team of over one hundred evangelical scholars drawn from most of the English-speaking countries. The NT appeared in 1973 and the entire Bible in 1978, with a minor revision released in 1984. It was advertised as being written in “the language of the common man,” but its idiom is rather more elevated than that of the GNB. The NIV achieved huge success and by the mid-1980s began outselling even the KJV. Twenty-five years after its release over 110 million copies were in print. The NIV’s success is largely due to its balance between formal correspondence and functional equivalence. It is readable yet closer to the cadence of the KJV tradition than other meaning-based versions.

Today’s New International Version (TNIV) updated the NIV in light of advances in biblical scholarship, striving also for greater accuracy and clarity. About 7 percent of the NIV was altered, with approximately one third of these changes related to gender. The NT was released in 2001 and the whole Bible in 2005.

A new revision of the NIV, intended to replace both the 1984 NIV and the TNIV, is scheduled for publication in 2011.

Bichri. See BICHRI.

Bicri. bik’ri (Heb. bikrî H1152, “firstborn” or “youthful”). Also Bichri; TNIV Bikri. Father of SHEBA, the Benjamite who rebelled against DAVID (2 Sam. 20:1-22). Because the name has a gentilic form, some scholars believe that Bicri refers to a clan rather than a person, possibly referring to the descendants of Benjamin’s son BEKER. See also BERITES.

Bidkar. bid’kahr (Heb. bidqar H982, derivation uncertain). A military officer who sided with JEHU in his revolt and who assisted him at the slaying of King Joram (2 Ki. 9:25; see JEHORAM).

bier. This term is used in English Bibles in the accounts of the funerals of ABNER and King ASA (2 Sam. 3:31; 2 Chr. 16:14) and of the widow’s son at NAIN (Lk. 7:14 KJV and other versions; NIV, “coffin”). The bier was an open bed or litter set in a bedroom where the body was placed for public viewing, while around the room hired mourners kept up lamentation. The body was carried to the grave on the same open stretcher, just as in poorer Muslim funerals the corpse is carried on boards.

Bigtha, Bigthan, Bigthana. big´thuh, big´thuhn, big´thuh-nuh (Heb. bigtā › H960, bigtan H961, bigtānā › H962, possibly from Pers. bagadâ or bagadâna, “gift of God”). The name of one or two EUNUCHS or officers in the court of XERXES (Ahasuerus). The three names occur respectively in Esth. 1:10; 2:1; 6:2. In the last two references, Bigthan and Bigthana are certainly one and the same (the NIV uses “Bigthana” in both passages); in them he and Teresh are described as “two of the king’s officers [lit., eunuchs] who guarded the doorway” and who had conspired to assassinate the king (they were subsequently hanged, 2:23). In the first reference, Bigtha, who may be the same person, is listed as one of the seven eunuch chamberlains instructed by the king to bring Queen VASHTI to the royal feast.

Bigvai. big´vi (Heb. bigway H958, possibly from Pers. baga, “God”). An Israelite mentioned among leading individuals who returned from BABYLON with ZERUBBABEL (Ezra 2:2; Neh. 7:7). Presumably the same Bigvai (but possibly an ancestor) is then listed as the head of a family that numbered more than 2,000 (Ezra 2:14; Neh. 7:19). Some members of the family came later with EZRA (Ezra 8:14). The name Bigvai also occurs in the list of leaders who signed the covenant with NEHEMIAH (Neh. 10:16); this may be the same person or a representative of the clan. It is possible that two or even three different individuals are intended in these passages

Bikri. See BICRI.

Bildad. bil´dad (Heb. bildad H1161, possibly “[the god] Bel has loved”; cf. ELDAD). One of the three friends of JOB who came to comfort him but who really added to his grief (Job 2:11; 8:1; 18:1; 25:1; 42:9). He is called a “Shuhite,” which may mean that he was descended from a son of ABRAHAM and KETURAH named SHUAH (Gen. 25:2); thus Bildad was possibly a member of an Aramean tribe of nomads who lived SE of Palestine (25:6; see ARAM). Three chapters (Job 8; 18; 25) are filled with Bildad’s speeches, in which he shows himself blustering and relatively kind as he emphasizes the justice of God.

Bileam. bil´ee-uhm (Heb. bil‘ām H1190, meaning uncertain; cf. BALAAM). One of the Levitical cities given to the descendants of KOHATH in the territory of the tribe of MANASSEH (1 Chr. 6:70; many scholars emend GATH RIMMON to Bileam in the parallel passage, Josh. 21:25). It is probably the same as IBLEAM, identified with modern Khirbet Bel‘ameh, 12 mi. (19 km.) SE of MEGIDDO.

Bilgah. bil'guh (Heb. bilgâ H1159, “gleam, cheerfulness”). (1) The head of the fifteenth division of priests in the time of DAVID (1 Chr. 24:14).

(2) A leader among the priests who returned from the EXILE with ZERUBBABEL and who served in the days of JESHUA (Neh. 12:5; cf. v. 7). It is possible that he gave his name to the priestly family headed by Shammua (v. 18). In addition, Bilgah is probably to be identified with BILGAI, who affixed his seal to the covenant of NEHEMIAH (10:8).

Bilgai. bil'gi (Heb. bilgay H1160, “gleam, cheerfulness”). One of the priests who sealed the covenant of NEHEMIAH (Neh. 10:8); probably the same as BILGAH #2.

Bilhah (person). bil'huh (Heb. bilhāh H1167, possibly “carefree”). A slave girl given by LABAN to his daughter RACHEL (Gen. 29:29). Because Rachel was barren, she became jealous of her sister LEAH, and in order to build her own family she gave Bilhah to JACOB as a concubine. Bilhah bore Jacob two sons, whom Rachel named DAN and NAPHTALI, thus claiming them as her own (30:1-8; 35:25; 46:25). Bilhah later engaged in incest with REUBEN (35:22).

Bilhah (place). bil'huh (Heb. bilhāh H1168, possibly “carefree”). One of the towns inhabited by the clan of SHIMEI, descendant of SIMEON (1 Chr. 4:29). Its location is unknown, but it is often identified with BAALAH (Josh. 15:29) and BALAH (19:3).

Bilhan. bil'han (Heb. bilhān H1169, possibly “foolish”). (1) Son of EZER and grandson of SEIR the HORITE; he probably became the progenitor of a clan in EDMON (Gen. 36:27; 1 Chr. 1:42).

(2) Son of JEDIAEL and grandson (or more distant descendant) of BENJAMIN; he was also the father of seven men who became warriors and heads of families (1 Chr. 7:10-11).

bill. This English term is used by the KJV and other versions in the expression “bill of divorce(ment)” (Deut. 24:1-3; Isa. 50:1; Jer. 3:8; cf. also Mk. 10:4 KJV). The NIV uses the term “certificate.” DIVORCE consisted of placing such a document in the hands of the rejected wife. The term “bill” is also used by most versions in the parable of the unjust steward (Lk. 16:6-7). The document referred to was of varied detail, given by the recipient of goods or property in acknowledgment of debt and obligation; it was a receipt. The rascally steward of Jesus' parable handed the documents back to the debtors and secured, in their own handwriting, a note of diminished obligation.

Bilshan. bil'shan (Heb. billēšān H1193, perhaps "inquirer"). An Israelite mentioned among leading individuals who returned from Babylon with ZERUBBABEL (Ezra 2:2; Neh. 7:7).

Bimhal. bim'hal (Heb. bimhāl H1197, perhaps "son of circumcision"). Son of Japhlet and descendant of ASHER (1 Chr. 7:33). He is listed among the tribal "heads of families, choice men, brave warriors and outstanding leaders" (v. 40).

binding and loosing. The carrying of a key or keys was a symbol of the delegated power of opening and closing. In Matt. 16:19 our Lord gave the "power of the keys" to PETER, and Peter's use of the keys is narrated in what may be called the "three stages of Pentecost." On the Day of PENTECOST (Acts 2:14-40) Peter preached the first Christian sermon and opened "the kingdom of heaven" to what became a Hebrew-Christian church; then, with JOHN THE APOSTLE, he went to SAMARIA (8:14-17) and opened the same "kingdom" to the Samaritans; still later in the house of CORNELIUS (10:44-48) he opened it to the Gentiles. Thus, the church became universal. The medieval teaching about Peter standing at the gate of heaven to receive or reject souls of men has no basis in biblical teaching.

Binea. bin'ee-uh (Heb. bin ʿā H1232, derivation uncertain). Son of Moza and a descendant of King SAUL through JONATHAN (1 Chr. 8:37; 9:43).

Binnui. bin'yoo-i (Heb. binnûy H1218, possibly short form BENAIAH, "Yahweh has built"). See also BANI. (1) Father of NOADIAH; the latter was a LEVITE appointed to the job of supervising the weighing of the gold and silver vessels that EZRA had brought from BABYLON (Ezra 8:33).

(2) Son (or descendant) of HENADAD; he repaired a section of the wall of Jerusalem and was among those who sealed the covenant of NEHEMIAH (Neh. 3:24; 10:9). Binnui was probably also the ruler of one of the half-districts of KEILAH (3:18 NIV, NRSV; the MT has BAVVAI [cf. KJV], likely a scribal error).

(3) The ancestor or head of a family that returned from the EXILE with ZERUBBABEL (Neh. 7:15; called Bani in Ezra 2:10).

(4) The ancestor of some Israelites who had married foreign wives (Ezra 10:38; he may be the same as the man called Bani in v. 34).

(5) One of the Levites who returned from the exile with Zerubbabel (Neh. 12:8; some scholars believe he may be the same as the man called Bani in 9:4-5).

(6) One of the descendants of PAHATH-MOAB who had married foreign wives (Ezra 10:30). Some identify this man with #4 above.

birds. PALESTINE is the home of some 375 kinds of birds, of which perhaps 25 are peculiar to that region. The Bible mentions about 50, using Hebrew or Greek names that can sometimes be identified with particular species of the present. Birds are mentioned in more than two-thirds of the biblical books. In English versions of the Bible there are often differences in the translations of the names of birds. Sometimes the identification of some creature as a bird has been questioned (see, e.g., peacock and night creature below). Where there are differences of translation, comparisons are often made with terms as they occur in different versions, but some of the more speculative translations that occur in only one version have been omitted. While the main aim is to put birds in their biblical context, some brief general details of birds are also given.

bird of prey. The Latin word rapto (“to seize and carry off”) is the root for the general description of birds of prey as raptors, a group that includes some of the largest and strongest birds, all with hook-tipped beaks and sharp, curving claws (talons). ABRAHAM drove away birds of prey from his sacrifice (Gen. 15:11); this is the Bible’s first reference to these troublesome creatures. JOB reflected that no bird of prey knew the hidden path of a mine of precious metals (Job 28:7). ISAIAH’s prophecy against CUSH (Isa. 18:6) shows knowledge of the habits of birds of prey—which must also obey the call of God (46:11).

bittern. A wading bird of the heron family, equipped with a long pointed bill used for spearing fish, frogs, and other prey. Its speckled plumage aids camouflage in the bittern's marshland environment, where it easily blends with reeds and other plant life. With its somewhat mournful call, the bittern was considered a melancholy creature and therefore likely to live in places far from human habitation, in the wasteland that followed the downfall of EDOM (Isa. 34:11 KJV) or the decay of BABYLON (14:23 KJV). NINEVEH would suffer a similar fate, its terrain becoming a home for the bittern (Zeph. 2:14 KJV). The RSV gives the alternative renderings "porcupine" and "hedgehog." The NIV translates this word "owl" (Isa. 14:23) or specifies a variety of owl (Isa. 34:11; Zeph. 2:14); such translations are more likely, given the desolation that might be expected to follow the prophesied catastrophes.

buzzard. A general description of any of a large number of heavily built hawks, mainly genus Buteo. With its short, broad wings and ability to soar, the buzzard is quite easily recognized. The European variety, Buteo buteo, is found from Scandinavia to the Mediterranean. The American use of "buzzard" is more widely applied to many types of hawk and vulture. Their main prey consists of small animals and insects, though the buzzard may occasionally attack small birds. It is included by the NRSV in the lists of unclean birds, where the NIV uses "red kite" (Lev. 11:14; Deut. 14:13).

carrion bird. EZEKIEL declared that the enemies of Israel would be given "as food to all kinds of carrion birds" (Ezek. 39:4), the reference being to a variety of flesh-eating birds. In addition, the NRSV uses "carrion vulture" to render a Hebrew term that the NIV understands as a reference to the osprey (Lev. 11:18; Deut. 14:17).

chicken. Descended from the wild red jungle fowl of SE Asia, the domestic chicken or fowl is seen in many varieties throughout the world. It is mainly bred for food, the eggs of the female being a useful source of protein. Our Lord observed the hen's care of its chicks as a striking example of the concern he felt for JERUSALEM (Matt. 23:37; Lk. 13:34). Immature males, cockerels, are usually bred for food purposes, mature males for breeding.

cormorant. A diving seabird of the Phalacrocoracidae family, equipped with a long neck and body that can reach a length of 3 ft. (1 m.). Although fast and powerful in flight—which is low over water—the cormorant has a rather laborious takeoff. With its diet of fish caught in short dives, the bird's hooked bill is ideal. Under water the cormorant swims with its feet only, while striking at its prey. Breeding harmoniously in colonies, the cormorant has been tamed in the Orient and trained to catch fish for its human owners. Because of its flesh-eating habits, the cormorant is included in the list of prohibited birds (Lev. 11:17; Deut. 14:17). The KJV uses “cormorant” also to render a Hebrew word of uncertain meaning in Isa. 34:11 and Zeph. 2:14.

crane. Any member of the Gruidae family of long-necked, long-legged wading birds, found throughout the world except for South America. The crane somewhat resembles the heron, but is larger and has a heavier bill, a partly naked head, and more compact plumage. When flying, it stretches its long neck forward, its stilt-like legs trailing behind. The crane's croak, or honk, may be heard over distances of several miles and is unmistakable. According to the KJV, HEZEKIAH's lament over his sickness was compared by Isaiah to the chatter of a crane, as if the king spoke loudly of his affliction, then fell away into muttering (Isa. 38:14); the NIV and other versions, however, use “swift” in this passage (cf. also Jer. 8:7 KJV).

cuckoo. This term (in the form “cuckow”) is used by the KJV in the lists of unclean birds (Lev. 11:16; Deut. 14:15), but the Hebrew word is generally thought to refer to the sea gull.

dove, pigeon. The dove is a medium-sized bird of the family Columbidae, to which the pigeon also belongs, the latter being a somewhat larger bird. Domestic pigeons are descended from the rock dove, Columba livia, and a strong resemblance may be noted to the wild variety. A white domestic pigeon is usually called “the dove of peace,” reproduction drawings showing a twig in its beak, commemorating the dispatch of the dove from the ark by NOAH (Gen. 8:8-12). Although not outstanding in its appearance, having a short neck and legs, nor in its cooing cry, the dove inspired the psalmist to write that he would indeed possess the wings of the dove (Ps. 55:6). In God's good time, the believer will share such glory as may be compared to the wings of the dove being sheathed with silver, its feathers with shining gold (68:13).

Some biblical references to the dove probably refer to the turtle dove (see turtle dove) as in Cant. 2:12, where the cooing of doves was associated with the season of singing. Hezekiah in contrast mourned about his illness, like a mourning dove (Isa. 38:14; cf. 59:11). Ezekiel prophesied that those people who escaped the sword in the city would moan like doves of the valley (Ezek. 7:16). Yet help was promised to those who flew like doves to their nests (Isa. 60:8); that is, those who returned to their true home, which is God. The security of the dove in the clefts of the rocks is noted in Cant. 2:14. It was not, however, reckoned to be a very intelligent bird, and EPHRAIM was compared to one because of the nation's lack of good sense (Hos. 7:11). Yet the NT spoke of the HOLY SPIRIT descending like a dove onto the head of Jesus Christ at his baptism (Matt. 3:18). This divinely given "dove" was indeed of power and grace, in contrast to the doves sold as merchandise in the temple, for ceremonial purification. The OT record clearly shows that doves were allowed for sacrifice because of their abundance: the temple authorities had made it hard for people to make their sacrifice by "cornering the market" in sacrificial doves. Jesus Christ charged his followers to be as shrewd as snakes and as innocent as doves (10:16), reflecting a prevailing public opinion of the bird.

eagle. For many centuries the eagle has been adopted as a symbol of power and majesty, appropriately, it might be said, in view of its powers and regal appearance. Carnivorous, equipped with long talons and remarkably keen eyesight, the eagle is a member of the Accipitridae family and is monogamous—mating for life—and using the same nest every year. Nests are built in inaccessible places, far from human and animal marauders. For the most part, the eagle's diet consists of live prey, not carrion, and stories of the swift appearance of an eagle, carrying away a small animal (a baby lamb, for example), are commonly heard among shepherds. Although the eagle is superbly equipped for flying because of its exceptionally broad wings, it is somewhat ponderous when pursuing prey. Thus it uses a sudden descent and the element of surprise, these characteristics being duly noted by the bird-watchers of Bible times. An eagle somewhat resembles a vulture, but it has a fully feathered head and, as already noted, prefers live prey. Among the many types found today is the crowned eagle, which may be some 3 ft. (1 m.) long and represents Africa's largest eagle; the snake-hunting harrier eagles of Europe, Asia, and Africa; and the lightly built hawk eagles found in the Mediterranean area and S Asia. Eagles were included among the unclean foods listed in Lev. 11.

Although in normal circumstances the town-dweller in Bible times might see an eagle only rarely, such an appearance was not to be forgotten. Indeed, the people of Israel were reminded that they had been borne from Egyptian captivity, as it were, on the wings of eagles (Exod. 19:4; Deut. 32:11). In similar praise, the psalmist declares that his youth was renewed like that of the eagle (Ps. 103:5). Isaiah promises similar power to those who hope in the Lord (Isa. 40:31). Two eagle's wings were provided to transport the woman mentioned in Rev. 12 to the place prepared for her in the desert. The power of the eagle was noted earlier; for example, the sudden descent of the eagle on its prey was appropriately compared to an attack of a nation that would be "like an eagle swooping down" on a careless Israel (Deut. 28:49). Jeremiah prophesied in a similar vein, referring to an enemy equipped with horses swifter than eagles (Jer. 4:13). Yet the Lord would prevail even against those enemies who built their nest as high as that of the eagle (49:16, echoed in Obad. 4, in reference to Edom).

The face of the eagle was part of EZEKIEL's great vision of living creatures (Ezek. 1:10). Later, Ezekiel used two eagles and a vine in his allegory (ch. 17); appropriately, both eagles were "great" and had "powerful wings." DANIEL's dream of four beasts included a lion with the wings of an eagle (Dan. 7:4)—a reference to the mighty kingdom of NEBUCHADNEZZAR. Yet, among the warlike similes—necessary to warn a careless Israel—there is graciousness indeed, as that shown to SAUL and JONATHAN, who were in life swifter than eagles (2 Sam. 1:23). Job felt the passage of his days on earth as swift-passing as an eagle swooping on its prey (Job 9:26). In a no-less-reflective mood, the author of Proverbs believed that riches would fly away like an eagle (Prov. 23:5).

falcon. Found worldwide, this member of the Falconidae family is equipped with long, pointed wings, a powerful hooked beak, and a long tail. Species of falcon include the peregrine, kestrel, merlin, and South American caracara. Some nine classes of falcon were known in Bible times. The NIV and other versions use "falcon" to render Hebrew ṣayyāh H370 (Job 28:7), a word elsewhere translated "black kite" (Lev. 11:14 et al.). The NIV uses it also to render dayyā H1901 (Deut. 14:13; Isa. 34:15), apparently a general term referring to various unclean birds of prey.

fowl. The KJV often uses this term with reference to birds in general (Gen. 1:20-22 et al.), but in modern speech it usually means "domestic fowl" or "poultry." We read that "choice fowl" was included in Solomon's inventory of daily provisions (1 Ki. 4:23), while the 150 Jews and officials who shared Nehemiah's table enjoyed meat of poultry as well as of oxen and choice sheep (Neh. 5:18). That people in Bible times set traps for wild fowl is clearly indicated in Ps. 91:3 and 124:7, where deliverance from one's enemy is compared to the escape of a bird from a fowler's snare.

gull. An aquatic bird of the family Laridae, characterized by long wings and webbed feet. The NIV uses this term in the lists of unclean birds (Lev. 11:16; Deut. 14:15; NRSV, “sea gull”; KJV, “cuckow”). Ten true gulls and eight other members of the family are recorded in Palestine; five are only rare stragglers, but the others migrate. The winter visitors are the commonest, including lesser black-backed and black-headed gulls; their flocks may run into hundreds and they may be seen on the Mediterranean and Red Sea coasts, on the Lake of Galilee, and around the great complexes of fishponds. Only the herring gull nests in Palestine, along with the black, common, and little terns. Most gulls are scavengers and would certainly rank as unclean.

hawk. A general name applied to several small to medium-sized diurnal birds of prey, having short, rounded wings, hooked beaks, and claws. Kites, buzzards, harriers, falcons, and caracaras are included in the generic description, together with other members of the genus Accipiter. All hawks were unclean and were not to be eaten (Lev. 11:16; Deut. 14:15). The impressive flying abilities of the hawk were compared to those of the eagle as the Lord answered Job out of the storm (Job 39:26-27). Found worldwide, hawks usually nest in trees, though some, such as the marsh hawk, prefer a ground-level nest site in a suitable grassy environment. Others nest in cliffs.

heron. Listed among the unclean birds (Lev. 11:19; Deut. 14:18), the heron is a long-necked, long-legged wading bird of the Ardeidae family, breeding in colonies with others in suitably high trees. Found throughout the world, herons are most concentrated in tropical regions, usually in marshy terrain. During biblical times large numbers of them populated the swamps surrounding Lake Huleh, and they were common also on the Jordan and the Kishon and on the coastal regions of Palestine. The heron’s diet consists of fish, frogs, and other reptiles, caught while wading unobtrusively in shallow water. With its sharp-pointed, long and straight bill, the heron is ideally equipped to catch its prey.

hoopoe. A solitary and somewhat timid bird, possessing a slender, down-curved bill and a long black-tipped erect crest, the hoopoe is found from southern Europe and Africa to SE Asia. It secures its diet of insects by thrusting its bill into the ground and foraging. This, together with its habit of fouling its own nest, may show why it was considered unclean (Lev. 11:19; Deut. 14:18 [KJV, “lapwing”]).

ibis. A wading bird similar to the stork. The term is used once by the RSV (Lev. 11:17), but the Hebrew word is more properly translated “(great) owl,” as the RSV itself does elsewhere (Deut. 14:16; Isa. 34:11). See owl.

kite. A member of the hawk family, equipped with a short beak and long, pointed wings, the kite is found worldwide in warm regions. Its diet consists mostly of carrion and small birds, though some kites live on insects. Lightly built, the kite flies by a slow flapping of its wings and by effective gliding action. Its scavenging characteristics may account for its inclusion in the list of prohibited birds (Lev. 11:14; Deut. 14:13 [KJV, “glede”]). American kites include the swallow-tailed kite, a black-and-white bird some 2 ft. (60 cm.) in length, and the white-tailed kite, one of the few American birds of prey increasing in population.

lapwing. See hoopoe.

lilith. See night creature.

little owl. See owl.

night creature. The Hebrew word lîlîṭ H4327 occurs only once in a passage describing the terrible desolation that will befall EDOM (Isa. 34:14). Because most (or perhaps all) of the other creatures mentioned in the context are real animals or birds thought to inhabit waste solitudes, this word has been rendered variously as “screech owl” (KJV), “night hag” (RSV), “night-jar” (NEB), “night creatures” (NIV). The NRSV and some other versions use the transliteration “Lilith,” referring to a female Mesopotamian deity. More likely, the reference could be to any of those nocturnal birds thought to bring omens, or to which superstition might be attached.

nighthawk. A small-beaked, insect-eating bird with impressive flying abilities. The name is used by the KJV and other versions in the lists of prohibited birds (Lev. 11:16; Deut. 14:15 KJV), but it is probable that some kind of owl is in view (cf. NIV, “screech owl”).

osprey. A large bird of the hawk family, the osprey is found in Europe, Asia, and North America. It has dark plumage with white underparts. Feeding on fish, the osprey is well-endowed with roughened pads on its feet in order to grasp its slippery prey. “Osprey” is the rendering of the NRSV and other versions for Hebrew ʿozniyyâ H6465 (Lev. 11:13 and Deut. 14:12, where the NIV has “black vulture”), while the NIV uses it to render rāḥām H8164 (Lev. 11:18 and Deut. 14:17, where the NRSV has “carrion vulture”).

ostrich. The largest of all birds, up to 8 ft. (2.5 m.) tall, this nonflying, fast-running bird of Africa and Arabia is mainly vegetarian, able to do without water for considerable periods. Its long legs have two toes on each foot, and its long, featherless neck accounts for about half the total body weight. It is well adapted for its life in hot, dusty areas. In the wild, the ostrich lives in flocks and enjoys the company of other grazing animals. Job’s essay on the ostrich (Job 39:13-18) confirms a keen observation of the bird. The NRSV and other versions have “ostrich” in several passages where a more likely rendering is “owl” (Lev. 11:16 et al.).

owl. Any member of the order Strigiformes, nocturnal birds of prey found throughout the world, in three families: typical owls (Strigidae), barn and grey owls (Tytonidae), and bay owls (Phodilidae). Equipped with a short, hooked beak set in a broad head, the owl has disc-shaped, forward-looking eyes, fringed with stiff feathers. Hearing and vision are acutely developed, fitting the owl for its nocturnal hunting pursuits. Prey consists of small birds and rodents. Hebrew names for the owl reflect the bird’s own cry and nature. Thus Job confessed that he had become a companion of owls (Job 30:29; NRSV and other versions, “ostriches”), and the psalmist felt that he had become like an owl among the ruins (Ps. 102:6). Isaiah declared that the great owl, desert owl, and screech owl would nest in the ruins of Edom (Isa. 34:11), though the NIV footnote points out that precise identification is uncertain. Isaiah also referred to the owls nesting among the ruins of Edom (34:15). Several kinds of owls are listed among the unclean birds (Lev. 11:16-18; Deut. 14:15-17). One of them, the “little owl,” is the most common owl in Palestine; it is noteworthy in its seeking of isolation, though its hoarse cry announces its presence to travelers.

partridge. A member of the order of birds to which chickens belong. Because of their swift and sneaky running, they are excellent game birds. When Saul was hunting him, David compared himself to a partridge (1 Sam. 26:20). It was supposed that partridges robbed eggs from other birds and hatched them, a symbol of getting riches unfairly (Jer. 17:11).

peacock. A male game bird, Paro cristatus, from India and SE Asia, best known for its handsome and long tail feathers, brought into a fan-shaped display during courtship. With their brightly colored bodies, peacocks were shown off in any self-respecting court in the ancient world and were a common feature of English country houses until fairly recent times. According to the KJV and other versions, large numbers of peacocks were imported for Solomon's palace (1 Ki. 10:22; 2 Chr. 9:21), but here the NIV prefers the alternate rendering "baboons" (see ANIMALS). (The KJV also has "peacock" in Job 39:13a, but the reference there is to the ostrich, a word that the KJV incorrectly uses at the end of the verse.)

pelican. A gregarious web-footed water bird, equipped with a very large bill, beneath which is suspended a pouch for storing fish. The white pelican of Africa and Asia is the best-known species, though pelicans may be found in many parts of the world. With a wingspan of up to 10 ft. (3 m.) and a length up to 6 ft. (almost 2 m.), the pelican is one of the world's largest birds. Its pursuit and capture of fish is helped by the webs between all four toes. The KJV and some modern versions use "pelican" to render Hebrew qā ʾat H7684 in the lists of unclean birds (Lev. 11:18; Deut. 14:17; cf. also Ps. 102:6). However, the contexts in which the Hebrew term occurs (Ps. 102:6; Isa. 34:11; Zeph. 2:14) make this meaning unlikely, and many scholars believe that the word refers to a type of owl.

quail. A small migratory game bird, in some 130 species. The quail lives at ground level, in pasture, scrub-land, arable crops, etc. Ready to fly short distances at a comparatively rapid speed, the quail has some similarity to the partridge but is somewhat smaller, reaching a length of only about 7 in. (18 cm.). Like the partridge, the quail is a dust-bather and shares a similar diet of fruit, leaves, and insects. In Bible times the quail was seen in large flocks, traveling most often over short distances. Its abundance as food for the Israelites in the wilderness came as large numbers of the Coturnix quail fell exhausted to the ground following the birds' long flight from Africa, where they had spent the winter (Exod. 16:13; Ps. 105:40). The abundance is graphically described in Num. 11:31. The flesh of the quail is delicious, as are its eggs. North American quail include the California or valley quail, as well as the desert quail—both being important game birds possessing forward curling head plume and somewhat stronger bills than are found in species of Europe, Asia, and Africa.

raven. This large bird—the male of which can reach a length of 2 ft. (60 cm.)—is a member of the crow family. It is found especially in the northern hemisphere in cliffs and mountainous terrain. In urban areas it is seen as a scavenger and will eat all kinds of animal flesh including carrion. Its head and shoulders are larger than those of a crow, and its soaring action is similar to that of a buzzard. The raven is listed among the unclean birds (Lev. 11:15; Deut. 14:14). Ravens were themselves fed by the Lord (Job 38:41). Such birds would nest in the ruins of Edom, together with other birds of desolation (Isa. 34:11). Jesus referred to the ravens in his encouragement of the disciples and their immense significance to his heavenly Father (Lk. 12:24).

Noah is said to have sent a raven from the ark to ascertain if a landfall might be made (Gen. 8:7), apparently forgetting that, as the raven was a bird of prey, it was unlikely to return, given the abundance of carrion exposed by the receding waters. Nor did the raven have the homing instinct of the dove that subsequently carried out Noah's errand. The record of Noah's dispatch of the raven and its apparent disloyalty, together with the bird's deep hoarse croak, accounts for some old beliefs. Proverbs 30:17 declares that any who mocked their fathers might expect to have their eye pecked out by the ravens of the valley. Yet ravens were used by God to feed ELLIJAH (1 Ki. 17:4), though some scholars have suggested here an alternative rendering to have Elijah fed by "human ravens" (itinerant peddlers). Another suggestion is that Elijah was fed by citizens of the nearby town of Orbo. However, ravens are ever generous in feeding their young, leaving some nests crowded with meat that could be eaten by a human being (after cooking or other preparation).

ravenous bird. See bird of prey.

rooster. In biblical times its early morning crowing was associated with the start of a new day (Matt. 13:35). The sound had a lamentable meaning for PETER, who denied his Lord before the cock crowed, according to Jesus' prophecy (26:74; Mk. 14:30; Lk. 22:34, 61; Jn. 13:38; 18:27).

screech owl. See owl.

sparrow. A small, short-beaked, seed-eating bird—noisy, active, and prolific. The house sparrow, member of genus Passer, possesses brown/gray streaked plumage and was originally native to northern Europe and Asia. It has been introduced into Australasia and North America, where it is sometimes called the "English sparrow." In fact, it is classed by ornithologists as a finch, not as a sparrow. True sparrows, with other finches, buntings, and grosbeaks, are members of the family Fringillidae, a large group with many subdivisions. In Bible times protection to the sparrow was provided within the temple precincts (Ps. 84:3). Sparrows were very cheap to buy, yet even this seemingly unimportant bird was of great concern to the Lord, without whose knowledge no sparrow fell to the ground, but who accounted people far more highly (Matt. 10:29, 31; Lk. 12:6, 7).

stork. A large migratory bird of the Ciconiidae family, nesting in trees. Equipped with long legs, neck, and bill, the stork usually lives on a diet of small animals caught at ground level. Some species, including the maribou stork of Africa and the adjutant stork of India, feed on carrion. Nesting characteristics of the stork “in the pine trees” were noted by the psalmist (Ps. 104:17), and Jeremiah confirmed that the stork knew its appointed seasons (Jer. 8:7). Here, as elsewhere in the passage, Jeremiah contrasted the alertness of the bird to natural law with the carelessness of God’s people. Zechariah’s vision included women equipped with the powerful wings of a stork (Zech. 5:9). The stork was included in the list of prohibited birds (Lev. 11:19; Deut. 14:18).

swallow. An insect-eating bird of the Hirundinidae family, small and with a long forked tail and long wings. Among the most agile of birds, it captures its insect prey while in flight. Its skill in executing maneuvers is noted in Prov. 26:2, while the piercing chatterlike call of the swallow was compared to the chattering of Hezekiah during his illness (Isa. 38:14; NIV, “swift”). Five species are still found in Bible lands. Two of these are known also in the United States—the bank swallow and the barn swallow, the latter recognized by its deeply forked tail feathers.

swan. This term is used by the KJV to translate a Hebrew word of uncertain meaning rendered “water hen” in the NRSV and “white owl” in the NIV (Lev. 11:18; Deut. 14:16).

swift. Any member of the Apodidae family of migratory birds, resembling swallows and having long wings reminiscent of the shape of a scythe. That the swift knew the time of its seasons (i.e., for migration) was confirmed by Jeremiah (Jer. 8:7). The record of Hezekiah’s illness also refers to the swift (Isa. 38:14). Some versions prefer the rendering “swallow.”

thrush. A term applied to many species of small, plain-colored, singing birds of the family Turdidae. It is used by the NIV to render a Hebrew word that occurs only twice (Isa. 38:14; Jer. 8:7).

turtledove. Found in S Europe and in Africa, the turtledove—a wild pigeon of migratory habit (Streptopelia turtur)—is similar to the “mourning dove,” which sings early in spring. Canticles 2:12 probably refers to such a bird. These were the birds that, abundant in number, were readily acquired for ceremonial sacrifice (Gen. 15:9). Purification after childbirth involved sacrifice of this bird or a young pigeon (Lev. 12:6-8). It was used in ceremonial cleansing (Num. 6:10). Translations vary in Jer. 8:7.

vulture. A large carrion-eating bird equipped with a hooked beak and strong claws. Some twenty species in the order Falconiformes have featherless heads and necks, as well as large crops. The Andean condor is probably the best known of vultures found in the American continent, though vultures exist in central Europe, Asia, and parts of Africa. Also found in America is the black vulture, sometimes called “black buzzard” or “carrion crow,” and the king vulture. One of the largest and heaviest birds in the world, the cinereous (gray colored) vulture (Aegypius monachus) has a wingspread of some 9 ft. (3 m.), is about 3 ft. (1 m.) long, and weighs over 27 lbs. (12 kg.). It is found in southern Europe, northern and eastern Africa, and the Middle East to Afghanistan and India. Another impressive member of the species is the Nubian or lappet-faced vulture found in Africa.

Little seems to discourage these large birds in their search for food, and the people of Bible times were accustomed to seeing vultures—and not merely on the battlefield or where carrion was plentiful. Sometimes they would descend to make a raid in some town. Some five species were known in those times. The bearded vulture was easily identified by its full-feathered head and black moustache feathers. The Egyptian vulture was a smaller bird with white feathers on its head, black flight feathers, and a weak, slender beak. Sometimes called Pharaoh’s chicken, the Egyptian vulture grew to a length of about 2 ft. (60 cm.). Three further types found in the area were all black and virtually bald. The Mosaic law prohibited eating the vulture (Lev. 11:13; Deut. 14:12 [KJV, “ossifrage”]). Jesus reminded his hearers that vultures eagerly gather around a carcass (Matt. 24:28; Lk. 17:37). Translations vary in Isa. 34:15.

Birsha. bihr’shuh (Heb. birša ^c H1407, possibly “in [or son of] wickedness”). King of GOMORRAH who, with his allies, rebelled against KEDORLAOMER and was defeated (Gen. 14:2).

birth. The bringing forth of a separate life into the world. Childbirth is often accompanied by rending pain, but Gen. 3:16 seems to indicate that such travail was a direct result of the entrance of SIN. Apparently the ancient Hebrew women went through labor more easily than the Egyptians did (Exod. 1:19). The day of one’s birth can be regarded, in a sense, as the most important day of his or her life, and so the celebration of birthdays goes back to very ancient times (Gen. 40:20). The Hebrew ceremonies connected with childbirth are given in Lev. 12. The permission to the poor to offer “a pair of turtledoves or two young pigeons” in place of a lamb (Lk. 2:24) gives touching testimony to the comparative poverty of Mary, the mother of Jesus. Our Lord, in Jn. 3:3-6, makes a clear distinction between the first and second births of a regenerate person; and when this distinction is applied, it seems almost to make two different species of the human race: the once-born and the regenerate (see REGENERATION). The former are depraved, and unless they repent they are destined for judgment (Heb. 9:27; 10:31); the latter are being made partakers in the divine nature (2 Pet. 1:4) and are destined for glory.

birth, new. See REGENERATION.

birth, virgin. See VIRGIN BIRTH.

birthright. From time immemorial the FIRSTBORN son has been given privileges above those of his younger brothers. This is illustrated today by the order of succession to the throne (in Britain, for instance). Among the Israelites God had a special claim on the firstborn, at least from the time of the EXODUS, when he destroyed the firstborn of Egypt and claimed those of Israel by right of redemption (Exod. 13:2, 12-16). The birthright included a double portion of the inheritance (Deut. 21:15-17) and the privilege of priesthood (Exod. 13:1-2; 24:5); but in Israel God later set apart the tribe of LEVI instead of the firstborn for that service. (Note Num. 3:38-51, where the Levites are about the same in number as the firstborn of Israel.) ESAU lost his birthright by selling it to JACOB for some stew, and no regret could undo the loss he had brought on himself. (See Gen. 25:27-34; Heb. 12:16; and compare the destinies of Israel and of Edom; see also Obad. 17-18.) REUBEN lost his birthright through sin, and his brothers SIMEON and Levi lost theirs through violence; and so the blessing came to JUDAH (Gen. 49:3-10).

birthstool. This English term is used in some versions of the Bible to render Hebrew ṣobnayim H78, lit., “double stones,” in one passage (Exod. 1:16; NIV, “delivery stool”). It apparently refers to a type of bench on which women sat while giving birth. The Hebrew word implies that it consisted of a pair of stones. Each stone would support a thigh, and the gap would allow the midwife to effect the delivery. According to a number of scholars, however, the word refers to the genitalia, which the Hebrew midwives were told to look at to determine the sex of the baby (if it was a boy, they were to kill him).

Birzaith. bihr-zay’ith (Heb. birzāyit H1365, “well of olive oil”). KJV Birzavith. Son of Malkiel and great-grandson of ASHER (1 Chr. 7:31). Some scholars, however, believe that the expression “father of Birzaith” means “founder [or leader] of Birzaith,” in which case the name refers to a town, presumably modern Bir Zeit, about 13 mi. (21 km.) N of JERUSALEM. If so, Malkiel was its “father,” that is, its founder or ruler. It is also possible that Birzaith was indeed a person, but that a town was named from him or populated by his offspring.

Birzavith. bihr-zay´vith. See BIRZAITH.

Bishlam. bish´luhm (Heb. bišlām H1420, perhaps “son of peace”). One of three Persian officials who wrote a letter of complaint against the Jews to King ARTAXERXES (Ezra 4:7). The syntax in this passage is a little unusual, and the SEPTUAGINT renders the word not as a name but as the phrase “in peace,” suggesting to some scholars that the term should be understood in the sense, “with the consent of.”

bishop. The KJV and other versions use this term to render Greek episkopos G2176, which simply means “overseer.” In the NT it evidently refers to the principal officer of the local church, the other being the DEACON (1 Tim. 3:1-7). The title ELDER (or “presbyter”) generally applied to the same officer, “elder” alluding to his age and dignity, and “bishop” to his work of superintendence. As the churches multiplied, the bishop of a larger church would often be given special honor, and so gradually there grew up a hierarchy, all the way from presiding elders to bishops (over groups of churches), then archbishops.

Bishops’ Bible. See BIBLE VERSIONS, ENGLISH.

bit and bridle. This expression is used in English versions to translate two words in Ps. 32:9. Both terms seem to include the whole controlling harness of the animal’s head and thus may be translated “bridle.” In the NT the term chalinós G5903 undoubtedly means “bit” in Jas. 3:3 (cf. 1:26) but “bridle, reins” in Rev. 14:20.

Bithiah. bi-thi´uh (Heb. bityâ H1437, “daughter of Yahweh”). A daughter of PHARAOH who married MERED, a descendant of JUDAH through CALEB (1 Chr. 4:18; NRSV, v. 17). It is not certain whether “Pharaoh” here was an Egyptian king. Some understand “Pharaoh’s daughter” to mean simply “Egyptian lady”; it has also been suggested that “Pharaoh” in this verse could be a Hebrew proper name.

Bithron. bith´ron (Heb. bitrôn H1443, “ravine” or “forenoon”). The KJV, as well as the NIV and other versions, treats “Bithron” as a place name, referring to a valley leading E from the JORDAN to MAHANAIM (2 Sam. 2:29). Some scholars, however, prefer to translate the term as a common noun, either “ravine” or “morning” (cf. NRSV, “the whole forenoon,” opposite “all that night”).

Bithynia. bi-thin´ee-uh (Gk. Bithynia G1049). A region in NW ASIA MINOR fronting on the Black Sea, the Bosphorus, and the Sea of Marmara. PAUL and his companions desired to enter Bithynia with the gospel (Acts 16:6-10), but the HOLY SPIRIT was leading toward Europe, and so they could not enter. However, there were Christians there in the first century (1 Pet. 1:1). At the beginning of the second century the Roman governor Pliny the Younger complained to Emperor Trajan concerning the Christians and asked how to deal with them. Bithynia was settled very early, and its known history goes back past the sixth century B.C. when Croesus made it a part of his kingdom. A king of Bithynia in the third century B.C. invited the Gauls into Asia, so originating GALATIA.

bitter, bitterness. These English terms usually render the Hebrew verb mārar H5352 and its derivatives; in the NT, Greek pikrainō G4393 and derivatives. Israel was commanded at the Feast of Passover to eat bitter herbs with the roast lamb and UNLEAVENED bread (Exod. 12:8). The observance was meant to symbolize the bitterness and agony of their Egyptian servitude (modern rabbis have allowed the eating of horseradish as the fulfillment of this commandment). A technical use is found in the ceremony of the BITTER WATER, which was a ritual test (or ordeal?) for a woman’s faithfulness in the case of a jealous husband (Num. 5:18-27).

In speaking of the moral corruption of the nations in Canaan, MOSES refers to them figuratively as bitter clusters of grapes (Deut. 32:32). The sacred writer records the mental attitude and stern disposition of dethroned DAVID and his followers as “bitter of soul” (lit. trans. of 2 Sam. 17:8; NIV, “fierce”). Jeremiah describes Judah’s wickedness as bitter, so much so that it overwhelms the heart (Jer. 4:18). Amos, in his denunciations of Israel’s sins, predicts the loss of their feasts and music with the replacement by sackcloth and mourning, all of it constituting a bitter day (Amos 8:10). God foretells that his people will be punished by the Babylonians, a “bitter and hasty nation” (Hab. 1:6 KJV; NIV, “ruthless and impetuous people”). The reference is to their inconsiderate and cruel treatment of subject peoples, whom they considered much as the fisherman does his catch.

At SAMARIA the apostle PETER was constrained to rebuke SIMON Magus sternly when he attempted to buy the gift of the HOLY SPIRIT. He accused Simon of being “in the gall of bitterness” (Acts 8:23 NRSV; NIV, “full of bitterness”), an expression intended to awaken the offender to the depth of his depravity and ungodliness. Throughout the epistle to the Hebrews, professing Jewish believers are warned against the “bitter root” (Heb. 12:15), which may refer to any sin which could develop into APOSTASY (cf. also Rom. 3:14; Eph. 4:31; Jas. 3:14). The “waters that had become bitter” (Rev. 8:11) may describe figuratively any disasters yet to befall sinful humanity.

bitter herbs. See BITTER, BITTERNESS; PLANTS (under herbs).

bittern. See BIRDS.

bitter water. A drink consisting of holy water, dust from the TABERNACLE floor, and the ink of a written curse and designed to be used as an “ordeal” to establish the guilt or innocence of a suspected adulteress (Num. 5:11-31). The priest would set the woman “before the LORD,” unbind her hair, and place in her hands the cereal offering. He would then declare a lengthy and frightening oath to which the woman would reply, “Amen, Amen.” The woman was made to drink the mixture of dust and ink, and the cereal was offered up to Yahweh. If she had been unfaithful, the bitter water would cause great pain and distortion of the lower body, and she would be considered accursed by her people. If, on the other hand, the woman was innocent, she would be free to bear children. This ritual seems to have been peculiar to Israel among ANE peoples.

bitumen. A mineral pitch widely scattered over the earth, and one of the best waterproofing substances known. This English word is used by the NRSV to render the Hebrew noun ḥēmār H2819, which occurs three times in the OT (Gen. 11:3; 14:10; Exod. 2:3). The NIV translates this noun with English “tar” (KJV, “slime”). A similar term, “pitch,” is used in most versions to translate other terms (Gen. 6:14; Exod. 2:3; Isa. 34:9). There were great deposits of bitumen or tar near the DEAD SEA and at different places in MESOPOTAMIA. The principal modern source is a great lake of pitch on the island of Trinidad.

Biziothiah. biz’ee-oh-thi’uh (Heb. bizyôtyâ H1026, perhaps “booty of Yahweh”). KJV Bizjothjah. According to the MT, a town in the NEGEV district of JUDAH (Josh. 15:28). Instead of “Beersheba, Biziothiah,” however, many scholars prefer to read “Beersheba and its villages” (cf. LXX and Neh. 11:27).

Bizjothjah. biz-joth’juh. See BIZIOTHIAH.

Biztha, Bizthah. biz'thuh (Heb. bizzēta ▸ H1030, possibly “eunuch” or “bound”). One of the seven EUNUCH chamberlains instructed by XERXES (Ahasuerus), king of Persia, to bring Queen VASHTI to the royal feast (Esth. 1:10).

black. This English term translates various Hebrew words. One of them is applied to horses (Zech. 6:2, 6, here signifying death and famine), to the suitor's locks (Cant. 5:11), and to the sunburnt look of SOLOMON's beloved (1:5; NIV “dark”). A cognate verb describes the state of JOB's skin as it peeled off under the ravages of the boils (Job 30:30). Another verb is used to describe storm-black clouds (1 Ki. 18:45; Jer. 4:28); metaphorically it refers to mourning (Jer. 8:21; Joel 2:6; Nah. 2:10) and is used of JOB's unfaithful friends (6:16). In the NT, “black” can describe the color of hair (Matt. 5:36), horses (Rev. 6:5), the obscuring of the sun (v. 12), and ink (2 Cor. 3:3). See also DARKNESS.

blacksmith. See OCCUPATIONS AND PROFESSIONS.

blasphemy. The act of insulting or showing contempt for someone. To reproach or to bring a railing accusation against any one is bad enough (Jude 9), but to speak lightly or carelessly of God is an especially grievous sin. The third commandment, “You shall not misuse the name of the LORD your God” (Exod. 20:7), was observed so meticulously by the Jews that they would not speak the sacred name YHWH at all, and so no one knows today for certain how it was pronounced (see JEHOVAH). Before his conversion, PAUL blasphemed (1 Tim. 1:13) and tried to force Christians to blaspheme (Acts 26:11). God prescribed that in Israel the punishment for blasphemy would be death by stoning (Lev. 24:10-16). NABOTH was falsely charged with blasphemy and was stoned to death (1 Ki. 21:10-13), as was STEPHEN (Acts 6:11). Stoning was also in the minds of those who charged Jesus with blasphemy (Matt. 9:3; 26:65; Lk. 5:31; Jn. 10:33); what Jesus said about himself would have been blasphemy were it not true. See also UNPARDONABLE SIN.

Blastus. blas'tuhs (Gk. Blastos G1058, “bud, sprout”). The chamberlain of Herod AGRIPPA I, who apparently was easily bribed; the men of TYRE and SIDON used him in approaching the king (Acts 12:20). As the officer in charge of Herod's private quarters, he was in a position to influence the king favorably.

bless, blessing. The Bible states that God blesses nature (Gen. 1:22), mankind (1:28), the Sabbath (2:3), individuals (24:1), and whole nations (Ps. 33:12). The idea is clearly that of a divine announcement of favor; the assurance that God is conferring his grace. On the other hand, when godly men and women “bless” God, they adore him, worship him, and praise him (103:1-2). The same word is used for what worshipers offer to God and for what they seek from him. When we “bless” God, we bring his glories before our mind and respond in worship and adoration; when we ask him to “bless” us, we invite him to call our needs to mind and respond in meeting them.

Godly people by words and actions can bestow blessings on their fellows (Matt. 5:44; 1 Pet. 3:9). In Bible times, men under inspiration bestowed prophetic blessings on their progeny; for example, Noah blessed Japheth and Shem (Gen. 9:26-27), Isaac blessed Jacob and Esau (27:27-29, 39-40), Jacob blessed the tribes of Israel (ch 49), and Moses also blessed them (Deut. 33). We can bless things when we set them apart for sacred use (e.g., 1 Cor. 10:16 KJV).

blessing, cup of. This expression is found only in 1 Cor. 10:16 (NIV, “cup of thanksgiving”), and is best understood in light of the ancient Jewish custom of concluding meals with a prayer of thanksgiving over a CUP of wine. This ritual act acknowledged God as the Giver of all good gifts, and consecrated the meal to the one who ate. Noteworthy is the fact that the third cup of the Jewish Passover feast was also called the “cup of blessing.” Borrowing this expression from Judaism, Paul applied it to the cup of the LORD’S SUPPER. He meant by it, therefore, not the cup that imparts blessing, but the cup over which the Christian gives thanks to God for the death of Christ.

blindness. See DISEASES.

blood. The word occurs over 400 times in the Bible and is especially frequent in LEVITICUS. The circulation of the blood was not known until long after Scripture was written, and for the most part Bible references are directed toward the practical observation that loss of blood leads to loss of vitality and that a draining away of the blood leads to death. Genesis 9:5 says (literally), “Your blood, belonging to your lives, I will seek...from the hand of man...I will seek the life of man.” In this verse “seek blood” is parallel with “seek life,” and both refer to exacting the death penalty. When blood is shed, life is terminated, and the Lord seeks requital for the shedding of blood by demanding the life of the murderer (cf. Gen. 37:26; Ps. 30:9; 58:10). The statement “Your blood be on your own head” (e.g., 2 Sam. 1:16) witnesses to the same understanding of things: a person guilty of murder must pay with his life. Our concern here is not the question of the death penalty, but the way in which the Bible uses “blood” as a metaphor for “death.” When blood is spoken of as the life of the flesh (Gen. 9:4; cf. Lev. 17:11), the meaning is the practical one that flesh and blood in their proper union constitute a living creature, beast or human, but that when they are separated death takes place. The bearing of this truth on the use of blood in sacrificial ritual is most important. For further discussion see SACRIFICE.

bloodguilt. This term (KJV, “bloodguiltiness” in Ps. 51:14) is sometimes used as a rendering of the Hebrew word for BLOOD, dām H1947, in its plural (intensive) form, dāmîm. It occurs only twice in the NIV (Ps. 51:14; Joel 3:21), but more frequently in the NRSV (e.g., Exod. 22:2; Deut. 19:10; 1 Sam. 25:26). In these instances guilt incurred by bloodshed is denoted. The Hebrew term can also be used where other crimes are in view (e.g., Ezek. 18:13).

blue. A color extracted from the mollusk Helix ianthina. The exact color on the fringe of every Hebrew garment cannot be defined (e.g., Num. 15:38); it may have been a shade of blue or violet. There is also no indication of how the dye was made, but no doubt the Israelites during the bondage in Egypt had learned to make the blue extract. See also PURPLE.

Boanerges. boh´uh-nuhr´jeez (Gk. Boanērges G1065, possibly from Heb. běně regeš H1201 + H8094, “sons of commotion”). A surname interpreted as meaning “Sons of Thunder” and given by Jesus to JAMES and JOHN THE APOSTLE, the sons of ZEBEDEE, at the time they were chosen apostles (Mk. 3:17). The derivation of the name is debated, and Mark translates it without stating why the term was appropriate. Some have thought it referred to their fiery eloquence; others have taken it as referring to their fiery dispositions.

boar. See ANIMALS.

boast. This English term is used to translate various Hebrew words, especially the verb hālāl H2146 (Ps. 10:3; 34:2; et al.). In the NT, it is primarily a rendering of the Greek verb kauchaomai G3016 and its derivatives; this word group is used mainly by PAUL, especially in 2 Cor. 10-12 (e.g., 10:13-17). The idea of boasting may convey both a good (e.g., Ps. 44:8; 2 Cor. 7:14) and a bad sense (e.g., Ps. 10:3; Rom. 2:17; 2 Tim. 3:2). The fundamental biblical principle is expressed by God’s declaration, “let him who boasts boast about this: / that he understands and knows me, / that I am the LORD” (Jer. 9:24; quoted in 1 Cor. 1:31).

Boaz met Ruth in the vicinity of the fields and threshing floors located on the E side of Bethlehem. (View to the N.)

Boaz. boh'az (Heb. bō'az H1244, possibly “quick [of mind]” or “in him is strength”; Gk. Boes G1067 [Matt. 1:5] and Boos G1078 [Lk. 3:32]). A well-to-do Bethlehemite in the days of the judges who became an ancestor of Jesus by marrying RUTH the Moabitess, widow of one of the sons of ELIMELECH (Ruth 2-4). This was in accordance with the levirate law of Deut. 25:5-10; Boaz could marry Ruth only after the nearer kinsman had refused the privilege—or the duty (Ruth 3:12; 4:1-8). The other refused because, if he had married Ruth and had had a son, a portion of his property would have gone to the credit of Elimelech's posterity, instead of his own by a former marriage. It is impossible to date Boaz exactly, because the genealogy of Ruth 4:18-22 (cf. Matt. 1:5-6; Lk. 3:32) is almost certainly a partial list, giving ten names to cover 800 years. The list in Matt. 1 is demonstrably schematic, as it omits names of four kings, and this one in Ruth is almost as surely partial also. They are both accurate but, like most genealogies, partial. SALMON (or Salmah), given here as the father of Boaz, lived at the time of the conquest, for he married RAHAB; but the general setting of the story is that of a later period of settled life.

body. The OT uses various names for parts and organs of the body to signify the physical, temporal, spatial, and tactual aspect of a human being. In the English versions some ten Hebrew words are loosely (and often incorrectly) translated “body.” The Greek word sōma G5393 has a wide range of meaning in the NT. It can refer to a corpse (Matt. 27:52), one’s physical body (Mk. 5:29), and the human self expressed in and through a body (Heb. 10:10; 1 Pet. 2:24). As a Jewish thinker, PAUL saw the body not merely as an outer shell to house the soul/spirit, but as the expression of the whole person (Rom. 12:1). So he warned against the misuse of the body (1 Cor. 6:13-20), especially since it is the temple of the HOLY SPIRIT in the case of the believer (6:15, 19). However, the body is affected by sin and so may be called the “body of sin” (Rom. 6:6) and “body of death” (7:24). Even so, Paul’s use of “body” must be distinguished from his use of FLESH. The latter almost always points to the principle of SIN endemic in human nature.

As there is a physical body for this life, so there is a spiritual and imperishable body for the life of the age to come after the RESURRECTION (1 Cor. 15:38-49). The present body, which is affected by sin, will be replaced by a body whose nature is spirit and which is pure and glorious—like Christ’s resurrection body. In the LORD’S SUPPER the bread symbolizes the body of Jesus offered as a sacrifice for sin (Mk. 14:22; 1 Cor. 11:24). The CHURCH can also be understood as a body. See BODY OF CHRIST.

body of Christ. The NT applies the term body to Christ in three ways. (1) As the natural, human body of Jesus that the eternal Son made his own in the womb of Mary, and in which he offered himself as a sacrifice for the sin of the world (Heb. 10:10). This body was transformed from a physical into a spiritual body in resurrection and then taken to heaven in ascension. Yet it remains a human body, and thus he who sits at the right hand of the Father as coregent is still the God-Man. (2) As the people of God or the CHURCH (local and universal) united to Christ in grace by faith and through baptism. Believers are “one body in Christ” (Rom. 12:5) in each locality and, as a universal community, are the “body of Christ” (Eph. 4:12) ruled and sustained by Christ, the Head (5:23). (3) As the bread used at the Last Supper by Jesus and then as the bread used in Holy Communion by believers. “This is my body,” said Jesus (Matt. 26:26). Just as Jesus’ body was broken on the cross, and just as by eating the Passover meal the Israelites had been associated with delivery from Egypt and bondage, so believers participate in the saving work of Christ on the cross by taking this bread (and wine).

Bohan, Stone of. boh´han (Heb. bōhan H992, possibly “thumb”). The description of the N boundary of the tribe of JUDAH contains a reference to “the Stone of Bohan son of Reuben” (Josh. 15:6); the same language is then used to describe the S boundary of the tribe of BENJAMIN (18:17). The stone was apparently near JERICHO, and it is possible that at one time descendants of the tribe of REUBEN temporarily inhabited the NE corner of the territory of Judah before the final boundary settlements were made by JOSHUA.

boil. See DISEASES.

Bokeru. boh´kuh-roo (Heb. bōkērû H1150, possibly “youthful”). Also Bocheru. Son of Azel and descendant of SAUL through JONATHAN (1 Chr. 8:38; 9:44). Some scholars (following the Greek and Syriac versions) take the word as a common noun with suffix, “his firstborn,” applying the description to Azel’s first son, Azrikam.

Bokim. boh´kim (Heb. bōkîm H1141, “weepers”). Also Bochim. Name given to a place near GILGAL where the nation of Israel wept after being admonished by the angel of the Lord (Jdg. 2:1, 5). The SEPTUAGINT inserts a reference to BETHEL after Bokim, and the latter may be connected with ALLON BACUTH, meaning “oak of weeping,” which is said to be “below Bethel” (Gen. 35:8).

boldness. Common translation of the Greek noun parrēsia G4244, which also means “frankness, sense of freedom, confidence.” Luke uses it often to describe the bold witnessing of the early Christians (Acts 2:29; 4:29-31; et al.; cf. also the cognate verb parrēsiazomai G4245, “speak boldly, preach fearlessly,” 9:27 et al.). PAUL uses it too in some key passages that focus either on the boldness required in his ministry (2 Cor. 3:12; Eph 6:19-20; et al.) or on the confidence believers have to approach God (Eph. 3:12; 1 Tim. 3:13; cf. also Heb. 3:16 et al.; 1 Jn. 2:28 et al.). For Christians, courage of every sort is possible in the measure that they know themselves to be in the almighty hands and under the beneficent protection of their heavenly Father. See also SHAME.

bolled. An archaic term used by the KJV once, referring to the flower bud or the seed pod of flax (Exod. 9:31; NIV, “in bloom”). The English term meant “having bolls” or “bearing pods,” hence “in seed,” though the corresponding Hebrew word may refer equally to the flower.

bone. In the living body, bones form the strong framework, and the connotation is one of strength. “Bone of my bones and flesh of my flesh” (Gen. 2:23) was spoken in a literal sense of EVE; but almost the same words (29:14), spoken by LABAN to JACOB, are figurative and show only kinship. Strong chastening is thought of as a bone-breaking experience (Ps. 51:8), and the terrible writhing on the cross of Calvary literally threw bones out of joint (22:14). Dry bones form a picture of hopeless death (Ezek. 37:1-12). The Passover lamb, without a broken bone (Exod. 12:46), was a type of the Lamb of God (Jn. 19:36).

book. Generally a literary production having some unity of purpose. Books may be classified by their forms or subjects, but more particularly by the nature and quality of the written material within. In ancient ASSYRIA and Babylonia (see BABYLON) much of the WRITING that was thought to be of value was done in wedge-shaped characters on soft clay that was then baked, and the “libraries” were, in form, almost like piles of brick.

In ancient EGYPT, the people early learned to press and glue thin sheets of the PAPYRUS plant into sheets of “paper”; the writing was in narrow columns on sheets of regular size that were then glued together and wound around two sticks, thus forming a scroll or roll. Still later, people learned to bind the sheets together into a “codex,” very similar to our modern books. Book in the Bible always refers to a scroll (see esp. Jer. 36). In PERGAMUM, in the second century B.C., due to the scarcity of paper, workers learned to dress the skin of calves and of kids as a writing material. This new substance was named parchment in honor of its place of origin and almost displaced papyrus in many regions.

In ancient Mesopotamia, books were produced in the form of inscribed tablets like this one (19th cent. B.C.), commemorating the building of Ur by Warad-Sin, king of Larsa.

In ancient books made of papyrus or parchment, the writing was generally done on one side of each sheet, but occasionally, owing to afterthoughts, material was written also on the back side (see Rev. 5:1). When a book was sealed, the contents were made secret, and when unsealed they were open (cf. Dan. 12:4, 9; Rev. 5:1-4 on the one hand and Rev. 5:5; 22:10 on the other). Only the Son of God was found worthy to open the seals of the book of the future that had been locked in the hands of “him that sat on the throne.”

Judaism, Christianity, and Islam are all religions of a book, and their main books have greatly changed the history of the human race. The Bible is the book, God’s Word, and it differs from all other books in that it alone is inspired (God-breathed). The Bible originally had sixty-three books, as the division of Samuel, Kings, and Chronicles into “First” and “Second” was not originally intended. The larger books were generally written on separate rolls (see Lk. 4:17) but sometimes the Megilloth (Ruth, Esther, Lamentations, Song of Songs, and Ecclesiastes) were bound together, as were also “The Twelve” (i.e., the Minor Prophets). Many books that have been lost are mentioned in the Bible (e.g., “the book of Jashar,” Josh. 10:13; “the book of the annals of Solomon,” 1 Ki. 11:41).

booth. A simple, temporary shelter generally constructed of tree branches with the leaves left on. It was used by the guardian of a vineyard or vegetable garden when the fruit was fit to be stolen. Sometimes this word describes a larger enclosure (Gen. 33:17) such as JACOB built for his cattle (cf. Isa. 1:8 NRSV).

Booths, Feast of. See FEASTS (sect. VI).

booty. Goods taken from a defeated enemy. In the law as given through MOSES, very different arrangements were made for varying circumstances. In the case of some cities whose people were extremely wicked, everything was to be destroyed (see DEVOTED THING). Persons could sometimes be enslaved (Deut. 20:14), but in other cases they had to be utterly destroyed (20:16-18). The purpose here was to prevent the pagans from teaching their abominations to God's people Israel (cf. 1 Sam. 15, where SAUL's hypocritical half-obedience brought ruin on himself and his house). The very practical question as to the division of the booty was solved partly by custom, as when Abram (ABRAHAM) freely devoted a tenth of the spoil to the Lord by giving it to MELCHIZEDEK (Gen. 14:20), and partly by legislation, as when DAVID ordered that booty be shared equally by those who because of weariness could not continue in battle (1 Sam. 30:21-25).

Booz. boh'oz. See BOAZ.

Bor Ashan. bor-ay'shuhn (Heb. bôr- ʿāšān H1016, "smoking pit"). A city in the SW of JUDAH, mentioned among the places where DAVID and his men roamed prior to his becoming king (1 Sam. 30:30; for the first consonant, many Heb. MSS have a k instead of a b, thus KJV "Chor-ashan"). It may be the same as ASHAN, a city of uncertain location in the SHEPHELAH (Josh. 19:7; 1 Chr. 4:32).

borrow. The KJV uses this verb three times in the context of the people of Israel "borrowing" extensively from the Egyptians (Exod. 3:22; 11:2; 12:35; the Heb. verb means literally "to ask"). The fact is that the Egyptians, thoroughly cowed by the rigors of the ten plagues, were willing to give generously in order to get rid of their troublesome “guests”; and God, in his providence, allowed Israel to despoil the Egyptians (12:36) in order to provide gold and silver for the TABERNACLE that was to be constructed. “Surely your wrath against men brings you praise” (Ps. 76:10).

The law of MOSES gives careful direction concerning the responsibility of those who borrow or who hold property in trust or who are criminally careless in regard to the property of another (Exod. 22:1-15). Among the blessings promised Israel on condition of obedience is that they would be lenders, not borrowers (Deut. 15:6; 28:12). Also, Jesus instructed his followers to not turn away those who wanted to borrow from them (Matt. 5:42). Generally the borrower is the servant of the lender (Prov. 22:7), but God’s judgment can erase differences (Isa. 24:2). See also DEBT; INTEREST.

bosom. Although in English this word refers to the part of the body between the arms, in Scripture it is generally used in an affectionate sense; for example, “the only Son, who is in the bosom of the Father” (Jn. 1:18 RSV), carrying the lambs in his bosom (Isa. 40:11 KJV), or LAZARUS resting in ABRAHAM’S BOSOM (Lk. 16:22-23 KJV). It can be almost synonymous with “heart” as the center of one’s life (cf. Ps. 35:13; Eccl. 7:9 KJV). Quite commonly, of course, it refers to conjugal love, as in Mic. 7:5 (KJV; NIV, “embrace”). In Prov. 17:23 we read of the bosom as a place of hiding money (KJV; NIV, “accepts a bribe in secret”).

Bosor. boh’sor (Gk. Bosor G1082 [not in NIV]). An alternate name for BEOR, the father of BALAAM (2 Pet. 2:15 KJV, NRSV; but NIV reads BEOR, following Codex Vaticanus and a few other witnesses). Some scholars have thought that the form Bosor in this passage is simply an ancient blunder that spread through virtually the whole MS tradition. Many others believe that it is the original form in this passage and that it was corrected to Beor by a few scribes to harmonize the text with the SEPTUAGINT spelling.

botch. See DISEASES.

bottle. A term used frequently by the KJV where modern versions have such renderings as “jar” and “wineskin” (or simply “skin”). The Hebrew noun nō ʾd H5532 in particular refers to the hide of an animal sewn and sealed to be used as a ^{WINE OR WATER} container (e.g., Josh. 9:4). In the NT, the Greek term askos G929 appears several times (e.g., Matt. 9:17). See also ^{PITCHER}; ^{POTTERY}.

bottomless pit. See ^{ABYSS}.

boundary stones. God not only set careful bounds to the land of his people (Josh. 13-21), but also provided a curse for those who removed their neighbors' landmarks (Deut. 27:17; cf. 19:14). Figuratively, the expression implies a decent regard for ancient institutions (Prov. 22:28; 23:10).

bow. See ^{ARMS AND ARMOR}; ^{RAINBOW}.

bowels. In the KJV this English word occurs thirty-six times and in three principal senses: (1) literally (2 Chr. 21:15-19; Acts 1:18); (2) as the generative parts of the body, whether male or female (Gen. 15:4; Ps. 71:6); and (3) as the seat of the emotions (e.g. Lam. 1:20 [NIV, "heart"]; Phil. 1:8 [NIV, "affection"]).

A collection of votive bowls dedicated to the Canaanite temple in Hazor (15th-13th cent. B.C.).

bowl. Various Hebrew words are rendered “bowl” in the OT. One of these may refer to a large, flat earthenware dish for holding a liquid, such as milk (Jdg. 5:25). Another one is used of large costly bowls, like the silver bowls presented by the princes of the congregation (Num. 7:13-14). Still another one is used in reference to the receptacle for oil in the candlestick of Zechariah’s vision (Zech. 4:3), and to the bowl-shaped capitals of the temple pillars Jakin and Boaz (1 Ki. 7:41-42; 2 Chr. 4:12-13). In the NT, two Greek terms are used.

One occurs in Jesus' statement at the Last Supper, "The one who has dipped his hand into the bowl with me will betray me" (Matt. 26:23). The other one is found frequently in the book of Revelation (Rev. 5:8; 15:7; et al. [KJV, "vial"]). See also CUP; POTTERY; VESSEL.

Bozez. boh'ziz (Heb. bôṣēṣ H1010, perhaps "gleaming [place]"). The northern of two cliffs (the southern was called SENEH) situated on either side of the pass of MICMASH (1 Sam. 14:4). It was apparently this crag, or near it, that JONATHAN and his armor-bearer climbed when attacking the PHILISTINE outpost. The exact spot has not been identified, although doubtless both cliffs lay near the sharp bend of the pass. The area is some 7 mi. (11 km.) NNE of JERUSALEM.

Bozkath. boz'kath (Heb. boṣqat H1304, "swollen" or "elevation"). One of the towns in the SHEPHELAH within the territory of the tribe of JUDAH (Josh. 15:39); it was the home of King JOSIAH's mother, Jedidah (2 Ki. 22:1; KJV, "Boscath"). Its precise location is unknown, but it must have been near LACHISH.

Bozrah. boz'ruh (Heb. boṣrāh H1313, possibly "enclosure [for sheep]"). (1) An ancient city in the mountains of EDMOM, strongly fortified and virtually impregnable. It is probably to be identified with modern Buṣeirah, situated at the head of the Wadi Hamayideh on a rocky isolated bluff surrounded on three sides by steep valleys, approximately 30 mi. (50 km.) N of PETRA (SELA) and 25 mi. (40 km.) SE of the S tip of the DEAD SEA. It was the strongest fortress of the northern half of Edom and as such controlled access to the king's highway, and hence to the ARABAH and the Red Sea port of ELATH. Bozrah is mentioned in Gen. 36:33 and 1 Chr. 1:44 as being the city of JOBAB, one of the early kings of Edom. It is particularly used by the prophets, along with TEMAN, to describe Edom in oracles of judgment, since both places were so impregnable (Isa. 34:6; 63:1; Jer. 49:13, 22; Amos 1:12). In Mic. 2:12 it is better translated "sheepfold," as in the modern versions.

(2) One of the cities of MOAB against which Jeremiah prophesied (Jer. 48:24). It is usually identified with BEZER.

bracelet. Properly a circlet for the wrist, but the word translates in the KJV five different Hebrew nouns. In 2 Sam. 1:10 the word probably means "armlet" as a mark of royalty (NIV, “band on his arm”); in Exod. 35:22 it could be “brooches” or “clasps”; in Gen. 38:18, 25 it represents the cord about the neck from which the signet ring was suspended; in Gen. 24:22, 30, 47, it is properly “bracelet,” from the root meaning “something bound on”; in Ezek. 16:11; 23:42; and in Isa. 3:19, in the interesting inventory of twenty-one items of feminine adornment, it could be rendered “twisted chains.” Bracelets and other showy adornments (anklets, nose-rings, armlets, etc.) were much admired in ancient days. See also DRESS.

braid. The braiding of the HAIR refers to a custom practiced by women of means during the Roman period. It involved the elaborate entwining of the hair, and it often included the use of thin threads of gold, pearls, or precious stones of various colors. Two of the NT church leaders speak against this practice because of its identification with the world system of that day (1 Tim. 2:9; 1 Pet. 3:3). The NIV uses the term “braid” with reference to SAMSON’s hair (Jdg. 16:13, 19).

bramble. See PLANTS.

branch. A word representing eighteen different Hebrew and four Greek words in the Bible, most notably as a title applied to the MESSIAH as the offspring of DAVID (Jer. 23:5; 33:15; Zech. 3:8; 6:12).

brasen. See BRONZE SEA; BRONZE SNAKE.

brass. See MINERALS.

bray. This verb refers to the distinctive call of the donkey, horse, and mule. Its two exclusive biblical references occur in JOB. In his distress Job declares there was good reason for his rash words: “Does a wild donkey bray when it has grass, / or an ox bellow when it has fodder?” (Job 6:5). Later, he compares the “base and nameless brood” who mocked him to wild desert asses braying in the bushes (30:8-9). (The KJV uses the word in its other meaning of “grind” in Prov. 27:22.)

brazen sea, brazen serpent. See BRONZE SEA; BRONZE SNAKE.

bread. The “staff of life,” generally baked from dough made of wheat flour that has been leavened (raised by means of fermenting yeast) and made into loaves of various shapes and sizes. At the time of the Passover (Exod. 12) the Israelites ate unleavened bread because of their haste, and ever afterward they memorialized this event in an annual feast (12:15-20). The poorer people usually used barley instead of wheat to make the bread for this feast, and in times of distress and of famine most of the people used barley. See PLANTS. In Jdg. 7:13, the Midianite’s dream of a barley loaf, which was interpreted as “the sword of Gideon,” perhaps hinted at the poverty of Israel under Midianite oppression; and in Jn. 6:9 the boy’s store of five barley loaves suggests that he came from a family or a region that could not afford the more delicious and nutritious wheat bread. Ezekiel 4:9-17 gives a vivid picture of baking in famine times.

In the more primitive parts of Syria today there are several sorts of wheat bread. In some villages a barrel-shaped hole in the ground is used as an oven; the women adroitly knead the bread into large thin sheets that they lay on cushions and slap against the hot wall of the oven. Though dried dung mixed with straw is used as fuel to preheat the oven, the taste is not impaired. In other villages of Syria, a convex sheet of iron is placed over an open fire and the bread is similarly baked; but in the larger towns and cities there are bakeries to which the people bring their loaves for baking. The long stone oven is heated for hours, then the raised loaves, about 8 to 10 in. (21 to 26 cm.) in diameter and one-fourth inch (about 1 cm.) thick, are placed inside by means of a long wooden paddle. The heat quickly bakes the surface, and gas forming inside splits the loaves, which are then turned and soon removed (Hos. 7:8).

The word bread, depicting the most universal solid food, is often used figuratively for FOOD in general: “By the sweat of your brow you shall eat bread” (Gen. 3:19 NRSV); “Give us today our daily bread” (Matt. 6:11). The word is used by the Lord in a mystical but very true and precious sense in his discourse on “the bread of life” in Jn. 6:43-59. As important as bread (i.e., solid food) is to our bodies, so necessary is the Lord to spiritual life. And so, in the “breaking of bread” at our “communion” services, some partake in a very real way of Christ, while others, not recognizing the body of the Lord, eat and drink judgment on themselves (1 Cor. 11:29). In the tabernacle and in the temple, the “bread of the Presence” indicated the presence of the Lord, the “bread of life” among his people.

breastpiece. An elaborately decorated square of linen worn on the breast as part of the robes of Israel's high PRIEST (Exod. 28:15-30; 39:8-21; Lev. 8:8; KJV, "breastplate"). A piece of material of gold, blue, purple, scarlet, and fine linen was folded double into a square of 9 x 9 in. It was fastened from the top to the shoulder of the EPHOD by gold cords, and by a blue lace from the lower corners to gold rings on the ephod. On the front were four rows, each of three precious stones, and each stone inscribed with the name of one of the twelve tribes. Three times it is referred to as the "breastpiece of judgment" (Exod. 28:15, 29-30; NIV, "breastpiece for making decisions"). This term apparently refers to the oracular function of the URIM AND THUMMIM, commonly thought to have been objects held in the fold.

breastplate. See ARMS AND ARMOR; BREASTPIECE.

breath. The most important ingredient of physical LIFE. A person can live for thirty days without food, but only a few minutes without breathing. Because human beings owe their breath to God (Gen. 2:7; Job 27:3), the concept has strong theological associations. God will restore his people, who are like dry bones, when he breathes his Spirit, and thus life, into them (Ezek. 37:1-14; the Heb. word for "spirit," rûaḥ H5972, also means "breath, wind," and the same is true of the corresponding Gk. word, pneuma G4460). After his resurrection, Jesus breathed on his disciples, signifying their reception of the HOLY SPIRIT (Jn. 20:22). Moreover, the Scriptures are described as being "breathed out" by God (theopneustos G2535, 2 Tim. 3:16; see INSPIRATION).

breeches. See DRESS.

brethren of the Lord. See BROTHERS OF THE LORD.

bribery. Anything given to induce a person to do something illegal or wrong, or against his or her wishes. The taking of bribes is mentioned often in the OT. Bribery was used to condemn the innocent (Ps. 15:5; Isa. 5:23; Ezek. 22:12), to acquit the guilty (Isa. 5:23), to slay the innocent (Deut. 27:25). The law of Moses prohibited it (Exod. 23:8; Deut. 16:19), and those who take a bribe are described as cursed (Deut. 27:25). The prophets denounced it (Isa. 1:23; Amos 5:12; Mic. 3:11; 7:3). Rulers (Exod. 18:21; Isa. 1:23; Ezek. 22:12; Mic. 3:11; 7:3) and judges (2 Chr. 19:7) were especially given to it. The God of Israel is not partial and does not take a bribe (Deut. 10:17). The person who is approved by God does not take bribes (Ps. 15:5; Prov. 15:27; Isa. 33:15).

brick. Building material made of clay dried in the sun. The word for “brick” in Hebrew (lēbēnâ H4246) is derived from the verb “to be white” (cf. LEBANON, so named for its snow-clad mountaintops). The very name would lead us to expect the oriental bricks to be whitish in color, rather than red like our more common bricks. The earliest mention of brick in the Bible (Gen. 11:3) shows that the molding of clay into bricks and its thorough burning were known when the Tower of BABEL was built, possibly not more than a century after Noah’s flood.

Owing to the prevalence of stone in EGYPT and its comparative rarity in lower MESOPOTAMIA, the use of brick for building was much more common in CHALDEA than in Egypt, though the record of the bondage of Israel (Exod. 1:11-14; 5:7-19) shows that at least some cities in Egypt were built of brick rather than of stone. In fact, the ruins of PITHOM have been found with three grades of brick in situ: bricks with binding material of straw at the bottom; above them, bricks made with stubble; and at the top, bricks of pure clay with no binding material at all. The ancient bricks were generally square instead of oblong and were much larger than ours, about 13 x 13 x 3.5 in. (33 x 33 x 9 cm.). Before being baked they were often stamped with the name of the monarch. Much of the ancient brickwork was of bricks merely baked in the sun, especially in Egypt, but at BABYLON the bricks were thoroughly burned.

Brickmaking is mentioned in DAVID’s time (2 Sam. 12:31), and centuries later NAHUM, taunting the Ninevites, tells them: “Work the clay, tread the mortar, repair the brickwork!” (Nah. 3:14). In Isa. 9:9-10 the “pride and arrogance of heart” of the Israelites is rebuked because they intended to replace the overthrown bricks with stone, even as many a modern city has been rebuilt after a catastrophe. The sin was not in their desire for improvement, but in their impious and profane pride.

brimstone. Modern translations prefer the more common term “sulfur,” referring to a nonmetallic element with a yellow color and usually found as well-formed crystals. It is soft and burns with a blue flame forming a noxious gas. The biblical use of the term is generally connected with judgment, as when the Lord rained “brimstone and fire” on SODOM and GOMORRAH (Gen. 19:24 KJV; NIV, “burning sulfur”) or as when the dust of EDOM was to be turned into brimstone (Isa. 34:9 KJV). In the book of Revelation, burning sulfur is mentioned repeatedly in connection with divine punishment (Rev. 14:10 et al.).

Broad Wall. A portion of the walls of JERUSALEM in times of NEHEMIAH (Neh. 3:8; 12:38). It was apparently in the NW section of the city, between the Tower of the OVENS and the EPHRAIM GATE. In the course of excavations during the 1970s, an impressive eighth-century B.C. wall (about 210 ft./64 m. long and 23 ft./7m. thick) was discovered in what is now the Jewish Quarter. It is very likely the wall that was built first by HEZEKIAH (2 Chr. 32:5).

bronze sea. Name given to a very large laver (c. 15 ft. or 4.5 m.) that SOLOMON placed in front of the TEMPLE for washing the sacrifices and the bodies of the priests (2 Ki. 25:13; 1 Chr. 18:8; Jer. 52:17; KJV, “brassen sea”). It is also known as the “molten sea” (1 Ki. 7:23; 2 Chr. 4:2; NIV, “Sea of cast metal”). The tank was mounted on a base consisting of twelve oxen, also cast from bronze, three facing toward each of the four cardinal points of the compass. The metal was cast a handbreadth in thickness, and the lip was curved over like the flower of a lily.

bronze snake. According to Num. 21:4-9, the people of Israel, as they were preparing to travel around the land of EDOM, complained against God and MOSES because they had no bread or water. In judgment God sent venomous snakes against them. When the people confessed their sin, Moses made a snake made of bronze and set it on a pole so that “anyone who is bitten can look at it and live.” With the passage of time, however, Israel lost sight of the symbolical and typical function of the statue. By the later eighth century B.C., the Israelites were burning INCENSE to it, as if it were in itself a deity, and during HEZEKIAH’s religious reform it was broken into pieces (2 Ki. 18:4; KJV, “brassen serpent”).

brook. The usual Hebrew word for “brook” is naḥal H5707 (to be distinguished from the similar-sounding term for “river,” nāhār H5643). It is often rendered “valley,” and this English term seems best in view of the places so named, such as the Valley of ESHCOL (Num. 13:23) and the Valley of SOREK (Jdg. 16:4). The Arabic word wadi is more accurate, since some “brooks” are nothing more than dry washes except during flood season. This feature is illustrated well in 2 Ki. 3:16-17. The Spanish arroyo describes the same phenomenon in the SW United States. The fact that the valley between JERUSALEM and the MOUNT OF OLIVES is called the Brook KIDRON is ample evidence that it may refer to a gully in which water rarely or never runs. Even though water is only occasionally present in some brooks, the dry bed is often the best place to dig for water or to plant. In some passages, the NIV renders the Hebrew term with “gorge,” “ravine,” etc. See also RIVER; VALLEY.

brother. This term is applied to various relationships. (1) A male person related to another person or other persons by having the same parents (Gen. 27:6) or only the same father or mother (28:2; Jdg. 8:19). (2) A member of the same tribe (2 Sam. 19:12); (3) A citizen of the same country (Exod. 2:11; Acts 3:22). (4) An ally (Amos 1:9). (5) A kindred nation (Num. 20:14). (6) Someone spiritually akin (Matt. 12:50; 23:8), used especially among Christians (Acts 9:17; 1 Cor. 6:6). (7) Someone of equal rank or office (1 Ki. 9:13; Ezra 3:2 KJV).

brothers of the Lord. The term is used in the NT in identifying four men: JAMES, JOSEPH, SIMON, and JUDE (Matt. 13:55; Mk. 6:3). It is also used collectively of a group of men whose names are not given (Jn. 7:3; Acts 1:14; 1 Cor. 9:5). The precise relationship of these men to Jesus has been much debated, with three different answers offered: (1) They were younger children of Mary and Joseph; this is suggested by the reference to Mary's "first" child (Lk. 2:7) but is rejected by those who insist that Mary remained a virgin throughout her life. (2) They were Joseph's children from a previous marriage; this view is possible, but it has no support in the NT. (3) They were cousins of Jesus, sons of his aunt Mary wife of CLEOPAS (Jn. 19:25), described as "the mother of James the Younger and of Joses" (Mk. 15:40); but if this James is the apostle listed in Mk. 3:18, Mary's husband was Alphaeus, not Cleopas, and this could be explained only if Alphaeus and Cleopas were alternative names for the same man, or if Mary had been married twice. Most Protestant scholars argue that the first option above is the most natural.

Bubastis. byoo-bas'tis (Gk. Boubastis; LXX Boubastos). A major city in EGYPT (Ezek. 30:17 NIV). See P_I BESETH.

bucket. A pail made of leather used for drawing water from a WELL or CISTERN. It had two crosspieces at the top to keep it open. Such buckets are still in use in Palestine. The term is used figuratively in the OT (Num. 24:7; Isa. 40:15).

Bukki. buhk´i (Heb. buqqî H1321, short form of BUKKIAH). (1) Son of Jogli; as a leader from the tribe of DAN, he was one of the men entrusted with the division of the land of Canaan among the Israelites (Num. 34:22).

(2) Son of Abishua, descendant of LEVI through KOHATH, and ancestor of EZRA (1 Chr. 6:5, 51; Ezra 7:4).

Bukkiah. buh-ki´uh (Heb. buqqiyyāhû H1322, possibly “proved of Yahweh”). One of the fourteen sons of HEMAN, a Levite; he received the sixth lot that determined his duties in the temple (1 Chr. 25:4, 13). Along with the sons of ASAPH and JEDUTHUN, the sons of Heman were involved in “the ministry of prophesying, accompanied by harps, lyres and cymbals” (v. 1).

Bul. bool (Heb. bûl H1004, possibly “autumn rain” or “harvest”). The name of the eighth month of the year (corresponding to late October and early November), according to the preexilic Canaanite system of names. It occurs only once, in dating the completion of Solomon’s TEMPLE (1 Ki. 6:38). See CALENDAR.

Bunah. byoo´nuh (Heb. bûnâ H1007, possibly “intelligence”). Son of JERAHMEEL and descendant of JUDAH through PEREZ and HEZRON (1 Chr. 2:25).

Bunni. buhn´i (Heb. bunnî H1221, possibly short form of BENAIAH). (1) A LEVITE who was present at EZRA’s public reading of the law (Neh. 9:4).

(2) An ancestor of a certain Shemaiah; the latter was one of the Levites who chose to live in Jerusalem at the time of NEHEMIAH (Neh. 11:15).

(3) A leader of the people who sealed the covenant with Nehemiah (Neh. 10:15).

burden. That which is laid on an animal or person in order to be carried. The word translates a variety of Hebrew and Greek terms. When literally used, it is easily understood and needs no special comment. Figuratively, it can refer to responsibility (Num. 11:11; Matt. 11:30) or to sorrow (Ps. 55:22 KJV; NIV, “cares”). The KJV uses “burden” also in passages where the Hebrew word (prob. a homonym) has the different meaning of “divine pronouncement, oracle” (Isa. 13:1 et al.).

burial. The act of placing a dead body in a tomb, in the earth, or in the sea, generally with appropriate ceremonies, as opposed to exposure to the beasts or abandonment or burning. Various peoples, notably the Egyptians, who believed that their dead would live and practice ordinary human occupations in “the land of the dead,” often went to great lengths to preserve the bodies of their departed loved ones. They sometimes placed with the mummy tools or instruments or weapons, and occasionally killed and buried a wife or a servant to accompany the one whom they had buried.

Partly because of God’s declaration to fallen Adam, “For dust you are and to dust you will return” (Gen. 3:19), the people of Israel almost always buried their dead; and because the land of Canaan had so many caves, these places were very frequently used as places of burial. Probably the prevailing motive for our respect for the dead, and even for the place of burial, is the sense of decency and our feeling of love for the person, often without regarding the fact that the real person has gone and that only his former “residence” remains.

The story of the treatment of the bodies of SAUL and of his sons sheds light on the subject. The PHILISTINES beheaded the bodies, exhibiting the heads throughout their land and fastening Saul’s body to the city wall of BETH SHAN (1 Sam. 31:8-13). The men of Israel rescued the bodies, burned them, reverently buried the bones under a tree, and mourned seven days.

It is remarkable that although God had given to ABRAHAM the deed of the land of Canaan (Gen. 15:18-21), the only land that the patriarchs possessed before JOSHUA’s time was the burial places for the original family: a cave at HEBRON and a field at SHECHEM (cf. Gen. 23; 49:29-32; Josh. 24:32-33). In Canaan, in ancient times and in the more primitive parts of the land even today, there was (and is) no embalming in most cases but immediate burial to avoid unpleasant odors (Acts 5:5-10) and ceremonial uncleanness (Num. 19:11-22). In the time of Christ, the bodies were wrapped in clean linen (Matt. 27:57-60), and spices and ointments were prepared (Lk. 23:56).

The strange story of the dead Moabite reviving when he touched the bones of ELISHA (2 Ki. 13:20-21) shows not only the speedy decomposition of a body but also the informality of burials in times of war or necessity. The still stranger story of the disobedient prophet (1 Ki. 13) shows how a heathen altar could be defiled by burning bones on it (13:1-3) and shows also the desire of a prophet to be buried near another whom he honored (13:30-31). In several cases of sinful rulers, ordinary burial was denied to their bodies: the dogs ate JEZEBEL (2 Ki. 9:10); JEHORAM of Judah, who died with incurable diseases, was not buried with the kings (2 Chr. 21:18-20); UZZIAH was buried in a field, not in the tombs of the kings (26:23); and JEHOIAKIM was given the burial of a donkey (Jer. 22:18-19).

burning. The burning of the SACRIFICE (Lev. 1-7) was a symbolic way of conveying the offering, and thus the commitment of the sacrificer, to God: as the sacrifice was consumed and the smoke and odor arose to heaven, it symbolized the entrance into the divine presence. Burning as a means of judgment has been literally carried out in history, and it will again at the consummation of all things (Lev. 10:1-2; Josh. 6:24; 8:28; 1 Cor. 3:13). God himself in holiness and eternal might is represented by the BURNING BUSH (Exod. 3:1-3), by the burning coals of Ezekiel's vision (Ezek. 1:13), and by the continually burning lamp of the sanctuary: "God is a consuming fire" (Heb. 12:29). Burning can also indicate zeal and passion, both in positive and in negative contexts (Lk. 24:32; Jn. 5:35; Rom. 1:27; 1 Cor. 7:9).

burning bush. A thorny bush that MOSES saw burning and from which he heard the Lord speak (Exod. 3:2-3; Deut. 33:16; Mk. 12:26). Many attempts have been made to identify the plant, but without success. The incident is important because it is the first direct statement in the Bible linking HOLINESS with the very life of God and making fire the symbol of that holiness. The flame that needs no fuel to maintain it ("the bush...did not burn up") represents the eternal, self-sufficient life of God. Where this God is, holiness is, and sinners can draw near only by meeting the conditions God imposes (“take off your sandals”). This is the seed from which the whole Mosaic system grows. The unapproachable fire is seen in all its majesty on Mount SINAI (Exod. 19:18), and this in turn is reflected in the undying fire on the altar (Lev. 6:9). The same God who made the simple provision for Moses to draw nigh (Exod. 3:5; cf. Josh. 5:13) provided the sacrifices.

butter. This English term is used by the KJV to render a Hebrew word that refers to curdled milk, comparable to yogurt. Modern versions usually render the Hebrew term with “curds” (e.g., Deut. 32:14; 2 Sam. 17:29; Isa. 7:15, 22) or “cream” (Job 20:17 and 29:6 NIV), though the word “butter” is sometimes retained (e.g., Prov. 30:33 NIV). After the milk has been churned and the “butter” (in our sense of the word) produced, the butter is boiled and the curds separated from the almost pure oil; this is poured into a goatskin and kept until slightly rancid (to Western taste) and then is used with food, but more generally for frying eggs or vegetables. See FOOD.

Buz. buhz (Heb. bûz H998, perhaps “contempt”; gentilic bûzî H1000, “Buzite”).
(1) Son of NAHOR (ABRAHAM’s brother) by MILCAH (Gen. 22:21).

(2) A descendant of GAD and ancestor of Abihail (1 Chr. 5:14).

(3) A tribe or city-state in ARABIA, listed with DEDAN and TEMA as objects of God’s judgment (Jer. 25:23). It was apparently the home of ELIHU, whose father is called Barakel the Buzite (Job 32:2, 6). It is debated whether the Buzites were descendants of #1 above. Buz is usually connected with the E Arabian town of Bazu, mentioned in Assyrian texts.

Buzi. byoo'zi (Heb. bûzî H1001, perhaps “contempt” or “of Buz”). The father of EZEKIEL (Ezek. 1:3). It is unclear whether this name should be related to the Arabian tribe of BUZ.

buzzard. See BIRDS.

byways. This English term is used by some versions to render a Hebrew phrase meaning “winding paths” (Jdg. 5:6). Cf. also the term “bypaths” to render a different Hebrew phrase that describes the way an erring people follow, in contrast to an open way or highway (Jer. 18:15).

C

cab. See WEIGHTS AND MEASURES.

Cabbon. kab´uhn (Heb. kabbôn H3887, derivation uncertain). TNIV Kabbon. A city in the SHEPHELAH, near LACHISH (Josh. 15:40). Some scholars have associated Cabbon with MACBENAH (Caleb’s descendant according to 1 Chr. 2:49, but usually taken as a reference to a town) on the assumption that the two names are from the same Hebrew root.

Cabul. kay´buhl (Heb. kābûl H3886, meaning uncertain). TNIV Kabul. (1) A town on the E boundary of the tribe of ASHER (Josh. 19:27). It is usually identified with modern Kabul, nestled among the hills c. 9 mi. (15 km.) ESE of ACCO (Acre), but another proposal is nearby Khirbet Ras ez-Zetun (Rosh Zayith).

(2) The “Land of Cabul” (1 Ki. 9:13) was a district in N GALILEE comprising twenty towns (presumably including the town of Cabul; see #1 above) that SOLOMON ceded to HIRAM for his help in building the TEMPLE at Jerusalem. When Hiram saw the cities he was so dissatisfied that he called them “Land of Cabul,” apparently because this name can be interpreted to mean “like nothing,” that is, worthless. The reason for Hiram’s reaction is unclear, but it seems from 2 Chr. 8:2 that Hiram returned these cities and that Solomon rebuilt them.

Caesar. see´zuhr (Gk. Kaisar G2790). Cognomen of the Julian family, whose most eminent member was Caius Julius Caesar, the great soldier, statesman, orator, and author (102-44 B.C.). The name was then taken as a title by each of the Roman emperors; thus, for example, the first emperor was known as AUGUSTUS CAESAR. The title is mentioned by our Lord (Lk. 20:22-25) both literally as referring to TIBERIUS and figuratively as meaning any earthly ruler. The name Caesar came to be used as a symbol of the state in general and is often used in this sense in the NT (Matt. 22:17, 21; Mk. 12:14, 16-17; Lk. 20:22, 25).

Caesarea. ses´uh-ree´uh (Gk. Kaisareia G2791). Also known as Caesarea Maritima (“by the sea”) to distinguish it from CAESAREA PHILIPPI. The city was built between 25 and 13 B.C. by HEROD the Great at a vast cost and named in honor of his patron AUGUSTUS CAESAR. It lay on the coast of the Mediterranean about 25 mi. (40 km.) NW of the town of SAMARIA. Herod intended it as the port of his capital, and great stone blocks were used to top the reefs that helped to form the harbor. It is a rewarding but demanding site for archaeological investigation. Underwater explorations during the 1970s and 1980s demonstrated that the construction of the harbor under Herod was an engineering marvel.

Being the military headquarters for the Roman forces and the residence of the procurators, Caesarea was the home of CORNELIUS, in whose house PETER first preached to the Gentiles (Acts 10). It was the place of residence of PHILIP the evangelist with his four unmarried prophesying daughters (8:40; 21:8-9), who entertained PAUL and LUKE and their party on their return from the third missionary journey. Later it was the enforced residence of Paul while he was a prisoner for two years, and where he preached before King AGRIPPA II (23:31—26:32). The Jewish war that JOSEPHUS described with such power and pathos, and that culminated in the destruction of Jerusalem, had its origin in a riot in Caesarea. Here Vespasian was proclaimed emperor of Rome in the year A.D. 69, while he was engaged in the Jewish war. Caesarea became the birthplace of the church historian Eusebius (c. 260) and the seat of his bishopric. It is still called Kaysariyeh.

Caesarea Philippi. ses´us-ree´uh-fil´i-pi´ (Gk. Kaisareia tēs Philippou). A town at the extreme N boundary of Palestine, about 30 mi. (50 km.) inland from TYRE and 50 mi. (80 km.) SW of DAMASCUS. It lies in the beautiful hill country on the southern slopes of Mount HERMON and was probably near the scene of Jesus' TRANSFIGURATION (cf. Matt. 16:13—17:8; Mk. 8:27—9:8). The town was very ancient, and some have speculated that it may be the BAAL GAD of Josh. 12:7; 13:5. Caesarea Philippi was a center of worship of the heathen god Pan, and thus the city came to be known as Paneas, whence the modern Arabic name Banias. AUGUSTUS CAESAR presented it, with the surrounding country, to HEROD the Great, who built a temple there in honor of the emperor. Herod's son, PHILIP the tetrarch, enlarged the town and named it Caesarea Philippi to distinguish it from the other Caesarea. It lies at the easternmost of the four sources of the JORDAN, and nearby these streams unite to form the main river. It was at a secluded spot near here that the Lord began to prepare his disciples for his approaching sufferings and death and resurrection, and that PETER made his famous confession (Matt. 16:13-17).

Caesar's household. A term referring to the imperial staff, composed of both slaves and freedmen; it was more commonly applied to the imperial civil service, usually at ROME, but also throughout the empire, particularly in the imperial provinces. When PAUL says to the PHILIPPIANS, "All the saints send you greetings, especially those who belong to Caesar's household" (Phil. 4:22), it is natural to infer that the apostle was writing from Rome. Some scholars, however, have argued that the epistle may have been written while he was imprisoned elsewhere (EPHESUS and CAESAREA have been suggested).

cage. This English term is used in Bible versions to render two rare Hebrew words that refer to an enclosure for confining birds (Jer. 5:27) or animals (Ezek. 19:9; Heb. sûgar H6050). The KJV uses the word also in the NT, where BABYLON is described as "a cage of every unclean and hateful bird" (Rev. 18:2; the NIV and other versions have "haunt").

Caiaphas. kay'uh-fuhs (Gk. Kaiaphas G2780). The official high priest during the ministry and trial of Jesus (Matt. 26:3, 57; Lk. 3:2; Jn. 11:49; 18:13-14, 24, 28; Acts 4:6). During the intertestamental period, the high priesthood evolved into a political office, the priests still coming from the descendants of AARON but being generally appointed for worldly considerations. When Pompey gained control of JUDEA in 63 B.C., the Romans took over the authority of appointing not only the civil rulers (e.g., HEROD) but the high priests also, with the result that the office declined spiritually. ANNAS, father-in-law of Caiaphas (Jn. 18:13), had been high priest by appointment of the Roman governor from A.D. 7 to 14 (see Lk. 3:2), and though three of his sons succeeded for a short period, Caiaphas held the office from 18 to 36, with Annas still a sort of "high priest emeritus."

After Jesus had raised LAZARUS from the dead (Jn. 11), many of the Jews believed in him (11:45-46), but some through jealousy reported the matter to the PHARISEES. With the chief priests they gathered a council, fearing, or pretending to fear, that if Jesus were let alone many would accept him and the Romans would destroy what was left of Jewish autonomy. Caiaphas declared that it would be better for Jesus to die than for the whole nation to be destroyed (11:41-53). When our Lord was betrayed into the hands of his enemies, the Roman soldiers and the Jewish officers took him first to the house of Annas, where by night he was given the pretense of a trial (18:12-23). Then Annas sent him bound to Caiaphas before whom the "trial" continued (18:24-27). Afterward he was delivered to PILATE because the Jews could not legally execute him. As a SADDUCEE opposed to the teaching of the RESURRECTION, Caiaphas took a leading part in the persecution of the early church. In Acts 4:6 he is named second among the Sadducean leaders who assembled to try Peter and John. That Annas rather than Caiaphas is here called "the high priest" is problematic, but seems to be further evidence of the continued power of the former high priest. Caiaphas is also probably the high priest mentioned in Acts as the bitter persecutor of the Christians (Acts 5:17-21, 27; 7:1; 9:1).

Cain. kayn (Heb. qayin H7803, possibly “metal worker,” but by popular etymology, “acquired” [Gen. 4:1]; Gk. Kain G2782). (1) The first son of ADAM and EVE, and a farmer by occupation. As an offering to God, he brought some of the fruits of the ground, while his brother brought an animal sacrifice (Gen. 4). Angry when his offering was not received (Heb. 11:4 shows that he lacked a right disposition toward God), he murdered his brother. He added to his guilt before God by denying the act and giving no evidence of repentance. He fled to the land of NOD and there built a city, becoming the ancestor of a line that included JABAL, forefather of tent-dwelling cattle-keepers; JUBAL, forefather of musicians; TUBAL-CAIN, forefather of smiths; and LAMECH, a man of violence. Cain is described in the NT as being “of the evil one” (1 Jn. 3:12; cf. Jude 11).

(2) Alternate form of KAIN.

Cainan. kay'nuhn (Gk. Kainam G2783). (1) Son of ARPHAXAD and grandson of SHEM, included in Luke's GENEALOGY OF JESUS CHRIST (Lk. 3:36; this name is not found in the MT, but see the LXX at Gen. 10:24 and 11:12).

(2) Alternate form of KENAN.

Calah. kay'luh (Heb. kelah H3996, possibly “strength”). One of the capital cities of ASSYRIA. Now called Nimrud and located in the NE angle of the confluence of the TIGRIS and Upper Zab rivers, it is c. 25 mi. (40 km.) S of NINEVEH on the E bank of the Tigris. According to Gen. 10:8-12, Calah was built by NIMROD (the KJV and other versions understand the Heb. text to mean that it was built by ASSHUR). The city was apparently rebuilt by Shalmaneser I (1274-1245 B.C.) and then later abandoned until it was restored by Ashurnasirpal (883-859). Calah fell to the Medes and Babylonians in 612 B.C. Excavations at this site have revealed immense statuary in the form of winged bulls and lions. Also discovered at Calah was the famous Black Obelisk of Shalmaneser III that portrays, among other captives, JEHU of Israel.

calamus. See PLANTS.

Calcol. kal'kol (Heb. kalkōl H4004, possibly “sustaining”). TNIV Kalkol. Son or descendant of MAHOL and one of the sages whom SOLOMON surpassed in wisdom (1 Ki. 4:31; KJV, “Chalcol”). Many believe, however, that “the sons of Mahol” refers to a guild of musicians. Calcol is elsewhere listed as a son or descendant of ZERAH, JUDAH’s son by TAMAR (1 Chr. 2:6; cf. v. 4). See also DARDA; ETHAN.

caldron. A large earthenware or metal vessel in which meat is to be boiled; the word is sometimes translated “pot” in modern versions (Jer. 52:18, 19; Ezek. 11:3, 7, 11).

Caleb. kay'luhb (Heb. kālēb H3979, “dog”). (1) The son of JEPHUNNEH the KENIZZITE; he was a leader of the tribe of JUDAH whom MOSES sent with eleven others to spy out the Promised Land (Num. 13:6). Most of the spies brought back a pessimistic report. Their names are almost forgotten; but two heroes of faith, Caleb and JOSHUA, who encouraged the people to go up and take the land, are still remembered. Because Israel in cowardice adopted the majority report, God imposed on them forty years of “wandering” in the wilderness until that generation died out. Caleb was forty years old when the spies were sent (Josh. 14:7). At the age of eighty-five, when the land of Canaan was being distributed, he asked for, and received, HEBRON and the hill country. There lived the fearful ANAKITES who had terrorized ten of the spies. Later he became father-in-law of OTHNIEL, the first of the “judges,” by giving him ACSAH his daughter (Jdg. 1:12-15, 20).

(2) Son of HEZRON and descendant of JUDAH through PEREZ (1 Chr. 2:9 [KJV and other versions, “Chelubai” or “Kelubai”]; 18-19, 42).

Caleb Ephrathah. kay'luhb-ef'ruh-thuh (Heb. kālēb eprātâ H3980). Possibly a village, otherwise unknown, where HEZRON is said to have died (1 Chr. 2:24). Many scholars, however, emend the Hebrew on the basis of the SEPTUAGINT and read, “After the death of Hezron, Caleb went in to Ephrathah, the wife of Hezron his father” (thus RSV). See EPHRATH.

calendar. A system of measuring time by reference to recurring phenomena or to computed intervals. Calendars are devised as a trustworthy means for recording history and determining dates in advance for social, civic, and religious anniversaries, and for economic planning. Comparatively little is known of the calendar of the early Israelites from the PATRIARCHS to the EXILE, but a critical study of the biblical records and archaeological discoveries is rewarding. During the Bible period, time was reckoned primarily on astronomical observations. The early Chaldean and Egyptian astrologers became quite learned in the movements of astronomical bodies. Their discoveries, as well as those of other ANE neighbors, made their impact on the Jewish calendar. From earliest times the sun and moon were determinants of periods: days, months, and years.

I. Day. In the biblical record of time, days begin with the account of ^{CREATION} (Gen. 1:5, 8, et al.). While the Babylonian day began at sunrise, the Bible reckoned the twenty-four-hour span from sunset to sunset (Deut. 23:11), probably taking its clue from the repeated phrase in the creation narrative. Nehemiah 4:21 suggests that the end of one day and the beginning of the next was actually marked by the appearance of the stars. Days of the week were not named but were designated by ordinal numbers. The term ^{SABBATH} was not so much the name of the seventh day as it was a sacred designation.

One of the earliest Hebrew texts (10th cent. B.C.), this limestone inscription discovered at Gezer lists the agricultural phases of the year.

Days were also subdivided in a manner set forth in the creation account. And God said, “Let there be lights in the expanse of the sky to separate the day from the night...the greater light to govern the day” (Gen. 1:14-16; see also Num. 9:16; Ruth 3:13). In the OT the day, as distinguished from the night, was not divided into exact periods but by broad terms such as evening, morning, midday, and (literally) “between the evenings” (e.g., Exod. 12:6). The division of the day into hours is ancient in Babylonia, and Isa. 39:8 (cf. 2 Ki. 20:9-10) shows that timing devices were known among the Hebrews as well. Babylonians divided the day by sun-watches into twelve equal parts, which were subdivided by the sexagenary system into minutes and seconds.

The Egyptians divided the day plus the night into twenty-four hours, for which they had at least two calibrated measuring devices. One was a shadow clock, comprised of a horizontal piece of wood with markings to which was attached at one end a short T-like piece, set toward the E in the morning and toward the W in the afternoon. A specimen dating about 1400 B.C. is now in the Berlin Museum. Another Egyptian timepiece was the water-clock, clepsydra, the oldest-known specimen of which dates from the reign of Amenhotep III. It is of alabaster, shaped like a flower-pot, with calibrated marks inside and a small aperture near the bottom through which the water gradually flowed out.

Early Hebrews divided the night into three watches: “the morning watch” (Exod. 14:24); “the middle watch” (Jdg. 7:19); and “at the beginning of the watches” (Lam. 2:19 NRSV). The Romans divided the night into four watches, from which Jesus drew an analogy in his eschatological warning of unpredictable time: “. . . in the evening, or at midnight, or when the rooster crows, or at dawn” (Mk. 13:35). In the NT Jn. 11:9 records the rhetorical question of Jesus, “Are there not twelve hours of daylight?” (as distinguished from night). This kind of daily reckoning is also seen in the crucifixion account that mentions the third, sixth, and ninth hours (Mk. 15:25, 33, 34), referring approximately to 9 a.m., noon, and 3 p.m.

II. Week. The seven-day week appears to be of Semitic origin, but reckoned from various reference points. The Babylonians and Assyrians bound their weeks to the lunar cycle, corresponding with the four phases of the moon, and beginning anew with each new moon. The biblical week had its origin in the seven-day creation account and ran consecutively in a free-week system irrespective of lunar or solar cycles. This approach reflects the high esteem held for the Sabbath. The Egyptian week had ten days. In contrast to other time units (measured by the sun, moon, and stars), the week alone was not controlled by celestial bodies, but originated by divine command for man’s economic, physical, and spiritual welfare.

Though God placed special emphasis on the seventh day at the time of creation (Gen. 2:2-3), the records are silent as to its observance during the long interlude between then and MOSES’ day. If the people of the pre-flood era or of the patriarchal period observed a “sabbath,” there are no biblical records of it. However, since sabbath observance was kept alive in tradition until recorded in Genesis, it is a reasonable conjecture that it was preserved in practice also. Anyway, it was either revived or given special emphasis by Moses. The first recorded instance of the observance of “a day of rest, a holy Sabbath to the LORD” (Exod. 16:23) was when the Israelites were gathering manna in the wilderness. Subsequently, the Sabbath became the most holy, as well as the most frequent, of all the sacred days observed by the Jews.

When Moses transmitted to Israel the fourth commandment in the Decalogue, “Remember the Sabbath day by keeping it holy” (Exod. 20:8), it was designated as a perpetual memorial sign of the COVENANT between God and his chosen people. “You must observe my Sabbaths. This will be a sign between me and you for the generations to come, so you may know that I am the LORD, who makes you holy” (31:12-13). It became a distinctive day with successive injunctions to observe it, describing the manner of doing so and the penalties for its desecration (23:12; 35:2-3). Emphasis on keeping the Sabbath is seen in the DEAD SEA SCROLLS and in the bitter accusations hurled at Jesus on this point (Mk. 2:24). Jesus confirmed the divine authenticity of this special day by going “into the synagogue, as was his custom” on the Sabbath day to teach, preach, and heal (Lk. 4:16), and by affirming, “The Sabbath was made for man” (Mk. 2:27a); but the additional comment, “not man for the Sabbath” (2:27b) reflects his displeasure with the misuse of the day by some of his contemporaries.

III. Month. This English term is derived from the word moon, and a similar connection is found in other languages, including Hebrew. Because of the moon’s regular cycles, ancient peoples measured time by it and often worshiped it. The Egyptian moon-god Thoth was the god of measure. Even in Israel the moon and other heavenly bodies were worshiped at times (2 Ki. 23:5; Jer. 8:2). The early Israelites designated their months by names that they borrowed from the Canaanites or Phoenicians. These names had seasonal connotations as implied in the four that have survived in the early biblical records. ABIB (Exod. 13:4; Deut. 16:1), corresponding to Nisan in the later calendar, means “[month of the] ripening head of grain.” ZIV (1 Ki. 6:1), corresponding to Iyyar, means “[month of] blossoms.” ETHANIM (8:2), corresponding to Tishri, means “[month of] perennial streams.” BUL (6:38), corresponding to Marchesvan, may mean “autumn rain” (being the first month in the rainy season) or “harvest.”

The Gezer Calendar, dated in the tenth century B.C., gives an interesting glimpse into the agricultural life in Palestine at that early date. This archaeological find is a limestone plaque bearing a Hebrew inscription enumerating farm operations for eight months, mentioning sowing, flax harvest, barley harvest, and vine pruning. The prophet HAGGAI, about 520 B.C., at the time of the rebuilding of the temple, uses the numeral designation of months without names (Hag. 1:1; 2:1, 10), but his contemporary ZECHARIAH relates the numeral month to the Babylonian names, which came into popular use after the EXILE: “the eleventh month, the month of Shebat” (Zech. 1:7; see also 7:1). These postexilic names of months were not used for civil and historical purposes. The first month in the Jewish religious calendar, still used today, is Nisan (late March to early April), followed by Iyyar, Sivan, Tammuz, Ab, Elul, Tishri, Marchesvan (Cheshvan), Kislev, Tebeth, Shebat, and Adar. These, like the early Canaanite names, probably had their origin close to nature, but the derivation of some of them is uncertain. When religious responsibility was vested in the SANHEDRIN, three of their number, including the chief, were entrusted as watchmen to report the first appearance of the new moon. A declaration of the beginning of a new month was then quickly dispatched over the country by fire signals, and later by messengers.

IV. Year. The Hebrew calendar contained two concurrent years: the sacred year, beginning in the spring with the month Nisan, and the civil year, beginning in the fall with Tishri. The sacred year was instituted by Moses following the EXODUS and consists of twelve or thirteen lunar months of twenty-nine and a half days each. The civil year claims a more remote antiquity, reckoning from the creation, which according to tradition took place in autumn. It came into popular use in the third century of the Christian era. That this order of the year was kept by the ancient Hebrews is supported by the Mosaic command, "Celebrate the Feast of Ingathering at the end of the year, when you gather in your crops from the field" (Exod. 23:16). According to JOSEPHUS (Ant. 1.3.3), Moses ordered that the year of holy days and religious festivals begin with Nisan, the month in which the exodus transpired, but that he retained the old order of year for buying and selling and secular affairs. This observation has been confirmed by critical study and subsequent Jewish custom of keeping both a sacred and a civil year.

The Babylonians and Egyptians devised the intercalary month in order to reconcile the lunar and solar years. The Jewish leap years in their Metonic cycle of nineteen years were fixed, adding an intercalary month to the third, sixth, ninth, eleventh, fourteenth, seventeenth, and nineteenth years. If on the sixteenth of the month Nisan the sun had not reached the vernal equinox, the month was declared to be the second Adar and the following one Nisan. (In 46 B.C., a great advance was made by Julius CAESAR, whose calendar year contained 365 1/4 days; it had a discrepancy of eleven minutes in excess of the solar year, and so was superseded by the Gregorian Calendar in A.D. 1582, which has the very small error of gaining one day in 325 years.)

FEASTS and fasts were intricately woven into the lunar-solar sacred year. Three great historic feasts were instituted by Moses: Unleavened Bread, Harvest, and Ingathering (Exod. 23:14-16), corresponding roughly to Passover, Pentecost, and Thanksgiving. There were also numerous minor feasts. Beginning in the month Nisan or Abib (Neh. 2:1; Exod. 23:15), the sacred holidays of feasts and fasts came in the following order: On the fourteenth of Nisan, the Passover (Exod. 12:18-19; 13:3-10) was observed in preparation for the following week's festival and in eating the paschal supper (see Matt. 26:17-29). The fifteenth to twenty-first was the Feast of Unleavened Bread (Lev. 23:6), which included, on the fifteenth, a Sabbath, a day of holy convocation; on the sixteenth, Omer, or presenting the first sheaves of harvest; and on the twenty-first, another holy convocation. (The Christian Easter, fulfilling the Passover, is reckoned on solarlunar cycles, coming on the first full moon on or after the vernal equinox, about March 21.).

On the tenth day of the second month, Iyyar (known formerly as Ziv), the Jews fasted in commemoration of the death of ELIJAH; the fourteenth was the Second or Little Passover for those who could not keep the regular one (cf. Num. 9:10-11); and on the sixteenth was a fast for the death of SAMUEL. Pentecost (also known as Feast of Weeks, or of Harvest, or of Firstfruits), when loaves as firstfruits of the gathered harvest were presented (Exod. 23:16; 34:22; Lev. 23:17, 20; Num. 28:26; Deut. 16:9-10), was celebrated on the sixth or seventh of Sivan (Esth. 8:9; cf. Acts 2:1). This was the first of the two great agricultural feasts, coming at the end of seven weeks after the beginning of barley harvest, or fifty days after the Passover.

Next in annual order was the New Year (Rosh Hashanah), one of the most important feasts and possibly the oldest, observed on the first day of the civil year, in the month Tishri (formerly Ethanim or seventh month, 1 Ki. 8:2). It was called the Feast of Trumpets, a precursor of one emblem of modern New Year's celebrations. It was a day of holy convocation, of reading the law (Neh. 8:1-8), of blowing trumpets, of burnt offerings, of cereal offerings, and of profound solemnity, introducing "Ten Days of Repentance" (cf. Num. 29:1-16; Ezra 3:4-6). This protracted feast culminated in the Day of Atonement (Yom Kippur), the tenth of Tishri, the most holy day for the Jews. This is strictly a fast day and the only one commanded by law (Lev. 16:26-34; 23:27-32; called "the fast" in Acts 27:9). The Jewish calendar does not allow Rosh Hashanah or Yom Kippur to fall on the day before or the day after the Sabbath; the same is true for the seventh day of Tabernacles. From the fifteenth to the twenty-first of Tishri the Jews held the Feast of Ingatherings (or Tabernacles or Booths—recalling the wilderness wandering), when the firstfruits of wine and oil were offered (Exod. 23:16; Lev. 23:34-42; Deut. 16:13). It was a day of soul-searching and expiation of sins and of deep gratitude to God. It was the third of the three great feasts commanded by Moses, and the second of the two great agricultural feasts, corresponding to our modern Thanksgiving.

Winter holy days were few, though one of significance is mentioned in Jn. 10:22-23: "Then came the Feast of Dedication at Jerusalem. It was winter, and Jesus was in the temple area." Dedication of the temple was instituted by Judas MACCABEE in 164 B.C. This feast was held on the twenty-fifth of Kislev (Zech. 7:1). Besides the one divinely ordained fast, the Day of Atonement, there were minor fasts, some temporary (Ezra 9:5; Neh. 1:4) and some annual. One fast in memory of the destruction of Jerusalem by NEBUCHADNEZZAR (2 Ki. 25:1-7), instituted after the exile, was observed on the ninth of Ab. Another, the fast of ESTHER, was observed on the thirteenth of Adar and was followed the next two days by the Feast of Purim.

V. Cycles. From God's hallowing of the seventh day there arose a special sacredness in relation to the number seven. Religious convocations and festivals were highly regarded on the seventh day (Sabbath), seventh week (Pentecost), seventh month (Trumpets), seventh year (sabbatical year), and seven times seven years (Jubilee). The sabbatical year was one of solemn rest for landlords, slaves, beasts of burden, and land, and of freedom for Hebrew slaves. Only what grew of itself on the farm and vineyard was to be gathered and consumed (Exod. 23:10-11; Lev. 25:3-7). The sabbatical and Jubilee years were synchronized with the civil or agricultural year, beginning in autumn. The Jubilee, every fiftieth year, following "seven weeks of years," was a hallowed year whose observance included family reunions, canceled mortgages, and the return of lands to their original owners (Lev. 25:8-17).

calf. See ANIMALS.

calf worship. A part of the religious worship of almost all ancient Semitic peoples. At least as early as the EXODUS, living bulls were worshiped in Egypt. The Babylonians looked on the bull as the symbol of their greatest gods. The bull was a sacred animal in PHOENICIA and SYRIA. Among the Semitic Canaanites the bull was the symbol of BAAL. It appears that the bull was in some way connected with the reproductive processes of plants and animals and with the sun. It symbolized strength, vigor, and endurance.

While MOSES was on the mountain receiving God's law, AARON made a golden image of a male calf in order that the people might worship the Lord under this form (Exod. 32:4). It is unlikely that the golden calf was a representation of an Egyptian deity; the feast held in connection with this worship was characterized as a "festival to the Lord" (32:5). Centuries later, after the division of the kingdom, JEROBOAM set up two golden calves in Israel, one at BETHEL and one at DAN (1 Ki. 12:28-29), because he feared that his people might desert him if they continued to worship in JERUSALEM. He was not trying to make heathenism the state religion, for the bull images were erroneously supposed to represent the God of Israel. In time, these images, at first recognized as symbols, came to be regarded as common idols (1 Ki. 12:30; Hos. 13:2).

Caligula. kuh-lig'yuh-luh. Gaius Julius Caesar Germanicus, nicknamed Caligula ("Little Boots") by the soldiers of the Rhine, was born in A.D. 12. After his father's death in 19 and his mother's arrest in 29, he lived with his uncle, the aging TIBERIUS. On the death of Tiberius in 37, Gaius was acclaimed emperor. In the first year of his principate Gaius was seriously ill, and on his recovery manifested those symptoms of sadistic madness and irresponsible folly for which he is chiefly remembered. Gaius's assassination in 41 ended a period of odious cruelty and dangerous tyranny, one effect of which would have been to anticipate the Jewish rebellion by thirty years. Gaius had given the order to set up his statue in the JERUSALEM Holy of Holies. It was only the brave temporizing of the legate of SYRIA, and Gaius's death, which averted disaster. PHILO JUDAEUS, the Alexandrian Jewish scholar, headed an embassy to Gaius in 39 or 40, and his vivid account (Legatio ad Gaium) sheds lurid light on the horrors of the young madman's brief principate.

call. This English term is very common in the Bible, representing over twenty Hebrew and Greek words, but principally with four different meanings: (1) To speak out in the way of prayer—"Call to me and I will answer you" (Jer. 33:3). (2) To summon or appoint—"I am calling all the tribes of the kingdoms of the north" (Jer. 1:15 NRSV). (3) To name a person or thing—"God called the light 'day'" (Gen. 1:5). (4) To invite people to accept salvation through Christ.

The last usage indicates a call by God through the HOLY SPIRIT; it is heavenly (Heb. 3:1) and holy (2 Tim. 1:9). This call comes to people in all situations and occupations (1 Cor. 1:26; 7:20). Often a distinction is made between the universal call ("many are called, but few are chosen," Matt. 22:14 NRSV) and the effectual call ("those he called, he also justified," Rom. 8:30). Christians are therefore described as "called" in the special sense that they have responded to the divine invitation (Rom. 1:6-7; 1 Cor. 1:2, 24; et al.).

Calneh, Calno. kal'neh, kal'noh (Heb. kalnēh H4011; kalnô H4012). TNIV Kalneh, Kalno. (1) One of the cities founded by NIMROD in SHINAR and cited in association with BABEL, ERECH, and AKKAD (Gen. 10:10). The location of the city, however, is unknown. As a result, some suggest a change in the Hebrew vowels, yielding the translation "all of them" (cf. NRSV).

(2) A city named "Calneh" appears in association with HAMATH and GATH (Amos 6:2). Elsewhere "Calno" is associated with CARCHEMISH (Isa. 10:9). Calneh and Calno are doubtless to be regarded as identical, but the contexts would seem to warrant a location to the N rather than in the area of Babel, Erech, and Akkad (see #1 above). Further support for a location in the N is claimed by those who believe that Calneh is the same as CANNEH (Ezek. 27:23). Many scholars identify Calneh with Kullania, a town mentioned in Assyrian documents in frequent association with Arpad. It is quite probably the modern Kullan Köy, located about 8 mi. (13 km.) NE of ALEPPO in SYRIA.

calves of our lips. The clause “so we will render the calves of our lips” is the KJV’s rendering of a difficult Hebrew clause (Hos. 14:2 [Heb. v. 3]). The meaning is probably, “and instead of bulls, we will offer as sacrifice our lips in praise” (NIV, “that we may offer the fruit of our lips”; cf. Heb. 13:15).

camel. See ANIMALS.

camel’s hair. A phrase mentioned only in Matt. 3:4 and Mk. 1:6, where we are told that JOHN THE BAPTIST wore a garment of that material. It is probable, however, that this was not a garment made of the relatively expensive woven camel’s hair, but of dressed camel’s skin. Such garments are still used in the Near East. Some think that Elijah’s mantle was made of camel’s hair (2 Ki. 1:8; cf. Zech. 13:4).

Camon. See KAMON.

camp, encampment. A group of tents intended for traveling or for temporary residence as in case of war—contrasted with villages, towns, or cities that are composed of houses and other more or less permanent buildings. The Hebrew word maḥāneh H4722 occurs over two hundred times and is properly rendered “camp,” but it is often translated “host” and occasionally “army,” indicating the military purpose of the encampment. In Gen. 32:1-2, when the angels of God met JACOB, the patriarch exclaimed, “This is the camp of God!” and he named the place MAHANAIM, or “Two Camps,” referring to God’s host and his own.

In the wilderness the Israelites were given precise instructions as to the order and arrangements of their camp, both at rest and in traveling (Num. 2). The TABERNACLE in the center indicated the centrality of God in their life and worship. It was surrounded rather closely by the three families of the priests and Levites, and then farther back were the twelve tribes. In Deut. 23:9-14 the sanitary and ceremonial observances, which were used to keep the camp clean and wholesome, are given. Three tribes were grouped on each side of the tabernacle under the banners of the leading tribes: Judah eastward, with Issachar and Zebulun; Reuben southward, with Simeon and Gad; Ephraim westward, with Manasseh and Benjamin; and Dan northward, with Asher and Naphtali. When they marched, the Levites, carrying the tabernacle, occupied the center of the line. The high command was located there.

Cana. kay'nuh (Gk. Kana G2830, prob. “reed”). Cana of GALILEE is mentioned four times in the Gospel of John and nowhere else in Scripture. It was in the highlands of Galilee, as one had to go down from there to CAPERNAUM; but opinions differ as to its exact location. It may have been at Kefr Kenna, about 5 mi. (8 km.) NE of NAZARETH, or at Khirbet Qana, a little farther N. Here Jesus performed his first miracle, graciously relieving the embarrassment caused by the shortage of wine at a marriage feast (Jn. 2:1-11). It was here too that he announced to the nobleman from Capernaum the healing of his apparently dying son (4:46). NATHANAEL came from Cana (21:2).

Canaan, Canaanites. kay'nuhn, kay'nuh-nits (Heb. kēna ʿan H4046, gentilic kēna ʿānî H4050; Gk. Chanaan G5913 [KJV NT, “Chanaan”], gentilic Chananaïos G5914). Fourth son of HAM, father of SIDON, and ancestor of many Canaanite people groups, such as the HITTITES, the JEBUSITES, and the AMORITES (Gen. 9:18; 10:6, 15-18). For reasons that are unclear, he received the curse from NOAH as a result of Ham’s offense (9:22-27). In the Bible, the name is used almost always to designate the land W of JORDAN occupied by the Israelites at the time of the conquest, though in a wider sense it included part of SYRIA. The etymology of the name is unknown, but early Egyptian inscriptions use it for the coastland between EGYPT and ASIA MINOR. In the AMARNA letters of c. 1400 B.C. the name is applied to the Phoenician coast.

According to Jdg. 1:9-10, Canaanites lived throughout the land. According to some passages (Gen. 12:6; 24:3, 37; Josh. 3:10), the Canaanites included the whole pre-Israelite population, even E of the Jordan. The language of Canaan (Isa. 19:18) refers to the group of W Semitic languages of which Hebrew, Phoenician, and Moabite were dialects. The Canaanites were of Semitic stock and were part of a large migration of Semites from NE ARABIA in the third millennium B.C. They came under Egyptian control c. 1500. The Israelites were never able to exterminate the Canaanites completely, and many were undoubtedly absorbed by their Israelite conquerors. Their continued presence with their heathen practices created serious religious problems for the Hebrew nation.

The Canaanite social structure was akin to that which prevailed all over the ANE; that is, it was comprised of city states in which the king had wide powers to appoint and conscript his subjects for military service, to control lands and lease them for services rendered, to impose taxation of various kinds, and to compel his subjects to undertake public works (corvée). There were several strata in society, such as freemen, semifreemen (clients), and slaves. The slaves comprised war captives, foreign slaves, and native Canaanites who became slaves because of debt or unemployment, or because parents sold them or exposed them as children. Slaves might belong to the state, to the temple, to private landowners, or to craftsmen.

The economy was based on AGRICULTURE. All land was owned by the state, the temples, and private landowners, although tenant farmers possessed small areas. Since society was basically feudal, much of the land was held as a grant from the king. Members of the royal family, state officials, and others owed the king specified services and taxation in return for their lands. There was a severe difference in living standards between the upper class patricians and the wide range of lower-class people such as half-free serfs, slaves, etc. Some evidence of class distinction comes from excavations that reveal some fine houses and many inferior houses. The population was distributed in the larger towns and their numerous associated villages or suburbs (many references in Josh. 13-19).

The excavations at Ugarit (RAS SHAMRA) have revealed an unsuspected world of Canaanite literature. The texts, which date from the early fourteenth century B.C., are written on clay tablets in the special thirty-letter cuneiform alphabet. Among the more important epics are three: the Baal Epic, which recounts the deeds and fortunes of Baal or Hadad; the legend of Aqhat, the only son of the good King Danel; the story of King Keret, who was bereft of his family and took another wife by conquest, thus incurring the wrath of the gods. There are fragments of other stories as well as a wide variety of letters, treaties, etc. Important insights into Canaanite religious beliefs, and into numerous aspects of national and family life shine through these epics.

The OT gives hints of a Canaanite pantheon that is now known to have been extensive. The senior deity was EL, to whom matters were referred by other gods. For practical purposes, however, BAAL (Lord) was more significant. He is known in the OT in his various local manifestations as the fertility god par excellence and is to be equated with HADAD the storm god. Both he and DAGON had a temple in Ugarit. Among the goddesses were ANATH, ASHERAH, and ASHTORETH, deities of sex and war. At Ugarit there was a high priest and no less than twelve families of priests. In ancient times the king exercised some priestly functions, which he retained in part in later times. Canaanite temples have been excavated in Syria and Palestine. Among the most famous of these is the Late Bronze Temple of LACHISH, the temples at MEGIDDO and JERICHO from c. 3000 B.C., three at Megiddo from c. 1900, two at BETH SHAN from the Late Bronze Age, and several important temples at HAZOR from the Late Bronze Age also.

canals. This English term is used in Bible versions to translate the plural form of Hebrew yē ʾôr H3284 (Exod. 7:19; 8:5). The singular normally refers to the NILE, so the relevant passages indicate irrigation canals branching off from this river. Other Hebrew words for “river” are also rendered “canal” in the NIV (Ezra 8:15; Dan. 8:2-3, 6; et al.).

Cananaean. kay’nuh-nee’uhn (Gk. Kananaios G2831). Surname given to SIMON, one of Jesus’ disciples (NRSV and other versions at Matt. 10:4; Mk. 3:18; NIV, “Simon the Zealot”). This epithet served to distinguish him from Simon PETER. The KJV, following many Greek MSS, reads the incorrect form “Canaanite,” which properly means an inhabitant of CANAAN. The term “Cananaean” is rather a Greek transliteration of the Aramaic qan ʾān, meaning “zealot, enthusiast.” Accordingly, the Lukan lists have “the Zealot” (Lk. 6:15 and Acts 1:13; these passages are the basis for the NIV rendering in Matt. 10:4 and Mk. 3:18). Thus the identification of this Simon is essentially the same in all four accounts. The surname presumably was given to him because he had been a member of the ZEALOTS, a religio-political party in first-century Palestine.

Candace. kan´duh-see (Gk. Kandakē G2833). TNIV Kandake. The title of the queen of ETHIOPIA, whose treasurer was baptized between JERUSALEM and GAZA by PHILIP the evangelist (Acts 8:26-27; see also ETHIOPIAN EUNUCH). By Ethiopia is meant the kingdom of Nubia in the N Sudan, whose capital was Meroē. Classical writers refer to several queens of Meroē in the first century B.C. and the first century A.D. who had the title Candace (in the form Kadake). The Candace of Acts 8:27 was probably Amantitere, who ruled about A.D. 25-41. She and her husband built or added to several Nubian temples, and her pyramid and tomb have been discovered in Meroē.

Canneh. kan´uh (Heb. kannēh H4034). TNIV Kanneh. A city in N MESOPOTAMIA, mentioned alongside HARAN and Eden (BETH EDEN) as places with which TYRE traded garments and fabric (Ezek. 27:23-24). Some scholars have identified Canneh with CALNEH (Amos 6:2). Others believe it is the same place as Kannu³, a city attested in Assyrian texts and apparently located on an important trade route on the E side of the TIGRIS, near ASSHUR. In either case, Canneh must have been a significant commercial center.

canonicity. The Greek word kanōn G2834 means “measuring rule,” hence more generally “rule” or “standard.” In theology its chief application is to those books received as authoritative and making up our BIBLE. The Protestant canon includes thirty-nine books in the OT, twenty-seven in the NT. The Roman Catholic and Orthodox Canons add seven books and some additional pieces in the OT (See APOCRYPHA). The Jews accept as authoritative the same books of the OT as do Protestants.

It is commonly said that the Protestant test of canonicity is INSPIRATION. That is, Protestants accept into their canon those books they believe to be immediately inspired by God and therefore true, infallible, and inerrant, the very Word of God. To be sure, it is possible for an utterance or a writing to have been inspired by God but not divinely intended to be part of the canon (e.g., it is likely that the book of Isaiah does not include every inspired message spoken by the prophet; and presumably, Paul's so-called "former letter" to the Corinthians [cf. 1 Cor. 5:9] was inspired even though it was not included in the NT). More important, some would argue that any "test" of canonicity necessarily elevates that test as a more ultimate criterion of authority than the Bible itself. The point that needs stressing, however, is that when the creeds of the Reformation age listed the books that were accepted as inspired, these were included not because of the decision of a church or council, but because the books themselves were recognized as true and inspired, having God for their author. The history of the acceptance of these books and the study of the principles on which this acceptance occurred is an important phase of Bible introduction.

I. The OT canon. The Jewish TALMUD names the books of the Hebrew canon in approximately the order found in our Hebrew Bibles today. By combining some of the books (e.g., 1 and 2 Samuel are regarded as one book, and so are the twelve Minor Prophets), the rabbis arrive at the number of twenty-four books. These were divided into five books of Torah or Law (Genesis to Deuteronomy), eight books of Prophets (the Former Prophets being Joshua, Judges, Samuel, and Kings; the Latter Prophets consisting of Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, and the Twelve) and eleven books of Writings (Psalms, Proverbs, Job, Song of Songs, Ruth, Lamentations, Ecclesiastes, Esther, Daniel, Ezra-Nehemiah, Chronicles). The position of Chronicles at the end of the canon is reflected in Lk. 11:51, where ZECHARIAH (cf. 2 Chr. 24:20-22) is reckoned as the last martyr of pre-Christian times, as ABEL was the first. In earlier days they combined Ruth with Judges, and Lamentations with Jeremiah, thus making twenty-two books equivalent to the twenty-two letters in the Hebrew alphabet.

Origen, the Christian scholar of the third century, lists twenty-two OT books, but in the order of the SEPTUAGINT, not that of the Hebrew Bible (which is the order attested in the Talmud). Earlier, about 170, Melito of Sardis tells us that he went to Palestine to ascertain accurately the number of OT books. He lists the five books of the Law first, then the others follow in an order based on the Septuagint and rather similar to that of our English Bible. Before Melito, we have the vital witness of the Jewish historian JOSEPHUS. About A.D. 90 he wrote his work Against Apion. In it he says that the Jews receive twenty-two books:

five of the Law of Moses, thirteen of prophecy, and four of hymns to God and precepts for life. These books, he says, the pious Jew would rather die than alter or deny. He says these books were written by Moses and the succeeding prophets from that time to the days of Artaxerxes (around 400 B.C.) and that other later books, not written by prophets, were not so highly regarded.

Some in the past have argued that the rabbis held a council at Jamnia around A.D. 90 to make formal decisions about the canon and that it was at this time that the Hebrew canon was officially closed. While it is true that for a number of decades after A.D. 70 Jewish sages gathered in Jamnia from time to time to debate a variety of problems, and that these meetings often led to decisions (whether by formal vote or by consensus), the use of such terms as council or synod is misleading. These gatherings should not be compared with the Christian ecumenical councils that reached decisions binding on the church as a whole. Moreover, there is no evidence that questions about the canon were a major concern when the rabbis met.

Earlier evidence on the OT canon gives us no listing but considerable valuable information. PHILO JUDAEUS, the Alexandrian philosopher of the first century A.D., evidently accepted the twenty-two Hebrew books, for he quotes from many of them and from them only, as authoritative. The NT evidence is in accord with this, for most of the OT books are quoted authoritatively. The NT gives no positive evidence on the order of the books, but it reveals in general a twofold division of the OT such as is found in Melito, rather than the threefold division. A dozen times the OT is referred to as the “Law and the Prophets” or “Moses and the Prophets.” As is evident from NT usage, this twofold category included all twenty-two books. Only once does it adopt a threefold classification, “Moses, the Prophets and the Psalms” (Lk. 24:44; but cf. 24:27).

Pre-Christian evidence has been greatly augmented by the discovery in A.D. 1947 of the DEAD SEA SCROLLS of the Qumran community. Previously, only the apocryphal books and other Jewish writings were available. These sources occasionally quoted books of the OT, but not with great frequency. Of special importance was the prologue to Ecclesiasticus, dated in 132 B.C. Three times it refers to the “law, and the prophets, and the other books of our fathers.” One time it refers to these as already translated into Greek—the LXX. Because of the antiquity of this witness, the threefold canon has been held to be original. The twofold canon as referred to in the NT was not then explained. The DSS, however, give four places where the OT is referred to in two categories, the Law and the Prophets, as is usual in the NT. That this twofold canon included all our present books seems apparent from the fact that the Qumran community quoted from most of the OT books, including those later classified in the third division of “Writings”; for example, even the book of Proverbs was treated as authoritative (cf. CD XI, 20). The DSS includes MSS of all the biblical books except Esther. Thus the twofold canon may be as early as, or possibly earlier than, the threefold.

From the above outline of evidence it is easily seen that the canonicity of the books of Tobit, Judith, Wisdom, Ecclesiasticus, Baruch, 1 and 2 Maccabees, and certain additions to Esther and Daniel, has no ancient authority and was not recognized by Christ, the apostles, or the Jewish people. The distinction between those books and the canonical OT writings was generally preserved by the Greek fathers; it was generally overlooked by the Latin fathers. Among the latter the outstanding exception was Jerome; his acquaintance with the Hebrew Bible enabled him to distinguish those books that belonged to the “Hebrew verity” from those of lesser authority. It was he who first called the latter the “apocryphal” books, meaning by that books that might be read in church “for example of life and instruction of manners,” but not for the establishment of doctrine. Jerome’s distinction was reaffirmed at the Reformation in the Anglican Articles of Religion (1562) and has been generally recognized by Lutherans. Those churches, however, that followed the Reformed tradition of Geneva tended to give no authoritative status at all to the Apocrypha. The Council of Trent, by reaction to the Reformers, affirmed the full canonicity of most of the apocryphal books, which are referred to by the term deuterocanonical (i.e., recognized at a “second” or later time).

The fact is that those who spoke the word of God to Israel were called prophets. There is no record of any group of non-prophets who were inspired. Most of the OT books were clearly written by prophets. Also regarded as prophets were authors of some others, like Joshua and Proverbs, Song of Songs, most of the Psalms—at least they received revelations from God (Num. 12:6). For several books, information on authorship is lacking. Jewish tradition classifies the books of Joshua, Judges, Samuel, and Kings as “the Former Prophets.” One has as much right to hold that Ruth, Job, Esther, or Chronicles were written by prophets as to say that Judges was. Apparently these books are included under the designation “Prophets” in the Qumran scrolls and in the NT. If books of prophetic origin were to be received by Israel, this is a practical test that would check on the authority of written teaching as well as oral (cf. Deut. 13:1-5; 18:15-22). On this basis it can be explained how it was that the writings of prophets were accorded prompt acceptance by the faithful (cf. Josh. 1:7, 8; Jer. 36:8-16; 26:18; Dan. 9:2). Hebrews 1:1 sums up the whole matter, “God spoke...through the prophets.”

II. The NT canon. Since the end of the fourth century there has been no question among most of the Christian churches as to which books belong in the NT. Nearly all branches of Christendom have accepted the current twenty-seven books as authoritative and canonical. They are so accepted because they are held to be true and immediately inspired by God. Earlier, there was a general agreement as to the books that the church at large accepted as canonical, but the evidence is not complete in detail for every book. Several books were accepted in some quarters but not in others. Contrary to statements sometimes made, no other books beside these twenty-seven were ever given significant or general acceptance.

One must not, however, confuse the acceptance of the books with the establishment of the canon. In a sense, the canon was established at once as soon as there were inspired books, for the NT books claim authority and recognize the authority of one another. But while canonicity presupposes this recognition of authority, it implies also the collection of authoritative books in such a way that it may be known by ordinary believers which books are authoritative and which are not. Some churches had some of the books early but it took time for all of the books to be distributed and for the evidence of their genuineness to be given to all and accepted by all. Fortunately for us, the early Christians were not gullible; they had learned to try the spirits. This testing of the spirits became especially necessary in the second half of the second century because of the rise of the Montanists, with their claim to the renewed gift of prophecy; it was necessary to submit prophetic utterances to the judgment of Holy Scripture, and this made it of practical importance to know what was Holy Scripture and what was not. Furthermore, the Gnostic heresy rather soon began to multiply spurious writings and this made people cautious. It took time to convince everybody of every book. The history of the collection of the books traces this process.

A. The Period of 170-200. In brief survey we may take three early periods for analysis. Irenaeus of Lyons (c. 180) has not left us a specific list of NT books, but it is evident from his extant writings that, in addition to the self-evident canonicity of the four Gospels, he regarded as canonical Acts, Paul's letters (including the Pastorals), 1 Peter, 1 John, and Revelation. More or less contemporary with Irenaeus is a Latin document known as the Muratorian Canon, which provides a list of books acknowledged to be of apostolic authority. Although some recent scholars have argued that the original Greek work from which the Muratorian Canon was translated may have been produced in Syria or Palestine as late as the fourth century, it is widely believed that this document is the earliest existing list of its kind, composed originally c. A.D. 180-190 in or near Rome. It includes the four Gospels and Acts, thirteen of Paul's letters (with a warning against some forgeries), two letters of John (probably in addition to 1 John, which is separately quoted), Jude, and Revelation. It mentions an apocalypse of Peter, "although some among us will not have this latter read in the churches." (This second-century apocalypse was popular because of its lurid description of the torments of the damned.) The Shepherd of Hermas is rejected from the canon because it is not apostolic and is too late to be included among the prophetic books. The omission of 1 Peter is surprising, especially if (as seems probable) the Muratorian list reflects the usage of the Roman church toward the end of the second century. The omission of Hebrews, on the other hand, is to be expected, because, while it was known in the Roman church from the first century on, it was not accepted there as canonical because it was known not to be the work of Paul.

B. The Period of 140-170. At the beginning of this period the most important figure is Marcion, who published an edition of Holy Scripture (an expurgated Greek NT) at Rome about 144. He rejected the OT as forming no part of Christian Scripture; his canon was a closed canon, comprising an edited text of the Gospel of Luke and ten letters of Paul (excluding the Pastorals). The use of Marcion's canon challenged orthodox churchmen to state more precisely what they believed constituted the canon of Christian Scripture. From this period we now have new evidence in the Gospel of Truth discovered recently in Egypt. This book, written by the Gnostic Valentinus, was referred to by Irenaeus and dates from about 150. It weaves into its pantheistic composition all our NT books except 1 and 2 Timothy, Titus, James, 2 Peter, 2 and 3 John, and Jude. Hebrews and Revelation are definitely included. One scholar has concluded that c. 140-150 a collection of writings known at Rome and accepted as authoritative was "virtually identical with our NT." Justin Martyr, who spent his later years in Rome and whose literary activity spans three decades (135-165), mentions "the memoirs of the apostles"—which, he says, "are called gospels"—and says that they were read in church along with the compositions of the prophets. His disciple Tatian showed his appreciation of the distinctive authority of the four Gospels by arranging their contents into a continuous narrative known as the Diatessaron.

C. The Period of 95-118. Omitting many details, we may turn to the three great witnesses of the earliest age. Clement of Rome, Ignatius, and Polycarp all wrote between 95 and about 118. They show by quotation or clear allusion that they knew and used all our NT books except Luke, Colossians, Philemon, 2 Peter, 2 and 3 John, Jude, and Revelation. Moreover, these authors held the apostles in such high repute that their writings would obviously be treasured and accepted. Clement rather clearly ascribes inspiration to Paul.

D. Later Problems. Although our books were accepted at an early date, the history of their use is discontinuous. The Gospels were never challenged after the collection and publication of the fourfold Gospel until a later group of heretics questioned all of John's writings, claiming that they were spurious. Note that here, as usual, denial of apostolicity involved denial of authority. The book of Hebrews was continuously and from early days received and accepted as Pauline in Egypt. In Rome it was used by Clement, Justin, and Valentinus, although they did not accept it as the work of Paul. The witness of Irenaeus and Tertullian (c. 200) is hardly clear. Finally the views of Egypt and Palestine prevailed and Hebrews was fully accepted. The Roman church was persuaded to include it in the canon in the fourth century under pressure from Athanasius; they agreed to do so not because he convinced them of its Pauline authorship but because they did not wish to be out of step with the rest of Christendom. Second Peter had least external authority, but it was certainly in circulation among the churches by the end of the second century.

E. The NT witness. We must not forget the vital witness of the NT itself. Paul claims the authority of an apostle (1 Cor. 9:1; 2 Cor. 12:11-12) and declares his letters are to be accepted (1 Cor. 14:37; 2 Thess. 3:14). John in Revelation does the same (Rev. 1:3; 22:18-19). Peter insists that Paul's writings are Scripture (2 Pet. 3:15; cf. 3:2). Jude quotes Peter as apostolic (Jude 18). It seems probable that 1 Tim. 5:18 quotes Lk. 10:7 as Scripture. The fact is that, as the early church knew, Christ had promised his apostles a special work of the Spirit, inspiring them as teachers of his revelation (Jn. 14:25; 16:13). It is true that a few, a very few, of the books were actually written by those not themselves apostles. But it is clear that the apostles used helpers in their writing (Rom. 16:22; 1 Pet. 5:12). The early church fathers called such men as Mark, Luke, and the author of Hebrews helpers or disciples of the apostles, and accepted their work as that of the apostles with whom they labored. At least the books were all written and apparently were all accepted within the period of the apostles.

Other indications combine to teach us that these twenty-seven books are rightly in our canon. The Holy Spirit has witnessed through the generations to the saving truth contained in them. These books have brought untold blessing where they have been received and obeyed. The church with one voice finds them to be the very word of God.

canopy. This English term is used a few times in modern versions of the OT to render various Hebrew words, such as sukkâ H6109 (2 Sam 22:12 = Ps. 18:11; this Heb. noun is elsewhere usually translated “booth”) and ḥuppāh H2903 (Isa. 4:5). The NRSV uses it also to render ʿāb H6264 (1 Ki. 7:6, NIV “overhanging roof”; Ezek. 41:25-26, NIV “overhang”).

View of Capernaum looking W to the Sea of Galilee. The modern Catholic church (octangle) is built over Byzantine remains from the 4th-5th cent. The partial reconstruction of the white limestone synagogue sits on top of the basalt synagogue foundation dating to the 1st cent.

Capernaum.

Capernaum. kuh-puhr'nay-uhm (Gk. Kapharnaoum G3019; from Heb. kēpar nahûm, “village of Nahum”). A town on the NW shore of the Sea of Galilee where Jesus made his headquarters during his ministry in GALILEE (Matt. 4:13; Mk. 2:1). In Scripture it is mentioned only in the Gospels, and perhaps did not arise until after the EXILE. That it was a town of considerable size in the days of Christ is shown by a number of facts: a tax collector had his office there (Mk. 2:14); a high officer of King HEROD Antipas had his residence in Capernaum and built a synagogue for the people there (Matt. 8:5-13; Lk. 7:1-10). Jesus performed many striking miracles in the town, among them the healing of the centurion’s palsied servant (Matt. 8:5-13), the paralytic who was lowered through a roof by four friends (Mk. 2:1-13), and a nobleman’s son (Jn. 4:46-54). It was there that Jesus called Matthew to the apostleship as he was sitting at the tax-collector’s booth (Matt. 9:9-13). Capernaum was also the setting for the discourse on the Bread of Life, which followed the feeding of the 5,000 (Jn. 6), and many other addresses (cf. Mk. 9:33-50). In spite of Jesus’ remarkable works and teachings, the people did not repent, and Jesus predicted the complete ruin of the place (Matt. 11:23-24; Lk. 10:15). His prophecy was so completely fulfilled that the town has disappeared and its very site is a matter of debate. There are two main claimants for the honor of being the site: Tell H̄um, which is about 2.5 mi. (4 km.) W of the mouth of the JORDAN, and Khan Minyeh, which is 2.5 mi. (4 km.) further SW of Tell H̄um. Several strands of evidence favor Tell H̄um, and archaeological excavations have given additional support to this identification.

caph. See KAPH.

Caphtor, Caphtorim, Caphtorite. kaf'tor, kaf'tuh-rim, kaf'tuh-rit (Heb. kaptôr H4116, meaning uncertain; gentilic kaptôrî H4118). KJV also Caphthorim (1 Chr. 1:12) and Caphtorims (Deut. 2:23). Explicit references to Caphtor are few. The PHILISTINES and the Caphtorites (or Caphtorim) are both said to have come from Caphtor (Deut. 2:23; Amos 9:7) and are probably to be identified or related. In the Table of Nations (Gen. 10:14; 1 Chr. 1:12), the Philistines are described as having come from the CASLUHITES, but it is often assumed that the phrase in question has been misplaced and that the text should read, “Casluhim, and Caphtorim, from which the Philistines came” (NRSV). In these two passages the Caphtorites are identified as the descendants of MIZRAIM (i.e., EGYPT). The closest the OT comes to giving the location of Caphtor is in Jer. 47:4, where the Philistines are described as “the remnant from the coasts [or isle] of Caphtor,” but even this comment is ambiguous. Most scholars believe that biblical Caphtor is used in the same sense as Akkadian Kaptara and Egyptian Keftiu, referring to Crete. Other proposals include the W part of CILICIA and the island of CYPRUS.

capital. The ornamental top of a PILLAR. This English term is used primarily in the description of the TEMPLE (1 Ki. 7:16-20 et al.), but some versions use it with reference to the posts of the TABERNACLE (e.g., NRSV at Exod. 36:38 et al.). For the sense “major city,” see CITY.

capital punishment. See PUNISHMENT.

Cappadocia. kap'uh-doh'shee-uh (Gk. Kappadokia G2838). A large inland region of ASIA MINOR that apparently was given this name by the Persians. Later the region was divided into two territories of which the more northerly was subsequently named PONTUS and the southerly Cappadocia, the name it retained in NT times. It was bounded on the N by Pontus, on the E by SYRIA and ARMENIA, on the S by CILICIA, and on the W by LYCAONIA. The Romans built roads through the “Cilician gates” in the Taurus range so that Cappadocia could readily be entered from the south. Jews from Cappadocia (Acts 2:9) were among the hearers of the first Christian sermon along with men from other Anatolian provinces; and PETER directed his first letter (1 Pet. 1:1) in part to “God’s elect... scattered throughout” various provinces in the north. It is almost certain that many of these Cappadocian Jews were converted on the Day of Pentecost, and so had the honor of being among the very earliest Christians.

captain. A military leader, although in the Bible the word is not to be understood in the modern sense designating a particular rank in order of command. Over a dozen Hebrew words (with such literal meanings as “head,” “chief,” “ruler,” etc.) are rendered “captain” in the KJV, though modern versions use a greater variety of renderings. Especially frequent is the word śar H8569, referring to the military commander of an army or of a division (e.g., Gen. 21:22; Num. 31:48; Jdg. 5:14), to the keeper of a prison (Gen. 40:3), etc. In the NT it is used by modern versions to render Greek stratēgos G5130 with reference to a temple officer who arrested the apostles (e.g., Acts 4:1; 5:24, cf. v. 26). According to rabbinic literature, this officer was in charge of twenty-four watches, or guard posts, located at important spots about the temple courtyard. See also ARMY. With regard to the application of the term “captain” to Christ in the KJV (Heb. 2:10), see AUTHOR.

captivity. See DISPERSION; EXILE.

caravan. A group of travelers united together for a common purpose or for mutual protection and generally equipped for a long journey, especially in desert country or through foreign and presumably hostile territory. JACOB’s “company” (Gen. 32-33) is a good example of a caravan organized to carry a clan to a new home; and the host of the AMALEKITES whom DAVID destroyed (1 Sam. 30:1-20) was also a caravan, but organized for raiding purposes. In the trackless desert where oases were few and far between and where savage beasts and more savage men were found, it was essential to go in caravans for protection. The word does not occur in the KJV, but “company” and “troop” could often have been “caravan.”

caraway. See PLANTS.

carbuncle. A red precious stone. This term is used by the KJV and other versions in several passages where a better rendering would be “beryl” or “emerald” (Exod. 28:17 et al.). See MINERALS.

Carcas. kahr’kuhs (Heb. karkas H4139, possibly from Old Iranian kahrkāsa, “vulture”). Also Carkas, Karkas. One of seven EUNUCHS who served King XERXES of PERSIA (Esth. 1:10). They were ordered by the king to bring Queen VASHTI before the princes of the empire, during a long banquet, to show off her beauty.

carcass. KJV carcase. The dead body of a person or beast. The word is used to render various words in Scripture with root ideas of something fallen, faded, exhausted; or it may simply denote “body,” such as the lion’s carcass in Jdg. 14:8-9. The law of Moses, probably partly for sanitary reasons, required that carcasses of “unclean” beasts be considered abominable. See Lev. 11:8-40.

Carchemish. kahr´kuh-mish (Heb. karkēmîš H4138; Akk. and Hitt. Kargamish). Also Charchemish. An ancient city of the HITTITES located on the W bank of the EUPHRATES; the modern site is Jerablus, c. 60 mi. (100 km.) NE of Aleppo. Carchemish was important commercially and militarily. For many years it paid tribute to the kings of ASSYRIA. When SARGON captured it in 717 B.C., the Hittite empire fell with it (Isa. 10:9). It was the scene of a great victory by NEBUCHADNEZZAR over Pharaoh NECO in 605 (Jer. 46:2; 2 Chr. 35:20). Its site is called Jerabis or Jerablus.

Careah. See KAREAH.

Carite. kair´it (Heb. kārî H4133). The Carites were a military group, apparently mercenaries, mentioned along with commanders and guards who were assigned to protect young King Joash/JEHOASH (2 Ki. 11:4, 19; KJV, “captains”). Their identity is uncertain. Some scholars argue that they were mercenaries from CARIA; others identify the Carites with the KERETHITES (cf. the Qere reading in 2 Sam. 20:23).

Carkas. See CARCAS.

Carmel. kahr'muhl (Heb. karmel H4150 and H4151, “orchard, plantation”; gentilic karmēlî H4153, “Carmelite”). (1) A city of the MAON district within the tribal territory of JUDAH (Josh. 15:55); it is identified with modern Khirbet el-Kirmil, located 7.5 mi. (12 km.) SE of HEBRON. It lies on the edge of the Judean desert, in a pastoral region of broad hills and wide valleys. Some emphasis is placed upon this location in the accounts of King SAUL (1 Sam. 15:12) and of DAVID, especially in the latter’s dealings with NABAL and his wife ABIGAIL, whom the young warrior eventually married after Nabal’s death (1 Sam. 25:2-40; 27:3; 30:5; 2 Sam. 2:2; 3:3). One of David’s warriors, HEZRO, was a Carmelite (2 Sam. 23:35; 1 Chr. 11:37).

(2) The mountainous promontory jutting into the Mediterranean Sea just S of the modern city of Haifa and straight W of the Sea of Galilee. On the map of PALESTINE it forms the principal deviation from a comparatively straight coastline and forms the southern wall of the magnificent bay (or gulf) of Acre (ACCO), the best natural harbor S of Beirut. When the word occurs with the definite article, it generally refers to Mount Carmel and is often used to illustrate a beautiful and fruitful place (Isa. 35:2; but see 33:9, which pictures God’s judgment). South of Carmel lies the fruitful plain of SHARON and NE of it flows the river KISHON through the Plain of ESDRAELON. At Carmel, ELIJAH stood against 450 heathen prophets and defeated them (1 Ki. 18). ELISHA also visited Carmel (2 Ki. 2:25; 4:25).

Carmi. kahr'mi (Heb. karmî H4145, “vineyard”; gentilic karmî H4146, “Carmite”). TNIV Karmi. (1) Fourth son of REUBEN (Gen. 46:9; Exod. 6:14; 1 Chr. 5:3). From him sprang the Carmites (Num. 26:6).

(2) Son of ZIMRI (or ZABDI), descendant of JUDAH, and father of ACHAN (Josh. 7:1, 18; 1 Chr. 2:7; in 4:1 he is described as a son of Judah in the sense of a descendant). Achan defiled all Israel by stealing from God what was devoted in JERICHO.

carnal. Traditional rendering of the Greek adjectives sarkikos G4920 and sarkinos G4921. It means “fleshly,” that is, in the manner of the FLESH (sarx G4922) or belonging to the realm of the flesh, and thus opposite of that which is spiritual. The word is used frequently in the KJV and has two main references. (1) Physical: that which is earthly, material, secular, in contrast to SPIRIT; something necessary to the physical (Rom. 15:27; 1 Cor. 9:11); subject to human sensibility (2 Cor. 3:3); weak (10:4); temporary (Heb. 7:16); also those appetites, desires, and urges that may be expressed in harmony with divine law and be satisfied without violation of God's law. (2) Ethical (moral): pertaining to or characterized by the flesh, hence weak and sinful (2 Cor. 1:12; Rom. 7:14); a disposition that is definitely antispiritual in its manifestation; the dynamic principle of sinfulness that alienate human beings from God (Rom. 8:5-8); also spiritual immaturity, not being delivered from that which is inherently evil (1 Cor. 3:3-4). Because in modern English the word carnal usually has a specific sexual meaning, the NIV uses various alternate renderings, such as "material," "human," "unspiritual," "worldly," and "sinful." (The distinction between the two Greek adjectives is not substantial and does not affect the translation.)

carnelian. See MINERALS.

carob. See PLANTS.

carpenter. See OCCUPATIONS AND PROFESSIONS.

carpet. This English term is used by some Bible versions in a passage referring to wares that traders sold to TYRE (Ezek. 27:24; NIV, "rugs"). Since the item was "bound with cords and made secure" (NRSV), some believe that chests covered with rich brocade are meant (so KJV; cf. Esth. 3:9; 4:7). In addition, the NRSV has "rich carpets" with reference to something on which people sit, apparently as they travel (Jdg. 5:10), but the NIV's "saddle blankets" is preferable. One should keep in mind that tent dwellers used only straw mats or a piece of leather on the floor. Assyrian and Persian palaces and wealthy villas in Hellenistic and Roman times had mosaic patterns in paved floors (cf. Esth. 1:6).

Carpus. kahr'puhs (Gk. Karpos, G2842). Carpus was a resident of TROAS, probably a Christian, with whom PAUL had left his cloak and perhaps also some important books (2 Tim. 4:13). Carpus is not mentioned elsewhere in Scripture, but according to Hippolytus (died c. A.D. 236) he later became the bishop of Berytus or Beroea in Thrace.

carriage. This term, in its older sense of “goods, baggage,” is used several times by the KJV (e.g., 1 Sam. 17:22). The NIV uses the term to render two different Hebrew words referring to Solomon’s litter (Cant. 3:7, 9). See also CART; CHARIOT.

carion vulture. See BIRDS.

Carshena. kahr-shee’nuh (Heb. karšēnā › H4161, possibly from Old Iranian Karša, “furrows”). TNIV Karshena. One of the seven nobles of PERSIA and MEDIA in the time of XERXES “who had special access to the king and were highest in the kingdom” (Esth. 1:14).

cart. Carts and wagons are very ancient. In Gen. 45:19-21 PHARAOH provided carts for the wives and children of JACOB for their journey into Egypt. In the days of ELI, the PHILISTINES took the ARK OF THE COVENANT and, finding it a most unwelcome guest, put it on a cart and let it go back to Israel (1 Sam. 6). Later, when DAVID desired to bring the same ark to his city, he used a cart, and there was a disastrous event connected with that arrangement (see 2 Sam. 6:1-11).

carving. See IDOLATRY; OCCUPATIONS AND PROFESSIONS (under craftsman and engraver).

casement. See LATTICE.

Casiphia. kuh-sif’ee-uh (Heb. kāsipyā › H4085, possibly “silversmiths”). TNIV Kasiphia. An unidentified town from which EZRA summoned Levites to return from Babylon and serve the newly restored Jewish community in Jerusalem (Ezra 8:17). The name has been a rich source of Jewish traditions, and other passages of the OT were related to it by the rabbis. Its location is unknown.

Casluhim. See CASLUHITES.

Casluhites. kas’luh-hits (Heb. kasluḥîm H4078, meaning unknown). Also Casluhim; TNIV Kasluhites. The name of an unidentified tribe sprung from MIZRAIM (EGYPT) and identified as the progenitor of the PHILISTINES (Gen. 10:14; 1 Chr. 1:12). Many scholars emend the text so as to link the Philistines with the CAPHTORITES rather than with the Casluhites (cf. NRSV).

cassia. See PLANTS.

castanets. See MUSIC AND MUSICAL INSTRUMENTS.

castaway. A word used once by the KJV to render Greek adokimos G99, “disapproved” (1 Cor. 9:27; NIV, “disqualified for the prize”). The Greek word elsewhere is translated in several ways (e.g., “depraved, rejected, unfit”) by the English versions (Rom. 1:28; 2 Cor. 13:5-7; 2 Tim. 3:8; Tit. 1:16; Heb. 6:8).

castle. A large fortified building or set of buildings, as that of a prince or nobleman. The English word is used fifteen times by the KJV to translate various Hebrew and Greek terms that are better rendered “camp” (e.g., Gen. 25:16), “settlement” (e.g., 1 Chr. 6:54), “fortress” (e.g., 1 Chr. 11:5), “citadel” (e.g., Prov. 18:19), “barracks” (e.g., Acts 21:34, with reference to the Tower of ANTONIA), etc. See also GABBATHA; TOWER.

Castor and Pollux. kas'tuhr, pol'uhks. In Greek mythology they were “sons of Zeus” (Gk. Dioskouroi G1483, Acts 28:11) by Leda, one of his numerous mistresses. Castor was a horseman and Pollux an adept boxer. They were later put in the sky in the constellation known as Gemini (“the Twins”) and were considered as tutelary deities favorable to sailors, a fact that explains why the ship in which PAUL sailed was named in their honor. St. Elmo’s fire used to be credited to Castor and Pollux.

caterpillar. See ANIMALS (under moth).

Catholic Epistles. Also General Epistles. A term applied to the letters of James, Peter, John, and Jude. It goes back to the early church fathers, but why the word catholic (meaning “universal” or “general”) was chosen is uncertain. The most commonly accepted explanation is that these epistles were addressed, not to individual churches or persons, but to a number of churches, thus to the church at large. The seeming exceptions, 2 and 3 John, were probably included as properly belonging with 1 John and of value to the general reader.

cattle. See ANIMALS.

Cauda. kaw'duh (Gk. Kauda G3007; apparently the name could also be spelled Klauda, which is the reading of many MSS). KJV Clauda. A small island lying about 25 mi. (40 km.) to the S of CRETE (Acts 27:16) and now called Gavdos. Here PAUL and his companions were almost wrecked on their journey toward ROME.

cave. A hollowed-out place in the earth, whether formed by nature or by humans. In a mountainous land such as PALESTINE, where there is much limestone, caves are likely to be quite numerous. Caves were often used for regular human habitation, for hiding from the law or from enemies in warfare, for securing precious treasure (such as the DEAD SEA SCROLLS), for storehouses and cisterns, for stables and cattle, and for burial (Gen. 19:30; 1 Ki. 19:9).

cedar. See PLANTS.

Cedron. See KIDRON.

ceiling. This English word is used in 1 Ki. 6:15 (KJV “cieling”) to translate a Hebrew term that normally means “walls” (as in v. 16 KJV, though here too the NIV has “ceiling”). Some scholars argue that in this passage the term should be emended to a very similar Hebrew word that means “beams” (cf. 2 Chr. 3:7). The NIV, on the basis of some ancient versions, uses “ceiling” also in 1 Ki. 7:7 where the Hebrew text repeats the word “floor.”

celestial. See HEAVEN.

celibacy. The state of being unmarried, particularly when this state is deliberately chosen. The Bible lays down no definitive rules about it. JOHN THE BAPTIST, for example, was unmarried, but PETER was married. Jesus himself did not marry, but he contributed notably to the wedding celebrations at CANA (Jn. 2:1-11). He realized that some “have renounced marriage because of the kingdom of heaven” (Matt. 19:12), and once he warned against wrong priorities if to become married would be a hindrance to discipleship (Lk. 14:20). PAUL recognized the dangers of earthly ties and stressed basic principles: God has an assignment for every life, and whatever our situation, married or single, the main thing is to be able to exercise our God-given gifts to the full (1 Cor. 7:7-9, 17, 32-38). See MARRIAGE.

cellar. This English term is used twice by the KJV with reference to storage supplies of wine and oil (1 Chr. 27:27 [NIV, “vats”], 28 [NIV, “supplies”]). Excavations at GIBEON have revealed bedrock cellars that undoubtedly provided the best available refrigeration for wine. The word is also used by the NRSV to render Greek kryptē G3219, “hidden place,” which occurs only once (Lk. 11:33).

Remnants of the ancient roadway leading to the Cenchrea harbor. (View to the NE.)

Cenchrea. sen'kree-uh (Gk. Kenchreai G3020). Also Cenchreae. The eastern harbor of CORINTH, about 7 mi. (11 km.) from the city. A village, it existed solely for the transportation of goods to and from Corinth. Rather than sail around the dangerous southern tip of the Peloponnesus, ships were dragged across the isthmus from Cenchrea to Lechaeum, the western harbor of Corinth, on sleds. The cargo of larger ships was unloaded and moved the same way to a ship on the other side. PAUL in Rom. 16:1 commends to the Roman church a deaconess called PHOEBE of the church at Cenchrea, a church that the apostle may have founded on his second missionary journey. Paul stopped here to have his head shaved in fulfillment of a VOW (Acts 18:18).

censer. A shallow vessel used to remove ashes (hot or cold) from an altar, or to gather burnt parts of wicks from the lampstand, or to burn INCENSE on hot coals placed on the pan (cf. Num. 16:6-7). The same Hebrew word can also mean “tray” (for the lampstand, e.g., Exod. 25:38) and “firepan” (e.g., 27:3). One of the angels in the book of Revelation hurled a golden censer to bring judgment on the earth (Rev. 8:3-5).

census. A numbering and registration of a people. The OT tells of three different occasions when a formal census was taken. The first was at Mount SINAI, soon after the Israelites left Egypt (Num. 1). The second was at SHITTIM near the end of the forty years’ wilderness wandering. The third was made by DAVID (2 Sam. 24:1-9; 1 Chr. 21:1-5). The exiles who returned from Babylonia with ZERUBBABEL were also numbered (Ezra 2). Shortly before the birth of Christ, Emperor AUGUSTUS ordered a census throughout the Roman world (Lk. 2:1). See QUIRINIUS.

centurion. (kentyriōn G3035 [from Lat. centurio], only in Mark; elsewhere hekatontarchēs G1672, “ruler of one hundred”). A commander of one hundred soldiers in the Roman army. The word is mentioned first in connection with the centurion of CAPERNAUM whose beloved servant was deathly sick (Matt. 8:5-13; Lk. 7:2-10). This officer had built a synagogue for the Jews, who therefore appreciated him and begged Jesus to heal the servant. The centurion showed real reverence for Jesus in saying, “I do not deserve to have you come under my roof,” and Jesus responded, “I have not found anyone in Israel with such great faith.” CORNELIUS (Acts 10), another centurion, was “devout and God-fearing.” PETER was sent to him to open up salvation to the Gentiles as he had at JERUSALEM for the Jews (Acts 2) and at SAMARIA for its people (8:14-17). Another centurion, JULIUS, of the Imperial Regiment (27:1-43), had the duty of taking PAUL to ROME. He saved Paul’s life when the soldiers wished to kill all the prisoners, and Paul by his presence and counsel saved the centurion and all the ship’s company. Other unnamed centurions are mentioned elsewhere (Matt. 27:54; Mk. 15:39, 44-45; Acts 22:25-26; 23:1-18 et al.).

chaff. The refuse of the grain that has been threshed and winnowed. This is partly dust and dirt, but the real chaff is the hard and inedible coat of the grain. By threshing, most of this is separated; then on a windy day the grain is tossed into the air and the chaff and the shorter pieces of straw are blown away. In Isa. 5:24 and 33:11, the word properly means “dry hay” fit for burning. The more common Hebrew word is generally used as a figure for worthless or godless people (e.g., Ps. 1:4, “Not so the wicked! They are like chaff that the wind blows away”). It is used also for godless nations (Isa. 17:13). The evanescence of the wicked is likened in Hos. 13:3 to the morning mist, the early dew, “chaff swirling from a threshing floor,” and “smoke escaping through a window.” In the preaching of John the Baptist (Matt. 3:12; Lk. 3:17) our Lord is to save the righteous (“gathering his wheat into his barn”) and destroy the wicked (“burning up the chaff with unquenchable fire”).

chain. The English word represents many Hebrew words meaning “chain, necklace, band, bracelet, clasp, hook, ring, rope.” Chains were used for a variety of purposes.

(1) As marks of distinction. When JOSEPH was put in charge of the land of Egypt, the PHARAOH gave him a ring, dressed him in fine clothes, and “put a gold chain around his neck” (Gen. 41:42); and after DANIEL interpreted the writing on the wall, he too was given a gold chain (Dan. 5:29).

(2) As ornaments. Chains were used to adorn the TABERNACLE (Exod. 28:14, 22; 39:15, 17-18). The Midianites adorned their camels’ necks with chains (Jdg. 8:21, 26). Wreaths of chainwork ornamented the tops of the pillars (1 Ki. 7:17; 2 Chr. 3:16) and other places in Solomon’s TEMPLE (1 Ki. 6:21; 2 Chr. 3:5). As jewelry, chains are referred to in several passages (Prov. 1:9 et al.).

(3) As fetters. The OT describes those who are conquered as being in chains (Isa. 45:14; Nah. 3:10; et al.). According to Mk. 5:3-4 (= Lk. 8:29), chains were used to bind a demoniac. PETER in prison was bound with two chains, but he was miraculously released (Acts 12:6-7). When PAUL was in ROME, he lived with a chain (28:20) that probably bound his right hand to a soldier’s left. In the book of Revelation, an angel binds SATAN with a chain (Rev. 20:1).

Chaldea was the name of a district in S Babylonia, later applied to a dynasty that controlled all Babylonia (cf. the NIV rendering in Jer. 50:10; 51:24, 35; Ezek. 11:24; 16:29). See BABYLON; UR (CITY).

chamber. This English word is used frequently in the KJV and other versions as the rendering of various Hebrew words (e.g., Isa. 26:20; Ezek 40:17). For many of these occurrences, the NIV prefers “room” (however, see Ezra 8:29; Job 37:9; Ps. 45:13; Cant. 1:4; et al.). The KJV uses the term also in the NT, but only a few times (e.g., Matt. 24:26; Acts 9:37). See also CHAMBERS OF THE SOUTH.

chambering. This English term is used once by the KJV in the now obsolete sense of “lewdness” (Rom. 13:13).

chambers of the south. This expression is used in a context that mentions several star formations (Job 9:9 KJV and other versions). JOB is probably applying the term to one or more constellations visible in the southern part of the sky (cf. NIV). Others refer it to the vacant stretches of this region and identify it with the place from which the whirlwind is said to come (thus NJPS, “chambers of the south wind”; cf. 37:9).

champaign. This English term, which refers to a broad expanse of plain, flat, open country, is used by the KJV once with reference to the ARABAH (Deut. 11:30; cf. also KJV Ezek. 37:2 mg.).

champion. This English word is used to render a Hebrew phrase that means literally, “the man of the middle”; it is used with reference to GOLIATH, who fought DAVID between the two armies that watched (1 Sam. 17:4, 23). It was common for individual champions from either side to decide conflicts, because the bloodshed of a full-scale war could thus be avoided. The word occurs occasionally to render other Hebrew terms (e.g., the NRSV in 1 Sam. 17:51; the NIV in Ps. 19:5 and Isa. 5:22; the NJPS in Jdg. 3:9 et al. [often as a verb, e.g., Isa. 3:13]). The phrase “David’s champions” is often used today with reference to “the Thirty,” the list of warriors who served as King David’s military elite (2 Sam. 23:8-39 = 1 Chr. 11:40-47; cf. 2 Sam. 21:15-22).

chancellor. This term is used by the KJV to render the Aramaic phrase bē ʿēl-ṭē ʿēm (H10116 + H10302), which was the title of the Persian official REHUM (Ezra 4:8-9, 17; NIV, “commanding officer”; NRSV, “royal deputy”); changers of money. The function of money changers was to convert the currency of a worshiper at the Jerusalem TEMPLE into a type of money acceptable for purposes of a sacrificial offering. It could not have been because of anything inherently reproachful in their activity that they aroused Christ’s ire in the temple (Matt. 21:12; Mk. 11:15; Jn. 2:14-15). Undoubtedly they served the convenience of the public, especially where birds, animals, or cake-offerings had to be purchased by city dwellers not possessing livestock of their own. In these transactions it must have been necessary to make small change available if the buyer was not to be cheated, and of course the banker who provided this service was entitled to some sort of a fee, in order to make a living. There seem to be only two possible grounds on which they incurred our Lord’s indignation: either their charges for money changing were excessive and tended to gouge the poor and pious, or else they had their tables set up so close to the section of the temple set apart for worship and sacrifice as to interfere with these sacred functions. On either count, or on both counts, Christ could have leveled the charge of turning the house of God into “a den of robbers.” Money changers evidently sat at tables or benches, stacked high with various types of coins used in the Mediterranean world at the time. It is quite conceivable that the loud and passionate haggling that undoubtedly accompanied this activity, augmented by the bleating of sheep and goats, was completely disturbing to genuine devotion. At any rate, Jesus found it necessary to clear them all out, and thus relegate them to a suitable distance from the place of sacrifice and prayer.

This chariot was given to the Egyptian courtier Yuya by his son-in-law, Pharaoh Amenhotep III (14th cent. B.C.); made of wood and covered in most parts with leather.

chariot. A two-wheeled vehicle drawn by two horses. In EGYPT, JOSEPH rode in PHARAOH's second chariot (Gen. 41:43). Chariots were used in JACOB's funeral procession (50:9). Pharaoh pursued the children of Israel into the RED SEA with chariots (Exod. 14:7—15:19). The Canaanites used chariots against Israel (1 Sam. 13:5). DAVID hamstrung the chariot horses of his enemies (2 Sam. 8:4). ADONIJAH prepared chariots when he plotted to assume the throne (1 Ki. 1:5). SOLOMON built establishments to house many chariots (9:19). He imported chariots from Egypt at six hundred shekels each (10:28-29). Both divided kingdoms used chariots in war (16:9; 22:34; 2 Ki. 23:30). The ETHIOPIAN EUNUCH was riding a chariot when PHILIP met him (Acts 8:27-29).

Some parts of a chariot are referred to in 1 Ki. 7:33. There was a pole to which the two horses were yoked, an axle, wheels with six or eight spokes, and a body fastened to the axle and pole. Often only two men rode in a chariot, a driver and a warrior (22:34); but sometimes the HITTITE practice of adding a shield-bearer was followed. The Assyrian chariot was heavier than the Egyptian or Hebrew and carried three or four men. Nahum 2:3-4 is a vivid picture of such chariots. ELIJAH was honored by being escorted up to heaven by a chariot of fire (2 Ki. 2:11), and his manner of going became a proverb (2:12; 13:14). God is represented as having thousands of chariots, showing his power (Ps. 68:17). Trust in chariots is vain compared with trust in God (20:7). Habakkuk speaks of God riding on his victorious chariots (Hab. 3:8). The chariots of the sun (2 Ki. 23:11) were used in sun worship (23:5). Chariots were used for riding (Cant. 1:9; 6:12), especially by royalty.

chaste, chastity. See CLEAN.

chastisement. This English term, which in modern English means “punishment” or “severe censure,” is used by the KJV and other versions to translate Hebrew and Greek words that mean more broadly “discipline, admonition, correction, chastening” (cf. Deut. 11:2; Job 5:17; et al.). The concept of instruction in wisdom is prominent in the book of Proverbs (e.g., Prov. 3:11-12, cited in Heb. 12:5-11). In Isa. 53:5 the term is used to speak of the substitution of the sinless Servant of the Lord for his guilty people. The Greek word paideia G4082 in classical literature is strictly a positive term (“the rearing of a child [pais G4090], education, learning, culture”), but in the SEPTUAGINT, as a rendering of the corresponding Hebrew word, it begins to take on as well the negative sense of “punishment.” PAUL counsels: “Fathers, do not exasperate your children; instead, bring them up in the training [paideia] and instruction of the Lord” (Eph. 6:4). He states that the commendable conduct of the Lord’s servant is to correct or instruct (verb paideuō G4084) his opponents with gentleness (2 Tim. 2:25). And in his climactic admonition to TIMOTHY, he wrote, “All Scripture is God-breathed and is useful for teaching, rebuking, correcting and training [paideia] in righteousness” (2 Tim. 3:16). Divine training with discipline is the process by which God brings people to put their trust in him, and nurtures those whom he has received until they reach maturity.

Chebar. See KEBAR.

checker work. The expression “nets of checker work” is used by some English versions to render an unusual Hebrew phrase that means literally, “lattices—a work of lattice” (only in 1 Ki. 7:17; NIV simply, “network”). It refers to the seven-stranded link chains, four in warp and three in weft (to hold the four in line) draped over each of the pommels of the double capitals of the pillars named Jakin and Boaz in Solomon’s TEMPLE.

Chedorlaomer. See KEDORLAOMER.

cheek. The lateral part of the mouth on each side of the face. The corresponding Hebrew term can refer to the jowls or jawbone of an animal (Deut. 18:3; Jdg. 15:15-17), but it is usually rendered “cheek” when the reference is to a person (e.g., Cant. 1:10; Lam. 1:2). To smite the cheek is an act of reproach (Job 16:10; Lam. 3:30; et al.). Christ’s command to turn the other cheek (Matt. 5:39 = Lk. 6:29) forcefully states what he meant the Christian’s attitude toward reproach should be. In line with this instruction, both PAUL and PETER, using different language, give expression to the special joy and blessing they experienced in thus enduring reproach for Christ’s sake (2 Cor. 12:10; 1 Pet. 4:14).

cheese. This word occurs three times in the OT, each time as the rendering of a different Hebrew term (1 Sam. 17:18; 2 Sam. 17:29; Job 10:10). The reference in Job's speech ("Did you not pour me out like milk / and curdle me like cheese...") is the clearest reference to cheese as the modern world knows it. Milk of cows, goats, and sheep was stored in skins. In a warm climate, without refrigeration, it soon curdled.

Chemosh. kee'mosh (Heb. kēmôš H4019, meaning uncertain). The god of MOAB, so named in an ancient Israelite song (Num. 21:29; alluded to in Jer. 48:7, 13, 46). JEPHTHAH refers to Chemosh as god of the AMMONITES (Jdg. 11:24), presumably because the nation of Ammon also worshiped this deity in addition to MOLECH. SOLOMON introduced the worship of Chemosh into Jerusalem to please a foreign wife, though by doing so he displeased God (1 Ki. 11:7, 33). JOSIAH defiled this high place of Chemosh (2 Ki. 23:13), putting an end to its use as a place of worship. MESHA, king of Moab, suffered a great disaster in his rebellion against Israel, in consequence of which he offered his son, the heir to the throne of Moab, as a burnt offering (3:4-27). His inscription on the MOABITE STONE shows that this sacrifice was made to Chemosh and describes the help that Mesha believed Chemosh had given his people in war and the chastisement that Chemosh meted out to them when they were unfaithful. The terms used are so similar in style to the terms used by the Israelites of the true God that they serve only to accentuate the contrast between the two.

cherub, cherubim. cher'uhb, cher'uh-bim (Heb. kērûb H4131 [usually in pl., kěrubîm], meaning uncertain; Gk. cheroub G5938 [in the NT, only in the form cheroubin, Heb. 9:5]). For traditional reasons, most Bible versions use cherubim as the plural form (KJV has cherubims, a superfluous English pl. form), though cherubs would be more appropriate. The term refers to a winged angelic creature and is applied mainly to the images made for the TABERNACLE and the TEMPLE. The cherubim and a flaming sword were placed at the E of EDEN to guard the way to the TREE OF LIFE after ADAM and EVE were expelled from the garden (Gen. 3:24). The curtains of the TABERNACLE were embroidered with cherubim (Exod. 26:1). God directed MOSES to place two cherubim of beaten gold on the mercy seat above the ARK OF THE COVENANT in the Most Holy Place of the tabernacle; there God would commune with Moses (25:18-22; 37:7-9). God's glory rested between the cherubim in both the tabernacle and the TEMPLE (Num. 7:89; 1 Sam. 4:4; 2 Sam. 6:2; 2 Ki. 19:15; Ps. 80:1; 99:1; Isa. 37:16; Heb. 9:5). The cherubim in the temple were huge figures newly made for the purpose (1 Ki. 6:23-28; 2 Chr. 3:10-13; 5:7-8). Carved cherubim also adorned the walls of the temple (1 Ki. 6:29). David sings of God riding on a cherub (2 Sam. 22:11; Ps. 18:10).

That the cherubim were more than clouds or statues is plain from the description Ezekiel gives (Ezek. 9:3; 10:1-22), which shows that they are the "living creatures" of the first chapter. The four faces of each of the cherubim (1:10) stand for the four "excellencies" of the created order: the lion, the greatest of the wild beasts; the eagle, the greatest of the birds; the ox, the greatest of the domestic beasts; and man, the crown of creation. Ezekiel sees, over the heads of the cherubim, the throne of the God who is thus absolutely sovereign over his whole creation, in all its variety of life and being and in all its complexity of movement. The same explanation of the cherub-form suits their function both in Eden (CREATION in its ideal purity consents to the Creator's edict of exclusion from the garden) and on the mercy seat (all the created excellencies marvel and adore the Triune God for the shed blood of ATONEMENT). At the same time, Ezekiel's vision explains the OT allusion to the Lord as seated (or enthroned) on/between the cherubim (e.g., Ps. 99:1); it is a metaphor of his total sovereignty. Likewise when the Lord is said to ride on the cherubim (e.g., Ps. 18:10; Ezek. 10 passim), the thought is that all creation is subject to his sovereign rule and "intervention," and all its powers are at his disposal.

The book of Revelation mentions four "living creatures" (Rev. 4:6-9; 5:6-14; 6:1-11; 14:3; 15:7; 19:4 [not "beasts," as the KJV says]). They are described in terms that identify them with Ezekiel's living creatures or cherubim (Ezek. 1; 10). The first living creature was like a lion, the second like a calf, the third had a face as a man, the fourth was like a flying eagle (Rev. 4:7). They are the bearers of the judgments that follow the breaking of the first four seals.

The cherubim are the living chariot or carriers of God when appearing to human beings. They are heavenly creatures, servants of God in theophany and judgment, appearing in winged human-animal form with the faces of lion, ox, man, and eagle. Their representations in the tabernacle and temple as statues and in embroidery and carving are not a breach of the second commandment (Exod. 20:4). They are significant in prophecy (Ezekiel) and in the Apocalypse (Revelation). Their service is rendered immediately to God. They never come closer to man than when one took fire in his hand and gave it into the hands of “the man in linen” (Ezek. 10:7). Yet because the mercy seat, on which the blood of atonement was sprinkled, lay “between the cherubim,” nothing can more nearly touch our salvation. In the OT sanctuary, where everything was done and taught by visible, tangible types and symbols, physical representations of the living heavenly cherubim were important.

child, children. Among the people of the OT and NT, as in most other cultures, children, especially male, were greatly desired (Gen. 15:2; 30:1; 1 Sam. 1:11, 20; Ps. 127:3; 128:3; Lk. 1:7, 28). Among the Hebrews all the FIRSTBORN belonged to God (cf. Num. 3:40-51). Children were sometimes dedicated to God for special service (Jdg. 13:2-7; 1 Sam. 1:11; Lk. 1:13-17, 76-79). Male descendants of ABRAHAM were circumcised on the eighth day (Gen. 17:12; 21:4; Lk. 1:59; 2:21), when the name was given. Weaning often was delayed and then celebrated with a feast (Gen. 21:8). Education was primarily in the home and was the duty of parents (Exod. 12:26-27; Deut. 6:7; Josh. 4:21-24; Prov. 22:6; Eph. 6:4; Col. 3:21; 2 Tim. 3:15). Discipline was to be firm, with corporal punishment (Prov. 22:15; 23:13; 29:15). Much was expected of children (Prov. 20:11). Obedience and respect to parents was commanded (Exod. 21:17; Eph. 6:1-3; Col. 3:20; 1 Tim. 3:4, 12; Tit. 1:6).

Favoritism was sometimes shown (Gen. 25:28; 37:3). Affection for children is strikingly portrayed in many instances, as in DAVID's love for his child who died (2 Sam. 12:15-23), and in the raising of children to life by ELLIAH (1 Ki. 17:17-24), by ELISHA (2 Ki. 4:18-37), and by Jesus (Matt. 9:23-26; Mk. 5:35-43; Lk. 8:49-56). Jesus' love and concern for children is seen in Matt. 18:1-14; 19:13-15; Mk. 9:35-37; 10:13-16; Lk. 9:46-48; 18:15-17. Jesus recognized children's play (Matt. 11:16). There are many reports of attractive childhood, for example, MOSES (Exod. 2:1-10), SAMUEL (1 Sam. 1:20—3:19), Jesus (Lk. 2:7-40), TIMOTHY (2 Tim. 1:5; 3:14-15).

"Children" is an affectionate address, as in 1 John, of an old man to adults, who are nevertheless expected to act their age (1 Cor. 13:11; 14:20). The attention given to the childhood of the MESSIAH in prophecy (Isa. 7:14; 9:6) prepares us for the infancy narratives in Matt. 2 and Lk. 2. The Savior came as a helpless babe and apparently had a normal childhood. A return to childlike receptiveness and trust is required of those who would enter the kingdom of heaven (Matt. 18:1-14; 19:13-15; Mk. 9:35-37; 10:13-61; Lk. 9:46-48; 18:15-17).

childbearing. The word occurs in 1 Tim. 2:15 in a passage relating to the proper sphere and conduct of women. The statement, “Women will be saved through childbearing,” cannot refer to salvation from sin, which is by grace through faith, but to safekeeping through the pain that became incidental to childbirth through the FALL (Gen. 3:16). Hebrew mothers had the assistance of midwives (Exod. 1:15-21). Newborn babies had the navel cut, were washed with water, salted, and wrapped in swaddling clothes (Ezek. 16:4; Lk. 2:7, 12). PURIFICATION rites were prescribed after childbirth (Lev. 12; Lk. 2:22-24).

Christ, Jesus. krist, jee´zuhs (Gk. Christos G5986, “anointed” [see MESSIAH]; Gk. Iēsous G2653, from Heb. yēšū`a H3800, short form of yēhōšua` H3397, “Yahweh is salvation” [see JOSHUA]).

I. Comprehensive Life and Work. Although the life of Christ, as ordinarily understood, embraces only the years our Lord spent on this earth as described in the four Gospels, his full career spans the ages and invites reflection on its several aspects. Fundamental to the various “I am” sayings of Jesus is his assertion of absolute existence (Jn. 8:58). Therefore it is reasonable to think of him as belonging to eternity. Scripture, in fact, affirms his preexistence and does so in terms of fellowship with the Father (1:1), glory (17:5), and designation in advance as the Savior of the world (1 Pet. 1:20). His more immediate relation to the realm of people and things belongs to his activity in CREATION. All things came into being through him (Jn. 1:3; 1 Cor. 8:6; Heb. 1:2), and in him they continue to have their cohesive principle (Col. 1:17).

Evidence is not lacking for his presence also in the OT. The manifestations of God in this period are apparently connected with the preincarnate Christ. When Isaiah glimpsed the glory of God, he was seeing Christ (Jn. 12:41). Moses and the prophets spoke of him (Lk. 24:27, 44; Jn. 5:46), with special reference to his sufferings and the glories that would follow (1 Pet. 1:11). Some of the more important passages of a predictive nature are Gen. 3:15; Deut. 18:15, 18; Ps. 2; 16; 22; 110; Isa. 7:14; 9:6, 7, 11; 42:1-4; 52:13—53:12; 61:1, 2; Jer. 23:5-6; Mic. 5:2. In addition there are covenantal statements that do not speak of the MESSIAH directly and personally, but that involve him in crucial ways (Gen. 12:3; 2 Sam. 7:12-16). As though in anticipation of the INCARNATION, the Son of God showed himself at times to the faithful in visible form as the ANGEL of the Lord (Gen. 18:1-19:1; Jdg. 13). Before his advent Christ had thoroughly identified himself with his people, so that when he came, he came to his own (Jn. 1:11).

By the incarnation, the Christ of God took on himself human nature in order to reveal God to people in a way they could grasp (Jn. 1:14, 18), to become their Savior by ransoming them from their sins (Mk. 10:45), and to deal sympathetically with their needs (Heb. 2:17-18). Today, in glory, he is still the God-man. The incarnation persists. The present ministry of Christ is being carried on in heaven, where he represents the saints before the throne of God (Heb. 7:25; 1 Jn. 2:1). By the successful completion of his work on earth he is exalted to be the head of the CHURCH (Eph. 1:22; 4:15) and by the HOLY SPIRIT directs the life and service of his saints on earth (Matt. 28:20).

One purpose of the incarnation was not achieved during the earthly ministry of our Lord but is reserved for his second coming. His kingly rule will then be introduced following his work as judge (Matt. 25:31-34). This future coming is one of the major truths set forth in the Epistles (Phil. 3:20-21; 2 Thess. 1:7-10) and is the leading theme of the Revelation. After the millennial kingdom, Christ will enter with his people the blessedness of the eternal state, which will be unmarred by the inroads of sin or death. See ESCHATOLOGY.

II. Earthly Ministry. The long-heralded Christ came in the fullness of time (Gal. 4:4). God providentially supplied the proper background for his appearing and mission. The world had become to a great extent homogeneous through the spread of the Greek language and culture and through the organizing genius of ROME. The means were thus provided for the spread of the GOSPEL once it had been forged out in the career of the Son of God. His advent occurred at a point in human history when the LAW of Moses had done its work of demonstrating the sinfulness of human beings and the impossibility of achieving righteousness by human effort.

Entirely in keeping with this divine control of the circumstances surrounding the incarnation is the careful selection of the Virgin Mary as the mother of Jesus. The birth of the Savior was natural, but his conception was supernatural by the power of the Holy Spirit (Matt. 1:18; Lk. 1:35). See VIRGIN BIRTH. Even the Roman emperor, AUGUSTUS, was drawn into the circle of the instruments chosen by God when he ordered a universal enrollment for taxation, not realizing that by doing so he would make possible the birth of Jesus in the place appointed by prophetic announcement (Mic. 5:2; Lk. 2:1-7). The shepherds, by their readiness to seek out the babe in the manger and by their joy at seeing him, became prototypes of the humble souls in Judaism who in coming days would recognize in Jesus their Savior. An intimation of Gentile desire to participate in the Christ may be seen in the coming of the MAGI from the East. In darker perspective appears the figure of HEROD, emblematic of the hatred and opposition that would meet Jesus of Nazareth and work for his death. In the SCRIBES, conversant with the Scriptures but apathetic about seeking the One who fulfilled them, we see the shape of things to come—the leaders of a nation refusing to receive him when he came to his own.

In more theological terms the Christ-event is an incarnation. God was manifest in flesh. The One who was in the form of God took the form of a servant and was made in human likeness (Phil. 2:6-7). Therefore, when the Scriptures assert from time to time that God sent his Son into the world, this affirmation is not to be treated as though Christ is merely a messenger of God, like the ancient prophets. Rather, he is the eternal Son of God now clothing himself with human nature to accomplish the salvation of people. Though the expression “God-man” is not found in the sacred records, it faithfully expresses the truth regarding the person of Jesus Christ. God did not appropriate a man who already existed and make of him an instrument for the working out of the divine purposes. He took what is common to us all, our human nature, yet free from any taint of sin, and combined it with deity to become an actual person with his own individuality. This is the mystery of the incarnation. The gulf between the Creator and the creature is bridged, first by the person of Christ and then by his mediatorial work.

Jesus' ministry in Galilee.

The boyhood of Jesus should be approached from the standpoint of the truth revealed about the incarnation. Deity did not eclipse humanity so as to render the process of learning unnecessary. Christ grew in body and advanced both in knowledge and in the wisdom that enabled him to make proper use of what he knew. He did not command his parents but rather obeyed them, fulfilling the law in this matter as in all others. The scriptural accounts have none of the fanciful extravagances of the apocryphal gospels, which present the boy Jesus as a worker of wonders during his early years (see APOCRYPHAL NEW TESTAMENT). They emphasize his progress in the understanding of the OT and affirm his consciousness of a special relation to his Father in heaven (Lk. 2:49).

At his BAPTISM Jesus received divine confirmation of the mission now opening out before him and also the anointing of the Holy Spirit for the fulfillment of it. The days of preparation were definitely at an end, so that retirement was put aside and contact begun with his people Israel. By the baptism he was fulfilling all righteousness (Matt. 3:15) in the sense that he was identifying himself with those he came to redeem.

Closely related to the baptism is the TEMPTATION, for it also includes this representative character. The first ADAM failed when put to the test; the last Adam succeeded, though weakened by hunger and harried by the desolation of the wilderness. In essence, the temptation was the effort of SATAN to break Christ's dependence on the Father, so that he would desert the standpoint of man and rely on special consideration as the Son of God. But Christ refused to be moved from his determined place of chosen identification with the human race. "Man does not live on bread alone" was his first line of defense. He maintained it in the two following episodes, quoting the obligation of Israel in relation to God as his own reason for refusing to be moved from a place of trustful dependence on the Almighty (Matt. 4:7, 10).

Only when equipped by the baptism and seasoned by the ordeal of temptation was Jesus ready for his life and work. No word of teaching and no work of power is attributed to him prior to these events, but immediately afterward he began moving in the power of the Spirit to undertake the work the Father had given him to do (Lk. 4:14).

The public ministry of Jesus was brief. Its length has to be estimated from the materials recorded in the Gospels. John gives more information on this point than the other evangelists. Judging from the number of PASSOVERS mentioned there (Jn. 2:23; 6:4; 13:1; perhaps also 5:1), the period was at least somewhat in excess of two years and possibly more than three.

John supplements the Synoptic Gospels also in the description of the place of ministry. The synoptists put chief stress on GALILEE and give notice of a visit to the regions of TYRE and SIDON (Matt. 15:21-28), CAESAREA PHILIPPI (16:13), the Gentile cities of the DECAPOLIS (Mk. 7:31; cf. also Mk. 5:1-20), SAMARIA (Lk. 9:51-56; 17:11), and the region E of the JORDAN River known as PEREA (Mk. 10:1). John, on the other hand, reports several visits to Jerusalem; in fact, most of his record is taken up with accounts of Jesus' ministry in JUDEA. The synoptists hint at such a ministry (e.g., Matt. 23:37; Lk. 10:38-42) but give little information.

During his Galilean mission, Jesus made the city of CAPERNAUM his headquarters. From this center he went out, usually in the company of his disciples, to challenge the people in city and town and village with his message. Several such tours are indicated in the sacred text (Mk. 1:38; 6:6; Lk. 8:1). A part of his ministry consisted in healings and exorcisms, for many had diseases of various sorts and many were afflicted with demon possession. These miracles were not only tokens of divine compassion but also signs that in the person of Jesus of Nazareth the Promised One had come (cf. Matt. 11:2-6; Lk. 4:16-19). They were revelations of the mercy and power of God at work in God's Anointed. Jesus found fault with the cities of Galilee for rejecting him despite the occurrence of so many mighty works in their midst (Matt. 11:20-24).

The message proclaimed by Jesus during these journeys was epitomized in the phrase, the KINGDOM OF GOD. Fundamentally, this means the rule of God in human life and history. The phrase may have a more concrete significance at times, for Jesus spoke now and again about entering into the kingdom. In certain passages he spoke of the kingdom as future (Matt. 25:34), but in others as present (Lk. 11:20). This last reference is of special importance, for it connects the kingdom with the activity of Jesus in casting out DEMONS. To the degree that Jesus invades the kingdom of Satan in this fashion, the kingdom of God has already come. But in the more spiritual and positive aspects of kingdom teaching, where the individual life is concerned, the emphasis does not fall on invasion of personality or compulsive surrender to the power of God. The laws of discipleship are demanding indeed, but for their application they await the consent of the individual. No disciple is to be forced but is rather to be persuaded by the power of love and grace.

If we inquire more definitely into the relation of Jesus himself to the kingdom, we are obliged to conclude that he not only introduced the kingdom but also was its perfect embodiment. The appropriate response to the preaching of the kingdom is committal to the will of God (Matt. 6:10), and it is crystal clear that doing the will of God was the mainspring of Jesus' ministry (Matt. 12:50; Mk. 14:36; Jn. 4:34). It is evident, of course, that Jesus will also inaugurate the final phase of the kingdom when he comes again in power and glory. Entrance into the present aspect of the kingdom is obtained through FAITH in the Son of God and his successful mission.

View from Mt. Tabor looking NW over the Nazareth Ridge and the modern city of Nazareth. Despite Jesus' extended stay in Nazareth during his early years, the Gospels say very little about this time in his earthly life.

Much of our Lord's teaching was conveyed through PARABLES. These were usually comparisons taken from various phases of nature or human life ("The kingdom of God is like..."). This method of teaching preserved the interest of the hearers until the spiritual application could be made. If the truth so taught was somewhat veiled by this method, this served to seal the spiritual blindness of the unrepentant and at the same time created a wholesome curiosity on the part of those who were disposed to believe, so that they could be led on to firm faith by more direct teaching.

The ministry of the Savior was predominantly to the multitudes during its earlier phase, as he sought out the people where they were, whether in the synagogue or on the city street or by the lakeside. "He went around doing good” is the way PETER described it (Acts 10:38). But much of Jesus’ last year of ministry was given over to instruction of the twelve disciples whom he had chosen (for the two phases, see Matt. 4:17 and 16:21). This shift of emphasis was not due primarily to the lack of response on the part of the multitudes, although his following faded at times (Jn. 6:15, 66), but principally to his desire to instruct his disciples concerning himself and his mission. These men, nearly all Galileans and many of them fishermen, had been able to learn much through hearing Jesus address the crowds and through watching him heal the sick and relieve the distressed, and especially through being sent out by him to minister in his name (Lk. 9:1-6). However, they needed more direct teaching to prepare them for the part they would play in the life of the church after the ASCENSION.

What they saw and heard during those early days confirmed their understanding of the person of Jesus as the Messiah and the Son of God (Matt. 16:16), but they were quite unprepared to receive his teaching on the suffering and death that his earthly life would involve (16:21-23). Although this prospect was absolutely necessary for Jesus (16:21), for Peter it was something that the Lord should dismiss from consideration (16:22). If the most prominent one of the apostolic circle felt this way, no doubt the others were of the same mind. Their thoughts were so taken up with the prospect of a kingdom of external power and glory that they were perplexed and disturbed to find that their Master anticipated quite a different experience. His prediction of a RESURRECTION from the dead fell on deaf ears, for the blow of the announcement about his forthcoming death had been too heavy. Even the lessons of the TRANSFIGURATION scene, where death was the theme under discussion and the glory beyond was presented to their sight, did not completely effect the orientation of the disciples to the teaching of Jesus. He had to repeat it more than once (Mk. 10:33-45). Their sorrow in the Garden of GETHSEMANE shows that they had reluctantly adjusted to it but could not look beyond it to resurrection nor could they realize how much that death itself could mean to their spiritual welfare. After the resurrection they were much more open to the Lord’s instruction, so when he appeared to them, he revealed from the OT the divine purpose prewritten there concerning himself (Lk. 24:26-27, 44).

Christ’s investment of time and patience with these men was well rewarded, for when the Spirit took up the work of instruction begun by him and gave them his own power for witness, they became effective instruments for declaring the Word of God and for the leadership of the Christian church. The record of the book of Acts vindicates the wisdom of Christ and his understanding of the future.

In contrast to the Twelve in their attitude to Jesus are the SCRIBES and PHARISEES. The former were experts in the law and the traditions that had grown up around it, and the latter were men dedicated to a meticulous devotion to this heritage of JUDAISM. These groups usually worked together, and they collided with Jesus on many occasions over many issues. They were shocked that he would declare sins forgiven and claim a special relation to God as Son that others did not have. They resented his rejection of the traditions that they kept so carefully, and stood aghast at his willingness to “break” the SABBATH (in their way of thinking) by doing deeds of mercy on that day. It was tragic that men who held to the Scriptures as God’s Word should fail to see in Jesus Christ the One of whom that Word spoke. They refused to put their trust in him despite all his MIRACLES and the matchless perfection of his personal life. Because tradition meant more to them than truth, they stumbled in their apprehension of the Christ of God. In the end they plotted with their opponents the SADDUCEES in order to do away with Jesus.

Even as Christ was engaged in teaching his disciples from the days of the transfiguration on, he was ever moving toward Jerusalem to fulfill his course at the cross (Lk. 9:51). In those latter days some stirring events were unfolded—the triumphal entry into Jerusalem, the cleansing of the temple, the institution of the Lord’s Supper, the soul conflict in the Garden of Gethsemane, the arrest and trial, the crucifixion, the resurrection, the appearances, the ascension into heaven. In all of them Jesus remained the central figure. In all of them he received testimony to himself or gave it. Nothing was unimportant. All contributed to the working out of the plan of God. The CROSS was the human decision respecting Christ, but it had already been his own decision and that of the Father. It underscored the sins of some even as it removed the sins of others. In the cross man’s day erupted in violence and blasphemy. In the resurrection God’s day began to dawn. It was his answer to the world and to the powers of darkness. In it Christ was justified and his claims illuminated.

III. Names, Titles, and Offices. Considerable help in understanding the person and work of Christ may be gleaned from a consideration of the terms used to designate him, especially as these are used by himself and his close associates. The name Jesus alludes to his role as Savior (it is the Gk. form of JOSHUA, “Yahweh is salvation”; cf. Matt. 1:21); it is used mostly in the narratives of the Gospels, and only rarely does it appear in direct address. For the most part this name is joined with “Christ” or “Lord” when used in the NT Epistles, but occasionally it stands alone, especially in Hebrews—doubtless for the purpose of emphasizing his humanity as a continuing element of his being (Heb. 2:9 et al.). Thus, it is legitimate for us today to use the simple name in unadorned fashion, but to do so exclusively could indicate a lack of appreciation of the rounded presentation that Scripture gives of him.

Christ, meaning “anointed one,” is the Greek equivalent of the Hebrew word Messiah. Its function as a title is emphasized by the fact that often it occurs with the definite article, which gives it the force of “the promised Christ,” the one who fulfills the concept of Messiah as set forth in the OT Scriptures. Our Lord uses it of himself in Lk. 24:46: “He told them, ‘This is what is written: The Christ will suffer and rise from the dead on the third day.’” By extension of meaning, the same form is used by Paul with reference to the CHURCH as a body (1 Cor. 12:12), thus emphasizing the intimate bond between Christ and his people (see BODY OF CHRIST). Of special interest is the development that led to the use of “Christ” as a personal name. It must have taken place early in the life of the church, for we find it reflected, for example, in the opening verse of Mark’s Gospel—“The beginning of the gospel of Jesus Christ, the Son of God.” Possibly our Lord himself is responsible for this usage (Jn. 17:3). In Acts and the Epistles it is not always clear whether “Christ” is being used as a name or as a title, but there are definitely some occurrences of this term alone as a name (e.g., 1 Cor. 15:3).

A circumstance that may strike the reader of the Gospels as odd is the prohibition against making Jesus known as the Christ or Messiah during the days of his ministry. He imposed this restriction on the disciples (Matt. 16:20) and somewhat similarly choked off any possible testimony from demons (Lk. 4:41). If this title should be used freely of him among the Jews, it would excite the populace to expect in him a political Messiah who would gain for them their national freedom and many accompanying benefits. Since this was not the purpose of Jesus, he did what he could to suppress the use of the term Messiah with regard to himself, though he welcomed it in the circle of the apostles (Matt. 16:16).

Only once does the name IMMANUEL occur, and then in connection with the conception of Jesus (Matt. 1:23). It is a Hebrew word meaning “God with us,” and is especially appropriate when describing the incarnational aspect of Jesus’ birth. For some reason the name did not gain currency in the church, perhaps because it was crowded out by Jesus and Christ.

Among the ancients it was common to distinguish a person not only by name but also by place of residence. Consequently Jesus was often called the NAZARENE because of his years spent in the village of NAZARETH (Lk. 24:19). When used of Jesus’ followers by the Jews (Acts 24:5), the term took on an element of reproach that it did not possess in any recognizable way during his life on earth.

When Jesus referred to himself, he most often used the title SON OF MAN. It was more than a means of identification, however, for it linked him to a conception of majesty that had gathered around the term since its use in Dan. 7:13. Although it is possible that occasionally the title stresses Jesus’ humanity, in the main it serves to point to his transcendence as a heavenly figure. Certainly the widespread notion that Son of Man expresses the humanity of Jesus, as Son of God expresses his deity, is quite misleading (cf. Lk. 22:69-70). By using this title publicly rather than Messiah, Jesus was able to avoid suggesting that his mission was political in nature, and instead could put into the title by his own use of it the content that he wanted to give to it. The church apparently recognized the Lord's right to exclusive use of the term and did not use it, out of deference to him (the one exception is STEPHEN's comment in Acts 7:56).

One of the most familiar designations for Jesus is SON OF GOD. Only in John's Gospel does he use it of himself (Jn. 5:25; 10:36; 11:4). But elsewhere he uses its equivalent, the Son (Matt. 11:27), which is especially appropriate when used opposite the Father, and which in such a passage clearly sets off the uniqueness of this particular Son. In the Synoptic Gospels considerable care is needed in order to impute to the term Son of God the exact nuance of meaning proper to its every occurrence. Geerhardus Vos discerned four meanings: the nativistic, which stresses the divine origination of the person of Jesus as a human figure; the ethico-religious, which points to the filial relation that Christ had with the Father within the context of his human life, similar to that which any child of God has; the messianic, which has to do with his appointment as the one anointed and sent by God, in fulfillment of OT prophecy; the trinitarian or ontological, in which the unique relation of Christ to the Father as the only Son is expressed. This latter, of course, represents the highest level of sonship.

Rather frequently in the course of his ministry Jesus was addressed as Son of David (Matt. 21:9; Lk. 18:38), which is a distinctly messianic title pointing to him as the One who fulfilled the Davidic covenant, the One who was expected to establish the kingdom and bring Israel to freedom, peace, and glory (cf. Matt. 1:1; Lk. 1:32-33).

A few passages proclaim outright that Jesus is God (Jn. 1:1 [in a preincarnate setting]; 1:18 [according to the strongest MS evidence]; 20:28; Rom. 9:5 [according to the most natural construction of the verse]; Tit. 2:13; Heb. 1:8). That the passages are relatively few in number is probably due to the fact that Jesus Christ, as known to human beings, was in a position of subordination to the heavenly Father, his deity veiled by his humanity, so that it was much more natural to assign to him the predicates of deity than to refer to him directly as God. The monotheistic background of the early Hebrew Christians doubtlessly exercised a restraining influence also. Some moderns who do not doubt Jesus' essential deity have also confessed to a feeling of restraint in referring to Jesus as God.

No term is more expressive of the faith of early believers in Jesus than LORD (Acts 2:36; 10:36; Rom. 10:9; 1 Cor. 8:6; 12:3; Phil. 2:11). It denotes the SOVEREIGNTY of Christ and his headship over the individual believer, the church as a body, and all things. For those who were strangers it was merely a title of respect and is translated “sir” (Jn. 4:11); but for those who were deeply attached to the Savior it had the highest import, calling alike for homage and obedience (Jn. 20:28; Acts 22:10). Used sparingly during the period of the earthly ministry prior to the resurrection, it takes on an increased use and heightened significance as a result of that momentous event.

Some titles pertain to the mission of Christ more than to his person. One of these is Word (Jn. 1:1, 14; 1 Jn. 1:1). See LOGOS. As such Christ is essentially the revealer of God, the One who opens to the understanding of people the nature and purposes of the Almighty and discloses the higher wisdom that stands in contrast to the wisdom of those who are merely human beings. In keeping with such a title is the designation Teacher, by which our Lord was customarily addressed in the days of his flesh. This attests to the impact of his instruction and the authority that lay behind it. Despite the fact that Jesus lacked rabbinic training, he could not be denied the recognition of the wisdom that shone through his spoken word.

The classic designation of Christ as Servant is given by Paul in Phil. 2:7, but it was widely recognized in the early church that our Lord fulfilled the servant-of-God role (see Matt. 12:17-21). That it dominated the thinking of Christ himself may be safely affirmed in the light of such a passage as Mk. 10:45. See SERVANT OF THE LORD.

Central to the mission of Christ was his work as SAVIOR. We have already seen that the name Jesus has this meaning, the name suggesting the reason for his coming into the world. Several passages herald Christ under the aspect of his saviorhood (e.g., Lk. 2:11; Jn. 4:42). The idea in the word is not merely deliverance from sin and all the other woes that afflict the human race, but the provision of a state of wholeness and blessedness in which a person realizes the purpose of God for him or her. In reports of the healings of Jesus, the verb form calls attention to the state of soundness that resulted from the healing touch of the Savior.

Jesus' saving mission is declared also in the expression, LAMB OF GOD (Jn. 1:29, 36; cf. Rev. 5:6). Peter likewise uses the word "lamb" in reference to Jesus, with special reference to his qualification of sinlessness (1 Pet. 1:19).

The designation of Jesus as High Priest is confined to the letter to the Hebrews, where it occurs some ten times, his work being described as taking place in the heavenly sanctuary, in the presence of God, where the fruits of his death for sinners on the earth are conserved in his work of intercession (Heb. 9:11-12).

More general is the characterization of the Lord as the MEDIATOR between God and men (1 Tim. 2:5). This term takes account of the barrier that sin erected between the Creator and the creature, that Christ alone was qualified to remove. For the concept in the OT, see Job 9:33.

Paul uses the title Last Adam (1 Cor. 15:45) in contrast to the first Adam, suggesting the undoing of the consequences of sin brought on by Adam's transgression (cf. Rom. 5:12-21) and the new creation life that is to be the possession of all believers in resurrection glory even as it is already their portion in Christ in a spiritual sense.

This list of names and titles of Christ is not exhaustive. The resources of language are taxed in the sacred record to set forth the full excellence and worth of the Son of God. When his work is considered in its broad sweep, the most satisfying analysis divides it into the offices that he fulfills—those of PROPHET, PRIEST, and KING. The prophetic ministry relates especially to the testimony given in the days of his flesh as he heralded the kingdom of God, warned of coming judgment, and encouraged the people of God. He is still the faithful and true witness as he speaks to the church through the Spirit. As priest our Lord made the one sacrifice of himself that brought to an end animal sacrifices and put away sin forever (Heb. 9:26). Faithful and merciful, he ministers before God on behalf of this people who are compassed by sin and infirmity (2:17; 4:15-16). The term king relates especially to the future activity of our Lord as he comes again to supplant the kingdom of the world with his own gracious and sovereign rule (Rev. 11:15). He will be no ordinary ruler, but King of kings, without a peer.

IV. Character. "What manner of man is this?" Such was the amazed observation of the disciples of Jesus as they watched him in action and felt the strength and mystery of his personality as they associated with him. Certain ingredients of character deserve special mention, but it cannot be said that he was noted for some things above others, for this would involve disproportion and would reflect on the perfection of his being. He had integrity. After all, this is the kernel of character. The gospel appeal to put our faith in Christ would be impossible if he were not trustworthy. No taint of duplicity marred his dealings with others, for there was no mixture of motives within his heart. He could not deceive, for he was Truth incarnate. The claims of Jesus in areas where we have no means of testing them can be cordially received, because in areas where his affirmations can be judged they stand the test.

Christ had courage. When Aristotle advanced his famous doctrine of the mean, he illustrated it by courage, which lies midway between cowardice and recklessness. Judged by this standard the character of Jesus appears in a most favorable light, for in him one can detect no wild instability even in the most intense activity, nor any supineness in his passivity. Christ had physical courage. Without it he could never have cleared the temple single-handedly. He had the courage of conviction. Peter was probably his boldest disciple, yet he denied his Lord under pressure, whereas Jesus confessed his own person and mission before the SANHEDRIN even though it meant his death. The stamina of human beings is often attributable, at least in part, to the help and sympathy of their fellows, but Jesus stood alone as he faced his final ordeal.

Our Lord showed great compassion as he dealt with people. This is the word used in the Gospels. In the NT Epistles it is called LOVE. The sight of multitudes forlorn and forsaken by those who should have been their spiritual shepherds stirred Christ to the depths of his being. Out of his compassion he ministered to their physical needs for food and health and went on to tell them the secrets of the life of true godliness. Compassion was more than an emotion with Jesus. It was a call to action, to selfless ministry on behalf of the needy. He gave himself to one with the same intensity that he showed in dealing with the many. Virtue went out of him and he did not regret the loss, for it is the nature of love to give. To love the loveless and love them to the end and to the uttermost—this is the love that Paul says “surpasses knowledge” (Eph. 3:19). It is a love that proved itself through death—he “loved me and gave himself for me” (Gal. 2:20)—and yet remains deathless.

Jesus clothed himself with HUMILITY. He could talk about this as his own possession without affectation (Matt. 11:29). Christ wrought a revolution in ethics by dignifying humility in a world that despised it as weakness. Though the universe was his creation, though he was equal with the Father, and though every knee would one day bow before him, yet he was not lifted up with pride because of these things. The mind of Christ is that which takes every reason for exaltation and transforms it into a reason for selfless service. In essence his humility was his refusal to please himself. He came not to be ministered to but to minister.

Our Lord’s character is crowned with perfection or sinlessness. This perfection was not simply the absence of sin, but the infusion of a heavenly HOLINESS into all that he said and did. It may be objected that when Jesus gave way to anger and spoke out in bitter denunciation of the Pharisees (Matt. 23), he revealed at least a trace of imperfection. But a character without the power of righteous indignation would be faulty. If Jesus had failed to expose these men, he would not have done his full duty as the exponent of truth. He is the image of the Father, and God is angry with the wicked every day.

V. Influence. A life so brief, so confined in its geographical orbit, so little noticed by the world in his own time, has yet become the most potent force for good in all of human history. This truth is seen in the Scriptures of the NT. In every single book that makes up this collection, Jesus Christ is the inevitable point of reference. Even so brief and personal a writing as Philemon owes its inspiration to the Son of God who came to make men free. The Gospels picture him in the flesh; the NT letters present him in the Spirit. The Acts of the Apostles depicts the victories of his grace in the extension of his church; the Revelation sets forth the triumph of his glory through his personal presence once more in history.

His influence on the saints is so radical and comprehensive that nothing can describe it better than the assertion that Christ is their life. They were not truly living until they came to know him by faith. Until he comes into the heart, self rules supreme. When he comes, he creates a new point of reference and a new set of values. To be Christ-centered is simply normal Christian experience.

What Christ can do in transforming a life may be seen to good advantage in the case of Saul of Tarsus. Apart from Christ the world might never have heard of him. Because in Christ he died to self and lived in the energy of the risen Christ to glorify God, his is a household name wherever Christians are found.

It is inevitable that sinners should feel the touch of Christ and never be the same afterward. Regarding the self-righteous leaders of his own time Jesus could say, "If I had not come and spoken to them, they would not be guilty of sin. Now, however, they have no excuse for their sin" (Jn. 15:22). Christ is the conscience of the world. Because he is the light of the world, when people stand in that light but then turn from it, they walk in deeper darkness and are without hope.

In a more general sense, Christ has mightily affected society in its organized state. He has taught the world the dignity of human life, the worth of the soul, the preciousness of personality. Because of this the status of women has steadily been improved under Christian influence, slavery has been abolished, and children, instead of being exposed as infants and neglected in formative years, are recognized as a primary responsibility for the lavishing of love and care. Even when human life becomes weak or deformed or diseased, it is not regarded as forfeiting a right to a place in society, but as being entitled to assistance. The fact that governments and scientific groups are now engaged in social service on a large scale ought not to disguise the fact that the impulse for these works of mercy has been the Christian church acting in the name and spirit of Christ.

The arts also owe their sublimest achievements to the desire to honor the Son of God. Beethoven called Handel the greatest composer of all time, a man who could not complete his oratorio The Messiah without being moved repeatedly to tears as he thought about the incarnation. Every cathedral spire that pierces the sky throughout Christendom bears its silent testimony to the loving outreach toward God that is induced through the knowledge of Christ the Lord. Moralists and philosophers, even when they lack faith in him for the saving of the soul, nevertheless are often found acknowledging wistfully that they wish they had a personal inheritance in him as they commend him to others as the one great hope for mankind.

Christian. (Christianos G5985, really a Latin formation, Christianus). The Latin termination -ianus is common and descriptive: in historical writings of classical times it is used to define a group in terms of its allegiance. The disciples of CHRIST were formally called Christians first in ANTIOCH of Syria (Acts 11:26). AGRIPPA II recognized that to believe what PAUL preached would make him a Christian (26:28). PETER accepted the name as in itself a basis for persecution (1 Pet. 4:16). Thus gradually a name imposed by GENTILES was adopted by the disciples of Jesus. Some Jews had referred to them as “the Nazarene sect” (Acts 24:5); and Paul, when he was a persecutor, referred to them as those “who belonged to the Way” (9:2). The apostles wrote of themselves as servants (slaves) of Christ (Rom. 1:1; Jas. 1:1; 2 Pet. 1:1; Jude 1; Rev. 1:1). The NT calls the followers of Christ “brothers” (Acts 14:2); “disciples” (6:1-2); “saints” (Acts 9:13; Rom. 1:7; 1 Cor. 1:2); “believers” (1 Tim. 4:12); “the church of God” (Acts 20:28); “all who call on your name” (Acts 9:14; Rom. 10:12-13). To the first Christians, their own name mattered not at all; their concern was with the one Name of Jesus Christ (Acts 3:16; 4:10, 12; 5:28). Inevitably, the name that they invoked was given to them: Christians—those who belong to Christ.

Chronicles, Books of. In the Hebrew Bible, these two volumes bear the title sēper dibrê hayyāmîm, “book of the things of the days,” that is, “record of the events of the times” or simply “annals.” This Hebrew expression occurs some thirty-two times in the books of Kings (e.g., 1 Ki. 14:29; 2 Ki. 1:18) and several times elsewhere (1 Chr. 27:24; Neh. 12:23; Esth. 6:1; 10:2), referring probably to official court records. The title used in the SEPTUAGINT, Paraleipomenōn, meaning “things left over,” reflects the view that 1-2 Chronicles contain events omitted in the accounts of Samuel and Kings, especially concerning the kingdom of Judah. The church father Jerome (c. A.D. 400) first entitled them “Chronicles.” Originally they formed a single composition but were divided into 1 and 2 Chronicles in the LXX, about 150 B.C. In the Hebrew they stand as the last book of the OT canon. Christ (Lk. 11:51) thus spoke of all the martyrs from Abel in the first book (Gen. 4) to Zechariah in the last (2 Chr. 24).

This cuneiform tablet (BM 21946, late 5th cent. or 4th cent. B.C.) records Babylonian history for the years 605-595 B.C. and includes Nebuchadnezzar's capture of Jerusalem in 598.

Chronicles contains no statements about its own authorship or date. The last event it records is the decree of CYRUS in 538 B.C. that permitted the exiles to return from their Babylonian captivity (2 Chr. 36:22); and its genealogies extend to approximately 500 B.C., as far, that is, as Pelatiah and Jeshaiiah (1 Chr. 3:21), two grandsons of ZERUBBABEL, the prince who led in the return from exile. The language, however, and the contents of Chronicles closely parallel that of the book of EZRA, which continues the history of the Jews from the decree of Cyrus down to 457 B.C. Both documents are marked by lists and genealogies, by an interest in priestly ritual, and by devotion to the law of Moses. Moreover, the closing verses of Chronicles (2 Chr. 36:22-23) are repeated as the opening verses of Ezra (Ezra 1:1-3). Thus many believe that Ezra may have been the author of both volumes. If so, his complete work would then have been finished some time around 450 B.C.

Ezra's position as a “scribe” (Ezra 7:6) may also explain the care that Chronicles shows in acknowledging its written source materials. These include such records as those of Samuel (1 Chr. 29:29), Isaiah (2 Chr. 32:32), and a number of other prophets (9:29; 12:15; 20:34; 33:19), and above all else, “the book of the kings of Judah and Israel” (e.g., 16:11; 25:26). This latter work cannot be equated with our present-day 1-2 Kings, for verses such as 1 Chr. 9:1

and 2 Chr. 27:7 refer to “the book of the kings” for further details on matters about which 1-2 Kings is silent. The author’s source must have been a larger court record, now lost, from which the authors of both Kings and Chronicles subsequently drew much of their information.

The occasion for the writing of Chronicles appears to be Ezra’s crusade to bring postexilic Judah back into conformity with the law of Moses (Ezra 7:10). From 458 B.C., Ezra sought to restore the temple worship (7:19-23, 27; 8:33-34), to eliminate the mixed marriages of Jews with their pagan neighbors (ch. 9-10), and to strengthen Jerusalem by rebuilding its walls (4:8-16). Chronicles, accordingly, consists of these four parts: genealogies, to enable the Jews to establish their lines of family descent (1 Chr. 1-9); the kingdom of David, as a pattern for the ideal theocratic state (10-29); the glory of Solomon, with an emphasis on the temple and its worship (2 Chr. 1-9); and the history of the southern kingdom, stressing in particular the religious reforms and military victories of Judah’s more pious rulers (10-36).

As compared with the parallel histories in Samuel and Kings, the priestly annals of Chronicles put a greater emphasis on the structure of the temple (1 Chr. 22) and on Israel’s ark, the Levites, and the singers (1 Chr. 13; 15-16). They omit, however, certain individualistic, moral acts of the kings (2 Sam. 9; 1 Ki. 3:16-28), as well as detailed biographies of the prophets (1 Ki. 17—22:28; 2 Ki. 1—8:15), features that account for the incorporation of Chronicles into the third (nonprophetic) section of the Hebrew canon, as distinguished from the location of the more homiletic books of Samuel and Kings in the second (prophetic) division. Finally, the chronicler foregoes discussion of David’s disputed inauguration and later shame (2 Sam. 1-4; 11-21), of Solomon’s failures (1 Ki. 11), and of the whole inglorious history of Saul (1 Sam. 8-30, except his death, v. 31), and of the northern kingdom of Israel. The disillusioned, impoverished Jews of 450 B.C. knew enough of sin and defeat; they needed an encouraging reminder of their former, God-given victories (e.g., 2 Chr. 13-14; 20; 25).

Overview of 1-2 CHRONICLES

Author: Unknown, though Jewish tradition attributed it (as well as Ezra and Nehemiah) to EZRA.

Historical setting: Chronicles treats approximately the same period covered by the books of 2 Samuel and 1-2 Kings, but from the perspective of someone living after the Babylonian EXILE, probably in the fifth century B.C. (some date Chronicles as late as 250 B.C.).

Purpose: To provide a historical-theological account of the Hebrew nation from the reign of DAVID to the fall of JERUSALEM, focusing almost exclusively on the southern kingdom of JUDAH, and reminding the people of the glories of the Davidic dynasty, the importance of the TEMPLE for Jewish WORSHIP, and the divine principle of BLESSING and RETRIBUTION.

Contents: After a genealogical background establishing the continuity of postexilic ISRAEL with the people of God (1 Chr. 1-9), the writer provides a narrative of the united Hebrew kingdom under David and SOLOMON, with emphasis on both the preparations for and the actual building of the temple (1 Chr. 10 to 2 Chr. 9); the last section traces the history of Judah after the division of the kingdom (2 Chr. 10-36).

Because of these emphases, many modern critics have rejected Chronicles as being Levitical propaganda, a fiction of “what ought to have happened,” with extensive (and conflicting) revisions as late as 250 B.C. The book’s high numeric totals (such as the one million invading Ethiopians, 2 Chr. 14:9) have been questioned despite the elucidations presented by several conservative scholars. Although Chronicles does stress the bright side of Hebrew history, it does not deny the defects (cf. 1 Chr. 29:22 on the successful second anointing of Solomon, and 2 Chr. 17:3 on the more exemplary first ways of David). The prophetic judgments of Kings and the priestly hopes of Chronicles are both true, and both are necessary. The morality of the former is invaluable, but the redemption of the latter constitutes the more distinctive feature of Christian faith.

While primarily historical in nature, the books of 1 and 2 Chronicles reflect a distinct theology. This theology is set forth in the selection and arrangement of historical events as well as in the chronicler’s comments on these events. One of the important theological themes of the books of Chronicles is the necessity of obedience for divine blessing. The chronicler observes that Saul’s death was due to unfaithfulness (1 Chr. 10:13-14), as was the exile of the southern kingdom (1 Chr. 9:1; see also 2 Chr. 6:24). On the other hand, obedience will bring blessing to the nation (1 Chr. 28:8; 2 Chr. 7:14-18). Even the lengthy genealogy that forms the preface to 1 Chronicles contains affirmations of this fact (4:10; 5:1, 25). The narration of selected events from the life of David focuses on the steps of obedience that led to his successful administration of the kingdom. Instances of David’s disobedience are minimized. Thus the obedience of David was presented as an ideal for the postexilic community.

Another theological aspect of Chronicles is its emphasis on the Davidic theology. David’s role in the establishment of Israelite worship receives prominence (1 Chr. 22:2-5; 23:1-32; 25:1—26:32). But most important to the Davidic theology is the restatement of the terms of the Abrahamic covenant to David (1 Chr. 17:1-27; cf. 2 Chr. 6:1-11). The Davidic covenant established the divine authority of the Davidic dynasty and guaranteed its perpetuity (1 Chr. 21:7).

The theology of worship in Chronicles acknowledges only one site where Israel may worship. The legitimacy of the postexilic temple and its personnel is established by virtue of its continuity with the temple built by Solomon under the sponsorship of David (1 Chr. 17:24; 2 Chr. 6:7-9).

chronology (OT). This topic presents complex and difficult problems. Because of insufficient data, many of these problems are at present insoluble. Even where the evidence is abundant, the exact meaning is often not immediately apparent, leaving room for considerable difference of opinion and giving rise to many variant chronological reconstructions. Only the most careful study of all the data, both biblical and extrabiblical, can hope to provide a reliable chronology.

I. From the creation to the flood. In this period the only biblical information consists of the ages of the patriarchs in Gen. 7:11 and the genealogical tables of Gen. 5. Calculations of the years from Adam to the flood vary in the ancient texts: 1,656 (Heb. Masoretic Text = MT), 1,307 (Samaritan Pentateuch = SP), and 2,242 (Gk. SEPTUAGINT = LXX). The numbers of the MT are in agreement with the SP except in the cases of Jared, Methuselah, and Lamech, where the numbers of the MT are higher by 100, 120, and 129 years respectively. For the eight patriarchs from Adam to Methuselah, the numbers of the LXX are a century higher in each instance than those of the SP, while for Lamech the number is 135 years higher.

Extrabiblical sources for this period are almost completely lacking. The early Sumerian king list names eight kings with a total of 241,200 years from the time when “the kingship was lowered from heaven” to the time when “the Flood swept” over the land and once more “the kingship was lowered from heaven” (Thorkild Jacobsen, The Sumerian King List [1939], 71, 77). Such a statement, however, makes no practical contribution to the solution of this phase of OT chronology. Nor is modern science in a position to supply a detailed and final solution.

II. From the flood to Abraham. For this period we are again dependent on the genealogical data in the Greek and Hebrew texts and the SP. Reckoning the age of Terah at the birth of Abraham as 70 (Gen. 11:26), the years from the flood to Abraham would be 292 according to the MT, 942 according to the SP, and 1,172 according to the LXX. But if the age of Terah at Abraham’s birth is reckoned as 130 years (on the basis of Gen. 11:32; 12:4; Acts 7:4), the above totals would be raised by 60 years. On this basis, the Hebrew text would give 352 years from the flood to Abraham, and the Greek would be 1,232. In this area the testimony of the MT stands alone against the LXX and the Samaritan Pentateuch, where the numbers are 100 years higher than those of the MT for Arphaxad, Salah, Eber, Peleg, Reu, and Serug; while for Nahor, the grandfather of Abraham, the SP and the LXX are respectively 50 and 150 years higher than the MT.

Serious chronological difficulties are thus encountered in the period immediately beyond Abraham. This patriarch was 86 years old at the birth of Ishmael (Gen. 16:16) and 100 at the birth of Isaac (21:5). But how old was Terah at the birth of Abraham—70, 130, or some number not revealed? And how old was Nahor at the birth of Terah—29, 79, or 179? If Terah was 130 years old at the birth of Abraham, as seems to be indicated by the biblical evidence, it must be admitted that the numbers of the LXX for this period (135, 130, 130, 134, 130, 132, 130, 179, 130), are much more consistent with each other than the numbers of the Hebrew (35, 30, 34, 30, 32, 30, 29, 130). But notice that in the case of nine patriarchs in the LXX, five of them were 130 years old when their sons were born, while in the Hebrew three out of eight were 30, one was 130, while the others were all in their thirties with the exception of Nahor, who was 29—one year from 30. And if Terah was 130 years old when Abraham was born, why was it regarded as so very unusual for Abraham to have a son at the age of 100 (Gen. 17:17; 18:11; 21:2, 5)?

An endeavor to assess the relative values of the three sources involved accomplishes little, for the indications are that none is complete. Certainly the LXX had great weight in NT times, for in Luke's table of the ancestors of Christ, there is listed a second Cainan—son of Arphaxad (Lk. 3:36), in harmony with the LXX of Gen. 11:12-13—a Cainan not found in the MT. If the LXX is here to be followed rather than the MT, another 130 years should be added to the years of the flood and creation, for that is the age of Cainan in the LXX at the time of the birth of Salah.

The omission of the names of known individuals is frequent in biblical genealogical records. Thus, Matthew's table of the ancestors of Christ omits the names of three Judean kings—Ahaziah, Joash, and Amaziah—with the statement that “Jehoram [was] the father of Uzziah” (Matt. 1:8), whereas Uzziah was actually the great-great-grandson of Jehoram. A comparison of Ezra 7:1-5 with 1 Chr. 6:4-15 shows a block of six names missing in Ezra's tabulation.

Extrabiblical materials prior to Abraham are of little assistance in the establishment of an absolute chronology, for no exact synchronisms exist between biblical and secular chronology of this period. Because of the difficulties involved, it must be admitted that the construction of a definitive chronology from Adam to Abraham is not now possible on the basis of the available data.

III. From Abraham to Moses. From Abraham to Joseph the detailed patriarchal narratives provide more data than are available for the preceding periods, and we have the certainty that there are no missing links. There are also a number of correlations with later and better-known periods. Since Abraham was 75 years old at the time of his entrance into Canaan (Gen. 12:4), and since he was 100 at the birth of Isaac (21:5), there were 25 years from the entry into Canaan to Isaac. Isaac was 60 at the birth of Jacob (25:26), and Jacob was 130 at his entrance into Egypt (47:9, 28), making 215 years from the beginning of the sojourn in Canaan to the beginning of the sojourn in Egypt. The total length of the sojourn was 430 years (Exod. 12:40). Did this involve only the sojourn in Egypt or did it include also the sojourn in Canaan? If Israel was in Egypt 430 years, there were 645 years from the entrance into Canaan to Moses' departure from Egypt. However, if the 430 years includes the time spent by the patriarchs in Canaan, the length of the Egyptian sojourn would have been only 215 years.

According to 1 Ki. 6:1, the temple was founded in the 480th year after the exodus. Some have argued that this figure is not intended as a precise number (40 x 12 perhaps indicating an ideal number of generations). If taken literally, however, it provides an important chronological marker. Solomon began to build the temple in the fourth year of his reign. On the basis of a 40-year reign (1 Ki. 11:42) and in accord with the established chronology of the kings, the year must have been 966 B.C. This information yields 1445 as the date of the exodus and 1525 as the year of Moses' birth (Exod. 7:7). If the 430-year sojourn involved only the period in Egypt, Abraham entered Canaan in 2090. If it included the years in Canaan, the date was 1875. The answer depends on the meaning of the prophecy of Gen. 15:13-16 and the reconstruction of the details from Abraham to Moses. From Abraham to Joseph the details are known, but from Joseph to Moses there is only genealogical evidence.

Due to omissions, repetitions, and other variations in the genealogical lists, the endeavor to establish dates by the evidence of such lists must be regarded as highly precarious. Compare, for instance, the line of descent of Samuel and his sons from Levi and Kohath as recorded in 1 Chr. 6:22-28 and in 6:33-38, and see 1 Sam. 8:2 for the names of these sons. Compare also the various lists of the sons of Benjamin and their descendants as found in Gen. 46:21; Num.

26:38-40; 1 Chr. 7:6-12; 8:1-40. The variations in existence here and in many other lists indicate the dangers involved in dogmatic reconstructions based only on genealogical evidence.

The ancestry of Moses from Jacob through Levi, Kohath, and Amram is repeatedly given (Num. 3:17-19; 26:57-59; 1 Chr. 6:1-3; 23:6, 12-13), including the ages of these men at the time of death (Exod. 6:16, 18, 20); but their ages at the time of their sons' births are not recorded. Jochebed, the wife of Amram and mother of Moses, is said to have been the sister of Kohath, who was the son of Levi and the grandfather of Moses (6:16, 18, 20), and to have been born to Levi in Egypt (Num. 26:59). This might appear to be conclusive evidence of a comparatively brief period in Egypt and to make a sojourn there of 430 years impossible. But there are difficulties. While four to five generations from Jacob to Moses may be indicated in the above line of descent, eleven generations may be counted from Jacob to Joshua (1 Chr. 7:20-27). And that some considerable period was involved is clear from the fact that Joseph before his death saw the children of the third generation of both his sons (Gen. 50:23), and that at the time of the exodus, Amram and his brothers were already regarded as founders of clans (Num. 3:27).

Levi was the elder brother of Joseph and must have been born not more than ten years before Joseph (Gen. 29:30-34; 30:22-43; 31:41). Since Joseph was 30 when he stood before Pharaoh (41:46), and since seven years of plenty and two years of famine had passed at the time Jacob entered Egypt (41:47, 53; 45:6), Joseph would have been 39 when Jacob was 130 (47:9, 28) and would thus have been born when Jacob was 91. That, however, would have made Jacob an old man of about 80 at the time of his marriage and the birth of his firstborn—possible but hardly probable. In view of the frequency of the numbers of 30 or 130 in age lists of biblical patriarchs, and in view of the significance of the number 30 in connection with the Sed Festival in Egypt (which honored a ruler on the thirtieth anniversary of his appointment as heir to the crown), the question might well be raised as to whether 130 as the age of Jacob is used in an absolute sense. If not, the chronological reckonings based on it are only approximate and not absolute.

We should also notice that if the sojourn in Egypt was 215 years and if there were only four generations from Jacob to Moses, then Levi must have been about 100 at the birth of Jochebed, and Jochebed 84 at the birth of Moses. Since the birth of Isaac to Sarah when she was 90 and to Abraham when he was 100 was regarded as in the nature of a miracle (Gen. 17:17; 18:11-14; Rom. 4:19), these ages are hardly probable.

On the basis of the OT data it is impossible to give a categorical answer as to exactly what was involved in the 430-year sojourn, nor is it possible to give an absolute date for Abraham's entry into Canaan. Paul regarded the 430 years as beginning at the time when the promises were made to Abraham (Gen. 12:1-4) and terminating with the giving of the law at Sinai (Gal. 3:16-17). On this basis the date of the entry into Canaan and the beginning of the sojourn was 1875 B.C.

An exodus date of 1445 calls for 1405 as the beginning of the conquest (Num. 33:38; Deut. 1:3; Josh. 5:6). If so, the exodus took place during the reigns of the famous rulers of Egypt's 18th dynasty (c. 1570-1325). Such a setting fits well with some of the evidence, but not all. Many scholars have argued for a date in the thirteenth century. See the discussion under EXODUS.

IV. From the conquest to the kingdom. The establishment of absolute dates from Moses through Joshua and the judges to the setting up of the monarchy is again not possible with the available data. Assuming the date 1405 B.C. for the beginning of the conquest, we infer 1399 as the year when Caleb received his inheritance, since he was 40 when he was sent as a spy from Kadesh Barnea (Josh. 14:7) in the second year after the departure from Egypt (Num. 10:11-12; Deut. 2:14), and he was 85 when he received his inheritance 45 years later (Josh. 14:10). The date of Joshua's death cannot be given, for we do not know how old he was when he was sent as a spy, although he was 110 when he died (24:29).

Many attempts have been made to set dates for the judges, but, with the data now available, absolute certainty regarding the chronology for this period is impossible. Here are the data:

Oppression under Cushan-Rishathaim	(Jdg. 3:8)	8
Deliverance under Othniel; peace	(Jdg. 3:11)	40
Oppression under Eglon of Moab	(Jdg. 3:14)	18
Deliverance by Ehud; peace	(Jdg. 3:30)	80
Oppression under Jabin of Hazor	(Jdg. 4:3)	20
Deliverance under Deborah; peace	(Jdg. 5:31)	40
Oppression under Midian	(Jdg. 6:1)	7
Deliverance under Gideon; peace	(Jdg. 8:28)	40
Reign of Abimelech	(Jdg. 9:22)	3
Judgeship of Tola	(Jdg. 10:2)	23
Judgeship of Jair	(Jdg. 10:3)	22
Oppression of Gilead by Ammon	(Jdg. 10:8)	18
Judgeship of Jephthah	(Jdg. 12:7)	6
Judgeship of Ibzan	(Jdg. 12:9)	7
Judgeship of Elon	(Jdg. 12:11)	10
Judgeship of Abdon	(Jdg. 12:14)	8
Oppression under the Philistines	(Jdg. 13:1)	40
Judgeship of Samson	(Jdg. 15:20; 16:31)	20
Judgeship of Eli	(1 Sam. 4:18)	40
Judgeship of Samuel	(1 Sam. 7:2)	20

The sum of the above numbers is 470 years. However, it seems clear that we can subtract the 20 years of Samson's judgeship, because that period is included in the 40 years of oppression under the Philistines (he “led Israel for twenty years in the days of the Philistines,” Jdg. 15:20). This results in the grand total of 450 years for the period of the judges, the same number given by the apostle Paul when he spoke of this period in his speech in the synagogue at Antioch in Pisidia (Acts 13:20). On the other hand, some speculate that the judges were local rulers, exercising control over limited areas while others held office in other parts of the land (cf. Jephthah, who ruled over Gilead, Jdg. 10:18; 11:5-11; 12:4). They argue that the judgeships and oppressions at times overlapped (as with Samson); two oppressions might have been simultaneous in different parts of the land, as with the Ammonites in the NE and the Philistines in the SW (10:6-7). Furthermore, they say, the numerous 40s or multiples and submultiples of 40 (40, 80, 20, 40, 40, 10, 40, 20, 40) and Jephthah’s 300 years after the conquest (11:26) are to be understood as merely approximate.

V. The united monarchy. Because of a number of uncertainties the absolute date for the establishment of the united monarchy cannot be given. The OT does not give the length of the reign of Saul, but Paul in a sermon at Antioch referred to it as forty years (Acts 13:21). If Saul reigned a full forty years, David was not born until ten years after Saul began his reign, for he was thirty when he took the throne (2 Sam. 5:4). The battle with the Philistines at Micmash, with Jonathan in command of a large part of the army, presumably took place early in Saul’s reign, perhaps even in his second year (1 Sam. 13:1-2). In such a case Jonathan would have been well advanced in years when David was a mere youth, which is out of harmony with the picture in the biblical record. Other difficulties are also involved, all making it clear that Saul either did not reign a full forty years or that he must have been very young when he took the throne.

The reign of David, on the other hand, may be regarded as a full forty years, for he reigned seven years in Hebron and thirty-three in Jerusalem (2 Sam. 5:4-5; 1 Ki. 2:11; 1 Chr. 3:4), and one event is dated in the fortieth year (1 Chr. 26:31).

Solomon began his reign before the death of David (1 Ki. 1:32-48), but how long is not recorded. Presumably it was only a short time, but the indefiniteness of this period must be taken into consideration in any endeavor to establish an absolute chronology. And the forty years of his reign (11:42) might have been intended as a round number. Without certainty that the recorded numbers from the exodus to Solomon are absolute, we cannot provide a definitive chronology for the periods involved.

VI. The divided monarchy. For the period of the divided monarchy an entirely different situation is found. Here there is an abundance of data that may be checked against each other; and the numbers evidently are no longer round. Four biblical yardsticks are here provided—the lengths of reign of the rulers of Judah and those of Israel, and the synchronisms of Judah with Israel and of Israel with Judah. Furthermore, a number of synchronisms with the fixed years of contemporary Assyria make possible a check with an exact chronological yardstick and make possible the establishment of absolute years for the period of the kings.

Various methods were used in the ANE for reckoning the official years of kings. During the divided monarchy, Judah used a system whereby the year when a ruler took the throne was his “accession year.” Israel, on the other hand, followed those nations where a king termed his initial year his “first year.” According to this latter method, the year when a king began to reign was always counted twice—as the last year of his predecessor and his own first official year. Thus, reigns reckoned according to this method were always one year longer in official length than those reckoned according to the former method, and for every reign there was always a gain of one year over absolute time. The following tables will make these two methods of reckoning clear and will show how for every reign the totals of Israel for this period increase by one year over those of Judah:

The following table shows how the totals of both nations from the division to the death of Ahaziah in Israel in the eighteenth year of Jehoshaphat in Judah (omitting the seven-day reign of Zimri) are identical and perfectly correct when properly understood:

Based on biblical numbers that possess internal harmony and are in accord with the years of contemporary Assyria and Babylon, the following conditions make possible the construction of a chronological pattern of the kings: (1) regnal years that begin the month of Tishri in Judah and the month of Nisan in Israel; (2) accession-year reckoning for Judah except for Jehoram, Ahaziah, Athaliah, and Joash, who followed the nonaccession-year system then employed in Israel; (3) nonaccession-year reckoning in Israel for the early period, but accession-year reckoning from Jehoash to the end; (4) synchronisms of each nation in accord with its own current system of reckoning; (5) a number of coregencies or of overlapping reigns when rival rulers exercised control; (6) a double chronological pattern for both Israel and Judah involving the closing years of Israel's history.

The years of the kings based on the above principles are as follows:

VII. The exile and return. The book of 2 Kings closes with the notice of the release of Jehoiachin from captivity on the twenty-seventh day of the twelfth month, in the thirty-seventh year of his captivity and the accession year of Evil-Merodach (2 Ki. 25:27). That was April 2, 561 B.C.

Babylon fell to the Persians on October 12, 539 B.C., and Cyrus in the first year of his reign issued a decree permitting the Jews to return and rebuild the temple (2 Chr. 36:22; Ezra 1:1). On the basis of Nisan regnal years, this would have been 538. However, Neh. 1:1 and 2:1 give evidence that the author of Nehemiah reckoned the years of the Persian kings not from Nisan as was the Persian custom, but from Tishri, in accord with the Jewish custom. The Aramaic papyri from Elephantine in Egypt give evidence that the same custom was followed by the Jewish colony there in the fifth century B.C. Since it is probable that Chronicles-Ezra-Nehemiah were originally one and came from the same author, the indications are that the first year of Cyrus referred to in Ezra 1:1 was reckoned on a Tishri basis, and that it was, therefore, in 537 that Cyrus issued his decree.

Haggai began his ministry on the first day of the sixth month in the second year of Darius (Hag. 1:1), August 29, 520; and Zechariah commenced his work in the eighth month of the same year (Zech. 1:1), in October or November of 520. The temple was completed on the third of Adar, the sixth year of Darius (Ezra 6:15), March 12, 515.

The return of Ezra from Babylon was begun the first day of the first month, in the seventh year of Artaxerxes (Ezra 7:7, 9). Artaxerxes came to the throne in December of 465, and this would bring the first of Nisan of his seventh year on April 8, 458, according to Persian reckoning, but on March 27, 457, according to Judean years. The evidence that this was the custom then employed has already been given above.

Word was brought to Nehemiah of the sad state of affairs at Jerusalem in the month Kislev of the twentieth year of Artaxerxes (Neh. 1:1), and in Nisan of that same twentieth year Nehemiah stood before the king and received permission to return to Jerusalem to rebuild the city (2:1-8). That was April, 444 B.C. With Nehemiah's return to Babylon in the thirty-second year of Artaxerxes (13:6), 433/32, the chronology of the OT proper comes to a close.

chronology (NT). The task of determining precise dates for the NT books and the historical events mentioned in them is beset with serious difficulty. The necessary evidence is often lacking, and the computations must be based on ancient documents that did not record historical events under exact calendar dates as modern historical records do. Neither sacred nor secular historians of that time were accustomed to record history under absolute dates; they felt that all demands were satisfied when some specific event was related to a well-known period, as the reign of a noted ruler or the time of some famous contemporary. Luke's method of dating the beginning of the ministry of John the Baptist (Lk. 3:1-2) is typical of the historian's method of that day. Further, the use of different local chronologies and different ways of computing years often leave the results tentative. NT chronology naturally falls into two parts: the life of Christ and the apostolic age.

I. Life of Christ. The erection of a chronology of the life of Christ turns around three points: his birth, baptism, and crucifixion. Luke's statement of the age of Jesus at his baptism (Lk. 3:23) links the first two, while the problem of the length of the ministry links the second and third.

The Christian era, now used almost exclusively in the Western world for civil chronology, was introduced at Rome by Abbot Dionysius Exiguus in the sixth century. It is now generally agreed that the beginning of the era should have been fixed at least four years later. According to the Gospels, Jesus was born some time before the death of Herod the Great. Josephus, the Jewish historian who was born A.D. 37, affirms that Herod died shortly after an eclipse of the moon (Ant. 17.6.4), which is astronomically fixed at March 12-13, 4 B.C. His death occurred shortly before Passover, which that year fell on April 4. His death in 4 B.C. is also confirmed from the known commencement of the rule of his three sons in that year. The age of Jesus at Herod's death is not certain. The "two years" for the age of the children killed at Bethlehem (Matt. 2:16) offers no sure indication, since Herod would allow a liberal margin for safety; also, part of a year might be counted as a year. It does show that Jesus was born at least some months before Herod's death. Christ's presentation in the temple after he was forty days old (Lev. 12:1-8; Lk. 2:22-24) may indicate that the wise men came at least six weeks after his birth. The time spent in Egypt is uncertain, but it may have been several months. Thus, the birth of Jesus should likely be placed in the latter part of the year 5 B.C.

Luke's statement that Jesus was born in connection with the "first census" when "Quirinius was governor of Syria" (Lk. 2:1-2) was once fiercely assailed as erroneous, since Quirinius was known to be governor in connection with the census of A.D. 6. But it is now known that he was also connected with the Syrian government at some previous time (see QUIRINIUS). Papyrus evidence shows that Augustus inaugurated a periodic census every fourteen years, from 8 B.C. onward. Herod's war with the king of Arabia and his troubles with Augustus, as well as the problem of the method of taking the census among the Jews, may have delayed the actual census in Palestine for several years, bringing it down to the year 5 B.C.

Luke gives the age of Jesus at his baptism as "about thirty years" (Lk. 3:23). Although the statement of age is not specific, it may indicate that he was only a few months under or over thirty. Born in the latter part of 5 B.C., his baptism then occurred near the close of A.D. 26 or the beginning of 27. The forty-day period of the temptation plus the events recorded in Jn. 1:19—2:12 seem to require that the baptism occurred at least three months before the first Passover of his public ministry (2:13-22). Since Herod began the reconstruction of the temple in 20 B.C., the "forty and six years" mentioned by the Jews during this Passover, using the inclusive Jewish count, again brings us to A.D. 27 for this first Passover.

Apparently John began his ministry some six months before the baptism of Jesus, Scripture dating that beginning as “in the fifteenth year of the reign of Tiberius Caesar” (Lk. 3:1). Augustus died in August of A.D. 14, but fifteen years added to that would be two years too late for our previous dates. Since Tiberius had been reigning jointly with Augustus in the provinces for two years before his death, it seems only natural that Luke would follow the provincial point of view and count the fifteen years from the time of Tiberius’ actual assumption of authority in the provinces. Thus counted, the date is in harmony with our other dates. The ministry of John, begun about six months before the baptism of Jesus, commenced about the middle of A.D. 26. (Others, however, argue that since there is no evidence that Tiberius’s reign was ever reckoned as beginning prior to the year 14, John’s ministry must have begun no earlier than 28.)

The time of the crucifixion will be determined by the length of the ministry of Jesus. Mark’s Gospel seems to require at least two years: the plucking of the ears of grain (April-June) marks a first spring, the feeding of the 5,000 when the grass was fresh green (March-April) was a second, and the Passover of the crucifixion becomes the third. John’s Gospel explicitly mentions three Passovers (Jn. 2:23; 6:4; 11:55). If the feast of Jn. 5:1 is also a Passover, as seems probable—a view having the traditional backing of Irenaeus—then the length of the ministry of Jesus was a full three years and a little over. This places the crucifixion at the Passover of A.D. 30. (An alternate reckoning dates the crucifixion in the year 33.)

II. Apostolic Age. Due to the uncertainties connected with the limited data for an apostolic chronology, authorities have arrived at varied dates. The book of Acts, with its many notes of time, mostly indefinite, offers but few points for the establishment of even relatively fixed dates. Even Paul’s apparently precise chronological notes in Gal. 1:18 and 2:1 leave us in doubt as to whether “after three years” and “fourteen years later” are to be regarded as consecutive or as both counting from his conversion.

The death of Herod Agrippa I (Acts 12:23) and the proconsulship of Gallio (18:12) are important for the chronology of the period. The death of Herod Agrippa I, one of the fixed dates of the NT, is known to have taken place in A.D. 44. It establishes the year of Peter’s arrest and miraculous escape from prison. The proconsulship of Gallio is also strongly relied on for an apostolic chronology. A fragmentary inscription found at Delphi associates his proconsulship with the twenty-sixth acclamation of Claudius as Imperator. This would place his proconsulship between May of 51 and 52, or between May of 52 and 53. The latter date is more probable since Gallio would assume office in May and not in midsummer as some advocates of the earlier date assumed. Since apparently Paul had already been at Corinth a year and a half when Gallio arrived, his ministry at Corinth began in the latter part of 50. Efforts to determine the time of the accession of Festus as governor, under whom Paul was sent to Rome, have not resulted in agreement. From the inconclusive data, advocates have argued for a date as early as 55 and as late as 60 or 61. The balance of the arguments seem to point to 60 or perhaps 59. If the latter, the suggested dates should be adjusted accordingly.

III. Chronological table. The dates for many NT events must remain tentative, but as indicated by Luke (Lk. 3:1-2), they have a definite correlation with secular history (as shown in the accompanying diagram). The following chronological table is regarded as approximately correct.

church. The English word church (cf. also Scottish kirk) is derived from the Greek adjective kyriakos G3258, signifying “the Lord’s” or “belonging to the Lord.” In the NT, however, church translates a different Greek term, ekklēsia G1711 (from a verb meaning “to call out”). This noun was originally employed in secular Greek society to denote an assembly or congregation of free citizens summoned or “called out” by a herald in connection with public affairs (cf. Acts 19:39). In the SEPTUAGINT the “congregation” of Israel is referred to as the ekklēsia, especially when gathered before the Lord for religious purposes (Deut. 31:30; Acts 7:38). In this latter sense the word is adopted to describe the new gathering or congregation of the disciples of Jesus Christ.

In the Gospels the term is found only in Matt. 16:18 and 18:17. This paucity is perhaps explained by the fact that both these verses seem to envisage a situation that would follow Christ’s earthly ministry. Yet the verses show that Christ has this reconstitution in view, that the church thus reconstituted will rest on the apostolic confession, and that it will take up the ministry of reconciliation.

When we turn to Acts, the situation changes. The saving work has been fulfilled, and the NT church can thus have its birthday at PENTECOST. The term is now used regularly to describe local groups of believers. Thus, we read of the church at Jerusalem (Acts 5:11), Antioch (13:1), and Caesarea (18:22). At the same time the word is used for all believers (as is possibly the case in 9:31). From the outset the church has both a local and a general significance, denoting both the individual assembly and the worldwide community.

This twofold usage is also seen in PAUL. He addresses his letters to specific churches, such as those in Corinth (1 Cor. 1:2) or Thessalonica (1 Thess. 1:1). Indeed, he seems sometimes to localize further by referring to specific groups within the local community as churches, as though sending greetings to congregations within the one city (e.g., Rom. 16:5). Yet Paul also develops more fully the concept of a church that consists of all believers in all local churches, as in 1 Cor. 10:32 and 1 Tim. 3:15, and with an even grander sweep in Col. 1:18 and especially Ephesians. The other NT books give us mostly examples of the local usage (e.g., 3 Jn. 9; Rev. 1:4; 2:1).

There is no tension between the local and the universal sense. Each church or congregation is the church in its own setting, each a manifestation or concretion of the whole church. This means that there is room for great flexibility in organization and structure according to particular and varying needs. At the worldwide level, it is unlikely that there can ever be more than the loosest practical interconnection. Varying degrees of integration are possible at national, provincial, or municipal levels. But the basic unity is always the local church, not in isolation but as a concretion of the universal fellowship with a strong sense of belonging to it.

This leads us to the further consideration that the church is not primarily a human structure like a political, social, or economic organism. It is basically the church of Jesus Christ (“my church,” Matt. 16:18) or of the living God (1 Tim. 3:15). The various biblical descriptions all emphasize this. It is metaphorically a building of which Jesus Christ is the chief cornerstone or foundation, “a holy temple in the Lord...a dwelling in which God lives by his Spirit” (Eph. 2:20-22). It is the fellowship of saints or people of God (1 Pet. 2:9). It is the bride of Jesus Christ, saved and sanctified by him for union with himself (Eph. 5:25-26). Indeed, the church is the BODY OF CHRIST (Rom. 12:5; 1 Cor. 12:12-13; Eph. 4:4, 12, 16-17), and as such it is the fullness of Christ, who himself fills all in all (Eph. 1:23).

While there is an element of imagery in some of the terms used to refer to the church (Christ’s temple, bride, or body), its true reality is found in the company of those who believe in Christ and are thus dead, buried, and raised in him, their Savior and substitute. Yet, this reality is not the visible one of earthly organization. The various local churches in this sinful age do not fully conform to their new and true reality any more than individual believers conform to what they are now in Christ. In its real life the church is known only in faith. It is thus hidden or, in the old phrase, “invisible.” The visible life that it must also have, and that should be conformed to its true reality, may fall far short of it. Indeed, in visible organization even the membership cannot be fully identical with that of the true church (cf. Simon Magus). Yet the church invisible is not just ideal or mystical, but the real fact of the church is its being in Christ. In every manifestation, there should thus be the aim, not of conformity to the world, but of transformation by renewal into the likeness of him in whom it has its true life (cf. Rom. 12:2).

In this connection appears the relevance of the traditional “marks” or “notes” of the church. (1) The church is one (Eph. 4:4), for Jesus Christ has only one temple, bride, and body, and all divisions are overcome in death and resurrection with him and by endowment of his Spirit. In all its legitimate multiformity, the visible church should thus seek a unity corresponding to this reality. (2) The church is holy, for it is set apart and sanctified by himself (Gal. 1:4; Eph. 5:26). Even in its pilgrimage in the world, it is thus to attest its consecration by the manner of its life and the nature of its service (cf. 1 Pet. 1:15). (3) The church is catholic or universal, that is, constituted from among all people of all races, places, and ages (Eph. 2:14; Col. 1:6; 3:11; Rev. 5:9). For all its diversity of membership and form, it is thus to maintain its universality of outreach, yet also its identity and relevance in every age and place. (4) The church is apostolic, for it rests on the foundation of the apostles and prophets (Eph. 2:20), the apostles being raised up as the first authoritative witnesses (Acts 1:8) whose testimony is basic and by whose teaching it is called, instructed, and directed. In all its activity it is thus “devoted...to the apostles’ teaching and to the fellowship” (Acts 2:42), not finding apostolicity in mere externals but in conformity to apostolic teaching and practice as divinely perpetuated in Holy Scripture.

This brings us to the means of the church’s life and its continuing function. It draws its life from Jesus Christ by the Holy Spirit; but it does so through the Word, from which it gets life (Jas. 1:18) and by which it is nourished and sanctified (Eph. 5:26; 1 Pet. 2:2). Receiving life by the Word, it also receives its function, namely, to pass on the Word that others may also be quickened and cleansed. It is to preach the gospel (Mk. 16:15), to take up the ministry of reconciliation (2 Cor. 5:19), to dispense the mysteries of God (1 Cor. 4:1).

The ministry of the church arises in this connection. The apostles were first commissioned, and they ordained others, yet no rigid form of ministry arose in the NT. Rather, we are given patterns (notably of speech, action, and rule), historically focused in the elders (also called bishops or overseers) and the deacons. There seems to be no biblical prescription, however, for the discharge of ministry in a fixed order, nor for the sharp isolation of an official ministry from the so-called laity or “mere” people of God. The Bible’s concern is that there should be real ministry, that is, service, not in self-assertion and pride but in humility, obedience, and self-offering that conforms to the example of him who was among us as one who serves (see Matt. 23:11-12; Phil. 2:5-6; 1 Pet. 5:1-2).

Finally, the church’s work is not exclusively for the salvation of people; it is primarily to the praise of God’s glory (Eph. 1:6; 2:7). Hence neither the church nor its function ceases with the completion of its earthly task. There is ground, therefore, for the old distinction between the church triumphant and the church militant. All the church is triumphant in its true reality. But the warring and wayfaring church is still engaged in conflict between the old reality and the new. Its destiny, however, is to be brought into full conformity to the Lord (1 Jn. 3:2). Toward this it moves hesitantly yet expectantly, confident in its future glory when it will be wholly the church triumphant as graphically depicted in Rev. 7:9-17, enjoying its full reality as the bride and body of the Lord.

Cilicia. suh-lish´ee-uh (Gk. Kilikia G3070). A country in SE ASIA MINOR, bounded on the N and W by the Taurus range, and on the S by the Mediterranean. It had two parts, the western one called Rugged Cilicia; the eastern one, Plain Cilicia, the chief city of which was TARSUS, the birthplace of PAUL (Acts 21:39; 22:3; 23:34). The early inhabitants must have been Hittites. Later, Syrians and Phoenicians settled there. It came under Persian sway. After ALEXANDER THE GREAT, Seleucid rulers governed it from ANTIOCH of Syria. It became a Roman province in 100 B.C. One of its governors was Cicero, the famous orator (51-50). Cilicia is accessible by land only by way of its two famous mountain passes, the Cilician Gates and the Syrian Gates. Jews from Cilicia disputed with STEPHEN (Acts 6:9). The gospel reached it early (15:23), probably through Paul (9:30; Gal. 1:21). On his second missionary journey the apostle confirmed the churches that had been established there (Acts 15:41), and on his way to Rome as a prisoner he sailed over the sea of Cilicia (27:5).

circle of the earth. The prophet Isaiah says that God “sits enthroned above the circle of the earth” (Isa. 40:22). The Hebrew word for “circle” here occurs in two other passages (Job 22:14, referring to the “vault” or “dome” of heaven, and Prov. 8:27, which says that God traced the “horizon” of the ocean). The text neither assumes nor excludes the notion of a spherical earth. All the usage of the term indicates is that the horizon where the sea meets the sky was known by observation to be curved, that it was upon this arc that Yahweh set the limits of the seas, and that his power and sovereignty are shown by the fact that he is enthroned above it.

circumcision. The surgical removal of the foreskin or prepuce, a covering of skin on the head of the male sexual organ. This custom has prevailed among many peoples in different parts of the world, and in ancient times it was practiced among many western Semites—Hebrews, Arabians, Moabites, Ammonites, Edomites, and also Egyptians, but not among the Babylonians, Assyrians, Canaanites, and Philistines. Various theories are held regarding the origin and original significance of circumcision, but there can be no doubt that it was at first a religious act.

Among the Hebrews the rite was instituted by God as the sign of the COVENANT between him and ABRAHAM, shortly after the latter’s sojourn in Egypt. God ordained that it be performed on Abraham, on his posterity and slaves, and on foreigners joining themselves to the Hebrew nation (Gen. 17:12). Every male child was to be circumcised on the eighth day. Originally the father performed the rite, but in exceptional cases a woman could do it (Exod. 4:25). In later times a Hebrew surgeon was called in. The child was given his name at the ceremony. Today in Jewish families the rite is performed either in the parent’s home or in the synagogue. In former times flint or glass knives were preferred, but now steel is usually used.

According to the terms of the covenant symbolized by circumcision, the Lord undertook to be the God of Abraham and his descendants, and they were to belong to him, worshiping and obeying only him. The rite effected admission to the fellowship of the covenant people and secured for the individual, as a member of the nation, his share in the promises God made to the nation as a whole. Circumcision reminded the Israelites of God’s promises to them and of the duties they had assumed. The prophets often reminded them that the outward rite, to have any significance, must be accompanied by a “circumcision of the heart” (Lev. 26:41; Deut. 30:6; Ezek. 44:7). Jeremiah said that his countrymen were no better than the pagans, for they were “uncircumcised in heart” (Jer. 9:25-26). Paul used a word meaning “mutilation” (KJV, “concision”) for this outward circumcision not accompanied by a spiritual change (Phil. 3:2). In the early history of the Christian church, Judaizing Christians argued for the necessity of circumcising GENTILES who came into the church over against Paul, who insisted that the signs of the old covenant could not be forced on the children of the new covenant. Paul's view was affirmed by the Council of Jerusalem (Acts 15).

cistern. An artificial tank or reservoir dug in the earth or rock for the collection and storage of rain WATER, or, sometimes, of spring water brought from a distance by a conduit. A cistern is distinguished from a pool by always being covered. Cisterns were very numerous in Palestine. The long, dry, rainless summers, lasting from May to September, and the small annual precipitation, together with a lack of natural springs, made the people largely dependent on RAIN water. Cisterns were fed from surface and roof drainage by gutters and pipes. The hilly character of the land allowed little rain to penetrate the soil. Most of it flowed down the steep hillsides through the many ravines and watercourses, and it was easily brought by conduits to pools and cisterns. Cisterns in Palestine varied in size and character. Some were cut wholly in the rock, often in the form of a bottle-shaped tank, with a long stairway leading to the surface of the ground. They were often of great depth, some more than 100 ft. (30 m.) deep. Very large ones were supported by rock pillars. The TEMPLE area in Jerusalem had at least thirty-seven great cisterns, one of them holding between two and three million gallons (8-11 million liters). Public rock-cut cisterns were made within the city walls so that the inhabitants could hold out in time of siege.

Where the substratum of the soil was earth and not rock, cisterns of masonry were built. Some of these were large and had vaulted roofs supported by pillars. Besides the large public cisterns, there were many smaller private ones. Ancient sites are honeycombed with them. All cisterns had one or more openings for drawing water to the surface. They needed periodic cleaning because of the impurities washed in from the outside. Empty cisterns were sometimes used as prisons. Joseph was cast into one (Gen. 37:22), and Jeremiah was let down into one with a muddy bottom (Jer. 38:6). Zechariah 9:11 alludes to the custom of confining prisoners in an empty cistern.

citadel. Fortifications within Hebrew towns. The term should probably be applied only to the final defense unit of a city. This might include the palace (1 Ki. 16:18) or sometimes the temple (Neh. 2:8). See also CASTLE.

cities, Levitical. See LEVITICAL CITIES.

cities of refuge. Six cities, three on each side of the JORDAN, set apart by MOSES and JOSHUA as places of asylum for those who had committed manslaughter. Those E of the Jordan were BEZER in Reuben, RAMOTH GILEAD in Gad, and GOLAN in Manasseh (Deut. 4:41-43); those W of the Jordan were HEBRON in Judah, SHECHEM in Ephraim, and KEDESH in Naphtali (Josh. 20:7-8). To shelter the person guilty of manslaughter from the AVENGER of blood, provision was made that the principal roads leading to these cities should always be kept open. No part of Palestine was more than 30 mi. (50 km.) away from a city of refuge—a distance that could be covered in one day. Cities of refuge were provided to protect a person until his case could be properly adjudged. The right of asylum was only for those who had taken life unintentionally. Willful murderers were put to death at once.

The regulations concerning these cities of refuge are found in Num. 35; Deut. 19:1-13; and Josh. 20. If one guilty of unintentional killing reached a city of refuge before the avenger of blood could kill him, he was given asylum until a fair trial could be held. The trial took place where the accused had lived. If proved innocent of willful murder, he was brought back to the city of refuge. There he had to stay until the death of the high priest. After that he was free to return to his own home. But if during that period he passed beyond the limits of the city of refuge, the avenger of blood could kill him without blame.

cities of the plain. This phrase occurs twice in the OT (Gen. 13:12; 19:29) and refers to certain cities near the DEAD SEA, including SODOM, GOMORRAH, ADMAH, ZEBOIIM, and ZOAR. In the first reference we read that LOT, after ABRAHAM had given him the choice of where he wanted to live, decided to dwell in the cities of the plain and pitched his tent near Sodom. According to Gen. 14:2, each of the cities had its own king; this chapter recounts how Abraham delivered Lot when the cities were attacked and Lot taken captive. The story of the destruction of the cities because of their wickedness is given in ch. 19. It is thought that God may have accomplished this by causing an eruption of gases and petroleum to ignite. Only Lot and his two daughters were spared. The exact site of the cities is unknown; but though there are weighty arguments for believing that they were at the N end of the Dead Sea, scholars favor the S end, especially since asphalt in large quantities has been found only here. It is believed that the sea covers the site. Sodom and Gomorrah are often used as a warning example of sin and divine punishment (Deut. 29:23; Isa. 1:9; 3:9; Jer. 50:40; Ezek. 16:46; Matt. 10:15; Rom. 9:29).

citizenship. In the Gospels the use of the Greek word for “citizen” means nothing more than the inhabitant of a country (Lk. 15:15; 19:14). Among the ancient Jews emphasis was placed on Israel as a religious organization, not on relationship to city and state. The good citizen was the good Israelite, one who followed not just civil law but religious law as well. Non-Israelites had the same protection of the law as native Israelites, but they were required not to perform acts that violated the religious commitments of the people. The advantage of a Jew over a Gentile was thus strictly spiritual. He was a member of the theocracy.

Among the Romans, citizenship brought the right to be considered equal to natives of the city of Rome. Emperors sometimes granted it to whole provinces and cities, and also to single individuals for services rendered to the state or to the imperial family, or even for a certain sum of money. Roman citizens were exempted from shameful punishments, such as scourging and crucifixion, and they had the right of appeal to the emperor with certain limitations.

PAUL says he had become a Roman citizen by birth (see Acts 16:37-39; 22:25-29). Either his father or some other ancestor had acquired the right and had transmitted it to his son. He was proud of his Roman citizenship and, when occasion demanded, availed himself of his rights. When writing to the Philippians, who were members of a Roman colony and therefore Roman citizens, Paul emphasized that Christians are citizens of a heavenly commonwealth and ought to live accordingly (Phil. 1:27; 3:20).

city. In ancient times cities owed their origin not to organized manufacture but to agriculture. When people left the pastoral life and settled down to the cultivation of the soil, they often found their cattle and crops endangered by wandering tribes of the desert; and it was to protect themselves from such enemies that they created first the village and then the city. Cities were built in areas where AGRICULTURE could be carried on, usually on the side of a mountain or the top of a hill, and where a sufficient supply of water was assured. The names of cities often indicate the feature that was determinative in the selection of the site. For example, the prefixes Beer, meaning “well,” and En, meaning “spring,” in such names as Beersheba and En Gedi, show that it was a local well or spring that determined the building of the city. Names like Ramah, Mizpah, and Gibeah (all from roots indicating height), which were very common in Palestine, indicate that a site on an elevation was preferred for a city. A ruling family sometimes gave its name to a city (with the word Beth, meaning “house of”).

The city of Jerusalem played a crucial role throughout the history of Israel. (View to the N.)

Ancient farmers did not have their own farms. At the end of a day's work they retired for the night to the village or city. Smaller villages sought the protection of nearby cities. That is the meaning of the expression, “and its surrounding settlements,” added to the name of a city (Num. 21:25; 32:42). In return for the protection offered against nomadic attacks, the cities received payment in service and produce. Sometimes a city was protected by a feudal lord around or near whose fortress the city was built. Often it depended entirely on the strength of its walls and the bravery of its men.

The chief feature distinguishing a city from a village was that it had a WALL (Lev. 25:29-30). Walls 20-30 ft. (6-9 m.) thick were not unusual. Sometimes a city was also surrounded by a moat (Dan. 9:25; KJV “wall”; NIV “trench”), and even by a second smaller wall acting as a rampart (2 Sam. 20:15). The wall had one or more gates that were closed during the night (Josh. 2:5, 7), and in later times on the Sabbath (Neh. 13:19). The gates were strengthened with iron or bronze bars and bolts (Deut. 3:5; Jdg. 16:3) and had rooms overhead (2 Sam. 18:24). From the top of the wall or from a tower by the gate, a watchman was on the lookout for approaching danger (Jer. 6:17). The gates were approached by narrow roads easy to defend. From a distance, usually all that could be seen of a city was its walls, except possibly its inner fortress or citadel.

Within the walls, the important features of a city were the stronghold or fortress, the high place, the broad place by the gate, and the streets. The stronghold was an inner fort protected by a garrison to which the inhabitants could run when the outer walls were taken by an enemy. The people of SHECHEM tried unsuccessfully to hold out against ABIMELECH in such a stronghold (Jdg. 9:49), and the king was afterward killed by a woman who dropped a stone from the tower within the city of Thebez (9:50, 53). When DAVID captured the fortress of ZION, the whole city came into his possession (2 Sam. 5:7). Sometimes TOWERS abutted the inside of the city wall.

The HIGH PLACES were an important part of every Canaanite city. There sacrifices were offered and feasts held. Originally they were on an elevation, but the term became the general one for any local sanctuary even when it was on level ground.

The broad place was an open area—not a square, but only a widening of the street, just inside the city gate, serving as a place for social intercourse in general. It was the center of communal life. Here the people of the city administered justice, held deliberative assemblies, exchanged news, and transacted business. Strangers in the city passed the night there if they had no friends in the city. It had a defensive value in time of war, as it permitted the concentration of forces in front of the city GATE.

The streets in ancient cities were not laid out on any fixed plan. They were narrow, winding, unpaved alleys. The streets of JERUSALEM were not paved until the time of Herod AGRIPPA II. Cities built on steep hillsides had streets on the roofs of houses. Streets were rarely cleaned and were unlighted. Certain streets were allocated to particular trades and guilds—for bakers, cheese-makers, goldsmiths, etc.

Little is known about how city government was administered. In Deut. 16:18 and 19:12 mention is made of elders and judges. SAMARIA had a governor (1 Ki. 22:26). Jerusalem must have had several high officials (2 Ki. 23:8).

city authorities, city officials. Although the NT can use general expressions referring to city officials (Acts 13:50; 25:23), the specific term politarchēs G4485 is used in only one passage (Acts 17:6, 8; KJV, “rulers of the city”). Here it refers to the civic MAGISTRATES of THESSALONICA before whom JASON and some of the Christians were dragged by the mob following on the preaching of the gospel by PAUL and SILAS. The term does not occur in classical Greek literature and its use in this passage was once dismissed as a mistake, but it has since been found in many inscriptions dating as far back as the second century B.C. In most cases the word is used for magistrates in Macedonian cities, and five times it refers to Thessalonica itself.

city clerk. See OCCUPATIONS AND PROFESSIONS.

City of David. Although this expression is applied to BETHLEHEM in Luke's nativity story (Lk. 2:4, 11; NIV, "town of David"), the phrase refers primarily to ZION, that is, the JEBUSITE fortress that DAVID captured and made his royal residence (2 Sam. 5:7, 9, and frequently).

City of Destruction. According to Isa. 19:18, five Egyptian cities will swear allegiance to Yahweh in the end times, and one of them will bear the name City of Destruction. The Hebrew word for "Destruction" is heres H2239, but the Great Isaiah Scroll from Qumran (see DEAD SEA SCROLLS), along with a few Masoretic MSS, has heres H3064, "Sun." This reading is also reflected in several ancient versions and has been adopted by some modern translations (e.g., NRSV). It is possible that a pun is implied—what was then "City of the Sun" was to be called "City of Destruction." Of Egyptian towns, one in particular was known as "City of the Sun," namely, HELIOPOLIS: the "destruction" could reflect the judgments expressed and the overthrow of Egyptian paganism.

city of Moab. A phrase used once by the KJV and other versions (Num. 22:36; NIV, "Moabite town"; NRSV, "Ir-moab"). It refers to the location near the river ARNON where BALAAM visited BALAK; it is often identified with the Moabite city of AR (cf. Num. 21:15, 28; Isa. 15:1).

City of Palms. Also "city of palm trees." An epithet for JERICHO (Deut. 34:3; Jdg. 1:16; 3:13; 2 Chr. 28:15).

City of Salt. One of six cities allotted to JUDAH in the desert (Josh. 15:62). Four of these—MIDDIN, SECACAH, NIBSHAN, and the City of Salt—are often identified with four Iron II settlements in el-Buqeah, a valley SW of JERICHO (see ACHOR), and many have thought that the City of Salt in particular is the same as Khirbet Qumran (see DEAD SEA SCROLLS). This identification is uncertain, however, and other proposals have been made.

City of the Sun. See CITY OF DESTRUCTION.

city of waters. This phrase is used by the KJV and other versions as the literal rendering of a Hebrew idiom that probably refers to a district in the Ammonite city of RABBAH where the water supply was found (2 Sam. 12:27).

clan. This English term is used frequently by the NIV and other versions to render Hebrew mišpāḥâ H5476, a unit of kinship larger than a FAMILY but smaller than a TRIBE (e.g., Gen. 10:5; 24:38; Num. 1:2; Josh. 7:14; et al.; less often it renders ḥelep H548, Jdg. 6:15 et al.). Unfortunately, the technical term clan in modern anthropology refers, as a rule, to an extended family within which marriage is not allowed (exogamous). The Hebrew word, in contrast, designates a large group made up of many families among whom marriage was not only permitted (endogamous) but might even be required in certain situations.

Clauda. See CAUDA.

Claudia. klaw'dee-uh (Gk. Klaudia G3086, apparently from Lat. claudus, “lame”). A Christian woman who, along with others (EUBULUS, LINUS, and PUDENS), was a friend of the apostle PAUL during his second Roman imprisonment and who sent greetings to TIMOTHY (2 Tim. 4:21). One ancient tradition identifies her as the mother (or possibly the wife) of Linus; others have speculated that she was married to Pudens.

Marble bust (1st cent.) of the emperor Claudius.

Claudius. klaw'dee-uhs (Gk. Klaudios G3087, apparently from Lat. claudus, “lame”). The fourth Roman emperor (A.D. 41-54). His full name was Tiberius Claudius Drusus Nero Germanicus. A young man of physical disabilities, he lived a secluded life under Emperor TIBERIUS, who was his uncle. Under the next emperor, Caligula, he held several important posts. When Caligula was killed, Claudius was named emperor by the praetorian guard in return for a considerable largess. Despite his handicaps he ruled well during the early years of his reign. Claudius was favorable towards the Jews during this period: two edicts, one relating to ALEXANDRIA and the other to the empire, granted them religious toleration, exemption from military service, and partial self-government. Herod AGRIPPA I, grandson of HEROD the Great, had assisted him much in his advancement to the throne, and in consequence was given the whole of Palestine.

The latter part of Claudius's reign, however, was marked by intrigue and suspicion. The government was in the hands of his freedmen and the women around him. His niece Agrippina became his fourth wife, and she prompted him to set aside his own son Britannicus in favor of NERO, her son by a former marriage. In A.D. 54 the emperor decided that Britannicus should succeed him, but before he could make public his wish, Agrippina fed him poisoned mushrooms.

Claudius is mentioned twice in the NT. In Acts 11:28 a prophecy was made by AGABUS that there would be a "severe famine...over the entire Roman world"; Luke adds, "This happened during the reign of Claudius." In 18:2 we are told that PAUL, while at Corinth, met AQUILA and his wife PRISCILLA, Jews who had come there "because Claudius had ordered all the Jews to leave Rome." This event is usually identified with an incident reported by Suetonius: "Because the Jews at Rome caused continuous disturbances at the instigation of Chrestus, he [Claudius] expelled them from the city" (Claudius 25; the name "Chrestus" is prob. a misunderstanding for "Christus").

Claudius Lysias. klaw'dee-uhs lis'ee-uhs (Gk. Klaudios Lysias G3087 + G3385). Commander of the Roman garrison in Jerusalem at the time of PAUL's arrest (Acts 21:31-39; 22:23-30; 23:10-35; the name occurs only in 23:26; 24:22). He was a military tribune in command of a cohort that was stationed at the fortress of ANTONIA near the temple area and connected to it by a staircase. His cognomen, Lysias, suggests that he was of Greek origin. When he learned who Paul was, he allowed him to address the Jewish mob from the steps of the castle. However, Paul's mention of his mission to the Gentiles renewed the uprising (21:27—22:24). Lysias was prepared to examine Paul by torture until he learned that he was a Roman citizen and therefore exempt from such treatment. The apostle was then turned over to the SANHEDRIN for examination. Dissension prevented Paul's conviction, but a group plotted to kill him. When informed of the plot by Paul's nephew, Lysias sent the apostle by night to FELIX, the governor at CAESAREA (23:23-33). The situation must have been serious, for Paul was guarded by 200 foot soldiers, 70 horsemen, and 200 spearmen. A letter from Lysias to FELIX concerning the essential facts in the matter is recorded in 23:26-30.

clay. A word that translates a number of different Hebrew words and one Greek word and is often used in the Bible in a literal or a metaphorical sense—in the latter sense meaning “dust” or “flesh” (as made from earth). Clay was widely used in OT times for the making of brick, mortar, and pottery, and, in some countries, for the making of tablets on which inscriptions were impressed (see CLAY TABLETS). Mud bricks were not always made of true clay, but of mud mixed with straw. True clay was variable in composition, giving variety to quality and color, and thus was suited for different uses. As a building material, clay has been used from very ancient times. BABYLON was made wholly of brick, either baked or dried in the sun. NINEVEH, the capital of ASSYRIA, was made mostly of brick. The villages of EGYPT were constructed of sun-dried clay.

clay tablets. In ancient times WRITING was done on papyrus, parchment, potsherds, and clay tablets. The latter were made of clean-washed, smooth clay. While still wet, the clay had wedge-shaped letters (a script now called cuneiform, from Latin cuneus, “wedge”) imprinted on it with a stylus, and then was kiln fired or sun dried. Tablets were made of various shapes—cone-shaped, drum-shaped, and flat. They were often placed in a clay envelope. Vast quantities of these have been excavated in the Near East, though many remain unread. The oldest ones go back to c. 3000 B.C. They are practically imperishable; fire only hardens them more. Personal and business letters, legal documents, books, and communications between rulers are represented. The tablets reveal many details of everyday life in the ANE and shed light on obscure customs mentioned in the OT. Some provide versions of the creation and the flood. They have greatly increased our understanding of the biblical setting, at times confirming the scriptural record.

clean. The division found in the OT between clean and unclean is fundamental to Hebrew/Israelite religion. The Lord is to be served and worshiped only by a clean, pure, and chaste people. They were to be physically clean (Exod. 19:10-14; 30:18-21), ritually and ceremonially clean (Lev. 14-15), and morally clean in heart. DAVID prayed, “Cleanse me with hyssop, and I will be clean; / wash me, and I will be whiter than snow” (Ps. 51:7). While the NT supplies examples of Jewish ritual cleansing (e.g., Mk. 1:44; Acts 21:26), it makes clear that Christian believers have been freed from the ceremonial regulations of the Mosaic LAW (e.g., Eph. 2:14-15). Its emphasis is therefore on the clean heart and pure life. Jesus condemned the obsession with external purity with no related emphasis on internal purity/wholeness (Mk. 7:1-23). Further, by his atoning work Jesus cleanses believers from all sin (Eph. 5:25-26; 1 Jn. 1:7). As High Priest, Jesus cleanses the heart as well as the body (Heb. 10:2, 21-22). So believers are to be pure in heart (Matt. 5:8; 1 Tim. 1:5) and chaste in life (1 Tim. 4:2; 5:2). It is their duty to purify themselves (1 Pet. 2:22; 1 Jn. 3:3). See also PURIFICATION; SANCTIFICATION; UNCLEAN.

Cleanthes. klee-an'theez (Gk. Kleanthēs). Son of Phanius of Assos and head of the STOIC school in ATHENS from 263 to 232 B.C. His Hymn to Zeus, a surviving poem, contains the words quoted by PAUL in his address before the AREOPAGUS Court (Acts 17:28). He made Stoicism more religious in its orientation by teaching that the universe was a living being, that God was its soul, and that the sun was its heart.

Clement. klem'uhnt (Gk. Klēmēs G3098, from Lat. clemens, “gentle”). One of PAUL's fellow workers at PHILIPPI, of whom the apostle says that their “names are in the book of life” (Phil. 4:3). He was apparently one of those who labored in the establishment of the church there. Paul seems to accord Clemens a place of special esteem since he alone is named in the group. Some early traditions identify him with Clement of Rome, who was bishop of that city at the end of the century and who wrote an important letter to the Corinthian church (see APOSTOLIC FATHERS), but most scholars think this is unlikely. The name Clement was very common.

Cleopas. klee'oh-puhs (Gk. Kleopas G3093, a short form of Kleopatros, possibly “renowned father”). One of the two disciples whom Jesus joined on the road to EMMAUS during the afternoon of the day of his resurrection (Lk. 24:13-32). The other disciple is not named. Tradition gives the name Simon to Cleopas's companion and includes both among the seventy(-two) whom Jesus sent out on a mission (Lk. 10:1-24; other suggestions regarding the identity of this disciple include Cleopas's wife or son, as well as NATHANAEL, NICODEMUS, et al.). Some of the church fathers identified Cleopas with the CLOPAS mentioned in Jn. 19:25. Because of the sound similarity, Cleopas (a genuine Greek name) may have functioned as the equivalent of Clopas (the Greek form of a Semitic name), but there is no evidence that these two persons were the same.

Clopas. kloh'puhs (Gk. Klōpas G3116, prob. an Aram. name). KJV Cleophas. The husband (or possibly the son or father—the Greek text is ambiguous) of a certain MARY, one of the women who stood at the foot of the cross when Jesus was crucified (Jn. 19:25). This Mary is distinguished from Mary Magdalene and from Jesus' mother. Matthew and Mark both mention a “Mary the mother of James and Joseph [Joses]” among the women who were at the cross (Matt. 27:56; Mk. 15:40). Mark identifies this JAMES as “James the younger” as if to distinguish him from James the son of Zebedee. It is interesting that in all four lists of the twelve disciples given in the Gospels and Acts, there is a James son of ALPHAEUS (Matt. 10:3; Mk. 3:18; Lk. 6:15; Acts 1:13). If the James mentioned in Matt. 27 and Mk. 15 is the son of Alphaeus, then Clopas is the same as Alphaeus. Some of the later church fathers identified Clopas with CLEOPAS, one of the disciples to whom Jesus appeared on the road to EMMANUS after his resurrection (Lk. 24:18), but Cleopas is clearly a Greek name while Clopas is Semitic.

closet. This English term is used by the KJV to render Hebrew ḥuppāh H2903 (with reference to a bridal “chamber” or “canopy,” Joel 2:16; cf. Ps. 19:5; Isa. 4:5) and Greek tameion G5421, “private room, inner chamber” (Matt. 6:6; Lk. 12:3).

cloud. Biblical references to clouds seldom have anything do with actual weather conditions, because in PALESTINE the weather is not very varied. There were two recognized seasons: a rainy one from October to April, and one of sunshine from May to September. The Hebrews were not much given to making comments on the weather. In Scripture there are, however, many references to clouds in a metaphoric and figurative sense. They symbolize transitoriness. God says Judah's goodness is like a morning cloud (Hos. 6:4 KJV; “mist” in NIV), and Job compares his prosperity to the passing clouds (Job 30:15). Sometimes they are used as a type of refreshment, for they bring shade from the oppressive sun and give promise of rain. Clouds without water, therefore, symbolize a person who promises much but does not perform (Prov.

16:15; 25:14; Jude 12). The darkness of clouds is the symbol of mystery, especially that of creation (Job 3:5; 38:9; Ps. 97:2). Their distance from the earth is made to typify the unattainable (Job 20:6; Ps. 147:8; Isa. 14:14). One of the most frequent and suggestive uses of the figure is in connection with the presence of God. Clouds both veil and reveal the divine presence. God rides on the clouds (Isa. 19:1; Nah. 1:3); he is present in the cloud (Exod. 19:9; 24:16; 34:5). See also CLOUD, PILLAR OF. A cloud appeared at our Lord's TRANSFIGURATION (Matt. 17:5) and at his ASCENSION (Acts 1:9), and it has a place in his prediction that he would return (Matt. 24:30; 26:64).

cloud, pillar of. A symbol of the presence and guidance of God in the forty-year wilderness journey of the Israelites from Egypt to Canaan (Exod. 13:21-22). At night it became fire. When God wanted Israel to rest in any place, the cloud rested on the tabernacle above the mercy seat (29:42-43) or at the door of the tabernacle (33:9-10; Num. 12:5), or it covered the tabernacle (Exod. 40:34-38).

club. A specially made club for battle purposes seems to have been used as early as 3500 B.C. in the ANE. The head was a well-shaped stone or ball of metal with a hole through which the handle was thrust. When an adequate helmet was invented, the mace became obsolete as a crushing weapon, and the axe was developed to pierce the armor of the enemy. The club then became stylized as a symbol of authority. In the OT this is called a "rod of iron" (Ps. 2:9; Isa. 10:5; cf. Isa. 10:15). The shepherd's weapon was a wooden club (1 Sam. 17:40, 43; Ps. 23:4).

Cnidus. ni'duhs (Gk. Knidos G3118). A Greek colony on the SW tip of ASIA MINOR, in the region of CARIA, past which PAUL sailed on his journey to ROME (Acts 27:7). It was situated at the end of a long, narrow peninsula projecting between the islands of COS and RHODES, and had two excellent harbors. It had the rank of a free city. Jews lived there as early as the second century B.C. Only ruins are left of a once-flourishing city, especially noted for its temple of Venus (Aphrodite), which housed a famous statue of this deity by Praxiteles.

coal. Often found in the English Bible, the word never refers to true mineral coal, which has not been found in Palestine proper, where the geological formation as a whole is recent. Coal of a poor quality has been found at SIDON, and for a time some was mined in Lebanon. The half dozen Hebrew and Greek words rendered “coal” refer either to charcoal or to live embers of any kind. Charcoal was used by the Hebrews to provide warmth in winter (Isa. 47:14; Jn. 18:18), for cooking (Isa. 44:19; Jn. 21:9), and for blacksmith work (Isa. 44:12; 54:16). It was made by covering a carefully stacked pile of wood with leaves and earth, and then setting fire to it. After several days of burning and smoldering, the wood was converted into charcoal and the pile was opened.

In Ps. 120:4 there is mention of “coals of the broom tree.” In 1 Ki. 19:6 and Isa. 6:6 the Hebrew word denotes a hot stone. Frequently the word is used metaphorically, as in Prov. 26:21 (NIV, “charcoal”). In Prov. 25:22 and Rom. 12:20, where we are told to give to an enemy good in return for evil, thus heaping coals of fire on his head, the coals of fire probably are not meant to suggest the pain of punishment to the guilty but the softening of his heart as he thinks with burning shame of his unworthy hatred. Love will melt and purify. In Lam. 4:8 the literal meaning of the Hebrew word translated “coal” by KJV (NIV, “soot”) is “blackness.”

cock crowing. Literal rendering of a Greek term used once in the NT to designate the name of the third watch of the night, from midnight to about 3:00 a.m. (Mk. 13:35 NRSV; the KJV has “cockcrowing”; the NIV, “when the rooster crows”). In the time of Christ the night was divided by the Romans into four watches: late, midnight, cockcrow, and early (see hour). In a literal sense, each of the evangelists refers to the crowing of the rooster in connection with PETER’s denial of Jesus (Matt. 26:34, 74; Mk. 14:30; Lk. 22:34; Jn. 13:38).

code, written. This expression is used by the NIV to render two Greek words: gramma G1207, meaning “letter, document” (Rom. 2:26-27; 7:6), and cheirographon G5934, meaning “handwritten document, record of debts” (Col. 2:14). In both cases it refers to the Mosaic law viewed negatively. The first term focuses on the law as an outward requirement, contrasting with what is spiritual. The second speaks of its condemnatory function.

codex. A bound manuscript (pl. codices), contrasted with a scroll (which consists of sheets joined together in long rolls). The modern book descends from the codex form, which was already in existence, but rarely used, during the NT period. As early as the second century of our era, Christians were favoring the codex for the transcription of NT books and other religious literature. Although the original reason for this choice is debated, the codex provided some significant advantages over the scroll. A relatively long biblical book, such as the Gospel of Luke, would fill one large scroll, whereas the whole NT (and even the whole Greek Bible) could be bound together within the covers of one portable codex. Moreover, finding a specific text was far easier by turning pages than by unrolling a scroll that was 20-30 ft. (6-10 m.) long. By the fourth century, the codex had become the medium of choice also for the transcription of non-Christian literature. See also text and versions (NT).

coffin. This word is used by the KJV and other versions only in Gen. 50:26, where it renders a Hebrew word meaning “chest” or “box,” though in this instance it may mean “mummy case.” In egypt, where Joseph died, the dead were put in such a case after being embalmed. The term coffin is also used by the cohort. Nominally the tenth part of a Roman LEGION, or 600 soldiers, but the actual number varied between 500 and 1,000. Although this English term often has the general sense of “a group of people,” it is used by the NRSV and other versions in its precise military meaning to render Greek speira G5061 (Matt. 27:27; Mk. 15:16; Jn. 18:3, 12; Acts 10:1; 21:31; 27:1). In the NT narratives, the cohorts function as garrison troops and as local military police. The NIV uses more general renderings, such as “detachment of soldiers” and “regiment.” See also AUGUSTAN COHORT; ITALIAN REGIMENT.

NIV in Lk. 7:14 with reference to the widow's son at NAIN, but the Israelites were usually carried to the grave on a BIER, a simple flat board with two or three staves.

Col-Hozeh. kol-hoh'zuh (Heb. kol-ḥōzeh H3997, possibly “everyone is a seer”). TNIV Kol-Hozeh. Father of a certain SHALLUN who ruled the district of MIZPAH and repaired the FOUNTAIN GATE (Neh. 3:15). He should probably be distinguished from another Col-Hozeh, identified as the father of a certain Baruch and as the son of Hazaiah, and included in a list of descendants of JUDAH who lived in Jerusalem (11:5).

college. This English term is used twice by the KJV to render Hebrew mišneh H5467, “double, second,” when it refers to a district in Jerusalem (2 Ki. 22:14; 2 Chr. 34:22). See SECOND DISTRICT.

colony. In the only occurrence of the word in the NT, Acts 16:12, the city of PHILIPPI is identified as a colony, that is, a settlement of Roman citizens, authorized by the government, in conquered territory. The settlers were usually retired Roman soldiers who settled in places where they could keep enemies of the empire in check. They were the aristocracy of the provincial towns where they lived. Such colonies had the rights of Italian cities: municipal self-government and exemption from poll and land taxes.

color. No word occurs in the Hebrew OT for the abstract idea of color; the Greeks had such a word (chrōma), but it is not used in the NT. It is possible that the first commandment inhibited many types of artistic efforts among the Israelites, including the extensive employment of color. On the other hand, the colors of the TABERNACLE hangings were prescribed by God, and likewise also the vestments of the high priest. But it was probably after contact developed with the Phoenicians that colors became more emphasized in Israelite culture. Individual colors are not numerous in the Bible, though the primary colors of red, yellow, and blue are found, as are purple, scarlet, and crimson, but the precision of quality or definition is unknown.

Colors appear principally as dyes, the most lavish use being seen in the tabernacle and on a reduced scale in Solomon's TEMPLE. These were extracted principally from plants or mollusks, and the resulting product was rather impure and often unstable. The most expensive was the PURPLE of the murex, which required 250,000 mollusks per ounce! In early times colors probably had little allegorical meaning. PHILO JUDAEUS (Life of Moses 2.17) makes white a symbol of the earth, and purple a symbol of the sea. The book of Revelation often mentions white, clearly as a symbol of purity and righteousness (e.g., Rev. 3:4-5; 19:8, 11, 14), while red represents the carnage of war (6:4), and black signifies the sorrow and death resulting therefrom (6:5, 12; cf. Zech. 6:2, 6).

Colossae. See COLOSSE.

Colosse. kuh-loſ'ee (Kolossai G3145). Also Colossae. An ancient city of PHRYGIA, situated on the S bank of the Lycus River. It was about 11 mi. (18 km.) from LAODICEA and 13 mi. (21 km.) from HIERAPOLIS. Colosse stood on the most important trade route from EPHESUS to the EUPHRATES River and was a place of great importance from early times. XERXES visited it in 481 B.C., and Cyrus the Younger in 401. The city was particularly renowned for a peculiar wool, probably purple in color (colossinus). The church at Colosse was probably established on PAUL's third missionary journey, during his three years in Ephesus, not by Paul himself (Col. 2:1), but by EPAPHRAS (1:7, 12-13). ARCHIPPUS also exercised a fruitful ministry there (4:17; Phlm. 2). PHILEMON was an active member of this church, and so also was ONESIMUS (Col. 4:9). During Paul's first Roman imprisonment, Epaphras brought to the apostle a report of the religious views and practices in Colosse that called forth his letter, in which he rebuked the church for its errors. Colosse lost its importance by the change of the road system. Laodicea became the greater city. During the seventh and eighth centuries A.D. its openness exposed it to the terrible raids of the Saracens, and the people moved to Chonae (now called Chonas), a fortress on the slope of Mount Cadmus, about 3 mi. (5 km.) farther south. In the twelfth century the Turks destroyed the city. Archaeologists have unearthed ruins of an ancient church.

Overview of COLOSSIANS

Author: The apostle PAUL.

Historical setting: Probably written from ROME during the apostle's first imprisonment in that city (c. A.D. 61-63), but some scholars prefer an earlier date and alternate places (EPHESUS or CAESAREA). The letter may have been written in response to news about heretical influences in the church at COLOSSE.

Purpose: To oppose false teachings concerning ceremonial and ascetic practices by exalting CHRIST as the one who holds supremacy over all and in whom true wisdom is to be found.

Contents: The preeminence of Christ over against human teachings (Col. 1-2), and the implications of this truth for Christian conduct (chs. 3-4).

Colossians, Epistle to the. A letter of PAUL to the church in COLOSSE. It was written by the apostle when he was a prisoner (Col. 4:3, 10, 18), about the year A.D. 62, probably during his first imprisonment in ROME (Acts 28:30-31), though CAESAREA (23:35; 24:27) and EPHEBUS have also been suggested. The genuineness of Colossians has been disputed on the grounds that its style and content contain non-Pauline features, but most scholars have not found this view persuasive.

The church at Colosse was very likely founded during Paul's three-year stay in Ephesus on his third missionary journey. It appears from Col. 2:1 that Paul himself had never preached in Colosse. EPAPHRAS, a native of Colosse (4:12), was probably converted under Paul's ministry at Ephesus and was then sent by the apostle to preach in his native city (1:7). Evidently he also evangelized the nearby cities of LAODICEA and HIERAPOLIS (4:13). When Paul wrote this letter, the minister of the church at Colosse was ARCHIPPUS (4:17), who may have been PHILEMON's son (Phlm. 2). Epaphras had recently come to Paul with a disturbing report of the condition of the church, and this led the apostle to write to the believers there. The bearer of the letter was TYCHICUS (Col. 4:7, 8), to whom Paul also entrusted his letter to the EPHESIANS (Eph. 6:21), probably written at the same time. With him went ONESIMUS (Col. 4:9), a runaway slave converted by Paul, bearing the letter to Philemon, a resident of Colosse, who was also one of Paul's converts, perhaps becoming a believer at Ephesus.

In the few years since Paul had been in the province of ASIA an insidious error had crept into the church at Colosse. Who the false teachers were we do not know; but it is clear that the trouble was different from that faced by Paul at GALATIA, where JUDAIZERS had tried to undermine his work. The teaching attacked by Paul is described in Col. 2:8, 16-23. It was, at least in part, Judaistic, as is seen in his reference to circumcision (2:11; 3:11), ordinances (2:14), meats and drinks, feast days, new moons, and Sabbaths (2:16). There was also in it a strong ascetic element. Special self-denying rules were given that had as their purpose the mortification of the body (2:16, 20-23). Some sort of worship of ANGELS was apparently practiced—a custom that continued for several centuries (in the fourth century the Council of Laodicea condemned it in one of its canons, and in the fifth century Theodoret said that the archangel Michael was worshiped in the area). This heresy claimed to be a philosophy and made much of wisdom and knowledge (2:8). Plainly, the Colossians were beguiled by this religious syncretism and even took pride in it (2:8). The exact origin of the false teaching is unknown. Some find it in Essenism, others in incipient GNOSTICISM or in contemporary Judaism with a syncretistic addition of local Phrygian ideas.

Paul met these errors, not by controversy or personal authority, but by presenting the counter truth that Jesus Christ is the image of the invisible God (Col. 1:15), in whom are hid all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge, and in whom the fullness of the divine perfections find their perfect embodiment (1:19). He is the creator of all, and all power is from him. On the cross he revealed the impotence of all the powers that had tried to thwart his purposes (2:15). Freedom from the corruption of human nature is found in the newness of life that the death and resurrection of Christ provide. The letter to the Colossians may be divided into four parts: (1) The salutation and thanksgiving (1:1-8); (2) the doctrinal section (1:9—2:5); (3) practical exhortations (2:6—4:6); (4) concluding salutations (4:7-18). Toward the end of the document (4:16), Paul asks that the Colossian church exchange letters with the church at Laodicea, to which he has also written. It is possible that this letter to the Laodiceans is what we know as the letter to the Ephesians, sent as a circular letter to various churches in the Roman province of Asia.

commandment. This word is used in the English Bible to translate a variety of Hebrew and Greek terms. The idea of authority conveyed by these terms comes from the fact that God as sovereign Lord has a right to be obeyed. The instruction of Jesus is full of ethical teachings that have the force of divine commandments. What he says is as authoritative as what was said by God in OT times. That is true even when he does not use the word “commandment” or its equivalents, as he often does. But what is said of God and Jesus Christ is also true of the apostles. Paul, for example, does not hesitate to say, “What I am writing to you is the Lord’s command” (1 Cor. 14:37). The Bible makes it very clear, however, that God is not satisfied with mere external compliance but expects willing and joyful obedience, coming from the heart. See also COMMANDMENTS, TEN; LAW.

commandment, new. That command given in the NT which emphasizes the substance and spiritual power of LOVE involved in the moral law (the TEN COMMANDMENTS). The kernel of this thought is imbedded in various passages in the Gospels (Matt. 19:16-22; 22:37-40; et al.), but the actual NT references where the term “new commandment” is found are Jn. 13:34-35; 1 Jn. 2:7-8; 2 Jn. 5. It had been stated in the OT that God’s people should love their neighbors. Jesus puts new emphasis on this concept found in the law. “You who are My disciples,” he says in effect, “must really show love to one another, as I have shown love to you. This will be a new thing for the world to see, that you, My disciples, have love for one another.” In 1 Jn. 2:5-10 the commandment is called “old” in that the readers knew from the OT and from John’s presentation of Jesus’ teaching that they should love one another (cf. Jn. 15:12), but it was new in that there was renewed and continual emphasis to be placed on the Christian loving his brother through the power of God’s own love.

Commandments, Ten. The OT is distinctly a religion of LAW, with creed, cult, and conduct prescribed minutely by God. The OT praises the revelational instruction of the Torah (God’s law as set forth in the first five books of the OT; cf. Ps. 119:97), which has come to the elect nation as a gift of grace, invested with divine authority and sanction. The Torah is revered because it embodies the will and wisdom of the Creator. Expressing God’s own nature, it demands of the creature only what the Creator’s HOLINESS requires for fellowship with himself. The climax of Torah is the Decalogue, the Code of the Ten Words, received by MOSES on Mount SINAI. The Decalogue is specifically the gift of grace of God the Redeemer (Exod. 20:2), given to his people not to bring them into bondage but because they have been brought out of bondage. That it is unique among the several codes found in the OT can scarcely be disputed. Originally spoken by God in a context calculated to produce unforgettable awe (19:9-25), it was afterward inscribed by his finger on two tablets of stone (31:18); in fact, it was inscribed by him a second time after Moses in anger shattered the first two tablets (Deut. 10:1-4). It was placed in the ARK OF THE COVENANT (Exod. 25:21) and thus enshrined at the very center of Israel's worship. Hence the Code of the Ten Words is indeed sui generis, a statement that gives the distillation of religion and morality: these principles, so simply phrased, are remarkably comprehensive and universally valid. Mount Sinai, therefore, was the scene of an epochal event in human history.

Before examining this code in any detail we must answer several questions concerning it. First, how do we explain the two somewhat dissimilar versions of it that the Pentateuch contains, one in Exod. 20:1-17, the other in Deut. 5:6-21? In the Exodus version the fourth commandment grounds the keeping of the SABBATH in God's own Sabbath-rest after his six days of CREATION; in the Deuteronomy version, however, Sabbath-keeping is grounded in the Egyptian deliverance. Moreover, the two versions do not agree with respect to the tenth commandment, which forbids covetousness; different verbs are used and the order of clauses varies. But surely these differences are trivial when we remember that the Deuteronomic version is part of an address Moses delivered. In an oral recital one scarcely expects notarial precision. Also, Moses, because of the Spirit's guidance, was free to introduce new elements and slight changes.

Second, how are the Ten Words to be numbered? W. S. Bruce helpfully clears away the complexities of this question by pointing out that the commandments were not numbered by Moses, and thus down the ages different schemes of arrangement have been found. According to one tradition, the commandments not to have other gods and not to make images are viewed as one, whereas the commandment against covetousness is analyzed as consisting of two. In the one most commonly known among English-speaking communities, "the preface is not made a commandment or part of one: but the first commandment simply forbids the worship of false deities, and the second prohibits the use of idols; while all the prohibitions of covetousness are included under the last command" (The Ethics of the Old Testament [1909], 101-2).

FIRST TABLE
1. No other gods.
2. No image of God.
3. No dishonoring of God's name.
4. No desecration of God's day.
5. No dishonoring of God's representatives (parents).
SECOND TABLE
1. No taking away of a neighbor's life.
2. No taking away of his wife, his dearest good.
3. No taking away of his goods.
4. No taking away of his good name.
5. No coveting of his good or his goods.

Third, how are the Ten Words to be divided between the two tables (tablets)? The Roman Catholic church puts three commandments on the first table, seven on the second. The Reformed church adheres to a four and six classification. Josephus, however, gives the traditional five and five arrangement, the first table dealing, as he says, with piety, the second with probity. Taking Josephus as his guide, C. E. Luthardt in his History of Christian Ethics gives what seems to be the most satisfactory division:

Fourth, is there any significance to the fact that the Ten Words are inscribed on two tables rather than one? Traditionally the reference to “two tables” has been understood to refer to the fact that the Decalogue falls, as we have seen, into the two sections of our duty to God and our duty to man. It has been assumed that each of these sections was given a tablet to itself. This explanation is unlikely because it would seem to put asunder what God has joined, making it appear as if the commandments Godward and the commandments manward are essentially separable. Some prefer to follow the line opened up by more recent knowledge of ancient COVENANT forms in which the stipulations of the covenant—the laws imposed by the covenant-lord—were written in duplicate. The covenant-lord retained one copy and deposited the other in the sanctuary of the god of the people on whom he was imposing his covenant. In the case of the Decalogue, Yahweh is both Covenant-Lord and also God of Israel. He, therefore, takes both copies into his care: the whole care, continuance, and maintenance of the covenant relationship rests with him.

Fifth, is this code merely negative or does it have a positive aspect also? Admittedly, the only commandment couched in positive terms is the fifth law, which enjoins respect for one’s parents. But the seeming negativism of the Ten Words is only superficial. Whenever an evil is forbidden, the opposite good is implicitly demanded. Here we have far more than a forbidding: we have a requiring as well. When Jesus interprets and epitomizes this code, he reduces it to the positive virtue of love. Paul does exactly the same thing in Rom. 13:8-10. This law cannot be fulfilled only by concern and care; it calls for loving obedience to God and loving service to man.

Sixth, are the Ten Commandments to be viewed as “a yoke of slavery” (Gal. 5:1) or as a wise provision that God graciously made for his people? Undeniably in the course of the centuries there was a tendency for the Torah to be perverted into a grievous legalism; undeniably, too, the law as a whole had a pedagogic function, revealing as it did—and still does—our need of Jesus Christ (Rom. 7:7; Gal. 3:24). Yet the primary purpose of the Ten Words was to enable the Israelites, as the Lord’s redeemed and peculiar treasure, to enter into a life of joyful fellowship with their Redeemer. This code issued from God’s sovereign and saving relationship with his elect nation. It was imposed at his initiative and as the result of his covenantal activity. Passages like Exod. 20:2 and Deut. 4:32-40 show that Israel’s Savior was Israel’s Legislator. This law, then, was designed to bring the Lord's saving deed to its fulfillment by creating a holy community, a community reflecting his own nature, a community in which he could dwell and by which he could be magnified (Lev. 11:44; 20:8). Hence, used lawfully (1 Tim. 1:8), this code, which guided life rather than gave it, was a source of blessing (Ps. 19:8-9; 119:54).

With these six questions answered, let us now analyze briefly each of the Ten Words. The first commandment (Exod. 20:3) enjoins a confession of God's singularity, his absolute and exclusive deity. It predicates faith in him as the one and only God. Though not expressly teaching MONOTHEISM, it inferentially denounces polytheism as treason and unbelief. It demonstrates that God is not a class term but a proper name.

The second commandment (Exod. 20:4-6) enjoins the adoration of God's spirituality. Forbidding his worship by any false means, it rebukes the gross IDOLATRY that surrounded Israel. It shows that because of his very Being (Jn. 4:24) no visible or material representation of true Deity is possible. Thus it prevents wrong concepts of God from taking root in the human mind (Rom. 1:21-23).

The third commandment (Exod. 20:7) enjoins the reverence of the Lord's NAME. Since in the OT name and person are equivalent, with the name practically a reification of the person, this law prohibits blasphemy and profanity. It also interdicts immorality, any conduct that causes God's honor to suffer defilement by the sinner who bears his name (Rom. 2:24-25). With respect to the sacredness and significance of God's name, Mal. 3:16-17 is instructive.

The fourth commandment (Exod. 20:8-11) enjoins the observance of the Lord's day. For both humanitarian (Amos 8:5-6) and religious (Isa. 58:13-14) reasons, one day of rest in every seven is a blessed necessity. A Sabbath—whether on Saturday as commemorating a finished creation or on Sunday as commemorating a finished redemption—serves one's physical and spiritual welfare simultaneously (Mk. 2:27).

The fifth commandment (Exod. 20:12) enjoins the honor of God's surrogates, parents to whom he grants a kind of cocreatorship in the begetting of children and to whom he grants a kind of corulership in the governing of children. Let any nation abandon respect for the mystery, dignity, and authority of parenthood, and before long the moral fiber and social fabric of that nation are bound to disintegrate. That is why the OT statutes on this score are so severe (Exod. 21:15; Deut. 27:16; Prov. 20:20).

The sixth commandment (Exod. 20:13) is a prohibition of MURDER. Life is, patently, a person's one utterly indispensable possession; but, more than that, human beings bear the IMAGE OF GOD, and murder wantonly destroys God's image.

Hence capital punishment is the penalty affixed to breaking this law (Gen. 9:5-6).

The seventh commandment (Exod. 20:24) is a prohibition of ADULTERY, a stringent prohibition that safeguards the sanctity of MARRIAGE and throws a bulwark around the home.

The eighth commandment (Exod. 20:15) is a prohibition of theft in any and all forms. Property is essentially an extension of one's personality, and thus this law indicates that the rights and achievements of one's neighbor must not be ignored.

The ninth commandment (Exod. 20:16) is a prohibition of falsehood in its many varieties, whether perjury, slander, or defamation (see LIE, LYING). TRUTH is the cement of community, the sine qua non of enduring interpersonal relationships on every level. Thus the OT, like the NT, stresses the need for a sanctified tongue (Ps. 5:9; 15:1-4; Prov. 18:21; Jer. 9:1-5).

The tenth commandment (Exod. 20:17) is a prohibition of COVETOUSNESS, and as such reveals that the Ten Words are not simply a civil code, but form a moral and spiritual code that strikes beneath the surface of the overt act (which is the exclusive province of civil law), tracing evil conduct to evil desire, probing the hidden motives of people (which is the province of morality and religion, God's province). This tenth commandment, therefore, highlights the pivotal importance of wrong appetites and intentions; it agrees with Paul that covetousness is idolatry (Col. 3:5), since inordinate craving means that a person's ego has become his or her god.

Except as the NT deepens and extends its principles, the Decalogue represents the high-water level of morality.

common. This English term is used in Bible versions with various meanings ("shared, ordinary, public"). In the NT, the phrase "in common" is used to describe the early Christian practice of sharing possessions (Acts 2:44; 4:32; see COMMUNITY OF GOODS). The word "common" can also describe the faith and salvation shared by God's people (Tit. 1:4; Jude 3). Of special interest is its use to render a Hebrew word meaning "profane, ritually neutral" (contrasted with "holy"; see Lev. 10:10; 1 Sam. 21:4-5; Ezek. 22:26; 42:20; 44:23; 48:14-15). The corresponding Greek adjective can also refer to that which is ritually UNCLEAN (Mk. 7:2, 5; Acts 10:14-15, 28; 11:8-9; Rom. 14:14; Heb. 10:29; Rev. 21:27). See CLEAN; HOLINESS.

community of goods. An expression not found in the NT but referring to Christian LOVE as expressed in the free sharing of material goods, as recorded in Acts 2:44 and 4:34—5:11. These two passages make clear that the social structure of the church at Jerusalem was not a communal program in the modern sense of the word, for the emphasis is placed first upon the sharing of spiritual blessings in Christ (2:42-43; 4:31-33). In addition, the Christians were willing to share their material goods, so that none of the saints at Jerusalem was impoverished (4:34). That the disciples were not forced to sell their property nor give it to the church is shown by the example of ANANIAS and SAPPHIRA, who were condemned not for failing to give their property (5:4), but for pretending to contribute more than they actually had given (5:1-3). Even this modified voluntary community of goods seems to have been practiced only in the Jerusalem church and for a limited time. Later this Christian community received gifts from non-Judean churches (Acts 11:27-30; 2 Cor. 8:1-5), one such church being instructed to lay aside offerings for the Lord's work each week (1 Cor. 16:1-2), with no suggestion of any community of goods. See CONTRIBUTION.

Conaniah. kon'uh-ni'uh (Heb. kānanyāhû H4042, possibly "Yahweh sustains"). TNIV Konaniah. (1) A Levite who, with the help of his brother Shimei, was in charge of administering the collections under King HEZEKIAH (2 Chr. 31:12-13; KJV, "Cononiah").

(2) A leader of the Levites during the reign of King JOSIAH; along with his brothers Shemaiah and Nethanel, Conaniah provided five thousand offerings (lambs) and five head of cattle for the renewed celebration of the Passover (2 Chr. 35:9). He is thought by some to be a descendant of #1 above.

concision. See CIRCUMCISION.

concubine. In the Bible this word designates not a paramour, but rather a woman lawfully united in MARRIAGE to a man in a relation inferior to that of the regular wife. No moral stigma was attached to being a concubine; it was a natural part of a polygamous social system. Concubinage is assumed and provided for in the law of Moses, which tried to prevent its excesses and abuses (Exod. 21:7-11; Deut. 21:10-14). Concubines were commonly taken from among Hebrew or foreign slave girls, or Gentile captives taken in war, although free Hebrew women might also become concubines. They enjoyed no other right but lawful cohabitation. They had no authority in the family or in household affairs. Their husbands could send them away with a small present, and their children could, by means of small presents, be excluded from the heritage (Gen. 25:6). The children were regarded as legitimate, although the children of the first wife were preferred in the distribution of the inheritance. In patriarchal times, at least, the immediate cause of concubinage was the BARRENNESS of the lawful wife; sometimes the wife herself might suggest that her husband have children by her maidservant (Gen. 16; 30). Prominent OT figures who had concubines were Nahor (22:24), Abraham (25:6), Jacob (35:22), Eliphaz (36:12), Gideon (Jdg. 8:31), Saul (2 Sam. 3:7), David (5:13; 15:16; 16:21), Solomon (1 Ki. 11:3), Caleb (1 Chr. 2:46), Manasseh (7:14), Rehoboam (2 Chr. 11:21), Abijah (13:21), and Belshazzar (Dan. 5:2).

concupiscence. This English term (from Lat. concupiscere, “to desire intensely”) is used in the KJV to render Greek epithymia G2123, “desire,” in three passages where the context is negative (Rom. 7:8; Col. 3:5; 1 Thess. 4:5). In the Christian ethical tradition concupiscence, which often connotes inordinate sexual desire, is generally considered to be a sinful disposition either because it is abnormally intense or (more often) because it is wrongly directed. See LUST.

condemn, condemnation. These terms (and in the KJV sometimes “damnation”) are used to render various Hebrew and Greek words that involve the thought of declaring JUDGMENT against someone or treating a person as guilty. Sometimes the sentence or penalty for the guilt or supposed guilt is expressed. Condemnation may be that of one person by another without any legal procedure—a person is simply reckoned guilty and perhaps made to suffer as guilty. Christ’s injunction, however, is against all such judging: “Do not condemn, and you will not be condemned” (Lk. 6:37; cf. Rom. 2:1). In a different sense, it may be said that the integrity and God-fearing quality of one person’s life condemns another: NOAH by his faith and action “condemned the world” (Heb. 11:7; cf. Matt. 12:41-42). Closely associated with this is the way that Scripture often says that people are condemned by their own words and actions (Job 9:20; 15:6; Tit. 3:11). John goes further in speaking of a person’s own heart as being self-condemning (1 Jn. 3:20).

Scripture speaks also of the condemnation of a human magistrate, which may be perfectly just (Lk. 23:40), or—as in the case of Jesus’ trial—completely unjust (Mk. 14:64). Earthly magistrates are considered God's ministers (Rom. 13:1-5), responsible to him for "acquitting the innocent and condemning the guilty" (Deut. 25:1). Ultimately all judgment is God's. He has judged and condemned men and women for their sin in the past (2 Pet. 2:6); all sin comes under his righteous condemnation (Rom. 5:16, 18); and in the end this will be perfectly manifest (Ps. 34:21; Matt. 12:37; Jude 4). It is made clear, however, that God's purpose in sending Jesus Christ was not "to condemn the world, but to save the world through him" (Jn. 3:17). Christ made this salvation possible by bearing the sin of men and women, because thus he "condemned sin" (Rom. 8:3); that is, he showed the guilt of sin and bore its consequences, so that "there is now no condemnation for those who are in Christ Jesus" (8:1).

confession. To confess is openly to acknowledge the truth in anything, as in the existence and authority of God or the sins of which one has been guilty. Occasionally it also means to concede or allow (Jn. 1:20; Acts 24:14; Heb. 11:13), or to praise God by thankfully acknowledging him (Rom. 14:11; Heb. 13:15). In the Bible, confession of SIN before God is recognized as a condition of FORGIVENESS. Christ taught the necessity of confessing offenses committed against other people (Matt. 5:24; Lk. 17:4).

confidence. See ASSURANCE; FAITH; HOPE.

confirm. This English term is used to render several verbs in the Bible that occur in a variety of contexts, such as strengthening persons, ratifying covenants, fulfilling promises, and verifying claims (e.g., Deut. 8:18; Esth. 9:29; Heb. 2:3).

congregation. A word used in Scripture most often to refer to the Hebrew people in a collective capacity, especially when viewed as an assembly summoned for a definite purpose (1 Ki. 8:65) or meeting on a festive occasion (Deut. 23:1). Sometimes it refers to an assembly of the whole people; sometimes, to any part of the people who might be present on a given occasion. Occasionally it conveys the idea of “horde.” Every circumcised Hebrew was a member of the congregation and took part in its proceedings probably from the time he bore arms. He had, however, no political rights as an individual, but only as a member of a house, a family, or a tribe, which was usually represented by its head, known as an elder or a prince. The elders, summoned by the supreme governor or the high priest, represented the whole congregation, served as a national parliament, and had legislative and judicial powers. They sat as a court to deal with capital offenses (Num. 15:32-33), declared war, made peace, and concluded treaties (Josh. 9:15). The people were strictly bound by their acts, whether they approved of them or not (9:18). Occasionally the whole body of people was assembled for some solemn religious occasion (Exod. 12:47; Num. 25:6; Joel 2:15) or to receive some new commandments (Exod. 19:7-8; Lev. 8:4). After the conquest of Canaan the congregation was assembled only to consider very important matters.

The “Western Wall” of the temple mount in Jerusalem is a popular assembly place for prayer. Ten Jewish men gathered for worship constitutes a synagogue.

The two primary Hebrew terms for “congregation” are ‘ēdāh H6337 and qāhal H7735; the former is translated by the SEPTUAGINT with synagōgē G5252, and the latter with either synagōgē (esp. Exodus, Numbers, Leviticus) or ekklēsia G1711. In the NT, the Greek term ekklēsia can be used of Israel (Acts 7:38) and of secular assemblies among the Gentiles (19:32, 39, 41), but it is in the process of becoming a technical term for a definite group of people who meet for religious purposes (Acts 5:11; 8:3; 1 Cor. 14:23). It can describe the CHURCH universal to which all Christians belong (Matt. 16:18; Acts 9:31; 1 Cor. 12:28), or a body of Christians in a particular place (Acts 8:1; Rom. 16:1). The term synagōgē also could still be used to describe a Jewish-Christian assembly place (Jas. 2:2), although its main reference in the NT is to the place of Jewish assembly (Lk. 4:16; Acts 13:5). The references to “synagogue of Satan” (Rev. 2:9; 3:9) may indicate the increasing antagonism between the Christian church and the Jewish SYNAGOGUE. At the end of the first century these two Greek terms, which had hitherto been interchangeable and not in any sense confined to religious assemblies, had become fixed to denote rival religions.

congregation, mount of the. A phrase used by the KJV only once (Isa. 14:13; NIV and NRSV, “mount of assembly”). This phrase is widely thought to be an allusion to the mythological “assembly of the gods” mentioned especially in Ugaritic texts. A similar conception is thought to be found in the next phrase, “the utmost heights of the sacred mountain” (NIV; the TNIV says, “the utmost heights of Mount Zaphon”; see ZAPHON #2). The OT sometimes uses the language of ANE myth (which would have been familiar to the Israelites) for various purposes, such as polemics and conceptual analogies. There is no reason to think, however, that the present passage had its origins in a pagan Canaanite setting. The term does seem to be some kind of literary allusion and cannot be identified with any known place name.

conscience. The OT has no separate word for “conscience,” but it is able to express the idea by other means. It is clear from Gen. 3:8 that the first result of the FALL was a guilty conscience, compelling ADAM and EVE to hide from God. Likewise, we read that DAVID’s “heart smote him” (1 Sam. 24:5 KJV); the NIV correctly interprets this comment by rendering, “David was conscience-stricken.” In everyday Greek the word syneidēsis G5287 referred to the pain or guilt felt by persons who believed they had done wrong. The author of Hebrews states that as a result of accepting the gospel, people receive a purified, or perfected, conscience (Heb. 9:14; 10:22), through forgiveness and the gift of the Holy Spirit.

PAUL, who used the word more than other NT writers, developed the concept in several ways. (1) He described the universal existence of conscience as the internal moral witness found in all human beings (Rom. 2:14-16). (2) He believed that Christians should have clear and good consciences (2 Cor. 1:12; 1 Tim. 1:5, 19; 3:9), because their lives are lived for the glory of God and in the light of Christian teaching. (3) He knew of and gave advice about the weak or partially formed conscience of certain Christians (“conscience” occurs nine times in 1 Cor. 8:1-13 and 10:23—11:1); in certain cases mature Christians are to restrict their liberty of action in order not to offend the undeveloped conscience of their weaker brothers and sisters. (4) He was aware of the existence of evil consciences, corrupted by false teaching (1 Tim. 4:5; Tit. 1:15). A person who rejects the gospel and resolutely opposes God has an evil conscience. (5) Finally, it may be said that while Paul’s use of the word conscience is that of the internal witness of the mind/heart judging past actions in the light of Christian teaching, he also appears to suggest that the conscience will guide present and future actions (e.g., Rom. 13:3; 1 Cor. 10:25).

consecration. An act by which a person or thing is dedicated to the service and worship of God. Frequently involved in the idea is the confirmation by religious ceremonies or rites; the word may also indicate an act by which a thing, event, or person becomes memorable or significant. The concept is especially prominent in the OT and in those portions of the NT that are most intimately related by content or symbolism to the Levitical system.

Among several Hebrew terms that convey the idea of consecration, the most common is the verb qādaš H7727 and its cognates (e.g., Exod. 13:12; Lev. 8:10-12; 1 Ki. 8:64; Isa. 66:17; et al.). These terms are used to indicate separation from common or profane use, and DEDICATION to a sacral purpose or use. The application of “consecration” to objects includes, among other instances, the TABERNACLE and TEMPLE as well as their furnishings (Exod. 40:9-11; 2 Chr. 7:7). The booty taken at the conquest of JERICHO was so set apart (Josh. 6:19; see ANATHEMA). When applied to individuals, the terms suggest not only the motif of setting apart for a sacred service but also the acceptance by the subject of such a dedication. Thus AARON and his sons accept as the garb of their office the garments that symbolize it (Exod. 29:29, 33, 35).

In the NT, the primary Greek verb meaning “consecrate” is hagiazō G39, usually rendered “sanctify, set apart, make holy” (e.g., Jn. 10:36; 17:17, 19; 1 Cor. 7:14; 1 Tim. 4:5). As applied to the Lord, the usages signify the endowment with fullness of grace and truth, and his self-dedication to his redemptive work; as applied to the disciples, it suggests setting apart and personal SANCTIFICATION; as applied to food, it indicates rendering licit by prayer; and as applied to unbelieving marital partners, it suggests that Christian sanctity is, in some degree, passed over from the believing one as a concomitant of the intimacy of the relationship. See also HOLINESS.

consolation. ELIPHAZ says to JOB, “Are God’s consolations not enough for you?” (Job 15:11), meaning, Do they seem beneath your notice? Job says to his friends that the consolation he asks from them is that they listen to him (21:2). JEREMIAH foretells that many in the land of Israel shall die, but no one will give the “cup of consolation” to a bereaved person who mourns for his parents (Jer. 16:7; NIV, “a drink to console”). When it is said of SIMEON that he looked for the “consolation [paraklēsis G4155] of Israel” (Lk. 2:25), the term is used by metonymy for the messianic salvation that will bring comfort to the people of Israel (cf. Isa. 40:1). PAUL describes God as “the Father of compassion and the God of all comfort” (2 Cor. 1:3; NRSV, “of all consolation”; see also vv. 4-7 and 7:6-7).

contentment. The state of being content or satisfied. It is a virtue enjoined by the Scriptures upon believers (Lk. 3:14; Heb. 13:5), is intimately associated with godliness (1 Tim. 6:6), and is a marked feature of Pauline spirituality (Phil. 4:11; 1 Tim. 6:8). Having nothing to do with social insensitivity, complacency, or inertia, Christian contentment is centrally an acceptance of God’s ministrations as these affect one’s station and task in life, and also one’s resources. It is thus a settled disposition to regard God’s gifts as sufficient, and his assignments as appropriate. Contentment is opposed to petulance, self-rejection, despair, and panic on the one hand, and vaulting ambition on the other. It excludes envy (Jas. 3:16), avarice (Heb. 13:5; 1 Tim. 6:8), and repinings (1 Cor. 10:10). It is a glad, trustful, repose in God and a humble participation in his purposes and dealings.

contribution. This English term is used by the NIV and other versions of the OT primarily as a rendering of Hebrew tērûmâ H9556, “tribute, offering” (e.g., Exod. 29:28; 2 Chr. 31:10-14). In the NT it renders koinōnia G3126 (which more frequently means “sharing”; see FELLOWSHIP) in one important passage, Rom. 15:26, where it designates the offering that the Gentile churches were giving “for the poor among the saints in Jerusalem” (cf. also 2 Cor. 9:13 RSV). PAUL refers to the same offering with the term logeia G3356, “collection,” in 1 Cor. 16:1-2. During his third missionary journey, he devoted much attention and effort to raising this collection among the Gentile churches for the believers in JUDEA. (Part of the reason, in the view of many scholars, was the need to relieve the tensions that had arisen between Gentile and Jewish Christians over the issue of circumcision; cf. Gal. 2:10.) At least twice he wrote to the Corinthians about the matter (1 Cor. 16:1-4; 2 Cor. 9:1-5). Toward the end of his third journey (when he was about to leave Corinth), Paul hoped to go to Rome, but he felt constrained first to accompany the contribution to Jerusalem (Rom. 15:22-29). The apostle clearly viewed this offering not only as a generous act, but also as an important demonstration of the unity between the Jewish and Gentile branches of the church.

contrite. This English term is found a few times in the OT as the rendering of Hebrew terms that mean literally “crushed” or “stricken.” God does not despise the “broken and contrite heart” (Ps. 51:17; 34:18). The contrite of spirit and heart are lowly and humble, trembling at the word of the “high and lofty One” (Isa. 57:15; 66:2).

conversation. This English term (from Latin conversārī, “to associate with”), is used by the KJV in its archaic sense of “conduct,” to render several different words, especially Greek anastrophē G419, meaning “way of life.” This word is found thirteen times in the NT, and almost half of the occurrences are in 1 Peter (Gal. 1:13; Heb. 13:7; 1 Pet. 1:15, 18; et al.). The modern meaning of conversation (“a spoken exchange”) can be conveyed by other Hebrew and Greek words.

conversion. The verb to convert is used a number of times in the KJV primarily as the rendering of Hebrew šûb H8740 and Greek epistrephō G2188 (e.g., Ps. 51:13; Matt. 13:15), both of which mean “to turn, return.” See REPENTANCE. The noun convert is used in modern versions to render Greek prosēlytos G4670 (lit., “one who has arrived”; e.g., Matt. 23:15; Acts 6:5). See PROSELYTE.

conviction. The first stage of REPENTANCE, experienced when in some way the evil nature of SIN has been brought home to the penitent, who now recognizes that he or she is guilty of it. Although the word conviction is never used in the KJV and seldom in other versions, the Bible gives many illustrations of the experience. In the OT one of the most notable is found in Ps. 51, where DAVID, realizing he has sinned against God, is overwhelmed with sorrow for his transgression and cries out to God for forgiveness and cleansing. In the NT the central passage bearing on this theme is Jn. 16:7-11, where Jesus says that when the HOLY SPIRIT comes, “he will convict the world of guilt in regard to sin and righteousness and judgment.” Here the verb convict means “convince” (so RSV) or “prove guilty” (cf. NRSV). The thought is that the Holy Spirit addresses the heart of the guilty and shows how inadequate ordinary standards of righteousness are. The purpose of conviction is to lead to godly repentance.

convocation, holy. The KJV rendering of a Hebrew phrase that the NIV translates as “sacred assembly.” It is first mentioned in Exod. 12:16 with reference to the first and seventh days of the Passover feast; on those days no work was to be done, and only the preparation of food was allowed. In addition, Lev. 23 lists other holy convocations that took place during the seventh month. Offerings of various kinds were to be made on these days (cf. Num. 28:8, 25-26). The ^{FEASTS} were undoubtedly meant to be a foretaste of the great day of rest for all of God’s people; they point to a day of hope when God’s children will sit down with him in his kingdom.

corban. kor’ban. This term occurs only once in the NT (Mk. 7:11, where it is defined as a “gift [dedicated to God]”; cf. Matt. 15:5). In this passage Jesus condemns the “tradition of the elders” when it evades the plain intent of the ^{TORAH}. Under the pious pretext of dedicating his property to the Lord (and retaining a life estate in it himself), a man could sidestep his obligation to support his aged parents, alleging that he had no undedicated property from which he could support them. Literally, the Hebrew term qorbān H7933 means “gift, offering,” and can refer to a blood sacrifice or a vegetable offering (Lev. 1:2; 22:27; 23:14; Num. 7:25; Ezek. 20:28; 40:43). The term was later applied cord. Throughout the ANE, ropes and cords were made of goats' or camels' hair spun into threads and then plaited or twisted into the larger and stronger form. Sometimes they were made of strips of skin from goats and cows twisted together. Ropes for temporary fastenings were sometimes made from vines twisted together and also from the bark of the branches of the mulberry tree. Frequently the word is used in a figurative sense in the Bible. Thus Job speaks of being "held fast by cords of affliction" (Job 36:8), and Solomon says of the wicked man that "the cords of his sin hold him fast" (Prov. 5:22). Other illustrations of this figurative use are Ps. 129:4; 140:5; Eccl. 4:12; Isa. 5:18; 54:2. The word is found also in the NIV with reference to the "lace of blue" (KJV) used to bind the high priest's breastplate to the EPHOD (Exod. 28:28, 37; 39:21, 31). Jesus made a whip out of cords to clear the temple of moneychangers (Jn. 2:15). Lifeboats were lashed to sailing ships by means of cords, or ropes (Acts 27:32).

Corinth. kor'inth (Gk. Korinthos G3172). A city of GREECE on the narrow isthmus between the Peloponnesus and the mainland. Under the Romans, ATHENS was still the educational center of Greece, but Corinth became the capital of the Roman province they called ACHAIA and was the most important city in the country. Land traffic between the N and S of Achaia had to pass the city, and much of the commerce between ROME and the E was brought to its harbors.

Corinth occupied a strategic geographical position. It was situated at the southern extremity of the isthmus, at the northern foot of the lofty (c. 2,000 ft./610 m.) and impregnable Acrocorinthus, which commanded a wonderful view over the Saronic Gulf on the E and the Corinthian Gulf on the W, as well as over central Greece and the Peloponnesus. From the Acrocorinthus it is possible on a clear day to see the Acropolis of Athens 40 mi. (65 km.) away. Corinth had three harbors: Lechaenum to the W, and CENCHREA and Schoenus to the E. Lechaenum was connected with Corinth by a double row of walls. Because of its highly favored commercial position, in ancient times the city was known as "two-sea'd Corinth."

Corinth.

Ancient sailors dreaded making the voyage round the southern capes of the Peloponnesus, and thus many of the smaller ships and their cargoes were hauled across the narrow isthmus on a track. Sometimes the cargo of large ships was removed at the harbor, carried across the isthmus, and then loaded onto another ship on the other side. Several attempts were made in ancient times to cut a ship canal across the isthmus, notably one by NERO about A.D. 66, but none was successful. Finally a canal was opened in 1893 and is now in use.

Corinth had an ancient and very interesting history. Phoenician settlers were early attracted to it. They introduced many profitable manufactures and established the impure worship of the Phoenician deities. Later, Greeks from Attica became supreme. They probably changed the name of the city to Corinth, and glorified the games held there in honor of Poseidon, the god of the sea. About 1074 B.C. the Dorians conquered the city. After the invention of triremes (ships with three tiers of oars on each side) about 585, a series of important colonies was founded, and Corinth became a strong maritime force. The city was lukewarm in the Persian Wars and opposed Athens in the Peloponnesian War. Except for a brief period the Macedonians held the city from 335 to 197. The Romans declared Greece and Corinth free in 196; but in 146, because of a rebellion against Rome, the city was totally destroyed by the Roman consul Mummius, and its famous art treasures were taken as spoil to Rome. Julius Caesar rebuilt it as a Roman colony and made it the capital of Achaia in 46, and after that it rapidly came into prominence again. The Goths raided it in the third and fourth centuries A.D.; the Normans sacked it in 1147; the Venetians and Turks held it in the Middle Ages; from 1715 until 1822 it remained with the Turks. A severe earthquake in 1858 caused the abandonment of the city and the building of a new town a few miles from the ancient site.

In Roman times Corinth was a city of wealth, luxury, and immorality. It had no rivals as a city of vice. "To live like a Corinthian" meant to live a life of profligacy and debauchery. It was customary in a stage play for a Corinthian to come on the scene drunk. The inhabitants were naturally devoted to the worship of Poseidon, since they drew so much of their wealth from the sea, but their greatest devotion was given to Aphrodite, the goddess of love. Her temple on the Acrocorinthus had more than a thousand hierodouloi—priestesses of vice not found in other shrines of Greece, and she attracted worshipers from all over the ancient world. Besides drawing vast revenues from the sea, Corinth had many important industries, its pottery and brass especially being famous all over the world. The Isthmian games, held every two years, made Corinth a great center of Hellenic life.

At the height of its power, Corinth probably had a free population of 200,000 plus a half million slaves. Its residents consisted of the descendants of the Roman colonists who were established there in 46 B.C., many Romans who came for business, a large Greek population, and many strangers of different nationalities attracted to the city for various reasons. In the last group was a considerable body of Jews and also some Gentiles brought under the influence of Judaism because of its monotheism and lofty morality.

PAUL visited Corinth for the first time on his second missionary journey (Acts 18). He had just come from Athens, where he had not been well received, and he began his work in Corinth with a sense of weakness, fear, and trembling (1 Cor. 2:3). A special revelation from the Lord in a night vision altered his plans to return to THESSALONICA (Acts 18:9-10; 1 Thess. 2:17-18), and he was told to speak freely and boldly in the city. At his first arrival, he became acquainted with AQUILA and PRISCILLA, fellow Christians and, like himself, tentmakers. During his stay of a year and a half he resided in their home. He labored with his own hands, so that his motives as a preacher would be above suspicion. Soon after his arrival, SILAS and TIMOTHY rejoined him, Timothy bringing news from the church at Thessalonica (1 Thess. 3:6).

Every Sabbath Paul preached in the synagogue, but before long he met with strong opposition from the Jews, so that he turned from them and for the rest of his stay in Corinth gave his attention to the Gentiles (Acts 18:6). He was then offered the use of the house of TITUS JUSTUS, a God-fearing Gentile who lived next door to the synagogue. Many turned to Christ and were baptized as a result of Paul's preaching, among them CRISPUS, the ruler of the synagogue, and all his house. None of the baptisms in Corinth were performed by Paul himself, except those of Crispus, GAIUS (Paul's host on his later visit, Rom. 16:23), and the household of STEPHANAS, who were Paul's first converts (1 Cor. 16:15).

Overview of 1 CORINTHIANS

Author: The apostle PAUL.

Historical setting: Written from EPHESUS during Paul's third missionary journey (c. A.D. 56), in response to (a) reports from members of CHLOE's household (1 Cor. 1:11) and (b) a letter written by the Corinthian Christians themselves (7:1).

Purpose: To give instruction and directions concerning many problems faced by the church in CORINTH, including internal divisions, immorality, partaking of idol food, disorders in worship, and false teaching concerning the resurrection.

Contents: After an introductory paragraph (1 Cor. 1:1-9), the apostle first addresses the problems reported by Chloe's household—quarrels within the Corinthian church (1:10—4:21) and moral and ethical issues (5:1—6:20); he then responds to the questions raised by the Corinthians' letter—about marriage and divorce (ch. 7), food offered to idols (chs. 8-10), worship (ch. 11), spiritual gifts (chs. 12-14), the resurrection (ch. 15), and the collection and other matters (ch. 16).

During Paul's stay in Corinth, GALLIO, the elder brother of the Roman philosopher Seneca, came to govern Achaia as proconsul. This was about the year A.D. 51, as an inscription found at Delphi in 1908 shows. The Jews brought an accusation before Gallio against Paul, charging that he was preaching a religion contrary to Roman law. Gallio, however, refused to admit the case to trial and dismissed them. It is evident that he looked on Christianity as being only an obscure variety of Judaism and that to him the quarrel between the Jews and Paul had its origin in nothing more than differing interpretations of the Jewish law. Following Gallio's decision, the Greek bystanders vented their hostility against the Jews by seizing and beating SOSTHENES, the ruler of the synagogue, and Gallio paid no attention to them (Acts 18:12-17). Gallio's action was highly important, for it amounted to an authoritative decision by a highly placed Roman official that Paul's preaching could not be interpreted as an offense against Roman law; and from this experience Paul gained a new idea of the protection the Roman law afforded him as a preacher of the gospel. After an extended period, Paul left Corinth to go to JERUSALEM and ANTIOCH, on his way stopping off briefly at EPHESUS.

Overview of 2 CORINTHIANS

Author: The apostle PAUL.

Historical setting: Written from MACEDONIA during Paul's third missionary journey (c. A.D. 56) in response to a report brought by TITUS (2 Cor. 2:13; 7:6, 13).

Purpose: To commend the Corinthians for their positive response to Titus's mission; to help them understand the nature of Paul's ministry; to encourage them to participate in the collection for other Christians in need; and to admonish a rebellious group in the church.

Contents: After an introductory paragraph (2 Cor. 1:1-11), Paul gives an account of his recent activities (1:12—2:13), leading to an explanation of his apostolic ministry (2:14—6:10) and to various appeals (6:11—7:16); he then urges them to fulfill their intention of contributing to the collection being raised for the poor in Jerusalem (chs. 8-9); finally, he vindicates his apostolic authority by rebuking some false teachers who are still causing problems in the Corinthian church (chs. 10-13).

Luke in the book of Acts tells little of the subsequent history of the church at Corinth. APOLLOS, a convert of Aquila and Priscilla at Ephesus, was sent from Ephesus to Corinth with a letter of recommendation, and he exercised an influential ministry there (Acts 18:27-28; 1 Cor. 1:12). There is evidence that during Paul's stay in Ephesus on his third missionary journey he paid a brief visit to Corinth (2 Cor. 12:14; 13:1), though some hold that he did this later from MACEDONIA. While at Ephesus he wrote a letter to Corinth that has not been preserved (1 Cor. 5:9). A reply to this, asking advice on important problems facing the church, and an oral report brought to him that all was not well in the church, led to his writing 1 Corinthians. This was probably brought by TITUS, who was sent to Corinth by Paul about this time (2 Cor. 7:13). Timothy was also sent there on some mission (1 Cor. 4:17). After the silversmiths' riot at Ephesus, Paul went to TROAS, hoping to meet Titus there with news from Corinth, but he was disappointed and went on to Macedonia, where he did meet him. From Titus's largely favorable report, Paul wrote 2 Corinthians, and probably sent Titus to deliver it. After some time in Macedonia, Paul went to Greece for three months (Acts 20:2-3), chiefly, no doubt, to Corinth. On Paul's third missionary journey he had busied himself getting offerings of money for the poor Christians in Jerusalem from the various churches he had founded. The Corinthian church responded generously (2 Cor. 9:2-5). During this visit to Corinth, Paul wrote his letter to the ROMANS (Rom. 16:23). Whether he ever returned to the city is unknown.

About A.D. 97, Clement of Rome wrote a letter to the church at Corinth, now included among the APOSTOLIC FATHERS. It shows that in his time the Christians there were still vexed by divisions.

Corinthians, Letters to the. The letter we call First Corinthians was written by PAUL in EPHESUS on his third missionary journey (Acts 19:1; 1 Cor. 16:8, 19), probably in A.D. 56 or 57. He had previously written a letter to the Corinthians that has not come down to us; in it he had warned against associating with immoral persons (1 Cor. 5:9). In reply Paul received a letter (alluded to in 5:10; 7:1; 8:1) in which they declared it was impossible to follow his advice without going out of the world altogether, and submitted to him a number of problems on which they asked his opinion. This letter from Corinth was probably brought by three of their number—STEPHANAS, FORTUNATUS, and ACHAICUS (16:17)—who came to visit Paul at Ephesus and undoubtedly told him about the condition of the church. Meanwhile, Paul had heard of factions in the church from the servants of CHLOE (1:11), probably from Corinth, and this news caused him much pain and anxiety. It was these various circumstances that led to the writing of 1 Corinthians.

The following subjects are discussed in the letter, after the introductory salutation (1 Cor. 1:1-9):

(1) In the first four chapters the apostle takes up the reported factionalism in the church and points out the danger and scandal of party spirit. He reminds them that Christ alone is their Master, their Christian teachers being only servants of Christ and fellow workers with God.

(2) In ch. 5 the apostle deals with a case of incestuous marriage and prescribes that the offender be put out of the church so that his soul may be saved.

(3) In ch. 6 Paul addresses their practice of bringing disputes between themselves before heathen judges for litigation. He shows that this is morally wrong and out of harmony with the spirit of love by which they as Christians should be animated. Paul also pleads with Christians to keep their bodies pure for God's glory.

(4) Various phases of the subject of marriage are considered in ch. 7. While commending a celibate life, Paul holds marriage to be wise and honorable.

(5) The eating of meat offered to idols was a problem of conscience to many Christians, and chs. 8-10 are devoted to it. Paul points out that while there is nothing inherently wrong in a Christian's eating such food, the law of love requires that it be avoided if it will offend another who regards the eating of it as sin. He illustrates this principle of self-control in his own life: lest his motives in preaching the gospel be misunderstood, he refuses to exercise his undoubted right of looking for material aid from the church. He warns against a spirit of self-confidence and urges them to be careful not to seem to countenance idolatry.

(6) Paul next takes up certain abuses in public worship: the matter of appropriate head apparel for women in their assemblies (1 Cor. 11:2-16) and the proper observance of the Lord's Supper (11:17-34), since there had been serious abuses in its administration.

(7) There then follows a long discussion of the use and abuse of spiritual gifts, especially speaking in tongues (ch. 12-14). The apostle, while commending the careful exercise of all the gifts, bids them cultivate above all God's greatest gift, love (ch. 13).

(8) In ch. 15 Paul turns to a consideration of one of the most important of their troubles—the doubt that some had concerning the resurrection of the dead. He meets the objections raised against the doctrine by showing that it is necessitated by the resurrection of Christ and that their salvation is inseparably connected with it.

(9) The letter concludes with directions about the collections being made for the saints in Jerusalem, the mother church; with comments about Paul's plans; and with personal messages to various friends.

Second Corinthians was written by Paul on his third missionary journey somewhere in Macedonia, where he had just met TITUS, who had brought him a report concerning the church at Corinth. The letter reveals that Judaizing teachers—perhaps recent arrivals from Jerusalem—had sought to discredit the apostle and had succeeded in turning the church as a whole against him. Paul was denounced as no minister of Christ at all. This revolt caused Paul to make a brief visit to Corinth in order to restore his authority (2 Cor. 12:14; 13:1-2), but the visit did not have its expected effect. The report Titus brought Paul was, on the whole, most encouraging. The majority had repented of their treatment of Paul and had cast out of the church the man who had led the attack on him. Paul's authority was acknowledged once more. Titus seems to have helped greatly in bringing about this happy change. It was the report of Titus that chiefly occasioned the writing of this letter.

Paul's mention of a severe letter that had caused him great sorrow of heart to write (2 Cor. 2:3-4, 9; 7:8-12) has been the subject of considerable debate. Some scholars think he refers to 1 Corinthians; others hold that this letter, like the one referred to in 1 Cor. 5:9, is wholly lost; while still others believe that it is preserved in 2 Cor. 10-13, which, they say, was written by Paul at Ephesus some time after the writing of 1 Corinthians.

This second letter is the least methodical and the most personal of Paul's writings. It is very autobiographical and falls naturally into three main divisions:

(1) In chs. 1-7 Paul, after giving thanks to God for his goodness to him in trial (1:1-11), shares some thoughts on the crisis through which the church has just passed.

(2) In ch. 8-9 he admonishes the Corinthians to complete the collection for the poor in Jerusalem.

(3) Chapters 10-13 are a defense of Paul's ministry against the attacks of his enemies and a vindication of his apostleship.

Cornelius. kor-neel'yuh (Gk. Kornēlios G3173). A name of ancient and honorable standing among the Romans. Before the NT age, it was borne by such distinguished families as the Scipios and Sulla. Acts 10:1 speaks of a Cornelius who was a centurion of the ITALIAN REGIMENT. While stationed at CAESAREA, in obedience to instructions received in a vision, he sent for Simon PETER, who was staying at JOPPA; Cornelius wanted to learn how he and his household should be saved (11:14).

Cornelius is described as “devout and God-fearing” (Acts 10:2). His religious status prior to Peter’s visit is ambiguous, but it is likely that Cornelius was a pious Roman, who, disillusioned by polytheism and disappointed by philosophy, had gravitated spiritually toward Judaism and was now what the rabbis called a “proselyte of the Gate.” Any doubts that Peter was acting improperly by sharing the message with this first Gentile convert are dispelled by the twofold consideration of Peter’s preparatory vision (10:9-16) and the subsequent outpouring of the Holy Spirit on Cornelius’s household (10:44-47). On these grounds, Peter defended his conduct before his critics at Jerusalem (11:1-18).

Corner Gate. A gate that protected the NW approach to JERUSALEM. During the reign of AMAZIAH king of Judah, a long stretch of the wall leading to it was destroyed by Jehoash (JOASH) king of Israel (2 Ki. 14:13; 2 Chr. 25:23), so the gate was later rebuilt and fortified by UZZIAH (2 Chr. 26:9). After the destruction of the city, the Corner Gate figures in two prophecies (Jer. 31:38; Zech. 14:10). It is not mentioned in NEHEMIAH’s description of Jerusalem, and its precise location is uncertain.

cornerstone. A stone that serves a foundational function as part of a corner or angle in a wall. Among the Canaanites, before the conquest of the land by JOSHUA, the laying of the foundation stone was accompanied by the dreadful rite of human sacrifice. Numerous skeletons have been unearthed, especially those of tiny babies in earthen jars. In the Bible the term cornerstone is commonly used figuratively. In particular, it occurs in several messianic contexts (Ps. 118:22 [NIV, “capstone”]; Isa. 28:16; Zech. 10:4). Jesus validated his ministry by citing the Psalms passage (Matt. 21:42 and parallels). Paul explained God’s saving purposes by combining Isa. 28:16 and 8:14 (Rom. 9:33; cf. Eph. 2:20). Peter’s description of Christians as “living stones” brings together the passages from both the book of Psalms and Isaiah (1 Pet. 2:4-8).

corruption. The KJV uses this term (NIV, “decay”) mainly in passages that refer to the decaying of the physical body (e.g., Ps. 16:10; Acts 2:27; more broadly of creation, Rom. 8:21). See DEATH; SHEOL. The word and its cognates can be used also of moral DEPRAVITY (e.g., Hos. 9:9; 2 Pet. 1:4). See SIN.

The forested area on the right side of the elevation marks the “Hill of Corruption,” where Solomon built high places to foreign idols.

(View to the NE.)

Corruption, Hill (Mount) of. According to 1 Ki. 11:7, SOLOMON built a HIGH PLACE for several Canaanite gods on a hill to the E of JERUSALEM. Many years later, during a time of spiritual revival, King JOSIAH “desecrated the high places that were east of Jerusalem on the south of the Hill of Corruption—the ones Solomon king of Israel had built for Ashtoreth the vile goddess of the Sidonians, for Chemosh the vile god of Moab, and for Molech the detestable god of the people of Ammon” (the same Hebrew phrase occurs in Jer. 51:25 with the sense “destroying mountain,” referring to BABYLON). The site is usually identified with the southern height of the ridge known as the Mount of OLIVES. In modern times this hill is sometimes referred to by the Latin names Mons Offensionis (Mount of Offense, from the Vulgate of 2 Ki. 23:13) and Mons Scandali (Mount of Scandal).

Cos. kos (Gk. Kōs G3271). KJV Coos. An island of the Sporades group off the SW coast of ASIA MINOR. It is mountainous in terrain, especially in the southern sector, and it was the birthplace of Hippocrates, the father of medicine, and of Ptolemy Philadelphus. The name of its capital is also Cos. A large Jewish settlement was located there. It is mentioned in connection with PAUL's third missionary journey (Acts 21:1).

Cosam. koh'suhm (Gk. Kōsam G3272, prob. from Heb. qāsām, “diviner”). Son of Elmadam and descendant of DAVID through NATHAN; included in Luke's GENEALOGY OF JESUS CHRIST (Lk. 3:28).

cosmogony, cosmology. The term cosmogony refers to any view regarding the origin of the visible universe. A similar meaning is conveyed by the word cosmology, which can also be used more specifically of the modern astrophysical study of the origins, evolution, and structure of the universe. See also ASTRONOMY; CREATION; HEAVEN; WORLD.

cotton. Possible rendering of Hebrew word in Esth. 1:6 (so NRSV; the KJV mistranslates with “green”); others believe the word refers to LINEN (cf. NIV). Some Egyptian child mummies were wrapped in cotton bandages. The Hebrews would have learned about cotton growing while they were in captivity in Persia under King XERXES. It is uncertain whether cotton was grown in Palestine in biblical times.

couch. A piece of furniture for reclining. The couch became so ornate that Amos rebuked the rich for the costly display of their couches (Amos 6:4). Sometimes, however, the couch was no more than a rolled-up mat that could be easily transported (Matt. 9:6). See also BED.

council. This English term can be used to render several Hebrew words, especially sôd H6051, which refers to an intimate circle of friends or confidants. In the OT God was frequently described as being in council with the host of heaven (Job 15:8; Ps. 89:7; Jer. 23:18; cf. Amos 3:7; see CONGREGATION, MOUNT OF). Likewise the ruler or king had his council of advisers and nobles; they were distinguished as those who were permitted in the royal presence to see his face (cf. NRSV at 2 Ki. 25:19; Jer. 52:25). In the NT, the Greek term synedrion G5284 can refer to lesser courts among the Jews (Matt. 10:17; Mk. 13:9; each town in Palestine had such a council). The most frequent use of this term, however, is in reference to the high court of the Jews, the SANHEDRIN, which many of the rabbis wanted to believe went back to MOSES.

The expressions “Council of Jerusalem” and “Apostolic Council” are applied to a meeting of delegates of the church in ANTIOCH with the apostles and elders in JERUSALEM (Acts 15, though the text does not contain the word council; many believe that the same meeting is referred to by Paul in Gal. 2:1-10). The primary concern of this gathering was whether GENTILE converts should be required to submit to the Mosaic LAW, especially the rite of CIRCUMCISION. See discussion under PAUL.

course. This English word, which has a variety of meanings, can be used to translate several words or expressions. For example, a Hebrew noun meaning “highway” can refer figuratively to the paths of the heavenly bodies (Jdg. 5:20). The Greek noun trochos G5580, “wheel, race-course,” is used in Jas. 3:6 with reference either to the course of a person’s life (NIV) or to the cycle of nature (NRSV). The KJV uses “courses” of the groups into which PRIESTS were divided (e.g., 1 Chr. 23:6; Lk. 1:5).

court. During the biblical period, court proceedings were held normally in the forum or market square that faced the principal GATE of the city. The first definite reference to such a forum is found in Gen. 19:1, which speaks of LOT “sitting in the gateway” of SODOM when he noticed the two angelic visitors whom he invited to his home. Later allusions to the city gate as the place for public tribunals are found in the book of Deuteronomy (Deut. 16:18; 21:19; 25:7). On JETHRO’s advice MOSES instituted a system of jurisprudence for the Israelites. He appointed judges over tens, fifties, hundreds, and thousands; Moses himself had the final decision in “difficult cases” (Exod. 18:25-26).

Judicial functions were taken over by the king after the Hebrew monarchy was instituted: DAVID maintained an “appellate court” for his entire kingdom (2 Sam. 15:2), and SOLOMON as well (1 Ki. 3:9; 7:7). By the time of JEHOSHAPHAT (2 Chr. 19:5-8) it became necessary to enlarge even the central tribunal at Jerusalem into a larger complex consisting of priests, Levites, and heads of clans. Perhaps it was from this measure that the later SANHEDRIN, or Council of Seventy, developed (although there is no specific mention of it until Hellenistic times), which functioned under the presidency of the high priest.

Platform for the throne and judgment room at the gate complex of Dan (8th-7th cent. B.C.).

By NT times there had intervened several centuries of Greek influence and example, and it became more usual to hold court hearings inside a building constructed as a courthouse. In Greek cities like PHILIPPI, criminal cases could be tried in the open (Acts 19:38; cf. also 18:12-17). Another distinctive feature of NT times was the activity of the lawyer. Like the SCRIBES (to which order they themselves may have belonged), lawyers were careful students of the TORAH, but also of the “traditions of the elders,” and could be relied upon to assist the judges with any interpretation or precedent that had previously arisen in Jewish history. Under the Roman government, the Jews of Palestine were permitted to adjudicate their own civil cases, and even their criminal cases if they did not involve the death penalty. But the Sanhedrin itself was not legally competent to execute capital punishment on Jesus (Jn. 18:31-32), and the later episode when STEPHEN was stoned (Acts 7:57-58) may have taken place in the reign of Herod AGRIPPA I, when there was no direct Roman authority present.

covenant. This English term translates the Hebrew noun bērît H1382, the etymology of which is uncertain. In the OT, the word identifies three different types of legal relationships. (1) A two-sided covenant between human parties who both voluntarily accept the terms of the agreement (for friendship, 1 Sam. 18:3-4; marriage, Mal. 2:14; or political alliance, Josh. 9:15; Obad. 7). God, however, does not enter into such a covenant of equality with human beings.

(2) A one-sided disposition imposed by a superior party (Ezek. 17:13-14). God the Lord thus “commands” a covenant his servants are to obey (Josh. 23:16). In the original “covenant of works,” as it is sometimes called, God placed ADAM on probation, bestowing life, should he prove faithful (Gen. 2:17). Humanity failed; but Christ, the last Adam (1 Cor. 15:45), did fulfill all righteousness (Matt. 3:15; Gal. 4:4), thereby earning restoration for all who are his. (3) God’s self-imposed obligation for the reconciliation of sinners to himself (Deut. 7:6-8; Ps. 89:3-4). As he stated to ABRAHAM, “I will establish my covenant...between me and you and your descendants after you for the generations to come (Gen. 17:7).

The SEPTUAGINT avoided the usual Greek term for covenant, synthēkē, probably because this word, which can also be rendered “contract,” assumes that the parties are equals. Instead, it used diathēkē G1347, the primary meaning of which is “a disposition of property by a will.” NT revelation makes clear the wonderful appropriateness of this term for describing the instrument of God’s redemptive love (see Heb. 9:16-18). Although most scholars believe that diathēkē in the NT simply means “covenant,” the sense of “will” or “testament” points to a specific form of covenant, the bequest; and it well describes God’s OT bērît, because apart from the death of Christ the OT saints “should not be made perfect” (11:40 KJV).

The covenant then constitutes the heart of all God’s special REVELATION; when put into writing, the “Book of the Covenant” becomes the objective source for religious hope (Exod. 24:7). Scripture consists of the “Old Testament” and the “New Testament.” While there can be but one testament, corresponding to the one death of Christ (“my blood of the testament,” according to the better MSS of Matt. 26:28), revelation yet organizes itself under the older testament, with its anticipatory symbols of Christ’s coming (Jer. 31-32; 2 Cor. 3:14), and the newer testament, commemorative of his accomplished redemption (Jer. 31:31; 2 Cor. 3:6).

The following aspects compose the testamentary arrangements: the testator, God the Son, “the mediator” (Heb. 9:15); the heirs, “those who are called” (9:15); the objective method of effectuation, a gracious bequest (9:16); the subjective conditions by which the heir qualifies for the gift, namely, commitment (9:28: it is “to those who are waiting for him”); and the inheritance of reconciliation, eternal salvation (9:15, 28). Certain specific features then characterize this covenant. Its objective effectuation is always marked by a monergism (“one worker”)—God exercising pure grace (cf. Gen. 15:18; Exod. 19:4), unassisted by human works (Eph. 2:8-9). Other features are the death of the testator (Exod. 24:8; Heb. 9:18-22); the promise, “I will be their God, and they will be my people” (Gen. 17:7 to Rev. 21:3); the eternity of the inheritance (Lev. 2:13; Num. 18:19; Ps. 105:8-10); and a confirmatory sign, such as the rainbow to Noah (Gen. 9:12-13), the exodus to Moses (Exod. 20:2), or Christ's resurrection to us (Rom. 1:4). Subjective appropriation of the covenant is likewise marked by unchangeable features of human response: faith (Gen. 15:6; Deut. 6:5; Heb. 11:6) and obedience—both moral (Gen. 17:1; Matt. 7:24; Eph. 2:10) and ceremonial (Gen. 17:10-14; Acts 22:16; 1 Cor. 11:24), for genuine faith must be demonstrated by works (Jas. 2:14-26).

Yet God's revelations of his covenant also exhibit historical progression (note plural "covenants," Rom. 9:4). Under the older testament appear: (1) the Edenic (Gen. 3:15), God's earliest promise of redemption, though at the cost of the bruising of the heel of the seed of woman; (2) the Noachian (9:9), for the preservation of the seed; (3) the Abrahamic (15:18), granting blessing through Abram's family; (4) the Sinaitic (Exod. 19:5-6), designating Israel as God's chosen people; (5) the Levitical (Num. 25:12-13), making reconciliation through priestly atonement; (6) the Davidic (2 Sam. 23:5), with messianic salvation promised through David's dynasty. Each of these covenants anticipated the same redemptive death; yet differences appear, particularly in their ceremonial response. A "dispensation" may thus be defined as a covenantal period during which faith in Christ is manifested by a distinct form of ceremonial obedience. Even our own, newer testament thus exhibits two stages: (7) the present new covenant in Christ, which is internal, "in their heart," reconciling (as always, "I will be their God"); direct, "they will all know me;" and with finished atonement, "for I will forgive their wickedness" (Jer. 31:33-34; Heb. 8:6-13). But its ceremony, the Lord's Supper, possesses a dispensational limit, exhibiting "the Lord's death until he comes" (1 Cor. 11:26). Thus Ezekiel speaks of (8) the future covenant of peace, when our internal salvation will reach out to embrace external nature (Ezek. 34:25), when direct spiritual communion will become "face to face" (20:35; 37:27), and when divine forgiveness will achieve the goal of peace among all nations (34:28).

Covenant, Book of the. An expression that occurs in Exod. 24:7 (also in 2 Ki. 23:2, 21; 2 Chr. 34:30 as a general reference to the law of Moses) and is used to designate Exod. 20-23. These chapters contain, in addition to the TEN COMMANDMENTS, a series of laws most of which begin with the word "if" in the English text. They are laws that express particular case types of domestic, economic, and criminal legislation common not only to the Hebrews but to many peoples of the ANE. See LAW.

covering the head. Modern archaeological discovery has provided information about ancient head coverings from reliefs or wall paintings. Evidently early Palestinian men were bareheaded. Later a variety of head-coverings came into use. The simplest was the headband (1 Ki. 20:38, 41), but ornamental headdresses were worn in various contexts (e.g., Isa. 3:18, 20; 61:3). High priests had a special “turban” (Exod. 28:4; 29:9; 39:28; Lev. 8:13). Writing to the corinthians, PAUL says that “long hair is given to [women] as a covering” (1 Cor. 11:15; cf. vv. 4-7). When the apostle insists that men should pray with heads uncovered, but women should have their heads covered in public worship, he seems to refer to the use of an external material, such as a shawl, but some scholars argue that having the head covered means wearing the hair long. Unfortunately, it is difficult to reconstruct what first-century worship practice may have been.

covetousness. The act or quality of desiring inordinately and with ENVY that which belongs to another. It is a SIN mentioned frequently in both OT and NT, considered a root of other serious and mortal iniquities. The Hebrew verb that appears in the tenth commandment (Exod. 20:17) is ḥāmad H2773, meaning “to desire intensely.” Clearly it refers to a desire that is given more than human and common importance and that becomes a substitute for the devotion and love due to God. Because of its intensity, this desire tends to overshadow the moral demands of the law and to allow the end, the possession of the coveted object, to justify any means for its achievement. The corresponding Greek verb, epithymeō G2121 (“to desire, long for”), occurs in many NT passages, some of which speak of a positive longing (e.g., Lk. 22:15). Another common term is the noun pleonexia G4432, meaning literally “greediness, insatiable desire” (Lk. 12:15).

Cozbi. koz'bi (Heb. kozbi H3944, perhaps “deceitful”). TNIV Kozbi. The daughter of Zur, one of the chiefs of MIDIAN (Num. 25:15, 18; cf. 31:8; Josh. 13:21). An Israelite named ZIMRI, who was one of the family heads in the tribe of SIMEON (Num. 25:14), apparently committed open immorality with Cozbi (v. 6, though the meaning of this text is debated). PHINEHAS the priest was outraged and executed them on the spot, an act that stopped the plague (vv. 7-8). It has been suggested that Cozbi may have played a significant role in leading the Israelites into the immoral worship of B_{AAL} (vv. 1-3).

Cozeba. koh-zee´buh (Heb. kōzēbā › H3943, “liar”). KJV Chozeba; TNIV Kozeba. A small village located in the S_{HEPHELAH}; it was home to some descendants of S_{HELAH} son of J_{UDAH} (1 Chr. 4:22). Most scholars think that Cozeba is the same as A_{CZIB} and K_{EZIB}, usually identified with modern Tell el-Beida (3 mi./5 km. W of A_{DULLAM}).

In the beginning God created the heavens and the earth (Gen. 1:1).

creation. The doctrine of creation is clearly presented in certain key passages (Gen. 1-2; Isa. 40-51; Heb. 11:3). The Bible teaches that the universe, including all matter, had a beginning and came into existence through the will of the eternal God. In Gen. 1:1 the words “the heavens and the earth” summarize all the materials of the universe. Thus even if one accepts the interpretation that this verse is a mere introduction to v. 2 (“When God began to create heaven and earth...”), it would not follow that v. 2 speaks of preexisting matter. In an attempt to reconcile the Genesis account with science (esp. the evidence for the existence of dinosaurs and other forms of life in remote times), some have held to a so-called “gap theory,” according to which v. 2 should be rendered, “And the earth became formless and empty,” implying that God’s perfect creation came into chaos through a great catastrophe. The Hebrew syntax, however, does not naturally lend itself to such a translation.

The length of the creative days of Gen. 1 is not stated in the Bible. The Hebrew word yôm H3427, like “day” in English, may mean a period of light between two periods of darkness, a period of light together with the preceding period of darkness, or a long period of time. All three usages occur often in the Bible, and in this very context (2:4) yôm is used with reference to the whole week of creation. (The argument that when the Heb. word is accompanied by a number it always refers to a 24-hour period is in effect an ad hoc explanation; the use of a number with a word does not normally affect a word’s meaning.) There is no indisputable indication as to which of the three is meant. The Bible gives no specific statement as to how long ago matter was created, how long ago the first day of creation began, or when the sixth day ended. On the seventh day (2:2-3) God ceased from his labors. God refers to this as an example for Israel to have six days of labor followed by one day of rest (Exod. 20:11). No end to the rest of the seventh day is mentioned. As far as the Bible tells us, God’s rest from creating still continues.

There is much discussion about the question of evolution in relation to the creation, but the word evolution is used in many different ways. If taken in its most comprehensive biological and philosophical sense—the theory that everything now existing has come into its present condition as a result of strictly natural development—such an explanation of origins is sharply contradicted by the divine facts revealed in Gen. 1-2. These chapters indicate a number of specific divine commands bringing new factors into existence. God’s activity is indicated throughout the entire creation narrative. It is explicitly stated several times that plants and animals are to reproduce “after their kind.” The account nowhere indicates how large a “kind” is, and there is no ground for equating it with any particular modern definition of “species.” Yet the narrative seems to indicate that a number (perhaps a large number) of “kinds” of plants and of animals did not come into existence by reproducing or evolving from one into the other. Nothing in the Bible, however, denies the possibility of change and development within the limits of a particular “kind.”

Moreover, the creation of ADAM is sharply distinguished from other aspects of creation, and Gen. 2:7 does not seem to allow for the possibility that he existed as an animate being prior to becoming a man, created after the IMAGE OF GOD. Similarly, the creation of EVE is described as a distinct act of God.

It is sometimes said that the Bible begins with two contradictory accounts of creation, but that is to misconstrue the narrative. An atlas may begin with two different but overlapping maps: one of the world and one of the United States. The first would include a great deal of territory not included in the second; while the second would include a great deal of detail not mentioned in the first. Such is exactly the relation between the two creation accounts. Genesis 1 describes the creation of the universe as a whole, while 2:4-25 covers one special segment of that creation. One may say that 2:4 “steps back” into ch. 1 to begin the study of “what happened next,” how out of God’s creative work there came the beginnings of human life and history on earth. This explains the alleged differences and supposed contradictions between the chapters, for ch. 2 alludes to the creative work as a whole only insofar as it is necessary to do so in recording the beginnings of human history. It is reasonable, therefore, that it gives a more detailed account of the creation of Adam and Even but says nothing about that of matter, light, heavenly bodies, or plants.

Again, it is sometimes said that Gen. 1 begins with a watery chaos and Gen. 2:4 with a dry earth. But there is no contradiction, because the two have different starting points in the creative acts of God. Chapter 2 does not describe the creation of vegetation, as some assert; it simply mentions the planting of a garden. It is hardly reasonable to insist that God created man and then put him aside while the garden was planted and given time to mature. The verbs in 2:8-9 must be understood (as is perfectly proper to do) as pluperfects, and the same is true of 2:19 where the previous creation of animals is alluded to. Genesis 2 does not contradict ch. 1 in any way; instead, it opens up our understanding of the wonder of the creation of human beings and introduces us to the beginnings of human history on earth.

creation, new. See REGENERATION.

creature. Something created, although the term is usually applied to living beings, especially humans (see also LIVING CREATURE). PAUL explicitly contrasts “the creature” (NIV, “created things”) with the Creator (Rom. 1:25). The well-known phrase in the KJV, “new creature” (2 Cor. 5:17; NIV, “new creation”), is a reference to REGENERATION.

credit, creditor. See BORROW; DEBT.

creed. An authoritative statement of the principal affirmations of the Christian faith. It is generally brief and concise, free of definition, proof, or explanation. It is at once personal, social, and historical in its impact. Insofar as possible, a creed attempts to witness to the universal CHURCH rather than to set forth those points of doctrine that would describe variance within that church. Thus creeds give testimony to those universal beliefs that bind the whole church, not only in the day in which they were written but throughout history. Several passages in the Bible may be regarded as creedal in character (e.g., Deut. 6:4-5; Matt. 16:16; 1 Cor. 15:1-5; 1 Tim. 3:16), but the earliest formal Christian confession, the Apostles' Creed, probably originated about the middle of the second century. The most substantial and important confessions of the ancient church, such as the Nicene Creed, were produced in the fourth and fifth centuries.

Crescens. kres'uhnz (Gk. Krēskēs, from Lat. Crescens, "growing"). A companion of PAUL in his last imprisonment (2 Tim. 4:10). He is said to have left the apostle and gone to GALATIA.

crescents. This term is used by some versions to render Hebrew śahārônîm H8448 (Jdg. 8:21, 26 [NIV, "ornaments"]; Isa. 3:18 [NIV, "crescent necklaces"]). The word refers to ornaments made of gold, silver, or bronze, and shaped in the form of the new moon. They were worn as necklaces or sewn on garments.

Cretan. kree'tuhn. See CRETE.

Crete. kreet (Gk. Krētē G3207; gentilic Krēs G3205, "Cretan"). A large island in the eastern Mediterranean, SE of the Greek mainland (see GREECE). Crete is about 160 mi. (260 km.) long, and its width varies from 7 to 35 mi. (11-55 km.). It is dominated by four mountain ranges, but in the eastern half there are fertile plains and upland basins that furnish summer pasturage. For this reason only the eastern half was settled in prehistoric times. Crete forms a natural bridge between Europe and Asia Minor, but despite this enviable geographical position, it has never attained a prominent place in history, partly because of internal dissensions and, in more modern times, because of its acceptance of Turkish rule and the Islamic faith until 1913, when it was formally incorporated into Greece, where the Orthodox Church predominates.

In mythology, Mount Ida is the legendary birthplace of ZEUS, the head of the Greek Pantheon. King Minos, a half-historical and half-mythological character, alleged son of Zeus, was an early ruler of Crete. Both Thucydides and Aristotle accepted the existence of King Minos and claimed that he established maritime supremacy for Crete by putting down piracy. Aristotle compares the institutions of Crete to those of Sparta. Crete is said to have been colonized by the Dorians from the Peloponnesus. The most important of the ancient cities of Crete are Knossos (excavated by Arthur Evans), Gortyna, and Cydonia. Around 140 B.C. the Jews established a large enough colony on this island to be able to appeal successfully to the protection of ROME.

In the OT the KERETHITES (1 Sam. 30:14; Ezek. 25:16), related to the PHILISTINES, are usually held to be Cretans. In the NT a number of Cretans are represented as being present on the Day of PENTECOST (Acts 2:11). PAUL sailed on a grain ship along the southern coast of Crete on the way to ROME (27:12-13). The ship anchored at FAIR HAVENS just E of Cape Matala, then sailed to the harbor of PHOENIX, but the narrative does not specifically indicate that Paul actually landed on the island. It is not known who founded the churches on Crete. Paul implied that he did so when he stated that he left TITUS on the island to correct the churches and appoint elders in every town (Tit. 1:5). The Cretans were proverbially depraved. Paul quoted the poet Epimenides c. 600 B.C., "Cretans are always liars, evil beasts, lazy gluttons" (1:12), an opinion shared by many of the ancients.

crimson. A vivid or deep red color, similar to SCARLET. The latter term usually refers to a brighter red, but it is uncertain whether this distinction applies to the relevant Hebrew words (cf. the use of both in Isa. 1:18). All the standard English versions use "crimson" as the rendering of Hebrew karmîl H4147, which occurs only three times (2 Chr. 2:7, 14; 3:14). It is found more frequently in the NRSV, which uses it also to render šānî H9106 (e.g., Exod.

28:5-6 and often), but this term is rendered “scarlet” in the KJV and NIV. The dye for red colors is extracted from the body of female cochineal insects.

crisping pin. An instrument for curling the hair. It is the KJV rendering of Hebrew ḥārīt H3038 (“bag, handbag, purse”) in Isa. 3:22. The Hebrew word occurs also in 2 Ki. 5:23, where the KJV correctly translates with “bag.”

Crispus. kris´puhs (Gk. Krispos G3214, from Lat. Crispus, “curled, curly”). A superintendent of the SYNAGOGUE in CORINTH and an early convert there with his family (Acts 18:8); he was one of the few Corinthians baptized by PAUL (1 Cor. 1:14). Most Corinthian Jews opposed the gospel, and synagogue preaching became impossible (Acts 18:4-8, 12); the conversion of a prominent synagogue official must have been striking. (This name occurs, mistakenly, for CRESCENS in some ancient versions of 2 Tim. 4:10.) See also SOSTHENES.

crookbackt. KJV rendering of a Hebrew word meaning “hunchbacked” (Lev. 21:20).

crop. This English noun, when referring to a bird’s enlarged gullet (craw), which was to be removed in sacrificial rites, occurs only once (Lev. 1:16). Otherwise, the word (usually in the pl. crops) occurs frequently in Bible versions with reference to the yield of cultivated plants and agricultural produce. See AGRICULTURE; HARVEST; PLANTS.

Artistic reconstruction of a T-shaped cross used in crucifixion. In certain cases the arms may have been attached to the cross beam by ropes.

cross. This term in the Bible can refer not only literally to the wooden instrument of torture and death, but also (by metonymy) to the act of crucifixion, death on the cross; in addition, the cross can be a symbolic representation of REDEMPTION. The cross existed in four different forms: (1) the crux immissa, the type usually presented in art in which the upright beam extends above the cross beam, traditionally held to be the cross on which the Redeemer suffered and died. (2) The crux commissa, or “Saint Anthony’s Cross” in the form of the letter “T.” (3) The Greek cross in which the cross beams are of equal length. (4) The crux decussata, or “Saint Andrew’s Cross,” in the shape of the letter “X.” Antedating these forms, the Assyrians impaled the body with a crude pointed stick.

Because of the sacrificial death of the Savior on the cross, the cross rapidly became interwoven into the theological construction of religious thinking, especially PAUL’s. In 1 Cor. 1:17 the “preaching” of the cross is set forth as the “divine folly” in sharp contrast to earthly WISDOM. In Eph. 2:16 it is presented as the medium of RECONCILIATION. According to Col. 1:20, PEACE has been effected through the cross; and in 2:14 we read that the penalties of the law have been removed from the believer by the cross. How Paul as a pious Hebrew to whom one hanged was accursed, and as a Roman to whom one crucified was an object of scorn (Gal. 3:13), came to glory in the cross would be one of the absurdities of history were it not for the fact that the apostle held the Crucified as the Christ of God (2:20).

Crucifixion was one of the most cruel and barbarous forms of death known to man. It was practiced, especially in times of war, by the Phoenicians, Carthaginians, Egyptians, and later by the Romans. So dreaded was it that even in the pre-Christian era, the cares and troubles of life were often compared to a cross. The gory details of the crucifixion of Christ are passed over by the Evangelists, who say simply, "They crucified him" (Matt. 27:35; Mk. 15:24). Following his trial before the Jewish and Roman authorities, Christ was led forth for crucifixion. Before the actual ordeal itself, he was scourged. The prisoner was bent over and tied to a post, while the Roman soldier applied blow after blow on his bared back with a lash intertwined with pieces of bone or steel. This in itself was frequently sufficient to cause death.

The agony of the crucified victim was brought about by a number of factors. First, the painful but nonfatal character of the wounds inflicted. Although there were two distinctive methods of affixing a living victim to a cross, tying or nailing, it is well established that Christ underwent the horror of the latter, or possibly both. The second factor causing great suffering was the abnormal position of the body. The slightest movement brought on additional torture. The third factor was the traumatic fever induced by hanging for such a long period of time.

What was the physical reason for Christ's death? Recent medical studies have sought an answer to the question. When a person is suspended by his two hands, the blood sinks rapidly into the lower extremities of the body. Within six to twelve minutes the blood pressure has dropped to half, while the rate of the pulse has doubled. The heart is deprived of blood, and fainting follows. This leads to an orthorastic collapse through insufficient circulation. Death during crucifixion is due to heart failure. Victims of crucifixion did not generally succumb for two or three days. Death was hastened by the crucifragium or the breaking of the legs. "But when they came to Jesus and found that he was already dead, they did not break his legs" (Jn. 19:33). To such a death, the one who was coequal with God descended (Phil. 2:5).

crown. This English word is used, with more than one meaning, to render several Hebrew and Greek terms. (1) It may simply indicate something of a particular form or shape (e.g., Exod. 25:11 KJV, referring to a part of the ornamentation of the ARK OF THE COVENANT). (2) It may be a symbol of kingship. In Ps. 21:3 Yahweh is spoken of as placing a crown of fine gold upon the head of DAVID, the theocratic king. According to 2 Sam. 12:30, the crown of the Ammonite king of RABBAH, weighing a talent of gold and set with a precious stone, was taken from his head and placed on the head of David, king of Israel, as a symbol of sovereignty over the country and people of AMMON. (3) In Ps. 8:5 human beings, as the representatives of God in ruling all the created existences of the world, are spoken of as crowned with glory and honor. (4) In the NT, the word is used twice to mean a symbol of evil ruling powers, demonic or antichristian (Rev. 12:3; 13:1), and once of Jesus Christ (19:12). (5) In addition, Roman soldiers are said to have “twisted together a crown of thorns” (Matt. 27:29; Mk. 15:17; Jn. 19:2). What material or kind of tree or bush was used is unknown. The crown of thorns evidently served a double function as intended by the soldiers: to mock and humiliate Jesus with a travesty of royal honor, and to increase the physical torture that was inflicted upon him.

(6) Finally, the crown can be a symbol of victory. The background of this concept is the Greek athletic GAMES or contests, in which the victor was crowned with a garland or wreath of foliage. This crown had no intrinsic value; its worth consisted solely in the honor of victory that it symbolized and recognized. (Similar to a ribbon or medal given to the winner in an athletic contest today). This idea was lifted by the NT into the terminology of religion, and the crown became the symbol of victory over the forces and powers of evil (cf. Rev. 2:10; 3:11; 6:2). In 2 Tim. 4:8 the “crown of life” and “crown of righteousness” are not to be thought of as separate or distinct glories to be received by the Christian at the Lord’s coming; rather, both signify absolute and total victory, the “crown of life” emphasizing the idea of victory over death, and the “crown of righteousness” stressing the idea of victory over sin.

crucible. A refining pot for silver and gold and other metals, made to resist great heat (Prov. 17:3; 27:21).

crucifixion. See CROSS.

cruse. This English term, meaning “a small earthenware jar (for holding water, oil, etc.),” is used by the KJV to render several Hebrew words, especially ṣappāḥat H7608, which seems to refer to the two-handled traveler’s flask or canteen (1 Sam. 26:11-12, 16; 1 Ki. 19:6). It was ill-suited to contain olive oil, but perhaps necessary in the case of the poverty-stricken widow (1 Ki. 17:12; 14, 16). See also POTTERY.

cry. This English word is often used as a rendering of various terms (e.g., Gen. 27:34; Matt. 25:6). The “cry” may or may not be uttered; it may express the anguish of the soul under dire and prolonged stress or burden and the lifting of perpetual petition in search of fulfillment, deliverance, or the answer to the riddles of life (cf. Heb. 5:7). At times the idea of prayer was uppermost, as in the cry of Jesus from the CROSS (Matt. 27:46). The two terms “pray” and “cry” can be used interchangeably (Ps. 39:12).

crystal. See MINERALS.

Cub. kuhb. Also Kub. Transliteration of Hebrew kûb H3915 (not in NIV), a place mentioned only once (Ezek. 30:5 ASV; the KJV has “Chub” and identifies “Put” as “Libya”). On the basis of the SEPTUAGINT, most scholars emend the Hebrew text to read lûb H4275, that is, LIBYA. Cf. Nah. 3:9, where Libyans are referred to along with CUSH and PUT, as here.

Cun. kuhn (Heb. kûn H3923). TNIV Kun. An Aramean town located in the northern part of ZOBAB (1 Chr. 18:8). Even though the parallel passage reads BEROETHAI (2 Sam. 8:8), this does not mean that they are necessarily the same place; DAVID took bronze booty from a number of the towns in this area. Some scholars identify Cun with modern Ras Baʿalbek, about 55 mi. (90 km.) NE of Beirut.

cuneiform. See WRITING.

cup. A drinking vessel made of POTTERY or metal. Cups were of various forms and designs; the cups of the Hebrews often carried designs borrowed from Phoenicia and Egypt. All of SOLOMON's drinking vessels were of gold (1 Ki. 10:21). The cups mentioned in the NT were doubtless of Roman style.

The cup is used as a symbol of prosperity or of the Lord's blessing, but also of his malediction on the wicked (Ps. 11:6; 16:5; 23:5). In other contexts the cup can represent drunkenness and other illicit pleasures (Prov. 23:31; Rev. 17:4; 18:6). "Cup of salvation" (Ps. 116:13), "cup of thanksgiving" (1 Cor. 10:16), and "cup of the Lord" (10:21) are also used. In the latter two passages, PAUL is referring to the communion cup, over which the blessing is said prior to the feast that commemorates the Lord's death and burial. The cup from ancient times signified FELLOWSHIP. Thus when the believer takes the cup of the Lord, he enters into fellowship with him. The "cup of demons" (10:21), mentioned in opposition to the cup of the Lord, can best be understood in this context. The apostle is saying in a figurative way that we cannot have fellowship with Christ and with the forces of darkness at the same time. At heathen feasts the cup was sacred to the name of the god in whose name the feast was being held. Thus, in the Christian communion service, the cup is sacred to the name of the Redeemer who instituted its practice (Matt. 26:27; Mk. 14:23-24; Lk. 22:20).

The “cup of his wrath” (Isa. 51:17, 22), the “cup that sends all the surrounding peoples reeling” (Zech. 12:2), and the “cup of ruin and desolation” (Ezek. 23:33) are among other biblical occurrences of the term.

cupbearer. See OCCUPATIONS AND PROFESSIONS.

curds. See BUTTER.

curse. The expression (as by prayer) of a wish that evil fall on someone; the opposite of blessing (see BLESS). On the divine level, to curse is to impose JUDGMENT. In ANE thought the curse carried with it its own power of execution. A curse was imposed on the serpent (Gen. 3:14). NOAH cursed CANAAN (9:25). The curse of BALAAM, the pseudoprophet, turned to a blessing (Num. 24:10). After the Israelites reached the Promised Land, half of the tribes stood on Mount GERIZIM and half on Mount EBAL to utter blessings and curses respectively (Deut. 27:12-13; Josh. 8:33-34). The cursing of one’s parents is sternly prohibited by Mosaic regulations. Christ commanded those who would be his disciples to bless and not to curse (Lk. 6:28). PAUL represents the curse of the LAW as borne by Christ on the CROSS for the believer (Gal. 3:13). See also BLASPHEMY.

curtain. Curtains were much more familiar in the ANE household than elsewhere. The nomad’s tent was sewn together of narrow lengths of cloth woven from goats’ and camels’ hair mixed with sheep’s wool. The majority of biblical references to curtains are in Exodus in connection with the TABERNACLE; in fact, one of the Hebrew words for “curtain” (yērî‘â H3749) became virtually synonymous with the sacred tent (2 Sam. 7:2; cf. KJV). The weaving of the curtains was the work of the women (Exod. 35:25-26). In the tabernacle the curtains hung on 60 acacia pillars set in brass sockets 5 cubits apart. Curtains for the N and S sides were each 5 cubits high by 100 cubits long of fine white linen; that for the W side was 5 by 50 cubits. On the E side (the entrance) hung two short curtains, each 5 by 15 cubits, on three pillars.

Special importance attaches to another Hebrew word, pārōket H7267, a technical term applied only to the inner curtain (KJV, “veil”) that divided the Holy Place from the Most Holy Place in the tabernacle. A symbol of God’s unapproachability, this curtain was made of blue, purple, scarlet, and fine twisted linen embroidered with figures of CHERUBIM (Exod. 26:31-37; 36:35). It was hung with golden hooks upon four pillars of acacia wood overlaid with gold which were set in sockets or bases of silver. It is likely that the curtain was quite thick to correspond with its great size. Only the high priest was permitted to enter behind the veil, and that only one day each year—the Day of Atonement (Lev. 16; Num. 18:7; Heb. 9:7). Mention is made only once of this curtain in Solomon’s ^{TEMPLE} (2 Chr. 3:14). During the crucifixion of Jesus (Lk. 23:45), or at the moment of his death (Matt. 27:51; Mk. 15:38), and at the time the priests were busy with the evening sacrifice, the veil of the temple was torn in two, from top to bottom, exposing the Holy of Holies and symbolizing that Jesus, as the High Priest who could enter the Most Holy Place (Heb. 6:19-20; 9:11-12), had opened the way for all believers to enter into the presence of God through his flesh, symbolized by the veil (10:19-20).

Cush. koosh (Heb. kûš H3932 and H3933; gentilic kûšî H3934, “Cushite”). Also Kush. (1) Oldest son of H^{AM} and grandson of N^{OA}H (Gen. 10:6-8; 1 Chr. 1:8-10). From him descended several tribes, including the southernmost people group known to the Hebrews. See #3 below.

(2) A Benjamite mentioned in the title of Ps. 7. In this psalm D^{AVI}D prays for deliverance from his enemies, and Cush (identified by some with S^{AUL}) may have been among them. It is also possible, however, that Cush was not an enemy; perhaps he is the same as the Cushite messenger mentioned in 2 Sam. 18:21-32.

Cushites (Nubians) being taken prisoner by Assyrian soldiers after capturing a fortress in Egypt. Panel from a palace in Nineveh (c. 640 B.C.).

(3) A land lying to the S of E^{GYPT}, in the upper N^{ILE} region (Nubia), and corresponding roughly to E^{THIOPIA}. It would appear that Cush originally referred to a piece of territory lying between the second and the third cataracts of the Nile, but later it came to designate a broader area. At times the reference to Cush is merely one that implies a country lying as far off as possible (cf. Ezek. 29:10). A few problems are encountered in connection with the use of the term kûš. The first of these is that “the entire land of Cush” is said to be encircled by the Gihon River (Gen. 2:13). This reference demands a location near Mesopotamia and lies therefore almost as far N as Cush lies S. There is also the problem of the wife of Moses, the “Cushite woman” (Num. 12:1). She either came from the area adjacent to the Sinai peninsula (the Zipporah of Exod. 2:21) or possibly after Zipporah’s death may have been an Ethiopian who, in a manner not known to us, came into that same peninsula. Another problem has to do with Zerah the Cushite, who appeared in the land of Judah in the days of King Asa with a huge army (2 Chr. 14:9, 12-13). History has yet to find an answer to the question how in a time when Ethiopia had no power in Egypt, Zerah should have been able to muster so large a force. (Other Cushites are mentioned in 2 Sam. 18:21-23 and Jer. 38:7-13.)

Cushan. koosh’an (Heb. kûšān H3936, derivation uncertain). Speaking of Yahweh’s coming in judgment, the prophet says, “I saw the tents of Cushan in distress, / the dwellings of Midian in anguish” (Hab. 3:7). The Septuagint understood the passage to refer to Ethiopia (see Cush), but this area is much farther S than the context suggests. Because of the parallelism in the verse, most scholars assume that Cushan was near (or even the same as) Midian, in the desert E of the Sinai peninsula. Others see a connection with Cushan-Rishathaim (“king of Aram Naharaim,” Jdg. 3:8) and place Cushan in N Syria.

Cushan-rishathaim. koosh’an-rish’uh-thay’im (Heb. kûšan riš-āṭayim H3937, possibly a deliberate disfigurement of an uncertain name). A king of Aram Naharaim (Mesopotamia) who ruled over Israel for eight years during the period of the judges (Jdg. 3:8, 10). When the Israelites cried to God, he raised a deliverer, Othniel, who prevailed over Cushan-Rishathaim. The identity of this king and his kingdom are uncertain. Perhaps there is a connection between him and a district in N Syria (part of Aram Naharaim) known as Kûshân-rôm. It is also possible that Cushan-Rishathaim was a Hittite ruler of that area or a member of an Assyrian or Babylonian dynasty.

Cushi. koosh’i (Heb. kûšī H3935; this form can also be used as the gentilic “Cushite,” for which see Cush). (1) The great-grandfather of Jehudi, who was a prince in the court of Jehoiakim (Jer. 36:14).

(2) The father of the prophet Zephaniah (Zeph. 1:1).

(3) KJV form of Cushite (2 Sam. 18:21-32).

Cushite. koosh´it. See CUSH.

custodian. This term is used by the RSV to render Greek paidagōgos G4080 (lit., “boy’s guide”), a word used by PAUL to describe one of the functions of the LAW (Gal 3:24-25). The word was wrongly translated “schoolmaster” by the KJV, while the NRSV uses a negative term, “disciplinarian” (the NIV uses descriptive phrases, “put in charge of,” “under the supervision of”). The paidagōgos was a trusted, often well-educated slave who was given constant supervision of a boy between the ages of six and sixteen. He was responsible for the disciplined training and the moral development of his charge, going to and from school with him and assisting with his home studies. Paul’s point in using this image, however, has been debated: is he calling attention to the oppressive character of the law or to its positive function in leading sinners to Christ? The apostle seems to indicate that the purpose of the law in the economy of God was to prepare a people, and thereby perfect his plan, for the coming of Christ. It was necessary to place upon them severe restrictions in order to develop their racial and cultural identity, and to lay them under the moral discipline of the law. In addition, they needed to be instructed in the “promises” that pointed to Christ. The intent of the law went no farther than this.

custom, receipt of. The post from which MATTHEW (Levi) was called to follow Christ (Matt. 9:9; NIV, “tax collector’s booth”). In postexilic days the TRIBUTE was usually in terms of a road toll. The Romans imposed tribute or TAXES on Jews as on all their subjects for the maintenance of their provincial government. Tax collectors or publicans were despised because of their notorious dishonesty and willingness to work for a foreign power.

Cuth. kooth. See CUTHAH.

Cuthah. kooth´uh (Heb. kûtâ H3940 or kût H3939, from Akk. Kûtû). Also Cuth; TNIV Kuthah. One of the most important cities of ancient Babylonia—perhaps even the capital of an early Sumerian empire (2 Ki. 17:24, 30). Today the site is marked by Tel-Ibrahim (c. 20 mi./32 km. NE of BABYLON). Here contract tablets were found that give the name as Gudua or Kûtû. To the W lies a smaller mound crowned with a sanctuary in memory of Ibrahim (ABRAHAM). Cuthah had a temple (E-shid-lam) dedicated to NERGAL, king of the underworld. The city was probably important commercially because it had two rivers (or canals). SENNACHERIB boasts that he destroyed Cuthah in one of his campaigns; NEBUCHADNEZZAR later rebuilt its beautiful temple. Cuthah is one of the cities from which SARGON II deported colonists to repopulate N Israel after SAMARIA had capitulated (721 B.C.). Apparently these aliens were predominant, for the inhabitants of Samaria were long after called Cutheans.

Cuza. koo'zuh (Gk. Chouzas, from Aram. kûzā ܕܐܝܢܐ, “jug”). Also Chuza. The husband of JOANNA, one of the women from GALILEE who followed Jesus and helped support him and his disciples (Lk. 8:3; she also went to the tomb of Jesus to anoint his body with spices on the morning of his resurrection, 24:10). Cuza is said to have been a steward of HEROD Antipas. Some have speculated that Cuza had died before the time when Joanna followed Jesus.

Cyprus.

Cyprus. si'pruhs (Gk. Kypros G3251). An island in the eastern part of the Mediterranean directly off the coast of Syria and Cilicia, about 150 mi. (240 km.) long and about 40 mi. (65 km.) across. The island, which is rich in copper deposits, has roots deep in the past. The aboriginal inhabitants of Cyprus seem to have been of Minoan stock. After the breakup of the Minoan civilization, the dark ages settled down on the island. The curtain rose again when settlers from the Greek mainland reached it. Cyprus has known various conquerors. SARGON in 709 B.C. made himself ruler of Cyprus, and it paid tribute to Assyria until the days of ESARHADDON. The demise of the Assyrian empire appears to have brought the island relative freedom, until it was annexed to Egypt in 540. With the rise of Cambyses (526), Cyprus passed under Persian rule until the time of ALEXANDER THE GREAT, to whom it surrendered voluntarily and helped with the siege of TYRE. During the late intertestamental period it fell into the hands of the Romans (cf. 1 Macc. 10:13), who accorded the island provincial status in 58 B.C.

Aerial view of the western section of the island of Cyprus (view to the N). The harbor of Paphos is located at the bottom right of the picture.

In the pre-Christian era, a large colony of Jews settled there and later no doubt formed the nucleus of the Christian church ministered to by PAUL and his companions, who passed through the island from SALAMIS to PAPHOS (Acts 13:4-12). At Paphos, Sergius PAULUS, the imperial deputy of the island, came to believe in Christ. BARNABAS, who accompanied Paul on this first missionary journey, was a native of the island (Acts 4:36); with John Mark (see MARK, JOHN) he later returned to evangelize Cyprus after they had left Paul's company (15:36-39).

Cyrene. si-ree'nee (Gk. Kyrēnē G3255, from the name of the nature goddess, Kyrana). A Libyan city in N Africa, W of EGYPT, separated from it by a part of the Libyan Desert. It was situated some 2,000 ft. (610 m.) above and 10 mi. (16 km.) away from the Mediterranean. The coastline afforded a natural shelter from the heat of the Sahara. It was protected by steps of descending ranges about 80 mi. (130 km.) to the south. The fertility and climate of the city were delightful and productive.

Cyrene, originally a Greek colony, was founded by Battus in 603 B.C. This veritable "oasis in the desert" attracted travelers and commerce from early times. Among its distinguished citizens was Carneacles, the founder of the new academy at ATHENS. Aristippus, the Epicurean philosopher and friend of Socrates, also came from this city. PTOLEMY Euergetes I incorporated Cyrene as a part of Egypt in 231. It later passed into the hands of the Romans, being willed to them by the last Ptolemy.

Cyrene is not mentioned in the OT but becomes important in the NT. A native of Cyrene, SIMON by name, was impressed by the Roman soldiers into carrying the cross of Jesus (Lk. 23:26); thus did Simon immortalize his city. There were also representatives of Cyrene present in JERUSALEM on the day of PENTECOST (Acts 2:10). Its Jewish population warranted a synagogue (6:9). A certain Lucius of Cyrene was one of the leaders of the church in Syrian ANTIOCH (13:1). Archaeology has shown that it was the Greek plan to make Cyrene the “Athens of Africa.” The most interesting remains are a great system of tombs cut out of solid rock into the cliff. Architecture and paintings adorn these tombs.

Cyrenius. See QUIRINIUS.

Cyrus. si’ruhs (Heb. kôreš H3931). Although this name was borne by more than one Persian ruler (see PERSIA), the most important by far was Cyrus II the Great (559-530 B.C.), son of Cambyses and founder of the Achaemenid empire, which continued for two centuries to the time of ALEXANDER THE GREAT. Seven years after the death of NEBUCHADNEZZAR, Nabonidus ascended the throne of BABYLON, in 555 B.C. He was destined to be the last ruling sovereign of the neo-Babylonian empire, for in the highlands of Iran another kingdom was forging out its own program of conquest. When the Medes and their king, Astyages, were defeated by Cyrus, the realm of Persia began to assume threatening proportions.

Cyrus himself announced his genealogy: “I am Cyrus, king of the hosts, the great king, king of Babylon, king of Sumer and Akkad...son of Cambyses, the king, king of Anshan; the grandson of Cyrus...the great-grandson of Teispes...king of Anshan...” In this same inscription Cyrus proceeds to relate how the city of Babylon opened its gates to him without resistance, confirming the biblical account recorded in Dan. 5 when DARIUS, acting as vice-regent for Cyrus, took the city of Babylon in the name of Cyrus the Great. The neo-Babylonian empire was in no condition to resist the advance of Cyrus, and fell easily into the hands of the Persians. The OT sets the framework of reference against the backdrop of BELSHAZZAR’s impious feast (Dan. 5:1-30). Cyrus entered Babylon on October 29, 539 B.C., and presented himself in the role of the liberator of the people. He allowed the images of the gods to be transported back to their original cities and instituted a kindly policy of repatriation for captive peoples. His policies of moderation naturally extended to the Hebrews, whom he encouraged to return to Judea to rebuild their temple (2 Chr. 36:22-23; Ezra 1:1-6). Isaiah refers to Cyrus as “his [i.e., the Lord’s] anointed” (Isa. 45:1).

D

D. The symbol used to designate two different NT MSS, Codex Bezae (for the Gospels and Acts) and Codex Claromontanus (Pauline Epistles). It is also an abbreviation used (along with E, J, and P) to designate one of the supposed sources of the PENTATEUCH, according to the Documentary Hypothesis. It refers primarily to the author or editor of the book of DEUTERONOMY, but also to the material or outlook peculiar to it.

Dabareh. See DABERATH.

Dabbasheth. See DABBESHETH.

Dabbesheth. dab´uh-sheth (Heb. dabbešet H1833, “hump”). KJV Dabbasheth. A town on the S border of the tribe of ZEBULUN between SARID and JOKNEAM (Josh. 19:11), perhaps a little E of the Brook KISHON. Dabbesheth should possibly be identified with Tell esh-Shammam, some 6 mi. (10 km.) NW of MEGIDDO.

Daberath. dab´uh-rath (Heb. dābērat H1829, “pasture”). A town at the NW foot of Mount TABOR, in the territory of the tribe of ISSACHAR, allotted to the Levites descended from GERSHON (Josh. 21:28 [KJV, “Dabareh”]; 1 Chr. 6:72 [Heb. 6:57]); it was apparently on the border with ZEBULUN (Josh. 19:12). The site is identified with the village of Daburiyeh, 5 mi. (8 km.) E of NAZARETH. Some think Daberath is the same place as RABBITH (Josh. 19:20).

dagger. See ARMS AND ARMOR.

Dagon. day´gon (Heb. dāgôn H1837, derivation disputed). Chief god of the PHILISTINES, but possibly worshiped by the Canaanites before the Philistine invasion of Canaan, as suggested by place-names such as BETH DAGON in Judah (Josh. 15:41) and in Asher (19:27). Some have thought that Dagon was a sea god (the Heb. word dāg H1834 means “fish”) or an agricultural deity (from dāgān H1841, “grain”) or, perhaps more likely, a storm god (as some Mesopotamian and Ugaritic texts suggest). The OT mentions Dagon in three contexts. (1) When the Philistines captured SAMSON, they “assembled to offer a great sacrifice to Dagon their god” (Jdg. 16:23). (2) Some years later the Philistines captured the ARK OF THE COVENANT, brought it into their temple, and set it beside an image of Dagon; but the statue fell twice on its face and broke, and moreover the Lord afflicted the people with tumors (1 Sam. 5:1-7). (3) Upon the death of SAUL and his sons on Mount GILBOA, the Philistines “hung up his head in the temple of Dagon” in BETH SHAN (1 Chr. 10:10; cf. 1 Sam. 31:10).

Dalaiah. See DELAIAH.

daleth. dahˈleth (from delet H1946, “door”). The fourth letter of the Hebrew alphabet (ד), with a numerical value of four. This consonant was pronounced like d in English, although in later times it became spirantized (cf. the th sound in English this) when it was preceded by a vowel sound. Because its shape is very similar to that of the RESH (ר), these two consonants were often confused by the scribes.

Dalmanutha. dal-muh-nooˈthuh (Gk. Dalmanoutha G1236). A village near the W shore of the Sea of Galilee (only in Mk. 8:10). See GALILEE, SEA OF. Following the feeding of the 4,000, Jesus and his disciples came to this region, an area that must have been near (or the same as) MAGADAN, the name that occurs in the parallel passage (Matt. 15:39). The ruins on the W shore of the lake, 3 mi. (5 km.) NW of TIBERIAS near modern Majdel (Magdala), may be the location. The name Dalmanutha is not attested elsewhere.

Dalmatia. dal-mayˈshee-uh (Gk. Dalmatia G1237). A district in the southern part of ILLYRICUM to which TITUS went during PAUL’s final imprisonment (2 Tim. 4:10). Dalmatia was a somewhat vaguely defined area of coast and mountain hinterland that lay E of the Adriatic Sea confronting Italy. It was a vital area in the prosecution of Rome’s project of a Rhine-Danube frontier. Paul’s brief and unexplained reference to Illyricum in writing to Rome (Rom. 15:19) may mean that the apostle himself had founded Christian churches in the southern and more hellenized parts of the region. He possibly visited the area from MACEDONIA after his Ephesian ministry (Acts 20:1).

Dalphon. dal'fon (Heb. dalpôn H1943, possibly from Akk. dullupu, “sleepless”). The second of the ten sons of H_{AMAN} who were put to death by the Jews (Esth. 9:7).

Damaris. dam'uh-ris (Gk. Damaris G1240, possibly “wife” or “heifer”). One of Paul's converts at Mars' Hill in A_{THENS} (Acts 17:34; see A_{REOPAGUS}). Beyond this we know nothing of her. Since L_{UKE} singled her out as one of several converts, and since she was named with D_{IONYSIUS}, one of the judges of the Athenian court, some have thought that she may have been a woman of high social rank; others, however, speculate that she was an educated courtesan and thus a woman of low moral character.

Damascene. dam'uh-seen. A resident of D_{AMASCUS}.

Damascus.

Damascus. duh-mas'kuhs (Heb. dammešeq H1966 [with variant spellings]; Gk. Damaskos G1242, gentilic Damaskēnos G1241, “Damascene”). This name can be applied to (1) the well-known city NE of Mount H_{ERMON}, (2) the general geographic region in S S_{YRIA} where the city was located, and (3) at times, the state of which the city was the capital. Today Damascus is the capital of the modern state of Syria.

For more than 4,000 years, Damascus has been the capital of one government after another, a prize for which nation after nation went to war, a city whose boast for centuries has been, "The world began at Damascus, and the world will end there." It is a modern focal point between the Christian and the Muslim worlds, center of tourist interest and of international unrest. Damascus is watered by the Barada River and the Wady Awaj (the ABANA and PHARPAR of the OT, 2 Ki. 5:12). A 2,000-ft. (625 m.) elevation gives it a delightful climate. Its gardens and olive groves still flourish after millennia of cultivation. Caravan routes from the E, W, and S once crossed in the city, carrying treasures of silks, perfumes, carpets, and foods. It was a rich city whose merchandise was far-famed (Ezek. 27:16).

Damascus and Syria played an important part in biblical history. By the time of ABRAHAM, Damascus was well enough known to be a landmark (Gen. 14:15). En route from Ur, Abraham found in Syria a steward, ELIEZER, who was his heir presumptive until ISAAC came (15:2-3). From the days when Abraham liberated LOT (14:13-16), there were repeated periods of peace and war among his descendants, many of them involving Damascus. Abraham secured a wife for Isaac from Syria, hence Israel is of Syrian ancestry (Gen. 24; Deut. 26:5). JACOB labored long in Syria for RACHEL (Gen. 29).

According to JOSEPHUS, Hadad was the first king. DAVID subjugated and ruled the city for a time (2 Sam. 8:5-6; 1 Chr. 18:3-6). REZON, a deserter, killed King HADADEZER, whom David had defeated, and made himself king. He hated Israel and harassed SOLOMON all his life (1 Ki. 11:23-25). Solomon had made extensive purchases from Syria (10:29). ASA, king of Judah, bribed BEN-HADAD, grandson of Rezon of Syria, to aid him against Israel, paying him with temple treasures (15:16-21). ELIJAH, acting on instructions from God, anointed HAZAEL to be king of Syria and JEHU to rule Israel, to the end that Judah might be punished (19:15-17). In the meantime, Ben-Hadad attacked King Ahab of Israel with a great force, but during a drunken orgy was overwhelmed. Ahab foolishly allowed him to return to his throne (20:1-34). Later, becoming ill, Ben-Hadad sent Hazael to consult Elisha, who made a prophecy that led Hazael to assassinate Ben-Hadad and usurp the throne for which Elijah had anointed him (19:15; 2 Ki. 8:7-15). Hazael overcame AHAZIAH and Joram (2 Ki. 8:28; see JEHORAM), and ravaged the northern tribes (10:32-33; 13:3).

A strong kingdom was developed under Ahab, with merchants in Damascus (1 Ki. 20:34). Syrians defeated Joash (JEHOASH) after he failed in a test before ELISHA (2 Ki. 13:14-22). Ben-Hadad II succeeded Hazael, and Israel recovered her lost possessions (13:24-25). Under JEROBOAM II, Damascus was retaken by Israel (14:28). AHAZ, in order to save his kingdom from Syria, made an alliance with TIGLATH-PILESER (Pul), who destroyed Damascus and ended Syria's power for many decades (16:7-9). The city remained of little importance until 333 B.C., when an army of ALEXANDER THE GREAT captured it. Then followed two centuries of rise and fall. In 63 B.C. Syria became a province of the Roman Empire.

During NT days, Damascus was an important center, ruled by ARABIA under ARETAS (2 Cor. 11:32). A strong Christian community had developed by PAUL's day. It was while en route there to arrest the believers that he was converted (Acts 9:1-18). He escaped his Jewish enemies of the city by being let down from a wall in a basket (9:25; 2 Cor. 11:33). After a checkered history under Rome, Damascus was captured by Muslims in A.D. 635 and made the seat of the Muslim world. It remained the center of the Muslim faith until 1918, when it was put under French mandate after World War I. In 1946 Syria became a free state.

Dan. dan (Heb. dan H1968 and H1969, “judge”; gentilic dānî H1974, “Danites”). The name of a man, of the tribe descended from him, and of a city within the tribe's territory.

The tribal territory of Dan and, farther north, the city of Dan.

(1) Son of JACOB through BILHAH. Jacob's wife RACHEL, unable to bear children (and thus jealous of her sister LEAH, who had already given birth to four sons), gave to Jacob her maid Bilhah as a wife. When the latter bore a son, Rachel said, "God has vindicated [or judged, dîn H1906] me," and so named him Dan (Gen. 30:6). Nothing more is said about Dan except that he had a son named HUSHIM (46:23; apparently the same as SHUHAM in Num. 26:42).

(2) A tribe descended from #1 above. By the time of the EXODUS Dan's offspring had increased to 62,700 men (Num. 1:39). The tribe acted as rear guard during the wilderness wanderings (10:25). After the conquest of Canaan, the Danites were given a fertile area lying between Judah and the Mediterranean Sea. This region, however, was occupied by the PHILISTINES, whose lands extended along the coast from EGYPT to the W of SHECHEM (Josh. 13:3). Failure to conquer Philistia made the Danites move northward, where by strategy they conquered Leshem (Laish of Jdg. 18:29) and renamed it Dan (Josh. 19:47; Jdg. 18:1-29; see #3 below). The heritage of Dan, though small, was productive and, with the acquisition of extra lands, provided for growth. OHOLIAH and SAMSON were Danites (Exod. 31:6; Jdg. 13:2, 24). The Assyrians eventually overran Israel and took many Danites into captivity (1 Chr. 5:26). Little is known of the tribe subsequent to that time.

(3) A city of the northern extremity of ancient Israel, situated on the S base of Mount HERMON close to one of the tributaries of the JORDAN River, the Nahr Leddan. It was commonly used as a symbol of the extent of Israelite territory in the phrase, "from Dan to Beersheba" (Jdg. 20:1, et al.). The mound where the ancient city stood is known in Arabic as Tell el-Qadi (in Hebrew as Tel Dan) and rises about 75 ft. (23 m.) above the grass land roundabout. In ancient Canaanite times it was known as LAISH (Jdg. 18:7; variant LESHEM, Josh. 19:47). It is known that the site was occupied as early as the Bronze Age and probably was inhabited by 3500 B.C. The town was on the trade route to the Syrian coast. After the revolt of JEROBOAM, Dan along with BETHEL became the locations of the two shrines that he set up with golden calves, probably as symbols of BAAL worship (1 Ki. 12:29; see CALF WORSHIP). So ingrained did this cult at the shrines become that even the massacre of Baal worshipers by JEHU did not stamp it out (2 Ki. 10:28-31). Subsequently it was one of the towns taken by the Aramean king BEN-HADAD, in fulfillment of the warning in 10:32: “the LORD began to trim off parts of Israel” (NRSV). Dan was recaptured by Israel under Jeroboam II (14:25), but was again taken by the Assyrian TIGLATH-PILESER III (745-727 B.C.).

dancing. Several Hebrew words describe the joyous, rhythmic movements of the dance, which evidently played a significant part in Israelite life. Dancing has formed a part of religious rites and has been associated with war and hunting, with marriage, birth, and other occasions since human records began to be written. It grew out of three basic motives: the desire to imitate movements of beasts, birds, even the sun and moon; the desire to express emotions by gestures; and gregarious impulses.

Throughout past ages, dancing has been linked with WORSHIP. In sacramental dance worshipers sought to express through bodily movements praise or penitence, worship or prayer. Out of the primitive dances the esthetic dance of civilized ancient nations slowly developed. In these the primary concern of the dancers was to reveal grace, speed, and rhythm, often to appeal to the carnal nature of both participants and spectators. VASHTI refused to expose herself to this end (Esth. 1:12). Priests of all pagan religions cultivated dancing but at times found it the source of dissipation and harm. For ages it has been accompanied by clapping of the hands. Percussion and other noise-making instruments seem to be native to dance (Jdg. 11:34; Ps. 68:25).

The Hebrew people developed their own type of dancing, associated in the main with worship. Basically, it was more like modern religious shouting by individuals, or processions of exuberant groups. Three things characterized it. First, the sexes apparently did not intermingle in it, except where pagan influences had crept in (cf. Exod. 32:19). Second, dancing was usually done by women, with one leading, as in the case of MIRIAM, when a form of antiphonal singing was used (15:20-21; cf. also Jdg. 21:20-23; 1 Sam. 18:6; Ps. 68:25). Third, dancing usually took place out of doors. Men might dance solo, as in the case of DAVID before the ARK OF THE COVENANT (2 Sam. 6:14-16), and in groups, as when Israel celebrated the victory over the AMALEKITES (1 Sam. 30:16). The time for dancing was recognized by the writer of Ecclesiastes (Eccl. 3:4). Job complained against the rich because of their ability to dance (Job 21:11).

Jeremiah bemoaned the tragedy that made singing and dancing out of place (Lam. 5:15). The redemption of Israel was to be celebrated by dancing, both virgins and men and boys having part (Jer. 31:13). The Romans introduced the Greek dance to Palestine. Primitive Christian churches allowed dance, but it soon caused degeneracy and was banned, as is indicated by many of the early Christian writers.

Daniel. dan'yuhl (Heb. dāniyyē l H1975, “God is my judge”; Gk. Daniēl G1248). (1) The second son of DAVID born to him in HEBRON (1 Chr. 3:1). See KILEAB (2 Sam. 3:3).

(2) A descendant of AARON through ITHAMAR and priest of the postexilic period; he was among those who affixed their seals to NEHEMIAH’s covenant (Ezra 8:2; Neh. 10:6).

(3) An important and wise individual whom the prophet EZEKIEL mentions alongside NOAH and JOB (Ezek. 14:14, 20; 28:3). The consonantal Hebrew text (Ketib) in these passages spells the name dn l, possibly pronounced “Danel.” The fact that this figure is associated with ancient patriarchs has led many scholars to link him with a Phoenician king named Danilu who is described in Ugaritic literature (see RAS SHAMRA) as someone revered for his wisdom and upright character. Other scholars prefer to identify him with the biblical Daniel who was a contemporary of Ezekiel (see #4 below).

(4) An exile who is traditionally regarded as the author of the book of Daniel (see DANIEL, BOOK OF). Born into an unidentified family of Judean nobility at the time of JOSIAH’s reformation (621 B.C.), Daniel was among the select, youthful hostages of the first Hebrew deportation, taken to BABYLON by NEBUCHADNEZZAR in 605, the third year of King JEHOIAKIM (Dan. 1:1, 3). The reliability of this date and indeed of the whole account has been questioned by some critics. However, the method of dating used in the book of Daniel simply follows the customary Babylonian practice of numbering the years of a king’s reign after his accession year (contrast Jer. 46:2, which speaks of this date as Jehoiakim’s fourth year). The publication, moreover, of certain Nebuchadnezzar tablets demonstrates that after the Babylonian defeat of Egypt at CARCHEMISH in 605, this king did “conquer the whole area of Hatti” (Syria and Palestine) and “took away the heavy tribute of Hatti to Babylon” just as claimed in Dan. 1:2 (cf. 2 Chr. 36:6-7).

Daniel was assigned the Babylonian name BELTESHAZZAR (Dan. 1:7), which probably means, “[may Bel] protect his life!”—thereby invoking a pagan deity (4:8)—and for three years he and his companions were trained in all the wisdom of the Babylonians (1:4-5). These young men, however, remained true to their ancestral faith, courteously refusing “the royal food and wine” (1:8, tainted with idolatry and contrary to the Levitical purity laws). God rewarded them with unsurpassed learning (1:20), which qualified them as official “wise men” (2:13). On Daniel, moreover, he bestowed the gift of visions and of interpreting dreams (1:17).

Near the close of this second year (602 B.C.), Nebuchadnezzar required his fellow Babylonians, who as the ruling strata in society had assumed the position of priestly diviners (Dan. 2:2), to identify and interpret an undisclosed dream that had troubled him the preceding evening (2:5, 8). The hoax of spiritism and astrology was duly exposed, and when judgment was pronounced on the enchanters, Daniel and his companions were included under the death sentence. But the “God in heaven who reveals mysteries” (2:28; cf. 2:11) answered Daniel’s prayer for illumination (2:18-19). Daniel revealed both the dream, depicting a fourfold image, and its import of four world empires (Babylon, Persia, Greece, and Rome) that would introduce God’s messianic kingdom (2:44). In appreciation, Nebuchadnezzar made Daniel ruler of the province of Babylon and chief over the wise men (2:48).

In the latter years of Nebuchadnezzar’s reign (604-562 B.C.), Daniel’s courage was demonstrated when he interpreted the king’s dream of the fallen tree (Dan. 4:13-27). He tactfully informed his despotic master that for seven “times” pride would reduce him to beast-like madness, and reiterated that “the Most High is sovereign over the kingdoms of men” (4:24-25; cf. its historical fulfillment twelve months later, 4:28-33).

In 552 B.C., after the retirement of King Nabonidus to Arabian Teima and the accession of his son BELSHAZZAR, Daniel was granted his vision of the four great beasts (Dan. 7) that parallels Nebuchadnezzar’s earlier dream of the composite image. Then in 550, at the time of CYRUS’s amalgamation of the Median and Persian states and of the growing eclipse of Babylon, Daniel received the prophecy of the ram and the goat concerning Persia and Greece (8:20-21) down to ANTIOCHUS IV (8:25). On October 12, 539, Cyrus’s general, Gobryas, after having routed the Babylonian armies, occupied the city of Babylon. During the profane revelries of Belshazzar’s court that immediately preceded the end, Daniel was summoned to interpret God’s handwriting on the wall, and the prophet fearlessly condemned the desperate prince (5:22-23). He predicted Medo-Persian victory (5:28), and that very night the citadel fell and Belshazzar was slain.

When Darius the Mede (presumably Gobryas or another official of similar name) was made king of Babylon by Cyrus (Dan. 5:31; 9:1), he at once sought out Daniel as one of his three “administrators” (6:2) because of his excellency, and was considering him for the post of chief administrator (6:3). Daniel’s jealous colleagues, failing to uncover a valid charge of corruption (6:4), proceeded to contrive his downfall through a royal edict prohibiting for thirty days all prayers or petitions, except to Darius himself. Daniel was promptly apprehended in prayer to God; and Darius had no recourse but to cast him into a den of lions, as had been prescribed. God, however, intervened on behalf of his faithful servant (cf. 6:16) and shut the lions' mouths, though they subsequently devoured his accusers when they were condemned to a similar fate. It was in this same first year of Darius, as the seventy years of Babylonian exile drew to a close, that the angel GABRIEL answered Daniel's prayers and confessions with a revelation of the seventy "sevens" (9:24-27). "So Daniel prospered during the reign of Darius" (6:28; cf. 1:21).

The last-known event in the life of Daniel took place in the third year of Cyrus (536 B.C.), when he was granted an overpowering vision of the archangel MICHAEL contending with the demonic powers of pagan society (Dan. 10:10—11:1); of the course of world history, through the persecutions of Antiochus IV (11:2-39); and of the eschatological ANTICHRIST, the resurrections, and God's final judgment (11:40—12:4). The vision concluded with the assurance that though Daniel would go to his grave prior to these events he would yet receive his appointed reward in the consummation (12:13). Thus in his mid-eighties, after completing his inspired autobiography and apocalyptic oracles, he finished his honored course. The book of Daniel presents a timeless demonstration of separation from impurity, of courage against compromise, of efficaciousness in prayer, and of dedication to him whose "kingdom endures from generation to generation" (4:34).

Daniel, Additions to. See APOCRYPHA.

Daniel, Book of. Although it stands as the last of the Major Prophets in the English Bible, this book appears in the Hebrew OT (which consists of the Law, the Prophets, and the Writings) as one of the Writings. For though Christ spoke of Daniel's function as prophetic (Matt. 24:15), his position was that of a governmental official and inspired writer rather than ministering prophet (see Acts 2:29-30). See DANIEL #4.

The first half of the book (Dan. 1-6) consists of six narratives on the life of Daniel and his friends: their education (605-602 B.C.), Daniel's revelation of NEBUCHADNEZZAR's dream-image, the trial by fiery furnace, Daniel's prediction of Nebuchadnezzar's madness, his interpretation of the handwriting on the wall (539, the fall of Babylon), and his ordeal in the lions' den. The second half (chs. 7-12) consists of four apocalyptic visions predicting the course of world history.

The vision recorded in Dan. 7 envisions the rise of four beasts: a lion, bear, leopard, and monster with iron teeth explained as representing successive kings (kingdoms, 7:23). The description parallels that of Nebuchadnezzar's image, with its head, breast, trunk, and iron legs. The first empire must therefore be contemporary BABYLON (2:38). The fourth kingdom is regarded by most conservative scholars as ROME. Between them lie PERSIA and GREECE. The vision further describes the disintegration of Rome into a tenfold balance of power (2:42; 7:24; cf. Rev. 17:12, 16), the eventual rise of ANTICHRIST for an indefinite period of “times” (Dan. 7:8, 25), and his destruction when “one like a son of man” comes with the clouds of heaven (7:13). This figure is understood by most scholars as the MESSIAH because Christ applied this imagery to himself (Matt. 24:30). However, some understand it to symbolize the saints of the Most High (7:18, 22) epitomized in Jesus Christ, the “last Adam” (Mk. 14:62; 1 Cor. 15:45). Some scholars understand the KINGDOM OF GOD, represented by the rock (Dan. 2:34-35; cf. vv. 44-45), to be the CHURCH. Others see it as the eschatological kingdom (the millennium; see ESCHATOLOGY).

Overview of DANIEL

Author: Daniel, a member of the Hebrew nobility who was taken into EXILE and rose to prominence in the Babylonian administration. The narrative of the first six chapters refers to Daniel in the third person without explicit claim of authorship, but the visions in the second part of the book are related in the first person (e.g., “I, Daniel,” Dan. 8:1).

historical setting: The sixth century B.C. in BABYLON and SUSA, though many scholars reject this traditional view and date the book to the Maccabean period (second century B.C.).

Purpose: To encourage the believing community by stressing God’s sovereignty over the oppressive nations of the world and his power to deliver those who trust him.

Contents: Six narratives on the life of Daniel and his friends (Dan. 1-6), followed by four apocalyptic visions predicting God’s victory over evil (chs. 7-12).

Excavated mud-brick remains of Belshazzar's palace, where this king saw the writing on the wall.

The section from Dan. 2:4b to 7:28 is composed in ARAMAIC, the international language of the day. But with ch. 8, Daniel resumes his use of HEBREW, probably because of the more Jewish orientation of the three remaining visions. The ram and the goat depict the coming victory of Greece (331 B.C.) over the amalgamated empire of Media and Persia (8:20-21) and the subsequent persecution of Judah by ANTIOCHUS IV (168-165; 8:9-14, 23-26).

The prophecy of the seventy “sevens” in Dan. 9:20-27 was given in response to Daniel’s prayer concerning the end of JERUSALEM’S desolations (9:16). The prophecy indicated that the suffering would cease at the end of seventy “sevens.” Many scholars understand the designation “seven” to refer to a period of seven years. Sixty-nine “sevens” extend from the decree to rebuild Jerusalem (458 B.C.; cf. Ezra 7:18, 25) to Messiah. Those who do not hold to the future significance of the seventieth “seven” propose that the “cutting off” (9:26) of the Messiah is Christ’s crucifixion in the midst of the seventieth “seven.” Other scholars terminate the sixty-ninth “seven” with Christ’s death and place the seventieth “seven” in the last days. It is in the seventieth “seven” that Antichrist will destroy Jerusalem according to this view. If the pointing of the Masoretic tradition is observed, the first seven “sevens” are separated from the sixty-two, and the seventieth “seven” witnesses either the devastations under Antiochus Epiphanes or the eschatological Antichrist.

The remaining chapters, after elaborating on the succession of Persian and Greek rulers through Antiochus (Dan. 10:1—11:39), move on to “the time of the end,” foretelling Antichrist’s tribulation (11:40—12:1), the resurrections of the saved and the lost (12:2; cf. Rev. 20:4-6, 12), and the final judgment (Dan. 12:2).

The authorship of the Book of Daniel is nowhere expressly defined but is indicated by the autobiographical, first-person composition from Dan. 7:2

onward. Unity of style and content (as admitted by several critical scholars), plus God's commitment of "the book" to Daniel (12:4), imply the latter's authorship, shortly after his last vision, 536 B.C. (10:1). Modern criticism, however, overwhelmingly denies the authenticity of Daniel as a product of the sixth century B.C. Indeed, as early as A.D. 275 the neo-Platonic philosopher Porphyry categorically repudiated the possibility of Daniel's miraculous predictions. Antisupernaturalism must bring the "prophecy" down to a time after the events described (especially after Antiochus's sacrilege of 168 B.C.); or, if the latest possible date has been reached, it must then reinterpret the predictions to apply to other events already accomplished. Consequently, since Daniel was extensively quoted (and misunderstood) as early as 140 B.C. (cf. Sibylline Oracles 3.381-400), rationalists have no alternative but to apply the supposed coming of the Messiah and the fulfillment of the seventy weeks to Maccabean times, rather than Christ's, even though this requires that the author has miscalculated the years involved.

The arguments for a late (Maccabean) date for the book of Daniel may be classed as historical, linguistic, and theological. A number of specific censures have been advanced against Daniel's historical authenticity. These may, however, be dismissed, either as arguments from silence or as answered by recent archaeology. More generally, it is asserted that Daniel conceived of a fictitious Median empire, existing as a separate kingdom between Babylon and Persia (thus allowing Daniel's fourth empire to be identified with Greece rather than Rome, as required by some critical presuppositions). But the very passage adduced (Dan. 5:31—6:1) speaks of unified Medo-Persia (6:8, 12; cf. 7:5; cf. 8:3, 29), while the third beast is described as four-headed, evidently the fourfold Greek empire (7:6; 8:8, 22). Again the fact that the apocryphal book of Ecclesiasticus, written about 180 B.C. (see APOCRYPHA), omits Daniel from its survey of Scripture, proves little other than the prejudice of its writer; for he likewise disregards the book of EZRA, whose high theology parallels that of Daniel. Fragments of Daniel, moreover, have been discovered among the DEAD SEA SCROLLS of Qumran, datable to the very second century B.C. in which the book's fraudulent composition is commonly said to have taken place.

Daniel has been questioned on linguistic grounds as well because it contains several terms of Persian or Greek origin. However, the Greek words are limited to the names of musical instruments, such as "harp" (Dan. 3:5). These words may have been imported to Babylon at an earlier time. Among the apocryphal literature from Qumran, there has been recovered a Prayer of Nabonidus that closely parallels Daniel's record of Nebuchadnezzar's madness (Dan. 4). Far, however, from proving Daniel to be a corruption of this third-century work, the Qumranic legend, though garbled, serves to suggest the essential historicity of Daniel's account. As to the so-called "late" Aramaic and Hebrew languages of Daniel, several specialists have concluded that there is nothing in the material that precludes a sixth-century B.C. authorship by Daniel.

Lastly, the theology of the book, with its APOCALYPTIC eschatology, biblicism, and developed angelology, are said to prohibit exilic origin. Yet Isaiah had composed an apocalypse, describing the RESURRECTION in terms similar to Daniel's, as early as 711 B.C. (Isa. 26:19; even those who deny the authenticity of this passage date it to the exilic period). When Daniel in 538 B.C. devoted himself to the inspired "Scriptures" (Dan. 9:2), the OT canon was complete, except for three minor prophets, the last two books of Psalms, and Chronicles-Esther (see CANONICITY). And Daniel's ANGELS, both in name and in function, stand naturally in the Hebraic religious development. His book was destined to inspire Jewish exiles with confidence in the Most High (4:34-37), and those of God's people today who will approach this book in faith believing will discover in it victorious supernaturalism that overcomes the world.

Danite. See DAN.

Dan Jaan. dan-jay'uhn (Heb. dān yaʿan H1970, meaning uncertain). A locality somewhere between GILEAD and SIDON (2 Sam. 24:6). According to the NIV, David's census takers "went to Gilead and the region of Tahtim Hodshi, and on to Dan Jaan and around toward Sidon." The NRSV emends the MT on the basis of the SEPTUAGINT and translates, "they came to Dan, and from Dan they went around to Sidon." Other emendations have been proposed.

Dannah. dan'uh (Heb. dannâ H1972, possibly "stronghold"). A town of the hill country of Judah, near SOCOH and DEBIR (Josh. 15:49). The exact location is unknown, but it must have been some 8-12 mi. (13-19 km.) SW of HEBRON.

Dara. dair'uh. See DARDA.

Darda. dahr'duh (Heb. darda ᵿ H1997, derivation uncertain). One of the sons of MAHOL who were regarded as wise men (1 Ki. 4:31). The same group of names (plus Zimri) apparently occurs in 1 Chr. 2:6, although most Hebrew MSS here have "Dara" instead of "Darda." This latter text, however, purports to list the children of ZERAH son of JUDAH. The discrepancy is often explained by arguing that Zerah was a remote ancestor. Others believe that the phrase "sons of Mahol” in the Kings passage should be understood as “sons of dance” and thus as the designation of a musical guild serving in the temple. See also E^{THAN}.

daric. dair’ik. A Persian gold coin of great value (1 Chr. 29:7; Ezra 8:27; KJV, “dram”). See MONEY.

Darius. duh-ri’uhs (Heb. doryāweš H2003 [Aram. H10184]). (1) A ruler described as “Darius the Mede” is mentioned only in the Bible (Dan. 5:31; 9:1). His identity is debated. He may have been the same as Gubaru, an officer in CYRUS’s army who became governor of the Persian province of N BABYLON, but the evidence is rather more suited to the view that “Darius the Mede” was an alternative title for Cyrus the Persian himself.

Clay tablet inscribed in Old Persian (Susa, 5th cent. B.C.) and recounting the achievements of Darius the Great (521-486).

(2) Darius I Hytaspes, also known as Darius the Great, was the fourth ruler of the Persian empire (521-486 B.C.) after Cyrus, Cambyses, and Gaumata. The background to his accession was as follows. Cambyses, the son of Cyrus, had continued the conquests started by his father. He did not, however, recognize the claims of the Jews (Jos. Ant. 11.1.2). In one of his campaigns he was defeated by the Egyptians, and on his way home he committed suicide. Taking advantage of the king’s defeat, a pretender named Smerdis was made king by zealots of the Magian religious sect, and he ruled one year until killed by Darius and other princes, Darius having had himself made king. He was of the same family line as Cyrus but not a direct descendant. Cyrus, according to tradition, had selected Darius to succeed him. Between the reign of Cyrus and that of Darius, the Jews had been mistreated, and work on rebuilding JERUSALEM had stopped (Ezra 4:1-6). An appeal was made to Darius who searched and discovered the original decree of Cyrus favoring the Jews. Under his lenient reign, they restored the walls of the city and rebuilt the temple (6:1-15). Darius was beset by rebellious subjects and spent much time in putting them down. He reorganized the government and extended its boundaries. He conducted many magnificent building enterprises and encouraged men of letters, especially the historians who extolled his prowess. The Greeks never yielded to him, however, and after some futile campaigns, his forces were overwhelmed in the battle at Marathon, 490 B.C. Darius planned another campaign against the Greeks, but rebellion in Egypt interfered, and death in 486 ended his career. He was succeeded by XERXES, a grandson of Cyrus the Great.

(3) Darius II Ochus, son of ARTAXERXES I by a Babylonian concubine, became the seventh ruler of the Persian empire (423-404 B.C.). The empire disintegrated at an accelerated pace under his administration, with revolts in Sardis, Media, Cyprus, Cadusia, and Egypt. In the latter case, the Jewish colony at ELEPHANTINE lost their temple (on an island in the Nile of Upper Egypt) and wrote desperate letters to Jerusalem and Samaria for help, all in vain. It was probably during the reign of Darius II that NEHEMIAH went to Jerusalem the second time and found that many abuses had arisen (Neh. 13:6-11; cf. 12:22), although some have argued that the ruler in view here is Darius III Codomannus (335-331 B.C.), the last king of the Persian empire, defeated by ALEXANDER THE GREAT.

darkness. This word first appears in Scripture as a description of the chaotic condition of the world before God created LIGHT (Gen. 1:2-3). The subsequent division between light and darkness resulted in “day” and “night.” Darkness has a certain reality, being more than the absence of light (Isa. 45:7). Beyond its literal sense, the word is used metaphorically in association with various concepts: (1) mystery (Exod. 20:21; 2 Sam. 22:10; 1 Ki. 8:12; Ps. 97:2; Isa. 8:22; Matt. 10:27); (2) ignorance, especially about God (Job 37:19; Prov. 2:13; Eccl. 2:14; Jn. 12:35; 1 Thess. 5:1-8); (3) the seat of evil (Prov. 4:19; Matt. 6:23; Lk. 11:34; 22:53; Jn. 8:12; Rom. 13:12; 1 Cor. 4:5; Eph. 5:11); (4) supernatural events (Gen. 15:12; Exod. 10:21; Matt. 27:45; Rev. 8:12; 16:10); (5) the Lord’s return (Isa. 60:2; Joel 2:2; Amos 5:8; Matt. 24:29); (6) eternal punishment (Matt. 22:13; 2 Pet. 2:4, 17; Jude 6-7; cf. Job 2:1-5; 20:20); (7) spiritual blindness (Isa. 9:2; Jn. 1:5; Eph. 5:8; 1 Jn. 1:5; 2:8); (8) sorrow and distress (Isa. 8:22; 13:10; Ps. 23:4). Darkness, however, never holds sway where the Redeemer has come to shed his light (Col. 1:13).

Darkon. dahr´kon (Heb. darqôn H2010, meaning disputed). Ancestor of a group of “Solomon’s servants” who returned from BABYLON with ZERUBBABEL and his associates (Ezra 2:56; Neh. 7:58).

dart. See ARMS AND ARMOR.

dates. See PLANTS (under palm).

Dathan. day´thuhn (Heb. dātān H2018, possibly “strong, warlike”). Son of Eliab and descendant of REUBEN. With his brother ABIRAM and another Reubenite, he joined the Levite KORAH in leading a rebellion of 250 chosen men against the leadership of MOSES and AARON (Num. 16:1, 12, 24-25, 27; 26:9). Moses specifically summoned Dathan and Abiram, but they refused to come. The next morning the glory of the Lord appeared to them all, the ground split apart, “and the earth opened its mouth and swallowed” the rebels and their families (16:31-32). Later Moses reminded Israel of this discipline of the Lord (Deut. 11:6; cf. also Ps. 106:17; Sir. 45:18; 4 Macc. 2:17).

daughter. In addition to the sense of “[direct] female offspring,” the Hebrew term bat H1426 can be used irrespective of age for a proximate circle of female relatives. See FAMILY. The word can also be applied to classes of females (e.g., “daughters [NIV, women] of Zion,” Isa. 3:16 et al.), but this use is considerably less common than the construction “son/sons of,” which can indicate a wide variety of relationships. See BEN (PREFIX AND IDIOM). The word is compounded in some names: BATH RABBIM (daughter of a multitude), BATHSHEBA (daughter of an oath), BATH-SHUA (daughter of abundance?). There are also many figurative uses, such as “village” (Num. 21:25 et al.), “[beloved] offspring” in general (Isa. 22:4; Jer. 9:1), “city inhabitants” (Zech 9:9), and so forth.

David. day´vid (Heb. dāwid H1858, possibly related to dôd H1856, “beloved”). Son of JESSE of BETHLEHEM and second king of Israel (1 Sam. 16—1 Ki. 2:11; 1 Chr. 11-29). David ranks with MOSES as one of the most commanding figures in the OT. Born about 1040 B.C., he was the youngest son of Jesse of Bethlehem (1 Sam. 16:10-11), and developed in strength, courage, and attractiveness while caring for his father’s sheep (16:12; 17:34-36). When God rejected SAUL, the prophet SAMUEL sought out David and secretly anointed him as Israel’s next king; and God’s Spirit came upon David from that time on (16:13). Saul, meanwhile, summoned David to periodic appearances at court to soothe his own troubled mind by skillful harp-playing (16:18; 17:15). While still in his teens, David gained national renown and the friendship of Saul's son JONATHAN (18:1-3; cf. 20:12-16; 23:16-17) through his faith-inspired victory over the taunting PHILISTINE champion GOLIATH (17:45-47). Saul's growing jealousy and four insidious attempts on David's life served only to increase the latter's popularity (cf. 18:13-16, 27). At length, urged on by David's rivals (cf. Ps. 59:12), Saul openly sought his destruction; and though frustrated by Samuel and the priests at NOB, he did succeed in driving David into exile (1 Sam. 19:11; 21:10).

David fled to the Philistine city of GATH, but his motives became suspect. Only by a stratagem and by the grace of God (1 Sam. 21:12; Ps. 56:3; 34:6-8) did he reach the wilderness cave of ADULLAM in Judah (Ps. 142:6). Here David was joined by a variety of people who were unhappy with conditions under Saul (1 Sam. 22:2), and also by the priest ABIATHAR, who had escaped Saul's retaliatory attack upon Nob (cf. Ps. 52:1). On three separate occasions Saul attempted to seize David: when fellow-Judeans from ZIPH betrayed his presence, after his deliverance of KEILAH (1 Sam. 23; Ps. 54:3); at the cave of EN GEDI by the Dead Sea where Saul was caught in his own trap (1 Sam. 24; Ps. 7:4; 57:6); and on David's return to Ziphite territory, when he again spared his pursuer's life (1 Sam. 26). Near the end of 1012 B.C., however (27:7), David in despair sought asylum in Gath, feigning vassalage (27:8—28:25).

Hearing of the death of Saul at Mount GILBOA in 1010 B.C. and the Philistine domination of Israel from BETH SHAN, David composed his moving lament of "The Bow" (2 Sam. 1:19-27). Shortly thereafter, David's forces advanced inland to HEBRON, where he was declared king over JUDAH. His appeal, however, to the northern and eastern tribes elicited no response (2:7); and for five years most of Israel lay under Philistine control.

In 1005 B.C. ABNER enthroned Saul's son ISH-BOSHETH, but in the conflict that followed David's arms gained ascendancy. Abner himself eventually transferred his support to David, only to be treacherously murdered by the vengeful commander JOAB (2 Sam. 3). Only after the death of Ish-Bosheth (ch. 4) did all Israel acclaim David king in 1003 (2 Sam. 5:1-5; 1 Chr. 11:10; 12:38).

Realizing that their "vassal" had gotten out of hand, the Philistines undertook an all-out attack on reunited Israel. David, however, after an initial retreat to Adullam (2 Sam. 5:17; 23:13-17), expelled the enemy in two divinely directed campaigns (5:18-25). He next established a new capital by capturing the JEBUSITE stronghold of JERUSALEM. This strategic site on the Benjamite border served not only as an incomparable fortress, but also as a neutral location between the rival tribes of N and S. David then constructed MILLO, a fortification that "filled up" Jerusalem's breached northern wall. Joab, for his bravery, was appointed commander (1 Chr. 11:6). Twelve corps of militia were organized under him, each with 24,000 men, on periods of one-month duty annually (ch. 27). David's military organization also included the professional KERETHITES and PELETHITES (Cretans and Philistines) and certain elite groups: "the six hundred" mighty men (2 Sam. 15:18; cf. 1 Sam. 27:2), "the thirty" heroes, and "the three" most distinguished (2 Sam. 23; 1 Chr. 11).

The "House of David Inscription" discovered in 1994 at Tel Dan (basalt stela, 9th cent. B.C.). This unique monument, written in Aramaic, is part of a victory stela erected by an Aramean king (presumably Hazael) in which he, according to the usual interpretation of the text, claims to have killed Joram son of Ahab, king of Israel, and Ahaziah son of Jehoram, of the "House of David" (apparently the earliest extrabiblical occurrence of this expression).

David also elevated Jerusalem into his religious capital by installing the ARK OF THE COVENANT in a tent on ZION (2 Sam. 6; cf. Ps. 24). He honored it, both with a dedicatory psalm (1 Chr. 16, from Ps. 96; 105; 106) and with a permanent ministry of Levitical singers under ASAPH (1 Chr. 16:5, 37, 42; 25:1-31). Eventually David organized 38,000 Levites under hereditary leaders, appointing them as doorkeepers, treasurers, or even district judges (chs. 23-26). The Aaronic priests he divided into twenty-four rotating courses, which were continued into NT times (1 Chr. 24:10; Lk. 1:5).

From approximately 1002 to 995 B.C. David expanded his kingdom on all sides: W against the Philistines, taking Gath, one of its five ruling cities (2 Sam. 8:1); E against MOAB, (8:2); N against SYRIA, in two campaigns to the EUPHRATES River (10:13, 18; cf. 8:3); and S against stubborn EDOM (1 Ki. 11:15; Ps. 60:10). An alliance with HIRAM of TYRE enabled David to construct a palace in Jerusalem (2 Sam. 5:11). David's political organization shows analogies with Egypt's, his "cabinet" (8:15-18) including such officers as the recorder (public relations official), the scribe (secretary of state), and other later additions (20:23-26).

Over all, however, whether tribal princes (1 Chr. 27:16-24) or royal officials (27:25-31), David reigned supreme.

Rest from war followed (2 Sam. 7:1; 22:1-51; Ps. 18), and David proposed a permanent TEMPLE for the Lord in Jerusalem. But while the prophet NATHAN denied David the privilege of building God's house (because of excessive bloodshed, 1 Chr. 22:8; 28:3), he revealed that God would build David's "house," raising up his son to construct the temple (2 Sam. 7:13a) and establishing his dynasty (7:13b). This "Davidic covenant" (Ps. 89:3; 132:12) mediates salvation for all (Isa. 55:3; Rev. 22:16), climaxing God's promises begun in Gen. 3:15 and accomplished in the new testament of Jesus Christ. God's Spirit then inspired David to compose messianic psalms, depicting the deity of the Lord's anointed Son (Ps. 2), his eternal priesthood (Ps. 110), his atoning death (Ps. 22), and his resurrection, ascension, and coming kingdom (Ps. 2; 16; 68). Some of David's greatest achievements lie in this literary sphere. Of the 150 canonical psalms, 73 possess titles asserting Davidic authorship. These references, moreover, appear in the oldest MSS and warrant full acceptance. David also composed some of the titleless psalms (cf. Ps. 2; 95; cf. Acts 4:25; Heb. 4:7) and stimulated Asaph and his associates to the inscripturation of others. One of the world's best-loved compositions is David's heart-affirmation, "The Lord is my shepherd" (Ps. 23).

Yet soon after this, David lapsed into a series of failures. He killed seven innocent descendants of Saul (but not MEPHIBOSHETH, 2 Sam. 21:7) to enforce a promise rashly made to pagan Gibeonites (contrast Num. 35:33). He committed adultery with BATHSHEBA and murdered her husband to conceal his crime (2 Sam. 10-11). When exposed by Nathan, he humbly confessed his sin (Ps. 32; 51); but the testimony of God's people had suffered compromise, and Nathan condemned the king to corresponding punishments (2 Sam. 12:10-14). David also became guilty of ineffective control over his sons. Thus in about 990 B.C. AMNON, following his father's shameful example, raped his sister TAMAR (13:1-14); and two years later ABSALOM avenged Tamar by murdering Amnon (13:23-29). Until about 983 (13:38; 14:28) David shunned Absalom's presence; and four years later (15:7 [KJV, "forty"]) Absalom revolted, driving his father from Jerusalem (cf. Ps. 3; 63) and specifically fulfilling Nathan's curses (2 Sam. 16:20-22). Through fatal delay, Absalom was defeated and killed by Joab, though only the latter's stern rebuke could shake David from irresponsible grief over the death of his son (18:33-19:8). Even after David's restoration to Jerusalem, intertribal jealousies led SHEBA of Benjamin to prolong the disorder (ch. 20).

David's last years (975-970 B.C.) were occupied with Philistine wars (2 Sam. 21:15-22) and with a military census, motivated by David's pride in his armed forces (24:3, 9; Ps. 30:6). Plague resulted. But when the destroying angel halted at ARAUNAH's threshing floor on Mount MORIAH, just N of Jerusalem (2 Chr. 3:1), this area became marked as David's place of sacrifice and the very house of God (1 Chr. 22:1; Ps. 30 title). David subsequently undertook massive preparations for the temple (1 Chr. 22); he received in writing from God's Spirit the plans for its construction (28:12, 19); and he solemnly charged Solomon and the princes with their execution (chs. 22; 28; 29). As David became increasingly incapacitated by age, his oldest surviving son, ADONIJAH, attempted to usurp the throne from Solomon, the divinely designated heir. Nathan, however, aroused David to proclaim Solomon's coronation (1 Ki. 1). Thus in 970, after a final charge to his son (2:2-9), David died. His last words were a prophecy of the future Davidic MESSIAH and of his own salvation, springing from this COVENANT (2 Sam. 23:5).

dawn. This English term, as a noun or a verb, can be used to render several words and expressions, especially Hebrew šahar H8840 (e.g., Job 38:12; KJV, "dayspring"). Some believe this word refers to the AMORITE god Shahr. The light of dawn can be a symbol for truthfulness and discernment (Isa. 8:19-20). The Greek term anatolē G424 ("rising"), rendered "dawn" by the NRSV in Lk. 1:78, is a figurative reference to the coming of MESSIAH.

day. A word often misinterpreted because of its various uses in the Bible. It often denotes the period of time from sunrise to sunset (Gen. 1:5; Ps. 74:16). At an early date it was divided into three parts—morning, noon, and evening (Ps. 55:17; Dan. 6:10). Probably due to Medo-Persian influence after the EXILE, it was divided into twelve hours (Jn. 11:9). Early morning was the first hour; the sixth hour was noon. Time could not be determined by clocks, so the length of an hour depended on the time of the year. The word also refers to time in general (Jdg. 18:30; Job 18:20; Obad. 12). It is also used figuratively, referring to the day of judgment (Isa. 2:12; Joel 1:15; Amos 5:18; Rom. 13:12), the length of life (Gen. 5:4), and the time of opportunity (Jn. 9:4).

Day of Atonement. See ATONEMENT, DAY OF.

Day of Christ. A phrase used by PAUL to indicate Jesus' eschatological intervention in human history (Phil. 1:6, 10). Sometimes it is called "the day of the [or our] Lord Jesus [Christ]" (1 Cor. 1:8; 2 Cor. 1:14) or simply "that day" (Matt. 7:22) or "the Day" (1 Cor. 3:13). See ESCHATOLOGY; DAY OF THE LORD.

day of the Lord. An eschatological term referring to the consummation of the KINGDOM OF GOD, the triumph over his foes, and the deliverance of his people. It begins at the second coming of Christ and will include the final judgment. It will remove class distinction (Isa. 2:12-21), abolish sins (2 Pet. 3:11-13), and will be accompanied by social calamities and physical cataclysms (Matt. 24; Lk. 21:7-33). It will include the millennial judgment (Rev. 4:1—19:6) and culminate in the new heaven and the new earth (Isa. 65:17; 66:22; Rev. 21:1; cf. also 1 Cor. 1:8; 5:5; 2 Cor. 1:14; Phil. 1:6, 10; 2:16; 1 Thess. 5:2; 2 Thess. 2:2). See ESCHATOLOGY.

day's journey, day's walk. The distance that a person can normally travel in one day. It would necessarily vary with the terrain and the method of travel—whether on foot, with an animal, with a caravan; also whether the journey was made in leisure or in haste. The Greek historian Herodotus in one place says that he reckons a day's journey at 25 mi. (40 km.), but in another at 18 mi. (29 km.; see Histories 4.101; 5.53). The Bible makes mention of a day's journey (Num. 11:31; 1 Ki. 19:4; Jon. 3:4; Lk. 2:44); of a three days' journey (Gen. 30:36; Exod. 3:18; 5:3; 8:27; Num. 10:33; Jon 3:3); and of a seven days' journey (Gen. 31:23; 2 Ki. 3:9). It is said that LABAN and his relatives pursued JACOB from HARAN to GILEAD, a distance of 350 mi. (560 km.), in seven days, or an average of 50 mi. (80 km.) a day (Gen. 31:23), but they would have been riding camels.

daysman. This archaic term, referring to someone appointed to serve as arbiter (on a day fixed for trial), is used by the KJV in one passage where JOB expresses the longing for someone to mediate the conflict between God and himself (Job 9:33; NRSV, "umpire"; NIV, "someone to arbitrate"; cf. the use of the same Heb. term in Isa. 29:21 et al.). That longing of the human heart was fulfilled in the INCARNATION. See also MEDIATOR.

deacon, deaconess. The Greek noun diakonos G1356 was a common term for “servant, assistant, messenger.” It and its cognates are used with reference to table waiters (Lk. 22:26-27; Jn. 2:5, 9), royal servants (Matt. 22:13), service or ministry in general (Mk. 10:43-45 [Jesus]; Acts 1:17, 25 [apostles]; Rom. 11:13 [Paul]), and local Christian leaders, possibly an official title (Phil. 1:1; 1 Tim. 3:8, 12-13). In Rom. 13:4 the word is applied to secular rulers.

The diaconate as a CHURCH office is inferred from Acts 6:1-2, which says that some of the widows were not receiving the daily diakonia G1355 (NIV, “the daily distribution of food”) and that the apostles believed it was not proper to set aside the preaching of the word of God in order to serve tables (verb diakoneō G1354). Thus seven men were chosen to meet the latter responsibility, though it should be noted that they are not specifically called “deacons” and that at least two of them, STEPHEN and PHILIP, also functioned as evangelists. At some point in the development of the church, however, deacons came to be recognized as church officers. Qualifications given in 1 Tim. 3 show that they were not considered ordinary lay members of the church. Paul’s mention of deacons in connection with BISHOPS or “overseers” (Phil. 1:1) supports the view. The same Greek word is used of Phoebe in Rom. 16:1, but its meaning here is disputed: should it be understood in a general sense and rendered “servant” (KJV, NIV), or officially in the sense of “deacon” (TNIV, NRSV), or more specifically of a separate office, “deaconess” (RSV)? See discussion under P_{HOEBE}.

Dead Sea. An intensely saline lake occupying the S end of the JORDAN Valley, called in Scripture the Salt Sea (Gen. 14:3; Num. 34:3, 12; Deut. 3:17; Josh. 3:16; 15:2, 5; 18:19), the Sea of the Arabah (Deut. 3:17; 4:49; Josh. 3:16; 2 Ki. 14:25), and “the eastern sea” (Ezek. 47:18; Joel 2:20). It has the earth’s lowest surface, 1,290 ft. (393 m.) below sea level. Occupying a geologic fault that extends from SYRIA through the RED SEA into AFRICA, it is 47 mi. (75 km.) long and covers approximately 300 sq. mi. (780 sq. km.). Cliffs rise 1,500-2,500 ft. (460-760 m.) on either shore. North of the Lisan or “Tongue” peninsula, the water’s depth attains 1,300 ft. (400 m.), though southward it averages less than 10 ft. (3 m.). The lake is slowly expanding, as the muddy Jordan extends its northern delta. Salt concentration reaches 25 percent, four times that of ocean water. Magnesium bromide prevents organic life; the climate is arid, and the heat extreme.

Though man’s historical access to the Dead Sea has been slight, five streams S of the Lisan recommended this area to LOT as a “well-watered...garden” (Gen.

13:10). Yet the text later explains that the plain, known as the Valley of SIDDIM, was the same as the Salt Sea (14:3), a fact suggested by the known growth of the lake (once crossable at the Lisan), by his mention of “tar pits” (14:10) now active on the Sea’s floor (cf. JOSEPHUS’s name for it, “Lake Asphaltites,” Ant. 1.9.1), and by contemporaneous ruins discovered on the Lisan. God’s destruction of SODOM may thus reflect the area’s combustibleness (Gen. 19:24, 28); and Jebel Usdum, “mountain of Sodom,” still identifies an extensive rock-salt formation opposite ZOAR (cf. Gen. 19:26; Lk. 17:32).

Looking E across the Dead Sea towards the mountains of Moab (modern Kingdom of Jordan).

The Dead Sea constituted Israel’s eastern border (Num. 34:12; Ezek. 47:18), although some of the tribes occupied parts of TRANSJORDAN. At EN GEDI, which terminates the principal descent from Judah, a spring provided refuge for DAVID (1 Sam. 24:1). The Valley of Salt, S of the Dead Sea, witnessed the victories of David and of AMAZIAH over EDM (2 Ki. 14:7; 1 Chr. 18:12) and countermarches in the days of JEHOSHAPHAT (2 Ki. 3:8-9; 2 Chr. 20:1-2). On the E shore above the ARNON River, the springs of Callirrhoe served HEROD the Great during his final illness; and at MACHAERUS his son Herod Antipas imprisoned JOHN THE BAPTIST (Mk. 1:14; 6:17). On the W shore, above En Gedi, lies Khirbet Qumran, site of the community that preserved the DEAD SEA SCROLLS; and opposite Lisan rises Masada, Palestine’s finest natural fortress, the refuge of Herod against Parthians in 42 B.C., and the last stand of Jerusalem’s zealots in A.D. 70 (Jos. War 7.10.1). In modern times the Dead Sea has produced potash; but Ezekiel predicts a healing of its waters, granting abundant life in God’s kingdom age (Ezek. 47:8-10).

Dead Sea Scrolls. The popular name given to a collection of manuscripts belonging originally to an ancient religious community living at a place now known as Khirbet Qumran, a short distance from the NW corner of the DEAD SEA (a copious spring of fresh water called ʿAin Feshkha is nearby). In the larger sense the designation Dead Sea Scrolls refers to all of the MSS found in numerous unrelated sites in the Judean desert in the area immediately surrounding the Dead Sea. The DSS were first discovered, probably in A.D. 1947, by a bedouin. They were seen by several scholars in the latter part of 1947, some of whom have admitted that they passed them up as forgeries. One of the scholars who recognized the antiquity of the scrolls was Eleazar L. Sukenik of the Hebrew University of Jerusalem, who was subsequently successful in purchasing some of them. Other scrolls were taken to the American School of Oriental Research in Jerusalem, where the acting director, John C. Trever, was convinced of their value and arranged to photograph the portions that were brought to him. One of his photographs was sent to William F. Albright, who promptly declared that this was “the most important discovery ever made in OT MSS.”

Qumran Cave 1, where the first of the Dead Sea Scrolls were discovered.

The scrolls that were purchased by the Hebrew University included the Hebrew University Isaiah Scroll (1QIsab), also known as the Second Isaiah Scroll, a fragmentary MS; the War of the Sons of Light against the Sons of Darkness (1QM); and the Thanksgiving Hymns, or Hodayot (1QH). The scrolls purchased by the Syrian archbishop and published by the American Schools of Oriental Research included the St. Mark's Isaiah Scroll (1QIsa^a), better known as the First or Great Isaiah Scroll, which is complete; the Habakkuk Commentary (1QpHab) which contains the text of Hab. 1-2 with a running commentary; and the Manual of Discipline (1QS), which contains the rules for the members of the Qumran community. The DSS have subsequently come into the possession of the State of Israel; they have been published in numerous editions and translated into many languages, and are readily available for anyone who wishes to study them either in translation or in facsimile.

Following the discovery of these important scrolls, which are now all but unanimously accepted as having come from the last century B.C. and the first century A.D., the region from which they came was systematically explored. Numerous caves were found, and so far eleven caves have yielded materials from the same period as the original scrolls. Most of these materials have come from the fourth cave explored (known as cave 4 or 4Q); others of special significance come from caves 2, 5, 6, and 11.

Hundreds of MSS are represented by the fragments of cave 4 alone, about a hundred of which are biblical documents. These include fragments of every book of the Hebrew Bible except Esther. Some of the books, especially Deuteronomy, Isaiah, and Psalms, are represented in many copies. Numerous important biblical MSS have also been discovered in cave 11. In addition, fragments of deuterocanonical writings have been found, specifically Tobit and Ecclesiasticus, as well as fragments of several noncanonical writings (see APOCRYPHA; PSEUDEPIGRAPHA). Some of these latter were already known, such as Jubilees, 1 Enoch, and the Testament of Levi; others were not previously known, such as the peculiarly Qumranian documents: the Thanksgiving Hymns, the War of the Sons of Light against the Sons of Darkness, and the commentaries on portions of Scripture. These last give us insights into the nature and beliefs of the community at Qumran.

Near the cliffs on an alluvial plateau overlooking the shore of the Dead Sea is the site of an ancient building complex often referred to as the "Monastery." This was thoroughly excavated over several seasons and has yielded important data about the nature, size, and date of the Qumran community. From coins found there, together with other remains, the community has been dated within the limits of 140 B.C. and A.D. 67. The members were almost all male, although the literature contains provisions for the admission of women and children. The number of people living there at any one time was in the neighborhood of 200 to 400 hundred. At nearby Ain Feshkha the remains of other buildings were found, the nature of which is not exactly clear. The fresh water of the spring probably was used for the growing of crops and other needs of the community.

From the sect's literature we know that the people of Qumran were Jews who had split off from the Jerusalem (or main) stream of Judaism, and indeed were quite critical of and even hostile toward the priests at Jerusalem. The fact that they used the name "The Sons of Zadok" has suggested to some scholars that they should be connected with the Zadokites or SADDUCEES; other scholars believe that they are rather to be identified with the ESSENES, a third sect of Judaism described by JOSEPHUS and PHILO. It is quite possible that elements of truth are to be found in both of these theories and that there was originally a split in the priestly or Sadducean line that first joined the movement known as the Hasidim, the forerunners of the PHARISEES, ultimately to split again and form a narrow separatist group, part of which located at Qumran. We must await further discoveries before we attempt to give a final answer to this entire problem.

The community devoted itself to the study of the Bible. The life of the community was largely ascetic, and their practices included ritual bathing, sometimes referred to as baptism. This has been understood by some to be the origin of the baptism of John the Baptist. A study of John's baptism alongside that of the Qumranians shows, however, that the two practices were quite distinct: hence, even if John was associated with this community (an unproven theory), he must have developed important distinctions in his own doctrine and practice of baptism.

Some scholars believe that Zoroastrian elements from PERSIA are to be found in the Qumran writings, particularly with reference to dualism and angelology. The problem is extremely complex. Zoroastrian dualism developed greatly in post-Christian times, and therefore it is precarious to assume that the Zoroastrian beliefs as we know them represent the beliefs a century or two before the time of Christ.

The Community Rule (1QS) from Qumran is also referred to as the Manual of Discipline. Shown here is the sixth column (out of eleven).

The discoveries of Qumran are important for biblical studies in general. The matter of CANONICITY is not necessarily affected, since the community there was a schismatic group in the first place; and, moreover, the absence of Esther does not necessarily imply that they rejected this book from the canon. In the matter of the text of the OT, however, the DSS are of great importance. The text of the Greek OT (the SEPTUAGINT or LXX), as well as the quotations of the OT in the NT, indicate that there were other textual forms besides the one that has come down to us (the Masoretic Text or MT). The study of surviving documents suggests that at the time of the production of the DSS (i.e., about the time of the production of the Scriptures used by the NT authors) there were at least three textual forms in existence: one we might call the ancestor of the MT; the second was a text closely related to that used by the translators of the LXX; the third was a text differing from both of these other texts. The differences are usually minor, but for careful textual study of the OT it is important that we free ourselves from the notion that the MT is the only authentic text. As a matter of fact, the quotations of the OT found in the NT rather imply that it was not the MT that was most commonly in use by NT authors. These statements should be qualified by pointing out that the quality of the text varies from book to book in the OT, and that there is much more uniformity in the text of the PENTATEUCH than in some of the other portions of the Hebrew Bible. The DSS have particularly made great contributions to the study of the text of Samuel (see SAMUEL, BOOKS OF). See also TEXT AND VERSIONS (OT).

In relation to the NT, the DSS are likewise of importance. There are no NT texts among the DSS, obviously, since the earliest book of the NT were written only very shortly before the destruction of the Qumran community. Moreover, there was no reason why any of the NT writings should have reached Qumran. On the other hand, there are certain references and presuppositions found in the NT, particularly in the preaching of John the Baptist and Jesus Christ and in the writings of Paul and John, that are placed against a background now recognizably similar to that furnished by the documents from Qumran. Thus, for example, the fourth Gospel was formerly thought by many to be non-Palestinian in character, but now its alleged Greek Hellenistic features are attested in the DSS material.

A great deal has been written concerning the relationship of Jesus Christ to the Qumran community. There is no evidence in the Qumran documents that Jesus was a member of the sect, and nothing in the NT supports such a view. Rather, the outlook of Jesus with reference to the world and particularly toward his own people is diametrically opposite that of Qumran, and it can be safely asserted that he was not a member of that group at any time. He may have had some disciples who had come out of that background, particularly those who were formerly disciples of John the Baptist—though this is far from proven. The attempt to show that the Qumran Teacher of Righteousness was the pattern for the gospel portrayal of Jesus cannot be established on the basis of the DSS. The Teacher of Righteousness was a man with high ideals who apparently died young; there is, however, no clear statement that he was put to death, and certainly no indication that he was crucified or rose from the dead or that the Qumranians expected him to return. The difference between Jesus and the Teacher of Righteousness stands out clearly at several points: the Teacher of Righteousness was never referred to as the Son of God or God come in the flesh; his death was not sacrificial in its nature; the sacramental meal (if such it was indeed) was not viewed as a memorial of his death or a pledge of his return in any way connected with the forgiveness of sin. Obviously in the case of Jesus Christ, all of these things are clearly asserted, not once but repeatedly in the NT, and indeed form a necessary basis without which there is no Christian faith.

death. Both the OT and NT present death as an event belonging to our sinful existence, but also in relation to the living God as Creator and Redeemer. Death means the end of a human LIFE on earth—man is made from dust and to dust he returns (Gen. 3:19). To ponder this may cause a sense of separation from God (e.g., Ps. 6:5; 30:9; 88:5); but as death is faced the believer recognizes that total confidence should be placed in the Lord (Job 19:25-26; Ps. 73:23-24; 139:8). The hope of bodily RESURRECTION after death leading into life everlasting, which gradually emerges in the OT (Isa. 26:19; Dan. 12:2), is given prominence in the NT (esp. 1 Cor. 15).

In the NT, especially in PAUL's letters, there is teaching on the cause of death; but this is death understood theologically, not biologically—not merely the end of physical existence on earth, but also the absence of a spiritual communion with God. (This understanding of death is also found in the OT; cf. Deut. 30:15; Jer. 21:8; Ezek. 18:21-22, 31-32.) Paul declares that “the wages of sin is death” (Rom. 6:23) and “sin entered the world through one man, and death through sin” (5:12); thus he exclaims, “Who will rescue me from this body of death?” (7:24). In similar vein another writer declares that it is the devil who, in this age on this fallen earth, has power over death—until Christ takes it from him (Heb. 2:15). Thus it is not surprising that the death of Jesus for the sins of the world is greatly emphasized as is also his victory over death in bodily resurrection. As Representative and Substitute Man, Jesus tastes death for every human being so that those who believe in him and are united to him have passed from death (separation from God) into life (that triumphs over physical death). Thus the Christian can say, “Whether we live or die, we belong to the Lord” (Rom. 14:8).

The book of Revelation contains the expression “the second death” (Rev. 20:6, 14; 21:8); it is defined in symbolic terms as “the fiery lake of burning sulfur” (21:8) and is the opposite of “the crown of life” (2:10-11). It will be experienced by those whose names are not written in the Lamb's “book of life” (20:15) and means everlasting separation from God and his redeemed people.

Debir (person). deeˈbuhr (Heb. dēbîr H1809, derivation uncertain). King of EGLON, identified as a member of the confederacy of five AMORITE rulers who opposed the town of GIBEON at the invitation of ADONI-ZEDEK, king of Jerusalem. The Gibeonites appealed to JOSHUA, and he and his army fought the Amorites in the Valley of AIJALON, where the sun stood still. The five kings fled to a cave in MAKKEDAH, but they were captured and executed (Josh. 10:1-28).

Debir (place). deeˈbuhr (Heb. dēbîr H1810, possibly “back room [of a shrine]”). (1) The more frequently mentioned Debir was located in the hill country of the SHEPHELAH to the W of Jerusalem; now generally identified with modern Khirbet Rabud (8.5 mi./14 km. SSW of HEBRON). The town’s original name was Kiriath Sepher (“city of writing,” Josh. 15:15), and possibly it was also known as Kiriath Sannah (v. 49, but this form may be a textual corruption). The history of the town is woven throughout the narrative of the conquest and settlement of Canaan. It is first mentioned as a Canaanite royal town whose inhabitants, the ANAKITES, were destroyed by JOSHUA (10:38; 11:21; 12:13). The particular force involved was that under the command of CALEB (15:15-17; Jdg. 1:11-15).

(2) A town or settlement near the Valley of ACHOR on the N boundary of the tribe of JUDAH (Josh. 15:7). Its precise location is unknown.

(3) A town in GILEAD located near the Jordan, within the territory of the tribe of GAD (Josh. 13:26). Its location is unknown. However, the Hebrew can be rendered “to the border of Lidbir” (so NJPS; cf. NRSV mg., “Lidebir”), and many scholars revocalize the name to read LO DEBAR (some believe that Lidbir or Lidebir is the original name of Lo Debar).

Deborah. debˈuh-ruh (Heb. dēbôrāh H1806, “honey-bee”). (1) The nurse of REBEKAH, wife of ISAAC; she was buried under an oak at BETHEL, and the place was then named ALLON BACUTH, “The Oak of Weeping” (Gen. 35:8; cf. 24:59).

(2) The fourth and greatest (with GIDEON) of Israel’s judges, identified as a prophetess and as wife of LAPPIDOTH (Jdg. 4-5). She resided near the border of Benjamin and Ephraim, probably belonging to the latter tribe, and administered justice “under the Palm of Deborah” (4:5). Like most Hebrew “judges,” however, Deborah served primarily as a divinely appointed deliverer and executive leader of Israel.

After the death of the previous judge, EHUD, God’s people had lapsed into apostasy, resulting in their subjection to the Canaanite king, JABIN II of HAZOR. Jabin’s commander, SISERA, “had nine hundred iron chariots and had cruelly oppressed the Israelites for twenty years” (Jdg. 4:2-3). This period coincides with the unrest that followed the HITTITE collapse and the death of Egypt’s RAMSES II, the treaties between which had preserved order in Palestine for eighty years (cf. 3:30). Ramses’s successor, however, was the elderly Merneptah. Despite his claim to have pacified both Canaanites and Israelites, disorder became rampant: “The roads were abandoned...and not a shield or spear was seen...in Israel” (5:6-8).

Then arose Deborah, “a mother in Israel” (Jdg. 5:7). Summoning BARAK of Naphtali, she prophesied that an offensive from Mount TABOR at the NE limit of ESDRAELON would lure Sisera and Jabin’s army to annihilation on the plains below (4:6-7). Barak agreed, provided Deborah’s inspiring presence should accompany the troops, though Deborah predicted Sisera’s death by a woman (4:8-9). Barak and Deborah then scouted Esdraelon around KEDESH; they mustered ten thousand men of Naphtali and Zebulun; and, together with princes of Issachar (5:15), they occupied Tabor (4:12). Deborah also summoned Dan and Asher in the N (cut off by Hazor) and Reuben and Gad in TRANSJORDAN, who failed to respond (5:16-17). But Benjamin, Ephraim, and Makir (Manasseh) answered the call (5:14), probably massing at BETH HAGGAN at the SE edge of Esdraelon. Deborah thus accomplished Israel’s first united action since the conquest, 175 years before.

Sisera, meanwhile, advanced from HAROSHETH HAGGOYIM in W Esdraelon, forded the Wadi KISHON southward to marshal the Canaanite kings from JOKNEAM, MEGIDDO, and TAANACH (Jdg. 5:19), and pressed inland along its southern bank. But God fought against Sisera (5:20). A providential storm (cf. 5:4), which turned the plain into a morass, rendered Sisera’s chariotry unmaneuverable, and they were cut to pieces by Israel’s charging foot soldiers. The routed Canaanites, cornered at the Kishon ford, were then swept away by a flash flood (5:21). Sisera fled alone and was killed by the woman JAEL at Kedesh (4:11, 17-22). Jabin was destroyed (4:24), and the land rested forty years (5:31), corresponding to the reign of Ramses III, the last great Pharaoh of Egypt’s 20th dynasty. After the battle, Deborah and Barak sang a song of victory (5:2-31; cf. v. 7), the contemporaneous authenticity of which is universally recognized from its archaic language, vivid descriptions, and ringing faith (5:31).

Yet Deborah’s record has occasioned manifold criticism against Scripture. (a) Confusion is alleged between Josh. 11 and Jdg. 4-5 as two garbled accounts of one actual battle against Jabin; Joshua’s opponent, however, may have been a predecessor of Jabin, or “Jabin” may have been a hereditary title in Hazor. (b) Contradictions are discovered between the prose and the poem, such as fewer tribes fighting in ch. 4 and Sisera being killed in his sleep; but the poetry intentionally singles out the tribes, and Sisera’s sleeping in 5:26 is apparently understood (sinking and falling in 5:27 simply describes his subsequent death agonies). (c) Regarding the prose, some surmise that an account of King Jabin in Kedesh of Naphtali and an account of King Sisera in Esdraelon were combined into one; yet the Kedesh of 4:9-11 fits Esdraelon, not Naphtali, and Scripture never designates Sisera “king,” only “captain” of Jabin. (d) Morally, the charge that the scriptural account of Jael is “reprehensible...[and] cannot be justified” is made by one modern commentary. But while we question this Gentile’s treacherous methods, Deborah’s insight into her fearless and unsolicited devotion to God’s people renders her “most blessed of women” (Jdg. 5:24).

debt. Under the Mosaic law Jews were not allowed to exact INTEREST (usury) from other Jews (Exod. 22:25). Special laws protected the poor against usurers (22:25-27; Deut. 24:12-13). After the EXILE cruel practices arose in collecting debts (2 Ki. 4:1-7; Isa. 50:1). A debtor had to make good his obligation, so land that was pledged (mortgaged) could be seized, but had to be restored during the Year of JUBILEE (Lev. 25:28). A house so pledged could be sold, or held in perpetuity if not redeemed during a year, unless it was an unwalled town (25:29-30). In NT times the Mosaic code was often disregarded. We read of bankers, money-changers, interest, usury (Matt. 25:16-27; Jn. 2:13-17). Debtors were often thrown into prison (Matt. 18:21-26). Jesus taught compassion toward those in debt (18:23-35). The prayer of Jesus, “forgive us our debts” (6:12), implies guilt from unpaid moral obligations to God.

Decapolis. di-kap'uh-lis (Gk. Dekapolis G1279, from deka G1274, “ten,” and polis G4484, “city”). In NT times, a large area mostly E of the JORDAN constituted by ten prominent Hellenistic towns. This region had been allotted by MOSES to the tribe of MANASSEH (Num. 32:33-42), but during the intertestamental period it was occupied by Greeks who had come in the wake of ALEXANDER THE GREAT’S conquests. After the Romans took control of the area (65 B.C.), a league of ten cities was constituted, though later the number was increased, eventually reaching eighteen. They had their own coinage, courts, and army. Ruins of temples, theaters, and other buildings tell of the high degree of culture that developed in these cities. Jesus drove the demons into swine near GADARA, one of these cities (Mk. 5:1-20), and became popular in the Decapolis (Matt. 4:24-25; Mk. 7:31-37).

decision, valley of. This phrase, which occurs in only one verse (Joel 3:14), apparently refers to the Valley of Jehoshaphat (vv. 2, 12). See JEHOSEPHAT, VALLEY OF.

decree. This English term can be used to translate a variety of Hebrew words, some referring to God’s statutes (Exod. 15:25 and frequently; see LAW), and others referring to an official edict or decision issued by a king (e.g., Esth. 9:32; similarly Gk. dogma G1504, Lk. 2:1 et al.). The term is also used in the theological sense of God’s sovereign plans and decisions, as when JOB says, “He carries out his decree against me, / and many such plans he still has in store” (Job 23:14; cf. also Ps. 2:7; 105:10; see ELECTION; PROVIDENCE).

Dedan. dee´duhn (Heb. dēdān H1847, derivation unknown; gentilic dēdānī H1848, “Dedanite”). (1) Son of RAAMAH and descendant of HAM through CUSH; his brother was SHEBA (Gen. 10:7; 1 Chr. 1:9).

(2) Son of JOKSHAN and grandson of ABRAHAM by KETURAH; his brother also is called Sheba (Gen. 25:3; 1 Chr. 1:32). The Asshurites, the Letushites, and the Leummites are said to have descended from him. Whether there is a connection between this Dedan and #1 above is uncertain, but many scholars posit a merging of ethnic traditions. See also #3 below.

(3) As a geographical and ethnic term, Dedan is mentioned several times in the prophets. The Dedanites (prob. viewed as descendants of #2 above) are said to lodge in the thickets of ARABIA and are referred to as being in caravans (Isa. 21:13; KJV, “Dedanim”). Dedan is mentioned in company with TEMA and BUZ as the object of God’s wrath (Jer. 25:23). In the context of a prophecy against EDMOM, the people of Dedan are warned of God’s punishment to befall them (49:8). In a similar context, God’s judgment against Edom includes all the territory from TEMA to Dedan (Ezek. 25:13). Finally, Dedan is mentioned with Sheba in a prophecy concerning GOG (38:13-14). Extrabiblical sources of antiquity indicate that Dedan also was an oasis on the trade routes of the peoples of Sheba, Tema, and Buz. It is probably to be identified with some ruins just N of modern al-‘Ula (c. 50 mi./80 km. SW of Tema in Central Arabia).

dedication. The act of setting apart or devoting to God for holy ends. The relevant Hebrew words are often used of the consecration of persons, but usually of the setting apart of things for God’s use. Consecration of the TABERNACLE (Num. 7) was an elaborate ceremony, as was that of the TEMPLE (1 Ki. 8). Among various dedicated things were the city wall (Neh. 12:27), private dwellings (Deut. 20:5), the temple treasure (1 Chr. 28:12), children (Exod. 13:2), people (Exod. 19:4; 1 Sam. 16:5), and booty of war (2 Sam. 8:10-11). See also HOLINESS; NAZIRITE; SANCTIFICATION.

Dedication, Feast of. This phrase occurs once in the NT (Jn. 10:22). It refers to the Feast of Hanukkah, celebrated annually by the Jews for eight days to commemorate the cleansing of the TEMPLE in Jerusalem after it had been desecrated by the Syrians under ANTIOCHUS Epiphanes (1 Macc. 4:52-59; 2 Macc. 10:5). The restoration of the worship of God was effected by Judas MACCABEE about 165 B.C., three years after its defilement. The feast came on the twenty-fifth of Kislev (mid-December). Josephus designated it “The Feast of Lights”; it is also known as “The Feast of the Maccabees” and “The Feast of Illumination.” The festival was characterized by the illumination of synagogues and homes. It was a time of joy and merriment, and no public mourning was permitted on this feast. Jewish tradition claims that Judas Maccabee found a cruse of oil that was sufficient for a day but lasted for eight. The feast is still celebrated among the Jews today. The system of lighting is one light for the first day, and an additional one for each succeeding day of the festival. The family solemnly gathers around the father as he lights the candles with a prayer of thanksgiving to God for the liberation of his people from the persecution of the oppressor. Presents and money gifts are distributed to the children.

deep, the. As an adjective, the English term deep can be used to translate a number of words. The chief biblical usage, however, is as a noun, referring to a lake or sea. Of particular importance is Hebrew têhôm H9333, thought by some to be used mythologically of the waters of a nether world in Gen. 1:2. This view sees a parallel to Tiamat of the Babylonian creation story—the demon of chaos from whose split body MARDUK made the earth and sky. The Hebrew term cannot be considered a direct borrowing; it is far better to assume that the old Semitic root thm indicated “ocean,” of which the Babylonian demon Tiamat was a personification. It should be noted that têhôm is not used elsewhere in the OT of mythical subterranean waters. It is used repeatedly of the RED SEA through which Israel passed (Exod. 15:5, 8; Ps. 77:16; Isa. 51:10; Hab. 3:10). It is used also many times of the Mediterranean or the deep ocean in general (Gen. 7:11; Ps. 107:26; Jon. 2:5). The biblical cosmology does not picture any subterranean watery chaos; such terms as “the water under the earth” (Deut. 4:18 NRSV) refer only to waters below shore line, as the mention of fish in them clearly shows. The SEPTUAGINT regularly renders the Hebrew word with Greek abyssos G12 (lit., “bottomless”), which thus about thirty times means merely the ocean and lakes. However, as the seas were the deepest things known to the ancients, the word gained a figurative sense and is used seven times in the book of Revelation of the bottomless PIT, the abode of evil spirits. See ABYSS; HADES; SHEOL.

defile. There are a number of Hebrew and Greek words that in general mean “to profane, pollute, render unclean.” In the OT defilement was physical (Cant. 5:3), sexual (Lev. 18:20), ethical (Isa. 59:3; Ezek. 37:23), ceremonial (Lev. 11:24; 17:15), and religious (Num. 35:33; Jer. 3:1). In the NT ceremonial defilement recedes into the background, so that emphasis falls on ethical or religious matters (Mk. 7:19; Acts 10:15; Rom. 14:20). In OT times God’s purpose in issuing laws regarding ceremonial defilement was clearly an educative one—to impress the Israelites with his HOLINESS and the necessity of their living separate and holy lives. See UNCLEAN.

degree. This English term occurs frequently in the KJV in the older sense of “step” (2 Ki. 20:9-11). See also ASCENTS, SONG OF.

Dehavite. di-hay´vit. According to the KJV and other versions, the Dehavites were a people group listed among those who were transferred to SAMARIA by the Assyrians (Ezra 4:9). Because no satisfactory identification has been made, most scholars interpret the text differently, so that instead of the KJV’s rendering, “the Susanchites, the Dehavites, and the Elamites,” the NRSV translates, “the people of Susa, that is, the Elamites” (cf. NRSV; similarly NIV, “the Elamites of Susa”).

Delaiah. di-lay´yuh (Heb. dēlāyâ H1933, “Yahweh draws up”). (1) Son of Elioenai and a descendant of DAVID through SOLOMON (1 Chr. 3:24).

(2) A priest during the time of David who was the leader of the twenty-third division (1 Chr. 24:18).

(3) Son of Shemaiah; he was one of the officials in the court of JEHOIAKIM who heard BARUCH read JEREMIAH’s scroll and urged the king not to burn the inspired prophecy (Jer. 36:12, 25).

(4) Ancestor of a family that returned from the EXILE but could not prove that they were Israelites (Ezra 2:60; Neh. 7:62).

(5) Son of Mehetabel and father of Shemaiah; the latter was an opponent of Nehemiah (Neh. 6:10; see SHEMAIAH #19). Some believe this Delaiah is the same as #4 above.

Delilah. di-li´luh (Heb. dēlîlâ H1935, meaning disputed). A woman of pagan extraction mentioned as the temptress of the judge SAMSON (Jdg. 16:4-20). The woman was presumably a PHILISTINE. She seems to be pictured in the story as a courtesan who was hired by her countrymen to lure Samson into compromising his personal strength and his position as judge in Israel.

Demas. dee´muhs (Gk. Dēmas G1318; possibly a shortened form of DEMETRIUS). A companion of PAUL first mentioned in the greetings sent from Rome to COLOSSE (Col. 4:14; Phlm. 24), but later marked for his desertion of Paul in his last imprisonment (2 Tim. 4:10). Paul speaks volumes in the few words applied to Demas: he “hath forsaken me, having loved this present world” (KJV). Nothing more is known about him.

Demetrius. di-mee´tree-uhs (Gk. Dēmētrios G1320, “belonging to [the god] Demeter”). (1) The name of several SELEUCID rulers, including Demetrius I Soter, who ruled from 164 B.C. until his death c. 150 (1 Macc. 7:1—10:52; Jos. Ant. 12.10.1-4 et al.). His son, Demetrius II Nicator, assumed power c. 145 but lost it five years later, then ruled again 129-125 (1 Macc. 10:67—15:22; Jos. Ant. 13.4.3 et al.); it was this king who in the year 142 confirmed Simon MACCABEE as high priest, thereby acknowledging Jewish independence.

(2) A jeweler in EPHESUS who raised a mob against PAUL because the apostle’s preaching had resulted in damage to the lucrative business of making silver shrines of the goddess ARTEMIS (Acts 19:23-27). The name of one Demetrius, a warden of the Ephesian temple, has been found by modern explorers, but the suggestion that he was the same person as the one mentioned in Acts has not been widely accepted.

(3) A disciple whom JOHN THE APOSTLE praised in his letter to GAIUS (3 Jn. 12); it has been suggested that he was the bearer of the letter.

demon. This English word is derived from the Greek daimōn G1230, which was used of rather anonymous influences whether of a good or bad variety. When the concept of a supernatural spirit or intelligence subsequently developed in Greek circles, the word gradually acquired a malign connotation and was used as a general designation of malevolent powers; these were commonly assigned individuality and characteristic functions. In the NT, this Greek word (which occurs only once, Matt. 8:31) and its cognate, daimonion G1228 (7:22 and very frequently), always have a negative connotation and are roughly synonymous with “evil spirit” (cf. Matt. 17:18 with Mk. 9:25).

The immaterial and incorporeal nature of both SATAN and his demon hosts is graphically set forth by the apostle PAUL when he describes the believer’s intense conflict as being “not against flesh and blood” but against “rulers,” “authorities,” “powers of this dark world,” and “spiritual forces of evil in the heavenly realms” (Eph. 6:12; cf. 2:2). JOHN THE APOSTLE likewise stresses their incorporeality in his reference to “spirits of demons” (Rev. 16:14); the construction is probably a genitive of apposition that defines the general term “spirits,” thus “demon-spirits” (cf. NRSV, “demonic spirits”).

As purely spiritual beings or personalities, demons operate above the laws of the natural realm and are invisible. The Bible presents them as such, and thus they are free from the magical rites and exorcistic rigmarole that contaminate ethnic and rabbinic demonology. The Word of God, however, does recognize the miracle whereby natural law may be temporarily transcended and residents of the spirit world glimpsed (2 Ki. 2:11; 6:17). On this principle John in apocalyptic vision saw the awful last-day eruption of locust-demons from the abyss (Rev. 9:1-12), as well as the three hideous frog-like spirits that emanate from the satanic trinity (the dragon, the beast, and the false prophet) in the tribulation to muster the world’s armies to their predestined doom at ARMAGEDDON (16:13-16).

As spirit personalities, demons have an intellectual nature through which they possess superhuman knowledge. Scripture features their shrewdness: they know Jesus (Mk. 1:24), bow to him (5:6), describe him as “the Son of the Most High God” (5:7), entreat him (Lk. 8:31), obey him (Matt. 8:16), corrupt sound doctrine (1 Tim. 4:1-5), conceal the truth of Christ’s incarnate deity and sole saviorhood (1 Jn. 4:1-3), and comprehend prophecy and their inevitable doom (Matt. 8:29). Because of their superhuman knowledge, demons are consulted by spiritistic mediums, who allow themselves to get under the control of evil spirits for oracular purposes (1 Sam. 28:1-25; Acts 16:16), as is seen in both ancient and modern spiritism, erroneously called “spiritualism.”

In their moral nature all demons (as fallen ANGELS) are evil and depraved, in distinction to the good spirits (the unfallen angels), who are sinless. The moral depravity of demons is everywhere evidenced in Scripture by the harmful effects they produce in their victims, deranging them mentally, morally, physically, and spiritually, and by the frequent epithet of “unclean” (NIV, “evil”) which often describes them (Matt. 10:1; Mk. 1:27; Lk. 4:36; Acts 8:7; Rev. 16:13). Fleshly uncleanness and base sensual gratification are the result of demon control of the human personality (Lk. 8:27). Demons figure in the moral collapse of a people who yield to gross carnality and sexual sin (2 Tim. 3:1-9; Rev. 9:21-22).

In addition to their superhuman intelligence and moral depravity, demons possess terrible physical strength, imparting it to the human body (Lk. 8:29) and binding their victims as with chains and with physical defects and deformities (Lk. 13:11-17) such as blindness (Matt. 12:22), insanity (8:26-36), dumbness (9:32-33), and suicidal mania (Mk. 9:22).

Demons under the leadership of Satan seek to oppose God's purposes and to hinder human welfare. So intimately bound up are they with their prince leader that their work and his are identified rather than differentiated. Thus the earthly life of our Lord is said to have consisted in going about "doing good and healing all who were under the power of the devil" (Acts 10:38). Certainly much of this so-called oppression by the devil was the work of the demons, as a cursory examination of the gospel records will show.

Demons are of two classes: those who are free, with the earth and the air as their abode (Eph. 2:2; 6:11-12; Col. 1:13), and those who are imprisoned in the ABYSS (Lk. 8:31; Rev. 9:1-11; 20:1-3). The abyss is only the temporary prison house of evil spirits, which must surrender its doleful inhabitants to GEHENNA or the "lake of fire" (Matt. 25:41), the eternal abode of Satan, demons, and unsaved human beings.

den, lions'. The dwelling place of lions (see ANIMALS) is mentioned in various biblical passages (Job 38:39-40; Ps. 104:21-22; Cant. 4:8; Amos 3:4; Nah. 2:11-12). Especially well known is Dan. 6:7-24, where the Aramaic word refers to a trenched out "pit." The Babylonians and Assyrians kept lions captured in the marshlands as beasts for hunting and as pets; they are shown in the magnificent reliefs of several Neo-Assyrian rulers. The punishment described in Dan. 6 has not survived in visual representation, but the condemnation to a "trial by ordeal" has many precedents in Mesopotamian-Iranian law. When DANIEL was spared, his accusers were condemned to the same fate (6:24).

deny. This term can be used in both negative contexts (such as PETER's denial or disowning of Jesus, Matt. 26:34, 70, et al.) and positive ones (we should deny ourselves, that is, set aside our self-interests, Matt. 16:24 et al.). Especially important are those passages that warn believers against denying the faith (e.g., 1 Tim. 5:8). See APOSTASY.

deposit. Since there were no banks or security houses in the ancient world, it would not be uncommon for an individual, when going on a journey, to deposit valuables with a friend or neighbor. Specific laws are spelled out in Exod. 22:7-13 and Lev. 6:1-7 concerning the protection of deposits. See PLEDGE. In the NT, the term deposit is sometimes used as the rendering of Greek parathēkē G4146, “property entrusted to another,” used with reference to the GOSPEL, which has been given over to the apostles and disciples for their care, so that they might proclaim it faithfully (1 Tim. 6:20; 2 Tim. 1:12, 14). In addition, the NIV uses the phrase “a deposit, guaranteeing [what is to come]” to render Greek arrabōn G775 (2 Cor. 1:22; 5:5; Eph. 1:14). See EARNEST.

depravity. See SIN.

deputy. One appointed to rule under a higher authority, as a regent in place of a king (e.g., 1 Ki. 22:47). The KJV uses this term also in passages where the reference is to a Roman PROCONSUL (Acts 13:7 et al.).

Derbe. duhr´bee (Gk. Derbē G1292). A city in the SE corner of LYCAONIA in ASIA MINOR, a region that was part of the Roman province of GALATIA. PAUL visited it on the first journey after being stoned at LYSTRA (Acts 14:20), also on his second tour (16:1), and probably on the third. A certain GAIUS, who accompanied Paul to JERUSALEM, was from this city (20:4). Derbe was approximately 65 mi. (105 km.) SE of ICONIUM.

descent into hell. The familiar Apostles’ Creed affirmation that Jesus descended into HELL or HADES is based chiefly on two references by PETER (1 Pet. 3:19; 4:6), supported by implications to be taken from two other NT verses (Acts 2:27; Rom. 10:7). The term is said to be in harmony also with the language of PAUL when he speaks of Christ’s descending “into the lower parts of the earth” (Eph. 4:9 KJV), but many scholars argue that this phrase refers to the earth itself as lower than heaven (cf. NIV, “to the lower, earthly regions”). Even in the case of Peter’s statements, the meaning is hotly debated by scholars. As a result, some argue that the descent into Hades is merely another way of emphasizing the depth of Christ’s humiliation and his total identification with the sufferings of sinners in death. Others believe that the statement is misleading and thus exclude it in their liturgical use of the creed.

desert. This term, like wilderness and wasteland, refers to a barren, desolate area. Deserts are mentioned in numerous contexts throughout the Bible. In most places it is a mild desert receiving some RAIN during the winter season of the year. Rain falls at intervals from November to April, causing flooding at certain places because of the treeless soil, while the other six months it is extremely dry because of the khamzin or desert winds. Because of the lack of good natural harbors along the Palestinian coast, the desert has had a far greater influence on the life and culture of Palestine than has the SEA. There was continuous hostility between the inhabitants of the desert and those of the more fertile areas. The lure of the planted crops was more than a hungry bedouin tribe could withstand. In other periods of time when peace was negotiated, active trade took place over the desert routes, bringing many goods from the S and E to Palestine.

Several words in the Bible are rendered “desert” or “wilderness.” The most common and inclusive term in the OT is midbār H4497, “uninhabited land.” It includes not only the barren deserts of sand and rock, but also the steppe lands that can be classified as semidesert. These would be used for the grazing of sheep and goats at certain periods of the year. The words šiyyâ H7480 (e.g., Isa. 41:18; NIV, “parched ground”) and yēšmôn H3810 (e.g., Ps. 78:40; NIV, “wasteland”) tend to be a little more narrow in meaning, referring to very dry and waterless areas. Two additional words sometimes rendered “desert” or “wilderness” are better treated as proper names: ARABAH (the barren plain located in the southern part of the Jordan valley) and NEGEV (the great southern desert tucked between the Sinai peninsula to the W and the Arabah to the E). In the NT, the standard term is Greek erēmos G2245, “desolate [area].” This term is used not so much to designate a dry region, but more in the sense of a solitary place. It occurs, for example, with reference to the area around BETHSAIDA on the eastern shore of the Sea of Galilee (Mk. 6:31-32), even though there was “plenty of grass in that place” (Jn. 6:10).

The desert is presented both in a positive and in a negative way in its relationship to Israel. At the beginning of the nation’s history, the desert was where God showed his power and his love for Israel (Jer. 2-3; Hos. 13:5). DEBORAH sings praise to the God of SINAI and the desert (Jdg. 5:4-5), and likewise HABAKKUK as he speaks about God’s deliverance of Israel (Hab. 3:2-7). The wilderness, however, also is seen as a place of sin. The golden calf scene took place in the desert (Exod. 32:23; see CALF WORSHIP). KORAH’s rebellion took place there (Num. 16-17). At SHITTIM many of the Israelites identified with BAAL PEOR (Num. 25) and suffered the judgment of God.

desire of all nations, the. This phrase is found only in Hag. 2:7, where the KJV reads, “And I will shake all nations, and the desire [NIV, desired; NRSV, treasure] of all nations shall come.” The prophet predicts glory for ZERUBBABEL’s temple greater in the future than in the present. The verse is often taken as a messianic prediction (cf. Zech. 3:8; 9:9; note also that Hag. 2:6 is quoted in Heb. 12:26-27). It seems from the context that the prophet was looking to the distant future, and elsewhere he apparently refers to Zerubbabel symbolically as the MESSIAH (Hag. 2:22-23; cf. Zech. 6:12). Some believe that Hag. 2:7 refers not to the arrival of the Messiah, but to the coming of the leaders of the Gentiles to join in worship in the messianic age.

desolation. See ABOMINATION OF DESOLATION.

destiny. Though this word is seldom used in English Bible versions (NIV Eccl. 9:2-3 et al.), the idea, divested of pagan implications, is frequent in the Bible. God sees the end from the beginning. He has appointed a destiny for the Christian, for the unbeliever, for Israel, and for other nations. See ELECTION; PROVIDENCE. As a proper name, the term Destiny refers to a pagan god, MENI, which is mentioned once along with GAD, “Fortune” (Isa. 65:11 [the KJV mistranslates this verse]). Pagan ideas of fate or destiny vary. In Greek mythology and in some popular forms of Islam, the hour of death is determined, and perhaps the place also, but the ordinary course of life is left to chance. The STOICS, more consistently, insisted that every event was determined. Sometimes fate is supposed to be a blind, purposeless force, rather than providence, foresight, and wise planning.

destroyer, the. In Exod. 12:23 (cf. Heb. 11:28), this term occurs in connection with the tenth plague of Egypt, the destruction of the Egyptian firstborn. Evidently the reference is to a superhuman being, used as an instrument of God’s WRATH in the execution of his judgment. It is difficult to say whether this is a good ANGEL used by God as an agent of destruction, or SATAN or one of his minions. If a good angel, God could use it to bring both blessing and destruction. In 1 Cor. 10:10, PAUL warned against grumbling, as some Israelites did in the wilderness and thus “were destroyed by the destroyer” (KJV). The term “the destroyer” occurs elsewhere in a somewhat different sense (e.g., Isa. 16:4; 54:16; Jer. 6:26; 48:8, 32). With different terminology, some passages refer to the concept of an angelic destroyer. For example, the Lord sent an angel to smite the people by means of a plague because DAVID had made a census of the nation (2 Sam. 24:16). In HEZEKIAH’s time in a single night an angel destroyed 185,000 men in the Assyrian camp (2 Ki. 19:35). The prophet EZEKIEL saw in a vision a number of angels executing judgment upon Jerusalem and Judah (Ezek. 9:5-7).

Deuel. doo’uhl (Heb. dē ʿû ʾēl H1979, possibly “known of God”). Father of ELIASAPH; the latter was a Gadite leader (Num. 1:14, 24-25; 2:14 [MT, “Reuel”]; 7:42, 47). In all these passages the SEPTUAGINT reads Ragouēl, which some scholars believe reflects the correct spelling. See REUEL #2.

Deuterocanonical Books. See APOCRYPHA.

Deuteronomy. doo’tuh-ron’uh-mee. The fifth book of the Bible and traditionally one of the five books of MOSES (see PENTATEUCH). In sight of the Canaan he would not be allowed to enter, Moses gathered the hosts of Israel about him for his farewell addresses. These, set within the historical framework of several brief narrative passages, constitute the book of Deuteronomy. Since the occasion of the renewal of the COVENANT made earlier at SINAI, the appropriate documentary pattern for covenant ratification supplied the pattern for Moses’ speeches and thus for the book.

The English, though not totally inappropriate, is based on the SEPTUAGINT’s mistranslation of the phrase “a copy of this law” (Deut. 17:18) as to deuteronomion touto, “this second law,” or “this repetition of the law.” In Hebrew literature the book (like the other books of the Pentateuch) is known from its opening words, “These are the words,” or simply, “Words” (Heb. dēbārîm, pl. of dābār H1821). This title is well suited because it focuses attention on a clue to the peculiar literary character of the book; the treaties imposed by ancient imperial lords on their vassals began with such an expression. Deuteronomy is the text of “words” of a suzerainty covenant made by the Lord of heaven through the mediatorship of Moses with the servant people Israel beyond the Jordan.

The claims of Deuteronomy concerning its own authorship are plain. It consists almost entirely of the farewell speeches of Moses addressed to the new generation that had grown to adulthood in the wilderness. The speeches are dated in the last month of the forty years of wandering (Deut. 1:3), and it is stated that Moses wrote as well as spoke them (31:9, 24; cf. 31:22). Modern conservative scholars, therefore, join older Jewish and Christian tradition in maintaining the Mosaic authorship of Deuteronomy as well as of the first four books of the Pentateuch. Almost all such scholars, however, recognize that the account of Moses' death (Deut. 34) is exceptional and must have been recorded by some other writer; some would attribute to a compiler (perhaps the unknown author of Deut. 34) much of the narrative framework of Deuteronomy. Whether or not the biblical testimony allows the latter latitude, even that variety of the conservative position stands in clear opposition to modern negative theories of the origin of Deuteronomy.

According to the Development Hypothesis, popular among nineteenth-century negative critics, Deuteronomy was a product of the seventh century B.C. and provided the program for the reform of JOSIAH (cf. 2 Ki. 22:3—23:25), allegedly introducing the concept of a centralized place of worship into Israelite religion at that late date. But unless a wholesale critical rewriting of the historical sources is undertaken, it is obvious that the concept of the central altar was normative during the entire life of Israel in Canaan. Moreover, it is equally apparent that, taken at face value, the covenant stipulations in Deuteronomy are directed to a unified young nation about to enter a program of conquest, not to a diminishing remnant of the divided kingdom. Indeed, many of those stipulations would be completely incongruous in a document produced in the seventh century. That dating, though still dominant, is being increasingly challenged even from the side of negative criticism. While some have suggested a postexilic origin, more have favored a date before Josiah's reign. There is a growing tendency to trace the sources of the deuteronomic legislation back to the early monarchy—if not earlier. The view that these traditions were preserved at a northern cult center, being shaped according to ritual patterns, is widespread. Some would detach Deuteronomy from the Pentateuch and treat the books of Deuteronomy, Joshua, Judges, Samuel, and Kings as a unit representing the historical-theological perspective of a distinctive school of thought, the “deuteronomic.”

Overview of DEUTERONOMY

Author: Although technically anonymous, most of the book consists of discourses attributed directly to MOSES, who is regarded by tradition as the author of the PENTATEUCH.

Historical setting: The end of the wilderness wanderings, as a new generation of Israelites are camped E of the JORDAN ready to take possession of the Promised Land (c. 1400 or 1250 B.C., depending on the date of the EXODUS; those who reject Mosaic authorship usually date the book to the time of King JOSIAH, late in the seventh century B.C.).

Purpose: To exhort the people to renew their COVENANT with God, avoiding the sins of the previous generation, and thus becoming spiritually prepared to conquer the land before them.

Contents: Historical review of God’s dealings with the Israelites (Deut. 1-4); extended exposition of the Ten Commandments and other laws (chs. 5-26); renewal of the covenant by affirming the curses and blessings (chs. 27-30); Moses’ last words and death (chs. 31-34).

The unity, antiquity, and authenticity of Deuteronomy are evidenced by the conformity of its total structure to the pattern of ANE suzerainty treaties dating from the second millennium B.C. The classic covenantal pattern consisted of the following sections: preamble, historical prologue, stipulations, curses and blessings, invocation of oath deities, directions for deposit of duplicate treaty documents in sanctuaries and periodic proclamation of the treaty to the vassal people.

This substantially is the outline of Deuteronomy:

- I. Preamble: Covenant Mediator (Deut. 1:1-5).
- II. Historical Prologue: Covenant History (1:6—4:49).
- III. Stipulations: Covenant Life (chs. 5-26).
- IV. Curses and Blessings: Covenant Ratification (chs. 27-30).
- V. Succession Arrangements: Covenant Continuity (chs. 31-34).

In Deut. 1:1-5 the speaker is identified as Moses, as the Lord's representative. The second section (1:6—4:49) is a rehearsal of God's past covenantal dealings with Israel from Horeb to Moab and serves to awaken reverence and gratitude as motives for renewed consecration. With 5:26 it is made clear that when covenants were renewed the former obligations were repeated and brought up to date. Thus chs. 5-11 review the Decalogue with its primary obligation of fidelity to Yahweh, while chs. 12-26 in considerable measure renew the stipulations of the Book of the Covenant (Exod. 21-33) and other Sinaitic legislation, adapting where necessary to the new conditions awaiting Israel in Canaan. In Deut. 27-30 directions are first given for the future and final act in this covenant renewal to be conducted by JOSHUA in Canaan (ch. 27). Moses then pronounces the blessings and curses as reasons for Israel's immediate ratification of the covenant, but also as a prophecy of Israel's future down to its ultimate exile and restoration (chs. 28-30). In ch. 31-34 preparations are made for the continuity of leadership through the succession of Joshua and for the continuing confrontation of Israel with the way of the covenant by periodic reading of the covenant document, which was to be deposited in the sanctuary, and by a prophetic song of covenant witness (chs. 31-32). The book ends with the final blessings and the death of Moses (chs. 33-34).

The similarity between the style of Deuteronomy and that of contemporary international suzerainty treaties is well worth noting. Also important is the overall oratorical nature of the book. The style is similar throughout, a fluent prose (chs. 32-33 are poetry) marked by majestic periods, warm eloquence, and the earnest exhortation of the preacher, calling the people to choose whom they would follow. Deuteronomy is the Bible's full-scale exposition of the covenant concept and demonstrates that, far from being a contract between two parties, God's covenant with his people is a proclamation of his sovereignty and an instrument for binding his elect to himself in a commitment of absolute allegiance.

Israel is confronted with the demands of God's governmental omnipotence, redemptive grace, and consuming jealousy. They are to show their consecration to the Lord by obeying his mandate to establish his kingdom in his land. That involves conquering the land, by which divine judgment would be visited on those who worship alien gods in God's land, and also establishing a community of brotherly love in common service to the Lord within the Promised Land. This covenant calling was not an unconditional license to national privilege and prosperity. By the covenant oath Israel came under both the curses and the blessings that were to be meted out according to God's righteous judgment. The covenant relation called for responsible decision: "This day I call heaven and earth as witnesses against you that I have set before you life and death, blessings and curses. Now choose life, so that you and your children may live and that you may love the LORD your God....For the LORD is your life" (Deut. 30:19-20).

devil. In the plural, this word is used by the KJV several times in the OT (Lev. 17:7 et al.) and frequently in the NT (Matt. 4:24 et al.). For these uses, see DEMON. Otherwise, the term occurs only in the NT, and only in the singular, as the rendering of Greek diabolos G1333, which means "slanderer" (the pl. of this Gk. word is used a few times to describe slanderous people). The devil is depicted as one inciting to evil (Matt. 4:1; 13:39; Jn. 13:2; et al.). Those under his control could be called children of the devil (1 Jn. 3:10; cf. Jn. 6:70; 8:44), and he is said to hold the power of death (Heb. 2:14). Though ruler of the world, he was defeated by the death of Christ and his resurrection (cf. Matt. 25:41; Rev. 2:10; 12:9; et al.). For discussion see SATAN.

devoted thing. The Hebrew verb ḥāram H3049 and its cognate noun ḥērem H3051, which are used of dedicating something or someone to the deity either for sacred use or for utter destruction, occur about eighty times in the OT. The verb is usually translated "utterly destroy" or the like. The translation "devote" or "devoted," though less common, is more expressive of the meaning of the root. The overwhelming usage refers to the destruction of the enemy in the total wars commanded in the conquest of CANAAN, in the campaign against the AMALEKITES, and in similar situations. The enemy was put "under the ban," as it is sometimes expressed. An example is the city of JERICHO, which was thus devoted. All was to be destroyed except metals that could be purified by fire, for the Lord's treasury. Thus ACHAN in violating the ban actually stole from God.

There is another usage observable. Some passages (Lev. 27:21, 28, 29; Num. 18:14; Ezek. 44:29) refer to offerings dedicated to holy use, which are given to the priests. Leviticus 27:21 specifies that such a field shall be the priests' in perpetuity and shall not revert to the owner in the Year of JUBILEE. We read that every devoted thing "is most holy to the LORD" (27:28). Devoted men are mentioned in the same context (27:29) as certainly condemned to death. This does not refer to those persons consecrated to the Lord by a vow and serving as slaves in the temple (these are mentioned in vv. 1-8). Nor does it refer to the firstlings of men who were redeemed when God chose the tribe of LEVI as an equivalent (Num. 3:12). There is no vestige of early human sacrifice. Rather the devoted men who must be killed as directed in Lev. 27:29 are captives from the holy wars. These captives theoretically belonged to God. Yet such foreign captives could not serve in the holy precincts. Like AGAG and the Amalekites, they must be put under the ban (1 Sam. 15:3-33). See also ACCURSED; EXCOMMUNICATION.

dew. The moisture condensed from the air that forms in drops during a still, cloudless night on the earth or any warm surface. In Syria and most of Palestine these conditions are fulfilled through the cloudless summer and early autumn, and the dew is a great blessing to the fruits of the land. The word (Heb. ṭal H3228) occurs thirty-five times, almost always with pleasant connotation. Dew is often used in Scripture as a symbol of BLESSING (Gen. 27:28; Mic. 5:7) and of refreshment (Deut. 32:2; Job 29:19; Ps. 133:3; Isa. 18:4).

diadem. This English term (from Gk. diadēma G1343, cf. NRSV Rev. 12:3 et al.), which usually refers to a CROWN as a symbol of royalty, is seldom found in Bible versions. The NIV uses it three times to translate Hebrew words that designate a headband or turban. See DRESS.

dial. Properly, a graduated arc intended to mark the time of day by the shadow of a style or shaft falling on it. In modern times the style is generally (and properly) parallel to the axis of the earth. The term is used by the KJV and other versions to render the plural of Hebrew ma ʿālāh H5092 (“ascent, step”) in 2 Ki. 20:11 (also in the parallel passage, Isa. 38:8, where the text is a little different and difficult). According to this narrative, HEZEKIAH was given a sign to prove the authenticity of ISAIAH’s prophecy that God would heal the king of his disease: “And Isaiah the prophet cried unto the LORD: and he brought the shadow ten degrees [ma ʿālôt] backward, by which it had gone down in the dial [ma ʿālôt again] of Ahaz” (so KJV; the NRSV, similarly, “and he brought the shadow back the ten intervals, by which the sun had declined on the dial of Ahaz”). The NIV translates more literally, “and the LORD made the shadow go back the ten steps it had gone down on the stairway of Ahaz,” but even in this rendering it is apparent that the stairs in question functioned as a kind of sundial. One possibility is that “the device consisted of two sets of steps each facing a wall whose shadow fell upon the steps. As the sun rose, the eastern steps would be in the wall’s shadow, which, as the day advanced, would grow shorter. On the other hand, during the afternoon, the steps facing west would more and more be in the shadow” (E. J. Young, The Book of Isaiah, 3 vols., NICOT [1965-72], 2:515n.). The miracle recorded in connection with the dial can be compared with Joshua’s “long day” (Josh. 10:12-14) and is equally inexplicable on natural grounds.

Diblah. dibˈluh (Heb. diblâ H1812, possibly “lump, cake [of pressed figs]”). KJV Diblath. An unknown city mentioned in a prophetic oracle of judgment (Ezek. 6:14). Because in the Hebrew alphabet the consonants d and r can be easily confused (see DALETH), many scholars emend the text to read RIBLAH (cf. NRSV).

Diblaim. dibˈlay-im (Heb. diblayim H1813, apparently dual form of dēbēlâ H1811, “lump, cake [of pressed figs]”). The father of GOMER, the unfaithful wife of the prophet HOSEA (Hos. 1:3). According to some, Diblaim was her hometown. A few scholars interpret the name allegorically (e.g., a reference to her cheap price as a prostitute or to the raisin cakes used in the worship of BAAL).

Diblath. See DIBLAH.

Dibon. di'bon (Heb. dîbôn H1897, derivation uncertain). (1) A Judean town toward the S, inhabited in the time of NEHEMIAH by members of the tribe of JUDAH (Neh. 11:25), which seems to be the same as DIMONAH (Josh. 15:22).

(2) A city in MOAB, E of the DEAD SEA and N of the ARNON River, to which reference is first made in the OT in describing Israel's victory over SIHON of the Amorites (Num. 21:30). Dibon, together with the whole area, was given to the tribes of GAD and REUBEN (Num. 32:3, 34; Josh. 13:9), and although Dibon was built (i.e., rebuilt) by Gad (Num. 32:34) and, therefore, was sometimes called Dibon Gad (33:45-46), it was part of the territory of Reuben (Josh. 13:17). It was later taken by MOAB under King MESHA, who rebelled against Israel after the death of AHAB in 906 B.C. (2 Ki. 1:1; 3:4-5). According to 2 Ki. 3, Israel badly defeated Mesha at the ensuing battle, but Mesha set up a stele at Dibon (the famous MOABITE STONE) boasting of his defeat of Ahab.

Dibon Gad. See DIBON #2.

Dibri. dib'ri (Heb. dibrî H1828, possibly "talkative"). A man of the tribe of DAN whose daughter Shelomith married an Egyptian (Lev. 24:11). Shelomith's son blasphemed "the Name" (of God) and was stoned (vv. 10-23).

Didache. did'uh-kee (Gk. Didachē G1439, "teaching"). A writing of the early church, usually included among the APOSTOLIC FATHERS.

didrachma. See MONEY.

Didymus. did'uh-muhs (Gk. Didymos G1441, "twin"). This designation, another name for the apostle THOMAS, appears only in the Gospel of John (Jn. 11:16; 20:24; 21:2).

Diklah. dik'luh (Heb. diqlâ H1989, "date palm"). Son of JOKTAN and descendant of SHEM through EBER (Gen. 10:27; 1 Chr. 1:21). The names of Joktan's thirteen sons appear to refer to S Arabian tribes, but the places associated with them (Gen. 10:30) are difficult to identify.

Dilean. dil'ee-uhn (Heb. dil ʿān H1939, possibly “protrusion”). A town in the Judean SHEPHELAH (Josh. 15:38). It was in the same district as LA-CHISH, but its precise location is not known.

dill. See PLANTS.

Dimnah. dim'nuh (Heb. dimnâ H1962, derivation uncertain). A town within the tribal territory of ZEBULUN, assigned to the Levites descended from MERARI (Josh. 21:35). No such place is otherwise attested, and many believe it is a scribal error for “Rimmon” or “Rimmonah” (cf. 19:13; 1 Chr. 6:77 [“Rimmono”]). See RIMMON (PLACE) #2.

Dimon. di'muhn (Heb. dîmôn H1904, derivation unknown). A city of MOAB, mentioned only in an oracle of ISAIAH (Isa. 15:9). Because there is no other reference to such a city in Moab, many scholars follow a text from the DEAD SEA SCROLLS (1QIsa^a) and the Vulgate in reading DIBON (cf. NRSV), assuming either a textual corruption or a deliberate scribal play on the Hebrew word for “blood” (dām H1947). Dibon, however, was mentioned earlier (v. 2), and no other place is mentioned twice in the passage).

Dimonah. di-moh'nuh (Heb. dîmônâ H1905, derivation unknown). A city of the NEGEV, near the Edomite border, belonging to the tribe of JUDAH (Josh. 15:22). It is generally thought to be the same place as the DIBON of Judah occupied by the Jews in the period of the return from EXILE under NEHEMIAH (Neh. 11:25). The exact site is not known, but some identify it with modern Khirbet edh-Dheiba, about 2 mi. (3 km.) NE of ARAD.

Dinah. di'nuh (Heb. dînâ H1909, possibly “justice” or “[female] judge”). The daughter of JACOB and LEAH (Gen. 30:21; 34:1-31; 46:15). During an inspection of the land and a visit with the pagan women, Dinah was criminally assaulted by SHECHEM, son of the ruler HAMOR, stated to be a HIVITE. Subsequently the brothers of the victim agreed to a marriage proposal from Shechem but insisted that the Hivite males submit to the rite of CIRCUMCISION. After the rite had been performed but while the wounds were sore and debilitating, two of Dinah's brothers, SIMEON and LEVI, took their weapons, slew all the males, and despoiled the whole village. For this act of wanton revenge the brothers Simeon and Levi were cursed in Jacob's final blessing (49:5-7). Many interpreters, both Jewish and Christian, have suggested that Dinah was careless in her behavior or even that she was at fault in this incident, but the biblical narrative passes no judgment on her.

Dinaite. di'nay-it. According to the KJV, the Dinaites were an ethnic group that, with others, complained to the Persian monarch ARTAXERXES against the Jewish rebuilding of the TEMPLE (Ezra 4:9, following the MT). Most scholars revocalize the Aramaic word and translate it “judges.”

Dinhabah. din'huh-buh (Heb. dinhābâ H1973, derivation disputed). The capital city of BELA, who was king of EDMON in the period before the Israelite monarchy (Gen. 36:32; 1 Chr. 1:43). Its location is unknown.

Dionysius the Areopagite. di'uh-nish'ee-uhs air'ee-op'uh-git (Gk. Dionysios ho Areopagitēs G1477 [“of Dionysus”] + G741 [“of the Areopagus”]). A convert of PAUL in ATHENS who was apparently a member of the council of the AREOPAGUS (Acts 17:34). He is one of a number of prominent men who are mentioned by LUKE as converts (13:12; 19:31; 26:32; 28:7). Little else is known about him except by traditions that cannot be verified, such as the claim that he was the first bishop of Athens. According to one account, Dionysius was martyred in that city under Emperor Domitian. Another indicates that he went to ROME and was then sent to Paris by Clemens I, where he was beheaded on the martyr's mount (Montmartre). He is often identified with St. Dennis, the patron of France.

Dioscuri. See CASTOR AND POLLUX.

Diotrephes. di-ot'ruh-feeZ (Gk. Diotrephēs G1485, “nourished by Zeus”). The lone biblical reference to this churchman is 3 Jn. 9, where he is reprimanded for his failure to receive the representatives sent by the author, JOHN THE APOSTLE. Evidently he had opposed a former letter from John, had maligned the apostle, and had refused to grant hospitality to the brethren, urging that all others of the congregation do likewise (v. 10). John characterizes him as someone “who loves to be first.” Diotrephes probably held an office in the church and abused his authority. In any case, he clearly tried to exercise dominance over the congregation.

discerning of spirits. The ability that the HOLY SPIRIT gives to some Christians to discern between those who spoke by the Spirit of God and those who were moved by false spirits. The phrase occurs in 1 Cor. 12:10 (KJV) as one of the GIFTS of the Spirit. The NIV renders “distinguishing between spirits.”

disciple, discipleship. The Greek word for “disciple,” mathētēs G3412, occurs over 250 times in the NT. The term implies the acceptance in mind and life of the views and practices of the teacher. The Gospels refer to the disciples of JOHN THE BAPTIST (Matt. 9:14), of the PHARISEES (22:16), and of MOSES (Jn. 9:28), but the term is almost always applied to the adherents of Jesus. Although sometimes it refers to the twelve APOSTLES specifically (e.g., Matt. 10:1; 11:1), more often Christians in general are in view (Acts 6:1-2, 7; 9:36). Followers of Jesus were not called “Christians” until the founding of the church at ANTIOCH (11:26).

Jesus’ teachings covered many topics, but the whole of it was summarized in one commandment, LOVE (Jn. 13:34); and although discipleship had many facets it was summed up in a single concept—obedience to this command (13:35). Many heard Jesus speak, but because his teaching was radical, and at times too difficult to accept (6:60), the majority of disciples defected (6:66). Consequently, much of what he taught about such topics as his death and resurrection (Matt. 16:21), the end of the age (Mk. 13), love, the Father, and the Holy Spirit (Jn. 14-16), was given only to the inner circle (6:68).

diseases. The diseases mentioned in Scripture appear largely to have been entities that are well known, and as a whole identical with those that now exist, especially in semitropical climates like that of Palestine. Instead of naming the disease involved, however, the Bible often simply mentions symptoms (e.g., fever, itch, sore).

I. Diseases with primary manifestations in skin. The hygienic measures outlined in Leviticus agree with modern concepts of communicable disease control, especially regarding the availability of running water and the isolation of the patient. Two kinds of skin disease are recognized in Leviticus: (1) those classified as ṣāra ʿat H7669 (called “leprosy” in the KJV), which were believed to require isolation, and (2) those not requiring isolation. Leviticus 13 gives clear diagnostic distinctions and procedural guides based on the developmental characteristics of the various diseases. Some Orthodox Jews believe that human ṣāra ʿat diseases include leprosy, syphilis, smallpox, boils, scabies, fungus infections (e.g., favus, tinea, actinomycosis), all of which are known to be potentially contagious, but also some that are doubtfully contagious, such as pemphigus, dermatitis herpetiformis, and skin cancer. In addition, the Hebrew term is applied to certain mold and fungus growths in houses and on cloth, conditions assuming importance from the standpoint of human allergy, often with manifestations in the form of asthma.

1. Leprosy (“Hansen’s disease”), as defined today, is the name for disease processes caused by the microorganism Mycobacterium leprae. It is evident that the Hebrew word ṣāra ʿat includes a variety of skin diseases, and most scholars now believe that it does not cover true leprosy. Hansen’s disease occurs in two types: (a) The lepromatous type begins with brownish-red spots on the face, ears, forearms, thighs, and/or buttocks that later become thickened nodules and, losing their skin covering, become ulcers (“sores”) with subsequent loss of tissue and then contraction and deformity. (b) The tuberculoid type is characterized by numbness of an affected area of skin and deformity such as fingers like claws resulting from paralysis and consequent muscle wasting (atrophy). Leviticus 13 and other passages dealing with skin disease make no reference to the deformity associated with true leprosy.

2. Syphilis is regarded by some Orthodox Jews as probably the disease called the “boils of Egypt” in Deut. 28:27 (KJV, “botch of Egypt”). It is a disease that from time to time throughout the ages has burst forth in virulent form with high mortality (cf. Num. 25:9). It is chiefly spread by sexual intercourse and is often associated with gonorrhea (cf. the “bodily discharge” in Lev. 22:4). Starting with a hard ulcer on the private parts, after some weeks raised spots (papular eruption) appear on the torso and extremities (almost never on the face), with no itching. Years later, syphilis of the vital organs such as heart, liver, or brain may become evident, often with fatal outcome. Some have thought that this late type of syphilis is in view in Prov. 7:22-23: “...he followed her [the harlot] like an ox going to the slaughter /...till an arrow pierces his liver, like a bird darting into a snare, / little knowing it will cost him his life.” Syphilis may be present also from birth and give rise to abnormalities such as those listed in Lev. 21:18-20.

3. Smallpox, uncontrolled, is a serious scourge of mankind, though over the last quarter of a century there has been a remarkable decrease of incidence. It consists of red spots that turn rapidly into blisterlike pustules over the entire body, including the face. A. R. Short (The Bible and Modern Medicine [1953]) suggested that Job’s “sores” (Job. 2:7) were actually smallpox. The Hebrew word here (šēḥîn H8825), usually translated “boil,” may indicate several types of diseased skin, today referred to as (a) papule (a raised red spot), (b) vesicle (a small blister containing yellow fluid; called “blain” in KJV), (c) pustule (a small blister containing pus), (d) boil (a deep, broad inflammation about a hair root resulting in death of the tissues in its center, with pus formation about this core, the pus discharging through an external opening), (e) carbuncle (a large boil with multiple openings), and (f) malignant pustule (anthrax).

4. Hezekiah’s “boil” (2 Ki. 20:7) which was almost fatal, may well have been a true boil or carbuncle. Another suggestion is that it was anthrax. The local application of a poultice of figs has been recognized therapy for gumboils in comparatively recent times. Its use by HEZEKIAH at the command of God’s prophet has often been cited as divine approval of the utilization of medicinal means of therapy.

5. Festering boils are recorded among the plagues of Egypt (Exod. 9:9). This disease has provoked much speculation and two alternative explanations. (a) Since both man and beast were infected with virtually the same disease, it may have been smallpox in humans and cowpox in cattle, the germ of cowpox being originally utilized for vaccination against smallpox. (b) The “terrible” fifth plague (9:3) was anthrax of animals, later transmitted to man as malignant pustule (anthrax). Untreated, anthrax is a fatal infectious disease, chiefly of cattle and sheep, characterized by the formation of hard lumps and ulcers and symptoms of collapse. In man without modern therapy it is often fatal.

6. Scabies is called “the itch, from which you cannot be cured” (Deut. 28:27). It is caused by a tiny insect allied to spiders that burrows under the skin. The itching is intense. Infection is spread to others through close bodily contact. The ancients knew no cure for it, but it readily responds to modern medicines.

B. Diseases not requiring isolation. These probably included what today are known as eczema, psoriasis, and impetigo. Of these only impetigo is very contagious; it is of very superficial character without system manifestations. (The scurvy of modern medicine, caused by vitamin C deficiency, is not a skin disease and thus obviously different from the “scurvy” of KJV.) Inflammation, present in wounds, bruises, and sores, is aggravated by accompanying infection when the skin is broken. “Wounds” are usually due to external violence; when the skin is unbroken they are called “bruises.” A “sore,” more properly called an ulcer, is a wound in which the skin and the underlying tissues are laid open, almost invariably becoming infected.

II. Diseases with primarily internal manifestations

A. Plague evidently played a major role in OT history. It begins with fever and chills that are followed by prostration, delirium, headache, vomiting, and diarrhea. Caused by the germ Pasteurella pestis, two forms of plague occur, both being sudden in onset and very serious.

1. Bubonic plague apparently broke out among the PHILISTINES when they placed the captured ARK OF THE COVENANT in an idol temple (1 Sam. 5). This disease is transmitted by rats through infected fleas that they carry on their bodies, the fleas transferring to humans for livelihood after the rat host dies of the disease. The disease causes the lymph nodes of the groin and armpits to enlarge to the size of walnuts. These enlarged nodes are known as buboes (KJV, “emerods”; NIV, “tumors”; NJPS, “hemorrhoids”). This outbreak of bubonic plague was attributed to “rats that are destroying the country” (6:5).

2. Pneumonic plague is transmitted by droplet spray from the mouth. The first case in an epidemic apparently arises from a case of bubonic plague that has been complicated by plague pneumonia. Untreated pneumonic plague is always fatal. The victim goes to bed apparently well and is found dead by morning. Very likely it was either bubonic or pneumonic plague or both that destroyed SENNACHERIB’s army (2 Ki. 19:35) when 185,000 men were all “dead bodies” by early morning.

B. Consumption doubtless included tuberculosis, malaria, typhoid fever, typhus fever, dysentery, chronic diarrhea, and cholera. These diseases are contagious and are sometimes referred to as “pestilences,” being especially prevalent under circumstances of impaired nutrition and crowding such as are encountered in the siege of a city (e.g., Deut. 28:21-22; Jer. 21:6-7, 9).

1. Tuberculosis occurs in acute or chronic form, more commonly the latter. Under the living conditions of OT days, it probably not only attacked the lungs (common form in America today), but also the bones and joints (common in underdeveloped lands today). “Crookback” (cf. the extreme hunchback of Lev. 21:20) may result from tuberculosis of the spinal vertebrae or less commonly from severe back injury. Tuberculosis anywhere in the body may produce fever, defective nutrition with underweight, or discharge of infectious pus (referred to as an “issue” in Leviticus). The disease may produce chronic invalidism or death if the disease process is not arrested.

2. Typhoid fever and typhus fever both give rise to similar symptoms of steady fever and delirium lasting for a matter of weeks, often fatal. Typhoid fever is transmitted through contamination in water and contamination that flies carry to food and drink. Typhus fever is transmitted to humans by lice that have fed on infected human beings.

3. Malaria may have been the “great fever” with which PETER’s mother-in-law was stricken (Lk. 4:38; cf. also Lev. 26:16; Deut. 28:22). Transmitted by certain species of mosquito, malaria is responsible for much chronic illness. A chill followed by fever often subsides in a few hours only to recur more severely some hours later, continuing intermittently thereafter. Death may follow if the disease is not treated.

4. Diarrhea, dysentery, and cholera, caused by microorganisms taken into the body in contaminated food or drink, were doubtless prevalent in OT times. They are characterized by frequent watery bowel movements, often by vomiting and fever, and if protracted, by weakness and prostration. PUBLIUS’s father’s illness (Acts 28:8) is probably rightly translated by NIV as “fever and dysentery,” a diarrhea associated with painful spasms of the bowel, ulceration, and infection, either amoebic or bacillary, giving rise to blood and pus in the excreta. As to cholera, it is fatal in half of the cases when modern treatment is not utilized.

III. Diseases Caused by Worms and Snakes

A. Intestinal roundworm infection (ascariasis) is a common disease today in lands where sanitation is poor, and is believed to have been responsible for Herod AGRIPPA I’s death (Acts 12:21-23). The pinkish yellow roundworm, Ascaris lumbricoides, is about 10-16 in. (26-41 cm.) long and 0.2 in. (0.5 cm.) in diameter. Aggregated worms sometimes form a tight ball with their interlocking bodies so as to obstruct the intestine, producing severe pain and copious vomiting of worms. If the obstruction is not promptly relieved by surgery, death may ensue. The roundworm does not chew and devour, but feeds on the nutrient fluids in the bowel and may work its way through diseased portions of the bowel as though it had eaten a hole through it. JOSEPHUS's account of Agrippa's death (Ant. 19.8.2 §§343-52) is highly suggestive of the intestinal obstruction produced by these worms.

B. The Guinea worm (Dracunculus medinensis), formerly called the serpent or dragon worm, has probably been known longer than any other human parasite. It is still found in interior ARABIA and the adjacent RED SEA coast. The infection enters the human body through drinking water containing Cyclops (an almost microscopic water insect) infected with tiny Guinea worm larvae. In about one year the female worm attains a length of 3 ft. (1 m.), being 0.07 in. (0.17 cm.) in diameter, usually maturing under the skin of the leg or arm. A blister is raised in the skin through which a huge brood of tiny larvae are extruded. This area itches and burns intensely. Death may result from internal complications or severe secondary infection, particularly if the worm is broken. The ancient and modern treatment consists in hastening the extrusion of larvae with cold water followed by gradual extraction of the worm. This is done by winding the worm around a stick of wood without breaking it, taking a turn or two of the stick each day. Complete removal takes about three weeks.

C. The snake-bite that PAUL received was doubtless inflicted by a venomous snake of the pit-viper type (Acts 28:3-6). Experts today stress that the bite of a venomous snake is not poisonous unless it is accompanied by envenomation, the latter failing to take place if the contents of the poison sac located at the base of the snake's hollow fangs have just previously been completely squeezed out, or if the sac is ineffectively squeezed when the snake strikes. Some suggest that envenomation did not take place in Paul's case, but that the snake, enraged by the fire, repeatedly struck at surrounding objects and exhausted all its venom before fastening itself to Paul's hand. This is a frequent occurrence and makes for difficulty in assessing the degree of envenomation and evaluating the efficacy of one snake-bite treatment as compared with another. When envenomation with pit-viper venom takes place, the tissues may quickly swell to three or four times their normal size in the region of the bite.

IV. Diseases of the Eyes

A. Epidemic blindness, described in 2 Ki. 6:18, when a whole army was struck with blindness, is not the rarity that some may imagine. For example, Richard H. Pousma, a medical missionary in China in the 1920s, was in close contact with an army contingent that was decimated with blindness in a few days. Gonorrhea of the sexual organs had been occurring sporadically. Suddenly this same gonorrhea germ in the midst of unsanitary conditions changed its propensities so as to produce acute blinding inflammation of the eyes in violent epidemic form, spreading from eye to eye like wildfire, which is one of the recognized potentialities of this germ. Many of the soldiers were permanently blinded. The army troops that had been the most feared for their cruel depredations were suddenly rendered powerless, and the condition of the men was pitiful as one saw them trying to grope their way about, the totally blind being led about by the partially blind.

B. Paul's illness (2 Cor. 12:7), which he described as “a thorn in my flesh,” is considered by many authorities to have been trachoma, an infectious eye disease. Early in the disease there is often acute inflammation of the eyelids, which makes the lids feel like sandpaper. This frequently spreads on to the bulb of the eye, especially the cornea, the transparent part of the bulb, which becomes red and inflamed. At this state, infection with other germs is often added. Pus seeps out over the lid margins, forming a tough, crusting scab as it dries and unites with the greasy secretion of the glands of the lid margin. It is possible that Paul's blindness encountered on the DAMASCUS road was of this type. For three days the secretion was evidently so severe that it formed incrustations at the lid margins such as to glue and mat together the lashes of the lids, so that the eyelids could not be parted. At the end of this time we are told he saw again after scabs fell from his eyes. Later Paul may have been afflicted with chronic trachoma, for (a) he failed to recognize the high priest (Acts 23:2-5); (b) the Galatians offered their good eyes for his (Gal. 4:13-15); and (c) he wrote with “large letters” (6:11). Other scholars interpret these passages differently.

V. Nervous and Mental Diseases. While terminology and explanations of the causes of emotional and mental diseases have varied greatly through the centuries, there is clear insight in the Scriptures concerning the relationship between the emotional state and physical disease (psychosomatic medicine). This is exemplified in Prov. 17:22: “A cheerful heart is good medicine, / but a crushed spirit dries up the bones.” The cheerful heart can resolve excessive emotional tension in a manner superior to that of any tranquilizer. In contrast, some forms of arthritis occur on an emotional basis, the outcome of a “crushed spirit,” whereby the bones are seemingly dried of joint lubrication. Both ELIJAH and JONAH were men who lapsed into states of extreme nervous exhaustion, often referred to as neurasthenia, a common condition amid the tension of modern days. God’s method of dealing with this condition as outlined in 1 Ki. 19 and in Jon. 4 is a model for modern psychiatric therapy. In the case of EPAPHRODITUS (Phil. 2:25-30) there is clear recognition then as today of the role played by pressure of work and anxiety as he endeavored to accomplish a colossal task unaided by those who should have been his helpers. No doubt there was physical illness superimposed on the emotional tension in his case, often true in modern times as well.

In addition, there are mental diseases that are recognized as disease entities just as distinctive as appendicitis or pneumonia. The general term used in KJV for those so afflicted is “lunatic,” though formerly this term referred to epilepsy as well as insanity because of a supposed relationship to the phases of the moon. As today, legal responsibility for actions was regarded as tempered by proof of mental incompetence. Hence we find DAVID escaping from ACHISH by pretending “insanity” (1 Sam. 21:13-15). Perhaps he was even imitating some of SAUL’s actions. The modern psychiatrist would diagnose Saul’s state as manic-depressive insanity, with its periods of black melancholy, flashes of homicidal violence, and deeply rooted delusion that people were plotting against him, characteristically ending in Saul’s suicide. NEBUCHADNEZZAR (Dan. 4:24-28) is considered by Short to have been a victim of paranoia, a delusional form of insanity well known to medical science.

VI. Miscellaneous Medical Disorders and Therapy

A. The woman’s issue of blood (NIV “bleeding”) of twelve years’ duration (Lk. 8:43-44) was doubtless excessive menstrual flow, a fairly common condition. In its severe form, it is commonly due to fibroid tumors in the womb encroaching on the lining of the womb. A flow of blood with large clots occurs, depleting the body of blood and causing severe anemia. The modern remedy usually used in this condition is removal of the tumor from the womb or removal of the womb (hysterectomy). This surgery obviously was not available in NT times, so it is quite understandable that all this woman’s living was spent on unsuccessful medical care.

B. In connection with Jesus’ agony in GETHSEMANE, we read that “his sweat was like drops of blood falling to the ground” (Lk. 22:44). Some have thought that this refers to actual blood-tinged sweat. Short tends to take this point of view despite his confession that this phenomenon must be very rare and is not well authenticated. Rather it seems that the emphasis here is to be put on the word “like,” referring to the size and weight of the drops of sweat. It should be recalled that this occurred at night. Jesus' enemies carried lanterns and torches, but evidently he had neither. The color of the sweat was therefore unobservable. Some suggest that the drops of sweat sounded like blood clots falling on the ground.

C. Gangrene. TIMOTHY was admonished to shun profane babblings because "their teaching will spread like gangrene" (2 Tim. 2:17). The term refers to local death of the tissues. Common forms of gangrene are: (a) gas gangrene, a rapidly fatal type caused by a spreading gas-forming germ in muscles after recent injury; (b) diabetic gangrene, a "dry" gangrene that spreads less rapidly caused by circulatory impairment associated with uncontrolled diabetes; (c) septic gangrene that spreads from the edges of infected ulcers.

D. Dropsy (Lk. 14:2), in modern medical language called edema, is a condition in which the tissues retain too much fluid. It may be caused by heart disease, kidney disease, or local infection, and may terminate fatally.

E. Dwarfism is referred to in Lev. 21:20. People may have been dwarfed through tuberculosis or injury of the spine, but deficiency of thyroid function such as is found in cretinism is also a likely cause. In the latter condition there is also usually mental deficiency, and this gives added reason for not permitting such an individual to participate in priestly service. Cretinism today responds well to thyroid extract therapy if administered early in life.

F. As to orthopedic conditions, reference is made to the maimed (those whose bodies are deprived of a part) and the halt (those who limp in walking because of lameness from a disabled lower extremity). The latter may be due to a fracture that has healed in an unfavorable position or it may be due to atrophy (wasting) of the muscles. Atrophy of a hand is referred to as a "shriveled" hand in Lk. 6:6 (KJV, "withered"). Atrophy usually results from palsy or paralysis (synonymous terms), a condition characterized by loss of control of movement of muscles through disease or destruction of nerves or nervous tissue.

G. Muteness, that is, inability to speak, may arise from deafness since one will naturally find it difficult to reproduce unheard sounds. It also may arise from hemorrhage (apoplexy) or thrombosis (clotting) in relation to the blood vessels of one or more of the speech centers of the brain. Often a marked degree of recovery takes place in these instances of so-called stroke as the clotted blood is gradually absorbed from the affected area. Such may have happened to ZECHARIAH (Lk. 1:20-22, 64), whereas NABAL (1 Sam. 25:36-38) evidently experienced a fatal stroke.

H. Frequent instances of unspecified sickness occur throughout the biblical record. Some of these cases of sickness did not experience divine healing. For example, Paul informs us, "I left Trophimus sick in Miletus" (2

Tim. 4:20). The apostle also states that three times he prayed for the removal of his thorn in the flesh; he was answered not by removal of his infirmity but by being given more grace (2 Cor. 12:8-10). Therefore, the Bible does not teach that all Christians are entitled to divine healing by virtue of being believers.

JAMES urges that the church elders be called to pray for the sick. He also directs that they “anoint him with oil in the name of the Lord” (Jas. 5:14). This directive has perhaps wrongfully been assumed to refer to a church ritual. The verb ANOINT commonly referred to rubbing oil on the skin as a household remedy. It would seem to be James’s meaning that the sick one is not only to be prayed for but the commonly accepted remedies are also to be applied as an indication of compassionate concern. Jesus’ disciples made similar use of the application of oil to the sick (Mk. 6:13).

dish. A receptacle for food, generally made of baked clay or else of metal. The “chargers” (NIV “silver plates”) of Num. 7 were large flat dishes of beaten silver, but most of the dishes in Scripture were pottery. Orientals ate from a central platter or dish, generally using a thin piece of bread for a spoon and handling the food quite daintily (Matt. 26:23). A special courtesy consisted in picking out a good piece of meat from the central dish and handing it to a guest. See also POTTERY.

Dishan. di’shan (Heb. dîšān H1915, possibly “mountain goat” or “ibex”). Seventh son of SEIR and chief of a HORITE clan (Gen. 36:21, 28, 30; 1 Chr. 1:38, 42 [in the latter reference the MT reads “Di-shon”]). Dishan had both a brother and a nephew called DISHON, and some argue that the two forms are variant spellings of the same name, thus reflecting some kind of confusion in the genealogies.

Dishon. di’shon (Heb. dîšôn H1914, possibly “mountain goat” or “ibex”). (1) Fifth son of SEIR and chief of a HORITE clan (Gen. 36:21, 26 [MT, “Dishan”], 30; 1 Chr. 1:38, 41b). See DISHAN.

(2) Son of ANAH and grandson of Seir the Horite (Gen. 36:25; 1 Chr. 1:41a); his sister OHOLIBAMAH became ESAU’s wife.

dispensation. This English term is used by the KJV four times as the rendering of Greek oikonomia G3873. In three of those passages (1 Cor. 9:17; Eph. 3:2; Col. 1:25) it refers to the commission PAUL was given so that the GOSPEL of divine GRACE might be dispensed to others. The fourth passage (Eph. 1:10, but also 3:9, where KJV translates differently) uses the term more broadly of God's plan of SALVATION (3:2 shows the conceptual connection between these two uses of the term). This Greek noun is also used in Lk 16:2-4 with regard to the "management" or "stewardship" of a business (cf. in the same passage the term oikonomos G3874, "manager" or "steward"), and in 1 Tim. 1:4 with the possible meaning of "training."

The modern theological use of the term as a "period of time during which man is tested in respect to obedience to some specific revelation of the will of God" (Scofield) is not found in Scripture. Nevertheless, the Scriptures do make a distinction between the way God manifested his grace in what may be called the "Old Covenant" and the way his grace has been manifested since the death of Christ in the "New Covenant," and there are accompanying differences in the requirements that God has for believers. Paul has this in mind when he speaks of God's dispensations in Ephesians and Colossians. In God's redemptive plan the era of law prepared the way, by types and shadows, for the new era of salvation through Christ, which in the NT is regarded as the climax of history (Heb. 1:2).

Dispersion. Also Diaspora. A term applied to the scattering of Jews outside of Palestine. God had warned the Jews through MOSES that dispersion among other nations would be their lot if they departed from the Mosaic Law (Deut. 4:27; 28:64-68). These prophecies were largely fulfilled in the two captivities, by Assyria and Babylonia (see EXILE), but there were other captivities by the rulers of Egypt and Syria, and by Pompey, which helped scatter the Israelites. Especially from the time of ALEXANDER THE GREAT, many thousands of Jews emigrated for the purposes of trade and commerce into the neighboring countries, particularly the chief cities. By the time of Christ the Diaspora must have been several times the population of Palestine. As early as 525 B.C. there had been a temple of the Lord in Elephantine (an island in the NILE River), in the early years of the Maccabean struggle. The synagogues in every part of the known world helped greatly in the spread of Christianity, for Paul invariably went to them in every city he visited. The Greek word diaspora G1402 occurs three times in the NT (Jn. 7:35; Jas. 1:1; 1 Pet. 1:1).

dissension. See HERESY; SECT; UNITY.

dissipation. This English term, referring to intemperate conduct, is used by the NIV to render two different Greek words (Lk. 21:34; 1 Pet. 4:4). Other terms, such as debauchery and licentiousness, are used variously by English versions to indicate extreme indulgence. See also DRUNKENNESS.

distaff. A stick used to hold the wool or flax fibers in the process of spinning (Prov. 31:19).

Dives. di'veez. The name traditionally given to the rich man in the parable of the rich man and LAZARUS (Lk. 16:19-31). Actually, his name is nowhere given in the parable, but the Greek term for “rich” corresponds to Latin dives (cf. Vulgate), and the latter began to be used as the man’s name as early as the second century.

divided kingdom. See ISRAEL; JUDAH.

divination. The practice of consulting beings (divine, human, or departed) or things (by observing objects or actions, that is, omens) in the attempt to gain information about the future and such other matters as are removed from normal knowledge. Those who practice divination assume that the gods or spirits are in possession of secret knowledge desired by humans and they can be induced to impart it. Divination was highly developed by all ancient peoples—the Babylonians, Egyptians, Greeks, Romans, etc.—and even the Hebrews practiced it, though it was severely condemned by MOSES and the prophets. Deuteronomy 18:10-11 is the classical passage on this subject. There were various modes of divination: by reading omens; dreams, both involuntary and those induced by what is called “incubation” (i.e., by sleeping in some sacred place where the god revealed his secrets to the sleeper); the use of the lot; hydromancy or foretelling from the appearance of water; astrology or the determination of the supposed influence of the heavenly bodies on the destiny of a person or nation; rhabdomancy or the use of the divining rod (Hos. 4:12; Ezek. 8:17); hepatoscopy or divination by an examination of the liver of animals; necromancy or consulting the dead; and the sacrifice of children by burning.

Diviners’ Oak. The RSV rendering of ʔēlôn mē ʕōnnûm (Jdg. 9:37; KJV, “the plain of Meonenim”; NRSV, “Elon-meonenim”; NIV, “soothsayers’ tree”). This tree was evidently in a prominent place, possibly on a small rise. The translation “Diviners” is based on the Hebrew term’s derivation from a verb that can mean “to practice soothsaying.” The existence of a tree in Canaan used for augury is not surprising in view of the widespread practice of DIVINATION.

divorce. An act whereby a legal MARRIAGE is dissolved publicly and the participants are freed from further obligations of the matrimonial relationship. It is an ancient device that has varied procedurally over the centuries, but in the main it has been instituted on the initiative of the husband.

© Dr. James C. Martin. Israel Museum, Jerusalem. Photographed by permission.

This papyrus written in Aramaic is a get or “certificate of divorce,” found at Wadi Murabba^{at} and dated to A.D. 111.

Among the ancient Sumerians it was easy for a man to divorce his wife, especially if she had failed to produce children. Among the Babylonians, the Code of HAMMURABI (18th cent. B.C.) provided for divorce under certain circumstances but included the return of the dowry to the wife, a situation that would give many men pause for contemplation. Where there was no dowry, the husband was required to make a payment of silver according to a schedule that was organized in terms of the social status of the wife’s family. But if the wife had been negligent in her household duties, she could be sent away without payment or simply replaced and demoted to the position of a servant or a slave (Code of Hammurabi, 141, 143). Simpler and more severe was the Middle Assyrian law code, which stated that, with no fault specified, the wife could be divorced and sent away empty-handed (Middle Assyrian Laws, 37). Generally speaking, it was an unusual and, therefore, more complex situation if a wife instituted divorce proceedings. Divorce was discouraged in the fourth century B.C. in Egypt, and later by the Hebrews, through the imposition of a substantial fine on the husband, known as “divorce money.”

Although the OT seems to permit divorce for rather general reasons (Deut. 24:1), it was usually either for adultery or childlessness. The bill of divorce could be a simple repudiation, such as, “She is not my wife, and I am not her husband” (Hos. 2:2). Either party could begin the divorce proceedings (Mk. 10:11-12). Because of the strength of the family unit, divorce was in actual fact not very common among the Hebrews. Nevertheless, in the postexilic period, in order for the purity of the Hebrew faith to be maintained, wholesale divorce was required by EZRA of those Jews who had married foreign wives in Babylonia (Ezra 9:2; 10:3, 16-17).

A Greek marriage could be dissolved at any time either by mutual consent or by the husband without cause, while the wife could institute divorce proceedings against her husband where she could prove persistent adultery on his part. In the early Roman period there was little divorce, but, typically, Roman law is quite specific about the marriage contract and its dissolution. The contract could be nullified by mutual consent, or for a variety of reasons that might be considered valid by the husband. If the wife proved to be barren, suffered from a chronic illness, or showed evidence of insanity, she could be divorced on those grounds. If she had attempted to kill her husband, or if she had committed adultery, she could also be divorced. In about 17 B.C. a law was passed that made it an offense for a husband to keep a wife known to be an adulteress. By the fourth and fifth centuries A.D. there was some curtailment of the grounds for divorce, but it was still relatively easy for either party to initiate proceedings.

Jesus asserts that God had, under the Mosaic law, allowed divorce only as a concession to the hardness of the human heart (Matt. 19:8). Considerable debate has surrounded the so-called exceptive clause in Jesus’ condemnation of divorce: “except for marital unfaithfulness” (5:32; 19:9; this clause does not appear in the parallels, Mk. 10:11-12; Lk. 16:18). Interpretations include: subsequent discovery of premarital unchastity, marriage in violation of the prohibited degrees (Lev. 18), extramarital sex relations, and failure to perform marital responsibility. Similarly, interpreters disagree as to whether PAUL permitted divorce and remarriage under certain circumstances (1 Cor. 7:12-15). Such differences of opinion, however, should not be allowed to minimize the clear scriptural injunctions to preserve the marriage relationship.

Dizahab. diz´uh-hab (Heb. dî zāhāb H1903, possibly “possessor of gold”). Also Di-zahab. A locality listed along with PARAN, TOPHEL, LABAN, and HAZEROTH to specify the place where MOSES delivered the messages of the book of DEUTERONOMY to Israel (Deut. 1:1). The exact location of Dizahab has not been established. The context suggests a location in the E of the ARABAH. The other locations named provide no assistance since they are also unknown.

doctor. This English term (from Latin doctor, “teacher”) is used by the KJV to render the Greek noun didaskalos G1437, “teacher” (only in Lk. 2:46; cf. also “doctor of the law” for nomodidaskalos G3799, Lk. 5:17; Acts 5:34). See SCRIBE. The NIV uses the term doctor in its modern sense of PHYSICIAN a few times (Matt. 9:12 and parallels; Col. 4:14). See OCCUPATIONS AND PROFESSIONS.

doctrine. This term is used frequently by the KJV to render the Greek terms didaskalia G1436 (e.g., 1 Tim. 1:10) and didachē G1439 (e.g., Acts 2:42), both of which mean “teaching,” usually emphasizing the content of what is taught. In the Greek world, teaching implied the communication of knowledge; for the most part it had a clear intellectual character. Among the Jews, especially in the OT, teaching served not simply to communicate religious truth, but rather to bring the one taught into direct confrontation with the divine will. What is taught are the commandments; what is expected is obedience. Thus MOSES is taught what he should do (Exod. 4:15), and he in turn teaches Israel the commandments (Deut. 4:1, 5, et al.), which they likewise are to teach to their children (Deut. 6:1, 6, 7, et al.).

For the most part the NT use corresponds more to the OT idea than to the Greek. That is, teaching usually implies the content of ethical instruction and seldom the content of dogmas or the intellectual apprehension of truth. For example, in the Pastoral Epistles “sound doctrine that conforms to the glorious gospel” is contrasted with all kinds of immoral living (1 Tim. 1:9-11; cf. 6:1, 3; Tit. 1:9; 2:1-5, 9-10). This usage is strengthened by the relationship of didachē to kērygma G3060, “preaching.” It was by means of the preaching that sinners were brought to faith in Christ (1 Cor. 1:21); and the content of that preaching included the essential data of the Christian message: the life, work, death, and resurrection of Jesus Christ as God’s decisive act for the sinner’s salvation (cf. Acts 2:14-36). Those who responded to the preaching would then be instructed in the ethical principles and obligations of the Christian life (2:42). Since ethical instruction or obedience to the divine will in the NT is so closely related to response to the preaching with its “doctrinal” content, it is not surprising that teaching itself eventually came to include the essential data of the faith. Thus didachē can refer to the truth of the INCARNATION, belief in which, of course, should eventuate in LOVE (2 Jn. 9-10). This latter meaning of “teaching,” as including “doctrine,” or the essential beliefs of the Christian faith, ultimately prevailed in the early church and continues in vogue today.

Dodai. doh´di (Heb. dôday H1862, “beloved”) Apparently a variant of DODO. Dodai the AHOHITE, one of DAVID’s military officers, was in charge of the division for the second month (1 Chr. 27:4). He was probably the same person identified as the father of Eleazar, one of David’s famous warriors (2 Sam. 23:9; 1 Chr. 11:12; the KJV and other versions read “Dodo” in both verses).

Dodanim. See RODANIM.

Dodava. doh´duh-vuh. See DODAVAHU.

Dodavahu. doh´duh-vay´hyoo (Heb. dôdāwāhû H1845, “beloved of Yahweh”). KJV Dodavah. The father of the prophet ELIEZER of Mareshah, who condemned JEHOSHAPHAT king of Judah for his alliance with AHAZIAH of Israel and foretold the destruction of his navy (2 Chr. 20:37).

Dodo. doh´doh (Heb. dôdô H1861, “[his] beloved”). (1) Grandfather of TOLA; the latter was a judge (leader) in ISSACHAR (Jdg. 10:1).

(2) Father of ELEAZAR; the latter was one of DAVID’s famous warriors (2 Sam. 23:9; 1 Chr. 11:12; in these verses NIV reads “Dodai”). Apparently the same as DODAI the Ahohite (1 Chr. 27:4).

(3) Father of ELHANAN; the latter was one of David’s famous warriors (2 Sam. 23:24; 1 Chr. 11:26).

doe. See ANIMALS.

Doeg. doh´ig (Heb. dô ʿēg H1795, possibly “anxious”). An Edomite who served King SAUL as head shepherd (1 Sam. 21:7; 22:9, 18, 22; Ps. 52 title). When DAVID, fleeing from Saul, came to NOB, Doeg was being “detained before the LORD” for some reason. He reported to Saul about the help AHIMELECH the priest had given David (1 Sam. 21:1-9). In revenge Saul gathered all the house of Ahimelech and Doeg killed them, eighty-five priests, all the women and children of the village, and even the cattle (22:11-23).

dominion. See AUTHORITY.

Domitian. duh-mish´uhn. When the popular TITUS died at the untimely age of forty-two (A.D. 81), after only two years and a few months as emperor, he was succeeded by his thirty-year-old brother Domitian (born A.D. 51), whom neither Titus nor their father VESPASIAN had expected to be called to the task. Domitian (whose full name was Titus Flavius Domitianus) was no trained soldier like his two predecessors, and he came to office, a despised younger brother, embittered by his elders' contempt, a resentment all the deeper for his keen intellect. Sensitive about his absence of military glory, Domitian ordered an attack on the Chatti of the Main Valley, and celebrated his victory in a great triumphal celebration.

Unfortunately, the pathological fears and suspicions of Domitian revived in ROME the hated cult of delation—that pernicious system of the common informer and the law of treason that so played into his hands. Among Domitian's victims were the Christians. He was heir to a policy and legislation established by NERO and sporadically pursued under Vespasian and Titus, both of whom had links with Palestine and entertained some fear of any movement initiated there. But Domitian, with a sharp eye for treason and enthusiastic for the Caesar-cult (see EMPEROR WORSHIP), justly ranks with Nero as a systematic persecutor. It is usually thought that the book of Revelation was written during the reign of Domitian and reflected the emperor's anti-Christian attitude. Domitian was murdered in the year 96, after a plot supported by his wife, who felt the insecurity of her own position.

door. Ancient doors usually were made of wood, sometimes sheeted with metal as in the case of city gates or in large public buildings. Sometimes they were made of one slab of stone or, rarely, a single piece of metal. Hinges on doors, as known today, were unknown; instead, doors turned on pivots set in sockets above and below. The sockets were made of stone or, sometimes, of metal. In Egypt, the hinge consisted of a socket of metal with a projecting pivot, into which two corners of the door were inserted. A wide doorway had a pair of folding doors (Isa. 45:1); which could be bolted with bars of wood (Nah. 3:13) or of metal (Isa. 45:2; Ps. 107:16; NIV, “gates”). The temple doors were two-leaved (1 Ki. 6:34). Doors were provided with a bolt (2 Sam. 13:17) or with lock and key (Jdg. 3:23). The term door is also used metaphorically, as in Jn. 10:7, “I am the door” (NIV, “gate”); Acts 14:27, “he had opened the door of faith to the Gentiles”; and Rev. 3:20, “I stand at the door and knock.” See ARCHITECTURE; GATE.

doorkeeper. A person who guarded the entrance to public buildings, temples, city walls, etc. The NIV uses this term a number of times, for example, with reference to those who guarded the ARK OF THE COVENANT (1 Chr. 15:23). To be a lowly doorkeeper of the temple is preferred to a life of wickedness (Ps. 84:10). The doorkeeper of a rich man’s house is mentioned by Jesus as an example of one who watches faithfully (Mk. 13:34; NIV, “the one at the door”). A doorkeeper might guard the entrance of a sheepfold (Jn. 10:3; NIV, “watchman”).

Dophkah. dof’kuh (Heb. dopqâ H1986, meaning disputed). A place where the children of Israel encamped on their journey from the RED SEA to SINAI (Num. 33:12-13). Some scholars identify it with Serabit el-Khadim, where the Egyptians carried on mining, and where the famous “Sinaitic Inscriptions” were found (dating from about 1525 B.C. and written in a Semitic hieroglyphic alphabet).

Dor was an important harbor along the Mediterranean Sea used by Phoenicians and Israelites during the period of the Israelite monarchy. (View to the S.)

Dor. dor (Heb. dôr H1888, “generation” or “dwelling”). A fortified city on the coast of Palestine, S of Mount CARMEL, c. 8 mi. (13 km.) N of CAESAREA. The surrounding hilly area was known as NAPHOTH DOR (Josh. 11:2; 12:23; 1 Ki. 4:11; cf. Josh. 17:11). It was settled in very ancient times by P^{HOENICIA} because of the abundance of shells along the coast which were the source of a rich PURPLE dye. The site is identified with modern Khirbet el-Burj (Tel Dor), N of TANTURAH. The king of Dor supported JABIN king of HAZOR in his unsuccessful battle against JOSHUA at the waters of MEROM (Josh. 11:2-5; 12:23). Dor was one of the cities within the borders of Issachar and Asher that were assigned to Manasseh, although Manasseh was unable to capture it. In later years, when it was captured, its Canaanite inhabitants were subjected by Israel to forced labor (Josh. 17:11-13; Jdg. 1:27-28). Dor and the neighboring territory were made the fourth administrative district by SOLOMON (1 Ki. 4:11).

Dorcas. dor'kuhs (Gk. Dorkas G1520, “gazelle,” corresponding to Aram. abyētā ܐܒܝܬܐ). A feminine name not uncommon to both Jews and Greeks, used in the NT to denote the Christian woman of JOPPA who died and was raised from the dead by PETER (Acts 9:36-43). Her ARAMAIC name was TABITHA, which has the same meaning as Dorcas. She was held in high esteem for her outstanding service to others. When she died, her friends sent for Peter. He prayed, and she was raised from the dead. As a result, many believed.

dot. This English term is used by the RSV and other versions in two passages (Matt. 5:18; Lk. 16:17; KJV, “tittle”) to render Greek kerāia G3037, which literally means “horn” but is used of any “projection.” In the context of writing, it can be applied to an accent, a diacritical mark, or a small part of an individual letter. Accordingly, the NRSV renders, “one stroke of a letter”; NIV, “the least stroke of a pen.”

Dothan. doh'thuhn (Heb. dōtān H2019, meaning uncertain). A prominent town in the boundaries between the tribes of MANASSEH and ISSACHAR, about 5 mi. (8 km.) S of the JEZREEL Valley and 11 mi. (19 km.) NNE of SAMARIA. If the doubtful suggestion is right that the name derives from an Aramaic word meaning “two wells,” it adds interest to the story of JOSEPH’s brothers casting him into a dry well-pit there (Gen. 37:24). Nearly a millennium after Joseph's experience, the prophet ELISHA (2 Ki. 6:13) was dwelling at Dothan when the king of SYRIA tried to capture him with an army, for he had learned that Elisha was able to tell his plans to the king of Israel, Joram (JEHORAM). When Elisha's servant informed him that a great host surrounded Dothan, Elisha prayed that the Lord would open his servant's eyes, and the servant saw angelic hosts defending his master. The site, modern Tell Dotan, was excavated by J. P. Free from A.D. 1953 onward. It showed habitation as early as c. 3000 B.C. and in the next millennium was surrounded by a thick wall. At the time of Joseph (2200-1550), it had a well-built fortress and a strong wall. Occupation continued in varying degrees of intensity until the Byzantine period.

double-minded. This English expression is used in Bible versions as a fairly literal rendering of Greek dipsychos G1500, which occurs twice (Jas. 1:8; 4:8). What James means by this word he makes clear with a further description: he is referring not simply to someone who experiences personal doubts, but to the one who is "unstable in all his ways." Set in context with an admonition to pray (1:5-6), it would be understood that the essence of prayer is the turning over of the entire mind to God. James's second use of the term is likewise set in an admonition to draw near to God. The answer to the double mind with its wavering loyalties, indecision, divided interests, and impurity was the rededication of the whole personality to Christ. See also DOUBLE-TONGUED.

double-tongued. An expression used by the KJV and other versions to render Greek dilogos G1474 ("two-worded"), which occurs only once in the NT (1 Tim. 3:8). The phrase "not double-tongued" (NIV has the clearer rendering, "sincere") designates one of the qualifications of a DEACON: he must not be someone who says one thing at one time and something else at another time (or perhaps who says one thing but means another). See DOUBLE-MINDED.

dough. The soft mass of moistened flour or meal that after baking becomes bread or cake. The word may apply to the mass before it has been raised by yeast, as in Exod. 12:34, 39, but generally after raising, as in Jer. 7:18 and Hos. 7:4.

dove. See BIRDS.

dove's dung. See PLANTS.

dowry. Money (or property) given by a bride to her husband at marriage. The word is used by the KJV several times to render Hebrew mōhar H4558, but this term refers to the compensation a husband pays to the bride's family, that is, a sum given to the father of the bride for her economic loss to the family. It is thus better translated "marriage present" or "bride-price" (Gen. 34:12; Exod. 22:17; 1 Sam. 18:25); this compensation could be paid in service (Gen. 29:18). Other Hebrew terms may be used in a similar way (cf. Gen 30:20; 1 Ki. 9:16).

doxology. An ascription of PRAISE or GLORY to God in song or prayer (from Gk. doxa G1518 "glory, praise, honor"). Although the word does not occur in the Bible, doxologies were uttered by angels to shepherds the night Jesus came into the world (Lk. 2:14) and by "the whole crowd of disciples" the day Jesus rode triumphantly into Jerusalem on Palm Sunday (19:37-38); the book of Revelation mentions doxologies by angels around the throne in heaven (Rev. 5:13) and by "a great multitude in heaven" (19:1-31). In the OT all five books of the Psalter end with a doxology, the last comprising a whole psalm in which "praise" appears thirteen times (Ps. 41:13; 72:18-19; 89:52; 106:48; 150:1-6). The LORD'S PRAYER is traditionally concluded with the doxology: "For thine is the kingdom, and the power, and the glory, for ever. Amen" (Matt. 6:13 KJV; it does not appear in some old Greek MSS); a similar statement is found in 1 Chr. 29:11. The longest and most comprehensive doxologies in the NT, frequently used as benedictions by pastors, are in Heb. 13:20-21 and Jude 24-25.

dragon. This English term is used in some Bible versions to render Hebrew tannîn H9490 (NIV, "monster") in passages that speak of cosmic combat (Job 7:12; Ps 74:13; Isa. 27:1; 57:9; Ezek. 29:3; 32:2; the Heb. word can also mean "snake," Exod. 7:9 et al.). In the book of Revelation it stands for Greek drakōn G1532 and designates SATAN (Rev. 12:3-17; 13:1-11; 16:13; 20:2).

dram. See WEIGHTS AND MEASURES.

drawer of water. An expression used by the KJV and other versions with reference to a lowly servant class (Deut. 29:11; Josh. 9:21-27; NIV, “water carrier”). Drawing WATER from a well or spring, usually located outside the city walls, was regarded as a menial task often performed by women (Gen. 24:13; 1 Sam. 9:11). Sometimes it was assigned to young men (Ruth 2:9). It may have been customary to subject defeated enemies to this service as Israel did to the GIBIONITES (Josh. 9:21-27).

dream. In early patriarchal times, God usually appeared in theophany to godly men (cf. ABRAHAM in Gen. 18), but from the time of JACOB onward his revelations were more often in dreams (e.g., 28:10-17.) He could reveal his will in dreams today, but the written Word of God and the indwelling HOLY SPIRIT have made dreams of this sort unnecessary for added revelation. (Contrast Num. 12:6 with Jude 8.) Often in ancient times God spoke in dreams to persons outside the chosen family, such as ABIMELECH of Gerar (Gen. 20:3), LABAN (31:24), the butler and baker of PHARAOH (40:8-19), PHARAOH himself (41:36), NEBUCHADNEZZAR (Dan. 2:1-45; 4:5-33). In these dreams either the meaning was clear enough to need no interpretation, as in those of Abimelech and Laban, or else God caused one of his servants to interpret the meaning, as in the latter cases. One principle of interpretation seems quite evident: When the symbol is in the natural realm, the interpretation is in the human realm; for example, when JOSEPH dreamed of the sun, moon, and eleven stars bowing to him, his brothers immediately knew the meaning as referring to his father, mother, and brothers (Gen. 37:9-11). When the symbol is in the human realm, as in Dan. 7:8, “Eyes like the eyes of a man and a mouth that spoke boastfully,” the interpretation is in the spiritual realm. Dreams may lead men astray, but God’s Word declares how to deal with this situation (Deut. 13:1-3; cf. 1 Jn. 4:1-6). In the NT, God spoke to MARY, MOTHER OF JESUS, through GABRIEL (Lk. 1:26-35), whereas JOSEPH received revelation through a dream (Matt. 1:20-24).

dress. Our knowledge of the kind of clothing worn by the people of biblical times comes from biblical statements; from representations of the people and their clothing found on monuments, reliefs, seals, plaques, and tomb-paintings; and from graves and tomb remains. All these, coupled with the traditions and usages extant among the present bedouin Arab tribes, lead us to conclude that at a very early period people learned the art of spinning and weaving cloth of hair, wool, cotton, flax, and eventually silk (Gen. 14:23; 31:18-19; 37:3; 38:28;

Job 7:6; Ezek. 16:10, 13). From these they established certain simple styles that were continued from generation to generation, then carried by E_{SAU} and I_{SHMAEL} and their descendants into A_{RA}BIA, where the Arab continued them through the centuries—always with a feeling that it was decidedly wrong to change. When the Arabs overran the larger part of the Bible lands in the sixth century A.D., they returned with these patterns of clothing. In general they have so nearly continued the basic forms that in unspoiled areas much the same garments are worn today as were worn by Jacob of OT times and by Jesus of NT times.

The clothing worn by the Hebrew people of biblical times was graceful, modest, and exceedingly significant. They were considered so much a part of those who wore them that they not only told who and what they were, but were intended as external symbols of the individual's innermost feelings and deepest desires, and his or her moral urge to represent God aright. With certain kinds of cloth and with astonishingly vivid colors of white, purple, scarlet, blue, yellow, and black, they represented the state of their minds and emotions. When joyful and ready to enter into festive occasions, they donned their clothing of brightest array; and when they mourned or humbled themselves, they put on sackcloth—literally cloth from which sacks were made—which was considered the very poorest kind of dress, and quite indicative of their lowly feelings (1 Ki. 20:31-32; Job 16:15; Isa. 15:3; Jer. 4:8; 6:26; Lam. 2:10; Ezek. 7:18; Dan. 9:3; Joel 1:8).

When a person's heart was torn by grief, the inner emotions were given expression by "rending" or tearing the garments (Mk. 14:63; Acts 11:14). To confirm an oath or seal a contract, a man plucked off his shoe and gave it to his neighbor (Ruth 4:8). When J_{ONATHAN} made a covenant with D_{AVID}, he went even farther and gave him his own garments (1 Sam. 18:3-4).

Red granite head of Pharaoh Amenophis III with double crown (from Thebes, 1390 B.C.). Headwear was used as a sign of authority and power.

There was variety in clothing characterizing the people from the various lands adjacent to Palestine, and within the narrow confines of the country itself there was a distinctive clothing that set off the Canaanite from the Philistine. Among the Hebrews there were slight differences in dress characterizing rank, trade, and profession. Yet it was little less than amazing how similar the general patterns were. The variety for the most part was in quality and in decoration. Clothing was colored, red, brown, yellow, etc., but white was much preferred. It denoted purity, cleanliness, and joy. Princes, priests, and kings of ANE countries wore purple, except on special occasions when they often dressed in white garments. Others sometimes wore white on the occasions of joy and gladness. But in general the people wore darker colors, yet they tended toward the brighter side.

The basic garments used among the men of biblical times seem to have consisted of the inner-tunic, the tunic-coat, the girdle, and the cloak. Added to this was the headdress and the shoes or sandals.

I. The inner-tunic or undershirt, which in cooler weather the male members of the oriental family wore next to the body, was usually made of a long piece of plain cotton or linen cloth made into a short shirtlike undergarment. At times it was little more than a loincloth in length, and at other times it reached below the knees or even just above the ankles. It was not usually worn when the weather was warm. The KJV refers to such undergarments worn by priests as “breeches” (Exod. 28:42).

II. The tunic-coat, a close-fitting shirtlike garment, was the piece of clothing most frequently worn in the home and on the street. In ancient times it was often of one solid color, but at the present it is more often made of a brightly colored striped cotton material that among the Arabs is often called “the cloth of seven colors” because of the narrow vertical stripes of green, red, yellow, blue, and white that alternate. It was lined with a white cotton material and worn over the undershirts when the weather was cool, but next to the body when it was warm. This garment usually had long sleeves and extended down to the ankles when worn as a dress coat and was held in place by a girdle. Hard-working men, slaves, and prisoners wore them more abbreviated—sometimes even to their knees and without sleeves—as shown on the Behistun Inscription. On SENNACHERIB’s Lachish relief (701 B.C.), the elders and important men of the city are shown wearing long dresslike white tunics that came down near the ankles. These garments were pure white, with no decorations, and no girdle to hold them. In this and other reliefs, however, the Hebrews had just been taken captive and were prisoners of war, therefore they could well have been divested of all but their basic garments.

III. The girdle was a belt made of either cloth or leather, which was worn over the loose coatlike skirt or shirt. The cloth girdle, ordinarily worn by village and townspeople, was a square yard of woolen, linen, or even silk cloth first made into a triangle, then folded into a sashlike belt about 5-8 in. (13-21 cm.) wide and some 36 in. (92 cm.) long. When drawn about the waist and the tapering ends tied in the back, it not only formed a belt but its folds formed a pocket to carry a variety of articles such as nuts, loose change, and other small objects or treasures. It was worn by both men and women, and the model woman of Prov. 31 made them to sell to the merchants. The girdle is not only a picturesque article of dress but also may indicate the position and office of the wearer. It is sometimes used to signify power and strength (2 Sam. 22:40; Isa. 11:5; Jer. 13:1; Eph. 6:14).

The leather girdle or belt was 2-6 in. (5-15 cm.) wide and was often studded with iron, silver, or gold. It was worn by soldiers, by men of the desert, and by countrymen who tended cattle or engaged in the rougher pursuits of life. This type of girdle was sometimes supported by a shoulder strap and provided a means whereby various articles such as a scrip (a small bag or wallet for carrying small articles), sword, dagger, or other valuables could be carried. It was the kind of girdle worn by ELLIAH (2 Ki. 1:8) and by JOHN THE BAPTIST (Matt. 3:4). Today the laborer and the poorer classes use rawhide or rope for a girdle; the better classes use woolen or camel’s hair sashes of different widths.

The girdle, whether made of cloth or leather, was a very useful article of clothing and often entered into many activities of everyday life. When one was to walk or run or begin any type of service he “girded himself” for the journey or for the task at hand. Girded loins became a symbol of readiness for service or endeavor. ISAIAH said of the MESSIAH that righteousness should be “his belt and faithfulness the sash around his waist” (Isa. 11:5), and PAUL spoke of the faithful Christian as having “the belt of truth buckled around your waist” (Eph. 6:14).

IV. The cloak, mantle, or robe was a large, loose-fitting garment, which for warmth and appearance was worn over all other articles of clothing as a completion of male attire. It was distinguished by its greater size and by the absence of the girdle. It existed in two varieties, which were usually known as the mē ʿīl H5077 and the šimlâ H8529.

The mē ʿīl was a long, loose-sleeved robe or public dress worn chiefly by men of official position and by ministers, educators, and the wealthy. It was the robe of the professions, a dress of dignity, culture, and distinction—the mark of high rank and station (1 Sam. 24:11; 1 Chr. 15:27). It was rich in appearance and could well have been the “coat of many colors” that JACOB gave to JOSEPH, or the like of which HANNAH made and brought to SAMUEL from year to year as he ministered before the Lord at Shiloh (1 Sam. 2:18-19). In its finest form, it must have been the high priest’s robe of the EPHOD with its fringe of bells and pomegranates swaying and swinging and tinkling as he walked (Exod. 28:31-38). It is generally understood that there were two kinds of ephods—one with its rich and elaborate insignia and paraphernalia peculiar to the office of high priest, and the other a more simple “linen ephod” worn by leaders of distinction other than the high priests (2 Sam. 6:14).

The šimlâ was the large sleeveless cloak or mantle that, in general pattern, corresponds to the long and flowing garment that the Arab shepherd and peasant call an abba or abayeh. They wear it by day and wrap themselves in it by night. Understandably, it was not to be taken in pledge unless it was returned by sundown (Exod. 22:26-27, which also uses the term šalmāh H8515).

Both of these simple yet picturesque garments were usually made of wool, goat hair, or camel hair. Men of distinction often wore more colorful cloaks called “robes,” which were made of linen, wool, velvet, or silk, elaborately bordered and lined with fur. This long outer garment or topcoat was, in all probability, the “mantle” worn by ELIJAH and ELISHA (2 Ki. 2:8-14). It was the camel-hair garment worn by JOHN THE BAPTIST (Matt. 3:4). It is frequently made of alternate strips of white, red, and brown, or is formed by sewing together two lengths of cloth so that the only seams required were those along the top of the shoulders. In unusual cases, however, the cloak is woven of one broad width, with no seam. Many believe that this was the garment Christ wore, and over which, at the crucifixion, the Roman soldiers “cast lots” rather than tearing it, for it was “seamless, woven in one piece from top to bottom” (Jn. 19:23-24).

This portrait on limewood painted with encaustic dates to c. 55-70 A.D. and depicts a woman dressed in a tunic and cloak, wearing gold ball earrings, gold necklace with a pendant, and snail curl hairdo.

On SHALMANESER’s Black Obelisk (9th cent. B.C.), the artist shows Israelite men wearing long cloaks or mantles with elaborate fringed borders both on the cutaway fronts and along the bottom. These were in keeping with the Mosaic injunction to make blue tassels on the borders of their garments to remind them to keep all the commandments and to be holy before God (Num. 15:38-40; Deut. 22:12).

V. The headdress was worn chiefly as a protection against the sun and as a finish to a completed costume. It varied from time to time according to rank, sex, and nationality. In the main, however, there were three known types that were worn by the male members of the Hebrew and surrounding nations. (a) The ordinary brimless cotton or woolen cap, corresponding somewhat to our skullcap, was sometimes worn by men of poorer circumstances. Captives are seen wearing these on the Behistun Rock. (b) The turbans were made of thick linen material and formed by winding a scarf or sash about the head in artistic style and neatly concealing the ends. The high priest wore a turban of fine linen (Exod. 28:39 [KJV, “mitre”]). (c) The head-scarf, known among the Arabs as the kaffiyeh, is usually made up of a square yard of white or colored cotton, wool, or silk cloth folded into a triangle and draped about the head. The apex of the triangle falls directly down the back, forming a V point, while the tapering ends are thrown back over the shoulders, or in cold weather they are wrapped about the neck. This graceful head-scarf is held in position by an ajhal, which is made of several soft woolen or silk twists bound by ornamental threads, and worn in coils about the head. An ornamental tassel falls to the side or down the back. When BEN-HADAD's shattered Syrian army realized the serious loss it had suffered, some of his men suggested to him that they go to the king of Israel "wearing sackcloth around their waists and ropes around their heads" (1 Ki. 20:32), hoping that he would spare their lives.

VI. Shoes and sandals were considered the lowliest articles that went to make up the wearing apparel of the people of Bible lands (Mk. 1:7). In the Bible and in secular sources, they were mentioned at a very early period and are seen in considerable variety on the Egyptian, Babylonian, Assyrian, and Persian monuments. A pair of terra-cotta shoes, of the modern snowshoe variety, were found in an Athenian grave of about 900 B.C. Shoes were of soft leather, while sandals were of a harder leather and were worn for rougher wear. According to some authorities, the sole was of wood, cane, or sometimes bark of the palm tree and was fastened to the leather by nails. They were tied about the feet with "thongs" (NIV), or "shoe-latchets" (Gen. 14:23 KJV). It was customary to have two pairs, especially on a journey. Shoes were usually removed at the doorway before entering a home, on approaching God (Exod. 3:5), and during mourning (2 Sam. 15:30). Property rights were secured by the seller pulling off his shoe and giving it to the purchaser (Ruth 4:7). The "clouts" referred to in Josh. 9:5 KJV are patched sandals (so NIV).

VII. Women's dress. Among the Hebrews neither sex was permitted by Mosaic law to wear the same form of clothing as was used by the other (Deut. 22:5). A few articles of female clothing carried somewhat the same name and basic pattern, yet there was always sufficient difference in embossing, embroidery, and needlework so that in appearance the line of demarcation between men and women could be readily detected. The women wore long garments reaching almost to the feet, with a girdle of silk or wool, many times having all the colors of the rainbow. Often such a garment would have a fringe hanging from the waist nearly to the ankles.

The ladies' headdress, for example, usually included some kind of a kaffiyeh or cloth for covering the head, yet the material that was in that covering was of different quality, kind, or color from that worn by the men. Also, it was often pinned over some kind of a cap made of stiff material and set with pearls, silver, gold, or spangled ornaments common to that day. If a woman was married, these or other more significant coins covered the entire front of her cap and constituted her dowry. Her undergarments would be made of cotton, linen, or silk, as might befit her wealth or station in life. She would probably wear a long gown with long, pointed sleeves. Over this was a small rather tightly fitted jacket or "petticoat"—meaning little coat. The small jacket was made of "scarlet" or other good material and was a thing of exquisite beauty because it was covered with “tapestry” or fine needlework, wrought with multicolored threads. A woman of even moderate circumstances could have beautiful clothing, for it was “the fruit of her own hands.”

In the OT many articles of women’s clothing are mentioned that cannot be exactly identified. Ezekiel 13:18, 21 KJV refers to a “kerchief.” The Hebrew word is mispāḥâ H5029, a head-covering or “veil” (so NIV) of some sort, the exact nature of which is unknown. Isaiah 3:19 KJV speaks of “mufflers,” probably two-piece veils or scarves, one part covering the face below the eyes, the other the head, down over the neck (several other items in the context cannot be certainly identified).

Women often added to their adornment by an elaborate braiding of the hair. PETER found it necessary to warn Christian women against relying on such adorning to make themselves attractive (1 Pet. 3:3). In the OT there are a number of references to painting the eyes in order to enhance their beauty, but it is always spoken of as a showy and somewhat vulgar device, unworthy of good women. Jezebel painted her eyes (2 Ki. 9:30).

In ancient times women especially were much given to various kinds of ornaments. Earrings and nose-rings were especially common. On account of their drop-like shape, earrings are called “chains” (Isa. 3:19 KJV) and “pendants” (Jdg. 8:26). Men also wore such earrings (Gen. 35:4; Jdg. 8:24). The nose-ring or nose-jewel made necessary the piercing of the nostrils. Rings were worn by both men and women. All ancient Israelites wore signet rings (Gen. 38:18 KJV; NIV, “seal”). Rings were often worn on the toes, anklets (spangles) on the ankles (Isa. 3:18), bracelets on the arms and wrists (Gen. 24:22; Ezek. 16:11).

Beginning about the second century B.C., all male Jews were expected to wear at morning prayers, except on Sabbaths and festivals, two phylacteries, one on the forehead, called a frontlet, the other on the left arm. They consisted of small leather cases containing four passages of Scripture from the OT: Exod. 13:1-10, 11-16; Deut. 6:4-9; 11:13-21.

drink. The essential beverage has always been WATER. The Hebrews procured it chiefly in two ways: by means of cisterns, which were possessed by every well-appointed house (2 Sam. 17:18; Jer. 38:6), and by means of wells, which were rare and were usually the possession of a clan or community. WINE was also widely used, both in the form of new wine, called must, and fermented wine. In the heat of harvest, frequent use was made of a sour drink mixture of water and wine, and of a “strong drink”; how the latter was prepared is unknown. Wine was sometimes spiced to improve its taste. Wine was also made from pomegranates and possibly also from ripe dates and barley. Next to bread and vegetables, the most important food was milk, both of larger and smaller cattle, especially goats' milk, which was usually kept in skins. Because of the hot climate, fresh milk soon became sour, but it was very effective for quenching thirst.

dross. The refuse in impure metals that is generally separated by melting, when the dross rises to the top and may be skimmed off. It is used figuratively of what is worthless (Ps. 119:119; Isa. 1:22, 25; Ezek. 22:18-19).

drunkenness. The Scriptures show that drunkenness was one of the major vices of antiquity, even among the Hebrews. Well-known cases of intoxication are NOAH (Gen. 9:21); LOT (19:33, 35); NABAL (1 Sam. 25:36); UURIAH (2 Sam. 11:13); AMMON (13:28); ELAH, king of Israel (1 Ki. 16:9); and BEN-HADAD, king of Syria (20:16). The prophets often denounce drunkenness as a great social evil of the wealthy. Even the women were guilty (Amos 4:1). The symptoms and effects of strong drink are vividly pictured in the Bible (Job 12:25; Ps. 107:27; Isa. 28:7; Hos. 4:11). While the writers of Scripture condemn intemperance in the strongest terms, they do not prescribe total abstinence as a formal and universal rule. Nevertheless, many believe that the principles laid down in the Bible point in that direction (cf. Mk. 9:42-43; Rom. 14:13-21; 1 Cor. 8:8-13; Eph. 5:18). In ancient times the poor could not afford to drink to excess, while the cheapening of alcoholic drinks has made drunkenness a much greater social problem in modern times.

Drusilla. droo-sil'uh (Gk. Drousilla G1537). The youngest of the three daughters of Herod AGRIPPA I. It was probably in A.D. 53 that Drusilla, in her sixteenth year, was married to Azizus of Emesa, a small principality in the N of SYRIA that included Palmyra (TADMOR). A year later, FELIX, who was CLAUDIUS's unprincipled freedman and that emperor's notorious appointee to the procuratorship of Palestine, persuaded the beautiful Drusilla to leave her husband. She became Felix's third wife, and in that role appears briefly in the story of PAUL's imprisonment at CAESAREA (Acts 24:24-27).

dugong. See ANIMALS (under badger).

duke. This English word is used by the KJV to render Hebrew ʔallûp H477 (“head of a thousand”), applied to the tribal chiefs of EDM until the time of MOSES (Gen. 36:15-43; Exod. 15:15; 1 Chr. 1:51-52; it also renders a word for “prince” in Josh. 13:21).

Dumah (person). doo'muh (Heb. dûmāh H1874, possibly “silence” or “enduring”). Sixth son of ISHMAEL and presumed founder of an Arab community (Gen. 25:14 [cf. v. 16]; 1 Chr. 1:30). Some scholars connect his name with that of Dumat al-Jandal, the capital of a district known as al-Jauf. The site is a large oasis in N central Saudi Arabia. Royal Assyrian and Babylonian inscriptions from the seventh and sixth centuries refer to the destruction of the Adummatu, which may be a reference to the descendants of Dumah.

Dumah (place). doo'muh (Heb. dûmāh H1873, possibly “silence” or “enduring”). (1) A town in the hills of JUDAH (Josh. 15:52). EUSEBIUS's Onomasticon refers to a town of this name. It is usually identified with the present Khirbet ed-Deir Domeh, located some 10 mi. (16 km.) SW of HEBRON. See also RUMAH.

(2) A place that is the subject of a prophetic oracle (Isa. 21:11). Because the next words mention SEIR, some believe that the reference is to EDM (the reading of two Heb. MSS; cf. also LXX, Idoumaia). Others point to the Arabian locations in the following verses (DEDAN and TEMA) and argue that this Dumah is to be identified with #1 above.

dumbness. See DISEASES (under muteness).

dung. The excrement of man or beast. The NIV usually renders “offal,” “refuse,” “rubbish.” In several of the offerings under the Levitical priesthood, the blood and the fat and the flesh were used, but the skins and the dung were discarded or burnt outside the camp (Exod. 29:14; Lev. 8:17). The ultimate disgrace was to have one's carcass treated as dung (2 Ki. 9:37 KJV; NIV, “refuse”). Dry dung was (and is) often used as fuel (see Ezek. 4:12-15). PAUL counted his natural advantages as dung (NIV “rubbish”) compared with his blessings in Christ (Phil. 3:8).

dungeon. See PRISON.

Dung Gate. One of the gates of JERUSALEM in NEHEMIAH’s day. From this gate Nehemiah surveyed the broken walls of Jerusalem in the night (Neh. 2:13). It was located between the VALLEY GATE and the FOUNTAIN GATE and was repaired by a certain MALKIJAH (3:13-15). It was near this gate that Nehemiah had the dedication of the wall when it was completed (12:31). Many scholars believe that the Dung Gate is to be identified with the POTSHERD GATE, which apparently led to the rubbish dump in the Valley of HINNOM, S of the city (Jer. 19:2; 2 Ki. 23:10).

Dura. door’uh (Aram. dûrā › H10164). A plain somewhere in the province of ancient BABYLON, in which King NEBUCHADNEZZAR erected his golden image (Dan. 3:1). Its precise location is uncertain (Dura was a common geographical name in Mesopotamia).

dust. In the warm and dry climate of the ANE, dust was a reality that people had to face on a daily basis. Thus, such practices began as washing the feet on entering a home (Jn. 13:1-17). Dust, however, also had a symbolic significance for Israel and the early church. (1) Throwing dust on the head as a sign of mourning or sorrow or repentance was common (Job 2:12; Rev. 18:19). (2) Shaking off dust from the feet was a sign of having no further responsibility for the area where the dust was picked up, thus leaving that area to God’s judgment (Matt. 10:14; Lk. 9:5; 10:11; Acts 13:51). (3) PAUL described the first man (ADAM) as a “man...of the dust” in 1 Cor. 15:47-49, meaning that he was created from the physical elements found in the earth (into which God breathed life—see Gen. 1-2). Adam is to be contrasted with Jesus, the second Adam, for while he took his humanity from Mary he existed before his incarnation as the eternal Son of God. In referring to human beings as made of dust Paul was echoing a strong theme of the OT where man is said to be made from dust and to return to dust (Gen. 2:7; 3:19; Job 4:19; 17:17).

ear. The vital organ of hearing. The Bible often refers to the ear in the physical sense. For example, we read that the tip of the right ear of the priests was touched with blood during their consecration (Lev. 8:23-14). A servant who spurned freedom to continue in the service of his master had his ear bored with an awl to signify his continual subservience (Exod. 21:6). Cutting off ears was a feared practice of the enemy (Ezek. 23:25). More frequently, however, the use of the term involves understanding and obedient response. “To incline the ear” means “to give attention” (Ps. 88:2). “To uncover someone’s ear” denotes “to reveal to someone” (1 Sam. 20:2; 2 Sam. 7:27). “Uncircumcised” ears are deaf to moral and spiritual instruction, not delighting whatever in the word of God (Jer. 6:10; Acts 7:51). “Ears that hear” is an expression that indicates obedience (Prov. 20:12; 25:12), whereas one who “stops his ears” from listening to an evil plot declares that he wants no part of it (Isa. 33:15). At the hearing of disastrous news, ears tingle (1 Sam. 3:11; 2 Ki. 21:12). While idols cannot hear (Ps. 135:17), God’s ears are not heavy (Isa. 59:1-2). God is said to open ears with the result that people gain understanding (Job 29:11) and display obedience (Isa. 50:4-5).

earnest. As a noun, this English term is used by the KJV in the NT to render arrabōn G775, a word that came into Greek from a Semitic language, perhaps from the vocabulary of Phoenician traders; it is related to Hebrew ‘ērābôn H6860, “pledge” (used in Gen. 38:17-20). Right down to modern Greek, where arrabōn can refer to an engagement ring, the word is used for a pledge in a contract. In commercial contexts, the word was applied to a down payment. Both meanings, “pledge” and “first installment,” are involved in each of the three NT uses of the word. PAUL speaks of God's gift of the HOLY SPIRIT as the pledge and foretaste of what the Christian will enjoy later (2 Cor. 1:22; the NIV renders the word with a descriptive phrase, "a deposit, guaranteeing what is to come"); significantly the word SEAL is also used in the context. Similarly, we are told that the Holy Spirit is the earnest of that fullness of life which the Christian will enjoy after the dissolution of his earthly "tent" (5:5). The promised Holy Spirit is also described as an earnest or deposit that assures our future INHERITANCE (Eph. 1:14).

earring. Earrings have been a popular ornament from the remotest antiquity, and they are mentioned frequently in the OT (Heb. nezem H5690, used also of nose jewels). They were often regarded as amulets or talismans (cf. Gen. 35:4). Among all ANE peoples, except the Hebrews and Egyptians, earrings were in general use by both sexes; but Exod. 32:2 shows that at least in the time of MOSES they were also worn by Israelite boys. In the W they have been largely female ornaments, but not exclusively so. The Ishmaelites customarily wore gold earrings (Jdg. 8:24-25).

earth. See WORLD.

earth, circle of the. A phrase used once in the Bible to emphasize God's greatness: "He sits enthroned above the circle of the earth, / and its people are like grasshoppers" (Isa. 40:22). The word for "circle" is combined with "heaven" in another passage, where it appears to mean "vault" or "dome" (Job 22:14). Finally, we read that God "drew a circle on the face of the deep" (Prov. 8:27 NRSV). This last reference, especially, suggests a boundary, but the sense is close to "horizon" (cf. NIV). The view that the meaning is "sphere" may be reading something into the word.

earth, four corners of the. This expression, referring figuratively to "the whole world," occurs twice in English Bible versions (Isa. 11:12 [NIV, "four quarters of the earth"]; Rev. 7:1). The Hebrew phrase is found also in Ezek. 24:16, where it refers to the country of Israel and is thus better translated "the four corners of the land." A more general phrase, "the corners [edges, ends] of the world," occurs in three other passages (Job 37:3; 38:13; Isa. 24:16). Similar expressions are found elsewhere. They generally allude to the outer limits of a vast expanse.

earth, new. See ESCHATOLOGY.

earth, pillars of the. Although the KJV and other versions use this phrase only once (1 Sam. 2:8; NIV, “the foundations of the earth”), there are two additional passages that speak of the earth as having pillars or columns (Job 9:6; Ps. 75:3). It is possible that many people in the ANE thought of the world as supported by literal columns, but this language clearly became conventional (cf. even today such expressions as “the sun rose”) and was used in poetic and metaphorical texts not to describe the physical world but to exalt God’s greatness.

earthen vessels, earthenware. See POTTERY.

earthquake. Four earthquakes are recorded in Scripture: (1) one occurred at Mount Horeb for ELLIJAH’s instruction (1 Ki. 19:11); (2) another one took place during the reign of UZZIAH (Amos 1:1; Zech. 14:5); (3) a violent earthquake is mentioned in connection with the RESURRECTION OF JESUS CHRIST (Matt. 28:2); (4) and another one freed PAUL and SILAS from prison (Acts 16:26). In addition, an earthquake is mentioned in Isa. 29:6 as a form of judgment from the Lord on the enemies of his people, and this is in line with the steady biblical testimony that all natural phenomena—earthquake, wind, storm, rain, hail, and the rest—are under divine sovereign control and are part of his armory for ruling the world in righteousness.

east. Possibly because it is the direction in which the sun rises, the E was the point of orientation for many (but not all) ANE peoples, including the Israelites. The gate of the TABERNACLE was on the E side (Exod. 38:13-14). In the wilderness MOSES and AARON camped on the East side of the tabernacle, and this area was barred to strangers (Num. 3:38). EZEKIEL saw the glory of the Lord leave the doomed TEMPLE by the E gate (Ezek. 10:19; 11:23), but in his vision of the future temple, he saw the glory of the Lord coming from the E and entering the temple by the E gate (43:2, 4). See also NORTH; SOUTH; WEST.

east, children (people) of the. In Gen. 29:1 we are told that JACOB journeyed to the territory of the people of the E in PADDAN ARAM (N MESOPOTAMIA; see 28:2-7). The phrase is used in the book of Judges to designate Arabs who joined the Midianites and the Amalekites in fighting Israel (Jdg. 6:3, 33; 7:12; 8:10; cf. Jer. 49:28; Ezek. 25:4, 10). JOB is described as the “greatest man among all the people of the East” (Job 1:3); some think that northern ARABIA, EDOM, or MOAB provides the setting of the book, a location that fits Isa. 11:14 also.

Easter. A feast commemorating the RESURRECTION OF JESUS CHRIST. The KJV uses this term to render Greek pascha G4247 only in Acts 12:4; in all other instances it correctly renders the word as Passover. It is held by some that the annual celebration of the Lord's resurrection was observed in apostolic times, but the earliest written evidence for such a festival appears in the "paschal controversy" over the correct date for "the feast of the Savior's passover," an issue that apparently was first discussed during the second century. The matter was settled by the Council of Nicea in A.D. 325, which ruled that Easter should be celebrated on the first Sunday after the full moon following the vernal equinox. This is the system followed today, so that the date of Easter varies between March 22 and April 25.

eastern sea. This term (lit., "the sea in front") occurs in three eschatological passages: Ezek. 47:18; Joel 2:20; Zech. 14:8. In the last two it is contrasted with "the western sea" (lit., "the sea behind"), which clearly refers to the MEDITERRANEAN (cf. Deut. 11:24; 34:2), and so most scholars interpret "the eastern sea" as a reference to the DEAD SEA, which could be viewed as an eastern boundary. However, some scholars suggest that these terms do not refer to geographical entities but rather reflect APOCALYPTIC language, indicating cosmic (primeval, mythological) extremes, that is, the uttermost east and west.

East Gate. Among those who helped repair the walls of JERUSALEM was a certain Shemaiah who is described as "the guard at the East Gate" (Neh. 3:29). It was situated between the HORSE GATE at its N and the MUSTER GATE at its S (3:28, 31; NIV, "Inspection Gate"), but its precise location is uncertain. Presumably, this is the same as a TEMPLE gate that existed during HEZEKIAH's reign, for a Levite named Kore is given the title, "the keeper of [the one] to the east" (2 Chr. 31:14; cf. 1 Chr. 26:14).

east wind. A scorching wind, known as the sirocco, which in Palestine and Egypt blows in from the desert most often in May and October. It withers vegetation (Gen. 41:6; Ezek. 17:10) and dries up fountains and springs (Hos. 13:15). Sometimes it destroys houses (Job 1:19) and ships (Ps. 48:7; Ezek. 27:26). By an E wind God drove back the waters so that the Israelites could cross the sea on dry land (Exod. 14:21). God used an E wind to bring judgment (Isa. 27:8; Jer. 4:11-12; 18:17). "God provided a scorching east wind" to afflict JONAH (Jon. 4:8).

Ebal. eeˈbuhl (Heb. ʿēbāl H6507, possibly from a root meaning “stout”). (1) Son of Shobal and grandson of SEIR the HORITE (Gen. 36:23; 1 Chr. 1:40).

(2) Variant of O_{BAL} (1 Chr. 1:22 KJV and other versions, following MT).

(3) The name of a mountain. See E_{BAL}, MOUNT.

Looking NW toward Mt. Ebal.

Ebal, Mount. eeˈbuhl (Heb. ʿēbāl H6506, possibly from a root meaning “stout”). A mountain 3,077 ft. (938 m.) high, one of the highest points in the land of Samaria. It stood opposite Mount GERIZIM, across a valley through which ran an important route of travel. At its foot was JACOB’S WELL (see Jn. 4:20: “on this mountain”), and the city of SHECHEM was located nearby. When the Israelites first entered the land, Moses commanded them to erect on Mount Ebal a monument of stones on which the law was inscribed and a stone altar for burnt offerings and peace offerings. The law, with its blessings and curses, was recited by the people antiphonally, the blessings from Mount Gerizim and the curses from Mount Ebal (Deut. 27:4-26). JOSHUA renewed this procedure after the conquest of AI (Josh. 8:30-35). The central location of this mountain and its height made it valuable for military purposes. A ruined fortress is still visible on its summit.

Ebed. eeˈbid (Heb. ʿebed H6270, “slave, servant”). (1) Father of GAAL; the latter was an Israelite who led a revolt against ABIMELECH (Jdg. 9:26-35).

(2) Son of a certain Jonathan and descendant of Adin; accompanied by fifty men, he was among those who returned from the EXILE (Ezra 8:6).

Ebed-Melech. ee´bid-mee´lik (Heb. ēbed-melek H6283, “servant of the king”). TNIV Ebed-Melek. An Ethiopian (or Cushite; see CUSH) in the court of ZEDEKIAH who received permission to rescue JEREMIAH from a miry dungeon (Jer. 38:7-13). Because he risked incurring the wrath of Jeremiah’s opponents, God said to him: “I will save you; you will not fall by the sword but will escape with your life, because you trust in me” (39:15-18). He is identified as a EUNUCH, probably referring to his official status.

Ebenezer. eb´uh-nee´zuhr (Heb. ēben hā-ēzer H75, “stone of help”). (1) The scene of two defeats of the Israelites by the PHILISTINES (1 Sam. 4:1-11). In the first battle, the Israelites lost 4,000 men, and in the second, 30,000. In the second battle, the ARK OF THE COVENANT was taken by the Philistines and taken to ASHDOD (5:1); also ELI’s sons, HOPHNI and PHINEHAS, were killed. The precise location of Ebenezer is uncertain, but some identify it with ʿIzbet Ṣarṭa, about 13 mi. (21 km.) E of JOPPA.

(2) Ebenezer also was the name given by SAMUEL to the stone set up by him between MIZPAH and SHEN to commemorate a later Israelite victory over the Philistines (1 Sam. 7:12). It is not certain whether this is a place different from #1 above.

Eber. ee´buhr (Heb. ēber H6299, perhaps “traveler”; Gk. Eber G1576). (1) A descendant of SHEM (through Arphaxad and Shelah) and an ancestor of ABRAHAM (Gen. 10:21-25; 11:14-17; 1 Chr. 1:18-25); included in Luke’s GENEALOGY OF JESUS CHRIST (Lk. 3:35 [KJV, “Heber”]). Practically nothing is known of him. Interest attaches to the name, which is derived from the same root as the name ʿibrī H6303, “Hebrew” (Gen. 14:13 et al.). See HABIRU; HEBREW PEOPLE.

(2) Son of Abihail; he was one of seven relatives from the tribe of GAD who occupied the region E of GILEAD (1 Chr. 5:13 [KJV, “Heber”]; cf. vv. 10, 14).

(3) Son of ELPAAL and descendant of BENJAMIN (1 Chr. 8:12).

(4) Son of Shashak, also a Benjamite (1 Chr. 8:22 [KJV, “Heber”]).

(5) A priest who returned from the EXILE; he was the head of Amok’s family (Neh. 12:20).

(6) A place or a people group mentioned by BALAAM in one of his oracles: “Ships will come from the shores of Kittim; / they will subdue Asshur and Eber, / but they too will come to ruin” (Num. 24:24). Some scholars think that Eber here refers to N SYRIA, not far from ASSYRIA. Others prefer to see here an allusion to Abraham’s ancestor (see #1 above) and thus to the Hebrews themselves.

Ebez. eeˈbiz (Heb. ēbes [§]H82, derivation unknown). KJV Abez. A town located in the territory of ISSACHAR (Josh. 19:20), which occupied the greater part of the fertile plain of ESDRAELON. The location is unknown.

Ebiasaph. i-biˈuh-saf. Alternate form of ABIASAPH.

Ebla. ebˈluh. An ancient city in N SYRIA, identified with modern Tell Mardikh, about 40 mi. (65 km.) S from the city of Aleppo. Ebla, with its surrounding towns and villages, was the largest in the region. At its height, the city reached a size of 140 acres with a population of perhaps fifteen to twenty thousand. It flourished in the middle of the third millennium B.C., but remained a center of some influence well into the second millennium. In 1975, thousands of cuneiform tablets and fragments were discovered in the royal palace near the throne room. These included some 1,757 texts that were whole or nearly complete, nearly 5,000 fragments with at least ten lines of writing, and many thousands of smaller fragments. The tablets, mostly administrative in character, date to the twenty-fourth and twenty-third centuries B.C.

Soon after the discovery of these texts, amazing claims were made regarding their relation to accounts in the Bible, such as the theory that the cities of the plain in Gen. 14 were named on one text. Similarly, earlier claims that Ebla lay at the center of a vast empire must now be rejected. It was perhaps the most significant city state of its time and is of interest in its own right. However, it had no direct or explicit relation to any events in the Bible. Ebla's role in illuminating the Bible may be more productive from the standpoint of language and vocabulary. Linked with contemporary languages found in texts elsewhere, Eblaite may form the background for the development of biblical Hebrew. Ebla itself is found in N Syria, in the general region that the Genesis records suggest that the PATRIARCHS remembered as their ancient homeland (Gen. 24:10-15; 28:1-5), a view also expressed by many of the names in Abraham's genealogy that can be associated with place names in the region (11:10-32). It should be noted also that names such as NOAH and HARAN, attested in the Ebla texts, are not found so frequently in later millennia. Therefore, they testify to the authentic antiquity of these names in the Genesis narratives and genealogies.

Ebron. eeˈbruhn (Heb. ēbrōn H6306 [not in NIV]). KJV Hebron. A town located in the territory allotted to ASHER (Josh. 19:28 NRSV). A few Hebrew

MSS, however, have ABDON, and this variant has been followed by the NIV.

Ebronah. See ABRONAH.

Ecbatana. ek-bat´uh-nuh (Gk. Ekbatana). The Greek name of the capital of the empire of the Medes (see MEDIA), and later one of the capitals of PERSIA and of the PARTHIANS. The Old Persian name of the city was Hangmátana (“the place of assembly”), and the Aramaic form in Ezra 6:2 is ܐܚܡܬܐ H10020 (thus KJV, “Achmetha”). This biblical passage refers to it as the location of the palace in which the decree of CYRUS authorizing the building of the Jewish temple was found. The city is also mentioned a number of items in the APOCRYPHA (e.g., Tob. 3:7; 2 Macc. 9:3). The site is occupied today by Hamadan, Iran, on the plain near the NE foot of Mount Alvand, c. 175 mi. (280 m.) SW of Teheran. Ecbatana owed its importance to its strategic location on the caravan route from Mesopotamia to the Persian plateau. The pleasant summer climate accounts for its popularity as a resort city. According to the Greeks (Herodotus, Hist. 1.96), Ecbatana was founded by the half-legendary Deioces the Mede c. 678 B.C., who also established the Median dynasty, but scholars question the accuracy of this tradition. Cyrus captured it in 550, and ALEXANDER THE GREAT took it from the Persians in 330. The city, built on a hill, was surrounded by seven concentric walls, the inner walls rising above the outer. The citadel was also a treasure house, the city famous for its luxury and splendor. Ecbatana became the summer capital of the Parthian kings, maintaining its traditional reputation, but under the Sassanids it declined. Today very little remains of the ancient city.

Flat limestone sundial with a triangular fin. “There is a time for everything” (Eccl. 3:1).

Ecclesiastes, Book of. i-klee´zee-as´teez. One of the WISDOM books of the OT, though it belongs to a special genre of philosophical discourse of which there are no other extant examples in ANE literature. In the Hebrew Bible it is included among the Five Scrolls (Megilloth, along with Ruth, Song of Solomon, Lamentations, and Esther) and bears the title Qoheleth (also Koheleth). The Hebrew word qōhelet H7738, which appears in the opening statement and elsewhere in the book (Eccl. 1:1-2, 12; 7:27; 12:8-10), has been interpreted in various ways, such as “someone who calls [or speaks in] an assembly [Heb. qāhāl H7736]” and “a collector of sayings,” but it is often rendered “teacher” or “preacher.” The SEPTUAGINT translates it with Greek Ekklēsiastēs (lit., “a member of the assembly”), a word that was taken over into Latin in the Vulgate translation and thence into English.

Overview of ECCLESIASTES

Author: “The Teacher [Preacher], son of David, king in Jerusalem” (Eccl. 1:1), apparently a reference to SOLOMON, but many (including some conservative scholars) believe that the book was written by a later, unknown sage.

Historical setting: If Ecclesiastes is the work of Solomon, it must have been composed during the last years of his life (c. 940 B.C.). Those who do not accept a Solomonic authorship date the book after the EXILE, some as late as the third century B.C.

Purpose: To show that, apart from the fear of God, life has no meaning and leads to despair.

Contents: After a prologue (Eccl. 1:1-11), the book seeks to demonstrate the meaninglessness of all earthly things (1:12—6:12), provides practical advice on various topics (7:1—12:7), and ends with an epilogue apparently written by someone other than “the Teacher” (12:8-14).

Traditionally the book has been ascribed to SOLOMON, an ascription based on several factors. The author describes the book as “The words of the Teacher, son of David, king of Jerusalem” (Eccl. 1:1). Several allusions in the book are appropriate to Solomonic authorship, such as the reference to the author’s wisdom (1:16), his interest in proverbs (12:9; cf. 1 Ki. 4:32), and his building projects (Eccl. 2:4-11). From the time of Luther, however, a large number of scholars have questioned the Solomonic authorship of Ecclesiastes. The book does not actually name Solomon as its writer. The author says he was king of Jerusalem (1:12), a statement difficult to apply to Solomon, and the language of the book may incline toward a later time. These observations have led many to hold that Solomon serves as a literary representation of the embodiment of wisdom.

The book presents a pessimistic view of life apart from God. The writer tells us that his observation of nature and human experience leads him to conclude that they, in and of themselves, do not impart purpose and meaning to life. He observes the endless cycles of nature (Eccl. 1:2-11) and finds in them only tedium. They do not offer satisfaction, for the “eye never has enough of seeing” (1:8). Even wisdom (1:16-18; 2:12-17), pleasure (1:1-8), and toil (1:9-11; 2:18-23) are meaningless. There is no substance or satisfaction in them. They are a “chasing after the wind” (1:17).

In the history of its interpretation the book has been characterized as hedonistic because it concludes that “a man can do nothing better than to eat and drink and find satisfaction in his work” (Eccl. 2:24). But this characterization of the book is rendered difficult by the writer’s recognition that pleasure does not lead to satisfaction either (2:1). The book is understood by some to be fatalistic in its approach to life. This view is based on 3:16-22, which seems to conclude that man is not better off than the animal. Such a conclusion, however, is true only when humans are viewed in and of themselves (Heb. hēmmâ lāhem, 3:18), that is, apart from God.

There is a positive life view that emerges from the book that may be called a theology of contentment. In view of the lack of substance and meaning in life, Qoheleth urges his readers to enjoy life, for it is God who gives us that privilege (Eccl. 2:24-25). This satisfaction does not belong to all mankind, for the work of the sinner ends in futility (2:26). Godly contentment, however, is not the ultimate good for mankind. Qoheleth reminds us of a future time when God will bring all things into judgment. This is the conclusion of his search for meaning in life (12:14). One is reminded of the counsel of the apostle PAUL in view of the futility of life, for like Qoheleth, he looked away from life’s meaninglessness to his future redemption (Rom. 8:20; cf. vv. 22-25).

Qoheleth urges us to fear God and obey him. Only when God is taken into account (Eccl. 12:1) and his will observed (12:13) does life impart purpose and satisfaction.

eclipse. The obscuring of one celestial body by another (from an observer’s perspective). For someone observing from the earth, a solar eclipse occurs when the moon passes between the sun and the earth, thus blocking sunlight; a lunar eclipse occurs when the earth passes between the sun and the moon, thus blocking moonlight. For possible references to eclipses in the Bible, see ASTRONOMY. Significant eclipses in the past aid scholars in identifying historical dates and establishing CHRONOLOGY.

eczema. See DISEASE.

Ed. ed (Heb. ēd H6332, “witness”). An altar built by the Reubenites and the Gadites (and the half-tribe of Manasseh) who settled E of the JORDAN, as a witness of their loyalty to the God of Israel and to the tribes W of the river (Josh. 22:34 KJV). The name Ed appears to be missing in the MT (but it occurs in a few Heb. MSS), therefore the KJV has “Ed” in italics on the basis of the explanation in the second part of the verse: “And the children of Reuben and the children of Gad called the altar Ed: for it shall be a witness between us that the LORD is God” (the NRSV and NJPS supply “Witness” rather than “Ed”). The NIV, however, interprets the explanation as the name itself: “. . . gave the altar this name: A Witness Between Us that the LORD is God.”

Edar. See EDER.

Eden (garden). ee´duhn (Heb. ēden H6359, prob. “delight”). The region in which the Lord God planted a garden for the newly created man, ADAM. In it grew every tree that was pleasant to see and good for food, including the tree of life and the tree of the knowledge of good and evil. A river flowed out of Eden and divided into four heads or streams: the PISHON, which went around the land of HAVILAH, where gold was found; the GIHON, which flowed around the whole land of CUSH; the HIDDEKEL (or TIGRIS), which flowed in front of ASSYRIA; and the EUPHRATES (Gen. 2:8-14). Adam and EVE lived there until they sinned by eating the forbidden fruit and were expelled from it (Gen. 2-3). Later Scripture writers mention Eden as an illustration of a delightful place (Isa. 51:3; Ezek. 28:13; 31:9, 16, 18; 36:35; Joel 2:3).

The location of Eden has been much investigated in both ancient and modern times. The data given in Genesis, however, are not sufficient to fix its site because two of the rivers, the Pishon and Gihon, were unknown even to the ancients and still are to modern scholars. Attempts have been made to locate Eden in the mountains of ARMENIA in the area where the Tigris and Euphrates and several other rivers rise. But the sources of all these streams are not together but are separated by mountain ranges. MESOPOTAMIA, where the Tigris and Euphrates rivers flow, is also within the FERTILE CRESCENT where archaeology has found the oldest civilization. Some scholars suggest the district at the head of the Persian Gulf as the likely location. It has been widely believed that the silt brought down by the rivers has added over a hundred miles of land to the head of the gulf since 3000 B.C. But recent geological examination of this land has indicated that it may not have changed much during the ages. At the site of Eridu, situated near what was considered to be the ancient shoreline, clay tablets have been found that tell of a garden in the neighborhood in which grew a sacred palm tree. Further upstream, a short distance north of ancient BABYLON, the Tigris and Euphrates flow close together so that canals connect them. Some consider this area to be the proper location of Eden.

Eden (person). ee´duhn (Heb. ēden H6360, prob. “delight”). Son of Joah and a Levite from the descendants of GERSHON during the time of HEZEKIAH (2 Chr. 29:12). He is probably the same man who faithfully assisted KORE in distributing the contributions made to the temple (31:15).

Eden (region). ee´duhn (Heb. ēden H6361). See BETH EDEN.

Eder (person). ee´duhr (Heb. ēder H6374 and ēder H6376, derivation uncertain). (1) Son of BERIAH and descendant of BENJAMIN (1 Chr. 8:15; KJV, “Ader”).

(2) Son of MUSHI and descendant of LEVI through MERARI (1 Chr. 23:23; 24:30).

Eder (place). ee´duhr (Heb. ēder H6375 and migdal-ēder H4468, derivation uncertain). (1) The “tower of Eder” was located between BETHLEHEM and HEBRON, where JACOB pitched his tent after RACHEL’s death, and where REUBEN cohabited with BILHAH (Gen. 35:21-22 NRSV; KJV, “Edar”). The NIV and others render it “Migdal Eder.” Because of its proximity to Bethlehem, where DAVID was born, MICAH possibly refers to it (“watchtower of the flock”) and to OPHEL (“stronghold of the Daughter of Sion,” where David’s palace stood in Jerusalem) as symbols of the royal house of David (Mic. 4:8).

(2) A town in the NEGEV district within the tribe of JUDAH (Josh. 15:21), identified by some with el-Adar, c. 5 mi. (8 km.) S of GAZA on the right bank of the Wadi Ghazzeh. Some MSS of the SEPTUAGINT, however, have either Ara or Arad, suggesting that ARAD is probably the correct reading.

edification. The Greek noun oikodomē G3869 (“a building” or “the act of building”) as well as its cognate verb oikodomeō G3868 (“to build”) occur sometimes in the NT in a literal sense (Matt 23:29; 24:1). More frequently they are used in the metaphorical sense. CHRIST spoke of building his CHURCH (Matt. 16:18), and PAUL of the building up of character in Christians (e.g., 2 Cor. 10:8; 13:10; Eph. 4:12, 16). The apostle describes the church as a building (1 Cor. 3:9; Eph. 2:21), and talks of erecting it on the proper foundation (1 Cor. 3:10, 12, 14). Paul says to the Corinthians that when they come together, each one making a contribution (hymn, instruction, revelation, etc.), all is to be done “for edification” (14:26; NIV, “for the strengthening of the church”). He is anxious that Christians mature, that they grace Christ’s cause, that they become well-founded in the faith.

Edom.

Edom. ee´duhm (Heb., eḏôm H121, “red”; gentilic, ădômî H122, “Edomite”). A name that can refer to ESAU (alluding to the red vegetable soup he received in exchange for his birthright, Gen. 25:30), to the land of his descendants (32:3; 36:20-21, 30), or to the Edomites collectively (Num. 20:18-21; Amos 1:6, 11; Mal. 1:4). The country was also called SEIR or Mount Seir, referring to a mountain and plateau area between the DEAD SEA and the Gulf of AQABAH about 100 mi. (160 km.) long and up to 40 mi. (65 km.) wide. The original inhabitants of this land were the HORITES or “cave dwellers” (Gen. 14:6). When Esau departed from Canaan to find room for his cattle and came to Mount Seir (36:5-8), the Horites had some tribal chiefs reigning in the land (36:29-30). Esau took the daughter of one of these chiefs for a wife, OHOLIBAMAH, daughter of Anah (36:2, 25). Esau's sons and grandsons were also tribal chiefs (36:15-19, 40-43). Probably the Edomites gradually absorbed the Horites until they disappeared (Deut. 2:12, 22).

Archaeological evidence suggests that the kingdom of Edom was founded during the thirteenth century B.C. In the process of about four centuries its government changed from one under tribal chiefs to a monarchy. Eight of these kings reigned over Edom before the Israelites had any such ruler (Gen. 36:31-39). One of these kings was on the throne at the time of MOSES and refused to permit the Israelites to pass through his country (Num. 20:14-21). Other evidence of ancient Edom is the Papyrus Anastasi VI of Egypt, dated in the late thirteenth century, which mentions the passage of shepherd tribes from Edom to the richer pasture land of the NILE delta. The AMARNA Letter no. 256, from about 1400, mentions Edom in the form Udumu, one of the enemies of a Jordan Valley prince.

SAUL fought against the Edomites (1 Sam. 14:47), but DAVID conquered them and put garrisons throughout the whole land (2 Sam. 8:14). The Israelite army spent six months cutting off all the men of the kingdom (1 Ki. 11:15-16). SOLOMON made the Edomite cities EZION GEBER and ELOTH, on the Gulf of Aqabah, seaports from which his ships sailed to OPHIR (2 Chr. 8:17-18). The kingdom of Judah lost Edom in the reign of JEHOAM when the nation revolted against him about 847 B.C. (2 Ki. 8:20, 22). Some fifty years later, AMAZIAH king of Judah inflicted a severe defeat on the Edomites (14:7). About 735, REZIN king of SYRIA went to war with Judah, captured Eloth, and drove the Jews out (16:6).

ASSYRIA came in contact with Edom as early as the seventh century B.C. When her kings began to penetrate as far S as Palestine, Edom, along with Judah and her other neighbors, paid tribute to the Assyrians for many years. She is mentioned many times in the inscription of the kings of Assyria, beginning with Adad-Nirari III (800) to Ashurbanipal (686-633). When Jerusalem was destroyed and Judah depopulated by the Babylonians in 586, the Edomites rejoiced over the affliction of the Judeans and began to take over the southern part of Palestine. Eventually they penetrated as far north as HEBRON. This action intensified the already smoldering hatred between Jews and Edomites (see Ps. 137:7; Ezek. 25:12-14; Amos 1:11; Obad. 10-13).

The Edomites were subject also to BABYLON. Under the Persian empire, Edom became a province called IDUMEA, the Greek form of Edom. In 325 B.C., an Arab tribe known as the NABATEANS conquered the eastern part of Edom's territory. During the Hasmonean period (see MACCABEES) John Hyrcanus subdued the Idumeans and forced them to accept Judaism. When the Romans took over Palestine, the Edomites also were included. From Idumea came Antipater, the father of HEROD the Great. He became procurator of JUDEA. After the destruction of Jerusalem by the Romans in A.D. 70, the Idumeans disappeared from history. Thus the rather mournful career of the Edomites came to an end. Only in the early centuries of their kingdom, before the Israelites became powerful, did they enjoy freedom to any great extent.

Edom figures prominently in the prophetic Scriptures (Isa. 11:14; 34:8-15; 63:1-6; Ezek. 35:2-15; Joel 3:19; Amos 9:12; and the whole book of OBADIAH). The explanation of this often unexpected appearance of Edom finds its origin in the fact already noted that the conquest of Edom was a unique achievement of David; the overthrow of Edom therefore became a symbol of the reign of the Davidic MESSIAH.

Edrei. ed´ree-i (Heb. ʾedre ʾ H167, possibly “strong”). (1) A residence city of OG king of BASHAN (Deut. 1:4; 3:10; Josh. 12:4; 13:12). It was built on a bluff overlooking a southern fork of the YARMUK River, along the southern boundary of Bashan near the eastern desert. MOSES defeated Og in a pitched battle outside Edrei, which was then destroyed (Num. 21:33-35; Deut. 3:1-6). The ruins were included in the allotment to the MAKIR clan of the tribe of MANASSEH (Josh. 13:31). Edrei is identified with modern Dera, c. 60 mi. (100 km.) S of DAMASCUS and 30 mi. (50 km.) E of the JORDAN. The site has ruins going back to Early Bronze times as well as a remarkable subterranean city of numerous streets, shops, rooms, and cisterns, probably from the Hellenistic or Roman period.

(2) A fortified city allotted to the tribe of NAPHTALI, near KEDESH in Upper GALILEE (Josh. 19:37), possibly modern Tell Khureibeh.

education. Several Hebrew verbs in the OT are used of learning and instruction, such as ḥānāk H2852, “to train, dedicate” (Prov. 22:6), lāmad H4340, “to learn” (Deut. 4:10; from this root is derived the term TALMUD), and yārāh H3723, hiphil “to throw, direct, teach” (1 Sam. 12:23; cf. its cognate, tôrâ H9368, “direction, instruction, teaching, law,” Deut. 1:5; Prov. 1:8). Because repetition was at the heart of learning, the verb for “repeat,” šānāh H9101, came to be used in postbiblical Hebrew for “to study, teach” (with special reference to the Mishnah, a noun derived from the same verb). Teachers were referred to with the term rab H8042 (which in the Bible means “commander, chief officer,” from the word for “great”) or derived forms, such as rabbî (“my master”). This usage is reflected in the NT, where the term RABBI is translated didaskalos G1437, “teacher” (Jn. 1:38; “rabboni” in 20:16). Jesus is described as “teacher” about fifty times in the Gospels, and he is frequently said to have taught (e.g., Matt. 7:29). The Greek term for DISCIPLE, mathētēs G3412 (from the verb manthanō G3443, “to learn,” 11:28) occurs over 200 times in the Gospels. Having been taught by Jesus, his disciples were told to teach others also, making them disciples (28:19-20). See SCHOOL.

egg. The OT makes several references to eggs. The PENTATEUCH, for example, contains an injunction not to take a mother bird with her eggs or her young, but the young only (Deut. 22:6-7); and the book of JOB speaks of the ostrich leaving her eggs on the ground to be warmed by the sun (Job 39:14). Other references are found in metaphorical contexts (Isa. 10:14; 59:5; cf. also the NIV in Job 6:6; Isa. 34:15; Jer. 17:11). In the NT, Jesus refers to the absurdity of thinking that a father would give a scorpion to a son who asked for an egg (Lk. 11:12). Wild birds’ eggs were first gathered for food (Deut. 22:6). By NT times eggs of domesticated fowl were a staple of diet.

Eglah. eg’luh (Heb. eglāh H6321 “heifer-calf”). A wife of DAVID who bore him his sixth son, Ithream, at HEBRON (2 Sam. 3:5; 1 Chr. 3:3).

Eglaim. eg’lay-im (Heb. eglayim H104, possibly “[two] drops”). A town on the border of MOAB (Isa. 15:8). Its site is uncertain. See also EN EGLAIM.

Eglath Shelishiyah. egˈlath-shi-lishˈuh-yuh (Heb. eglat šeʿlišiyyâ H6326, “the third Eglath [heifer-calf]”). An unidentified town near ZOAR mentioned in prophetic oracles of judgment on MOAB (Isa. 15:5; Jer. 48:34). The KJV takes the words as a metaphorical description of Zoar (and Horonaim), “an heifer of three years old.”

Eglon (person). egˈlon (Heb. eglôn H6323, “young bull”). An obese king of MOAB who early in the judges period occupied territory W of JORDAN near JERICHO. The military campaign of this king was assisted by neighboring AMMON, which attacked an area to the E of the JABBOK River (Num. 21:24; Josh. 12:2; 13:10, 25; Jdg. 11:13, 22), and also by the desert bedouin AMALEKITES. The exploits of Eglon resulted in the occupation of the City of Palms (Jdg. 3:13), apparently a reference to the broad territory surrounding Jericho. The Israelites were dominated by the Moabites for eighteen years, after which God raised up EHUD to deliver Israel from this humiliation (3:21). Ehud brought the annual tribute to Eglon, gaining a private audience, and when the obese king stood up to receive the tribute, Ehud inflicted a fatal abdominal wound upon him.

Eglon (place). egˈlon (Heb. eglôn H6324, “young bull”). An AMORITE town in the western SHEPHELAH, between GAZA and LACHISH; its king joined four others against GIBEON because this city had made a covenant with JOSHUA. Gibeon appealed to Joshua, who came with the Israelites and defeated and destroyed the five kings (Josh. 10:3, 5, 23). Later Joshua captured the city (10:36-37; 12:12). It was assigned to Judah (15:39). Recent work suggests that Eglon should be identified with Tell Aitūn, 11 mi. (18 km.) WSW of HEBRON.

Egypt. eeˈjipt. A country in the NE corner of Africa, including the NILE delta and valley, with their flanking deserts. In antiquity, it extended from the Mediterranean Sea to the first cataract of the Nile (to the second cataract in modern times). In the Table of Nations, Egypt (Heb. misrayim H5213) is listed as one of the sons of HAM and as the ancestor of seven people groups (Gen. 10:6, 13-14 = 1 Chr. 1:8, 11-12 NRSV; the NIV follows KJV in rendering “Mizraim”).

I. Its Name. The Egyptians themselves had a number of names they used for their country; usually it was called “the Two Lands,” which has reference to the origin of the nation in the union of Upper and Lower Egypt, just as the name “the United States of America” has historical derivation. Egypt was also Kemet, “the Black Land,” the rich alluvial soil of the valley, as opposed to Desheret, “the Red Land,” the barren waste of the desert. The English name Egypt derives from Greek Aigýptos G131, which in turn derives from Egyptian ḥ(t)-kꜣ-ptḥ, “Mansion of the ka-spirit of [the god] Ptah,” a name for MEMPHIS, the ancient capital. This term, already attested in the AMARNA letters of the 14th cent. B.C. as Hikuptah, shows the use of a city name for the land. Conversely, the Arabic name of the land, Maṣr or Miṣr, also stands for Cairo, successor to Memphis. This Arabic term for Egypt is that attested in the older Semitic languages, including biblical Hebrew (miṣrayim, which possibly means “[two] boundaries,” perhaps alluding to Upper and Lower Egypt).

The Nile River (looking W).

II. The Nile. “Egypt,” said Hecateus, echoed by Herodotus, “is the gift of the Nile.” This is a reflection of actual circumstances and of the Egyptian appreciation of the great river. The Nile, which courses like a living vein through the desiccated hills and deserts of NE Africa, laid down the black alluvium of the delta and the entire river valley. In view of the almost complete absence of rain, the annual overflow of the Nile was of great importance to the land, for it watered the soil and provided it with new alluvium and some organic fertilizer. Its waters were used for drinking (Exod. 7:18, 21, 24; Ps. 78:44), for bathing (Exod. 2:5), and for irrigation (Deut. 11:10). Its stream was the main channel of commerce and travel, with a prevailing N wind to favor southbound sailing vessels against the current.

The regularity of the inundation afforded a practical agricultural calendar, and the coincidence of the rise of the Nile and the appearance of the Dog Star (Sirius or Sothis) on the horizon at daybreak around July 19 was the basis for a chronological unit of 1,460 years, which is termed a Sothic cycle. Since the Egyptian calendar of 365 days was one-fourth of a day short of the true year, the Egyptian New Year's Day worked its way through the calendar until it again coincided with the rising of Sothis and the inundation ($365 \times 4 = 1,460$). The recognition of this cycle and several references to it in dates of historical records make some helpful checkpoints in Egyptian chronology.

The awareness of the dependence of land and people on the resources of the Nile led to the deification of the river. The longest river in the world, the Nile covers some 4,000 mi. (6,440 km.) from its sources in equatorial Africa to its divided mouths that open into the Mediterranean. The White Nile is the principal stream, with tributaries joining it from their eastern points of origin in the Ethiopian hills. The Blue Nile enters at Khartoum. Farther N, the Atbara, the last consequential tributary, empties its periodic flow into the northbound stream. From this junction the Nile continues some 1,500 mi. (2,415 km.) without tributary to the sea. Numbered from Aswan to the S, in order of their discovery by modern explorers, are six cataracts, areas in which hard rock resisted the erosive action of the rushing stream. To varying degrees these hindered river travel and served as barriers to military movement. From Aswan to Cairo is a stretch of somewhat less than 600 mi. (960 km.). Below Cairo spreads the fan of the delta, an area about 125 x 125 mi. (200 x 200 km.).

III. Its Geography. The division of the land into Upper and Lower Egypt predates the union into one nation. Lower Egypt included the delta and a short section of the valley southward; the rest of the valley to Aswan was Upper Egypt. These areas were subdivided into administrative units that in Greek times were called "nomes," twenty in Lower Egypt and twenty-two in its southern counterpart. With the cataracts and the Nubian desert to the S and SE, the Libyan desert and the Sahara to the W, and the Arabian desert on the E, the valley was not subject to the frequent invasions that characterized less defensible lands. The biggest threat from outside was on the delta edges; even here the passage of armies was handicapped by terrain and climate. On the NE border, fronting Asia, the Egyptians made early use of fortresses and other checkpoints to control invasion from this direction. With such protection, the country was free to develop its culture in comparative security and still to retain a free exchange of goods and ideas with other peoples.

IV. Its Climate. The climate of the land, along with the particular beliefs of the people, has been of great advantage to ARCHAEOLOGY, so that it may be said that Egypt is the archaeological area par excellence. Lack of rain and frost, plenty of dry sand to form a protective cover over remains, and abundant use of stone for monumental building are helpful environmental factors. The burial customs have been of much help to the cultural historian, for the relief sculpture, tomb furniture, models, and inscriptions tell much of the daily life of antiquity.

V. Its Religion. The religion of ancient Egypt is a vast and labyrinthine subject. Much of the religious literature appears as a hodgepodge of conflicting statements to the modern Western reader, to whom many of the allusions must remain obscure. In general, the religion may be described as a complex polytheism, with many local deities of varying importance. A full list of these divinities would be impractical, but these may be singled out: Osiris and Isis, who are well known from their later adoption by the mystery religions of Greece and Rome; Ra (Re), a sun-god, who came into prominence in the 5th dynasty; Horus, another sun-god, the son of Osiris and Isis; Set, the rival of Osiris and Horus; Amon-Re, who became the god of empire; Ptah, the god of Memphis; Khnum, the god of Elephantine. The attempt of Akhenaten (Amenhotep IV) to reorient Egyptian religion with a primary emphasis on Aton, the sun-disc, has been widely discussed as a tendency toward monotheism. There is no evidence of possible Israelite influence on his beliefs. His innovations did not long survive him and the priests of Amon at Thebes scored a theological-political victory. Much of the religious literature has a mortuary interest; this preoccupation with death was a futile gesture to transfer earthly life to an eternal dimension. There are no reflections of this Egyptian concept in the Bible, and the absence of any large body of OT teaching concerning life beyond the grave may be a divine avoidance of a possible snare to the Israelites. The influence of Egyptian religion on Israelite religious practice was largely negative. In several instances the Israelites were led into apostasy to worship Egyptian gods (see below), but even these occasions were rare.

VI. Its History. Preceding the historical or dynastic period are a number of prehistoric cultures that are known in general outline. In the late predynastic epoch there is interesting evidence of cultural influence from Mesopotamia. The rudiments of hieroglyphic WRITING also appear about this time and usher in the historical period. The materials for writing the political history of Egypt are lists of kings (such as those inscribed in temples of Abydos and Karnak, that of a tomb at Saqqarah, the Turin Papyrus, and the Palermo Stone) and numerous historical records, both of kings and of lesser persons active in history-making. The dynastic scheme is a historiographical convenience inherited from the priest-historian Manetho, who divided Egyptian history from Menes to Alexander into thirty-one dynasties. Egyptologists have used a somewhat standard arrangement of these dynasties into historical periods. A highly condensed outline follows.

A. Protodynastic Period (1st-2nd dyn.; 3100-2700 B.C.). According to the tradition of Manetho, the first king of united Egypt was Menes, who came from Thinis in Upper Egypt, united the two lands, and established his capital at Memphis in about 3200-3100. Some scholars equate Menes with Narmer and/or Aha. Royal tombs of this period have been found at Saqqarah and Abydos.

B. Old Kingdom (3rd-6th dyn.; 2700-2200). This is a high point in Egyptian history. The canons of art were firmly established in this period and perhaps the bases of the applied sciences were also laid. In the 3rd dynasty, the step pyramid of Djoser, “the world’s first monumental architecture in stone,” was built at Saqqarah. Its architect, Imhotep, was also famed in other fields of accomplishment. The 4th dynasty was the time of the pyramid-builders par excellence: the pyramids of Khufu (Cheops), Khafre (Chephren), and Menkaure (Mycerions) were constructed at Giza. Kings of the 5th and 6th dynasties had their pyramids at Saqqarah; in these were inscribed the religious writings known as the Pyramid Texts. The proverbs of Ptahhotep, a vizier of the 5th dynasty, are well-known.

C. First Intermediate Period (7th-11th dyn.; 2200-2050). This was a period of weakness and confusion. The 7th-8th dynasties were at Memphis, the 9th-10th were at Herakleopolis, and the 11th was at Thebes. The literature is an outgrowth of the pessimism of the times; it includes the writings of Ipuwer, the Dialogue of a Man Weary of Life; the Song of the Harper.

D. The Middle Kingdom (12th dyn.; 2050-1800) was another peak in Egyptian history. Art and architecture flourished. This is the time of the Eloquent Peasant and of the adventures of the courtier Sinuhe. In religious literature the Coffin Texts are found. There is a trend toward democratization of royal privileges, along with an emphasis on ma‘at, “justice, right.” The king is heralded as “the shepherd” of the people.

E. Second Intermediate Period (13th-17th dyn.; 1800-1580); another dark age for Egypt. Insignificant rulers made up the 13th-14th dynasties. The 15th-16th are the Hyksos dynasties, which may be of greater importance than brief, derogatory Egyptian references lead us to think. The 17th dynasty was made up of Theban rulers who began the movement to expel the Hyksos.

F. The New Kingdom or Empire (18th-20th dyn.; 1580-1090) marked the height of Egyptian imperialistic ambitions, with some fluctuations. Outstanding rulers include: in the 18th dynasty, Hatshepsut, the woman-king who sponsored a voyage to Punt and built a fine mortuary temple at Deir el-Bahri; Thutmose III, the energetic warrior and capable administrator; Amenhotep III, the Magnificent, a lavish spender who neglected the empire and with his successor Akhenaten, the religious innovator, ignored the pleas for help from Palestine-Syria (AMARNA Tablets). In the 19th dynasty, the outstanding figure is Ramses II, the builder, renovator, and chiseler; in the 20th dynasty, it is Ramses III, who defeated the SEA PEOPLES.

G. The Post-Empire Period or Period of Decline (21st-25th dyn.; 1150-663) finds Egypt a “broken reed.”

H. The Saite Period (26th dyn.; 663-525). There was a short restoration in this period, which includes Neco and Apries (biblical Hophra, Jer. 44:30).

I. Later Egypt. In 525 B.C., PERSIA (under Cambyses) took over Egypt; what followed were two centuries of Persian domination, limited independence, and Egyptian rebellions (27th-30th dyn.; 525-332). With ALEXANDER THE GREAT came the end of the dynasties and of native rule. After the death of Alexander (323), Egypt was governed by the Ptolemies until the Romans made it a province in 31.

VII. Egypt and the Bible. To the Israelites, Egypt was somewhat of an enigma, a land of contrast, a country that they hated but respected. When a psalmist looked back to the days of the EXODUS, he referred to the Egyptians as “a people of foreign tongue” (Ps. 114:1), a description to which even many moderns may assent. Egypt was the iron furnace of affliction during the bondage, but Israelites were so impressed with the might of the Pharaonic kingdom that there were elements in Judah that looked to the Egyptians for help even after Egypt had become the broken reed of Assyrian contempt (cf. 2 Ki. 18:21; Isa. 36:6). An unreliable ally, Egypt was also a sanctuary for some of Israel’s individual enemies. From Egypt, too, came some of the worst occasions for apostasy in Israel. Egypt appears in the Bible as a type of the transitory, earthbound system called “the world.” In one instance it is an allegorical synonym for Sodom and for rebellious Jerusalem (Rev. 11:8). Nevertheless, it was an abundant ANE breadbasket and was for centuries the ranking world power. It afforded food for many a hungry Palestinian, and heat-smitten wandering tribes were permitted to cross its borders to graze their animals in the delta. JOSEPH realized that God’s providence was in his being sold into Egypt (Gen. 45:5-9), and JACOB was instructed by the Lord to go there (46:3-4).

Egypt appears early in biblical references. ABRAHAM’s sojourn in Egypt is a well-known incident. It is evident from Gen. 12:10 that Egypt was the place to which Palestinians naturally looked in time of famine. The famous scene from the wall paintings of the tomb of Khnumhotep II at Beni Hasan shows a group of Asiatics in Middle Egypt for purposes of trade and illustrates several facets of Abraham's descent into Egypt. His fears concerning the king's interest in SARAH were real and perhaps well founded, but there is no certain evidence for such royal behavior in Egyptian literature. The oft-cited Tale of Two Brothers relates a quite different sort of situation, for there the wife is anxious to be rid of her husband so that she may become a wife of Pharaoh.

The closest Egyptian-biblical relationships may be seen in the narrative of Joseph and the account of Israelite life in Egypt to the time of their exodus (Gen. 37; 39-50; Exod. 1-15). A listing of some of the most intriguing elements includes: Joseph's coat (Gen. 37); POTIPHAR, "an Egyptian" (ch. 39); Potiphar's wife (39:6-18), with interesting parallels in the Tale of Two Brothers, a not uncommon episode in many cultures; the prison for political offenders (39:20); the duties of butler and baker; dreams in Egypt; Egyptian viticulture (ch. 40); cattle and the Nile; grain-growing (ch. 41); shaving (41:14); east wind (41:27); taxes (41:34); the gold (41:42); chariots (41:43); the priest of On (Heliopolis) (41:45); Egyptian names; Egypt as a source of food (41:57); divination (44:5); the land of GOSHEN (ch. 47); the Egyptian priesthood (47:22); embalming, mummification, and burial rites (ch. 50).

In Exod. 1 there are references to brick-making, field work, and obstetrical practices that are particularly Egyptian. In ch. 2 the references to the Nile are of interest. The account of the signs and the plagues shows an intimate knowledge of Egyptian life and provides a study in the relationship of natural and miraculous phenomena. The asking for jewelry of silver and gold (11:2) is a reflection of the expert Egyptian work in metals. The Egyptian pursuit of the fleeing Israelites (14:10, 23) finds parallels in the battle reliefs of Egypt's chief monarchs. The ironic mention of graves in Egypt (14:11) reminds us of the vast necropolis that marks the desert fringe. Well into the wilderness, the refugees were outside of Egyptian concern and out of its effective reach; but, barely escaped from slavery, the Israelites were soon engrossed in worshiping the golden calf (ch. 32), a descendant of the bovine worship of Memphis and other Egyptian cities. There were also fond recollections of good eating in Egypt, with its fish, cucumbers, leeks, onions, and garlic, which the Israelites regarded as strength-giving fare (Num. 11:5-6). During the period of the judges, the hill-country of Palestine saw little likelihood of antagonistic Egyptian interference. Egyptian power had declined; in about 1100 B.C. the royal emissary Wen-Amon found little respect for the might of Egypt along the Mediterranean coast.

With this weakness, the time was ripening for the rapid growth of a young and vigorous nation in the former Asiatic empire of Egypt. When the Israelite monarchy came into existence, neither SAUL nor DAVID recorded immediate dealings with the land of the Nile. SOLOMON, however, married a daughter of the current Pharaoh, who captured and destroyed GEZER and presented it to his daughter as dowry (1 Ki. 9:16). It is stated that Solomon's wisdom excelled that of his commercial relations with Egypt (2 Chr. 1:16-17). Late in Solomon's reign, an Edomite enemy, HADAD, who as a child had found asylum in Egypt after a raid by David into Edomite territory, left Egypt to become an active adversary of Solomon. JEROBOAM fled to Egypt to escape Solomon; as first king of the northern tribes, this Jeroboam, "who made Israel to sin," set up calf images at Dan and Bethel (1 Ki. 12:26-33), a religious importation influenced by his Egyptian exile. In the fifth year of REHOBAM (926 B.C.) the Egyptian King Sheshonk (biblical SHISHAK) carried out an expedition into Palestine that saw the temple stripped of its treasures to meet his demands (1 Ki. 14:25, 26; 2 Chr. 12:1-9).

Egypt was a strong influence in Judean politics in the days of ISAIAH and JEREMIAH, who were aware of the weakness of Egypt against the Assyrian threat. When the Assyrian remnant was making its dying stand and Egypt marched to aid them against the rampaging Babylonians, the Judean JOSIAH made a fatal effort to stop the Egyptian forces at MEGIDDO (2 Ki. 23:29-30; 2 Chr. 35:20-27).

After the fall of JERUSALEM in 586 B.C. and the subsequent murder of GEDALIAH, the Judeans again looked to Egypt as a place of refuge in spite of the prophet's warning. Here they were scattered about, with a group as far S as Elephantine maintaining a temple and keeping up correspondence with Palestine, as revealed by the Aramaic papyri found at Elephantine.

In the NT most of the references to Egypt have to do with Israel's past. One important mention had current meaning, for Joseph was divinely directed to take the infant Jesus and Mary to Egypt to escape the wrath of HEROD (Matt. 2:13-15; cf. Exod. 4:22; Hos. 11:1).

VIII. Its Significance and Future. It is remarkable that Egypt so often was a place of refuge or a means of sustaining life. Though it is regarded by some as an invariable epitome of "the world," Egypt has the scriptural prediction of a wonderful future: "In that day Israel will be the third, along with Egypt and Assyria, a blessing on the earth. The LORD Almighty will bless them, saying, 'Blessed be Egypt my people, Assyria my handiwork, and Israel my inheritance'" (Isa. 19:24-25; cf. 19:18-23).

Egypt, Brook of. See EGYPT, WADI OF.

Egypt, river of. This phrase properly renders Hebrew neḥar misrayim, which occurs only once (Gen. 15:18); it may refer to the NILE, but more likely it is the same as "the Wadi of Egypt" (see below). The NIV uses "the river of Egypt" also as the translation of yeʾôr misrayim, which occurs twice with reference to the Nile (Amos 8:8; 9:5 [KJV, "the flood of Egypt"; NRSV, "the Nile of Egypt"]; cf. the plural form in Isa. 7:18). In addition, the KJV uses the phrase six times to render a third Hebrew term, naḥal misrayim (in Num. 34:5, naḥālâ misrayim). See also EGYPT, WADI OF.

Egypt, Wadi of. The SW border of the Promised Land (Num. 34:5; cf. Josh. 15:4, 47; 1 Ki. 8:65; 2 Ki. 24:7; 2 Chr. 7:8; Isa. 27:12). Ezekiel refers to it simply as "the wadi" (naḥālâh H5711; Ezek. 47:19; 48:28). In these passages the KJV has "the river of Egypt" (except Isa. 27:12, "the stream of Egypt") and the RSV, "the Brook of Egypt." The biblical evidence places this WADI or stream bed westward from GAZA (cf. Josh. 15:47) and KADESH BARNEA (cf. Num. 34:4-5). The Wadi of Egypt has usually been identified with Wadi el-ʿArish, reaching the Mediterranean at the town of el-ʿArish some 90 mi. (145 km.) E of the Suez canal and almost 50 mi. (80 km.) SW of Gaza. More recently, however, some scholars have identified it with Naḥal Besor, which is farther N. In any case, it probably should not be confused with SHIHOR, which seems to designate the old Pelusiac and easternmost arm of the Nile (never a wadi).

Egyptian, the. An unnamed individual mentioned in the context of PAUL's arrest and removal from the temple precinct (Acts 21:38). In the narrative the Roman officer asked Paul if he was not a certain Egyptian who was attempting a revolt against Rome. This man was supposed to have led his 4,000 dagger-bearers or Sicarii into the wilderness. JOSEPHUS (Ant. 20.8.6 §§168-72; cf. War 2.13.5 §§261-63) apparently refers to the same Egyptian, "a man who declared that he was a prophet and advised the masses of the common people to go out with him to the mountain called the Mount of Olives. . . . For he asserted that he wished to demonstrate from there that at his command Jerusalem's walls would fall down, through which he promised to provide them an entrance into the city." The revolt was quelled by FELIX; 400 were killed and another two hundred taken prisoner, but the Egyptian himself escaped.

Ehi. ee'hi (Heb. ēḥî H305, derivation uncertain). Sixth son of BENJAMIN and grandson of JACOB (Gen. 46:21). Some scholars regard Ehi as an abbreviated form of AHIRAM (Num. 26:38). According to others, the Hebrew text has suffered scribal corruption.

Ehud. ee'huhd (Heb. ēhûd H179 [in 1 Chr. 8:6, MT has ēḥûd H287], possibly "where is the glory?"). (1) Son of Gera and descendant of BENJAMIN. Ehud, a left-handed hero, led the revolt against the Moabite King EGLON, who early in the period of the judges had subjugated Israel for eighteen years (Jdg. 3:15-31; 1 Chr. 8:6). Before taking the annual tribute to Eglon, Ehud fashioned a 13-inch double-edged dagger which he carried on his right thigh for convenience, being left-handed. Having publicly paid the tribute, he seized an opportunity through a ruse to speak privately to Eglon and slew the unsuspecting king. Gaining time by locking the body in the private chamber, Ehud escaped through a window and marshaled the W Jordanian Israelites to prevent 10,000 Moabite soldiers from fleeing homeward, thus insuring peace for eighty years.

(2) Son of Bilhan and descendant of Benjamin (1 Chr. 7:10).

Eker. ee'kuhr (Heb. ēqer H6831, possibly "root" or "offspring"). Son of Ram and descendant of JUDAH (1 Chr. 2:27).

Ekron. ek´ruhn (Heb. ʿeqrôn H6833, possibly “barren place”; gentilic ʿeqrônî H6834, “Ekronite”). The most northern of the five chief cities of the PHILISTINES (see 1 Sam. 6:17). It was located on the boundary between the tribes of JUDAH and DAN (Josh. 15:11; 19:43), but was assigned to Judah (15:45). After the Philistines returned the ARK OF THE COVENANT from Ekron to escape the wrath of God (1 Sam. 6), the Israelites regained possession of the city and of neighboring towns (7:14). Following DAVID’s victory over GOLIATH, the Israelites drove the Philistines back to Ekron (17:52). The god of this city was BAAL-ZEBUB (2 Ki. 1:3). The prophets mention Ekron with other Philistine cities (Jer. 25:20; Amos 1-8; Zeph. 2:4; Zech. 9:5, 7).

In the Assyrian inscriptions Ekron appears as Amqarrûna. SENNACHERIB assaulted it and killed its officials because they had been disloyal to ASSYRIA. ESARHADDON called on twenty-two cities that paid tribute to him (Ekron was one) to help transport building supplies for his palace. ASHURBANIPAL included Ekron in the list of cities that paid tribute to him. The Greek form Akkarôn appears in the APOCRYPHA (1 Macc. 10:89) and in accounts of the Crusades. Ekron is now generally identified with Khirbet el-Muqanna^c (Tel Miqne), located S of the SOREK Valley, about 20 mi. (32 km.) SE of JOPPA.

El. el (Heb. ʾēl H446, etymology disputed; ancient Semitic term for deity, cf. Assy. ilu, Ugar. il). The generic word for God in the Semitic languages, used over 200 times in the OT. In the prose books it often has a modifying term with it, but in JOB and PSALMS it occurs alone many times. El was the chief, and somewhat vague, shadowy god of the Canaanite pantheon (see RAS SHAMRA), and the title is used in the OT to express the exalted transcendence of God. See ELOHIM. The Hebrews borrowed this word from the Canaanites. The linguistic derivation of the name is uncertain; suggestions include roots that mean “to be strong” and “to be in front of” (as a leader). The Canaanite god El was the father of human beings and of gods. He is called “father of mankind” and “father of years.” He was an immoral and debased character. It is a tribute to the high morality of the OT understanding of God that a title that in Canaanite usage was so defiled could, without risk, be used to express the moral majesty of the God of Israel. Note, however, that just as the word god in English can be used of the true God or of false gods, so this word in Hebrew may refer to heathen gods, usually meaning idols (Exod. 15:11; 34:14; Isa. 43:10).

Ela. ee´luh (Heb. ʾēlā H452, meaning uncertain). Father of SHIMEI; the latter was one of the twelve governors in charge of providing for King SOLOMON’s household (1 Ki. 4:18; KJV, “Elah”).

Eladah. See ELEADAH.

Elah. ee'luh (Heb. ēlāh H462, possibly “oak”). (1) One of the Edomite chiefs descended from ESAU (Gen. 36:41; 1 Chr. 1:52). Some believe that the word should be taken as a place name and identified with ELATH.

(2) Son of CALEB and descendant of JUDAH (1 Chr. 4:15).

(3) Son of BAASHA and fourth king of Israel (1 Ki. 16:8-14). He succeeded his father in the twenty-sixth year of ASA of Judah, reigned in TIRZAH, and was assassinated in the following year (vv. 10, 15). This short period was long enough for him to show his adherence to his father's religious policy, in defiance of the prophecy of JEHU son of Hanani (v. 1), but he seems to have lacked his father's energy and leadership. It is recorded that he met his death while carousing at the home of his chamberlain in Tirzah, though the army was at the time laying siege to the PHILISTINE city of GIBBETHON.

(4) Father of HOSHEA; the latter became the last king of Israel (2 Ki. 15:30; 17:1; 18:1, 9).

(5) Son of UZZI and one of the first Benjamites to resettle in Jerusalem after the EXILE (1 Chr. 9:8).

(6) KJV form of ELA.

Elah, Valley of. ee'luh (Heb. ēlāh H463, possibly “oak”). A valley in the SHEPHELAH, generally identified with Wadi es-Sant ("Valley of the Acacia"), about 18 mi. (29 km.) WSW of JERUSALEM. The area is rich in acacias, terebinths, and oaks. It was the scene of the combat between DAVID and GOLIATH (1 Sam. 17:2, 19; 21:9). Coursing through the valley is a watercourse (or WADI, as the Arabs call it), which runs in the period of the rains only. The bottom of the watercourse is covered with small stones, the kind David might have used for his sling.

Elam (person). eeˈluhm (Heb. ēlām H6521 [H6520 for #1 below], derivation uncertain). (1) Son of SHEM, grandson of NOAH, and eponymous ancestor of the Elamites (Gen. 10:22; 1 Chr. 1:17). See ELAM (PLACE).

(2) Fifth son of Meshelemiah and descendant of LEVI through KORAH; like his father, he and his brothers were Levitical gatekeepers in the time of DAVID (1 Chr. 26:3).

(3) Son of Shahach and descendant of BENJAMIN (1 Chr. 8:24). Some identify him with #4 below.

(4) The eponym of a clan from which 1,254 persons returned to Palestine with ZERUBBABEL after the EXILE (Ezra 2:7; Neh. 7:12). An additional 70 members of this family, headed by Jeshaiiah son of Athaliah, returned with EZRA (Ezra 8:7). Still another member of this family, Shecaniah son of Jehiel, suggested to Ezra that those Israelites who had married foreign women put away these wives and their children (10:2-4). Six of the men of this family put away their foreign wives (10:26).

(5) A man referred to as “the other Elam” also had a family of 1,254 who returned from the exile (Ezra 2:31; Neh. 7:34). Because the number of family members is the same as that of #4 above, some scholars identify the two individuals as one.

(6) One of the chiefs who are said to have sealed the covenant with NEHEMIAH (Neh. 10:14). Some scholars identify him with #4 above.

(7) A priest who participated in the dedication of the walls of Jerusalem in Nehemiah's time (Neh. 12:42).

Elam (place). ee'luhm (Heb. ēlām H6520; Aram. gentilic ēlmāy H10551 and Gk. gentilic Elamitēs G1780, "Elamite"). A country situated on the east side of the TIGRIS River opposite Babylonia in a mountainous region. Its population was made up of a variety of tribes. Their language, different from the Sumerian, Semitic, and Indo-European tongues, was written in cuneiform script. It has not yet been deciphered to any great extent. Elam was one of the earliest civilizations. In Sumerian inscriptions it was called Numma (high mountain people), which became Elamtu in Akkadian texts; in classical literature it was known as Susiana, the Greek name for SUSA, the capital city of Elam.

Sargon (2350 B.C.) claimed conquest of Elam in his day. Later on, about 2280, an Elamite king invaded Babylonia and took back much spoil. Gudea, a ruler of the city of Lagash about 2100, mentions that the Elamites collected some of the timbers he used in constructing the temple of Ningirsu, the god of Lagash. HAMMURABI (1728-1686) subdued the Elamites. In the time of ABRAHAM, according to Gen. 14, an Elamite king, KEDORLAOMER, made a raid on Palestine.

Elam figures prominently in Babylonian and Assyrian texts because it was situated so close to them. When BABYLON became active against Assyrian supremacy, Elam became her chief ally. ASSYRIA was not able to subdue Elam completely until the time of ASHURBANIPAL (668-626 B.C.), who sacked the country thoroughly in 640. This catastrophe practically finished Elam as a nation, but part of the country was not much affected by these intrusions of Semitic powers. This district called Anzan was, next to the capital at Susa, the most important part of the nation. From that area, CYRUS, the conqueror of Babylon, arose.

Isaiah cites Elam as one of the nations going up with Cyrus against Babylon (Isa. 21:2) and joining the Assyrian army against Judah (22:6). Elam was one of the nations forced to drink the cup of God's wrath (Jer. 25:25) and doomed to judgment (49:34-39). Ezra 4:9-10 refers to Elamites as among the peoples brought over to SAMARIA by the Assyrians. In Acts 2:9 the Elamites are said to have been present, along with PARTHIANS, Medes (see MEDIA), and others, in Jerusalem on the day of PENTECOST.

Elasah. el'uh-suh (Heb. el āsâ H543, "God has made"). (1) Son of SHAPHAN; he and Gemariah son of Hilkiah were entrusted with a letter from JEREMIAH to the exiles in Babylon (Jer. 29:3).

(2) One of the descendants of PASHHUR who agreed to put away their foreign wives (Ezra 10:22).

Ancient Elath lay at the N end of the Gulf of Aqabah. (View to the E.)

Elath, Eloth. ee'lath, ee'loth (Heb. ēlat H397 and ēlôt H393, possibly “grove of [palm] trees”). The NIV renders “Elath” consistently. A town on the northern end of the Gulf of AQABAH (also known as the Gulf of Elath, the NE arm of the RED SEA). Many believe it is the same as EL PARAN (Gen. 14:6). The town is mentioned along with EZION GEBER in connection with the wilderness travels of the Israelites through MOAB (Deut. 2:8). Because of its strategic position, Elath was an asset to any nation. The first mention of the place after the EXODUS states that “King Solomon also built ships at Ezion Geber, which is near Elath in Edom, on the shore of the Red Sea” (1 Ki. 9:26; cf. 2 Chr. 8:17; David had earlier subdued the Edomites, 2 Sam. 8:14). Later, in the time of JEHOSHAPHAT, the ships were wrecked at Ezion Geber (1 Ki. 22:48; 2 Chr. 20:35-37). The Edomites apparently captured Elath when they rebelled against King JEHORAM (2 Ki. 8:20), for AMAZIAH is said to have rebuilt the city and restored it to Judah (2 Ki. 14:22). His son, King UZZIAH (Azariah), apparently completed the rebuilding (2 Chr. 26:2), but under the reign of AHAZ the Edomites reoccupied it (2 Ki. 16:6). There is evidence that Elath continued to play an important role long after OT times. The site is thought to be a short distance SE of Tell el-Kheleifeh, which is widely identified with Ezion Geber. The modern Israeli town of Eilat shares the same general locale, but the Jordanian town of Aqabah may be covering the ancient biblical site.

El-Berith. el'bi-rith' (Heb. ʔēl be'rîṯ H451, “God of the covenant”). A god worshiped at SHECHEM, in whose temple some of the Shechemites took refuge when ABIMELECH destroyed the city (Jdg. 9:46; KJV, “the god Berith”). It is possibly an alternate name for the god BAAL BERITH.

El Bethel. el-beth'uhl (Heb. ʔēl bêṯ-ʔēl H450, “the God [of] Bethel”). The name that JACOB, after his return from PADDAN ARAM, gave to the altar he erected at BETHEL, “because it was there that God revealed himself to him when he was fleeing from his brother” (Gen. 35:7).

Eldaah. el-day'uh (Heb. ʔeldā ʕâ H456, possibly “God has called”). Son of MIDIAN and grandson of ABRAHAM through KETURAH (Gen. 25:4 [cf. vv. 1-2]; 1 Chr. 1:33). The names of Keturah’s sons and grandsons appear to function as the clan names of various ARABIAN tribes.

Eldad. el'dad (Heb. ʔeldād H455, possibly “God has loved” or “God is friend”). One of the seventy elders chosen to assist MOSES in leading the Israelites (Num. 11:26-27; possibly the same person as ELIDAD, 34:21). When Moses found that the discontent of the people, on the journey from Sinai toward Canaan, was hard to bear, he was commanded to choose seventy elders who would share the burden of administration (11:16-17). The elders gathered at the TABERNACLE, and the Spirit of the Lord came upon them and they prophesied. Two of those chosen, Eldad and Medad, remained in the camp, yet they received the same Spirit of prophecy. JOSHUA was indignant because these two prophesied in the camp rather than at the tabernacle, but Moses refused to forbid them, remarking that he wished all the Lord’s people were PROPHETS (11:28-29).

elder. In Israel, the elders (Heb. zāqēn H2418, from the word for “beard”) were adult men who gathered in popular assembly, or as a kind of council in every village. They also served as local rulers. Usually they were the heads of families, but probably were selected also on the basis of age, wisdom, ability, respect, or prowess. MOSES called the elders of Israel together to announce that the Lord had heard their cries for help and had appointed him to lead them out of Egypt (Exod. 4:29). Later he called them out to institute the Passover (12:21). At SINAI, seventy of the elders went up the mountain with Moses and saw the God of Israel (24:9). In the wilderness, to relieve Moses, seventy elders shared his divine anointing (Num. 11:25). After the Israelites had settled in Canaan and had a king over them, the elders still functioned. They were a separate group from the heads of the tribes and the princes of the fathers’ houses (1 Ki. 8:1). Each town had its group of elders, as BETHLEHEM did (1 Sam. 16:4), “the elders. . . of each town” (Ezra 10:14). After the return from exile the elders made up the SANHEDRIN, the governing council of the Jews.

This type of society continued into NT times. The elders joined the PRIESTS and SCRIBES against Jesus (Matt. 27:12). When churches came into being, elders were appointed for each congregation (Acts 14:23; Gk. presbyteros G4565, lit., “older person, old man,” sometimes transliterated “presbyter”). The “elders” of Acts 20:17 are referred to as BISHOPS in v. 28 (NIV “overseers”). In Tit. 1:5, “elders” in the Cretan churches are mentioned; in listing qualifications for such an office, Paul calls them “bishops/overseers” in v. 7. These men were required to be blameless in their lives and obedient to the truth in their faith (1 Tim. 3:1-7; Tit. 1:6-9). Their duties involved spiritual oversight of the congregation and teaching the Word. Those who ruled well and also taught were worthy of “double honor” (1 Tim. 5:17). Before the first century A.D. had elapsed, the term bishop had taken on a special meaning, denoting the one leader of a church. Opinions vary regarding the twenty-four elders in heaven around the throne of God (as depicted in the book of Revelation); probably they represent the heavenly priesthood of the church associated with Christ, the Great High Priest.

Elead. el’ee-uhd (Heb. ʔel ʕād H537, “God has testified”). Son of EPHRAIM (or possibly son of SHUTHELAH #1 and grandson of Ephraim); he and EZER (prob. his brother), while raiding the livestock in GATH, were killed by the men of the city (1 Chr. 7:21). This tragedy in the family moved Ephraim to call his next son BERIAH, an allusion to the Hebrew word for “calamity” (v. 23).

Eleadah. el’ee-ay’duh (Heb. ʔel ʕādâ H538, “God has adorned”). KJV Eladah. Son or, more probably, descendant of EPHRAIM; it is possible that his father’s (as well as his son’s) name was TAHATH (1 Chr. 7:20; the referent of the repeated phrase “his son” is ambiguous).

Elealeh. el’ee-ay’luh (Heb. ʔel ʕālêh H542 and ʔel ʕālê H541, possibly “God ascends”). A city in TRANSJORDAN on the S boundary of the region known as GILEAD. It lay over a mile NNE of HESHBON, almost due E of the northern tip of the DEAD SEA. It is identified with the modern site of el-ʕAl. Elealeh and surrounding towns were given to the tribe of REUBEN (Num. 32:3). They were rebuilt and given Israelite names (32:37-38). The Moabites soon reoccupied the area, and the territory was in dispute between AMMON and MOAB (Jdg. 11:13-33). Upon the death of AHAB (c. 850 B.C.), MESHACH of Moab revolted; the territory thus became Moabite and remained so throughout the prophetic period. Elealeh and Heshbon are mentioned in both Isaiah's and Jeremiah's oracles of judgment on Moab (Isa. 15:4; 16:9; Jer. 48:34).

Eleasah. el'ee-ay'suh (Heb. ʔel ʿāsâ H543, "God has made"). (1) Son of Helez and descendant of JUDAH (1 Chr. 2:39-40).

(2) Son of Raphah and descendant of SAUL through JONATHAN (1 Chr. 8:37; 9:43).

Eleazar. el'ee-ay'zühr (Heb. ʔel ʿāzār H540, "God has helped"; Gk. Eleazar G1789; see also ELIEZER). (1) Son of AARON and ELISHEBA (Exod. 6:23). Two of Eleazar's brothers, NADAB and ABIHU, were killed when they offered "unauthorized fire before the LORD" (Lev. 10:1-11). Eleazar, the oldest remaining son, evidently had the primogeniture rather than his younger brother, ITHAMAR, and he succeeded in the high priestly office after his father's death (Num. 20:25-28; Deut. 10:6). Eleazar supervised the Kohathites (see KOHATH), who carried the ARK OF THE COVENANT and the holy furniture upon their shoulders on the march (Num. 3:30-32). He was also charged with the oversight of the TABERNACLE and its furniture, the oil, the incense, etc. (4:16). Eleazar was prominent after the rebellion of KORAH, DATHAN, and ABIRAM (Num. 16). He was the first appointed to prepare holy water from the ashes of the red heifer (19:4), and he served as high priest to JOSHUA (27:19-21). His son PHINEHAS carried the trumpets and other articles to battle in TRANSJORDAN (31:6). With Joshua, Eleazar divided the land of Palestine by lot (34:17; Josh. 14:1; 17:4). For a time, and for reasons that are not clear, the descendants of Ithamar superseded those of Eleazar in the tabernacle of SHILOH. The priest ELI was of the house of Ithamar, but because of the wickedness of his house, his line was rejected.

(2) Son of ABINADAB; he was consecrated to keep the ARK OF THE COVENANT after it was brought back from Philistia (1 Sam. 7:1).

(3) Son of Dodo the Ahohite and one of David's first three "mighty men" (2 Sam. 23:9; 1 Chr. 11:12). See discussion under SHAMMAH #4.

(4) Son of Mahli and descendant of LEVI through MERARI; the text records twice that he died without sons (1 Chr. 23:21-22; 24:28). His daughters married the sons of his brother KISH.

(5) Son of Phinehas and a priest of the time of Ezra (Ezra 8:33; prob. the same as the temple singer mentioned in Neh. 12:42).

(6) One of the descendants of Parosh who agreed to put away their foreign wives (Ezra 10:25).

(7) Son of Eliud, included in Matthew's GENEALOGY OF JESUS CHRIST (Matt. 1:15).

election and predestination. For God to “predestine” (Gk. proorizō G4633) is for him to decree or foreordain the circumstances and destiny of people according to his perfect will (Rom. 8:29-30; Eph. 1:11). It is, therefore, a particular aspect of the general PROVIDENCE of God that relates to God's superintendence of the whole cosmos and everything in it. For God to “elect” (Heb. bāḥar H1047 and Gk. eklegomai G1721) is for him to choose for salvation and/or service a people or a person; the choice is based not on merit but on his free, sovereign LOVE (Deut. 4:37; 7:7; 14:2; Acts 13:17; 15:7; 1 Thess. 1:4). Further, since predestination and election are both presented as gracious acts of God, they cannot be based on God's knowing in advance the reactions of people to his will. Election must be choice flowing only from God's own initiative. Believers were chosen in Christ before the foundation of the world (Eph. 1:4).

Election is a prominent theme in the OT. There is the choice of ABRAHAM and his “seed” that in him the nations of the world will be blessed (Gen. 12:1-3; 22:17-18); and there is the choice of (or COVENANT with) the people ISRAEL whom God led out of bondage into liberty (Exod. 3:6-10; Deut. 6:21-23). This nation was chosen by God as those to whom he could reveal himself and his will, and through whom he could exhibit and declare to the world his purposes and salvation (Deut. 28:1-14; Isa. 43:10-12, 20, 21). Further, there was the choice, from within the chosen people, of specific individuals—e.g., AARON and DAVID—for special roles and tasks (Deut. 18:5; 1 Sam. 10:24; Ps. 105:26; 106:23).

In the NT, Jesus is the Elect One (Lk. 9:35), in whom the election of Israel and of the CHURCH of God of the new covenant find their meaning and center. Jesus is the elect “cornerstone” of the new building that God is constructing, composed of both Jewish and Gentile believers (1 Pet. 2:4-6). God destined us in love to be his children through Jesus Christ (Eph. 1:5). So the church of God is an elect race (1 Pet. 2:9), replacing the old Israel in the purposes of God. And this new race is mostly composed of poor and ordinary people (1 Cor. 1:27-29). God's election is never presented as a cause for speculation or controversy, but rather to celebrate the free GRACE of God that grants salvation and also to move believers to constant worship and lives of holiness and goodness. As in the OT there is in the NT the election of individuals for service (e.g., Acts 6:5; 15:22, 25). Further, the question as to whether the Jews are, as a people, still the elect of God is faced by Paul in Rom. 9-11 in the light of the salvation of God in and through Jesus.

elect lady. This title occurs in the salutation of 2 Jn. 1 (NIV, “To the chosen lady”). It has been understood to identify a Christian woman, the acquaintance of the Elder who wrote the letter. Her sister may have been his hostess at the time he wrote. “Lady” in Greek was sometimes a proper noun, and some have thought it should have been transliterated (“To the elect Kyria”; cf. the name of GAIUS in 3 John). It is more likely that the reference was a figure of speech referring to the church to which the letter was addressed, as also the closing reference to “sister” would be understood as a designation for a Christian community.

El Elohe Israel. el-el’oh-heh-is’ray-uhl (Heb. ʔēl ʔeʔlōhê yiśrā ʔēl H449, “God is the God of Israel”). The name of a confessional altar erected by JACOB, who appropriated the Canaanite deity name EL for use as one of the designations of the true God (Gen. 33:20). When the patriarch returned from PADDAN ARAM with his family, he purchased a portion of a field from the sons of HAMOR, on which he had camped (33:18-19) and on which he erected the altar.

El Elyon. el’el-yohn’ (Heb. ʔēl H446, “God,” and ʔelyôn H6610, “high, highest”). A name of God used especially in GENESIS and PSALMS and often rendered “God Most High.” When ABRAHAM paid tithes to MELCHIZEDEK, this is the name by which the latter worshiped God (Gen. 14:19-20). The name occurs exactly in this form again in Ps. 78:35, but there are other Psalms where Elyon is combined with Yahweh or Elohim (see 7:17; 47:2; 57:2; 78:56). Frequently, Elyon (the Highest) is used by itself as a name for God (Num. 24:16; Deut. 32:8; et al.).

elements, elemental spirits. These and similar English terms are used by the NRSV and other versions to render Greek stoicheion G5122 (in the NT always pl. stoicheia). The NIV uses “basic principles” or “principles” (Gal. 4:3, 9; Col. 2:8, 20; TNIV, “elemental spiritual forces”), but also “elements” (2 Pet. 3:10, 12) and “elementary truths” (for a phrase in Heb. 5:12). The word meant “one of a row,” that is, anything standing in a series, such as the letters of the alphabet. It aptly described the rudiments (“ABCs”) of a system of knowledge or religion, which is probably its meaning in Hebrews. This “logical-pedagogical” sense also may apply to the Galatian and possibly the Colossian passages. A natural extension of the word was to the elemental substances of the world, which is its probable meaning in 2 Peter. The term also came to designate personified beings or “elemental spirits.” These could be simply personifications of natural forces, or could be individualized as demons or, possibly, as angels. See ANGEL; DEMON. Recent scholarship has tended to interpret the language of Col. 2:8, 20 in this way. Some interpreters have so understood Gal. 4:3, 9 as well.

Eleph. See HAELEPH.

elephant. See ANIMALS.

Elephantine. el'uh-fan-ti'nee (Gk. Elephantinē, “Elephant place,” translation of the older Egyptian name, Iebew). A settlement on an island in the NILE River, opposite ancient SYENE, with the modern name of Geziret Aswan (the “Island of Aswan”). It is best known because of certain papyri (see PAPYRUS) of the fifth century B.C. that were found there and that provide very important information about ancient ARAMAIC and about Jewish society in EGYPT.

Eleven, the. This term is used in Luke-Acts with reference to the eleven apostles of Jesus who remained after the death of JUDAS ISCARIOT (Lk. 24:9, 33; Acts 2:14; cf. Matt. 28:16; Mk. 16:14; Acts 1:26). The use of the Greek definite article sets them apart as a group who retained their continuity with the Twelve. After the choice of MATTHIAS (Acts 1:26), they became “the Twelve” again (Acts 6:2; cf. Rev. 21:14).

Elhanan. el-hay'nuhn (Heb. elḥānān H481, “God has been gracious”). (1) Son of JAARE-OREGIM, from BETHLEHEM; he was a member of DAVID’s army in the wars against the PHILISTINES at GOB who slew GOLIATH the Gittite, the shaft of whose spear is said to have been like a weaver’s rod (2 Sam. 21:19; KJV conjecturally reads “the brother of Goliath”). In Chronicles, however, the father of Elhanan is said to be JAIR, and his victim is Goliath’s brother, LAHMI (1 Chr. 20:5). The discrepancy may be the result of one or more scribal errors. Other solutions include the view that there were two separate giants named Goliath (one slain by David and one by Elhanan), or that Goliath was a generic name for a class of giants, or that David and Elhanan are identical.

(2) Son of Dodo, from Bethlehem; he was one of David’s Thirty who ranked next to the Three (2 Sam. 23:24; 1 Chr. 11:26). A few scholars have identified him with #1 above.

Eli. ee'li (Heb. ēlî H6603, possibly “lofty” or “[God/Yahweh] is high”). A member of the family of ITHAMAR (fourth son of AARON) who acted as both judge and high PRIEST in Israel. He lived at SHILOH in a dwelling adjoining the TABERNACLE (1 Sam. 1-4; 14:3; 1 Ki. 2:27). Little is known about him until he was well advanced in age, when HANNAH came to pray for a son. The conduct of Eli's sons, PHINEHAS and HOPHNI, who also served as priest, gave him grief in his declining years. Their behavior shocked the people, for they "were treating the LORD's offering with contempt" (1 Sam. 2:17). While Eli warned them of their shameful ways, he did not rebuke with the severity their deeds merited. Instead, Eli mildly reasoned with his sons, saying, "Why do you do such things?" (2:23). But the sons no longer heeded their father, and he did not restrain them. An old man of ninety, almost blind, Eli waited to hear the result of the battle between the Israelites and the PHILISTINES. When the messenger came with the news of the slaughter of his sons and of the taking of the ARK OF THE COVENANT, Eli fell off his seat and died of a broken neck. Although a good and pure man, Eli was weak and indecisive.

Eli, Eli, lama sabachthani. See ELOI, ELOI, LAMA SABACHTHANI.

Eliab. i-li'uhb (Heb. עֲלִיָּאֵב H482, "my God is father"). (1) Son of Helon and a leader from the tribe of ZEBULUN, heading a division of 57,400 (Num. 2:7; 10:16). He was among those who assisted MOSES in taking a census of the Israelites (1:9) and who brought offerings to the Lord for the dedication of the TABERNACLE (7:24-29).

(2) Son (or descendant) of PALLU son of REUBEN. Two of Eliab's sons (or descendants), DATHAN and ABIRAM, were among the leaders who joined the Levite KORAH in his rebellion against Moses and Aaron in the wilderness and subsequently suffered judgment (Num. 16:1, 12; 26:8-9; Deut. 11:6).

(3) Son of Nahath and descendant of LEVI through KOHATH; he was also an ancestor of SAMUEL the prophet (1 Chr. 6:27). He is apparently the same as ELIEL (1 Chr. 6:34) and ELIHU (1 Sam. 1:1).

(4) Eldest son of JESSE whose physical appearance made him attractive to SAMUEL as a candidate for king but who at the Lord's prompting was passed in favor of his brother DAVID (1 Sam. 16:6; 1 Chr. 2:13). Eliab, who served SAUL in the Valley of Elah when Goliath challenged the army, was angry at David for coming to the battle (1 Sam. 17:13, 28). He also was the father of ABIHAIL, wife of REHOBOAM (2 Chr. 11:18). On the assumption that ELIHU is a variant name, many scholars believe Eliab was the brother of David who later became an officer over the tribe of JUDAH (1 Chr. 27:18).

(5) A warrior, third in rank among the Gadite officers, who served DAVID at ZIKLAG (1 Chr. 12:9). These Gadites “were brave warriors, ready for battle and able to handle the shield and spear. Their faces were the faces of lions, and they were as swift as gazelles in the mountains” (v. 8).

(6) A Levite, listed among those who sang and who played lyres and harps when the ARK OF THE COVENANT was transferred, as arranged by David (1 Chr. 15:18, 20; 16:5).

Eliada. i-li’uh-duh (Heb. elyādā H486, “God knows”). (1) Son of DAVID; he is listed among those children born after David took concubines and wives in Jerusalem (2 Sam. 5:16; 1 Chr. 3:8). His original name was probably BEELIADA (“Baal [= the Lord] knows,” 1 Chr. 14:6) and was later changed when the term BAAL became distasteful because of its associations with IDOLATRY.

(2) Father of REZON (1 Ki. 11:23; KJV, “Eliadah”); the latter seized DAMASCUS and became SOLOMON’s adversary (vv. 24-25).

(3) A skilled soldier and a commander of 200,000 archers from BENJAMIN during the reign of JEHOSHAPHAT (2 Chr. 17:17). The large numbers in this passage (well over one million soldiers residing in Jerusalem) seem impossibly high. Some argue that the word for “thousand” (elep H547) should be “leader” (allûp H477), in which case Eliada commanded 200 specially trained soldiers. Alternatively, the term elep came to indicate a military unit of varying sizes. Others believe that the Chronicler deliberately uses hyperbole to indicate divine favor.

Elijah. i-li’uh. KJV form of ELIJAH (only 1 Chr. 8:27; Ezra 10:26).

Elijahba. i-li’uh-buh (Heb. elyābā H494, “God hides”). A Shaalbonite (i.e., from SHAALABBIN) and one of the “Thirty,” DAVID’s elite guard (2 Sam. 23:32; 1 Chr. 11:33).

Eliakim. i-li’uh-kim (Heb. elyāqîm H509, “God raises up,” i.e., “may God deliver”; Gk. Eliakim G1806). (1) Son of HILKIAH and palace administrator under King HEZEKIAH (2 Ki. 18:18—19:7; Isa. 36:3—37:7). Eliakim, with two others (Shebna and Joah), was selected to negotiate with the besieging Assyrian army in 701 B.C. The trio objected to the Assyrian commander’s use of the HEBREW LANGUAGE instead of ARAMAIC in the public conference, but to no avail. After hearing the repeated demands that Jerusalem surrender, they relayed the message to the king with great sorrow, and the king in turn sent these official to inquire of the prophet ISAIAH. Contrasted with SHEBNA, Eliakim receives very high commendation from the Lord (Isa. 22:20-24).

(2) Son of JOSIAH and one of the last kings of Judah (2 Ki. 23:34-37 et al.). See JEHOIAKIM.

(3) One of the priests who, with their trumpets, participated in the dedication of the wall of Jerusalem under the leadership of NEHEMIAH (Neh. 12:41).

(4) Son of Abiud, included in Matthew's GENEALOGY OF JESUS CHRIST (Matt. 1:13).

(5) Son of Melea, included in Luke's GENEALOGY OF JESUS CHRIST (Lk. 3:30).

Eliam. i-li´uhm (Heb. ʔeʕlî ʕām H500, “God is [my] kinsman”). (1) The father of BATHSHEBA, who became DAVID’s wife (2 Sam. 11:3; in 1 Chr. 3:5 he is called AMMIEL [note that the two names have the same meaning, but with the components reversed]). The fact that Bathsheba is identified first as Eliam’s daughter and then as URIA’H’s wife may indicate that Eliam was a person of some significance. According to some scholars, this Eliam should be identified with #2 below.

(2) Son of AHITHOPHEL of Gilo and a member of DAVID’s Thirty, the military élite of the nation (2 Sam. 23:34). This man is also called AHLIAH (“my brother is Yahweh”) the Pelonite (1 Chr. 11:36).

Elias. i-li´uhs. The Greek form of the name of the prophet ELIJAH, used by the KJV in all occurrences of the name in the NT.

Eliasaph. i-li´uh-saf (Heb. ʔelyāsāp H498, “God has added”). (1) Son of DEUEL (or REUEL) and a leader of the tribe of GAD, heading a division of 45,650 (Num. 2:14; 10:20). He was among those who assisted MOSES in taking a census of the Israelites (1:14) and who brought offerings to the Lord for the dedication of the TABERNACLE (7:42-47).

(2) Son of Lael and the leader of the Levitical clan descended from GERSHON during the time of Moses (Num. 3:24). The Gershonites were responsible for the care of the tabernacle (vv. 25-26).

Eliashib. i-li´uh-shib (Heb. ʔelyāšîb H513, “God has restored”). (1) A priest chosen during the time of DAVID to head the eleventh of the twenty-four courses of priests who took turns serving in the sanctuary (1 Chr. 24:12).

(2) A high priest during the time of NEHEMIAH who helped to rebuild the SHEEP GATE (Neh. 3:1, 20-21). Reference is made to his son Joiada and to a grandson who married SANBALLAT's daughter (13:28). This Eliashib may be the same priest who incurred NEHEMIAH's displeasure because he made a temple storage area into special living quarters for TOBIAH (13:4-9). Some think he may also be the father (grandfather?) of a certain Jehohanan (Johanan) who provided a room for EZRA's mourning (Ezra 10:6).

(3) A singer among the Levites during the time of Ezra (Ezra 10:24). He pledged to put away his foreign wife and children when commanded to do so.

(4) One of the descendants of Zattu who agreed to put away their foreign wives (Ezra 10:27).

(5) One of the descendants of Bani who agreed to put away their foreign wives (Ezra 10:36).

(6) Son of Elioenai and descendant of DAVID through ZERUBBABEL (1 Chr. 3:24).

Eliathah. i-li'uh-thuh (Heb. ʔeḏî ʔātâ H484 and ʔeḏîyyātâ H517, "God has come"). Son of HEMAN, the king's seer (1 Chr. 25:4). The fourteen sons of Heman, along with the sons of ASAPH and JEDU-THUN, were set apart "for the ministry of prophesying, accompanied by harps, lyres and cymbals" (v. 1). The assignment of duty was done by lot, and the twentieth lot fell to Eliathah, his sons, and his relatives (25:27).

Elidad. i-li'dad (Heb. ʔeḏîdād H485, possibly "my God has loved" or "my God is friend"). Son of Kislon, from the tribe of BENJAMIN (Num. 34:21). He was one of the leaders chosen by God to divide the land of Canaan on the W side of the JORDAN for the inheritance of the ten tribes. Elidad is possibly the same as ELDAD, who together with MEDAD prophesied in the camp of Israel (11:26-27).

Elihoenai. i-li'uh-hoh-ee'ni (Heb. ʔelyeḥô ʕênay H492, "to Yahweh are my eyes [looking]"). (1) Son of Meshelemiah, a LEVITE (1 Chr. 26:3; KJV, "Elioenai"). Meshelemiah and his seven sons were Korahites (i.e., descendants of LEVI through KORAH) appointed as doorkeepers in the time of DAVID.

(2) Son of Zerariah and descendant of PAHATH-MOAB; he was at the head of 200 men who returned from the EXILE with EZRA (Ezra 8:4; KJV, "Elihoenai").

Eliel. i-li'uhl (Heb. ʔeḏî ʔēl H483, "my God is God"). (1) Son of Toah; he was a descendant of LEVI through KOHATH and an ancestor of SAMUEL the prophet and of HEMAN the musician (1 Chr. 6:34). He is probably the same as ELIAB (1 Chr. 6:27) and ELIHU (1 Sam. 1:1).

(2) One of the family heads in the eastern half of the tribe of MANASSEH (1 Chr. 5:24). He and others are described as “brave warriors, famous men, and heads of their families. But they were unfaithful to the God of their fathers and prostituted themselves to the gods of the peoples of the land” (vv. 24b-25).

(3) Son of Shimei; he was a Benjamite family head who lived in Jerusalem in David’s day (1 Chr. 8:20; cf. v. 28).

(4) Son of Shashak; another Benjamite family head who lived in Jerusalem in David’s day (1 Chr. 8:22; cf. v. 28).

(5) A MAHAVITE included among David’s mighty warriors (1 Chr. 11:46).

(6) One of David’s mighty warriors (1 Chr. 11:47, apparently different from Eliel the Mahavite, v. 46).

(7) A warrior, seventh in rank among the Gadite officers who served David at ZIKLAG (1 Chr. 12:9). These Gadites “were brave warriors, ready for battle and able to handle the shield and spear. Their faces were the faces of lions, and they were as swift as gazelles in the mountains” (v. 8). It is possible that this Eliel is the same as either #5 or #6 above.

(8) A descendant of HEBRON and one of the Levitical leaders whom David brought together when the ARK OF THE COVENANT was transferred to Jerusalem (1 Chr. 15:9, 11).

(9) One of the temple supervisors under CONANIAH, who was in charge of the contributions during the reign of HEZEKIAH (2 Chr. 31:13).

Elienai. el’ee-ee’ni (Heb. עֵלִינַי H501, short form of עֵלְיָהוּ הַנַּי H492, “to Yahweh are my eyes [looking]”). Son of Shimei; a Benjamite family head who lived in Jerusalem in DAVID’s day (1 Chr. 8:20; cf. v. 28).

Eliezer. el’ee-ee’zühr (Heb. עֵלִי עֶזֶר H499, “my God is [my] help”; Gk. Eliezer G1808; see also ELEAZAR). (1) A servant (prob. the chief servant) in the household of ABRAHAM who was due to receive the inheritance if the latter had no sons (Gen. 15:2-3). Eliezer is described by Abraham as “the one who will inherit my estate” (the Heb. expression is difficult) and identified as “Eliezer of Damascus” (but the Heb. here is unusual too and can be translated “Dammesek Eliezer,” as in NJPS). Whatever may be the precise explanation of 15:2, the following verse makes the meaning explicit, and the Lord’s response is equally clear, “This man will not be your heir, but a son coming from your own body will be your heir” (v. 4). Eliezer was most likely the unnamed servant of Gen.

24 who was sent to get a wife for ISAAC from among Abraham's people. If so, he was a devout man of faith.

(2) The second son of MOSES by ZIPPORAH (Exod. 18:4; 1 Chr. 23:15). The name was given to him by Moses with this explanation, "My father's God was my helper [Heb. ēzer H6469]; he saved me from the sword of Pharaoh." Eliezer had only one son, Rehabiah, "but the sons of Rehabiah were very numerous" (23:17). One of Eliezer's descendants was in charge of all the treasuries of the gifts that DAVID and the heads of the families of Israel had dedicated to God (26:25-26).

(3) Son of BEKER and grandson of BENJAMIN (1 Chr. 7:8).

(4) One of the priests appointed to blow the trumpet when David transferred the ARK OF THE COVENANT to Jerusalem (1 Chr. 15:24).

(5) Son of Zicri and chief officer of the tribe of REUBEN in David's day (1 Chr. 27:16).

(6) Son of Dodavahu and a prophet in JEHOSEPHAT's time (2 Chr. 20:37). He was from MARESHAH and predicted the destruction of Jehoshaphat's fleet because the king had made alliance with AHAZIAH.

(7) One of a group of leaders sent by EZRA to Iddo to get attendants for the house of God (Ezra 8:16).

(8) One the descendants of JESHUAH who agreed to put away their foreign wives (Ezra 10:18).

(9) One of the Levites who agreed to put away their foreign wives (Ezra 10:23).

(10) One of the descendants of Harim who agreed to put away their foreign wives (Ezra 10:31).

(11) Son of Jorim, included in Luke's GENEALOGY OF JESUS CHRIST (Lk. 3:29).

Elihoenai. el'ee-hoh-ee'ni. See ELIEHOENAI.

Elihoreph. el'uh-hoh'rif (Heb. ʾelīhōrep H495, possibly "my God rewards"). Son of Shisha and a chief official during SOLOMON's reign; he and his brother AHIJAH functioned as secretaries (1 Ki. 4:3).

Elihu. i-li'hyoo (Heb. ʾelīhū H491 and ʾelīhū H490, "my God is he"). (1) Son of Tohu and ancestor of the prophet SAMUEL (1 Sam. 1:1). He is apparently the same as ELIAB (1 Chr. 6:27) and ELIEL (1 Chr. 6:34).

(2) One of the commanders from the tribe of MANASSEH who deserted SAUL to join DAVID's army (1 Chr. 12:20).

(3) Son (or relative) of Shemaiah and grandson (or descendant) of OBED-EDOM (1 Chr. 26:7). This family of Korahites (see KORAH #3) belonged to one of the divisions of gatekeepers (v. 1).

(4) A brother of David who became an officer over the tribe of JUDAH (1 Chr. 27:18). Many scholars believe he should be identified with ELIAB, David's eldest brother (1 Sam. 16:6 et al.).

(5) Son of BARAKEL the Buzite and one of the friends who reasoned with JOB (Job 32:2; see BUZ #3). He became angry with Job's arguments and the failure of his three friends to respond to those arguments. Thereupon he launched into a speech in which he insisted that suffering has a disciplinary purpose (32:6—37:24).

Elijah. i-li'juh (Heb. ʿēliyyāhû H489 and ʿēliyyâ H488 [2 Ki. 1:3 et al.], "my God is Yahweh"; Gk. ēlias G2460). KJV NT, Elias. (1) Son of JEROHAM and descendant of BENJAMIN; he is listed among the heads of families who lived in Jerusalem (1 Chr. 8:27; KJV, "Eliah").

(2) One of the descendants of Harim who agreed to put away their foreign wives (Ezra 10:21).

(3) One of the descendants of Elam who agreed to put away their foreign wives (Ezra 10:26; KJV, "Eliah").

(4) The famous ninth-century prophet who served in the northern kingdom in the reigns of AHAB and his son AHAZIAH (1 Ki. 17:1—2 Ki. 2:12). Elijah was from the town of TISHBE in GILEAD (KJV, "of the inhabitants of Gilead"), E of the JORDAN River. In our ears his first message sounds like no more than a weather forecast, a drought (1 Ki. 17:1) that would last over three years (18:1), but Ahab and all who heard knew that more was involved than a prediction of climatic hardship. The "forces of nature" are in the Lord's hands; he uses them to bless, to warn, and to judge his people (cf. Deut. 28:1-2, 12, 15, 22-24). Elijah's commission therefore was to convey a stern message: All is not well between the Lord and his people, and they are about to suffer his judgments on their disobedience.

But, remarkably, the Lord did not leave Elijah there either to amplify the message or to seek to win the people back from the path of spiritual disaster. He took Elijah away into three hidden years of apprenticeship (1 Ki. 17:3, "hide"). First, by the Lord's word, he returned to his own home area, for even though we do not know precisely where KERITH was, it was E of Jordan (17:2-5). There Elijah was marvelously provided for. In this way he began to learn that as long as he walked in obedience he would be safe (however unlikely the means of supply might be). The next test was more demanding: he had to go to ZAREPHATH, which was only 6 mi. (10 km.) S of JEZEBEL's hometown of SIDON. Elijah not only learned once again that the Lord cared for his obedient servant, but that the Lord's power is superior to all human power (18:10). The third story from the hidden years (17:17-24) was designed by the Lord to teach Elijah specifically the power of prayer to transform situations of death—a boy was restored to life (17:22) and his mother brought to spiritual faith and testimony (17:24).

After confronting the prophets of Baal, Elijah fled to Horeb. The cypress trees at the bottom of the photo mark the traditional site of “Elijah’s spring.” (View to the SW.)

Against this background the time came for the drought to be broken. Again the word of God came (1 Ki. 18:1), and Elijah had learned in the apprentice years that when the word is obeyed all must be well. He therefore went without fear to meet Ahab, but it is in fact Ahab who had to come to meet Elijah (18:2-16). Another lesson learned in the hidden years now came to fruition: knowing that the Lord answers prayer (17:20-24), Elijah proposed a prayer contest (18:24) on Mount CARMEL. The behavior of the BAAL prophets there (18:26-29) was in accord with their beliefs. According to a practice known as “imitative magic,” they sought to do on earth what they desired their god to do from heaven. First they limp (literally) or dance around the altar, trying to suggest flickering and dancing flames (18:26). When that failed, they resorted to the desperate expedient of slashing and cutting their bodies, in the hope that the down-pouring blood might prompt the down-pouring of fire. But it was all to no avail. Elijah, on the contrary, began his appeal to the Lord by a deliberate disavowal of imitative magic. About to call for fire, he first demanded the pouring of water on the intended sacrifice. This was a direct denial of the whole Baal theology and tantamount to a denial of the reality of Baal. Then, with simplicity and dignity (18:36-37), he rested his case on the certainty that the Lord would answer prayer.

Why did Elijah demand the deliberate slaughter of the Baal entourage (1 Ki. 18:40)? Perhaps we are repulsed by it because we have allowed our sense of moral and spiritual outrage to atrophy: we no longer feel any deep concern at the presence and threat of false religions; we are tolerant of error and of the menace it constitutes to the souls of people; we do not face up to the exclusiveness of the person and claims of the Lord. This is not to say that we should copy the methods of Elijah in this any more than we would build altars and sacrifice animals, but we must not criticize, much less scorn or look down on him for expressing in terms appropriate to his day a decisiveness of commitment, loyalty, and concern that we are failing to express in terms appropriate to ours.

Elijah had one more matter to occupy him on Mount Carmel. James directs us to interpret Elijah's crouched attitude as one of prayer (Jas. 5:18): he was praying for the fulfillment of what the Lord had promised (1 Ki. 18:1). He was blessed with persistent faith, for seven times he sent his servant to a lookout point, and as soon as even the slightest sign appeared, he responded in active faith to its message (18:43-45).

The collapse of Elijah (1 Ki. 19:1-4) is not at all difficult to understand. The amount of sleep the Lord insisted on giving him (19:5-6) shows the extent to which he had neglected his physical well-being. He had allowed himself to become overtired and then he became overwrought (19:3) when he was faced, not with celebrations and triumphant crowds as he had hoped, but with Jezebel's undiminished influence. It seemed as though the victory on Mount Carmel had never happened. But the Lord was not defeated. First he gave his servant rest and nourishment (19:5-7); second, he brought him into his own presence (19:8-9); third, he renewed Elijah's sense of the power of the word of God. Elijah experienced the wind, earthquake, and fire—three notable instruments of divine purpose—but he had no sense of meeting the Lord in them (19:11-12). Yet when a “gentle whisper” came (19:12b), Elijah knew he was in the very presence of the Lord. How significant then the question is: What are you doing here? (19:13). In his hidden years, he did nothing without a word (17:2-3, 8-9; 18:1-2), but the Lord had not told him to flee from Jezebel! Understandably but tragically, in the crucial moment, Elijah forgot one of the central lessons of his apprenticeship: The servant of the Lord lives by the word of the Lord, and when he does so he is provided for and kept safe. Fourth, the Lord renewed Elijah's commission and gave him a word of encouragement (19:15-18). Perhaps we ought to note as a fifth element in the restorative work of the Lord that he left Elijah's prayer unanswered (19:4). He had it in mind to grant Elijah something far better than he would dare pray for. He would never die (2 Ki. 2:11).

Elijah appears only once more in the reign of Ahab, when that weak king acquiesced in the murder of NABOTH (1 Ki. 21) and the violent seizure of his vineyard. In his response to this, Elijah is a true founder of the brilliant line of PROPHETS that was to follow him in his concern for moral and social righteousness. In the reign of Ahab's son, Ahaziah (853-852 B.C.), he vigorously resisted the king's attempt to take him by force (2 Ki. 1). Again we find ourselves affronted by the violence of Elijah's response, and we need to remind ourselves that he was acting in ways appropriate to his day with a decisiveness for God and a hatred and abhorrence of false religion that we might well covet for ourselves.

Elijah was a mighty man for God, yet the Bible does not conceal his faults, but rather selects one for special mention. Elijah was what we call a "loner." He easily felt himself isolated and solitary (1 Ki. 18:22), even when he knew that it was very far from the truth (cf. 18:13). It is true to character that when he most needed fellowship and help, he deliberately sought a solitary path (19:3-4), and when the Lord blessed him with the companionable and warm-hearted ELISHA, he was unready to share with him the great experience that he knew was to be his (2 Ki. 2:2, 4, 6). It is certain he would not have fled from Jezebel had he been willing to gather round him the supportive fellowship of OBADIAH and his large prophetic group. Nevertheless the Lord gave Elijah, that man of like nature with ourselves (Jas. 5:17), the glorious and unique honor of by-passing death and entering heaven in the whirlwind (2 Ki. 2:11).

But though Elijah thus dramatically left the earthly scene, his story was not over. His prophecy regarding Jezebel (1 Ki. 21:23) was later fulfilled (2 Ki. 9:36), and his forecast regarding the dynasty of Ahab proved true (10:10, 17). Furthermore, 2 Chr. 21:12-15 records that Elijah also had a written ministry. Beyond that, too, his ministry continued. Malachi 4:5-6 foresaw the appearance of Elijah as the forerunner of the MESSIAH, and this was fulfilled in the ministry of JOHN THE BAPTIST (e.g., Matt. 11:13-14; 17:9-13). Elijah's greatest privilege in the Bible story was to stand with the Son of God on the Mount of TRANSFIGURATION and speak with him of his coming death (Matt. 17:3-4; Mk. 9:4-5; Lk. 9:30-33).

Elika. i-li'kuh (Heb. עֲלִיקָא H508, derivation uncertain). A Harodite (see HAROD #2) included among the Thirty, DAVID's elite military force (2 Sam. 23:25; his name is omitted in the parallel list in 1 Chr. 11:27).

Elim. ee'lim (Heb. עֵלִים H396, "oaks" or "terebinths"). The second recorded stopping place of the Israelites on their journey from the RED SEA to SINAI (Exod. 15:27; 16:1). The EXODUS narrative recounts that they journeyed from the Red Sea to MARAH, and from there to Elim, where there were twelve springs of water and seventy palm trees (cf. Num. 33:9-10). The exact location of this oasis is not certain. If the traditional identification of Mount Sinai in the lower part of the peninsula is correct, Elim is likely to be one of the oases in the wadis along the main route into that area. The place now known as Wadi Gharandel (55 mi./88 km. SE of Suez) is frequently suggested. Another proposal is ‘Ayun Musa (9 mi./14 km. SE of Suez).

This oasis, Wadi Gharandel, may be the location of ancient Elim. (View to the N.)

Elimelech. i-lim´uh-lek (Heb. ʾeḷîmelek H497, “my God is king”). TNIV Elimelek. An Ephrathite from BETHLEHEM and the husband of NAOMI (Ruth 1:2-3; 2:1, 3; 4:3, 9). Because of a famine in their homeland, Elimelech took his family to sojourn in MOAB. After the death of Elimelech and his sons, Naomi returned to Judah with her daughter-in-law RUTH. A man named BOAZ, being of the same clan as Elimelech and having the right of kinship, purchased from Naomi the land formerly belonging to Elimelech. Boaz also married Ruth, and from this marriage came DAVID and eventually the MESSIAH (Matt. 1:5; see GENEALOGY OF JESUS CHRIST).

Elioenai. el´ee-oh-ee´ni (Heb. ʾelyô ʿênay H493, “to Yahweh my eyes [look]”; short form of ELIEHOENAI). (1) Son of Neariah and postexilic descendant of DAVID through SOLOMON (1 Chr. 3:23-24).

(2) A clan leader from the tribe of SIMEON during the days of King HEZEKIAH (1 Chr. 4:36). His family and other Simeonite clans “increased greatly,” and so they migrated to GEDOR “in search of pasture for their flocks.” Subsequently they destroyed the Hamites and other inhabitants of the land (vv. 41-43).

(3) Son of BEKER and grandson of BENJAMIN (1 Chr. 7:8).

(4) Descendant of Pashhur; he was among the priests who put away their foreign wives (Ezra 10:22). He may be the same as #6 below.

(5) One of the descendants of Zattu who agreed to put away their foreign wives (Ezra 10:27).

(6) A postexilic priest who, with his trumpet, participated in the dedication of the wall of Jerusalem (Neh. 12:41). He may be the same as #4 above.

Eliphal. i-li´fuhl (Heb. ʔeʕlîpal H503, “God has judged”). Son of Ur and one of the Thirty, DAVID’s military elite (1 Chr. 11:35). Some scholars believe that the text has suffered scribal corruption and that his original name was ELIPHELET, as in the parallel list (2 Sam. 23:34). See also AHASBAI.

Eliphalet. See ELIPHELET.

Eliphaz. el´i-faz (Heb. ʔeʕlîpaz H502, derivation disputed). (1) Firstborn of ESAU; his mother was ADAH the HITTITE, and his sons became chiefs in EDM (Gen. 36:4, 10-12, 15-16; 1 Chr. 1:35-36).

(2) An Edomite from TEMAN (or TEMA) and one of the friends who visited JOB to “sympathize with him and comfort him” (Job 2:11). Eli-phaz may have been the eldest and the leader of the three friends (cf. 42:7-9). He was the first to address Job and is marked out by the courtesy with which he spoke (chs. 4-5). Like his friends, he took for granted that Job must have committed some major sin, for only so could he explain his sufferings. But dominated, as he was, by a dream he had had of man’s sinfulness before God (4:12-21), he tried to make it as easy as possible for Job to repent. In his second address (ch. 15) one senses the note of irritation caused by Job’s rejection of his advice; the colors are darkened, and the applicability to Job heightened. The third address (ch. 22) is in many ways the bitterest of all: without evidence, Eliphaz accuses Job of all the worst sins according to the concepts of the time, but even then his kindness breaks through in a final offer of hope.

Elipheleh. See ELIPHELEHU.

Eliphelehu. i-lif´uh-lee´hyoo (Heb. ʔeʕlîpêhû H504, possibly “may God distinguish him”). KJV Elipheleh. A Levite and one of the gatekeepers assigned to be a musician when DAVID made preparation to transfer the ARK OF THE COVENANT to JERUSALEM (1 Chr. 15:18). He is called one of the brothers of the “second order” (NRSV; NIV, “next in rank”) who followed HEMAN, ASAPH, and ETHAN. Eliphelehu and some others “were to play the harps, directing according to sheminith” (v. 21; see MUSIC AND MUSICAL INSTRUMENTS, sect. VI).

Eliphelet. i-lif’uh-let (Heb. ʔe lîpelet H505, “my God is deliverance”; in 1 Chr. 14:5, ʔelpelet H550). (1) Son of DAVID, listed as the last of eleven (or thirteen) children born to him in Jerusalem (2 Sam. 5:16; 1 Chr. 14:7; KJV, “Eliphalet”). His mother’s name is not given, but the Chronicler includes him as the last of thirteen sons who were not born of a concubine (1 Chr. 3:8; see v. 9).

(2) Son of David, listed among the thirteen children born to him in Jerusalem not from a concubine (1 Chr. 3:6); he is elsewhere called “Elpelet” (14:5; KJV, “Elpalet”). Because his name (as well as Nogah) is not included in the parallel list in the MT (2 Sam. 5:16), some scholars doubt his existence. Others suggest scribal corruption in Samuel and speculate that this Eliphelet died at an early age and that a later child (see #1 above) was named after him.

(3) Son of AHASBAI, from MAACAH, and one of the Thirty, David’s military elite (2 Sam. 23:34). Some scholars believe that he is the same as ELIPHAL son of Ur (1 Chr. 11:35).

(4) Third son of Eshek and a descendant of SAUL through JONATHAN (1 Chr. 8:39).

(5) A son or descendant of Adonikam who, with Juel, Shemaiah, and sixty other kindred, returned from Babylon with EZRA (Ezra 8:13).

(6) One of the sons or descendants of Hashum who had married foreign women (Ezra 10:33).

Elisabeth. See ELIZABETH.

Eliseus. See ELISHA.

Elisha. i-li’shuh (Heb. ʔēliš H515, “God is salvation”; Gk. Elisaios G1811). KJV NT Eliseus. Son of Shaphat and the prophet who succeeded ELIJAH. At Horeb, God directed Elijah to anoint Elisha to be his successor (1 Ki. 19:16-21), who was to aid HAZAEL, king of SYRIA, and JEHU, king of ISRAEL, in taking vengeance on the enemies of God. Elijah left Horeb and on his way N found Elisha at ABEL MEHOLAH (19:16) plowing with the last of twelve yoke of oxen. The number of oxen indicates the wealth of the family. Elijah cast his mantle on Elisha, who understood the significance of the act as the choice of himself to succeed the older prophet. Elisha ran after Elijah, who had not tarried to explain his action, and begged for permission to kiss his parents farewell. Elijah replied, "Go back. What have I done to you?" Elisha thus went home and made his own decision to accept the prophetic call. Elisha next appears in connection with the end of Elijah's life on earth (2 Ki. 2). He persisted in following Elijah till the latter was carried up to heaven, and a double portion of Elijah's spirit was given him. Taking the mantle of Elijah, he used it to make a dry path over the Jordan, as his master had done, and tried to dissuade the sons of the prophets from a fruitless search for the body of Elijah.

Since Elisha thus comes into his ministry endowed with a double portion of Elijah's spirit, we are on the alert to see what his first words or deeds will be. The narrative selects two immediate acts of the prophet: the healing of the waters at JERICHO (2 Ki. 2:19-22) and the cursing of the rabble at BETHEL (2:23-25)—a curse removed and a curse invoked. Jericho had been put under a curse by JOSHUA (Josh. 6:26) at the time of its destruction. It was, in its ruin, to be a perpetual memorial to the Lord's wrath against false religion and corrupt society. In the reign of AHAB, and within the era of Elijah and Elisha, Jericho had been rebuilt. Bible history (1 Ki. 16:34) faithfully records the fulfillment of Joshua's prediction. The rebuilding of the cursed city is offered as plain evidence of the spiritually careless days of Ahab; the recording of the fulfillment of the curse is to assure us that though sinners may blithely assume power to disregard the word of God, the word remains in force. Those who had the temerity to live in the new city found this out to their cost. Every prospect was pleasing about Jericho, but nothing went right. The water was foul and the land (literally) "casts it young" (2 Ki. 2:19). Animals were miscarrying, perhaps women too, and the meaning of the phrase has even been extended to crops: nothing came to full fruitage and term. Elisha's response was not, "I could have warned you about that." He said nothing about their folly in disregarding divine wrath; rather he set about a work of grace. We see in Lev. 2:13 and Num. 18:19 that salt is linked with the covenant of God (see SALT, COVENANT OF). Elisha's requirement that the salt be brought to him in a new bowl (2 Ki. 2:20) was intended to safeguard the act as far as possible from the pollution of human use. The intention in pouring the salt into the spring was to bring the city and its life back within the covenant mercies of the Lord and (2:21-22) this is what in grace the Lord allowed to happen.

The case of Bethel was quite different. It was one of the centers of long-standing religious APOSTASY in the northern kingdom (1 Ki. 12:26-29), and the arrival there of the new prophet of the Lord was bound to be an event of special significance. What follows is related in 2 Ki. 2:23-25, which states that "some youths [KJV, little children] came out of the town and jeered at him," leading Elisha to call down a severe curse on them. Some see here an irascible old man teased by playful children, losing his temper, and uttering a curse that is implemented by divine action; seemingly, the old man's God is as irascible and unattractive as he is himself. If this is the truth of the matter, then we have no recourse but to agree with those commentators who find the episode pointless and who say that it reflects no credit on either Elisha or his God. But is this what really occurred? First, Elisha was not an old man; rather, he was the young man who until recently was second in command to Elijah. Second, the Hebrew does not necessarily indicate toddlers or infants. In a suitable context the expression in v. 23 could mean youngsters of an early age (see the same expression in 2 Ki. 5:14). But in 1 Sam. 20:35 we would more naturally think of a teen-age servant in the royal household. The noun is, by itself, indeterminate regarding age. It is used of JOSEPH aged seventeen (Gen. 37:2) and of the trained men in Abram's private army (14:24). The different word in 2 Ki. 2:24 leads to the same conclusions. It is used of REHOBAM and his contemporaries (1 Ki. 12:8, 10, 14) at a time when 1 Ki. 14:21 says Rehoboam was himself forty-one. In other words, the words derive their meaning from what suits the context, saving that the adjective "small" (2 Ki. 2:23 Heb.) means that they were less than adult. The word "kids" today is somewhat similar, covering a wide age-range short of adulthood.

View across the Harod Valley toward Mt. Moreh. To the far left is the village of Shunem (at the SW base of Mt. Moreh), where the Lord used Elisha to raise the widow's son.

The situation can be reconstructed, then, as follows. Since succeeding Elijah, Elisha has stayed near Jericho, but he must soon return to their old prophetic center at CARMEL. This road passes Bethel, and for the first time the new prophet and the old apostasy come face to face. The religious authorities at Bethel are determined not to let the chance pass; Elijah was too much for them, but they will strike at his successor before he consolidates his position. So they arrange a "reception committee" in the approved "rent-a-mob" fashion. Why they opened the proceedings with a taunt of baldness remains a mystery—though possibly, if Elisha was a Nazirite, they were mocking the uncut and abundant hair flowing out from under his head covering. At all events, they are bent on a mischief that goes beyond verbal abuse. If the victory is to remain with Elisha, it can only be so if the Lord will come to his aid. Elisha expresses his need of the Lord, not in a “will he, won’t he” wish for help but in a confident commanding of divine wrath. The Lord does not desert his beleaguered servant. We might well ask if we would want it to be otherwise.

Elisha had a long ministry during the reigns of Joram (JEHORAM), JEHU, JEHOAHAZ, and JEHOASH (Joash), kings of Israel. After the death of Ahab, the country of MOAB rebelled against his son Joram (2 Ki. 3). When Joram secured the king of EDOM and Jehoshaphat, king of Judah, as allies, JEHOASHAPHAT insisted on consulting Elisha. The latter referred Joram to the prophets of his parents, but out of regard to Jehoshaphat, counseled the kings to dig trenches to channel water from Edom to relieve their army, and predicted victory over the Moabites.

Elisha saved a poor widow from financial distress by miraculous multiplication of her oil supply (2 Ki. 4:1-7). He visited the home of a “well-to-do woman” and her husband in SHUNEM so often that she had a room built for him (4:8-37). Elisha sent his servant GEHAZI to ask the woman what she would like to have him do for her in return for her hospitality. She asked for a son, and a son was given her. When the lad was old enough to go to the fields with his father, he suffered a fatal sunstroke. His mother herself went for Elisha, who, after sending Gehazi, whose efforts were fruitless, came himself, and after great effort the child came back to life. Later, during a famine at GILGAL (4:38-41), Elisha saved a company of the prophets from death because of eating poisonous vegetables. When a present of food was given him, Elisha set it before a hundred men, and the Lord increased the supply to satisfy them (4:42-44).

Elisha healed the Aramean (KJV “Syrian”) captain NAAMAN of leprosy (2 Ki. 5); Gehazi proved himself an unworthy servant. Elisha rescued a young prophet’s borrowed axhead (6:1-7). He gave timely warning, repeatedly saving Israel from defeat by the Arameans (6:23). The Arameans came to DOTHAN, where Elisha was living with a servant, whom Elisha showed the armies of God protecting the city. The Arameans were stricken with blindness, and Elisha led them to SAMARIA and persuaded the king of Israel to feed them and release them. The Arameans invaded Israel no more for a time. When Aram finally besieged Samaria and the city was reduced to terrible straits, the king of Israel blamed Elisha (6:24-7:20). Elisha predicted relief the next day. Four lepers, considering their case hopeless, visited the Aramean camp and found it deserted. The spoils of the Arameans relieved the inhabitants of Samaria. Elisha advised the “well-to-do woman” of 4:8 to escape a coming famine by going to PHILISTIA (8:1-6).

When she returned and sought restoration of her property, Gehazi, who had just been telling the king the deeds of Elisha, was the means by which the woman secured restitution.

Elisha visited DAMASCUS and had an innocent part in HAZAEL's succeeding BEN-HADAD as king of Aram (2 Ki. 8:7-15). Elisha sent a young prophet to anoint Jehu king of Israel (9:1-3). Before Elisha died (13:14-21), Jehoash, king of Israel, came to visit him and received an object lesson by means of arrows, with regard to his war against the Arameans. A man being hastily buried in Elisha's sepulchre touched Elisha's bones and revived (13:20-21). Elisha's ministry was filled with miracles, many dealing with private needs, some related to affairs of state. Elisha's prophetic insight and wise counsel made him a valuable though not always appreciated adviser to kings. He finished the work of Elijah, destroying the system of BAAL worship, completed the tasks assigned to Elijah of anointing Hazael and Jehu, and saw the final ruin of the house of Ahab and Jezebel. The mention of the cleansing of Naaman the Syrian from leprosy in Lk. 4:27 perhaps indicates this as the crowning achievement of his career, giving Elisha an influence with the Syrian king that enabled him to help Israel. Elisha's story is told with vigor and vivid detail, making him live as few OT characters do. The incidents are not all told in chronological order, but they bear the marks of historical truth in the simplicity of their narration.

Elishah. i-li'shuh (Heb. עִלְשָׁה H511, meaning uncertain). Son or descendant of JAVAN and progenitor of a nation known by the same name (Gen. 10:4; 1 Chr. 1:7; Ezek. 27:7). Since Javan is the Hebrew word for the Greeks, Elishah is to be associated with them. Elishah and the other descendants of Javan are called "the maritime peoples" (lit., "the coasts [or islands] of the nations," Gen. 10:5), and TYRE is said to have imported blue and purple dyes "from the coasts of Elishah" (Ezek. 27:7). Its association with GREECE and KITTIM (CYPRUS) would seem to indicate a location in the area of the N Mediterranean. Some have identified Elishah with Carthage in N Africa, because of the similarity between Elishah and Elissa (a Tyrian princess said to have founded Carthage). Many identify Elishah with Alashiya, one of the islands (prob. Cyprus) affected by the invading SEA PEOPLES. Most probably Elishah in the Bible refers generally to the inhabitants of the islands of the Aegean Sea.

Elishama. i-lish'uh-muh (Heb. עִלְשָׁמָא H514, "my God has heard"). (1) Son of Ammihud of the tribe of EPHRAIM (Num. 1:10). He was selected to help MOSES as a representative from his tribe in the taking of the census. He is later described as "the leader of the people of Ephraim," with a division numbering 40,500 (2:18). In that capacity he brought his tribe's offering on the seventh day of the dedication of the altar (7:48-53). He was in command of the Ephraimite camp in the march through the wilderness (10:22). From 1 Chr. 7:26-27, one learns further that he was the father of Nun and grandfather of JOSHUA.

(2) Son of DAVID, listed among eleven (or thirteen) children born to him in Jerusalem (2 Sam. 5:16; 1 Chr. 14:7). His mother's name is not given, but the Chronicler includes him as one of the thirteen sons who were not born of a concubine (1 Chr. 3:8).

(3) Another son of David, listed among the thirteen children born to him in Jerusalem not from a concubine (1 Chr. 3:6 NRSV, following the MT); the NIV, on the basis of two Hebrew MSS and the parallels (2 Sam. 5:15; 1 Chr. 14:5), reads ELISHUA. See also ELIPHELET #2.

(4) Son of Jekamiah and descendant of JUDAH through PEREZ (1 Chr. 2:41). Jerome suggested that this Elishama is the same as #5 below.

(5) The grandfather of a certain ISHMAEL who killed GEDALIAH, the governor of Judah after the fall of Jerusalem (2 Ki. 25:25; Jer. 41:1).

(6) A royal secretary; he was one of the officials in the court of JEHOIAKIM who heard BARUCH read JEREMIAH's scroll and urged the king not to burn the inspired prophecy (Jer. 36:12). Later the scroll was put in his chamber, where it remained until it was taken to be read to the king (36:20-21).

(7) A priest sent by JEHOSHAPHAT to teach God's book of the law in Judah (2 Chr. 17:8).

Elishaphat. i-lish'uh-fat (Heb. ʔeʕlîšāpāt H516, "my God has judged"). Son of Zicri and one of five commanders of units of a hundred who helped JEHOIADA depose ATHALIAH and enthrone Joash (JEHOASH, 2 Chr. 23:1).

Elisheba. i-lish'uh-buh (Heb. ʔeʕlîšēba H510, "my God is [or makes] an oath" or "my God is abundance"). Daughter of Amminadab and wife of AARON (Exod. 6:23). Her brother NAHSHON was leader of the tribe of JUDAH (Num. 1:7; 2:3), so Elisheba was a Judahite. She bore four sons, one of whom, ELEAZAR, succeeded Aaron as high priest (Num. 20:25-28).

Elishua. el'uh-shoo'uh (Heb. ʔeʕlîšûa H512, "God is salvation" [cf. ELISHA]). Son of DAVID, listed among eleven children born to him in Jerusalem (2 Sam. 5:16); another passage lists him as one of thirteen children born in Jerusalem (1 Chr. 14:7). Apparently the same son is called ELISHAMA in the MT of 1 Chr.

3:6, but this is probably a transcriptional error (note that “Elishama” occurs again in v. 8); thus the NIV reads “Elishua” here too on the basis of two Hebrew MSS and the parallel passages.

Eliud. i-li´uhd (Gk. Elioud G1809). Son of Akim, included in Matthew’s GENEALOGY OF JESUS CHRIST (Matt. 1:14-15).

Elizabeth. i-liz´uh-buhth (Gk. Elisabet G1810, from Heb. ʔeḥlîṣeba H510; see ELISHEBA). KJV Elisabeth. The wife of the priest ZECHARIAH, herself of the lineage of AARON (Lk. 1:5-57). In fulfillment of God’s promise, in her old age she bore a son, JOHN THE BAPTIST. Her kinswoman (cousin), Mary of NAZARETH in GALILEE (see MARY, MOTHER OF JESUS), having learned that she was to be the virgin mother of Jesus, visited Elizabeth in the hill country of Judea. Elizabeth’s Spirit-filled greeting prompted Mary to reply in a song called Magnificat. After Mary returned home, Elizabeth’s son was born. She was a woman of unusual piety, faith, and spiritual gifts, whose witness to Mary must have been an incomparable encouragement. LUKE, who alone tells the story, appreciated the significant role of women in the history of redemption and emphasized the agency of the HOLY SPIRIT in the life of Elizabeth.

Elizaphan, Elzaphan. el´uh-zay´fan, el-zay´fan (Heb. ʔeḥlîṣṣāpān H507, short form ʔelsṣāpān H553 “[my] God has hidden [or treasured or protected]”). (1) Son of Uzziel and the leader of the Kohathites in the wilderness (Exod. 6:22 [Elzaphan]; Num. 3:30); the families descended from KOHATH “were responsible for the care of the ark” and the furniture of the TABERNACLE (v. 31). After NADAB and ABIHU offered unauthorized fire, Elizaphan and his brother MISHAEL were directed by MOSES to take their relatives away from the sanctuary (Lev. 10:4 [Elzaphan]). His descendants are mentioned during the reigns of DAVID (1 Chr. 15:8) and HEZEKIAH (2 Chr. 29:13).

(2) Son of Parnach and the leader from the tribe of ZEBULUN who assisted Moses in dividing the land into future inheritance portions for each tribe (Num. 34:25).

Elizur. i-li´zuhr (Heb. ʔeḥlîṣṢûr H506, “my God is a rock”). Son of Shedeur and the leader of the tribe of REUBEN who assisted MOSES in taking a census of the Israelite community (Num. 1:5). He commanded a division numbering 46,500 (2:10; 10:18), and he brought the offering of his tribe on the fourth day of the dedication of the altar (7:30-35).

Elkanah. el-kay'nuh (Heb. elqānā H555, “God has taken possession” or “God has created”). A common name, especially among Levites descended from KORAH. In particular, several ancestors of the prophet SAMUEL, including his father, bore the name Elkanah. Because of ambiguities (and possible scribal corruptions) in the genealogical lists, some of the identifications are uncertain.

(1) Son or descendant of Korah and head of a Levitical clan (Exod. 6:24; see v. 25). He may be the same as #2 below.

(2) Son of Assir and grandson of Korah; father (or ancestor) of Ebiasaph (1 Chr. 6:23). He is probably the same as #3 below.

(3) Father or ancestor of Amasai and Ahimoth (1 Chr. 6:25); he is also described as the son of Joel (v. 36).

(4) Son of AHIMOTH and grandson or descendant of #3 above (1 Chr. 6:26; Ahimoth must be the same as Mahath, v. 35).

(5) Son of Jeroham, descendant of #4 above, and father of Samuel (1 Chr. 6:27, 34). Elsewhere he is described as a “man from Ramathaim, a Zuphite from the hill country of Ephraim,” and thus “an Ephraimite,” not by descent but by virtue of the tribal territory where he lived (1 Sam. 1:1; the KJV has “Ramathaim-zophim”; see RAMAH #3). Elkanah had two wives: the favorite HANNAH, who was barren, and PENINNAH (1:2). Aside from those who had a royal claim, Elkanah is the only man in the Samuel-Kings narrative to have more than one wife—probably an indication of his wealth and social standing. He was also a godly man who made it a habit to visit the sanctuary in SHILOH every year (1:3). Hannah, brought to tears by Peninnah’s taunting, prayed to God for a son whom she would return to the Lord. God answered her petition and she bore Samuel, who after being weaned was given to ELI the priest (1:28). Later Hannah bore to Elkanah other sons and daughters (2:20-21). Elkanah’s great-grandson, HEMAN, became a leading musician in DAVID’s day (1 Chr. 6:33).

(6) One of the two Levites who were appointed doorkeepers for the ARK OF THE COVENANT when it was transferred by David to Jerusalem (1 Chr. 15:23).

(7) One of several Korahite warriors who joined David at ZIKLAG (1 Chr. 12:6; cf. vv. 1-2). Some argue that Korah here is the name of a locality in the tribe of BENJAMIN.

(8) A high official during the reign of AHAZ of Judah, described as second to the king in authority (2 Chr. 28:7). Because the people of Judah were unfaithful, the Lord allowed PEKAH king of Israel to inflict heavy casualties on the army of AHAZ. During the conflict Elkanah, along with a prince and another official, was killed by an Ephraimite warrior named Zicri.

(9) Grandfather or ancestor of Berekiah; the latter is listed among those Levites who first resettled in Jerusalem after the return of the Babylonian captivity (1 Chr. 9:16).

Elkosh. See ELKOSHITE.

Elkoshite. elʾkosh-it (Heb. ʔelqōšî H556). A term used to identify NAHUM the prophet (Nah. 1:1). It presumably refers to a town named Elkosh (cf. NRSV). Various identifications have been proposed (including CAPERNAUM, which means “village of Nahum”), but there is no credible evidence to support any of these suggestions.

Ellasar. elʾuh-sahr (Heb. ʔellāsār H536, derivation uncertain). A kingdom ruled by ARIOCH, one of the allies of KEDORLAOMER, king of ELAM, in his raid on the JORDAN Valley in the time of ABRAHAM (Gen. 14:1). Earlier scholars, who considered the identifications of these kings as reasonably firm, believed that Arioch was the same as Eri-aku, king of Larsa (an important city in S MESOPOTAMIA). Further studies weakened this confidence, and some scholars argue that Ellasar should be identified with ASSHUR.

elm. See PLANTS (under terebinth).

Elmadam. el-mayʾduhm (Gk. Elmadam G1825; most MSS, Elmōdam). KJV Elmodam. Son of Er, included in Luke’s GENEALOGY OF JESUS CHRIST (Lk. 3:28).

Elmodam. See ELMADAM.

Elnaam. el-nayʾuhm (Heb. ʔelnā am H534, “God is pleasantness”). The father of Jeribai and Joshaviah, two of the mighty men of DAVID’s army (1 Chr. 11:46); they are mentioned in a list of sixteen warriors (vv. 41b-47) beyond the military elite known as the Thirty (vv. 10-41 = 2 Sam. 23:8-39).

Elnathan. el-nayʾthuhn (Heb. ʔelnātān H535, “God has given”). (1) Father of Nehushta, who was the wife of King JEHOIAKIM and the mother of King JEHOIACHIN (2 Ki. 24:8). It is often thought that this Elnathan is the same as #2 below.

(2) Son of ACBOR and an official during the reign of Jehoiakim (this king was possibly Elnathan’s son-in-law; see #1 above). Elnathan and others were sent by the king to Egypt to bring back the prophet URIAH, who was then executed

(Jer. 26:22). Elnathan was also one of the officials to whom was read JEREMIAH's scroll and who urged the king not to burn it, but to no avail (36:11-26).

(3) Three men named Elnathan—two of them described as leaders and the other one as wise (NIV, “men of learning”)—are said to have been part of a group of eleven sent by EZRA to search for Levites (Ezra 8:16). Because it seems unlikely that three different persons in a relatively small group would bear a name that is otherwise not frequent, some scholars suspect textual corruption.

Elohim. el'oh-him (Heb. ʾēlōhîm H466, prob. pl. of ʾēlôah H468 and related to ʾēl H446; see EL). The most frequent Hebrew word for GOD, occurring over 2,200 times in the OT. Its etymology and historical origins are debated. Elohim is plural in form, but is usually singular in construction (used with a sg. verb or adjective). When applied to the one true God, the plural is evidently due to the Hebrew idiom of a plural of magnitude or majesty. When used of heathen gods (Gen. 35:2; Exod. 18:11; 20:3; Josh. 24:20) or of angels (Job 1:6; Ps. 8:5; 97:7) or judges (Exod. 21:6; 1 Sam. 2:25) as representatives of God, Elohim is plural in sense as well as form. Elohim is the earliest name of God in the OT, and persists along with other names to the latest period. Jesus is quoted as using a form of the name on the cross (Matt. 27:46; Mk. 15:34; see ELOI, ELOI, LAMA SABACHTHANI).

Eloi, Eloi, lama sabachthani. ee'loh-i ee'loh-i lah'muh suh-bahk'thuh-ni. A Semitic phrase meaning, “My God, my God, why have you forsaken me?” It comes from Ps. 22:1 and was quoted by Jesus on the cross; it occurs transliterated into Greek in Matt. 27:46 and Mk. 15:34. In Matthew, according to most MSS, the divine name (including the personal possessive suffix “my”) is transliterated as ēli, which corresponds with the Hebrew form in Ps. 22, whereas Mark (and a few important MSS of Matthew; cf. NIV) has elōi, which seems to reflect an Aramaic form. The interrogative pronoun “why” can be either Hebrew or Aramaic. The verb (plus suffix) sabachthani, however, can only be Aramaic. It is generally agreed that Jesus' mother tongue was ARAMAIC and that he naturally would have expressed himself with it at this time of suffering. The statement is of great theological significance for understanding the self-revelation of Jesus, who quoted from a messianic Psalm as his death was quickly approaching. The cry of the dying Messiah in the passion narratives highlights the mystery of Christ's two natures: the just covenant God was pouring judgment on his coeternal Son, the divine Suffering Servant. The sinless CHRIST was thus experiencing a separation from the Father that should have been the lot of sinners.

Elon (person). ee´lon (Heb. ʔêlôn H390, “terebinth”; gentilic ʔêlônî H533). (1) A HITTITE and father of BASEMATH, who married ESAU (Gen. 26:34). Elsewhere (36:2) Elon’s daughter is called ADAH. In the latter passage the name Basemath is given to the daughter of ISHMAEL so that apparently two of Esau’s wives were named Basemath. Perhaps the Hittite was given an alternate name to distinguish the two wives.

(2) Son of ZEBULUN; he was among those who came to Egypt with JACOB (Gen. 46:14). From him sprang the Elonite clan (Num. 26:26).

(3) A judge in Israel from the tribe of Zebulun; he ruled Israel ten years until his death and was buried in AIJALON (Jdg. 12:11-12).

Elon (place). ee´lon (Heb. ʔêlôn H391, “terebinth”). A city on the border of the inheritance of DAN between ITHLAH and TIMNAH (Josh. 19:43). It is probably the same as ELON BETHHANAN, which was part of Solomon’s second administrative district (1 Ki. 4:9). The town was on the coastal plain, E of JOPPA (cf. Jdg. 19:46). Its precise location is uncertain, though some have identified it with Khirbet Wadi ʿAlin (just E of BETH SHEMESH).

Elon Bethhanan. ee´luhn-beth-hay´nuhn (Heb. ʔêlôn bêṯ ḥānān H392, “terebinth of the house of grace”). A town in the territory of DAN that was part of SOLOMON’S second administrative district (1 Ki. 4:9). The SEPTUAGINT understands the passage as referring to two distinct places, and some modern scholars take the same approach. Others believe that Elon Bethhanan is an alternate name for ELON.

Elon-bezaananim. ee´luhn-bi-zay´uh-nan´im. See ZAANNANNIM.

Elon-meonenim. ee´luhn-mee-on´uh-nim (Heb. ʔêlôn meʿōnnîm [H471 + poel ptc. of ʔānan H6726]). A place mentioned once in the Bible (Jdg. 9:37 NRSV, NJPS; the NIV renders the words as common nouns, “soothsayers’ tree”). See DIVINERS’ OAK.

Eloth. See ELATH, ELOTH.

Elpaal. el-pay´uhl (Heb. ʔêl bêṯ-ʔêl H551, “God has made”). Son of SHAHARAIM and descendant of BENJAMIN (1 Chr. 8:11; five sons of Elpaal are listed in vv. 12-13).

Some scholars believe that the Elpaal included later in this genealogy (v. 18, which mentions another group of sons) is a different individual. Otherwise, one of the two passages (or both) may list descendants within a large Elpaal clan.

Elpalet. See ELIPHELET.

El Paran. el-pay´ruhn (Heb. ʔēl pā-rān H386, “terebinth of Paran”). A place described as the southernmost point of the campaign of KEDORLAOMER against the HORITES in the mountains of SEIR (i.e., EDOM); it is said to be on the edge of the wilderness (Gen. 14:6). The name PARAN refers to a wilderness area in the E central region of the SINAI peninsula whose eastern boundary was the Wadi ARABAH in the N and the Gulf of AQABAH in the S. Since the mountains of Seir (the modern Jebel esh-Sharah range) extend to the SW as far as the Gulf of Aqabah, “El of Paran” on the edge of the desert (of Paran), situated at the southern limit of the mountains of Seir, exactly describes the position of ELAT, the seaport on the northern tip of the gulf. It is very likely that El Paran was the ancient name of Elat.

Elpelet. See ELIPHELET.

El-roi. el-roi´. The NRSV transliteration of a Hebrew phrase that the NIV renders as “the God who sees me” (Gen. 16:13). It is the name that HAGAR gave to the Lord, whose protection she experienced when fleeing from Sarai (SARAH). For that reason, a spring where the angel appeared to her was named BEER LAHAI ROI (“the well of the Living One who sees me”).

El Shaddai. el-shad´i (Heb. ʔēl šadday H446 + H8724, derivation disputed). Also El Shadday. Transliteration of an epithet of GOD used in the patriarchal narratives and in many poetic passages of the OT. The term is usually translated “God Almighty” (Gen. 17:1; 28:3; 35:11; 43:14; 48:3; Exod. 6:3; Ezek. 10:5). In many other passages (Gen. 43:25; Num. 24:4, 16; Ruth 1:20-21; Ps. 68:14; 91:1; Joel 1:15 [cf. Isa. 13:6]; Ezek. 1:24; Job 5:17 [and thirty times more in Job]) the single element Shaddai is used and is translated “the Almighty.” This rendering, which goes back to the SEPTUAGINT (Gk. pantokratōr G4120), is somewhat dubious. Some critics believe it refers to a tribal deity, a high god worshiped by the PATRIARCHS, who allegedly were not true monotheists. They usually point to Deut. 32:17 or Josh. 24:2, which record the fact that the Israelite ancestors served other gods “beyond the River [Euphrates].” The Genesis account, however, emphatically states that ABRAHAM turned from this false religion to worship the true and only God. See also EL.

Elteke. See ELTEKEH.

Eltekeh. el'tuh-kuh (Heb. ʔelteṣqē H558 and ʔelteṣqēh H559, derivation disputed). A town in the territory of DAN (Josh. 19:44). It was assigned to the Kohathite Levites (21:23; NRSV, “Elteke”). The Assyrian king SENNACHERIB destroyed the town in 701 B.C., and it was in its environs that the decisive battle between the Assyrians and Egyptians was fought. The precise location of Eltekeh is uncertain.

Eltekon. el'tuh-kon (Heb. ʔelteṣqôn H560, derivation uncertain). A town given in the hill country of the tribe of JUDAH (Josh. 15:59). The precise location has not been determined, but one possibility is Khirbet ed-Deir, c. 4 mi. (6 km.) W of BETHLEHEM.

Eltolad, Tolad. el-toh'lad, toh'lad (Heb. ʔeltôlad H557, tôlād H9351, possibly “[place of] request for a child”). A town in the NEGEV, part of the southernmost territory of the tribe of JUDAH (Josh. 15:30; cf. v. 21). Eltolad was later assigned to the tribe of SIMEON (19:4); the alternate name Tolad (1 Chr. 4:29) appears to be a shortened form. The precise location of the town is unknown, but presumably it was near BEERSHEBA, where an ostrakon bearing the name Tolad has been found.

Elul. ee'luhl (Heb. ʔelûl H469, prob. derived from the Babylonian Elūlu [Ulūlu], the month of purification). The sixth month (August-September) in the Jewish CALENDAR (Neh. 6:15).

Eluzai. i-loo'zi (Heb. ʔelûzay H539, “God is my strength”). One of the ambidextrous Benjamite warriors who joined DAVID while he was in exile from SAUL at the PHILISTINE city of ZIKLAG (1 Chr. 12:5; cf. v. 2).

Elymas. el'uh-muhs (Gk. Elymas G1829, derivation disputed). Also named BAR-JESUS (“son of Joshua”); a Jewish magician and false prophet whom PAUL met on his first missionary journey (Acts 13:6-12). Elymas was in the retinue of Sergius PAULUS, the Roman proconsul of CYPRUS. He became blind following Paul's curse, causing the proconsul to believe in the Lord. The name or title Elymas has caused debate. Many believe it is to be derived from a Semitic root (cf. Arab. ʿalim) signifying "wise" or "one who has insight [into the future]" and thus roughly equivalent to Greek magos G3407 ("magician"; see MAGI). The likelihood is that Bar-Jesus gave himself the name or the title Elymas because he claimed the powers of the Median priests.

Elyon. See EL ELYON.

Elzabad. el-zayʿbad (Heb. ʾelzābād H479, "God has granted"). (1) The ninth of eleven Gadite army officers who joined DAVID while he was at ZIKLAG in exile from SAUL (1 Chr. 12:12). These men are described as "brave warriors, ready for battle and able to handle the shield and spear. Their faces were the faces of lions, and they were as swift as gazelles in the mountains" (v. 8).

(2) Son of Shemaiah, grandson of OBED-EDOM, and a gatekeeper from the Korahites (1 Chr. 26:7; cf. v. 1). See KORAH. Elzabad and his brothers are described as "leaders in their father's family because they were very capable men" (v. 6).

Elzaphan. See ELIZAPHAN.

embalm. To prepare a dead body with oil and spices to preserve it from decay. Embalming was of Egyptian origin. The only clear instances of it in the Bible were in the cases of JACOB and JOSEPH, who died in EGYPT (Gen. 50:2-3, 26). The purpose of the Egyptians in embalming was to preserve the body for the use of the soul in a future life. The purpose of the Hebrews was to preserve the bodies of Jacob and Joseph for a long journey to their resting place with ABRAHAM (50:13). In the case of Joseph, centuries elapsed before burial in the ancestral tomb (Exod. 13:19; Josh. 24:32). The process of embalming is not described in the Bible. Body cavities were filled with asphalt, cedar oil, or spices, or all three. The body was wrapped tightly in linen cloths, the more perishable parts being stuffed with rolls of linen to maintain the shape of the human form. The body of ASA is said to have been buried with spices, but is not said to have been embalmed (2 Chr. 16:14).

embroidery. Decoration on cloth by means of ornamental needlework. Embroidered work, chiefly using geometric patterns and stylized motifs, is well attested in sculptured and painted scenes from the ancient world. The relevant Hebrew terms are rāqam H8387 (ptc. “embroiderer, weaver of colored fabrics,” Exod. 26:36 et al.) and riqmâ H8391 (“embroidery, many-colored fabric,” Ps. 45:14; Ezek. 16:10; et al.). The latter term can also be used of the varied sheen of the eagle’s feathers (Ezek. 17:3) and of multicolored stones (1 Chr. 29:2). Embroidery is well attested in the background cultures of the OT, and may be expected to appear in Hebrew crafts also. The expressions denoting the raw materials used by the embroiderer (“blue, purple and scarlet yarn and finely twined linen,” Exod. 26:36) apparently refer to thread and yarn suitable for embroidery, since they can be used of products of spinning (35:25). It should be noted, however, that some of these terms occur in contexts where they could be taken as denoting woven cloth as well as spun thread (e.g., 39:22).

Emek Keziz. ee´mik-kee´ziz (Heb. ēmeq qeššîs H6681, “valley of Keziz” or “plain of gravel”). A town on the E boundary of the tribe of BENJAMIN (Josh. 18:21; KJV, “the valley of Keziz”). The site is unidentified, but it was presumably to the SE of the tribal territory, near JERICO.

emerald. See MINERALS.

emerod. See DISEASES (sect. II.A).

Emim. See EMITES.

Emites. ee´mits (Heb. ʔêmîm H400, “terrors, frightening ones”). Also Emim (KJV superfluous English pl., “Emims”). Early inhabitants of an area E of the DEAD SEA who were defeated in the time of ABRAHAM by KEDORLAOMER and his allies (Gen. 14:5). Their descriptive name was given to them by the Moabites, who subsequently occupied that territory. See MOAB. The Emites are described as “a people strong and numerous”; apparently they had some connection with the ANAKITES and REPHAITES, who were regarded as GIANTS (Deut. 2:10-11).

Emmanuel. See IMMANUEL.

Emmaus. i-may´uhs (Gk. Emmaous G1843). The village to which two disciples were going on the day of Jesus’ resurrection, when he was recognized by them as he broke bread at supper (Lk. 24:7-35). It was about 7 mi. (11 km.) from JERUSALEM, in what direction is not stated, though possibly to the NW. At least half a dozen sites have been proposed as the location of Emmaus, but none can be confirmed.

Emmor. See HAMOR.

emperor worship. The worship of the Roman emperor as a divine being—the cause and occasion of the tragic rift between the empire and the church—began spontaneously in the eastern provinces, was recognized by AUGUSTUS and TIBERIUS, and was progressively promoted by their successors as a political measure. Such a cult had manifest usefulness as a cementing and unifying force in the first century, as the principate struggled to stabilize the frontiers and establish cohesion in the Mediterranean world. From earliest times, the rulers of EGYPT had been regarded as incarnations of deity and accorded divine honors and worship. When the Ptolemies, on the breakup of ALEXANDER THE GREAT’s vast empire, took control of Egypt, they were regarded as the successors of the PHARAOHS, and similarly were honored by the Egyptian people. The Caesars were no more than the successors of the Ptolemies (see CAESAR; PTOLEMY). Nor was it difficult for similar concepts of a divine ruler to find place in SYRIA and ASIA MINOR.

An extant letter of Pliny the Younger, governor of BITHYNIA at the end of the first decade of the second century, showed the cult in its political operation. Pliny found his province in the grip of Christianity. Doubtless pressed hard by the temple wardens of the cult whose shrines were empty, and the guild of butchers whose sacrificial meat was finding no purchasers, Pliny proceeded to suppression. He wrote to the current emperor, Trajan: “Those who denied they were, or had ever been, Christians, who repeated after me an invocation to the gods, and offered adoration, with wine and frankincense, to your image, which I had ordered to be brought for that purpose, together with those of the gods, and who finally cursed Christ—none of which acts, it is said, those who are really Christians can be forced into performing—these I thought it proper to discharge. Others who were named by that informer at first confessed themselves Christians, and then denied it; true, they had been of that persuasion but they had quitted it, some three years, others many years, and a few as much as twenty-five years ago. They all worshipped your statute and the images of the gods, and cursed Christ” (Ep. 10.96-97). The cult in no way fulfilled a religious need. It was never more than a tribute of flattery, a demonstration of gratitude, a symbol of patriotism or subjection, and as such a vastly important political force.

En. en (Heb. ên, construct form of ayin H6524, “eye” or “spring”). A word compounded with various other terms to form place names, such as EN GEDI, EN ROGEL, etc. Note similarly the use of Arabic Ain to form numerous compounds.

Enaim. i-nay'im (Heb. ênayim H6542, possibly “[two] eyes” or “double spring”). A town “on the road to Timnah”; at its entrance TAMAR, disguising herself as a prostitute, seduced her father-in-law JUDAH because he had not given her as a wife to his son SHELAH (Gen. 38:14, 21). Enaim is widely regarded to be the same place as ENAM. Some interpret the Hebrew differently (e.g., KJV, “in an open place”; NEB, “where the road forks in two directions”). See also TIMNAH.

Enam. ee'nuhm (Heb. ênām H6543, “[place of] the spring”). A town in the SHEPHELAH within the tribal territory of JUDAH (Josh. 15:34); probably the same place as ENAIM. The location is uncertain, though various sites have been suggested, including Khirbet Beith Ikka, some 5 mi. (8 km.) SE of BETH SHEMESH.

Enan. ee'nuhn (Heb. ênān H6544, possibly “spring”). Father of AHIRA; the latter was a leader in the tribe of NAPHTALI (Num. 1:15; 2:29; 7:78, 83; 10:27).

encampment. See CAMP, ENCAMPMENT.

enchanter, enchantment. See MAGIC.

Endor. en'dor (Heb. ên-dôr H6529, perhaps “spring of habitation” or “source of generation”). Also En-dor. A town in the tribal territory of ISSACHAR allotted to MANASSEH (Josh. 17:11). Apparently, the Manassites did not drive out all the Canaanites from Endor at the time of the conquest (17:12). According to Ps. 83:9-10, the town was near the river KISHON and thus a part of the battlefield of the JEZREEL Valley; it was the scene of the defeat of JABIN and SISERA by BARAK. Endor is perhaps most famous because here King SAUL sought the help of a medium (see FAMILIAR SPIRIT) in the uncertain hours before his final battle (1 Sam. 28:7). The precise location of Endor is disputed. It was earlier identified with the historical Endur/Indur, 4 mi. (6 km.) S of Mount TABOR, but many scholars now favor Khirbet ŞafŞafeh, about 2 mi. (3 km.) farther N.

En Eglaim. en-eg'lay-im (Heb. ên eglayim H6536, “spring of [two] heifers”). This place is mentioned only in the APOCALYPTIC vision of Ezek. 47:1-12, where the prophet describes a future river flowing from the temple to the E and emptying into the (Dead) Sea so that “the water there becomes fresh” (v. 8), making it possible for large numbers of fish to live in it. Then he adds, “Fishermen will stand along the shore; from En Gedi to En Eglaim there will be places for spreading nets” (v. 10). EN GEDI lies on the W shore of the DEAD SEA, close to the half-way point, so many scholars have sought to locate En Eglaim to its N (e.g., at Ain Feshka, near Qumran). Others believe that En Eglaim is viewed in this passage as opposite En Gedi, that is, on the E shore.

enemy. One who feels or behaves in a hostile manner. Enmity among human beings, resulting in murder, is one of the first recorded results of the FALL (Gen. 4:5-8), but will someday be removed (Mic. 4:3-4). Enmity is opposed to LOVE, a basic ethical principle even in the law (Lev. 19:18). The enmity of nature toward humanity is also a result of the fall (Gen. 3:17-18). The future will include reconciliation of the parts of nature with one another, as, for example, in the case of reconciling the enmity between the animals (Isa. 65:25). Those who oppose God's purposes (even among his chosen people, Lam. 2:4; Isa. 1:24-25) can become enemies of God. The Scriptures hint that their hatred of God is self-destructive (Isa. 26:11c, lit., “the fire of your enemies will consume them”). God's vengeance on his enemies is coming (Jer. 46:10), and they must be destroyed when God reigns (Ps. 97:1, 3). The NT specifically and unequivocally commands love both for the stranger (Lk. 10:29-37) and for the hostile enemy (Matt. 5:38-44). The message of Christ, however, may produce enmity (Matt. 10:34-36). Theologically, enmity with God has been universalized and used to describe fallen mankind (Rom. 5:10). RECONCILIATION, then, views salvation as making enemies of God into friends of God (cf. 2 Cor. 5:18-20). See also WRATH.

En Gannim. en-gan'im (Heb. ên gannîm H6528, “spring of gardens”). (1) One of the towns in the second district of the tribe of JUDAH (Josh. 15:34). Beyond the fact that it was in the SHEPHELAH (lowland) and probably not far from ZANOAH and JARMUTH, there is no indication of its site.

(2) A town in the tribal territory of ISSACHAR; it was one of the Levitical cities given to the Gershonites (Josh. 19:21; 21:29). The parallel passage has ANEM, which is probably the same place (1 Chr. 6:73). The location of En Gannim is uncertain; among various proposals, a likely site is Khirbet ed-Dir, some 5 mi. (8 km.) SW of the Sea of Galilee.

En Gedi. en-ged'î (Heb. ên gedî H6527, “spring of young goat”; cf. Arab. Ain Jidi). A spring and associated streams that issue from beneath the limestone cliffs on the W side of the DEAD SEA at a temperature of 80°F. It lies almost due E of HEBRON and apparently was also known as HAZAZON TAMAR (2 Chr. 20:2). En Gedi belonged to the territory of the tribe of JUDAH (Josh. 15:62). The “Desert of En Gedi” (1 Sam. 24:1; cf. 23:29), figuring in the story of DAVID, is one of the bleakest parts of the Wilderness of Judah (JESHIMON). When the nations of AMMON, MOAB, and EDOM tried to invade Judah through En Gedi in the time of JEHOSHAPHAT (2 Chr. 20:1-2), it was presumably because they hoped to achieve a tactical surprise by attacking one of the few weak spots on Judah’s eastern flank. Once warning had been given, failure was inevitable. En Gedi is mentioned again in the prophet’s vision of the transformed Dead Sea (Ezek. 47:10; see EN EGLAIM).

engine. This English term is used by the KJV twice in the OT. According to one of these passages (2 Chr. 26:15), King UZZIAH made engines (NIV, “machines”) “for use on the towers and on the corner defenses to shoot arrows and hurl large stones.” The reference is probably to a wooden shielding device pictured in Assyrian reliefs; part of the fortification of the walls, it protected those who were shooting arrows and throwing stones. The second passage (Ezek. 26:9) uses a Hebrew technical term for some kind of siege device; modern versions translate, “battering rams.”

engraver. See OCCUPATIONS AND PROFESSIONS.

En Haddah. en-had´uh (Heb. ʿên ḥaddâ H6532, possibly “spring of gladness”). A town in the tribal territory of ISSACHAR (Josh. 19:21). It is usually identified with the modern village of el-Hadatheh, about 6 mi. (10 km.) WSW of the S tip of the Sea of Galilee, or the nearby Tell el-Karm.

En Hakkore. en-hak´uh-ree (Heb. ʿên haqqôrê H6530, “spring of the one who calls” or “spring of the partridge”). The spring where SAMSON drank after slaughtering the PHILISTINES at LEHI; upon drinking from it, “his strength returned and he revived” (Jdg. 15:19). Attempts to locate this site, presumably in JUDAH, have been unsuccessful.

En Hazor. en-hay´zor (Heb. ʿên ḥāsôr H6533, “spring of Hazor [enclosure]”). A fortified city included in the assignment to the tribe of NAPHTALI (Josh. 19:37). The precise location of this town (not to be confused with the royal city of HAZOR) is unknown, although one possible site is the modern town of ʿAinitha in S Lebanon.

enlighten. True enlightenment is the intellectual and moral effect produced upon a person by the reception of the Christian REVELATION. It is not a mere intellectual illumination or understanding of divine truth, for this spiritual insight manifests itself in ethical action. Christians are “sons of light and sons of the day,” as PAUL puts it (1 Thess. 5:5). The apostle prayed that the hearts of his readers “may be enlightened in order that you may know the hope to which he has called you” (Eph. 1:18; contrast SATAN’s work of blinding the mind, 2 Cor. 4:4). JOHN THE BAPTIST proclaimed that the MESSIAH is the “true light that gives light to every man” (Jn. 1:9), and Jesus himself more than once claimed to be the LIGHT of the world (8:12; 9:5). In one of the most difficult passages in the NT, the author of Hebrews says, “It is impossible for those who have once been enlightened, . . . if they fall away, to be brought back to repentance” (Heb. 6:4-6; cf. 10:26, 32). Ancient writers understood the language of enlightenment here as a reference to BAPTISM; modern expositors debate whether or not this statement describes REGENERATION (see also PERSEVERANCE).

En Mishpat. en-mish´pat (Heb. ʿên mišpāt H6535, “spring of judgment”). A place to which KEDORLAOMER and his allies went in the course of their military campaign; it is identified as KADESH (Gen. 14:7).

enmity. See ENEMY.

Enoch (person). ee´nuhk (Heb. ḥănôk H2840, possibly “dedicated” or “initiated” [see H_{ANNOCH}]; Gk. Enōch G1970). (1) Son of CAIN and father of Irad; Cain named a city after him (Gen. 4:17-18).

(2) Son of Jared, descendant of SETH, and father of METHUSELAH (Gen. 5:18-24; 1 Chr. 1:3 [KJV, “Henoch”]). It is said of him that he “walked with God; then he was no more, because God took him away” (Gen. 5:24), clearly a reference to his being taken to heaven without dying (cf. ELIJAH’s experience, 2 Ki. 2:11). His name is included in Luke’s GENEALOGY OF JESUS CHRIST (Lk. 3:37). A hero of faith, he is known as a man who pleased God (Heb. 11:5), while Jude 14-15 refers to a tradition that Enoch prophesied against ungodly men (cf. ENOCH, BOOKS OF).

Enoch (place). ee´nuhk (Heb. ḥănôk H2840, possibly “trained” or “initiated” or “follower”; Gk. Enōch G1970). A city that CAIN built and named after his son ENOCH (Gen. 4:17).

Enoch, Books of. A collection of APOCALYPTIC LITERATURE written by various authors and circulated under the name of ENOCH. Especially important is 1 Enoch, regarded as a major source for the development of Jewish doctrine in the last two pre-Christian centuries. See PSEUDEPIGRAPHA.

Enos. See ENOSH.

Enosh. ee´nosh (Heb. ʾeṇôš H633, “man”; Gk. Enōs G1968). KJV Enos (except 1 Chr. 1:1). Son of SETH and grandson of ADAM; it is noted that at his birth “men began to call on the name of the LORD” (Gen. 4:26). At the age of 90 years, Enosh became the father of Kenan; he had other sons and daughters and died at 905 years (5:6-11). Because his name means “man,” he may represent a new Adam, that is, a humanity revived by the birth of Seth and preserved after the FLOOD. Enosh is included in the Chronicler’s genealogy (1 Chr. 1:1) and in Luke’s GENEALOGY OF JESUS CHRIST (Lk. 3:38).

En Rimmon. en-rim´uhn (Heb. ʿēn rimmôn H6538, “spring of Rimmon [pomegranate]”). A village resettled by the people of JUDAH after the EXILE (Neh. 11:29). Its identification is uncertain, but many scholars believe it is the same as RIMMON (PLACE), a city in the NEGEV (Josh. 15:32; 19:7; 1 Chr. 4:32; in these three passages, the two names “Ain” and “Rimmon” perhaps should be read as one, “En Rimmon”). It may have marked the extreme S of Judah in postexilic times (if Zech. 14:10 refers to the same town).

En Rogel. en-roh´guhl (Heb. ʿên rōgēl H6537, prob. “spring of the fuller”). A spring S of JERUSALEM, just below the junction of the HINNOM and KIDRON Valleys, on the boundary between the tribes of BENJAMIN and JUDAH (Josh. 15:7; 18:16). It was here that JONATHAN and AHIMAAZ, two of DAVID’s spies, stayed during ABSALOM’s rebellion (2 Sam. 17:17). The spring was mentioned again as the coronation site during the attempted usurpation of the kingdom by ADONIJAH, who sacrificed animals at a site near En Rogel known as the Stone of ZOHELETH (1 Ki. 1:9). Today En Rogel is usually connected with Bir Ayyub (“Well of Job”). The other source of water in E Jerusalem, ʿAin Sitti Maryam (“Spring of the Lady Mary”) or the Virgin’s Fountain, has also been a suggested identification but is a less likely candidate (the latter is now thought to be the GIHON Spring of 1 Ki. 1:33 et al.).

enrollment. See CENSUS; QUIRINIUS.

En Shemesh. en-shem´ish (Heb. ʿên šemeš H6539, “spring of Shemesh [sun]”). A spring on the boundary between the tribes of BENJAMIN and JUDAH (Josh. 15:7; 18:17). It is usually identified with modern ʿAin Ḥod, about 2 mi. (3 km.) E of JERUSALEM on the way to JERICO in the JORDAN Valley. It is sometimes referred to as the “Spring of the Apostles.”

ensign. See BANNER.

En Tappuah. en-tap´yoo-uh (Heb. ʿên tappûʾaḥ H6540, “spring of Tappuah [apple tree]”). A settlement on the boundary between the tribes of EPHRAIM and MANASSEH, near the town of TAPPUAH (Josh. 17:7; cf. v. 8).

envy. A feeling of displeasure and ill will because of another’s advantages or possessions. The English word usually renders Hebrew qin ʾâ H7863, “passion,” which is often used in the good sense of “zeal,” less frequently in the negative sense of “envy” (e.g., Job 5:2). Both the Psalms and Proverbs warn against the temptation of becoming envious of evil persons when they seem to prosper in spite of their wrongdoing (Ps. 37:1; 73:2, 3; Prov. 3:31; 23:17; 24:1, 19). The OT abounds in examples of the evil effects of envy—among them JACOB and ESAU, RACHEL and LEAH (Gen. 30:1), JOSEPH and his brothers, HAMAN and MORDECAI. In the NT “envy” is most often the translation of Greek phthonos G5784, which uniformly has a negative meaning, “ill-will, envy.” For example, envy is said to have led to the crucifixion of Jesus (Matt. 27:18), and it is listed by Jesus and by Paul with the worst of sins (Mk. 7:22; Rom. 1:29; Gal. 5:21). Christians are warned against it (Gal. 5:26; 1 Pet. 2:1). See also COVETOUSNESS.

Epaenetus. See EOPENETUS.

Epaphras. ep’uh-fras (Gk. Epaphras G2071, prob. a contracted form of Epaphroditos G2073, “charming”). A native of COLOSSE and founder of the Colossian church, who was with PAUL when he wrote COLOSSIANS (Col. 1:7-8; 4:12-13; Phlm. 23; not to be confused with EPAPHRODITUS, a member of the Philippian church, Phil. 2:25; 4:18). Epaphras may have been Paul’s convert. As Paul’s representative he had evangelized Colosse (Col. 1:7) and the neighboring towns of LAODICEA and HIERAPOLIS (4:13) during Paul’s Ephesian ministry (Acts 19:10). His visit to Paul in ROME and his report concerning conditions in the churches of the Lycus Valley caused Paul to write Colossians (Col. 1:7-9). Paul’s high esteem for Epaphras is seen in the terms he applies to him: “our dear fellow servant,” “a faithful minister of Christ on our behalf” (Col. 1:7), “a servant of Christ Jesus” (4:12), and “my fellow prisoner” (Phlm. 23).

Epaphroditus. i-paf’ruh-di’tuhs (Gk. Epaphroditos G2073, “handsome, charming”). A member of the church at PHILIPPI who brought an offering to PAUL when the apostle was imprisoned in ROME (Phil. 2:25-30; 4:18). His Greek name (corresponding to the Lat. Venustus, “belonging to Venus,” called Aphrodite by the Greeks) was common and indicates a non-Jewish origin. It was also common in a contracted form, EPAPHRAS, but there is no reason to identify Epaphroditus with the Epaphras from Colosse (Col. 1:7; 4:12). Epaphroditus was an esteemed member of the Philippian church, commissioned to deliver the church’s offering to Paul (Phil. 4:18) and to stay and help him (2:25, 30). He became dangerously ill “for the work of Christ.” After his slow recovery, Paul felt it best to send him back home. Epaphroditus was distressed because of anxiety for him at Philippi and longed to return. Paul sent him back with the letter to the PHILIPPIANS and asked them to receive Epaphroditus “in the Lord with great joy.” Some believe that the Philippians expected Epaphroditus to stay with Paul so that TIMOTHY could go to Philippi, and that the apostle was thus concerned about how the church might receive Epaphroditus; thus Paul expresses his own high esteem of him.

Epenetus. i-pee´nuh-tuhs (Gk. Epainetos G2045, “praised”). Also Epaenetus. A Christian in ROME affectionately greeted by PAUL as “my dear friend” and “the first convert [lit., the firstfruits] to Christ in the province of Asia” (Rom. 16:5; KJV, “Achaia,” reflecting an inferior variant reading). Such senior Christians naturally assumed positions of leadership in the church. That Epenetus was an accepted leader is implied in Paul’s mention of him immediately after PRISCILLA AND AQUILA.

ephah (measure). See WEIGHTS AND MEASURES.

Ephah (person). ee´fuh (Heb. êpāh H6549, “darkness”). (1) Son of MIDIAN and grandson of ABRAHAM and KETURAH (Gen. 25:4; 1 Chr. 1:33). Ephah was thus the eponym of a prominent Midianite tribe, apparently inhabiting NW ARABIA and famous for its camels (Isa. 60:6 [êpāh H6548]).

(2) A concubine of CALEB who bore him three sons; she is mentioned in the genealogy of JUDAH (1 Chr. 2:46).

(3) Son of JAHDAI included in the genealogy of Judah (1 Chr. 2:47). The mention of Jahdai and his sons is abrupt, but apparently there was some connection between them and Caleb (cf. vv. 46, 48, and see #2 above).

Ephai. ee´fi (Heb. êpay H6550, “my darkness” or “my bird”). An inhabitant of NETOPHAH (a city or group of villages near BETHLEHEM) whose sons were army officers under the authority of GEDALIAH, governor of JUDAH after the destruction of JERUSALEM by the Babylonians (Jer. 40:8; the parallel passage, 2 Ki. 25:23, reads differently; see TANHUMETH).

Epher. ee´fuhr (Heb. êper H6761, “[kid of] gazelle”). (1) Son of MIDIAN and grandson of ABRAHAM and KETURAH (Gen. 25:4; 1 Chr. 1:33). Epher was thus the eponym of a Midianite tribe in NW ARABIA (cf. Gen. 25:6). There may have been more than one clan of Midian, or the name may be used broadly of different peoples.

(2) Son of EZRAH and descendant of JUDAH (1 Chr. 4:17).

(3) One of the heads of families in the half-tribe of MANASSEH during the time of TIGLATH-PILESER III (1 Chr. 5:24; cf. v. 26). These leaders are described as “brave warriors, famous men,” but also “unfaithful to the God of their fathers” (v. 25).

Ephes Dammim, Pas Dammim. ee´fiz-dam´im, pas-dam´im (Heb. ēpes dammîm H702, “border of Dammim [blood]”; pas dammîm H7169, perhaps a short form). A site in the territory of JUDAH between SOCOH and AZEKAH where the PHILISTINES encamped and near which DAVID defeated GOLIATH (1 Sam. 17:1; 1 Chr. 11:13; cf. 2 Sam. 23:9 NIV). Some have conjectured that the deep red color of the soil gave rise to the concept of blood, but it is more probable that the site was so named because of the number of battles fought there between Israel and the Philistines. The site was near the Valley of Elah (see ELAH, VALLEY OF), but the precise location is uncertain.

Ephesians, Letter to the. Generally acknowledged to be one of the richest and most profound of the NT letters. The depth and grandeur of its concepts, the richness and fullness of its message, and the majesty and dignity of its contents have made this letter precious to believers in all ages and in all places. Its profound truths and vivid imagery have deeply penetrated into the thought and literature of the Christian church.

Ephesians explicitly claims authorship by PAUL (Eph. 1:1; 3:1), and its entire tenor is eminently Pauline. The early Christian church uniformly received and treasured it as from Paul. Only within the modern era have critics raised doubts as to its origin. The attacks are based solely on internal arguments drawn from the style, vocabulary, and theology of the letter. These arguments are subjective and inconclusive and offer no compelling reasons for rejecting the undeviating evidence of text and tradition. If Paul’s authorship is rejected, the letter must be ascribed to someone who was fully Paul’s equal, but the literature of the first two centuries reveals no traces of anyone capable of producing such a writing.

Ephesians was written while Paul was a prisoner (Eph. 3:1; 4:1; 6:20). The prevailing view has been that it was written from ROME during his first Roman imprisonment (Acts 28:30-31). Some attempts have been made to shift the place of composition to CAESAREA (24:27) or even to EPHESUS during an unrecorded imprisonment there (19:10; 20:18-21, 31; 2 Cor. 11:23), but the traditional Roman origin firmly holds the field.

Overview of EPHESIANS

Author: The apostle PAUL, though many scholars argue that the letter consists of Pauline material brought together and edited by one or more of his disciples.

Historical setting: Probably written from ROME during the apostle's first imprisonment in that city (c. A.D. 61-63; those who believe that someone other than Paul was the author date the letter two or three decades later). Ephesians may have been addressed to several churches in and around EPHESUS in the aftermath of the problems that occasioned the writing of COLOSSIANS.

Purpose: To expound on the blessings enjoyed by the CHURCH, to stress the unity of the BODY OF CHRIST, and to encourage believers to walk in the ways of CHRIST.

Contents: A doctrinal section that focuses on our standing in Christ (Eph. 1-3), followed by a practical section on righteous Christian living (chs. 4-6).

Along with COLOSSIANS and PHILEMON (Col. 4:7-8; Phlm. 9, 13, 17), the letter was transmitted to its destination by TYCHICUS (Eph. 6:21-22). Thus all three were sent to the Roman province of ASIA, but there is much scholarly disagreement as to the precise destination of Ephesians. The uncertainty arises from the fact that the words "in Ephesus" in Eph. 1:1 are not found in the three most ancient Greek MSS (P⁴⁶, Vaticanus, Sinaiticus). Passages in the writings of Origen and Basil indicate that they also knew the enigmatic reading produced by the omission of "in Ephesus." But the words are found in almost all other witnesses, and ecclesiastical tradition uniformly designates it as "to the Ephesians."

How does one explain the omission of the phrase in some MSS? One widely accepted view is that the letter was really an encyclical sent to the various churches of provincial Asia, of whom Ephesus was the most important. It is often further assumed that originally a blank was left for the insertion of the local place-name. The impersonal tone and contents of the letter are urged as confirmation. The view is plausible, but it has its difficulties. If it was originally directed to a group of churches, would not Paul, in accordance with his known practice of including a direct address, rather have written "in Asia," or "in the churches of Asia"? In all other places where Paul uses the words "to those who are" he adds a local place-name. Then how is the uniform tradition of its Ephesian destination to be accounted for? A fair solution would seem to be that the letter was originally addressed to the saints "in Ephesus" but was intentionally cast into a form that would make it suitable to meet the needs of the Asian churches. As transcriptions of the original to the mother church were circulated, the place of destination might be omitted, though they were uniformly recognized as the letter originally addressed to the Ephesians.

Its contents offer no clear indication as to the occasion for the writing of the letter. Its affinity to Colossians in time of origin and contents suggests an occasion closely related to the writing of that letter. Ephesians seems to be the after-effect of the controversy that caused the writing of Colossians. Colossians has in it the intensity, rush, and roar of the battlefield, while Ephesians has a calm atmosphere suggestive of a survey of the field after the victory. With the theme of Colossians still fresh in mind, Paul felt it desirable to declare the positive significance of the great truths set forth in refuting the Colossian heresy. A firm grasp of the truths here stated would provide an effective antidote to such philosophical speculations.

Ephesians sets forth the wealth of the believer in union with Christ. It portrays the glories of our salvation and emphasizes the nature of the CHURCH as the BODY OF CHRIST. As indicated by the doxology in Eph. 3:20-21, its contents fall into two parts, the first doctrinal (chs. 1-3), the second practical and encouraging (chs. 4-6). An outline may suggest some of its riches.

I. Salutation (1:1-2).

II. Doctrinal: the believers' standing in Christ (1:3—3:21).

A. The thanksgiving for our redemption (1:3-14).

B. The prayer for spiritual illumination (1:15-23).

C. The power of God manifested in our salvation (2:1-10).

D. The union of Jew and Gentile in one body in Christ (2:11-22).

E. The apostle as the messenger of this mystery (3:1-13).

F. The prayer for the realization of these blessings (3:14-19).

G. The doxology of praise (3:20-21).

III. Practical: the believers' life in Christ (4:1—6:20).

A. Their walk as God's saints (4:1—5:21).

1. The worthy walk, in inward realization of Christian unity (4:1-16).

2. The different walk, in outward manifestation of a changed position (4:17-32).

3. The loving walk, in upward imitation of our Father (5:1-17).

4. The summary of the Spirit-filled life (5:18-21).

B. Their duties as God's family (5:22—6:9).

C. Their warfare as God's soldiers (6:10-20).

IV. Conclusion (6:21-24).

Ephesus. ef'uh-suhs (Gk. Ephesos G2387). A major city founded by ancient Ionians at the mouth of the Cayster River, between the Koressos Range and the sea, on the W coast of ASIA MINOR. Greek colonies that surround the Mediterranean and Black Sea were primarily trading posts. Migrant communities of Greeks did not seek to dominate the hinterlands, but to secure an emporion or “way in,” a bridgehead for commerce and enough surrounding coast and territory to support the community. Great cities grew from such foundations from Marseilles to Alexandria, some of them royal capitals. And in all cases colonies became centers or outposts of Hellenism, distinctive and civilizing.

Ephesus displaced MILETUS as a trading port; but when its harbor, like that of Miletus, in turn silted up, SMYRNA replaced both as the outlet and emporion of the Maeander Valley trade route. In the heyday of Asia Minor, 230 separate communities, each proud of its individuality and wealth, issued their own coinage and managed their own affairs. The dominance of Persian despotism, wide deforestation, and the ravages of war on a natural bridge and highway between the continents slowly sapped this prosperity; but in early Roman times, as in the days of its Ionian independence, Ephesus was a proud, rich, busy port, the rival of ALEXANDRIA and Syrian ANTIOCH.

Ephesus.

Built near the shrine of an old Anatolian fertility goddess, Ephesus became the seat of an oriental cult. The Anatolian deity had been taken over by the Greeks under the name of ARTEMIS, the Diana of the Romans. Grotesquely represented with many breasts (or clusters of fruit), the goddess and her cult found expression in the famous temple, served, like that of Aphrodite at CORINTH, by a host of priestess courtesans.

Much trade clustered round the cult. Ephesus became a place of pilgrimage for tourist-worshipers, all eager to carry away talisman and souvenir, hence the prosperous guild of the silversmiths whose livelihood was the manufacture of silver shrines and images of the meteoric stone that was said to be Diana's image "fallen from heaven." Ephesus leaned more and more on the trade that followed the cult, and commerce declined in her silting harbor. A long stretch (20 mi./32 km.) of reedy marshland now separates the old harbor works from the sea, and even in Paul's day the process was under way. The historian Tacitus tells us that an attempt was made to improve the seaway in A.D. 65, but the task proved too great. Ephesus in the first century was a dying city, given to parasite pursuits, living, like ATHENS, on a reputation, a curious meeting place of old and new religions, of East and West. Acts 19 gives a peculiarly vivid picture of her unnatural life. The "lampstand" had gone from its place, for Ephesus's decline was mortal sickness, and it is possible to detect in the letter to Ephesus in the Apocalypse (Rev. 2:1-7) a touch of the lassitude that characterized the effete and declining community. The temple and part of the city have been extensively excavated.

This theater in Ephesus, seating 25,000, was the site of a public hearing after the silversmith Demetrius incited the other craftsmen against Paul for opposing the worship of the idol Artemis of the Ephesians (Acts 19:29).

Ephlal. ef'lal (Heb. ᵐephāl H697, derivation uncertain). Son of Zabad and descendent of JUDAH in the line of JERAHMEEL (1 Chr. 2:37).

ephod (garment). ee'fod. A sacred vestment originally worn by the high PRIEST and made of "gold, and of blue, purple and scarlet yarn, and of finely twisted linen—the work of a skilled craftsman" (cf. Exod. 28:6-14; 39:2-7). It was held together front and back by two shoulder pieces at the top and a girdle band around the waist. On each shoulderpiece was an onyx stone engraved with six names of the tribes of Israel. Attached to the ephod by chains of pure gold was a breastplate containing twelve precious stones. The blue robe of the ephod was worn underneath, having a hole for the head and extending to the feet, with a hem alternating with gold bells and pomegranates of blue, purple, and scarlet (28:31-35; 39:22-26).

Later, persons other than the high priest wore ephods. SAMUEL wore a linen ephod while ministering before the Lord (1 Sam. 2:18), which was characteristic of the ordinary priests (2:28; 14:3; 22:18). DAVID wore a linen ephod while he danced before the Lord after bringing the ARK OF THE COVENANT to Jerusalem (2 Sam. 6:14). ABIATHAR carried off from NOB an ephod that represented to David the divine presence, for of it he inquired the will of the Lord (1 Sam. 23:6, 9; 30:7-8). Earlier, the ephod was misused as an object of idolatrous worship by GIDEON (Jdg. 8:27) and associated with images by a man named MICAHA (17:5; 18:14).

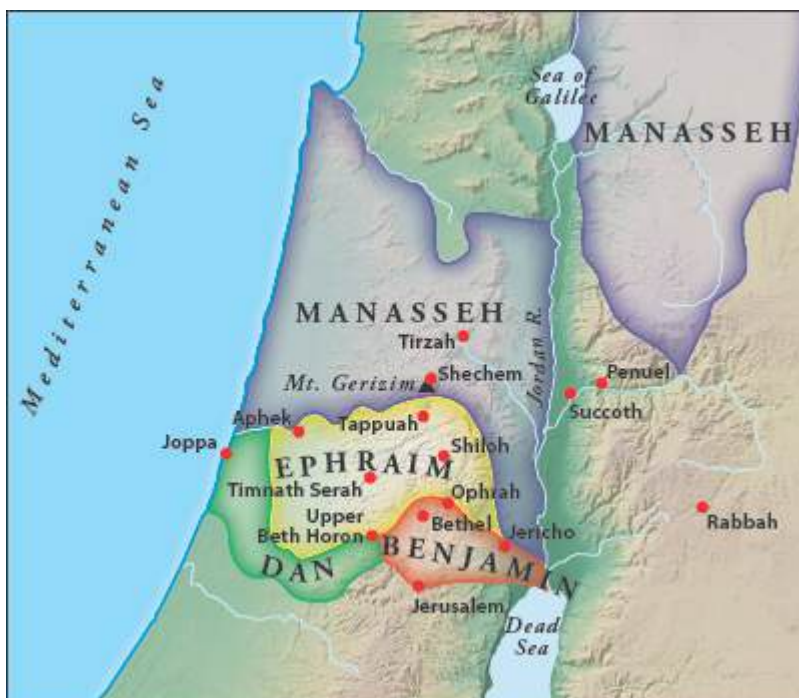

Ephod (person). ee´fod (Heb. ʾēpōd H681, meaning uncertain). Father of Hanniel; the latter was a leader in the tribe of MANASSEH appointed to help distribute the land of Canaan among the tribes (Num. 34:23; cf. v. 18).

ephphatha. ef´uh-thuh (Gk. ephphatha G2395, Gk. transliteration of a Semitic form meaning “be opened”). This word was spoken by Jesus to a deaf mute in the DECAPOLIS (Mk. 7:34). “At this, the man’s ears were opened, his tongue was loosened and he began to speak plainly” (v. 35). This passage is one of the rare occasions when a biblical author saw fit to quote from an original Semitic language the exact word Jesus used. After quoting the foreign word, Mark immediately translates it (dianoichthēti, “be opened,” pass. impv. of dianoigō G1380). The use of this term (hardly a secretive word of magic), along with Jesus’ touching and spitting (v. 33), may suggest the special difficulty and thus greatness of the miracle. Scholars have debated whether the Semitic word is HEBREW or ARAMAIC. Since the latter was almost surely Jesus’ mother tongue and the commonly used language by Jews in GALILEE and surrounding areas, most scholars interpret ephphatha as representing the Aramaic form ʾēppataʰ (a contraction of ʾetpeʿtaʰ, 2nd masc. sing. ethpeel).

Ephraim (person and tribe). ee´fray-im (Heb. ʾeprayim H713, derivation uncertain, but by popular etymology, “doubly fruitful”; gentilic ʾeprāʾî H718, “Ephraimite” [the form can also mean “Ephrathite”; see EPHRATH]). The younger of two sons born to JOSEPH and ASENATH in Egypt; his older brother was MANASSEH (Gen. 41:50-52; 46:20). He was also the ancestor of the tribe that bears his name. The aged JACOB, when he blessed his grandsons Manasseh and Ephraim, adopted them as his own sons. Despite Joseph’s protest, Jacob gave the preferential blessing (signified by the right hand) to Ephraim (48:1-22). When

Jacob blessed his own sons, he did not mention Ephraim and Manasseh, but he did give a special blessing to their father, Joseph (49:22-26). Instead of one tribe of Joseph, the Hebrews recognized two distinct tribes among Ephraim's and Manasseh's descendants, bringing the total of tribes to thirteen, yet the original number twelve (derived from the twelve sons of Jacob) continued to be referred to. The separation of the tribe of LEVI for cultic service throughout the land, so that they did not receive a separate territory in which to live, helped to perpetuate the concept of the "Twelve Tribes of Israel."

Ephraim together with Manasseh and Benjamin camped on the W side of the TABERNACLE in the wilderness (Num. 2:18-24). JOSHUA (Hoshea) the son of Nun, one of the spies and MOSES' successor, was an Ephraimite (13:8). Ephraim and Manasseh were mentioned as making up the Joseph group in Moses' blessing (Deut. 33:13-17). At the division of the land among the tribes, the children of Joseph (except half of Manasseh, which settled east of the JORDAN, Num. 32:33, 39-42) received the central hill country of PALESTINE (see EPHRAIM, HILL COUNTRY OF). This area is bounded on the N side by the Valley of JEZREEL, on the E by the Jordan River, on the S by a "zone of movement" that runs from JOPPA to JERICHO (a series of valleys that invite travel across Palestine) and on the west by the Mediterranean. The Joseph tribes were not able to occupy this land completely for a long time, being forced up into the heavily wooded hill country (Josh. 17:14-18) by the Canaanites and Philistines, who occupied the good bottom lands and who by their superior civilization and power (Jdg. 1:27-29) kept the Hebrews subservient until the time of DAVID.

Tribal territory of Ephraim.

Ephraim and Manasseh seem to have been bitter rivals (Isa. 9:20-21), Manasseh being the larger group (Gen. 49:22), but Ephraim asserting the more vigorous leadership. Although they seem to have held their land in common for a time (Josh. 17:14-18) it was presently divided between them. Ephraim's portion was well defined and very fruitful, its soil fertile and its rainfall more plentiful than JUDAH's to the S (Deut. 33:13-16). Ephraim's inheritance is described in Josh. 16:5-10. The territory was bounded on the S by the northern borders of BENJAMIN and DAN. BETHEL was just across the line in Benjamin, the two BETH HORONS were just in Ephraim, as was GEZER toward the sea. The W boundary seems ideally to have been the Mediterranean. On the N, the brook KANAH separated Ephraim from the half of Manasseh, as did the towns of SHECHEM (in Manasseh) and TAANATH SHILOH. Then the line seems to have turned abruptly southward, through ATAROTH, passing near Jericho and thence to the Jordan. References to the towns for Ephraimites within Manasseh (16:9; 17:9) suggest that the rivalry between these two tribes had resulted in some boundary changes.

At SHILOH, in the territory of Ephraim, JOSHUA pitched the tabernacle (Josh. 18:1), and this town remained a religious center for the Hebrews (Josh. 22:12; Jdg. 18:31; 21:19; 1 Sam. 1:3, 9, 24; 2:14; 3:21) until it was destroyed by the PHILISTINES after the battle of EBENEZER (1 Sam. 4:1-11). Samuel was an Ephraimite (1:1). The Ephraimites contributed their share of the hatred and strife that divided the Hebrew tribes during the dark days of the judges (Jdg. 8:1-3; 12:1-6).

Broad regional view of the topography of Ephraim.

It would appear that Ephraim, in common with the rest of the central and northern tribes, was never completely reconciled to the rule of Judah that the Davidic dynasty brought (2 Sam. 2:8-9; 1 Ki. 12:16). When JEROBOAM I, an Ephraimite (1 Ki. 11:26), rebelled against SOLOMON'S son REHOBOAM, no doubt his own tribe supported him completely. Ephraim became such a leader in the new northern Hebrew kingdom that in addition to its more common name ISRAEL, the kingdom is also called Ephraim (Isa. 7:2, 5, 9, 17; Hos. 9:3-16). From this time on the tribe's history is merged with that of this kingdom.

Ephraim (place). ee'fray-im (Heb. ʾeprayim H713 [see EPHRAIM (PERSON AND TRIBE)]; Gk. Ephraim G2394). A town that was near BAAL HAZOR (the place where ABSALOM kept his sheepshearers, 2 Sam. 13:23). This town is often identified with OPHRAH, which in turn is usually thought to be the same as EPHRON (PLACE) and the NT village of Ephraim (modern et-Taiyibeh, 13 mi./21 km. NNE of JERUSALEM), where Jesus once stayed with his disciples (Jn. 11:54). It is possible, however, that 2 Sam. 13:23 refers not to a town at all but to the tribal territory of Ephraim (cf. NIV, "near the border of Ephraim").

Ephraim, forest of. The term occurs only in 2 Sam. 18:6 (KJV, "wood of Ephraim"), where it denotes the place of the decisive battle in which DAVID'S soldiers defeated those of ABSALOM. Opinions differ as to whether the latter refers to the expansion by the house of JOSEPH eastward into TRANSJORDAN or to settlement in the forested sectors of the Ephraimite hill country itself. Two details in Josh. 17:15 support the first view: (1) the reference to the land of the REPHAITES indicates an area in Transjordan; (2) "the forest" is placed in juxtaposition with "the hill country of Ephraim," which was clearly in Cisjordan, the area W of the Jordan. The proximity of the forest of Ephraim to MAHANAIM (2 Sam. 17:27), formerly ISH-BOSHETH'S Transjordanian capital (2:8-9), firmly establishes this location. Originally this territory was granted to "the house of Joseph—to Ephraim and Manasseh" (Josh. 17:17). Ephraim later lost this woodland E of Jordan to JEPHTHAH and the Gileadites (Jdg. 12:1-15).

Ephraim, hill country of. The Hebrew phrase har-ʾeprāyim (KJV, "mount Ephraim"), which occurs more than thirty times in the OT (Josh. 17:15; Jdg. 3:27; 1 Sam. 1:1; et al.), denotes not a single mountain but the hill country in central PALESTINE occupied by the tribe of EPHRAIM and extending N into the territory of MANASSEH. It was more fruitful than the hill country of JUDAH, especially on its western slopes, and it was one of the few areas where the Israelites were able to establish themselves after the conquest under JOSHUA. At its highest point, the plateau rises to over 3,000 ft. (910 m.). This section is resistant to erosion, leading to extensive vegetation prior to its being deforested.

Ephraim, mount of. See EPHRAIM, HILL COUNTRY OF.

Ephraim Gate. A northward-facing gate of OT JERUSALEM (it exited to the ridge route and thus led to the hill country of Ephraim). We read that, during the reign of AMAZIAH king of Judah, JEHOASH king of Israel invaded the southern kingdom and “broke down the wall of Jerusalem from the Ephraim Gate to the Corner Gate—a section about six hundred feet [lit., four hundred cubits] long” (2 Ki. 14:13; 2 Chr. 25:23). This statement has led many to infer that the Ephraim Gate was 600-650 ft. (180-200 m.) E of the CORNER GATE. The Ephraim Gate figured in postexilic celebrations (Neh. 8:16; 12:39).

Ephraimite. See EPHRAIM (PERSON AND TRIBE).

Ephrain. See EPHRON.

Ephratah. See EPHRATH, EPHRATHA.

Ephrath, Ephrathah. ef´rath, ef´ruh-thuh (Heb. ʾeprāt H714 and H715, ʾeprātāh H716 and H717, “fruitful”; gentilic ʾeprātî H718, “Ephrathite” [the form can also mean “Ephraimite”; see EPHRAIM]). KJV Ephrath, Ephratah. (1) A city or area associated with (and at some point absorbed into) BETHLEHEM. ELIMELECH and JESSE are identified as Ephrathites (Ruth 1:2; 1 Sam. 17:12; the KJV has Ephrathite also in 1 Sam. 1:1 and 1 Ki. 11:26, where modern versions more correctly have Ephraimite). The compound form “Bethlehem Ephrathah” occurs once (Mic. 5:2). On the way to Ephrath (the spelling used in Genesis), BENJAMIN was born and his mother RACHEL died and was buried (Gen. 35:16-20; 48:7). The burial place of Rachel is elsewhere set in the tribal territory of Benjamin (1 Sam. 10:2; cf. Jer. 31:15), whereas Bethlehem was in JUDAH (cf. also Ps. 132:6, where Ephrathah is associated with JAAR, prob. on the border between Benjamin and Judah). A plausible solution is that Ephrathah referred originally to a relatively large area extending from the Benjamin/Judah border to the S as far as TEKOA, and that Bethlehem was thus a village within this region. It has been argued further that Ephrathah was originally the name of a Judahite clan descended from #2 below.

(2) The second wife of CALEB son of HEZRON; her firstborn was HUR, whose descendants included KIRIATH JEARIM and Bethlehem (Ephrath in 1 Chr. 2:19; Ephrathah in 2:50; 4:4). There may be a reference to her also in 2:24 (cf. RSV and CALEB EPHRATHAH).

Ephron (person). ee'fron (Heb. ʿeprôn H6766, possibly “dust” or “fawn”). Son of Zohar; he was the HITTITE from whom ABRAHAM purchased a burial place for SARAH his wife in MACHPELAH (Gen. 23:7-20). Ephron, assuming Abraham's knowledge of propriety, offered at first to give away the land (23:11). Even when Abraham properly insisted on paying for it, Ephron did not offer to sell the land, but slyly stated the value he put on the property (23:13-15). Abraham, understanding that this was the asking price, responded by purchasing it at that price.

Ephron (place). ee'fron (Heb. ʿeprôn H6767, possibly “[place of] dust” or “fawn”). (1) Mount Ephron (Josh. 15:9) probably refers to a range near KIRIATH JEARIM that served to describe the N boundary of the tribe of JUDAH. The site has not been identified, but one possibility is el-Qastel, about 5 mi. (8 km.) WNW of JERUSALEM.

(2) A town that, along with BETHEL and JESHANAH, was taken from King JEROBOAM of Israel by King ABIJAH of Judah (2 Chr. 13:19). This Ephron, thought to be the same as OPHRAH and NT Ephraim (Jn. 11:54), is usually identified with modern eṭ-Ṭaiyibeh, about 13 mi. (21 km.) NNE of Jerusalem. See EPHRAIM (PLACE).

Epicurean. ep'i-kyoo-ree'uhn (Gk. Epikoureios G2134, from Epikouros, Epicurus, meaning “helper, ally”). A prominent philosophical school in the Greco-Roman period. The Epicureans are mentioned in Acts 17:18, along with the STOICS. Luke gives no information on their views, except that they rejected the idea of a bodily RESURRECTION. They were named after the Greek philosopher Epicurus (341-270 B.C.), who taught that nature rather than reason is the true reality; nothing exists but atoms and void, that is, matter and space. The chief purpose of human beings is to achieve happiness, and they have free will to plan and live a life of pleasure. Epicurus gave the widest scope to this matter of pleasure, interpreting it as avoidance of pain, so that the mere enjoyment of good health would be pleasure. Such stress on the good things of life, while very practical, is also very dangerous. For the philosopher the highest joy is found in mental and intellectual pursuits, but for lesser souls lower goals of sensual satisfaction fulfill the greatest pleasure. Thus the high standards of the founder were not maintained, and the philosophy gained a bad reputation.

Since such teaching appealed to the common man, this natural philosophy became widespread. It was widely held at the time of Christ, and thus PAUL met it at ATHENS when he encountered the philosophers of that city.

epileptic. See DISEASES.

epiphany. This term (from Gk. epiphaneia G2211) can be used generally of any manifestation or even of a sudden realization. More specifically, it refers to a supernatural revelation or to the appearance of a divine being. When capitalized, it designates the Christian feast (January 6) that celebrates the visit of the MAGI because at that time the divine nature of Jesus was manifested to the Gentiles. In the Christian churches of the E, it celebrates the baptism of Jesus (when his messianic office was made manifest); this was its original significance, which can be dated to the third century.

epistle. This term (from Gk. epistolē G2186, “message, commission, letter”) in English usage normally refers to a literary composition that is written in the form of a letter. Since the “epistles” of the NT are real pieces of correspondence (not published literary works), most modern versions translate the Greek word as LETTER. Written correspondence, whether personal or official, has been common to all ages. The OT abounds with evidence of widespread written letters, among the best known being DAVID’s letter to JOAB concerning UURIAH (2 Sam. 11:14-15), JEZEBEL’s letter regarding NABOTH (1 Ki. 21:8-9), and SENNACHERIB’s letter to HEZEKIAH (2 Ki. 19:14).

In biblical studies, however, the word epistle has traditionally been almost a technical term, designating twenty-one NT books written in the form of letters. Paul wrote thirteen (or fourteen, if Hebrews is by him); John, three; Peter, two; James, one; and Jude, one. According to the custom of the time, they usually began with the name or title of the writer and that of the addressee or addressees; then followed words of greeting and the body of the letter. It was Paul’s usual practice to employ a secretary to write from dictation. The epistles were written to individual churches or groups of churches (almost always given by name) or to individuals. Seven are called General Epistles or CATHOLIC EPISTLES, because they were written to the church at large.

The epistles are not disguised doctrinal treatises. They were written in the way of ordinary correspondence and dealt with situations, whether doctrinal or practical, needing immediate attention. They were written in reply to letters or as the result of other information otherwise obtained. It is very apparent that the writers realized that what they wrote was authoritative and came from God. They all dealt with some aspect of the redemptive message and experience. Although written to deal with specific local situations, they set forth fundamental principles applicable to the individual and collective life of all believers. They were received from the beginning with the OT Scriptures (2 Pet. 3:15-16). It is not to be supposed that all of the epistles of the apostles have survived. PAUL in 1 Cor. 5:9 refers to a letter he had written to the Corinthians prior to our 1 Corinthians; and in Col. 4:6 he speaks of a letter to the Laodicean church.

Er. uhr (Heb. ēr H6841, “watcher” or “protector”; Gk. ēr G2474). (1) Firstborn son of JUDAH by his Canaanite wife, the daughter of Shua (Gen. 38:3). Er married TAMAR, but the Lord slew him for some unnamed wickedness before he had any children (Gen. 38:6-7; 46:12; Num. 26:19; 1 Chr. 2:3). Tamar was then given to his brother ONAN (Gen. 38:8).

(2) Son of Shela and grandson of JUDAH, thus nephew of #1 above (1 Chr. 4:21).

(3) Son of a certain Joshua, included in Luke’s GENEALOGY OF JESUS CHRIST (Lk. 3:27).

Eran. ihr’an (Heb. ērān H6896, “watcher” or “protector”; gentilic ērānī H6897, “Eranite”). Son of SHUTHELAH and grandson of EPHRAIM; eponymous ancestor of the Eranite clan (Num. 26:36; not mentioned in the parallel passage, 1 Chr. 7:20).

Erastus. i-ras’tuhs (Gk. Erastos, “beloved”). A common Greek name, occurring in the NT with reference to two (or possibly three) companions of PAUL. (1) A helper of Paul, sent along with TIMOTHY to MACEDONIA while the apostle remained in the province of ASIA for a while longer (Acts 19:22). He is very likely the same Erastus whom Paul left behind at CORINTH (2 Tim. 4:20); some think he may be a different individual.

This stone, discovered in 1929, was placed by Erastus, the commissioner for public works at Corinth, at his own expense. Some think he is the same Erastus who sent greetings to the Christians in Rome (Rom. 16:23).

(2) A man described as “director of public works” in Corinth (the city from which ROMANS was written) and who sent greetings to the Christians in ROME (Rom. 16:23; NRSV, “city treasurer”). He was apparently the steward or manager (Gk. oikonomos G3874) of the property or financial affairs of the city. Such officials were generally slaves or freedmen, though often wealthy. It is debated whether the title reflects high social status or the humble position of a city-owned slave. In 1929, archaeologists uncovered at Corinth a 1st-cent. Latin inscription reading, “Erastus, commissioner for public works [aedile], laid this pavement at his own expense.” That he was the Erastus of Romans is possible, but not probable. It is also unlikely that he was the same as #1 above.

Erech. ee´rik (Heb. ereḳ H804; Akk. Uruk). TNIV Uruk. The second of the cities founded by NIMROD (Gen. 10:10). In times of the Assyrian empire, Erech was one of the cities whose inhabitants were deported to SAMARIA by King ASHURBANIPAL (Ezra 4:9-10). Erech, or Uruk, was one of the oldest, largest, and most important cities of ancient SUMER. The site is located at modern Warka, c. 160 mi. (260 km.) S of Baghdad. Originally the city was on the W bank of the EUPHRATES River but the river now lies some distance to the E of the site.

Eri. ee´ri (Heb. erî H6878, “watcher” or “protector”; gentilic erî H6879, “Erite”). Son of GAD, grandson of JACOB, and eponymous ancestor of the Erites (Gen. 46:16; Num. 26:16).

Esaias. i-zay´yuhz. KJV NT form of ISAAH.

Esarhaddon. ee´suhr-had´uhn (Heb. ēsar-ḥaddōn H675, from Akk. Aššur-ah-iddin, “Ashur has given a brother”). King of ASSYRIA 681-669 B.C. The younger son of SENNACHERIB, Esarhaddon obtained the throne of Assyria after his older brothers murdered their father (2 Ki. 19:36-37; 2 Chr. 32:21; Isa. 37:37-38). His reign saw important political developments. He restored the city of BABYLON, which his father had destroyed, and fought campaigns against the Cimmerians and other barbaric hordes from beyond the Caucasus. His main achievement was the conquest of EGYPT, Assyria’s competitor for world domination.

In preparation for his Egyptian campaign, Esarhaddon subdued the Westlands. SIDON was destroyed, its inhabitants deported, its king beheaded, and a new city erected on its site. According to Ezra 4:2, Esarhaddon brought deportees into SAMARIA, which had already been colonized with pagans by SARGON when he destroyed it in 722 B.C. After Sidon's fall twelve kings along the Mediterranean seacoast submitted to the Assyrians and were forced to supply wood and stone for the king's palace in NINEVEH. Among these was "Manasi king of Yaudi," the MANASSEH of the Bible. Manasseh had little choice. The Assyrian Empire had now reached its greatest power; and it appears that most of the Judean citizenry preferred peaceful submission, even with the Assyrian pagan influences now imposed on them, to constant abortive rebellion. Manasseh's summons to appear before an Assyrian king, mentioned in 2 Chr. 33:11-13, probably took place in the reign of Esarhaddon's successor, ASHURBANIPAL.

In 671 B.C. Egypt fell to Esarhaddon. He occupied Memphis and organized Egypt into districts under princes responsible to Assyrian governors. A later Egyptian rebellion necessitated a second Assyrian campaign there, during which Esarhaddon died and Ashurbanipal his son succeeded him.

Esau. ee'saw (Heb. ʿēśāw H6916, derivation uncertain, but by popular etymology, "hairy"; Gk. ēsau G2481). Son of ISAAC and REBEKAH, and elder twin brother of JACOB. At their birth, "The first to come out was red, and his whole body was like a hairy garment; so they named him Esau" (Gen. 25:25). He was also named EDM, meaning "red" (25:30). Before the birth of the twins, God had told their mother that the elder should serve the younger (25:23). Esau became a man of the fields. He apparently lived only for the present. This characteristic was demonstrated when he let Jacob have his BIRTHRIGHT for a dinner of bread and stew because he was hungry (25:30-34).

At the age of forty he married two HITTITE women (Gen. 26:34). When the time came for Isaac to give his blessing to his son, he wanted to confer it on Esau, but, through trickery, Jacob obtained the blessing instead. This loss grieved Esau very much. He begged for another blessing, and when he received it he hated it because it made him the servant of his brother. He hated Jacob for cheating him and intended to kill him (Gen. 27). When Esau saw that Jacob had been sent away to obtain a wife from his mother's relatives, he understood that Canaanite wives did not please his father, so he went out and took for himself two additional wives of the Ishmaelites (28:6-9). Years later, when he was living in Mount SEIR, Esau heard that Jacob was returning to Canaan (32:3-5). With four hundred men he set out to meet his brother warmly (32:7-33:15). They soon parted company and Esau went back to Mount Seir (33:16).

In the PROVIDENCE of God, Esau was made subservient to Jacob. In Heb. 12:16-17 he is described as a profane person. Long after Esau's death the Lord declared he had loved Jacob and hated Esau (Mal. 1:2-3). The apostle PAUL used this passage to illustrate how God carries out his purposes (Rom. 9:10-13).

eschatology. The doctrine of the last things (from Gk. eschatos G2274, “last,” and logos G3364, “word, discourse, subject”). This term designates the teaching from Scripture concerning the final consummation of all things. It includes the study of such important events as the second coming (parousia) of Jesus Christ, the judgment of the world, the resurrection of the dead, and the creation of the new heaven and earth. Related topics include the kingdom of God (the saving rule of God exhibited in Jesus Christ and experienced now through the Holy Spirit in anticipation of its fullness in the new heaven and earth of the age to come), the nature of the millennium, the intermediate state, the concept of immortality, and the eternal destiny of the wicked. Only passing reference will be made to the themes of the kingdom of God and the millennium, since both of these are treated in the separate article KINGDOM OF GOD.

Because the Lord is presented in Scripture as the Creator, Preserver, Redeemer, and King, that which will bring the present age to its end and inaugurate the new age is seen as being very much under his control. Thus, the believer is to have HOPE. However, it is helpful, in order to do justice to the tension within the NT between SALVATION already (but partially) experienced and salvation not yet (wholly) experienced, to speak of “inaugurated” eschatology and “fulfilled” eschatology. The people of God are living in the last days (1 Cor. 10:11; Heb. 1:2), but the Last Day has not yet arrived. The new age broke into this present evil age when Christ rose from the dead, but the new has not yet wholly replaced the old. The Spirit of Christ brings into the present age the life of the age to come; so what he makes available is “firstfruits” (Rom. 8:23), and he is the “guarantee/guarantor” or “pledge” of the fullness of life to come (2 Cor. 1:22; Eph. 1:14).

As the people of the new age yet living in the old world and age, the church is called to engage in mission and evangelism (Matt. 24:14; 28:19-20) until Christ’s return to earth. Signs of the times—i.e., that the end is sure and near—include the evangelization of the world, the conversion of ISRAEL (Rom. 11:25-26), the great APOSTASY (2 Thess. 2:1-3), the TRIBULATION (Matt. 24:21-30), and the revelation of ANTICHRIST (2 Thess. 2:1-12). These signs are seen during the whole of the “last days,” but particularly at the end of that period.

I. The second coming. Christ is now in heaven, seated at the right hand of the Father as our exalted Prophet, Priest, and King, waiting for the time appointed by the Father to return to earth. Mainly three Greek words—parousia G4242 (“presence, arrival,” e.g., Matt. 24:3), apokalypsis G637, (“disclosure, revelation,” 2 Thess. 1:7), and epiphaneia G2211 (“appearance, manifestation,” 1 Tim. 6:14)—are used of this event in the NT. This coming will be nothing less than the personal, visible, and glorious return of the same Jesus who ascended into heaven (Matt. 24:30; Acts 1:11; 3:19-21; Phil. 3:20). It will be an event of which everyone on earth will be abruptly aware, for it will mean the end of things as they are and the universal recognition of the true identity of Jesus of Nazareth. (Some scholars hold that Christ will come in two stages: first, secretly, to gather his faithful people, and then, seven years later, openly to be seen by all. This is part of the system of pretribulational dispensationalism and is expounded, e.g., in the Scofield Reference Bible.)

II. The resurrection of the dead. Christ himself rose bodily from the dead. His body, though in one sense “spiritual,” was a real, physical body, and he is the FIRSTBORN from the dead (Rom. 8:11, 29; Col. 1:18) and the FIRSTFRUITS of the resurrection of all believers (1 Cor. 15:20). The resurrection of each and every person who has ever lived is part of God’s plan for the human race (Dan. 12:2; Jn. 5:28-29; Acts 24:15); but the resurrection of the wicked will be the beginning of God’s judgment on them, while the resurrection of the righteous will be the beginning of their life in Christ in the fullness of the kingdom of God. At the second coming of Christ, the dead will appear in their resurrection bodies; those who are alive will find that their bodies are marvelously changed, even though they remain the same individual persons. Little is taught in Scripture concerning the new bodies of the wicked; but we learn that the resurrection bodies of the righteous will be incorruptible, glorious, and spiritual (1 Cor. 15:35-49) and like Christ’s glorious body (Phil. 3:21). Life in the new age of the kingdom of God in the new heaven and earth will be everlasting, abundant life in an immortal body. The NT has no doctrine of the “immortality of the soul.” (According to the classical tradition, there is one resurrection of the dead at Christ’s coming. However, premillennialists maintain that there will be two resurrections—one of believers at the beginning of the 1,000 years and one of unbelievers at the end of the millennium. Those who adopt the dispensationalist premillennial approach specify two other groups that will be resurrected—saints from the tribulation at the end of the seven years and saints from the millennium at the end of the 1,000 years.) One should distinguish between (1) the resurrection to mortal life, that is, life that will eventually involve death, as happened to the widow’s son (1 Ki. 17:17-24), the son of the Shunammite woman (2 Ki. 4:32-37), the widow of Nain’s son (Lk. 7:11-17), the daughter of Jairus (Matt. 9:18-26), and Lazarus (Jn. 11:38-44); and (2) the resurrection to immortality, of which Jesus is the supreme example and the “prototype.”

III. The last judgment. Having returned to earth, Jesus Christ will be the judge of the nations and of every person who has ever lived. In the name of God the Father (Rom. 14:10; 1 Pet. 1:17), Jesus the Lord acts as universal judge (Acts 17:31). This JUDGMENT, however, is not to determine but to confirm the eternal destiny of human beings according to their acceptance or rejection of the gospel. Further, it is an examination of the motives and deeds of everyone, believer and unbeliever, together with judgment based on this evidence (Matt. 11:20-22; 12:36; 25:35-40; 2 Cor. 5:10) and on the human response to the known will of God (Matt. 16:27; Rom. 1:18-21; 2:12-16; Rev. 20:12; 22:12). True believers will, in this judgment, be shown to be those in whom faith has manifested itself in love and deeds of mercy (Matt. 7:21; 25:35-46; Jas. 2:18). Therefore, there are spiritual rewards in the age to come for those in this life who have faithfully served the Lord (Lk. 19:12-27; 1 Cor. 3:10-15; cf. Matt. 5:11-12; 6:19-21). Those who hold to dispensationalism often refer to several judgments—of the sins of believers (at Calvary), of the works of the believer (at the time of the rapture), of individual Gentiles (before the millennium), of the people Israel (before the millennium), of fallen angels, and of the wicked (after the millennium). After the second coming of Christ and the final judgment, those who are judged to be the righteous begin their life in the new heaven and earth, while those who are judged to be unrighteous are consigned to everlasting punishment.

IV. Eternal happiness in the new order of existence (new heaven and earth). At or following the second coming of Christ, the old universe will be marvelously regenerated (Acts 3:19-21; Rom. 8:19-21; 2 Pet. 3:2) in order to be reborn as the “new heaven and earth,” the new cosmos/universe. This is described in Isa. 65:17-25; 66:22, 23; 2 Pet. 2:13; and Rev. 21:1-4. In Rev. 21-22, God himself is presented as dwelling with his people in this new order of existence, and, thus, they are supremely happy with Christ as the center and light of all. It is fitting that those with resurrection bodies should dwell with their God in a regenerated universe, from which heaven—as God’s place and sphere—is not separated but is rather present. This is the force of the picture of the descent of the heavenly Jerusalem in Rev. 21:2, to be the center of the new universe.

V. Eternal misery and punishment in hell. Jesus himself had more to say about HELL than any other person whose teaching is recorded in the NT (e.g., Matt. 5:22, 29-30; 10:28; 13:41-42; 25:46). Through a variety of pictures and images, the NT presents a frightening portrayal of the everlasting suffering of those who have rejected the gospel. Since this is a difficult and hard teaching to accept, two alternatives have been proposed and remain popular. The first is universalism, which insists that God is love and that ultimately all people will receive God’s salvation. This approach involves the denial of the natural interpretation of many NT passages. The second is annihilation—the wicked cease to exist after the Last Judgment. This involves the view that human beings are mortal beings (like animals) who, unless they are given the gift of immortality through grace, return to nothingness.

VI. Immortality. God alone truly possesses immortality (1 Tim. 6:16), for he is the eternal source of life. Human beings were created for immortality (rather than created with immortal souls); and this immortality, in the sense of receiving and enjoying God’s life, is given to the righteous at the resurrection of the dead, in and through the gift of an imperishable and immortal new body

(1 Cor. 15:53-55). This immortal/eternal life, anticipated with the gift of the Spirit in new birth in this age, is fully given at the resurrection. At all times the immortality of the redeemed sinner is dependent on the gift of God, the source of eternal life. Careless talk about the immortality of the soul can eclipse the biblical emphasis that immortality belongs to God alone and is given to believing human beings in and through a body (2 Cor. 5:1-4). The wicked retain their personal existence but away from the holy love and immortal, abundant, eternal life of God. They are never said to have immortality or to exist eternally in immortal bodies, for the NT concept of immortality denotes the immunity from death and decay that results from sharing in the divine life.

VII. The intermediate state. Those who are alive at the second coming of Christ will experience the transformation of their earthly, perishable bodies. But what of those who have died and will die before the end of the age and the resurrection of the dead? We know that their bodies return to dust. Since the emphasis of the NT is on the events that bring this age to an end and inaugurate the age of the kingdom of God, little is said about the existence of those who die before the second coming. This interim period when they await the resurrection is often called the intermediate state. The parable of the rich man and Lazarus (Lk. 16:19-31) suggests that there is conscious existence and that this can be of misery or of rest/happiness. Certainly the NT points to the comfort and security of those who die as disciples of Jesus (Lk. 23:42-43; 2 Cor. 5:6-8; Phil. 1:21-23; 1 Thess. 4:16; see also HADES; PARADISE; SHEOL).

Esdraelon. ez'druh-ee'luhn (Gk. Esdrēlōn, from Heb. yizre'el H3476, "God will sow"). A lowland that transects the central ranges of PALESTINE separating the hills of GALILEE and SAMARIA. It is popularly known as "the Emek" (from Heb. ēmeq H6677, "valley"). The name Esdraelon occurs only in the APOCRYPHA (Jdt. 1:8; 3:9; 4:6; 7:3), but it corresponds to the Valley of JEZREEL (Josh. 17:16; Jdg. 6:33; cf. the "fertile valley" of Isa. 28:1, 4), and forms the setting for several passages of Scripture. In broadest usage, Esdraelon may include the whole plain from the MEDITERRANEAN SEA to the JORDAN River, but a stricter terminology excludes both the ACCO plain and (less emphatically) the valley eastward from Jezreel. It thus denotes the central triangle of lowland, approximately 15 mi. (24 km.) along each side, with its apices at the KISHON Gorge, Jenin (BETH HAGGAN), and Mount TABOR.

Valley of Esdraelon looking ENE toward Mt. Tabor and the Nazareth ridge.

Several passes enter into the plain, making it easy of access and important commercially and in military operations. Many cities were situated in it, one of the most important being MEGIDDO, which guarded one of the main entrances. The Canaanites were strongly established in this region before the Israelites came into Palestine. The tribes of ISSACHAR and ZEBULUN were assigned to this area, but the Israelites never gained complete control of it until the time of DAVID. Esdraelon was the scene of some of the most important battles in Bible history: The victory of BARAK over SISERA (Jdg. 4) and of the PHILISTINES over SAUL and his sons (1 Sam. 31). Here the Egyptians mortally wounded JOSIAH, king of Judah, when he went out to intercept the army of Pharaoh NECO (2 Ki. 23:29).

Esek. ee'sik (Heb. עֵשֶׂק H6922, “dispute”). An artesian well dug by the servants of ISAAC in the valley between GERAR and BEERSHEBA (Gen. 26:20). Rather than quarrel with the native herdsmen, Isaac moved on, digging two more wells before he established an undisputed claim. The site is unknown.

Eshan. ee'shuhn (Heb. עֵשָׁן H878, possibly “support”). KJV Eshean. A town in the tribal territory of JUDAH (Josh. 15:32). It is mentioned as part of a group of towns in the hill country and presumably was not far from HEBRON, but its precise location is not known.

Esh-Baal. esh-bay´uhl (Heb. ʿēšbaʿal H843, “man of the Lord” or “the Lord exists”). An alternate form of I^{SH}-BOSHETH, son of King SAUL. While this form occurs only twice (1 Chr. 8:33; 9:39), it was probably his original name, later changed by scribes when the name BAAL became too closely associated with idolatry.

Eshban. esh´ban (Heb. ʿēšbān H841, derivation uncertain). Son of Dishon and descendant of SEIR the HORITE (Gen. 36:26; 1 Chr. 1:41).

Eshcol (person). esh´kol (Heb. ʿēškōl H866, “cluster [of grapes]”). TNIV Eshkol. An AMORITE, brother of MAMRE and ANER, who apparently resided near HEBRON (Gen. 14:13, 24). All three were allies of ABRAHAM when LOT was rescued from KEDORLAOMER. According to some scholars, the names of all three brothers refer to localities. See ESHCOL (PLACE).

Eshcol (place). esh´kol (Heb. ʿēškōl H865, “cluster [of grapes]”). TNIV Eshkol. The valley or WADI where the twelve spies found a cluster of grapes so huge that it required two men to carry it (Num. 13:23-24; 32:9; Deut. 1:24). The site is unknown, but some think it should be associated with ʿAin-Eshkali, a spring c. 2 mi. (3 km.) N of HEBRON. The vineyards in this general area still produce delicious grapes.

Eshean. See ESHAN.

Eshek. ee´shik (Heb. ʿēšeq H6944, possibly “strong”). Son of Eleasah and descendant of BENJAMIN through SAUL (1 Chr. 8:39; cf. vv. 33 and 37). Some of his descendants “were brave warriors who could handle the bow” (v. 40).

Eshkalonite. See ASHKELON.

Eshkol. TNIV form of ESHCOL.

Eshtaol. esh´tay-uhl (Heb. ʿēštā ʾôl H900, “[place of] inquiry”; gentilic ʿēštā ʾulî H901, “Eshtaolite”). A town in the SHEPHELAH, always mentioned with ZORAH; though apparently allotted to the tribe of JUDAH (Josh. 15:33), it is also listed as one of the cities of DAN (19:40-41). When the attempt to occupy the Shephelah region encountered stiff opposition from the AMORITE cities there (Jdg. 1:34-35), the Danites of Zorah and Eshtaol played a principal role in relocating the tribe in Leshem (Josh. 19:47; Jdg. 18:2, 8, 11). Judeans from KIRIATH JEARIM, descendants of Hur, probably replaced the Danites in both Zorah and Eshtaol (1 Chr. 2:50-53). It was between these two towns that the Spirit of God began to stir SAMSON, a Danite; he was also buried there (Jdg. 13:24-25; 16:31). The site is identified with the modern village of Ishwa^c (more precisely, the nearby site of Khirbet Deir Shubeib), about 14 mi. (23 km.) W of JERUSALEM.

Eshtemoa, Eshtemoh. esh'tuh-moh'uh, esh'tuh-moh (Heb. ʾešteṁōa ^c H904, ʾešteṁōh H903 [only in Josh. 15:50, possibly a scribal corruption], “[place of] hearing,” i.e., where an oracle is heard). (1) Son of Ishba and descendant of JUDAH (1 Chr. 4:17). The genealogical connection is not stated, but he was possibly related to CALEB (cf. v. 15). Some have suggested he is the same as #2 below. Since these genealogical lists are partly personal and partly topographical, it is possible to regard Ishbah as founder or leader of the town of Eshtemoa; see #3 below.

(2) A Maacathite, described as descending from HODIAH's wife, and included in the genealogy of Judah (1 Chr. 4:19). He may have been an inhabitant of MAACAH or a descendant of Caleb's concubine by the same name (cf. 2:48).

(3) A town in the hill country of JUDAH (Josh. 15:50); it was later ceded to the Levites (21:14; 1 Chr. 6:57). It was one of the cities where DAVID had friends who were elders of Judah and to whom he sent part of the booty taken from the AMALEKITES after his raid upon ZIKLAG (1 Sam. 30:26-28). Eshtemoa is identified with modern es-Semu^c, some 9 mi. (14 km.) SSW of HEBRON.

Eshtemoh. See ESHTEMOA.

Eshton. esh'ton (Heb. ʾeštôn H902, perhaps “effeminate” or “uxorious”). Son of Mehir and descendant of JUDAH (1 Chr. 4:11-12). The family is described as “the men of Recah,” but their genealogical connection with other Judahite families is not stated.

Esli. es'li (Gk. Hesli G2268). Son of Naggai, included in Luke's GENEALOGY OF JESUS CHRIST (Lk. 3:25).

espousals. This English term, meaning “betrothal” or “wedding,” is used by the KJV in two passages (Cant. 3:11; Jer. 2:2); in the second reference, “the love of thine espousals” means “your love as a bride” (so NRSV and other versions). See MARRIAGE.

Esrom. See HEZRON.

Essenes. es'eens (Gk. Essēnoi, Essaiōi). A Jewish religious group that flourished between the second century B.C. and the first century A.D. Although not mentioned by the NT writers, the Essenes formed an important school of thought in the time of CHRIST. The meaning of the name is much debated; possibly it denotes “pious ones” or “holy ones.” Our principal sources of information regarding them are the first-century writers PHILO, JOSEPHUS, and Pliny the Elder; the church father Hippolytus (c. A.D. 200) provides information based mainly on Josephus.

The Essenes lived a simple life of sharing everything in common. They practiced strict rules of conduct. They were mostly unmarried. They were reported to number 4,000. The majority of them lived together in settlements, but some resided in the cities of the Jews. Apparently they kept their ranks filled by the adoption of other people's children. They did not participate in the temple worship but had their own purification rites. They observed the SABBATH day very strictly and greatly venerated MOSES. They would take no oaths; but new members, after going through a three-year probationary period, were required to swear a series of strong oaths that they would cooperate in every way with the organization and would never reveal to outsiders any of the affairs or beliefs of the sect.

The Essenes came into public attention in the mid-twentieth century because of the study of the DEAD SEA SCROLLS and the excavation of Khirbet Qumran, where apparently some or most of the scrolls were written. This literature and building give evidence of an organization very similar to what is known about the Essenes. The structure was occupied from the end of the second century B.C. to A.D. 135. The Essenes are known to have flourished in this period. Also, the location of the building fits the description of the elder Pliny. The literature reveals that the people of the Qumran community were avid students of the Jewish Scriptures. There appear to be a few significant differences between the Essenes and the Qumranites, and some specialists regard them as distinct groups, but many scholars are persuaded that the two groups are identical.

Esther. es'tuhr (Heb. ḥestēr H676, possibly from Akk. ISHTAR [meaning uncertain] or from Pers. stāreh, “star”). A Benjamite woman whose name is immortalized in the book that bears her name (see ESTHER, BOOK OF). Her Hebrew name was HADASSAH (Esth. 2:7), meaning “myrtle.” Some have thought that her Persian playmates, who did not understand Hebrew, approximated a strange name to one with which they were familiar. Esther’s cousin, MORDECAI, who was a minor official of the palace, reared her as his own daughter. XERXES, the Persian king, had divorced his wife. When he sought a new queen from among the maidens of the realm he chose Esther. When the Jews in the empire were faced with destruction she was able to save them. In her honor the book of Esther is read every year at the Feast of PURIM.

Esther, Additions to. See APOCRYPHA.

Esther, Book of. The last of the historical books of the OT. It was written after the death of King XERXES (Esth. 10:2; KJV, “Ahasuerus”), who reigned 486-465 B.C. Probably the book was written about 400. The author is unknown, but it is evident from the details of the record that he was well acquainted with the Persian court life. The book of Esther has always been accepted as canonical by the Jews, in spite of its outstanding peculiarities, such as the complete absence of the name of God, the lack of any direct religious teaching, and no mention of prayer. These remarkable features can have occurred only by deliberate design.

Overview of ESTHER

Author: Unknown.

Historical setting: The book was probably written in PERSIA sometime between 450 and 350 B.C.

Purpose: To provide a historical-theological account of the origin of the Feast of PURIM and thus to encourage the Jewish people of the DISPERSION in the midst of their suffering.

Contents: The rejection of VASHTI and the selection of Esther (Esth. 1-2); the plot of HAMAN (chs. 3-4); the triumph of MORDECAI (chs. 5-7); the vindication of the Jews (chs. 8-10).

Artistic representation of the Persian guard at the Susa palace where Esther lived.

The account contains many dramatic elements. King Xerxes gave a great feast for all the officials of his realm. Queen V_{ASHTI} offended him when she refused to appear before the company at the command of the king. As a result he divorced her (Esth. 1). Later, in order to procure another queen, he ordered all the beautiful maidens of the land brought together (ch. 2). Among them was H_{ADASSAH}, who had been reared by her cousin Mordecai; it was perhaps the Persians who changed her name to Esther. This maiden was chosen by the king to be his queen, and about the same time Mordecai discovered a plot against the king's life. Subsequently, the king made H_{AMAN} his chief minister (ch. 3). Everybody bowed down to him except Mordecai. This disrespect infuriated the high official. Knowing Mordecai was a Jew, Haman decided to destroy all the Jews in revenge for his hurt feelings. Lots (Heb. pûr H7052) were cast to find an auspicious day for the destruction. The consent of the king was obtained, and an official decree was written and publicized throughout the empire, setting the date for the slaughter of the Jews. Mordecai sent word to Esther that she must plead for her people before the king (ch. 4). At the risk of her life she went in before the king. He received her favorably. Instead of pleading with him at once she invited him and Haman to a banquet. There the king asked her to state her request, but she put it off and invited them to another banquet. Haman, rejoicing in his good fortune but incensed at Mordecai, had a gallows constructed on which to hang him (ch. 5). That night, unable to sleep, the king was listening to the reading of the royal chronicles. When the account of Mordecai's discovery of the assassination plot was read, the king asked what reward had been given him and was told none at all.

It was early morning and Haman had come to ask permission to hang Mordecai (Esth. 6). But the king asked him what should be done to a man he wished to honor. Being convinced that the king could have only him in mind, Haman suggested the greatest of honors he could imagine. At the king's command he was obliged to bestow those honors on Mordecai. At the second banquet Esther told the king about the scheme to destroy her people and named Haman as the one responsible for it. The king became very angry and ordered Haman to be hanged on the gallows he had made (ch. 7). Another decree was sent out that enabled the Jews to save themselves (ch. 8). In two days of fighting they were victorious everywhere. Esther and Mordecai wrote letters to the Jews instituting the commemoration of these two days in an annual Feast of PURIM (ch. 9). Mordecai, being next to the king, brought blessing to the people (ch. 10).

Etam. ee'tuhm (Heb. ēṭṣām H6515, possibly “place of birds of prey”). (1) Son (or descendant or clan) of HUR included in the genealogy of JUDAH (1 Chr. 4:3-4). The reading “These were the sons of Etam” is an emendation based mainly on the SEPTUAGINT; the Hebrew text reads, “these the father [ʾābī] of Etam,” which is obviously corrupt. Other suggestions include the conjecture “These are the families of Abi-Etam” and the view that “father” here (as elsewhere) indicates the lord or founder of a town. If the latter is correct, then it refers to #2, below.

(2) A town near BETHLEHEM and TEKOA that REHOBAM fortified after the secession of the ten northern tribes (2 Chr. 11:6). JOSEPHUS (Ant. 8.7.3) relates that Etam was a very pleasant place c. 50 furlongs (less than 6 mi./10 km.) from JERUSALEM, situated in fine gardens “and abounding in rivulets of water.” According to the TALMUD, the spring of Etam supplied water for the TEMPLE at Jerusalem. This fact probably explains the ancient aqueduct that extends 7 mi. (11 km.) from Jerusalem to three large Hellenistic Roman reservoirs S of Bethlehem, now known as the “pools of Solomon.” The lowest pool is fed by a stream called ʿAin ʿAṭan, and Etam is generally identified with the nearby Khirbet el-Khokh, only c. 2 mi. (3 km.) SW of Bethlehem.

(3) A village in the tribal territory of SIMEON (1 Chr. 4:32). The site is unknown today. Some identify it with #2 above, others with ʿAitum (c. 11 mi./18 km. WSW of HEBRON). It was probably located between the NW NEGEV and the Simeon-Judah boundary.

(4) The “rock of Etam” refers to a cliff somewhere in W JUDAH where SAMSON took refuge after slaughtering many PHILISTINES (Jdg. 15:8, 11). This cliff has not been identified. Some believe that it was near #2 above, but the most likely site is ʿAraq Ismaʿin in Wadi Ismaʿin, 2.5 mi. (4 km.) ESE from ZORAH.

eternal. This English word is often the rendering of Hebrew ʿôlām H6409, which refers to “duration,” both of antiquity and futurity. The term takes color from its context. To speak of a “slave forever” (Deut. 15:17 NRSV) manifestly limits the word to the duration of a human lifetime (cf. NIV). To refer to “the everlasting hills” (Gen. 49:26 NRSV) also obviously limits the word to the geological age of a feature of the landscape (but NIV renders “age-old hills”). On the other hand, when the word is applied to God, his abiding acts, his covenants, promises, and laws, it clearly signifies the eternal and everlasting in the literal and absolute sense of the term. The word often refers simply to a long time; for example, the possession of CANAAN (Gen. 17:8); the throne of DAVID (2 Sam. 7:16; 1 Chr. 17:14); or Jewish rites and privileges (Exod. 12:14, 17; Num. 10:8).

The Greek adjective aiōnion G173 is derived from the noun aiōn G172 (“age”) and bears the basic meaning, in consequence, of “belonging to time in its duration,” that is, “constant, abiding, eternal.” In the NT, its most common application is to zōē G2437, “life” (Matt. 19:16 et al.). The frequency of its use in Johannine contexts is notable. The significance mingles future and present, for “eternal life” in Christian belief is not only a life of endless duration, but a quality of life in which the possessor shares in God’s eternal being by faith. Other NT connections with the adjective include such words as “fire” (Matt. 18:8; 25:41; Jude 7), “punishment” (Matt. 25:46), “destruction” (2 Thess. 1:9), “sin” (Mk. 3:29), “judgment” (Heb. 6:2), “salvation” (5:9), and others. See also ESCHATOLOGY; HEAVEN; HELL; LIFE.

eternity. See ETERNAL.

Etham. ee´thuhm (Heb. ʔētām H918, possibly “fort”). The first encampment of the Israelites after leaving SUCCOTH at the time of the EXODUS (Exod. 13:20; Num. 33:6-7). Its precise location is unknown, but it was on the edge of the wilderness of SHUR (Exod. 15:22), a portion of which was known as the wilderness of Etham (Num. 33:8). Probably it was N of Lake Timsah and formed part of the Egyptian fortifications guarding their eastern frontier.

Ethan. ee´thuhn (Heb. ʔêtān H420, “long-lived”). (1) Son (or descendant) of ZERAH and grandson (or more distant descendant) of JUDAH (1 Chr. 2:6, 8). Because the other sons (or descendants) of Zerah included HEMAN, CALCOL, and DARDA, many scholars identify this Ethan with #2 below.

(2) A wise man described as an EZRAHITE to whom SOLOMON was compared (1 Ki. 4:31). In this verse Solomon is also said to be wiser than “Heman, Calcol and Darda, the sons of Mahol.” According to many scholars, the expression “the sons of Mahol” refers to members of a musical guild and should therefore be translated “the singers” or “the musicians” (see MAHOL). In addition, Ps. 89 is attributed to “Ethan the Ezrahite” and Ps. 88 to “Heman the Ezrahite.” It is possible that the term Ezrahite is equivalent to “descendant of Zerah” and that therefore this Ethan is the same as #1 above. It has also been argued, however, that the term really means “native” and was used of non-Israelite inhabitants of Canaan.

(3) Son of Zimmah, descendant of LEVI through GERSHON, and ancestor of ASAPH (1 Chr. 6:42-43; cf. v. 39).

(4) Son of Kishi (or Kushaiah), descendant of Levi through MERARI, and a musician who served at the left hand of Heman (1 Chr. 6:44; 15:17, 19). Heman, ASAPH, and Ethan had the responsibility of sounding the bronze cymbals. Some have thought that this Ethan was the same as #1 above and that both Ethan and Heman were Levites incorporated into the Judahite family of Zerah, but the evidence for such a connection is not strong. It has also been argued by many that this Ethan is the same as JEDUTHUN (16:41-42 et al.).

Ethanim. eth´uh-nim (Heb. ēṭānîm H923, “ever-flowing [streams]”). The seventh month in the Hebrew religious CALENDAR (later called Tishri), corresponding to late September and early October (mentioned only in 1 Ki. 8:2, dating SOLOMON’S transferal of the ARK OF THE COVENANT to the TEMPLE). The name was borrowed from the Canaanite calendar.

Ethbaal. eth-bay´uhl (Heb. etba‘al H909, “with [him is] BAAL”). The king of SIDON whose daughter JEZEBEL was married to King AHAB of Israel (1 Ki. 16:31). The Bible says nothing more about him, but the ancient historian JOSEPHUS, citing Menander of Ephesus, mentions a drought (cf. 1 Ki. 17) that occurred during the reign of Ethbaal (Jos. Ant. 8.13.2 §324). He states further that Ethbaal built cities in PHOENICIA and in LIBYA.

Ether. ee´thuhr (Heb. eter H6987, perhaps “[place of] fragrance”). A town in the SHEPHELAH within the tribal territory of JUDAH (Josh. 15:42); it was later given to the tribe of SIMEON (19:7; cf. v. 1). Ether is commonly identified with Khirbet el-‘Ater, some 4 mi. (6 km.) NE of LACHISH. Because the Simeonite towns are associated with the NEGEV (19:8), some believe that there were two distinct towns and that the Ether in the latter passage should be identified with Khirbet ‘Attir (see JATTIR), about 8 mi. (13 km.) N of BEERSHEBA. Some scholars have argued that Ether (and possibly also TOKEN in the parallel, 1 Chr. 4:32) should be emended to, or is an alternate form of, ATHACH.

Ethiopia. ee'thee-oh'pee-uh. A country referred to also as Nubia, located S of EGYPT, in what is now N Sudan (but modern Ethiopia, known as Abyssinia prior to the 20th cent., lies farther S and E). Ethiopia is often associated with Egypt in the Bible (e.g., Ps. 68:31; Isa. 20:3-5; Ezek. 30:4-5) and is identified as being S of ASWAN (Aswan, Ezek. 29:10), the southernmost important city of Egypt. The name comes from Greek Aithiopia (understood to mean “[land of the] burnt-faced people”; gentilic Aithiops G134, “Ethiopian”), which the ancient Greeks applied generally to any region far to the S. The SEPTUAGINT uses this term to render Hebrew kûš H3932, and for that reason many English versions translate the Hebrew term as “Ethiopia.” The NIV transliterates “Cush, Cushite,” but uses “Ethiopian(s)” in two passages (Jer. 13:23; Acts 8:27) and “Nubians” once (Dan. 11:43; TNIV, “Cushites”). See CUSH.

Ethiopian MS of the Bible (18th cent.).

Ethiopian eunuch. A convert of the evangelist PHILIP (Acts 8:27-40). The ethnic term “Ethiopian” (Gk. Aithiops G134) was applied in Roman times to the area of E Africa, S of EGYPT and beyond the mountains of the second cataract. See ETHIOPIA. The Acts account states that this man was “an important official” (Greek dynastēs G1541, “lord, ruler, vizier”) of CANDACE, the queen of the Ethiopians. As a EUNUCH he could not be a full member of the Jewish community (Deut. 23:1), but he had been worshiping in Jerusalem and was reading aloud the book of Isaiah when Philip, sent by the HOLY SPIRIT from SAMARIA to help him, met his chariot. From Isa. 53, Philip led the African to faith in Christ, so that he asked for and received baptism and went on his way toward GAZA rejoicing.

Eth Kazin. eth-kay´zin (Heb. ʿēt qās̄în H6962 [occurring only in the locative form, ʿittâ qās̄în], from ʿēt H6961, “time,” and qās̄în H7903, “ruler”). KJV Ittah-kazin. A town on the NE boundary of the tribal territory of ZEBULUN (Josh. 19:13). Its location is unknown, but apparently it was N of GATH HEPHER and S of RIMMON (PLACE); a possible site is Kefr Kenna, some 4 mi. (6 km.) NE of NAZARETH.

Ethnan. eth´nuhn (Heb. ʾetnān H925, possibly “gift”). Son of Asshur (by his wife Helah) and descendant of JUDAH (1 Chr. 4:7; cf. v. 5). Some believe Ethnan may be the name of a town, possibly ITHNAN in S Judah (Josh. 15:23).

ethnarch. eth´nahrk (Gk. ethnarchēs G1617, “ruler of a people”). The Greek term appears after the Hellenistic expansion under ALEXANDER THE GREAT and has various meanings. Usually it was the title of a governor of a town or county who ruled for an overlord of a different race or culture than the subjects. In the APOCRYPHA (1 Macc. 14:47; 15:1-2), the title is applied to the high priest Simon as a representative of SYRIA. The chiefs of the seven districts of Roman Egypt bore the title, as did the princes of the Bosphorus under Caesar AUGUSTUS. Moreover, after the death of HEROD the Great, his son ARCHELAUS (Matt. 2:22) was appointed ethnarch of JUDEA by Augustus (Jos. Ant. 17.11.4 §317). The term occurs only once used in the NT: PAUL, in recounting his narrow escape from DAMASCUS, uses it with reference to the city’s governor under King ARETAS (2 Cor. 11:32).

Ethni. eth´ni (Heb. ʾetnî H922, “gift”). Son of Zerah, descendant of LEVI through GERSHON, and ancestor of ASAPH (1 Chr. 6:41).

Eubulus. yoo-byoo´luhs (Gk. Euboulos G2300, “good counsel”). A Christian who, along with others (CLAUDIA, LINUS, and PUDENS), was a friend of the apostle PAUL during his second Roman imprisonment and who sent greetings to TIMOTHY (2 Tim. 4:21).

Eucharist. yoo´kuh-rist (Gk. eucharistia G2374, “thankfulness, thanksgiving”). As early as the beginning of the second century, this term came to be applied to the LORD’S SUPPER, probably because of the giving of thanks by the Lord at the time of institution, as he gave his disciples the bread and the cup (cf. Mk. 14:22; 1 Cor. 11:23-24). Early liturgies made the thanksgiving, next to the reception of the elements, the most significant part of the celebration, and this no doubt promoted the general adoption of the name.

Euergetes. yoo-uhŕ'juh-teez. See BENEFACTOR.

Eunice. yoo'nis (Gk. Eunikē G2332, “good victory”). The daughter of LOIS and mother of TIMOTHY (2 Tim. 1:5). Eunice’s husband was a Gentile (Acts 16:1), but she was Jewish, as was also her mother. Timothy had not been circumcised (see CIRCUMCISION), undoubtedly because his father was a Gentile, but he was brought up by his mother and his grandmother in the Jewish faith. Paul wrote of Timothy that from a child his mother had taught him to know the holy Scriptures (2 Tim. 3:15). Eunice, her mother Lois, and Timothy were probably converted to Christianity during PAUL’s first missionary journey at LYSTRA, where the apostle had been stoned and left for dead.

eunuch. A male officer in the court or household of a ruler, and often one who had been castrated. The Hebrew term, sārîs H6247, is probably a loanword from Akkadian ša rēši, indicating a courtier or confidant. The meaning “castrated one” was secondary, arising from the rulers’ preference for such men in offices that involved contact with the women of their households. It is therefore improbable that all those designated with the term sārîs in the OT were eunuchs, but in most cases it is not possible to decide by other than the probabilities of the context whether the meaning “official” or “eunuch official” is more appropriate. There are passages in which the sense “eunuch” seems unlikely (e.g., Gen. 37:36; 40:2; 1 Ki. 22:9; 2 Ki. 8:6; 1 Chr. 28:1; Jer. 52:25), whereas in others it seems probable (Esth. 1:10; 2:3 et al.; Isa. 39:7). See also ETHIOPIAN EUNUCH.

Men who had been emasculated were not permitted to enter the assembly of the LORD (Deut. 23:1), yet ISAIAH assures eunuchs who are faithful to God’s COVENANT that they will be given “a memorial and a name better than sons and daughters” (Isa. 56:4). Jesus made a distinction between those who are eunuchs (Gk. eunouchos G2336) in a physical sense and those who make themselves eunuchs (NIV, “have renounced marriage”) for the sake of the kingdom (Matt. 19:12).

Euodia. yoo-oh'dee-uh (Gk. Euodia G2337, “prosperity”). KJV Euodias (wrongly interpreting it as a masculine name). A Christian woman in PHILIPPI whom PAUL asked to be reconciled to SYNTYCHE (Phil. 4:2). Clearly both were influential Christians in the Philippian church, where women were prominent from the beginning (Acts 16:12-15). The cause of their disagreement, whether doctrinal or personal, is unknown, but Paul’s impartial appeal for reconciliation implies that both were responsible for the estrangement.

Euodias. See EUODIA.

Euphrates. yoo-fray'teez (Heb. peṣrāt H7310 [from Akk. Purattu]; Gk. Euphratēs G2371 [from Old Pers. Ufrātu]). The longest river of W Asia. It rises in the mountains of ARMENIA in modern Turkey, heads W as if to reach the MEDITERRANEAN, then swings in a wide bow in SYRIA, eventually joins the TIGRIS to become the Shatt el-Arab, and empties into the Persian Gulf. The Euphrates is some 1,780 mi. (2,865 km.) long, considerably longer than its companion stream, the Tigris, with which it is often linked in discussion of MESOPOTAMIA (a name that means, “the land between [or in the midst of] the rivers”). For approximately 1,200 mi. (1,930 km.) it is navigable for small vessels. The melting of the snows in the Armenian mountains causes the river to flood each spring. NEBUCHADNEZZAR controlled the floods by turning the water through sluices into channels for distribution over the whole country.

In the OT the Euphrates is sometimes referred to as “the River” (Isa. 8:7) or “the great river” (Gen. 15:18 et al.; cf. Rev. 9:14; 16:12), as being the largest with which Israel was acquainted, in contrast to the soon dried up torrents of PALESTINE. The promise to ABRAHAM that his seed’s inheritance should reach the Euphrates (Gen. 15:18; Deut. 1:7; Josh. 1:4) received a partial fulfillment in REUBEN’s pastoral possessions (1 Chr. 5:9-10), and a fuller accomplishment under DAVID and SOLOMON, when an annual tribute was paid by subject petty kingdoms in that area (2 Sam. 8:3-8; 1 Ki. 4:21; 1 Chr. 18:3; 2 Chr. 9:26). The Euphrates was the boundary between Assyria and the Hittite country after Solomon’s time, according to inscriptions. See also PERATH.

Eurakylon, Euraquilo. yoo-rahk'i-lon, yoo-rahk'wi-loh. See EUROCLYDON.

Euroclydon. yoo-rok'li-don (Gk. Euroklydōn). The KJV name for the wind that aroused a storm and caused PAUL's shipwreck at MALTA (Acts 27:14). This reading, which is based on the later Greek MSS, would refer to a SE wind that stirs up the waves. The earliest MSS, however, have Eurakylōn G2350, a sailor's term compounding Greek Euros ("E wind") with Latin Aquilo ("N wind"). Thus modern translations usually render it "northeaster" (some versions transliterate "Eurakylon" or "Euraquilo"). Such a word suits the local situation on the S coast of CRETE, where a southerly breeze often gives way to a NE gale.

Eutychus. yoo'tuh-kuhs (Gk. Eutychos G2366, "fortunate"). A young man at TROAS who fell from a window seat during a prolonged discourse by PAUL late in the evening (Acts 20:7-12). Eutychus had taken a seat in the open window, sank into a deep sleep, and "fell to the ground from the third story and was picked up dead" (v. 9). Having embraced him, Paul quieted the tumult with the assuring words, "his life is in him" (v. 10 NRSV). That Eutychus only appeared to be dead is contrary to the precise language used by LUKE, who was an eyewitness of the event ("we," v. 8; contrast 14:19, "thinking he was dead"). Paul's act of embracing the body is not the act of one investigating a case of apparent death; it clearly recalls the actions of ELIJAH (1 Ki. 17:21) and ELISHA (2 Ki. 4:34).

evangelist. A preacher of the GOSPEL (Gk. euangelistēs G2296, "one who announces good news," from euangelion G2295, "good news"). The term can be used in a general sense of anyone who proclaims the gospel of Jesus Christ. Certainly the APOSTLES did evangelistic work (Acts 8:25; 14:7; 1 Cor. 1:17), and TIMOTHY was instructed to "do the work of an evangelist" (2 Tim. 4:5). The term also designates a particular class of ministry, as in Eph. 4:11: Christ "gave some to be apostles... prophets... evangelists... pastors and teachers." The evangelist founded the CHURCH; the pastor-teacher built it up in the faith. The evangelist was not confined in service to one spot but moved about in different localities, preaching the good news concerning Jesus Christ to those who had not heard the message before. Once such had put their trust in the Lord, then the work of the pastor-teacher began. He would remain with them, training them further in the things pertaining to Christ and building them up in the faith. PHILIP, who had been set apart as one of the seven DEACONS (Acts 6:5), is the typical example of an evangelist. When he went to SAMARIA, "he preached the good news of the kingdom of God and the name of Jesus Christ" (8:12), and subsequently he converted and baptized the ETHIOPIAN EUNUCH, sending him back home with the gospel (8:26-40). Later he is specifically identified as “the evangelist” (21:8). Evangelist in the sense of “inspired writer of one of the four Gospels” was a later usage.

Eve. eev (Heb. ḥawwāh H2558, “life” [by popular etymology]; Gk. Heua G2293). The first WOMAN, wife of ADAM. Already in the summary of CREATION it is stated that there were two sexes (“male and female he created them,” Gen. 1:27). But when Eve was brought to her husband by the Creator, Adam made the pronouncement: “she shall be called ‘woman,’ [ᾤṣā H851] / for she was taken out of man [ᾤṣ H408]” (2:23), a clever play on words (not a precise etymology, since the first term is not derived from the second). The way in which she was created and the designation “woman” emphasize also the intimacy, sacredness, and inseparability of the marital state, transcending even the relationship between children and parents (2:24). The name “Eve” originated in the experience of the FALL, when God had laid disabilities on the tempter, on Adam, and on his wife. Then it became apparent to Adam that the life of mankind was tied up with his wife, and he called her ḥawwāh (3:20), a form that may bear some relation to ḥāyā H2649 (“to live”). This too is an instructive play on words, aiding the memory, not a scientific etymology. She was called “Eve” because she was to be “the mother of all the living.” While the Scriptures uniformly trace the fall of the race to Adam’s sin, the part Eve played in this tragedy is vividly portrayed in Gen. 3. Her susceptibility to temptation is juxtaposed with Adam’s willful act of disobedience. Deceived by SATAN, she ate of the fruit. Enamored of his wife, Adam chose to leave God for the one he had given him. PAUL twice refers to Eve in his letters (2 Cor. 11:3; 1 Tim. 2:13).

everlasting. See ETERNAL.

Evi. ee’vi (Heb. עִוִּי H209, perhaps “desire” or “shelter”). One of the five kings of MIDIAN slain by the Israelites (Num. 31:8). This was apparently an act of retribution, for earlier the Lord had said to MOSES, “Treat the Midianites as enemies and kill them, because they treated you as enemies when they deceived you in the affair of Peor” (25:17-18). The incident is recalled in Joshua, where the kings are said to be allies of SIHON (Josh. 13:21).

evil. This English term is usually the rendering of Hebrew raʿ H8273 in the OT. Appearing about 800 times with its cognates, it refers to what is physically undesirable and what is morally bad. For the precise meaning the context must always be consulted. Rotten figs are “evil” in the sense of “harmful,” as are poisonous herbs (2 Ki. 4:41) and a “ferocious” beast (Gen. 37:20). The child prophesied by Isaiah would reject the “wrong” and choose the right (Isa. 7:15). Individuals are sometimes described as “wicked” in the sight of the Lord (Gen. 38:7; Deut. 4:25; Ps. 51:4). The same is true of the counterpart words of the NT, especially ponēros G4505 with its cognates (e.g., Matt. 6:23; Mk. 7:23; of physical evil only twice in Matt. 7:17-18; Rev. 16:2) and kakos G2805 and cognates (e.g., Matt. 24:48; Mk. 7:21).

The reconciliation of the existence of evil with the goodness and HOLINESS of a God infinite in his wisdom and power is one of the great problems of theism. The Scriptures indicate that evil has been permitted by God in order that his justice might be manifested in its punishment and his grace in its forgiveness (Rom. 9:22-23). Thus the existence of evil is a reminder of the manifold perfections of God. Moral evil, or sin, is any lack of conformity to the moral law of God. According to the Bible, it is the cause of the existence of physical or natural evil in this world. Adam and Eve, the first humans, enjoyed perfect fellowship with God in the Garden of Eden. The day they ate of the fruit of the tree that was in the midst of the garden, disobeying God, they fell under his condemnation and were banished from the Garden. The ground was then cursed for man’s sake, and from that time forward man has been forced to gain his sustenance through arduous, sorrowful toil, even as woman has borne children through suffering and labor (Gen. 3:16-19). In the NT the relationship between moral and natural evil is indicated by Paul in Rom. 8:18-22.

evil eye. This phrase, as a literal rendering of the corresponding Hebrew and Greek idioms, is used by the KJV both in the OT, where it can refer to such qualities as hostility, lack of compassion, stinginess (Deut. 15:9; 28:54-56; Prov. 23:6; 28:22), and in the NT, where it refers to envy (Matt. 20:15; Mk. 7:22; cf. Matt. 6:22-23; Lk. 11:34). The expression is not used directly in the Bible in the superstitious sense of an eye that is supposed to be capable of harming, or even killing, living beings by looking at them.

Evil-Merodach. ee´vuhl-mer´uh-dak (Heb. ʔeʿwîl meʾrōdak H213, from Akk. Amēl-Marduk [originally Awîl-Marduk], “man [or servant] of MARDUK”). Son and successor of NEBUCHADNEZZAR II as king of the Neo-Babylonian empire, c. 562-560 B.C. According to 2 Ki. 25:27-30 and Jer. 52:31-34, in the first year of his reign he released JEHOIACHIN, former king of Judah, from prison, even honoring him above all the other vassal kings in BABYLON. It is noteworthy that administrative documents found at Babylon, and containing lists of ration issues (oil), refer to a Yakukinu of Yakudu (= Jehoiachin of Judah). Some ancient sources indicate that Evil-Merodach was assassinated by his brother-in-law, Neriglissar (prob. the NERGAL-SHAREZER who appears as a Babylonian officer, Jer. 39:3, 13), who then took the throne. References to him as lawless and indecent indicate the probable reasons for the coup that cut short his reign.

exaltation of Christ. The term covers the sequence of events that begins with the RESURRECTION of Christ and that includes his ASCENSION and his coming again (see ESCHATOLOGY). The outcome of his humility and obedience, the “high exaltation” of Christ, will in turn lead to the bowing of every knee and the acknowledgment of his Lordship by every tongue (Phil. 2:8-11; cf. Acts 2:33). The exaltation of Christ places him “at the right hand of God” (Rom. 8:34), an expression used by Stephen (Acts 7:55-56), Paul (Eph. 1:20), Peter (1 Pet. 3:22), and the writer to the Hebrews (Heb. 1:3; 10:12; 12:2). This firmly establishes the association of Christ with God in power and glory, a glorification noted by our Lord himself (Jn. 17:5; cf. 12:32).

excellent, most. The title “most excellent” (Gk. kratistos G3196) is found four times in the NT. It may have been the official rendering of the Latin vir egregius, which meant “a man of equestrian rank,” that is, one of the knights who came in order after senators in ROME. The title was applied to FELIX (Acts 23:26 [NIV, “His Excellency”]; 24:3) and to FESTUS (26:25), both of whom were governors of JUDEA. In addition, the term could be used more generally as a courtesy title in addressing one honored for his position, such as THEOPHILUS (Lk. 1:3).

excommunication. Disciplinary exclusion from church fellowship. The Jews had two forms of excommunication, perhaps alluded to by Christ: “Blessed are you. . . when they exclude you [possibly the Jewish nîddûy for thirty, sixty, or ninety days], and. . . reject your name as evil [possibly the Jewish ḥērem, a formally pronounced, perpetual cutting off from the community], because of the Son of Man” (Lk. 6:22). Christian excommunication is commanded by Christ (Matt. 18:15-18), and apostolic practice (1 Tim. 1:20) and precept (1 Cor. 5:11; Tit. 3:10) are in agreement. “Hand this man over to Satan” (1 Cor. 5:5; 1 Tim. 1:20) seems to mean casting out of the church into the world that lies in the power of the wicked one (Eph. 6:12; 1 Jn. 5:19). The object of excommunication is the good of the offender (1 Cor. 5:5) and the moral well-being of the sound members (2 Tim. 2:17). Its subjects are those guilty of heresy or great immorality (1 Cor. 5:1-5; 1 Tim. 1:20). It is inflicted by the church and its representative ministers (1 Cor. 5:1, 3-4; Tit. 3:10). PAUL's inspired words give no warrant for uninspired ministers claiming the same right to direct the church to excommunicate at will (2 Cor. 2:7-9).

execution. The OT makes a clear and precise distinction between murder—the illicit and violent killing of a human being (Exod. 20:13)—and the legal, moral act of slaying a criminal by the duly constituted authority (Gen. 9:6 et al.). Several cases of execution, or legal deprivation of life, are mentioned in the OT (2 Chr. 25:2-4 et al.). Criminals were to be either stoned (Deut. 13:10) or hanged (21:22). But strict prohibitions against vendetta were in force (24:16). Several executions at the hands of the authorities are mentioned in the NT (Matt. 14:10 et al.). The KJV uses “executioner” once (Mk. 6:27; cf. also the mg. at Gen. 37:36; Jer. 39:9; Dan. 2:14). See also CROSS; PUNISHMENT.

exile. This term usually refers to the period of time during which the southern kingdom (JUDAH) was forcibly detained in BABYLON. It began with a series of deportations during the reigns of the Judean kings JEHOIAKIM (609-598 B.C.), JEHOIACHIN (598), and ZEDEKIAH (598-587). After the destruction of JERUSALEM by NEBUCHADNEZZAR (587) the kingdom of Judah ceased to exist as a political entity. Although there were settlements in EGYPT, the exiles in Babylon were the ones who maintained the historic faith and provided the nucleus that returned to Judea after the decree of CYRUS (536). The northern kingdom (ISRAEL) had earlier been exiled to ASSYRIA (722). It was the policy of the Assyrian conquerors to move the populations of captured cities, with the result that Israelites were scattered in various parts of the empire and other captives were brought to the region around SAMARIA (2 Ki. 17:24). Subsequent history knows these people as the SAMARITANS. Although people from the northern kingdom doubtless returned with the Judean exiles, no organized return took place from the Assyrian captivity.

I. Causes. Both theological and political causes are mentioned in the biblical accounts of the exile. The prophets noted the tendency of both Israel and Judah to forsake the Lord and adopt the customs of their heathen neighbors. These included the licentious worship associated with the BAAL fertility cult and the MOLECH worship that required the offering of human beings in sacrifice to a heathen deity. Politically the exile was the result of an anti-Babylonian policy adopted by the later kings of Judah. Egypt, the rival of Babylon, urged the Judean kings to refuse to pay tribute to Nebuchadnezzar. Although JEREMIAH denounced this pro-Egyptian policy, it was adopted with disastrous results. Egypt proved to be a “broken reed,” and the kingdom of Judah was rendered impotent before the Babylonian armies. After a siege of eighteen months Nebuchadnezzar entered Jerusalem, destroyed the TEMPLE, and took captive the inhabitants of the city.

II. Social and economic conditions. The exile worked great hardships on a people who were forcibly removed from their homeland and settled in new territory. The psalmist pictures the exiles weeping in Babylon, unable to sing the songs of Zion in a strange land (Ps. 137:4). Among other hardships, they had to endure the failure of false prophecies of an exile that would only last two years (Jer. 28:11). On the other hand, actual conditions of life in the exile were not necessarily harsh. Jeremiah, knowing that a protracted period would be spent in Babylon, urged the exiles to settle down, build homes, marry, and pray for the peace of their new land. He predicted a seventy-year captivity (29:4-14). From EZEKIEL, himself present among the exiles (Ezek. 1:1-3), we gather that the exiles were organized in their own communities under their own elders (8:1). Ezekiel’s own community was situated at TEL ABIB (3:15), an otherwise unknown location on the river or canal KEBAR.

III. Religious conditions. The prophets Ezekiel and DANIEL ministered in Babylon during the exile. Jeremiah, who had urged Zedekiah to make peace with Nebuchadnezzar, was permitted to remain in Judah after the destruction of Jerusalem. The murder of GEDALIAH, who had been appointed by Nebuchadnezzar as governor of Judah, precipitated a move on the part of the remaining Judeans to migrate to Egypt. Although tradition suggests that he subsequently went to Babylon, Jeremiah’s actual prophetic ministry ends among those who had fled this way to Egypt.

Ezekiel was taken to Babylon at the time of the deportation of Jehoiachin. He prophesied to the exiles at Tel Abib, warning them of the impending destruction of Jerusalem. Subsequent to the fall of the city, Ezekiel held forth the hope of a return from exile and the reestablishment of the people of God in Palestine.

Daniel was one of the youths selected to be taken to Babylon at the time of the first deportation (under Jehoiakim). God-given abilities and a spirit of faithfulness enabled Daniel to rise to a position of influence in the Babylonian court—a position that he maintained through varying political regimes to the time of Cyrus the Persian, conqueror of Babylon. Like Ezekiel, Daniel spoke of the exile as temporary in duration. He also depicted a succession of world powers, culminating in the reign of the MESSIAH as the goal of history.

Within preexilic Judaism, the center of WORSHIP was the Jerusalem temple where sacrifices were offered daily and where annual festive occasions were observed. With the destruction of the temple a new spiritual orientation took place. Jews came together for the purpose of prayer and the study of Scripture in gatherings that later were called synagogues. The emergence of the SYNAGOGUE made possible the continuation of Jewish religious life during the period of absence from the temple. The synagogue persisted after the building of the second temple (516 B.C.) and is still an important factor in Jewish life.

The sacred books of the Jews assumed great importance during the period of the exile. The LAW, which had been lost prior to JOSIAH'S reign (2 Ki. 22:8), became the subject of careful study. By the time of the return from Babylon, the institution of the SCRIBE was established. Scribes not only made copies of the law, but they also served as interpreters. EZRA is regarded as the first scribe (Ezra 7:6 et al.). The SABBATH, a part of the Mosaic law, assumed a new meaning to the displaced Jews of the exile. It served as a weekly reminder of the fact that they had a definite covenant relationship to God, and became a marker to distinguish the Jew from his Babylonian neighbor. When NEHEMIAH led a group back to Palestine he insisted that the Sabbath be scrupulously observed (13:15-22).

IV. Political conditions. The exile began during the reign of the Neo-Babylonian king Nebuchadnezzar and ended with the decree of the Persian king Cyrus. Nebuchadnezzar defeated an Egyptian army that had joined forces with the Assyrians, who were retreating before the Babylonians, at CARCHEMISH on the upper EUPHRATES (605 B.C.). The campaign against Egypt was deferred when Nebuchadnezzar, on receiving news of the death of his father, Nabopolassar, returned home to insure his succession to the kingdom. Judah was among the states of W Asia that Nebuchadnezzar claimed as heir to the Assyrians whom he had defeated in battle. Babylonian armies occupied Judah during the reign of Jehoiakim (c. 603) and took captive a number of its leading citizens, leaving only “the poorest of the people” in the land. Jehoiakim was allowed to retain his throne until he rebelled (2 Ki. 24:12-16). In 598 the Babylonian king called on the vassal states (including MOAB, SYRIA, and AMMON) to support his power in Judah by force of arms (24:2). When Jehoiakim was killed in battle his eighteen-year-old son, Jehoiachin, succeeded him. After a reign of but three months, Jehoiachin was deported to Babylon with 10,000 Jews, including Ezekiel. Jehoiachin’s uncle, Zedekiah, the third son of Josiah, was made a puppet king in Jerusalem (24:17-19). In spite of the warnings of Jeremiah, Zedekiah yielded to the pro-Egyptian party and refused to pay tribute to Babylon. Thereupon Nebuchadnezzar laid siege to Jerusalem and, after eighteen months, entered the city, destroyed its temple, and deported its citizens (587). Following the murder of Gedaliah, whom Nebuchadnezzar had appointed to handle Judean affairs after the destruction of Jerusalem, the final deportation took place in about 581 (25:22).

Nebuchadnezzar reigned for more than forty years, but he left no able successor. Jehoiachin was given a place of honor among the exiles in Babylon by EVIL-MERODACH (561-560 B.C.), son and successor of Nebuchadnezzar. Neriglissar (559-556) and Labashi-Marduk (556) had brief, nonsignificant reigns. Nabonidus (Nabū-naʿid), with his son BELSHAZZAR, served as the last ruler of the Neo-Babylonian empire (556-539). Nabonidus had an interest in archaeology and religion but was inefficient as a ruler. He repaired the ZIGGURAT to the moon god Sin at Ur where one of his daughters served as priestess. Another daughter is said to have maintained a small museum of archaeological finds. His diversified interests caused Nabonidus to name Belshazzar, his eldest son, as prince regent. It was during the reign of Belshazzar that the Neo-Babylonian empire came to an end. Cyrus had made rapid conquests after his succession to the throne of the small Persian principality of Anshan (559). Successively unifying the Persians, conquering the neighboring Medes and the distant Lydians of Asia Minor, Cyrus marched against Babylon, which he defeated in 539. Cyrus issued the decree that permitted Jews to return to Jerusalem to rebuild the temple (Ezra 1:1-4). This may be regarded as the end of the exile, although many Jews chose to remain in Babylon.

V. Results. Although the exile ended the political independence of Judea, it served to emphasize the fact that God was in no sense confined to PALESTINE. He accompanied his people to Babylon and providentially cared for them there (cf. Ezek. 11:16). The experience of life far away from the land, city, and house where the Lord had chosen to dwell, brought to the fore the monotheism that had always been part of the faith of the people of the Lord. At the same time, the teaching of the prophets that the exile was the Lord’s punishment on idolatry bore fruit. Their suffering, coupled with face-to-face contact with the realities of false religion, purged the people of idolatrous desire. Although many exiles returned to their homeland following the decree of Cyrus, others remained in the Persian empire, with the result that in due time Judaism became international in scope.

exodus. The departure of the Hebrew people from EGYPT under MOSES (from the Gk. word exodos G2016, “a going out”). The family of JACOB had voluntarily entered Egypt during a time of severe famine in CANAAN. JOSEPH, who had earlier been sold into slavery by his jealous brothers, was then vizier of Egypt, and his Israelite brothers were assigned suitable land in the NE section of Egypt known as GOSHEN (Gen. 42-46). When a new dynasty arose “who did not know about Joseph” (Exod. 1:8), that is, forgot what he had done for Egypt, the Israelites were reduced to the status of slaves. Afraid that they might prove sympathetic with foreign invaders, PHARAOH ordered the male children destroyed. The infant Moses, however, was placed in an ark of bulrushes where he was rescued by Pharaoh’s daughter (2:1-10). Raised in the royal court, Moses chose to turn his back on the possibilities of advancement in Egypt in order to lead his oppressed people into freedom.

I. Date of the exodus. There has been a lack of unanimity among Bible students concerning the date of the exodus and thus the identity of the pharaohs who took part in the oppression of Israel. Later pharaohs are sometimes mentioned by name (e.g., Pharaoh Hophra, Pharaoh Neco), but only the title “Pharaoh” is given in the exodus account. Some biblical scholars consider that 1 Ki. 6:1 is decisive in furnishing the date of the exodus. That verse states that SOLOMON began to build the temple “in the four hundred and eightieth year after the Israelites had come out of Egypt.” Since we know the approximate dates of Solomon’s reign, this information can be used in calculating the date of the Exodus. The date suggested by this method of computation, about 1441 B.C., falls within the reign of Amenhotep II, son of Thutmose III, one of the great empire builders of New Kingdom Egypt. Paintings from the tomb of Rekhmire, vizier of Thutmose III, depict Semites working as slave laborers on building projects.

Adherents of this “early date” of the Exodus (1441 B.C.) also find support for their position from the AMARNA Letters (1400-1366). These cuneiform tablets discovered at the site of Akhena-ten’s capital contain correspondence from the kings of the city-states in Canaan, asking the help of the pharaoh against a people known as Habiru. This, it is suggested, is a description of the battles fought after the exodus by the armies of Israel when seeking to conquer Canaan.

There are, however, serious difficulties in accepting the early date. During the 18th dynasty of Egyptian history (when the early date would fall), the capital of Egypt was at THEBES, S of the NILE delta, and the building operations of Thutmose III seem to have been centered there. Later, however (during the time of the RAMSES), the pharaohs resided in the delta, where they engaged in extensive building activity. It is specifically in the delta region, adjacent to Goshen, that Moses met with Pharaoh, and it was in the city of RAMESES (also known as Avaris and Tanis) in the eastern delta that the Israelites are reported to have labored (Exod. 1:11). Advocates of the early date suggest that the name Rameses is a modernization of an older name.

Because of these problems in dating the exodus as early as the fifteenth century B.C., a number of biblical scholars have come to accept a date in the thirteenth century. Explorations in TRANSJORDAN by the archaeologist Nelson Glueck indicate a gap in the sedentary population of that region from about 1900 to 1300. The Bible, however, indicates that Israel met formidable opposition from SIHON and OG, kings in the E Jordan country, and that the Moabite king sought to bring a curse on Israel to prevent their progress into Canaan. The earlier suggestion of evidence that JERICHO fell about 1400 has been questioned by recent expeditions there under the direction of Kathleen Kenyon. The excavations at HAZOR by Yigael Yadin also tend to point toward a thirteenth-century date for the exodus, as did earlier excavations at LACHISH and DEBIR. The Stele of Merneptah (c. 1229) provides the first reference to Israel in the Egyptian monuments. Merneptah claims a decisive victory over the Israelite people. It may be significant that the ideogram for “nation” is not used. In any event, we know that Israelites were fighting in Canaan during the reign of Merneptah. Merneptah’s predecessor was Ramses II, who reigned for sixty-seven years from his capital at Tanis (or Rameses) in the delta.

Some biblical scholars suggest that Seti I, father of Ramses, began the oppression, which was continued under Ramses himself, and that the exodus took place during the latter’s reign. Those who hold to this thirteenth-century date for the exodus usually suggest that the 480 years of 1 Ki. 6:1 be taken as a round number signifying twelve forty-year generations. Since generations are often much less than forty years apart, there may be a smaller time span between the exodus and the building of Solomon’s temple. This view is accepted by many who hold to the full inspiration of the scriptural text. In view of the fact that the non-Israelite characters in the account of the exodus are not identified in Scripture, it is wise to avoid a dogmatic approach to the question. The evidence for the historicity of the exodus account is decisive, but the evidence for specific dates is still inconclusive.

II. Route. The biblical record (Exod. 13:17) states that Israel did not take the direct route through the PHILISTINE country to Canaan. Had they done so, Israel would have had to pass the Egyptian wall (biblical SHUR) that protected the NE highways out of Egypt. This wall was guarded and could be passed only with great difficulty. If they successfully crossed the border, further opposition could be anticipated from the Philistines. The discipline of the wilderness was a part of God's preparation for his people before they were to come into open conflict with formidable foes. Leaving Rameses (12:37) in the E delta, the Israelites journeyed SE to SUCCOTH (Tell el-Mashkutah).

Possible routes of the Exodus.

They then moved on to ETHAM “on the edge of the desert” where they were conscious of God's guidance in the pillar of cloud and pillar of fire (Exod. 13:21-22). The Hebrew word ēṭām H918 possibly derives from an Egyptian word meaning “wall” or “fortress” and was probably part of the series of fortifications built by the Egyptians to keep out the Asiatic nomads. From Etham they turned back and camped near PI HAHIROTH, described as between MIGDOL and the sea and near BAAL ZEPHON. The location of these sites is not known with certainty. It is possible that Pi Hahiroth is Egyptian for “house of the marshes.” Baal Zephon is the name of a Semitic deity who was worshiped in Egypt, doubtless at a shrine located at the town that bore his name.

After passing Pi Hahiroth, Israel arrived at the body of water designated in the English versions as the RED SEA, the Yam Suph of the Hebrew text. The geography of the exodus suggests that Yam Suph, or Sea of Reeds, formed a natural barrier between Egypt and the SINAI Peninsula, the destination of the Israelites. The topography of this region has been altered since the construction of the Suez Canal, but the Yam Suph was probably north of Lake Timsah. An Egyptian document from the thirteenth century B.C. mentions a Papyrus Lake not far from Tanis, whose suggested location is the southern extension of the present Lake Menzaleh. The exodus from Egypt through the Yam Suph was made possible by the direct intervention of God who “drove the sea back with a strong east wind” (Exod. 14:21). Israel was thus able to cross from Egypt to the Sinai Peninsula. When the armies of Pharaoh attempted to pursue the Israelites, the Egyptians were destroyed by the waters that returned to their normal course.

III. Miracles. The exodus period was one of the great epochs of biblical MIRACLES. The first nine PLAGUES OF EGYPT may have been related to the natural phenomena of the country, but their timing and intensification were clearly supernatural. The last plague—the death of the firstborn—signaled the beginning of the exodus. Israel ate the Passover meal in haste, ready to depart from Egypt. The opening of the Red Sea by the “strong east wind” was the means by which God brought his people out of Egypt into the wilderness where, for a period of forty years, they were miraculously sustained.

Exodus, Book of. The second book of the Bible. The title is a Latin term derived from the Greek word exodos G2016 (“a going out”), which is the title of the book in the SEPTUAGINT. The title in the Hebrew tradition is comprised of the first several words of the book, “And these are the names” (i.e., the names of the Israelites who came out of Egypt), and it is usually referred to simply as Shemoth, “names.” Tradition ascribes the authorship of the book to MOSES. It covers the history of the Israelites from the events surrounding the EXODUS to the giving of the LAW at SINAI.

I. The Israelites in Egypt (Exod. 1:1—12:36). The historical events recorded in this section flow logically from the last chapters of the book of GENESIS, where we are told how JACOB and his sons came to live in Egypt. The clan grew into a nation, but the lot of the Hebrew people changed when a PHARAOH arose who did not remember the contributions of Jacob’s son JOSEPH, who had been elevated to prominence in the Egyptian government years before (1:8). This king forced the Hebrew people into hard servitude (1:13-14). The birth of Moses and his providential preservation, when the pharaoh ordered the death of every male child born to the Hebrews (1:22), is recorded in ch. 2.

The account of Moses’ call to lead the Hebrews out of Egypt (Exod. 3:1—4:17) contains the classic statement of the Lord in which he depicts his divine character in the words, “I AM WHO I AM” (3:14). While this statement has been understood in various ways, the context emphasizes the continuity of the promise made to the forefathers (3:13, 15-16). It is probably best to understand the words as connoting the continuity of God’s dealings with his people—“I am the God who is,” or “I am the God who continues to be,” that is, the God who appeared to Moses was the same God who gave his gracious promises to their forefathers. The God of Moses was the God of ABRAHAM. The efforts of Moses to free his people met with no success until the firstborn in Egypt were stricken by God. Only then were the Hebrews able to escape.

Overview of EXODUS

Author: Anonymous, but comments elsewhere in the Bible seem to support the traditional view that MOSES is responsible for the PENTATEUCH as a whole.

Historical setting: The initial composition of the book must have taken place during the wilderness wanderings (either late in the fifteenth or early in the thirteenth century B.C.; those who reject Mosaic authorship usually date the book after the EXILE, while acknowledging that much of the material is several centuries earlier).

Purpose: To provide a historical-theological account of the life of Moses, the deliverance of the Israelites from slavery in EGYPT, the establishment of the COVENANT at SINAI, and the building of the TABERNACLE.

Contents: Birth, earthly life, and calling of Moses (Exod. 1-4); confrontation with PHARAOH, leading to the plagues, the institution of the Passover, and the exodus (chs. 5-15); from the crossing of the RED SEA to the establishment of the covenant (chs. 16-24); instructions for the building and operation of the tabernacle (chs. 25-31); Israel's sin and restoration, followed by the construction of the tabernacle (chs. 26-40).

II. From Egypt to Sinai (Exod. 12:37—19:2). Three important Hebrew traditions were formalized just after the flight from Egypt: the Passover (12:43-49), which commemorated the fact that the Lord had passed over the houses of the Israelites (12:27); the Feast of Unleavened Bread (13:3-10); and the consecration to God of every firstborn male, “whether man or animal” (13:2). When the Israelites finally fled from Egypt, the pharaoh realized that he had lost a major source of manpower (14:5) and pursued them to the RED SEA, where God miraculously brought about their escape (14:21-31).

The period of Israelite history between the exodus and the giving of the law at Sinai was marked by frequent complaining by the people against God and their leader Moses. The complaints were often due to a lack of sustenance, but the deprivation was always met by miraculous displays of God's power. The bitter waters at MARAH were made sweet (Exod. 15:22-25), the hunger of the people was satisfied by the supply of MANNA (16:2-4) and quails (16:13), and their need for water on another occasion was met when God brought water out of a rock (17:2-7).

III. The Israelites at Sinai (Exod. 19:3—40:38). One of the most momentous events in Israelite history—the giving of the law—is recorded in this section. The law was given in three general categories: the Decalogue or the Ten Commandments (20:2-17; see COMMANDMENTS, TEN), civil and societal laws (21:1—23:11), and ceremonial laws (23:12—31:18). Moses' delay in returning from the mountain where the law was given was the cause of another period of apprehension and complaining on the part of the people. This led to the construction of a golden calf that AARON, Moses' brother, proclaimed to be Israel's god (32:4). The cult of the golden calf, which was also observed many years later in the northern kingdom of Israel (1 Ki. 12:25-30), appears not to have been an outright rejection of Yahweh, but rather a syncretistic combination of worship of Yahweh and the calf (see CALF WORSHIP). Verse 5 makes it clear that the worship associated with the golden calf was really directed to Yahweh. In the ancient world animal forms were often used to represent the point at which the spiritual presence of a deity was localized. For example, the storm god of MESOPOTAMIA was prefigured as a lightning bolt set on the back of a bull. This is somewhat similar to the presence of Yahweh over the CHERUBIM on the ARK OF THE COVENANT.

Some think that Jebel Serbal was the Bible's Mt. Horeb (Sinai).

The remainder of the book of Exodus records the implementation of the ceremonial law in the construction of the TABERNACLE (Exod. 35:4—38:31) and the fashioning of the priests' garments (39:1-43). When the tabernacle was completed it was filled with the glory of the Lord (40:34-38).

exorcism. The act of expelling an evil spirit from a person (see DEMON). The English term derives from the Greek verb exorkizō G2019, “to adjure, to put someone under oath” (Matt. 26:63). Exorcism was a common practice among ancient heathen. In Acts 19:13-16 the profane use of Jesus' name as a mere spell was punished when the demon-possessed man turned on the would-be exorcists; these “vagabond Jews” were pretenders. Christ, however, implies that some Jews actually cast out demons (Matt. 12:27)—some probably by demonical help, others (in the name of Jesus) without saving faith in him (7:22). He gave power to cast out demons to the Twelve, the Seventy, and to the other disciples after the ascension (Matt. 10:8; Mk. 16:17; Lk. 10:17-19; Acts 16:18).

expanse. See FIRMAMENT.

expiation. See PROPITIATION AND EXPIATION.

extortion. The act or crime of obtaining what belongs to another by such means as coercion, intimidation, blackmail, and fraud. Numerous passages of Holy Scripture condemning fraud and extortion of various kinds indicate that even the people of God often became guilty of exploiting others. God himself forbids all types of stealing and fraud, including extortion (Exod. 21-23). The prophet EZEKIEL warns that God will deal justly with an extortioner (Ezek. 18:18) and states that such crimes were common in his day (22:29). The psalmist preached that those who place confidence in extortion and robbery follow a vain hope (Ps. 62:10). Extortion through excessive INTEREST, or usury, is particularly hit hard to prevent the exploitation of a fellow Israelite’s misfortune (Lev. 25:35-36; Deut. 23:19). One common form of extortion was to trick a man into a huge loan or pledge, then foreclose and force him to become a slave (Lev. 25:39, 47). Jesus aimed charges of extortion, fraud, and robbery against the people of his day in the sharpest terms their ears could bear (Matt. 23:25 RSV; cf. Lk. 11:39; 18:11). JOHN THE BAPTIST counseled repentant tax collectors and soldiers (Lk. 3:13-14). The final stroke is given by PAUL: “nor thieves nor the greedy nor drunkards nor slanderers nor swindlers will inherit the kingdom of God” (1 Cor. 6:10).

eye. The organ of sight. The literal sense is that which is most frequently found in the Scriptures, where the eye is recognized as among the most valued of the members of the body. In the Mosaic legislation, if a man hit a slave’s eye so that it was blinded, the slave was to be released (Exod. 21:26). One of the most cruel customs of the heathen nations was that of putting out the eyes of a defeated enemy (2 Ki. 25:7). The word is also used often in figurative expressions. Frequently “eye” speaks of spiritual perception and understanding. Thus the word of God enlightens the eyes (Ps. 19:8). Growth in spiritual knowledge comes through the “eyes of the heart being enlightened” (Eph.

1:18). Other expressions speak of the eye as indicative of character. The good man has a “bountiful eye” (Prov. 22:9 KJV). High or lofty eyes (Ps. 131:1) describe the proud man. The envious man is one with an evil eye (Matt. 20:15 KJV).

eyelids of the morning. This phrase is the KJV’s literal rendering of a Hebrew idiom that occurs twice in the OT (Job 3:9; 41:18; NRSV, “eyelids of the dawn”). The expression seems to refer to the gradual appearance of sunlight culminating in sunrise itself (thus NIV, “the rays of dawn”).

eye of a needle. See NEEDLE.

eyes, painting of. The ancient practice of painting the eyelids in order to enhance the beauty of the feminine face (Jer. 4:30; Ezek. 23:40). JEZEBEL “painted her eyes” (2 Ki. 9:30). Oriental women still paint their eyelids with antimony or kohl (a black powder made of the smoke black from the burning of frankincense) to make them look full and sparkling, the blackened margin contrasting with the white of the eye.

eyesalve. This term is used by the KJV to render Greek kollourion G3141, which appears in the context of the address to the church at LAODICEA (Rev. 3:18; NIV simply, “salve”). Some scholars have seen a connection between the use of this term and the existence of a famous school of medicine in Laodicea. The ancient physician Galen speaks of a medicine for the eyes made from Phrygian stone and in the form of a tabloid (De sanitate tuenda 6.439). Since Laodicea was a well-known city in the region of P_{HRYGIA}, some have thought that Galen was referring to a “Phrygian powder” mentioned by Aristotle, and that this medicine came from Laodicea.

eyeservice. This term, used by the KJV and other versions, is a literal rendering of a Greek noun that appears twice in nearly identical phrases (Eph. 6:6; Col. 3:22). It vividly describes insincere service, that is, work done to impress masters (or employers) “when their eye is on you” (NIV).

eyewitness. Someone who has personally witnessed an event and can verify its truthfulness. One Greek term with this meaning (autoptēs G898) is used by LUKE to support and insure the authenticity of his narrative (Lk. 1:2). A close synonym (epoptēs G2228) is used by PETER similarly to designate himself and the other disciples who witnessed the majesty of Christ and who can testify that Christians have not followed “cleverly invented stories” (2 Pet. 1:16).

Ezar. ee´zühr. KJV alternate form of EZER (only 1 Chr. 1:38 in some editions).

Ezbai. ez´bi (Heb. ʿezbāy H256, meaning uncertain). Father of NAARI; the latter is listed among the Thirty, DAVID’s military elite (1 Chr. 11:37). The parallel passage at this point has “Paarai the Arbite” (2 Sam. 23:35) instead of “Naari son of Ezbai.” These differences, like others in the lists, reflect scribal mistakes, but scholars do not agree regarding the original form.

Ezbon. ez´bon (Heb. ʿesbōn H719, meaning uncertain). (1) Fourth son of GAD (Gen. 46:16); apparently the same as OZNI in the parallel passage (Num. 26:16).

(2) Son of BELA and grandson of BENJAMIN (1 Chr. 7:7).

Ezekiel. i-zee´kee-uhl (Heb. yeʿezqēʾl H3489, “God strengthens”). Son of Buzi, descendant of ZADOK, and a major Hebrew prophet during the EXILE (Ezek. 1:3). A play is made on this name in connection with the prophet’s call (3:7-8, 14). Born of a priestly family (1:3), Ezekiel grew up in JUDAH during the last years of Hebrew independence and was deported to BABYLON with JEHOIACHIN in 597 B.C., probably early in life. He was called to be a prophet in the fifth year of his captivity (1:1-2); the last date mentioned is the twenty-seventh year (29:17); his ministry therefore lasted at least twenty-two years, from about 593 to 571 B.C. Ezekiel was a younger contemporary of the prophet JEREMIAH and probably a somewhat older contemporary of DANIEL, who also as a young man was taken to Babylon in 605. Ezekiel lived with the Jewish exiles by the irrigation canal named KEBAR (1:1, 3; 3:15) which connected the TIGRIS River with the EUPHRATES above Babylon; Daniel carried out his quite different work in the Babylonian court. We know little more about Ezekiel, except that he was married (24:18).

The “captivity” of the Jews consisted in their deportation to a foreign land. Once arrived in Babylon, however, the exiles seem to have been completely free to settle and live their lives as they pleased. At Nippur, located on the Kebar Canal, many records have been found of a Jewish business house, the Murashu Sons, indicating the possibilities open to exiles. Many of the Jews became so settled in their adopted land that they refused to leave it at the end of the exile, and from that time to this the majority of the Hebrews have lived outside of Palestine.

When Jerusalem was finally destroyed, some ten years after he arrived in Babylon, Ezekiel entered into the sufferings of his people. On the day on which the final siege began, the prophet's wife became suddenly sick and died. In this he became a sign to the people and was not allowed to go through the customary period of mourning, doubtless to emphasize to them the greater sorrow now coming on the nation.

Glazed brick reliefs of the lion, the sacred animal of the goddess Ishtar, from the “procession street” in Babylon (6th cent. B.C.). It was from Babylon that Ezekiel prophesied to Israel.

In recent years a good deal of interest has been awakened regarding the unusual states of the prophets during the reception of their revelations. Some have diagnosed Ezekiel's condition as catalepsy, but the passages adduced (Ezek. 3:14-15, 26-27; 4:4-5; 24:27) hardly support such a theory. Rather it would seem that the occasional silence of the prophet and his lying on the ground were signs to gain the attention of the people and to act out his message. Ezekiel was a powerful preacher. Possessing a deeply introspective and religious nature, he used ALLEGORY, vivid figures, and symbolic actions to clothe his message. His favorite expression to denote the divine inspiration, “the hand of the LORD was upon me” (1:3; 3:14, 22), shows how strongly he felt impelled to communicate the message given him. His preaching was directed to his Jewish brethren in exile; and, like Jeremiah's, it was often resented, for it held out little hope for the immediate future. No doubt his message was ultimately received, for the exile became a time of religious purging. In Babylon the Jews were cured permanently of their idolatry; and Ezekiel, their major religious leader, must be given much credit for that.

The prophet's ministry was divided into two periods. The first ends with the siege of Jerusalem in 587 B.C. (Ezek. 24:1, 27). It was a message of approaching destruction for Jerusalem and of condemnation of her sin. The second period begins with the reception of the news of Jerusalem's fall, some two years later (33:21-22). Now the prophet's message emphasized comfort and looked forward to the coming of the kingdom of God. It would appear that during the two years between, Ezekiel ceased all public ministry. Frequently in this book (more than seventy times), Ezekiel is referred to as “son of man.” The term means a mortal, as in Ps. 8:4, and is used here to emphasize the prophet’s weakness and dependence on God for his success. Later the term came to be a messianic designation. See SON OF MAN.

Overview of EZEKIEL

Author: The priest-prophet Ezekiel.

Historical setting: Ezekiel received his visions while in EXILE in BABYLON from c. 593 (seven years before the fall of JERUSALEM) to c. 571 B.C.

Purpose: To impress on the Hebrew exiles the truth that their captivity and the destruction of the nation were the result of their faithlessness; to bring them to repentance; and to assure them that God will yet restore them.

Contents: Oracles against JUDAH (Ezek. 1-24); oracles against pagan nations (chs. 25-32); promises of restoration (chs. 33-39); visions of the future temple (chs. 40-48).

Ezekiel, Book of. The third book among the Major Prophets of the OT. Until quite recently the work was universally accepted as written by the prophet EZEKIEL. Some critics have denied the unity of the book and have attributed all or parts of it to later writers. There has been, however, no agreement among these critics. The arguments for both the unity of the book and its origin with Ezekiel are very strong. The book is autobiographical, that is, the author often uses the first person singular pronoun. The arrangement of the book shows its unity—all the parts fit together and, indeed, need each other to make the whole.

The locality of Ezekiel’s ministry was BABYLON, to which he had been deported in 597 B.C. Ezekiel 8-11 contains a unique vision of events that were transpiring in JERUSALEM, made possible when “the Spirit lifted me up. . . and in visions of God he took me to Jerusalem” (8:3). Elsewhere in the book an intimate knowledge of events in faraway Jerusalem is implied (e.g., 24:1-2). It appears impossible that Ezekiel in Babylon could have known in such detail events in Jerusalem except by divine INSPIRATION. Therefore many scholars are now of the opinion that Ezekiel really prophesied in Jerusalem until the city fell. The clear statements of the book, however, indicate his presence with the Jews in Babylon when he “saw” (8:6, 9-10) the events taking place at Jerusalem; and one who makes a serious attempt to understand the visions should grapple with these statements rather than deny them.

The book is divided into three parts: denunciation of Judah and Israel (Ezek. 1-24, dated 593-588 B.C.); oracles against foreign nations (chs. 25-32, dated 587-571); and the future restoration of Israel (chs. 33-48, dated 585-573).

The prophecies of the first section were uttered before the fall of Jerusalem. Ezekiel’s call to the prophetic work is described in Ezek. 1-3. Here occurs his vision of the divine glory—God’s throne borne by an unearthly chariot of CHERUBIM and wheels (1:4-21). The prophet eats the scroll on which his sad message is written (2:8—3:3); and he is commanded to be the Lord’s watchman, his own life to be forfeited if he does not cry the alarm (3:16-21; cf. 33:1-9). Ezekiel then predicts the destruction of Jerusalem by symbolic acts (4:7), such as laying siege to a replica of the city (4:1-8) and by rationing food and drink (4:9-17). Next follows the famous vision of Jerusalem’s iniquity, for which Ezekiel is raptured in spirit to Jerusalem (chs. 8-11) and sees all kinds of loathsome idolatry being practiced in the temple courts. While he watches the desecration of the house of the Lord, he beholds the divine glory, which had been manifested in the Most Holy Place (8:4), leave the temple and city (9:3; 10:4, 19; 11:22-23), symbolizing God’s abandonment of his apostate people. At that moment Ezekiel returns in spirit to Babylon. The rest of the first section (chs. 12-24) records symbolic actions and sermons of the prophet predicting the fall of Jerusalem. He enacts the departure into exile (12:1-7), preaches against false prophets (ch. 13), and in two deeply moving oracles (chs. 16; 23) depicts the ungrateful people’s apostasy. His statement of the individual’s responsibility before God (ch. 18) is famous. Finally he announces the beginning of the siege of Jerusalem, and in the evening of the same day his wife dies and he becomes dumb until the fall of the city (ch. 24).

After the prophecies of judgment against foreign nations (Ezek. 25-32) comes the climax of the prophet’s vision, written after the fall of Jerusalem—the restoration of Israel (chs. 33-48). God will bring back the people to their land, send the son of David to reign over them, and give them a new heart (chs. 34; 36). The vision of the valley of dry bones (ch. 37) is a figurative statement of this regathering of the nation. Then follows Israel’s defeat of the Gentile powers, Gog and Magog (chs. 38-39; see MAGOG). Finally a great restored TEMPLE is pictured (chs. 40-43), its holy services (chs. 44-46), the river of life running from it (ch. 47), and the people of Israel living in their places around the city, called “The Lord is there” (ch. 48), to which the glory of the Lord has returned (43:2, 4-5; 44:4).

Ezel. ee´zuhl (Heb. ʔezel H262, possibly “departure”). The name of a stone, otherwise unknown, near which DAVID was supposed to wait for JONATHAN (1 Sam. 20:19). On the basis of the SEPTUAGINT, many scholars emend the Hebrew text, yielding such a rendering as “remain beside the stone there” (so NRSV).

Ezem. ee´zuhm (Heb. ʿessem H6796, “bone” [signifying “strength”]). KJV also Azem (in Joshua). One of the southernmost towns of JUDAH in the NEGEV (Josh. 15:29); it was among the towns later assigned to the tribe of SIMEON (Josh. 19:3; 1 Chr. 4:29). The location of Ezem is unknown, but a popular suggestion is Umm el-ʿAzam, 12 mi. (19 km.) SE of BEERSHEBA.

Ezer. ee´zuhr (Heb. ʔēs̄er H733, perhaps “treasure” [only #1 below]; ēzer H6470, “help”). (1) Son of SEIR the HORITE in the land of EDM; he is mentioned sixth among the chiefs of the Horites (Gen. 36:21, 27, 30; 1 Chr. 1:38 [some KJV editions, “Ezar”], 42).

(2) Father of Husha and a descendant of JUDAH (1 Chr. 4:4). His place in the genealogy is unclear.

(3) Son (or grandson) of EPHRAIM who, with his brother Elead, was killed by the men of GATH (1 Chr. 7:21). See comments under ELEAD.

(4) The chief of the mighty men of GAD, who came to DAVID in ZIKLAG when David fled from SAUL (1 Chr. 12:9). The Gadites are described as “were brave warriors, ready for battle and able to handle the shield and spear. Their faces were the faces of lions, and they were as swift as gazelles in the mountains” (v. 8).

(5) Son of JESHUA and ruler of Mizpah; he was a LEVITE who repaired a section of the walls of JERUSALEM in the days of NEHEMIAH (Neh. 3:19).

(6) A priest listed among those who assisted Nehemiah in the dedication of the rebuilt walls of Jerusalem (Neh. 12:42).

Ezion Geber. ee´zee-uhn-gee´buhr (Heb. ʿes̄yôn geber H6787, meaning uncertain). A city located on the N end of the Gulf of AQABAH, banked on the E by the hills of EDM and on the W by those of PALESTINE. The site, Tell el-Kheleifeh, is 2.5 mi. (4 km.) NW of modern Aqabah (biblical ELATH) in Jordan, and about the same distance SE of Eilat in Israel. Some scholars, however, believe that the offshore island known as Jezirat Faraun (“Pharaoh’s Island,” now Coral Island) is the probable site.

Ezion Geber was the last stopping place of the Israelites in their wilderness wanderings before KADESH (Num. 33:35-36). The city's period of greatest prosperity was in the time of SOLOMON, who there built a fleet of ships that sailed between Ezion Geber and OPHIR, a source of gold (1 Ki. 9:26-28; 2 Chr. 8:17-18). Similarly, JEHOSHAPHAT joined with AHAZIAH in building ships at Ezion Geber that were designed to sail to Ophir, but the fleet was destroyed before leaving port (2 Chr. 20:35-36; 1 Ki. 22:48-49). The location was chosen to take advantage of these winds, for the city was an industrial center as well as a seaport. Archaeological work at Tell el-Kheleifeh was thought to have uncovered an extensive industrial complex centered on the smelting and refining of copper (chiefly) and iron. However, the excavations failed to turn up either the clay crucibles that would have been used in smelting or the slag from the refining process. According to some, the finds and ground plans indicate that the city was a large storehouse for grain and supplies for caravans and a fortress guarding the southern approaches on both sides of the gulf.

Ezra. ez'ruh (Heb. ezrā 𐤌𐤐𐤕𐤗𐤁, "help"). (1) KJV form of EZRAH.

(2) A leading priest who returned from BABYLON to JERUSALEM with ZERUBBABEL (Neh. 12:1); apparently the same as Azariah (10:2).

(3) The famous Jewish priest and scribe who is the main character of the book of Ezra and the coworker of NEHEMIAH. Ezra was a lineal descendant from ELEAZAR, the son of AARON the high priest, and from SERAIAH, the chief priest put to death at RIBLAH by order of NEBUCHADNEZZAR (2 Ki. 25:18-21). All that is really known of Ezra is what is told in Ezra 7-10 and Neh. 8-10. There are various traditions about him in JOSEPHUS, 2 Esdras (see APOCRYPHA), and the TALMUD, but they are discrepant, and consequently no great reliance can be put on them.

In the seventh year of the reign of ARTAXERXES Longimanus, king of PERSIA (458 B.C.), Ezra received permission from the king to return to Jerusalem to carry out a religious reform. Following the return from Babylonian captivity, the temple had been rebuilt in 516, in spite of much powerful and vexatious opposition from the SAMARITANS; but after a brief period of religious zeal, the nation drifted into apostasy once more. Many of the Jews intermarried with their heathen neighbors (Mal. 2:11); the temple services and sacrifices were neglected (1:6-14); and oppression and immorality were prevalent (3:5). Just how Ezra acquired his influence over the king does not appear, but he received a royal edict granting him authority to carry out his purpose. He was given permission to take with him as many Israelites as cared to go; he was authorized to take from the king and the Jews offerings made for the temple; to draw on the royal treasury in Syria for further necessary supplies; to purchase animals for sacrifice; to exempt the priests, Levites, and other workers in the temple from the Persian tax; to appoint magistrates in Judea to enforce the law of God, with power of life and death over all offenders. Eighteen hundred Jews left Babylon with him. Nine days later, they halted at a place called Ahava, and when it was found that no Levites were in the caravan, thirty-eight were persuaded to join them. After fasting and praying three days for a safe journey, they set out. Four months later they reached the Holy City, having made a journey of about 900 mi. (1,450 km.). The treasures were delivered into the custody of the Levites, burnt offerings were offered to the Lord, the king's commissions were handed over to the governors and viceroys, and help was given to the people and the ministers of the temple.

When he had discharged the various trusts committed to him, Ezra entered on his great work of reform. The princes of the Jews came to him with the complaint that the Jewish people generally, and also the priests and Levites, but especially the rulers and princes, had not kept themselves religiously separate from the heathen around them, and had even married heathen wives. On hearing this report, Ezra expressed his horror and deep affliction of soul by tearing his garment and pulling out his hair. Those who still feared God and dreaded his wrath for the sin of the returned exiles gathered around him. At the evening sacrifice that day he made public prayer and confession of sin, entreating God not to remove his favor because of their awful guilt. The assembled congregation wept bitterly, and in the general grief, SHECANIAH came forward to propose a covenant to put away their foreign wives and children. A proclamation was issued that all Jews were to assemble in Jerusalem three days later, under pain of excommunication and forfeiture of goods. At the time appointed, the people assembled, trembling on account of their sin and promising obedience. They requested that, since it was raining hard (it was the time of the winter rains in Palestine) and the number of transgressors was great, Ezra would appoint times for the guilty to come, accompanied by the judges and elders of each city, and have each case dealt with. A divorce court, consisting of Ezra and some others, was set up to attend to the matter; and after three months, in spite of some opposition, the work of the court was finished and the foreign wives were put away.

The book of Ezra ends with this important transaction. Nothing more is heard of Ezra until thirteen years later: in the twentieth year of Artaxerxes (446 B.C.), he appears again at Jerusalem, when Nehemiah, a Babylonian Jew and the favored cupbearer of Artaxerxes, returned to Jerusalem as governor of Palestine with the king's permission to repair the ruined walls of the city. It is uncertain whether Ezra remained in Jerusalem after he had effected the above-named reformation, or whether he had returned to the king of Persia and now came back with Nehemiah, or perhaps shortly after the arrival of the latter. Since he is not mentioned in Nehemiah's narrative until after the completion of the wall (Neh. 8:1), it is probable that Nehemiah sent for him to aid in his work. Under Nehemiah's government his functions were entirely of a priestly and ecclesiastical character. He read and interpreted the law of Moses before the assembled congregation during the eight days of the Feast of Tabernacles, assisted at the dedication of the wall, and helped Nehemiah in bringing about a religious reformation. In all this he took a chief place. His name is repeatedly coupled with Nehemiah's, while the high priest is not mentioned as taking any part in the reformation at all. Ezra is not again mentioned after Nehemiah's departure for Babylon. It may be that he himself returned to Babylon before that year.

Evidence points to Ezra's ministry taking place during the reign of Artaxerxes I (456-424 B.C.); but there are some modern critics who put Ezra after Nehemiah, holding that the sections dealing with them in the two books that bear their names have been transposed and that the Chronicler (the supposed author of the two books and of 1-2 Chronicles) blundered in the few passages that associate the two. First Esdras, a part of the OT Apocrypha, reproduces the substance of the end of 2 Chronicles, the whole of Ezra, and a part of Nehemiah, and was written somewhere near the beginning of the first century A.D. There is also an apocalyptic book known as 2 Esdras or 4 Ezra, written about A.D. 100, describing some visions granted to Ezra in the Babylonian exile. Ezra made a lasting impression on the Jewish people. His influence shaped Jewish life and thought in a way from which they never completely departed.

Ezra, Book of. One of the historical books of the OT, included among the "Writings" (Ketubim) in the threefold canon of the Hebrew Bible. It is so named because EZRA is the principal person mentioned in it; possibly also because he may be its author. It does not in its entirety claim to be the work of Ezra, but Jewish tradition says it was written by him. Supporting this view is the fact that Ezra 7-10 are written in the first person singular, while events in which he did not take part are described in the third person. The trustworthiness of the book does not, however, depend on the hypothesis that Ezra is the author. Many scholars have thought that 1-2 Chronicles, Ezra, and Nehemiah constitute one large work, compiled and edited by someone designated the Chronicler, who has been dated from 400 to 300 B.C. Certainly the strong connection between Ezra and Nehemiah is established, and in Hebrew tradition they were regarded as one book; some recent scholars, however, believe that Ezra-Nehemiah should be treated independently of 1-2 Chronicles.

The book of Ezra continues the narrative after Chronicles and records the return from BABYLON and the rebuilding of the TEMPLE. The purpose of the author is to show how God fulfilled his promise given through prophets to restore his exiled people to their own land through heathen monarchs, and raised up such great men as ZERUBBABEL, HAGGAI, ZECHARIAH, and Ezra to rebuild the temple, reestablish the old forms of worship, and put a stop to compromise with heathenism. All material that does not contribute to his purpose he stringently excludes.

As sources for the writing of the book, the author used genealogical lists, letters, royal edicts, memoirs, and chronicles. Some of these were official documents found in public records. This diversity of material accounts for the varied character of the style and for the fact that it is written in both HEBREW and ARAMAIC.

The order of the Persian kings of the period is CYRUS (538-529 B.C.), DARIUS (521-486), XERXES (486-464), and ARTAXERXES I (464-424). In view of this succession, Ezra 4:7-23 departs from the chronological order of events. The reason for this is probably that the author regarded the topical order to be more important. He brings together in one passage the successful attempts of the SAMARITANS to hinder the building of the temple and the city walls.

The period covered is from 536 B.C., when the Jews returned to Jerusalem, to 458, when Ezra came to Jerusalem to carry out his religious reforms. It thus covers a period of about seventy-eight years, although the fifteen years between 535 and 520 and the fifty-eight years between 516 and 458 are practically a blank. We have a description of selected incidents, not a continuous record of the period.

For an understanding and appreciation of the book, a few historical facts must be kept in mind. The last chapter of 2 Kings records the destruction of Jerusalem by NEBUCHADNEZZAR and the deportation of many of its inhabitants into Babylonia. There they were settled in colonies and were not mistreated as long as they were quiet subjects. Many of them prospered so well that when, later, they had an opportunity to return to their homeland, they chose not to do so. Since the temple was destroyed, they could not carry on their sacrificial system; but they continued such religious ordinances as the SABBATH and CIRCUMCISION, and gave great attention to the study of the LAW. The chapter concludes by noting that EVIL-MERODACH, in the year he became king (561 B.C.) released JEHOICHIN from prison and allowed him to eat from then on at the king's table (2 Ki. 25:27-30). This was about twenty-five years before the first events recorded in Ezra 1.

Overview of EZRA

Author: Anonymous, though Jewish tradition attributed it (as well as Chronicles and Nehemiah) to the priest EZRA.

Historical setting: The book was written possibly c. 430-400 B.C., but many date it a century later. In any case, the setting is postexilic JUDEA under Persian jurisdiction.

Purpose: To provide a historical-theological account of the restoration of Israel through the return of Hebrew exiles from BABYLON to JERUSALEM; and to encourage the people to lead a life of repentance from sin and obedience to the law.

Contents: The first part describes the return of Jewish exiles under ZERUBBABEL and JESHUA (Ezra 1-2), leading to the restoration of worship through the rebuilding of the TEMPLE (chs. 3-6); the second part details the return of additional exiles under Ezra (chs. 7-8), leading to the restoration of the community (chs. 9-10).

The EXILE was brought to a close when the Babylonian empire fell before Cyrus, king of Persia, in 538 B.C. The way in which the expectations of the Jews respecting Cyrus were fulfilled is told in the opening narrative of the book of Ezra. The return from exile did not bring with it political freedom for the Jews. They remained subjects of the Persian empire. Jerusalem and the surrounding districts were under the control of a governor, who sometimes was a Jew, but usually was not. Persian rule was in general not oppressive; but tribute was exacted for the royal treasury and the local governor. The hostile population surrounding them, especially the Samaritans, did all they could to make life miserable for them, especially by trying to bring them into disfavor with the Persian authorities. There were a few differences in the religious life of the Jews before and after the exile. Idolatry no longer tempted them—and never did again. The external features distinctive of Jewish worship and the ceremonial requirements of the laws were stressed. Prophecy became less important, scribes gradually taking the place of the prophets.

The book of Ezra consists of two parts. The first (Ezra 1-6) is a narrative of the return of the Jews from Babylonia under Zerubbabel and the restoration of worship in the rebuilt temple; the second (chs. 7-10) tells the story of a second group of exiles returning with Ezra and of Ezra's religious reforms.

Ezrah. ez'ruh (Heb. ezrāh H6477, "help"). KJV Ezra. A descendant of JUDAH who had four sons (1 Chr. 4:17). His precise place in the genealogy is not indicated.

Ezrahite. ez'ruh-hit (Heb. ezrāhî H276). A descriptive term applied to ETHAN (1 Ki. 4:31; Ps. 89 title) and HEMAN (Ps. 88 title). The term has traditionally been understood as equivalent to "descendant of Zerah," but others believe it means "aborigine, member of a pre-Israelite family."

Ezri. ez'ri (Heb. ezrî H6479, "my help"). Son of Kelub; he was an official in charge of those who farmed the royal lands during the reign of DAVID (1 Chr. 27:26).

fable. A fictitious narrative. In this general sense, the KJV uses the term to translate the Greek word mythos G3680 (“story, legend, myth”), which occurs five times in the NT (1 Tim. 1:4; 4:7; 2 Tim. 4:4; Tit. 1:14; 2 Pet. 1:16). In a narrower sense, fable refers to a narrative in which animals and inanimate objects of nature are made to act and speak as if they were human beings. Two passages in the OT may be regarded as fables (Jdg. 9:7-15; 2 Ki. 14:9); some other passages employ illustrations that approach the status of fable (Isa. 5:1-7; Ezek. 17:3-10; 19:2-14).

face. This term (which renders primarily Heb. pānîm, pl. of pāneh H7156, and Gk. prosōpon G4725) can refer not only to the front of a human head (e.g., Gen. 4:5; Jas. 1:23) but also to that of animals (Gen. 30:40 NRSV). In a figurative sense, the Bible speaks of the face of God (Num. 6:25-26) and of Christ (2 Cor. 4:6), and the term can also refer to the surface of inanimate objects, like the waters (Gen. 1:2 NRSV), the earth (1:29), the moon (Job 26:9), and the sky (Matt. 16:3 KJV). Both the Hebrew and the Greek term can refer to the whole person (2 Sam. 17:11 [NIV, “you yourself”]; 2 Cor. 1:11). It should also be noted that the Hebrew word for “nose” (ḥāp H678, e.g., Gen. 19:1) may stand for the whole countenance. The hidden face was the equivalent of disapproval or rejection (Ps. 13:1; 27:9). To spit in the face was an expression of contempt and aversion (Num. 12:14). To harden the face meant to harden oneself against any sort of appeal (Prov. 21:29 KJV). To have the face covered by another was a sign of doom (Esth. 7:8). Falling on the face symbolized prostration before man or God (Ruth 2:10). Setting the face signified determination (Lk. 9:51 KJV). To cover the face expressed mourning (Exod. 3:6).

fair. A word translating more than a dozen Hebrew and Greek words, none of which has the modern sense of blond or fair-skinned. It has the meaning of beautiful, attractive (Hos. 10:11; Acts 7:20 RSV; cf. NIV footnote); unspotted, free of defilement (Zech. 3:5 KJV); plausible, persuasive (Prov. 7:21 KJV); making a fine display (Gal. 6:12 KJV); good weather (Job 37:22 KJV; Matt. 16:12); honest, just (Jdg. 9:16; Prov. 1:3).

Fair Havens. A bay near L_{ASEA} on the S coast of C_{RETE}, about 5 mi. (8 km.) E of Cape Matala (Acts 27:8). P_{AUL}, in the custody of a centurion, sailed W from C_{NIDUS} on an Alexandrian grain ship. The weather forced them to sail on the S side of Crete and then to take refuge at Fair Havens. The harbor was not suitable to spend the winter in, so the captain decided to sail from there, with the hope of reaching P_{HOENIX}, a more secure harbor farther to the W. Failing, they drifted in the open sea for fourteen days until the shipwreck at M_{ALTA}.

fairs. This English term (now obsolete, but related to the noun fair, “market, exhibition”) means “wares, merchandise” and is used by the KJV to render a Hebrew word that occurs seven times, but only in one passage (Ezek. 27:12-33).

Distant shot of the Herodium (view to the SE). To construct this palace-fortress, Herod had to build a mountain. Referring to a different elevation, Jesus once said, “If anyone says to this mountain, ‘Go, throw yourself into the sea,’ and does not doubt in his heart but believes that what he says will happen, it will be done for him” (Mk. 11:23).

faith. The Hebrew verb meaning “to believe, trust” (ʾāman H586 in the hiphil stem) occurs fewer than fifty times in the OT, but this comparative infrequency does not adequately reflect the importance of the place of faith in the Hebrew Scriptures. The NT draws all its examples of faith from the lives of OT believers (e.g., Rom. 4:18-25; Heb. 11; Jas. 2:20-26), and P_{AUL} rests his doctrine of faith on the word of Hab. 2:4 (Rom. 1:17). It would thus be true to say that the OT demands faith more than it develops an explicit doctrine of faith. It looks for, and finds in its great individuals, a true commitment of self to God, an unwavering trust in his promises, and a persistent fidelity and obedience.

The foundation of Israel's faith was the Lord's REVELATION of himself to the PATRIARCHS and to MOSES, the COVENANT that he sealed at SINAI, and the conviction that God would keep his covenant promises. The observance of LAW and the life of faith were in no way incompatible because the law rested on the promises of God and obedience was motivated by a believing conviction that he would stand by what he had said. In connection, for example, with the sacrifices that the law commanded, we need to remind ourselves that OT believers did not offer their sacrifices with any thought in mind of the perfect sacrifice of Christ that was yet to come. They did not (at that point) think of themselves as doing something "pro tem" or as doing something that was allowed to be effective because the "real thing" was some day going to be done. They acted in simple faith in the promises of God. If asked how they knew their sins were forgiven, they would have replied, "Because he said so." In this way personal faith—in exactly the same terms as Paul later developed in the doctrine of JUSTIFICATION by faith—is the presupposition behind the provisions and prescriptions of the old covenant. Obedience to the Lord's law was the way of life incumbent on those who trusted him. OT faith is never a mere assent to a set of doctrines or the outward acceptance of a legal code, but utter confidence in the faithfulness of God and a consequent loving obedience to his will.

When used with a religious application in the OT, the object of faith is sometimes a specific word or work of God (Lam. 4:12; Hab. 1:5), or in the fact of God's revelation (Exod. 4:5; Job 9:16), or in the words or commandments of God in general (Ps. 119:66), or in God himself (Gen. 15:6). Faith is put in the word of God's prophets because they speak for him, and he is absolutely trustworthy (Exod. 19:9; 2 Chr. 20:20). NT writers, especially Paul and the author of Hebrews, show that the faith manifested by OT saints was not different in kind from that expected of Christians.

In contrast with the relative infrequency of the relevant terms in the OT, the Greek word for "faith" (pistis G4411) and "believe" (pisteuō G4409) occur in the NT almost 500 times. A principal reason for this is that the NT makes the claim that the promised MESSIAH had finally come, and, to the bewilderment of many, the form of the fulfillment did not obviously correspond to the messianic promise. It required a true act of faith to believe that the humble and crucified Jesus of Nazareth was the promised Messiah. It was not long before "to believe" meant to become a Christian. In the NT, faith therefore becomes the supreme human act and experience.

In his miracles and teaching, Jesus aimed at creating in his disciples a complete trust in himself as the Messiah and Savior of sinners. He made it plain that faith is necessary for eternal life, that it is what God required in the OT, and that refusal to accept his claims will bring eternal ruin. His primary concern with his own disciples was to build up their faith in him.

The record in Acts shows that the first Christians called themselves “the believers” (Acts 2:44) and that they went everywhere persuading men and women and bringing them into obedience to the faith that is in Jesus (6:7; 17:4; 28:24). Before long, as communities of believers arose in various parts of the Mediterranean world, the apostolic leaders had to teach them more fully the meaning and implications of the Christian faith, and so the NT books appeared.

It is in Paul’s letters that the meaning of faith is most clearly and fully set forth. Faith is trust in the person of Jesus, the truth of his teaching, and the redemptive work he accomplished at Calvary, and, as a result, a total submission to him and his message, which are accepted as from God. Faith in his person is faith in him as the eternal Son of God, the God-man, the second man or last Adam (1 Cor. 15:45, 47), who died in the sinner’s stead, making possible justification with God, adoption into his family, sanctification, and, ultimately, glorification. His death brings REDEMPTION from sin in all its aspects. The truth of his claims is attested by God’s raising him from the dead. Some day he will judge the living and the dead. Faith is not to be confused with a mere intellectual assent to the doctrinal teachings of Christianity, though that is obviously necessary. It includes a radical and total commitment to Christ as the Lord of one’s life.

Unbelief, or lack of faith in the Christian gospel, appears everywhere in the NT as the supreme evil. Not to make a decisive response to God’s offer in Christ means that the individual remains in sin and is eternally lost. Faith alone can save him.

faithfulness. An attribute or quality applied in the Bible to both God and human beings. When used of God, it has in the OT a twofold emphasis, referring first to his absolute reliability, firm constancy, and complete freedom from arbitrariness or fickleness, and also to his steadfast love and loyalty toward his people. God is constant and true in contrast to all that is not God. He is faithful in keeping his promises and is therefore worthy of trust. He is unchangeable in his ethical nature. God’s faithfulness is usually connected with his gracious promises of salvation. Faithful men and women are dependable in fulfilling their responsibilities and in carrying out their word. In the NT there are frequent exhortations to faithfulness. It is listed as a fruit of the Spirit in Gal. 5:22.

fall, the. A term used with reference to the first SIN of ADAM and EVE, who through disobedience fell from the state of integrity in which God had created them and thus brought a curse upon themselves and their descendants. The fall is narrated in Gen. 3 as a historical fact, not as a myth. It stands in a context of historical facts. Though not directly alluded to again in the OT, it is regarded as historical by the NT writers (Rom. 5:12-13; 1 Cor. 15:22; 1 Tim. 2:14). Some philosophers and theologians think the account is an ALLEGORY describing the awakening of man from a brute state of self-consciousness and personality—a fall upward, rather than downward, but such an explanation conflicts radically with biblical teaching. There is no doubt that PAUL takes the account literally and sees in the fall the origin of sin in the human race. The scriptural view of sin and of redemption takes the fall for granted.

The Scriptures teach us that man was created in the IMAGE OF GOD, with a rational and moral nature like God's, with no inner impulse or drive to sin, and with a will free to do God's will. There was, moreover, nothing in Adam and Eve's environment to compel them to sin or to make sin excusable. In these circumstances, solicitation to sin could come only from outside. The Bible does not allow us to probe the mystery of the presence of sin in God's fair universe; as in so many other things, it faces us with the practical reality, the voice of the Tempter coming from outside, the voice of the Serpent that the rest of the Bible recognizes as the voice of SATAN.

The sin that constituted the fall involved Adam and Eve in disobeying the word of God (Gen. 3:1-4) and challenging the goodness of God by imputing to him an ill motive (3:5). But chiefly it consisted in disobeying the law of God. Such was the bounty of the Creator that the whole lavish richness of the Garden of Eden was open to them with only a single condition (2:16-17). The fall was thus the breaking of the whole law of God. Equally involved in the fall was the whole of the human nature. Eve was first emotionally attracted to the forbidden fruit (3:6, "good for food and pleasing to the eye"); second, she was led into sin by a logic that contradicted the mind of God. He had said, "The tree of...knowledge...you will surely die" (2:17). Eve appears to have said to herself that a tree of knowledge was bound to make those who partake wise. It was a question of God's logic or hers. Third, the fall was an act of will: "she took...and ate it" (3:6). Emotions, mind, and will combined in the first sin. The whole law of God was broken by the whole nature of the sinner.

The effect of the fall, as Gen. 4 and the remainder of the Bible explicitly and implicitly bring out, was not merely immediate alienation from God for Adam and Eve, but guilt and depravity for all their posterity and the cursing of the earth. Redemption from the fall and its effects is accomplished through the Lord Jesus Christ (cf. Rom. 5:12-21; 1 Cor. 15:21-22, 45-49).

fallow deer. See ANIMALS.

fallow ground. Land that is left idle for a season after plowing and harrowing, so that weeds and insects are killed while the soil regains its fertility (cf. NRSV Jer. 4:3 and Hos. 10:12; NIV, “unplowed ground”). In addition, the expression “lie fallow” (NIV, “lie unplowed”) is used in Exod. 23:11, which discusses the law of the sabbatical year, prescribing one year of rest every seven years for cultivated soil.

false apostle. A description used by PAUL only in 2 Cor. 11:13, applied to certain leaders who led the Corinthian Christians astray from their “sincere and pure devotion to Christ” (v. 3) and preached “a Jesus other than the Jesus we preached” (v. 4). These false teachers boasted of their special religious prerogatives as Jews (v. 22). He also calls them “false brothers” (v. 26; Gal. 2:4). They were counterfeit apostles, but not from the circle of the apostles or apostolic men. Rather, they were members of the Judaizing party (see JUDAIZER) whose activity in the early churches gave the occasion for Paul’s classic defense of his gospel and apostleship in the letter to the GALATIANS. See also FALSE PROPHET.

false brother. See FALSE APOSTLE.

false Christ. One who makes a spurious claim to be the MESSIAH. Jesus cautioned against such impostors (Matt. 24:24; Mk. 13:22). A false messiah is distinct from an ANTICHRIST. The former is an impersonator or impostor, usurping the title or allowing others to herald him as such. The latter, mentioned only by John (1 Jn. 2:18, 22; 4:3; 2 Jn. 7), indicates not impersonation as much as opposition by one who is against Christ.

false prophet. MOSES ordered the death of any PROPHET advocating the worship of another god (Deut. 13:1-4). During the monarchy, false prophets were often in the majority in the court of Israel. The 800 prophets of AHAB openly advocated the worship of BAAL and ASHERAH (1 Ki. 18:20). Later, 400 prophets, influenced by a lying spirit, assured Ahab of victory at RAMOTH GILEAD, only to be contradicted by MICAIAH, the true prophet (22:6-23). Frequently, lying prophets told the leaders what they wanted to hear (Jer. 5:31; Lk. 6:26). In the NT false prophets are often mentioned (1 Jn. 4:1) and are compared with wolves in sheep’s clothing (Matt. 7:15) and false teachers (2 Pet. 2:1). The false prophet BAR-JESUS was smitten with blindness by PAUL (Acts 13:6, 11). Christ warned of false prophets whose miracles would deceive many in the end (Matt. 24:24; Mk. 13:22). In Rev. 13:12-14 and 19:20, the master false prophet is described. He will support the beast through powerful signs before his destruction.

false testimony, false witness. Bearing false testimony, particularly in court, is banned in the OT laws (Exod. 20:16; 23:1; Deut. 5:20), and the false witness is subject to the penalty he intended to inflict on the accused (Deut. 19:16-21). Twice God is said to hate false witnesses (Prov. 6:19; Zech. 8:17). Jeremiah condemns those who swear falsely, even though they say, “As surely as the LORD lives” (Jer. 5:2). Note also the warning against taking the Lord’s name in vain (Exod. 20:7). See LIE; OATH.

familiar spirit. This term is used by the KJV to render Hebrew ʾôb H200, which modern versions usually translate “medium.” The Hebrew word appears to refer to the spirit of a dead person, which a medium, in the form of magic known as necromancy, claimed to summon to consultation (Deut. 18:11; see DIVINATION). In necromancy, in which the dead were consulted about the future, it was believed that either a spirit dwelt in the controlling medium (Lev. 20:27) or that the medium had fellowship with a spirit from whom she could receive information. The Mosaic law forbade the consulting of familiar spirits, and mediums were commanded to be put to death (Lev. 19:31; 20:6, 27; Deut. 18:11). Mediums seem to have deceived their inquirers by speaking in a thin weak voice, as though it came from the ground or from a bottle (Isa. 8:19; 29:4). King SAUL put away the mediums early in his reign, but, greatly worried about the outcome of his last battle, he consulted the witch of ENDOR and asked to speak to the prophet SAMUEL (1 Sam. 28:3, 7-9; 1 Chr. 10:13). It appears that Saul was told by the witch that she saw Samuel, and Saul himself entered into the conversation with the prophet. In the NT, Acts 16:16-18 tells of a slave girl who was a medium and brought her owners much gain by her divination.

family. The fundamental unity of human society and the center of God’s COVENANT activity.

I. The general nature of the family. The Hebrew term mišpāḥâ H5476, having no exact equivalent in English, should be interpreted principally as “household.” Another term for family, bayit H1074 (lit., “house”), included all those living within the confines and jurisdiction of the dwelling. In a patriarchal setting the father was the head of the family, having authority over his wife, children, unmarried daughters, and sometimes married sons and their families, as well as cousins and their families and possibly grandparents and even great-grandparents (Gen. 46:8-26). Additional members of the household also included in the category of family would be concubines, servants, slaves, visitors, and occasionally prisoners of war. Some polygamy was practiced, and this also made the family unit more extensive.

In a wider sense, family could also mean clan, tribe, or village; and phrases such as “house of David” (Isa. 7:13) or “house of Israel” (Ezek. 9:9; 18:30) show that in broader terms the household could encompass the entire nation. Some families returning from EXILE in BABYLON comprised several hundred members (Ezra 8:1-14).

A common bond of blood bound together the members of the larger family or clan, who referred to each other as “brothers” (1 Sam. 20:29). Members of the clan accepted a communal responsibility for assistance, protection, the sharing of work, loyalty, and cooperation for the general well-being of the family. In places where the nomadic life gave way to a more settled existence, groups of villages (often interdependent and with intermarried members) formed a “family,” as did the Danites at ZOREH and ESHTAOL (Jdg. 18:11). When arts and crafts developed, sons acquired skills from their fathers, and villages devoted to a particular type of production—such as wood or ironworking, linen or pottery (1 Chr. 4:14; cf. 4:21, 23; Neh. 11:35)—became common. With specialization, however, came a loss of the former self-sufficiency of the family and an increased interdependence on the producers of food and other goods.

In general, city life tended to fragment the family, and the size of the houses excavated indicates that in later times the family unit consisted only of father, mother, and children. During the kingdom, as family ties loosened, so the absolute authority and responsibility of the father was transferred to the king. By the eighth century B.C., the individual, instead of working primarily for the good of the larger group, worked for his immediate family and for the ultimate benefit of the king or nation. Not surprisingly, as the focus of the family unit sharpened, the sense of communal responsibility lessened, and biblical reminders concerning obligations toward widows and orphans became more frequent (Isa. 1:17; Jer. 7:6). Family blood feuds declined as revenge for the honor of members of the wider family was no longer usual, though it was sometimes practiced and expected (2 Sam. 3:27; 16:8; 2 Ki. 9:26; Neh. 4:14).

By virtue of marriage, the husband and wife were regarded as being akin, and their children were legitimate family members. Close kinship was an obstacle to marriage in the clan or tribe, and Lev. 18:6-17 provided a list of degrees of relationship within which marriage was prohibited. One exception to this rule was the so-called LEVIRATE (i.e., husband’s brother’s) marriage (Deut. 25:5-10), in which a man was expected to marry the wife of a childless deceased brother so as to perpetuate his family name by means of children.

Refusal to comply with this requirement brought shame upon the offender's house.

The family functioned as an essential unit of the religious community. The father was the spiritual head of the family and acted as the priest within the household. He was responsible for leading religious observances and for instructing the family in the religious and secular history of the Israelites, as well as in their manners and customs. The father maintained the family altar and ensured the religious observances and piety of the entire family. The religious observances and festivals were frequently family-oriented, particularly the Passover, which was observed as a religious family meal and thank offering (Exod. 12:3-4, 46). In patriarchal times, before worship was centralized in the TEMPLE, it was the fathers that offered sacrifice to God (Gen. 31:54). The supreme position of religious and secular authority that the father had helps to clarify the subsequent reverence for his grave.

In the Gospels, little reference is made to the family, except to reinforce monogamous MARRIAGE and to denounce DIVORCE (Matt. 5:27-32; 19:3-12; Mk. 10:2-12; Lk. 16:18). While a child, CHRIST set an example of obedience to parents, with whom he evidently remained until the beginning of his ministry, his brothers not understanding him (Matt. 10:36; Jn. 7:1-8). It is PAUL, however, who reinforces the duties of the family members (Eph. 5:22—6:9; Col. 3:18-22). He reiterates the financial responsibility of the members towards each other (1 Tim. 5:4, 8) and the importance of teaching religion in the home (Eph. 6:4). Also, in several of his epistles, Paul refers to the role of women in the family (1 Cor. 11:3; Eph. 5:22-24, 33; Col. 3:18; cf. also 1 Pet. 3:1-7). In Roman times, family ties loosened still further with the gradual disintegration of society. In the early church, however—where, in the absence of a church building, services took place in a private home—converts were often entire families (2 Tim. 1:5) or all the members of the household (Acts 16:15, 31-34).

II. Roles of family members

A. Father: provider, procreator of children, master, teacher, priest. In nomadic times the father, by means of his authority, held the family group together and became the symbol of their security in the encampment. His powers over the family members was awesome. His decisions could mean life or death; and as his status was unquestioned, he demanded respect and obedience. His responsibilities were extensive both within and beyond the family unit. In addition to providing for his own family security, he was expected from the time of the kingdom period to send his sons to defend the nation. Throughout biblical times the father was responsible for the economic well-being of those over whom he had authority. The entire family could be sold for falling into debt, and uncles and cousins would be expected to prevent family property from passing into outside hands (Lev. 25:25; Jer. 32:6-15). The father was also responsible for teaching his sons a trade, frequently his own, so that they would be productive members of both the family and society.

The teachings of Hebrew history, religion, law, and custom were passed on from father to son in the family setting (Exod. 10:2; 12:26; Deut. 4:9; 6:7) and reinforced by the many rites celebrated within the house, often associated with the family meal. All such occasions—whether in celebration of the Passover, some lesser feast, or an ordinary family meal—reinforced the faith, heritage, and nationalism of the family, as well as their own unity as a group. As the sons grew older it was the father's responsibility to find them suitable wives.

B. Mother: child-bearer, household manager, teacher. The list of a man's possessions included his wife, servants, slaves, goods, and animals (Exod. 20:17; Deut. 5:21). Even the phrase "to marry a wife" comes from a phrase that means "to become the master of a wife" (Deut. 21:13; 24:1). Although she would even address the husband in subservient terms, the status of the wife was higher than that of the rest of the household.

The primary responsibility of the mother was to produce children, preferably sons. A large number of sons, who became workers from an early age, ensured the future economic prosperity and security of the family. The maximum number of children was normally seven. Babies were weaned at approximately three years of age, and husband and wife did not normally have sexual relations between the child's birth and the completion of the weaning process.

Throughout her life a woman was subject to the protecting authority of a male relative—as a daughter, that of her father, and as a wife, that of her husband. If she became a widow, her nearest male relative became her protector, and under the levirate marriage provisions he could also be her "redeemer." Under such conditions the woman was subject to the man's authority.

The bride-price paid by the betrothed male to his fiancée's father, though not directly a "purchase price," was intended to compensate the father for the loss of his daughter's services. Because of the exchange of money on most occasions, the bride was left with the stigma of having been sold to her future husband (cf. Gen. 29:18, 27; Exod. 22:16-17; 1 Sam. 18:25; 2 Sam. 3:14). After the wedding the bride normally went to live with her husband's family. Thus she became part of that extended family group and was subject to its authority. Aside from the primary duty of childbearing (Gen. 1:28; 9:1), the wife's main responsibility was the organization of the household. This was her domain, and she was generally a respected manager. All aspects of food, from the collecting of olives and dates to the grinding of corn and cooking, were her responsibility, as well as the spinning and weaving of thread, the making of clothing, and the care of domestic animals.

The young children remained with their mother, and she was responsible for teaching the boys until they were about six years old, after which time they were likely to take on their own roles either as shepherds or goatherds. Some boys spent their days in the company of their father, whose skills they acquired by observation and practice. The daughters remained with their mother, who trained them in the arts of cooking, spinning, weaving, and general household management, as well as schooling them in their future roles as wives and mothers. When the wife provided a son, her position was a little more secure. Prior to that it was somewhat precarious. She could be divorced for any apparent offense (cf. Sir. 25:26). In early times, when polygamy was still practiced, the wife could find herself replaced by a second wife or sometimes by a CONCUBINE. Nevertheless, despite the status of the mother, her role in actual fact was not as difficult as it might seem. In many families her opinion was sought in decision making, and her ideas were respected (Exod. 20:12; Prov. 19:26; 20:20; Sir. 3:1-16).

By Persian times the status of the wife was showing definite improvement. She had her own position at games, the theaters, and religious festivals, often assisted her husband in business, and was known at times to manage her own property. In the NT one such woman, LYDIA of Thyatira (Acts 16:24), operated a textile business out of her own home.

C. Sons and daughters: status, childhood, education, and duties. The law of primogeniture provided a double portion of the inheritance as the birthright of the eldest son (Deut. 21:17). He always took precedence over his brothers and sisters (Gen. 43:33), and the elder of twins, even if only by a few minutes, could also hold this premier position with all its attendant privileges (25:24-26; 38:27-30). The right to primogeniture could be forfeited as a result of a serious offense (Gen. 35:22; 49:3-4; 1 Chr. 5:1), surrendered voluntarily, or sold, as ESAU did to his brother JACOB (Gen. 25:29-34). DAVID gave his kingdom to his youngest son, SOLOMON (1 Ki. 2:15), despite a law protecting the eldest son from the favoritism of a father toward a younger brother (Deut. 21:15-17). In a family that had no sons, property could be inherited by a daughter (Num. 27:8).

The inferior status of a daughter in patriarchal society is depicted clearly. She could be sold into slavery or into concubinage and then possibly resold (Exod. 21:7-11). Even her very life was at the disposition of her father. Both sons and daughters could be put to death for disobeying the head of the household. ABRAHAM was prepared to sacrifice his son ISAAC (Gen. 22:1-14). JUDAH ordered the burning of TAMAR on suspicion that she, a widow, was having sexual relations with a man who was not of her late husband's family (Gen. 38:11-26), when she would normally have been expected to marry a relative of her husband and was, in fact, promised to his brother.

With the coming of the Mosaic law, a father could no longer put his child to death without referring the case to the authorities. Thus the elders heard accusations of disobedience, gluttony, and drunkenness, which, on conviction, were punishable with death by stoning (Deut. 21:20-21). Children, however, could no longer be held responsible for the crimes of their parents (24:16). By the time of David, there was the right of ultimate appeal to the monarch himself (2 Sam. 14:4-11).

Frequently, neither sons nor daughters were consulted when marriage partners were being selected for them. A marriage was often an alliance or contract between families, the wishes of the individual being regarded as unworthy of consideration. Although loved and valued, children were not pampered (Sir. 30:9-12). As family disciplinarian, the father spared neither the rod nor the whip (Prov. 13:24; 22:15; 29:15-17). In postexilic times, a son's more formal education took place within the precincts of the synagogue, and just prior to the time of Christ a form of general education was introduced into Palestine.

Childhood was brief, although boys and girls laughed, played, and sang. Some of them had whistles, rattles, and dolls, while the young ones sat on their mother's lap (Isa. 66:12). In later Judaism a boy's coming of age was celebrated in a manner that reinforced his position within the home and also within the religious family of the synagogue. As soon as they were old enough, both boys and girls were expected to gather fuel (Jer. 7:18), care for cattle, and tend the flocks.

Protecting sheep from wild beasts and from the danger of injuring themselves in the mountain crevices, finding them good pasture and water, and carrying them home when sick or injured, was neither a light task nor a small responsibility (Gen. 29:6; Exod. 2:16; 1 Sam. 16:11). Young boys and girls would often follow their fathers to the fields to watch and help, but more often the girls would be learning the household skills from their mothers. One of the most menial and arduous tasks was that of fetching water, often from some considerable distance, and this was the responsibility of the mother or the daughter. Young girls were by no means secluded; rather, they were free to go about unveiled and visit with friends and neighbors (Gen. 34:1).

Bearing in mind that all members of the household were subject to the strict authority of the head of the family, it is not surprising that as the household became smaller in postexilic times, it became the practice (where it was feasible practically and economically) for the married sons to move out of the patriarchal home and to set up their own family units.

III. Figurative use. The concept of family in its broadest and most figurative sense is seen in the phrase “house of Israel” (Isa. 5:7), meaning the entire nation. In the OT, the relationship between God and Israel is seen in such family terms as “bride” (Jer. 2:1), “daughter” (8:19; 31:22), “children” (3:14), or “betrothal” (Hos. 2:19-20). In the NT, the bridal imagery describing the relationship between Christ and the church is continued (2 Cor. 11:2; Eph. 5:25-33; Rev. 19:7; 21:9) and is given deep spiritual emphasis, and the CHURCH is referred to as the household of God (Gal. 6:10; Eph. 2:19; 3:15; 1 Pet. 4:17).

famine. An acute and prolonged food shortage (Heb. rā'āb H8280 and Gk. limos G3350, both of which can also be translated “hunger”). In ancient times in PALESTINE and EGYPT, famines were not infrequent. They were produced by lack of rainfall in due season, destructive hail storms and rain out of season, destruction of crops by locusts and caterpillars, and the cutting off of food supplies by a siege. Pestilence often followed, and the suffering was great. Famines that were the result of natural causes are recorded as occurring in the time of ABRAHAM (who left Canaan and stayed in Egypt, Gen. 12:10), JOSEPH (when famine “had spread over the whole country,” 41:56), the judges (Ruth 1:1), DAVID (2 Sam. 21:1), AHAB and ELIJAH (1 Ki. 17:1; 18:2), ELISHA (2 Ki. 4:38; Lk. 4:25), and NEHEMIAH (Neh. 5:3). Famines were caused in SAMARIA and JERUSALEM when these cities came under siege (2 Ki. 6:25; 25:3). The NT speaks of a famine “over the entire Roman world” (Acts 11:28) during the reign of CLAUDIUS. In the Olivet Discourse, Jesus predicted famines in various places (Matt. 24:7; Mk. 13:8; Lk. 21:11), a prophecy believed to be partly fulfilled in the siege of JERUSALEM by the Roman general Titus. Famines are sometimes said to be sent as punishments, and sometimes they are threatened as such (Lev. 26:19-20; Deut. 28:49-51; 2 Ki. 8:1; Isa. 14:30; 51:19; Jer. 14:12, 15; Ezek. 5:16). To be preserved in time of famine is a special mark of God’s favor and power (Job 5:20; Ps. 33:19; 37:19). Sometimes the word famine is used in a figurative sense, as when Amos says that God will send a famine, not of bread and water, but “a famine of hearing the words of the LORD” (Amos 8:11).

farming. The Israelites in the time of the PATRIARCHS were a nomadic people. They first learned AGRICULTURE in PALESTINE after the conquest of CANAAN. After that a large proportion of the people were engaged in agrarian pursuits. The page470"indent">Agriculture was the background for the legislation of Israel. At the time of the conquest every family probably received a piece of land, marked off by stones that could not be removed lawfully (Deut. 19:14; 27:17; Hos. 5:10). On the year of JUBILEE those who had lost their ancestral estates recovered possession of them. Terracing was necessary to make use of soil on the hillsides. Irrigation was not required, since there was usually sufficient rainfall (see RAIN). Aside from the NEGEV and other desert regions, the soil of Palestine was generally fertile. Fertilizing was almost unknown. To maintain the fertility of the land, the law required that farms, vineyards, and olive orchards were to lie fallow in the seventh year (Exod. 23:10).

Plowing to prepare the land for sowing was done in autumn, when the early rains softened the ground that had become stone-hard in the summer sun. This was done with a crude wooden PLOW drawn by oxen or, if the soil was thin, with a mattock. With such implements the surface of the ground was hardly more than scratched (perhaps 3-4 in./8-10 cm.). Little harrowing was done and was probably unknown in Palestine in early times.

Modern farmer still using an ancient technique for plowing his field.

The summer grain was sown between the end of January and the end of February. Usually the seed was scattered by hand from a basket, but careful farmers put it in furrows in rows (Isa. 28:25). Between sowing and reaping, the crops were exposed to several dangers: the failure of the latter rain, which came in March and April; the hot, drying easterly winds that often came in March and April (Gen. 41:6); hail storms (Hag. 2:17); various kinds of weeds like tares and thorns (Jer. 12:13; Matt. 13:7, 25); injurious insects, especially the palmerworm, the cankerworm, the caterpillar, and the locust (Amos 7:2); the thefts of crows and sparrows (Matt. 13:4); and fungus diseases, especially mildew (Deut. 28:22). As the harvest season approached, particularly valuable crops were protected by watchmen (Jer. 4:17); but the law permitted a hungry person to pick grain when passing by (Deut. 23:25; Matt. 12:1).

The time of HARVEST varied somewhat according to the climatic condition of each region, but usually began about the middle of April with the coming of the dry season. Barley was the first grain to be cut, and this was followed a few weeks later with wheat. The grain harvest generally lasted about seven weeks, from Passover to Pentecost. Whole families moved out of their village homes to live in the fields until the harvest was over. The grain was cut with a sickle and laid in swaths behind the reaper. It was then bound into sheaves and gathered into shocks (Exod. 22:6). In the interest of the POOR, the law forbade a field to be harvested to its limits.

The grain was threshed in the open air, a custom made possible because the harvest season was free from rain (2 Ki. 13:7). During the threshing time the grain was guarded by harvesters who spent the nights on the threshing floor (Ruth 3:6). The threshing floor was constructed in an exposed position in the fields, preferably on a slight elevation, so as to get the full benefit of the winds. It consisted of a circular area 25-40 ft. (8-12 m.) in diameter, sloping slightly upward at the edges, and was usually surrounded with a border of stones to keep in the grain. The floor was level and hard. The sheaves of grain, brought in from the fields on the backs of men and animals, were heaped in the center. From this heap, sheaves were spread out on the floor; and then either several animals tied abreast were driven round and round the floor or two oxen were yoked together to a threshing machine, which they dragged in a circular path over the grain until the kernels of grain were separated from the stalks. The threshing machines were of two kinds, a board with the bottom studded with small stones or nails, or a kind of threshing wagon. While this was going on, the partly threshed grain was turned over with a fork. After that the grain was winnowed by tossing the grain and chaff into the air with a wooden fork or shovel so that the wind might blow away the chaff. This was usually done at night, to take advantage of the night breezes. The chaff was either burned or left to be scattered by the winds. The grain was then sifted with a sieve to remove stones and other impurities, and collected into pits or barns (Lk. 12:18).

fasting. The act of abstaining from food, especially for religious purposes. The only fast required by the Mosaic law was that of the Day of Atonement (Lev. 16:29, 31; 23:27-32; Num. 29:7; KJV, “afflict your souls”; NIV, “deny yourselves”). See ATONEMENT, DAY OF. Throughout the OT period, however, there are many examples of fasts on special occasions, held because of transgression or to ward off present or impending calamity. SAMUEL called for such a fast (1 Sam. 7:6); JEHOIAKIM proclaimed a fast after BARUCH had read the condemnatory word of the Lord given through JEREMIAH (Jer. 36:9); JEZEBEL hypocritically called a fast when she sought to secure NABOTH’s vineyard (1 Ki. 21:9, 12). We read of individuals who were moved to fast—for example, DAVID, when his child became ill (2 Sam. 12:16, 21-23), and AHAB on hearing his doom (1 Ki. 21:27).

After the EXILE, four annual fasts were held in memory of the national calamities through which the nation had passed. They are mentioned only in Zech. 7:1-7; 8:19. These fasts, established during the captivity, were held in the fourth, fifth, seventh, and tenth months. By the time of Christ they had fallen into disuse and were not revived until after the destruction of Jerusalem by the Romans. In rabbinic times the Feast of Purim, the origin of which is explained in the book of Esther (Esth. 9:31-32), was accompanied by a fast in commemoration of the fast of ESTHER, MORDECAI, and the Jews (4:1-3, 15-17). The OT gives a number of instances of other fasts in which the whole people joined (Ezra 8:21-23; Neh. 9:1). Examples of fasts by individuals are given in Neh. 1:4 and Dan. 9:3. A fast of great strictness was proclaimed by the heathen king of NINEVEH to avert the destruction threatened by the Lord through JONAH (Jon. 3:5).

DAYS OF FASTING IN THE JEWISH SACRED YEAR
17 Tammuz (Jun-Jul)	Breaking through the walls of Jerusalem (Second Temple).
9 Ab (Jul-Aug)	Destruction of the Temple.
3 Tishri (Sept-Oct)	Fast of Gedaliah.
10 Tishri	Day of Atonement.
10 Tebeth (Dec-Jan)	Beginning of the siege on Jerusalem (Second Temple).
13 Adar (Feb-Mar)	Fast of Esther.

Fasting among the Israelites was either partial or total, depending on the length of the fast. When DANIEL mourned three full weeks, he ate no “choice food; no meat or wine touched my lips” (Dan. 10:2-3). Another longer fast is mentioned in Neh. 1:4. The fast on the Day of Atonement was “from the evening...until the following evening” (Lev. 23:32); and no food or drink was taken. Other daylong fasts were from morning till evening. The fasts of MOSES and ELIJAH for forty days were exceptional (Exod. 34:28; 1 Ki. 19:8).

Religious fasting was observed as a sign of MOURNING for sin, with the object of deprecating divine wrath or winning divine compassion. The prophets often condemn the abuse of the custom, for Israelites superstitiously thought that it had value even when not accompanied by purity and righteousness of life (Isa. 58:3-7; Jer. 14:10-12; Zech. 7-8). Fasts were not necessarily religious in nature. They were commonplace when someone near and dear died, as when the inhabitants of JABESH fasted after they had buried SAUL and JONATHAN (1 Sam. 31:13) and after the death of ABNER (2 Sam. 1:12).

There are few references to fasting in the Gospels, but what is said shows that frequent fasts were customary with those Jews who desired to lead a specially religious life. We are told that ANNA “worshiped night and day, fasting and praying” (Lk. 2:37). Again, the PHARISEE in the parable says, “I fast twice a week” (18:12). Jesus fasted for forty days in the wilderness, but it is not clear whether this fast was voluntary or not. There is no reason to doubt that he observed the usual prescribed public fasts, but neither by practice nor by precept did he stress fasting. Jesus was so unascetic in his ordinary mode of life that he was reproached with being “a glutton and a drunkard” (Matt. 11:19; Lk. 7:34). The references to fasting in Matt. 17:21 and Mk. 9:29 do not occur in the earliest MSS (cf. NIV mg.). Jesus did speak of fasting on two occasions recorded in the Gospels:

Matt. 6:16-18. Here voluntary fasting is presupposed as a religious exercise, but Jesus warns against making it an occasion for a parade of piety. The important thing is purity and honesty of intention. Fasting should be to God, not to impress human beings. Jesus approves of fasting if it is an expression of inner contrition and devotion. The externalism of the Pharisees had its own reward.

Matt. 9:14-17 (parallels Mk. 2:18-22; Lk. 5:33-39). In this incident the disciples of John and of the Pharisees ask Jesus, “How is it that we and the Pharisees fast, but your disciples do not fast?” Jesus replies that fasting, which is a sign of mourning, would be inconsistent with the joy that should characterize those who know that the MESSIAH has finally come and is now with them. The time will come, however, when he will be taken away, and then his disciples will mourn. Jesus here sanctions fasting, as he does in the Sermon on the Mount; but he refuses to force it on his disciples. In the parables of the old wineskins and the old garment he shows that fasting belongs to the body of old observances and customs and is not congruous with the liberty of the gospel. The new era that he inaugurates must have new forms of its own.

The book of Acts has a few direct references to fasting. The church at ANTIOCH fasted and prayed before sending out PAUL and BARNABAS as missionaries (Acts 13:2-3). On Paul’s first missionary journey, elders were appointed in every church, with prayer and fasting (14:23). The reference to the fasting of CORNELIUS

(10:30), found in KJV and many MSS, is omitted by the NIV and other modern versions. The only other direct references to fasting in the NT are found in 2 Cor. 6:5 and 11:27, where Paul describes his sufferings for Christ; and here, most likely, he has in mind involuntary fasting.

fat, fatted. The first reference to fat in the Bible is in Genesis: “Abel brought fat portions from some of the firstborn of his flock. The LORD looked with favor on Abel and his offering” (Gen. 4:4; see ABEL). According to the Mosaic law, all the fat of sacrificed animals belonged to the Lord and was burned as an offering to him, “a pleasing aroma” (Lev. 3:14-16; 7:30). The fatty portions are specified in Lev. 3-7 as the fat of the entrails, of the kidneys, and of the liver, and also the tail of the sheep. The fat had to be offered on the day the animal was sacrificed (Exod. 23:18). It is sometimes asserted that the eating of any fat was forbidden to the Israelites; however, the prohibition did not apply to animals slain solely for food, but only to specified parts of sacrificed animals (Deut. 12:15, 16, 21-24). A “fatling” (e.g., 2 Sam. 6:13 NRSV) was a young animal fattened for slaughter (cf. the references to “fatted” calves, 1 Sam. 18:24; Lk. 15:23; et al.). The word fat is sometimes used in a figurative sense to signify the best part of anything, for example, “the fat of the land” (Gen. 45:18), “the fat of wheat” (Ps. 81:16 lit.; NIV, “the finest of wheat”). (Note that the KJV also uses the now archaic terms fat and winefat with the meanings “vat” and “winepress”; see Joel 2:24; 3:13; Isa. 63:2; Mk. 12:1.) See SACRIFICE AND OFFERINGS.

fate. See DESTINY.

father. A male parent or ancestor (Heb. ʾāb H3; Gk. patēr G4252). In the Hebrew FAMILY the father had absolute rights over his children. He could sell them into slavery and have them put to death. Reverence and obedience by children is prescribed from the earliest times (Exod. 20:12; Lev. 19:3; Deut. 5:16). The Scriptures many times set forth the character and duties of an ideal father (e.g., Deut. 4:9; 6:7; 31:13; Prov. 22:6; Isa. 28:9). The term is used also of both immediate and remote ancestors. It may refer to a grandfather, as when ABRAHAM is called JACOB’s father (Gen. 28:13). More broadly, God told Abraham that he would be the “father of many nations” (17:4). The founders of the Hebrew race, the PATRIARCHS, are referred to as its fathers (Rom. 9:5 KJV); so also heads of clans (Exod. 6:14; 1 Chr. 27:1).

In addition, the word has many figurative and derived uses: a spiritual ancestor, whether good or bad (e.g., Abraham, “the father of all who believe,” Rom. 4:11; and the devil, “You belong to your father, the devil,” Jn. 8:44); the originator of a mode of life (“Jabal...the father of those who live in tents and raise livestock,” Gen. 4:20); one who exhibits paternal kindness and wisdom to another (Jdg. 17:10); a revered superior, especially a prophet and an elderly and venerable man (1 Sam. 10:12; 1 Jn. 2:13); royal advisors and prime ministers (Gen. 45:8); a source (“Does the rain have a father?” Job 38:28).

God is Father: As Creator of the universe, “the Father of the heavenly lights” (Jas. 1:17); as Creator of the human race, “Have we not all one father?” (Mal. 2:10); as one who begets and takes care of his spiritual children, “you received the Spirit of sonship. And by him we cry, ‘Abba, Father’” (Rom. 8:15). See ABBA. In a special and unique sense, God is the Father of Jesus Christ (Matt. 11:26; Mk. 14:36; Lk. 22:42).

fear. This word in English has two principal meanings: (1) an apprehension of evil that normally leads one either to flee or to fight and (2) awe and reverence that a person of sense feels in the presence of God and, to a less extent, in the presence of a king or other dread authority. A child feels the first of these in the presence of a cruel parent and feels the second before one who is good but who must also be just. Several Hebrew words are translated “fear” in the OT, especially the verb yārē H3710 and its cognates. The corresponding Greek verb is phobeomai G5828; noun phobos G5832.

The most prevalent use of this concept in the Bible is the fear of God. The majesty and HOLINESS of God cannot but incite fear in human beings (Job 37:22-24). The phrases “the fear of God” and “the fear of the Lord” occur frequently in the Bible, particularly in the OT. The Hebrew deity was awesome, so naturally the Israelites were constantly called on to “fear the LORD your God and serve him” (Deut. 10:20; note that “serve” helps to define “fear”). The admonition was an instrument with two edges, rewards and restraints. “The fear of God” is synonymous with true religion, and therefore rewarding. It was considered so as early as ABRAHAM’s day. When that patriarch misrepresented his wife SARAH to ABIMELECH, he gave as his reason, “I said to myself, ‘There is surely no fear of God in this place’” (Gen. 20:11). “The fear of God” was required in the following ways: by keeping his commandments (Exod. 20:20); by serving him and keeping his statutes (Deut. 6:13, 24); by hearkening to his voice (1 Sam. 12:14); and by worshiping in his temple (Ps. 5:7).

There is also a fear that debilitates and demoralizes. The wicked person is destroyed by his fears (cf. Prov. 28:1). Fear can take its toll among good people (cf. Jn. 19:38). God said to Abraham, “Do not be afraid, Abram. I am your shield, your very great reward” (Gen. 15:1). DAVID exclaimed triumphantly, “I fear no evil, for you are with me” (Ps. 23:4). Divine visible presence, after the first startling moments, always dispelled fears (Exod. 3:6; Lk. 1:30; 2:10; Matt. 14:27; 17:6-7). Though the awesome nature of God will never diminish, his Fatherly LOVE has been manifested through Jesus. His tenderness has replaced terror. Consequently, John could give the Christian antidote for fear: “There is no fear in love. But perfect love drives out fear, because fear has to do with punishment. The one who fears is not made perfect in love” (1 Jn. 4:18). The Christian should have no fear of hunger, nakedness, sickness, suffering, wicked people, death, nor judgment. All have lost their power of fear in the love of Christ. “Do not be afraid, little flock, for your Father has been pleased to give you the kingdom” (Lk. 12:32).

Fear of Isaac. This expression appears twice in Scripture (Gen. 31:42, 53; in the latter passage, “the Fear of his father Isaac”). It is generally thought to be a name for God, pointing to his protective care and power, which inspires terror in his enemies. A few scholars have argued that in these passages the Hebrew term for “fear” (paḥad H7065) has a different meaning, such as “kinsman” or “thigh” (the latter sense supposedly being related to oath-making; cf. Gen. 24:2, where a different word is used).

feasts. Sacred festivals held an important place in Jewish religion. They were religious services accompanied by demonstrations of joy and gladness. In Lev. 23, where they are described most fully, they are called “sacred assemblies” (KJV, “holy convocations”). Their times, except for the two instituted after the EXILE, were fixed by divine appointment. Their purpose was to promote spiritual interests of the community. The people met in holy fellowship for acts and purposes of sacred worship. They met before God in holy assemblies.

I. The weekly Sabbath (Lev. 23:3). This celebration stood at the head of the sacred seasons. The holy meetings by which the SABBATH was distinguished were quite local. Families and other small groups assembled under the guidance of Levites or elders and engaged in common acts of devotion, the forms and manner of which were not prescribed. Little is known of where or how the people met before the captivity, but after it they met in SYNAGOGUES and were led in worship by teachers learned in the law.

II. The Passover, or the Feast of Unleavened Bread (Lev. 23:4-8). The Passover was the first of all the annual feasts, and historically and religiously it was the most important of all. It was called both the Feast of the Passover and the Feast of Unleavened Bread, the two really forming a double festival. It was celebrated on the first month of the religious year, on the fourteenth of Nisan (our April), and commemorated the deliverance of the Jews from Egypt and the establishment of Israel as a nation by God's redemptive act. The Feast of Unleavened Bread began on the day after the Passover and lasted seven days (23:5-8). This combined feast was one of the three that all male Jews who were physically able and ceremonially clean were required by the Mosaic law to attend (Exod. 23:17; Deut. 16:16). The other two were the Feast of Weeks, or Pentecost, and the Feast of Tabernacles. These were known as the pilgrimage festivals; on all of them special sacrifices were offered, varying according to the character of the festival (Num. 28-29).

A sukkah made from palm fronds. The Israelites built such shelters during the Feast of Tabernacles or Booths (Sukkoth).

Theologically the Passover finds its heart in the doctrine of PROPITIATION. The Lord entered Egypt bent on judgment (Exod. 12:12); but, seeing the blood, he passed over that house completely at peace with those who were sheltering there. His wrath was assuaged by the blood of the lamb.

III. The Feast of Pentecost (Lev. 23:15-21). Other names for Pentecost are the Feast of Weeks, the Day of the Firstfruits, and the Feast of Harvests. It was celebrated on the sixth day of the month of Sivan (May–June), seven weeks after the offering of the wave sheaf after the Passover. The name Pentecost (from a Gk. word meaning “fiftieth”) originated from the fact that there was an interval of fifty days between the two feasts. The feast lasted a single day (Deut. 16:9-12) and marked the completion of the wheat ^{HARVEST}. The characteristic ritual of this feast was the offering and waving of two loaves of leavened bread, made from ripe grain that had just been harvested. This was done by the priest in the name of the congregation. In addition to these wave offerings, the people were to give the Lord an offering of the firstfruits of their produce. The amount of the offering was not designated.

IV. The Feast of Trumpets or New Moon (Lev. 23:23-25). This celebration was held on the first day of the seventh month, Tishri (Sept.–Oct.), which began the civil year of the Jews. It corresponded to our New Year’s Day, and on it, from morning to evening, horns and trumpets were blown. After the exile the day was observed by the public reading of the law and by general rejoicing.

V. The Day of Atonement (Lev. 23:26-32). This sacred event was observed on the tenth day of Tishri. It was really less a feast than a fast, as the distinctive character and purpose of the day was to bring the collective sin of the whole year to remembrance so that it might earnestly be dealt with and atoned for. On this day the high priest made confession of all the sins of the community and entered on their behalf into the Most Holy Place with the blood of reconciliation. It was a solemn occasion, when God’s people through godly sorrow and atonement for sin entered into the rest of God’s mercy and favor. In receiving his forgiveness, they could rejoice before him and carry out his commandments.

VI. The Feast of Tabernacles (Lev. 23:33-43). Also called the Feast of Booths or Ingathering, this was the last of the sacred festivals under the old covenant in preexilic times. It began five days after the Day of Atonement (Lev. 23:34; Deut. 16:13) and lasted seven days. It marked the completion of the harvest and historically commemorated the wanderings in the wilderness. During this festival people lived in booths and tents to remind themselves of how their forefathers wandered in the wilderness and lived in booths. The sacrifices of this feast were more numerous than at any other. The last day of the feast marked the conclusion of the ecclesiastical year. The whole feast was popular and joyous in nature.

Besides the above feasts, which were all preexilic and instituted by God, the Jews after the Captivity added two others, the Feast of Lights, or Dedication, and the Feast of Purim.

VII. The Feast of Lights was observed for eight days beginning on the twenty-fifth day of Kislev (Nov.–Dec.). It was instituted by the Maccabees in 164 B.C. when the temple, which had been defiled by Antiochus Epiphanes, king of Syria, was cleansed and rededicated to the service of the Lord. During these days the Israelites met in their synagogues, carrying branches of trees in their hands, and held jubilant services. The children were told the brave and stirring deeds of the Maccabees so that they might emulate them.

VIII. The Feast of Purim (“lots”) is kept on the fourteenth and fifteenth days of Adar (Feb.–Mar.), the last month of the religious year. It was instituted by Mordecai to commemorate the failure of Haman’s plots against the Jews (Esth. 9:20-22, 26-28). On the evening of the thirteenth it became customary to read the whole book of Esther publicly in the synagogue. It was a joyous occasion. See also CALENDAR.

Felix. fee’liks (Gk. Phēlix G5772, from Lat. fēlix, “fruitful, fortunate”). Born Antonius Claudius, he was a freedman of the family of Emperor Claudius (A.D. 41-54). Felix and his brother Pallas were favorites of Claudius and later of Nero (54-68), and so Felix evidently thought that he could do as he pleased. The Roman historian Tacitus said of him that “he revelled in cruelty and lust, and wielded the power of a king with the mind of a slave.” His very title of PROCURATOR hints at his fiscal duties of procuring funds for ROME, which he seems to have accomplished with all sorts of tyranny. He began his career as procurator of JUDEA by seducing Drusilla, the sister of AGRIPPA II and wife of the king of Emesa (modern Homs), and marrying her. Because she was Jewish (at least in part), he learned much of Jewish life and customs.

Coin minted during the procuratorship of Antonius Felix.

Felix appears in the biblical account only in Acts 23:24—25:14. He was susceptible to flattery, as the speech of TERTULLUS shows, and also to conviction of sin, as is shown by his terror when PAUL reasoned before him about “righteousness, self-control and the judgment to come” (24:25). His conviction faded and he procrastinated. He held Paul for about two years (c. 58-60), hoping that the apostle “would offer him a bribe” for his freedom (24:26). Felix was then replaced by FESTUS, a far better man.

felloe. Variant form of felly, which refers to the rim of a wheel supported by spokes. It is used by the KJV once in connection with the wheels of the ten bronze stands in the temple (1 Ki. 7:33; NIV, “spokes”).

fellow. This English term (meaning “man, companion, peer”) is used in Bible versions to render several words and expressions (e.g., Exod. 2:13 KJV; the NIV and NRSV clarify, “fellow Hebrew”). The term can be used in expressions of contempt (Matt. 9:3 et al.). It also occurs frequently as an adjective in combination with various nouns (e.g., “fellow worker,” Rom. 16:3; “fellow servant,” Col. 4:7; et al.).

fellowship. The meaningful Greek term koinōnia G3126 (“association, communion”) and its cognates stand for one of the most powerful concepts in the Scriptures. They apply first of all to participation in a person or project and a “common” spirit. Fellowship in the family of God comes after the new birth (2 Cor. 5:17; 1 Jn. 3:9; see REGENERATION). Christians partake of Christ (Heb. 3:14), and of the HOLY SPIRIT (6:4; in Hebrews a different Gk. term is used, metochos G3581). True fellowship results in mutual LOVE (Jn. 13:34). The significant KJV rendering “communicate” (for the verb koinoneō G3125, Gal. 6:6) touches the heart of the Christian spirit: those who are taught in the Word of God are admonished to exercise their sense of community or fellowship sharing. This was an essential strength of the early Christians. Although a minority movement, they shared the strength of belonging to each other and to God.

The notion of koinonia can have negative aspects as well. A Christian has no genuine “fellowship” with an unbeliever, whose nature is different (2 Cor. 6:14-16). Pagan ceremonies are not a part of true koinonia (1 Cor. 10:20-22). Christians should have no “fellowship” with unfruitful works of darkness (Eph. 5:11 KJV). True NT koinonia is rooted in a depth of fellowship with God as Father (1 Jn. 1:3, 6). Christians must continue to walk in the light to enjoy this fellowship. They are called to fellowship with the Son (1 Cor. 1:9). The LORD’S SUPPER is a symbol of this inner fellowship (10:16). Fellowship with the Spirit is a blessing of Christians (2 Cor. 13:14). The true koinonia is not only earthly, but continues and is consummated in heaven (Rev. 21:1-4). See also COMMUNITY OF GOODS; CONTRIBUTION.

fence. This English term is used frequently by the KJV, especially in the expression “fenced city,” which is better rendered “fortified city” (Num. 32:17 et al.). The NIV uses “fence” only in Ps. 62:3, where the psalmist speaks of his oppressors as a “leaning wall” and a “tottering fence,” that is, ready to fall over.

ferret. See ANIMALS.

ferry boat. Term used once by the KJV to render a Hebrew noun that simply means “ford” or “crossing” (2 Sam. 19:18). Because the Hebrew expression is unusual, the KJV translators either misinterpreted the noun or rendered the clause freely, “And there went over a ferry boat to carry over the king’s household” (cf. NIV, “They crossed at the ford to take the king’s household over”).

Fertile Crescent. This term does not occur in Scripture but is a modern description of the territory that may roughly be described as reaching NW from the Persian Gulf through MESOPOTAMIA, then W to the northern part of SYRIA, then SW through Syria and PALESTINE. In this crescent-shaped area the land is mostly rich and fertile and is watered by the TIGRIS, the EUPHRATES, the ORONTES, the JORDAN, and numerous rivers descending W in LEBANON. In most of the region irrigation has also long been employed. Various grains such as wheat and barley, and fruits such as grapes, olives, figs, oranges, lemons, and pomegranates abound. A journey in a straight line across the crescent from one end to the other would go mostly through the great Syrian desert, with only an occasional oasis. This configuration of the land explains much of Bible history.

fertility cults. Religions that promoted the fertility of humans, animals, and crops by celebrating the myth of a dying-and-rising god with rites of mourning and of later jubilation. The god was believed to typify the death and renewal of vegetation. A “sacred marriage” between the god, represented by the king, and the goddess, represented by a hiero-dule (temple slave or prostitute), also was believed to promote the fertility of the land. Some scholars have thought that the fertility-cult background is a key to the interpretation of a number of books of the OT. They argue that the Canaanite fertility cult was transmitted to Israel when the prophets exalted Yahweh as the god of the sacred marriage in place of BAAL. Others have compared the RESURRECTION OF JESUS CHRIST to the resurrection of such deities as Attis, Adonis, or Osiris, and have attributed some of PAUL’s teachings to a dependence upon pagan mysteries. Further research, however, has tended to undermine seriously the thesis of a generically similar series of fertility cults, on the one hand, and the thesis of the dependence of Christianity upon the pagan mysteries, on the other hand.

Festus, Porcius. fes’tuhs, por’shuhs (Gk. Phēstos G5776 [from Lat. fēstus, “festal, joyful”], Porkios G4517 [a Roman clan name]). Roman governor who succeeded FELIX in the province of JUDEA (Acts 24:27). The date of his accession is uncertain. Almost nothing is known of the life of Festus before his appointment by NERO as PROCURATOR of Judea. He appears in the Bible (24:27—26:32) principally in his relationship with his prisoner, the apostle PAUL. Festus was apparently a far better and more efficient man than his predecessor. At the very beginning of his rule, he took up the case of Paul, and as King AGRIPPA II said, Paul “could have been set free if he had not appealed to Caesar” (26:32). Paul had made this appeal when Festus, at the request of the Jews, was considering bringing Paul to Jerusalem for trial. Festus evidently knew that Paul was a good man (25:25), but he was unable to understand Paul’s reasoning with King Agrippa and thought that Paul had gone mad with much study (26:24). Festus died at his post and was followed about A.D. 62 by Albinus.

field. The biblical “field” was usually not enclosed, but marked off from its neighbors by stone markers at the corners and sometimes one or two along the sides. Because they were unenclosed, and because of normally unsettled conditions, a watchman was often employed, especially when the crop was nearing maturity. Besides the danger of human intruders, there might be danger from straying cattle or even of cattle driven by rustlers (Exod. 22:5), and of fire if a SAMSON (Jdg. 15:5) or an angry ABSAOM (2 Sam. 14:30) were about. The word is used also in a larger sense for “territory,” as in Gen. 36:35 (KJV), where “the country of Moab” (NIV) is intended; and as in the parable of the tares (Matt. 13:38), where “the field is the world.” Many of the ancient “fields” were the habitat of wild animals (Ps. 80:13).

Field of Blood. See AKELDAMA.

fiery serpent. This expression is used by the KJV with reference to the desert vipers that attacked the Hebrews in the wilderness as they journeyed around MOAB (Num. 21:6, 8; Deut. 8:15). Their bite was cured miraculously when the victim looked at the bronze serpent made by MOSES on that occasion (see NEHUSHTAN). The context suggests a poisonous viper living in the desert regions near biblical Moab. In other usages, the same Hebrew term refers to legendary creatures (the flying serpents of Isa. 14:29; 30:6) or supernatural angelic beings (the SERAPHS of 6:2-7). This raises the possibility that the term is used in Num. 21:6 not because it normally designated a particular kind of snake, but rather to emphasize the supernatural, miraculous character of the plague.

figure. This English term is used variously in Bible versions to render several words. Special interest attaches to the use of “figure” in the KJV to render Greek typos G5596, a term that has a wide range of meanings, such as “mark” (Jn. 20:25), “pattern” (Acts 7:44), and “example” (1 Tim. 4:12). The most important and characteristic usage is in the sense of an event or personage who fulfills a prophetic prefigurement. Such a connotation is involved, for example, in PAUL’s statement that ADAM “was a pattern of the one to come” (Rom. 5:14). The English cognate type often has been used to translated this usage (cf. NRSV). The compound form antitypos G531, “that which corresponds [to something else],” is also rendered “figure” by the KJV (Heb. 9:24; 1 Pet. 3:21). From such terms, along with the notion of prophetic prefigurement, the whole elaborate system of hermeneutics known as TPOLOGY was developed. See also figured stone. This phrase is used by the NRSV in two passages (Lev. 26:1; Num. 33:52). From contextual usage, the word probably refers to religious images carved in relief on flat surfaces (cf. NIV, “carved stone,” “carved image”). These, along with other pagan cult objects, were proscribed and to be destroyed. The same Hebrew word is rendered “image” in Ezek. 8:12 (NIV, “idol”), which speaks of idolatrous pictures carved or scratched on walls (cf. v. 10). See also GRAVEN IMAGE; IDOLATRY.

figurehead. A carved figure on the prow of a ship. The term is used in connection with the Alexandrian ship on which PAUL sailed toward Rome, which had as its insignia the Dioscuri, that is, CASTOR AND POLLUX, the twin sons of ZEUS who were “good luck” deities of sailors (Acts 28:11).

filigree. Delicate ornamental work in fine wire, usually gold or silver. Archaeological finds have demonstrated that filigree work was produced throughout the ANE. Egyptian funerary jewelry provides some of the best examples, with intricate wire reproductions of divine symbols inlaid with glazed beads and semiprecious stones. Although the evidence is less than conclusive, biblical scholars generally agree that some of the settings of the high priest's garments were of gold filigree (Exod. 28:11-14 et al.).

fillet. This English term is used by the KJV with reference to the “bands” (NIV) or rings binding the pillars of the TABERNACLE, probably close to the capitals (Exod. 36:38). The fillets for the pillars of the court were overlaid with silver (38:10-12, 17, 19), while those for the door pillars were of gold (36:38).

filth. See UNCLEAN.

finances. See MONEY.

finer. KJV term for “refiner, smith” (Prov. 25:4).

finery. This English term, rarely used in Bible versions, occurs in a passage that describes the beauty of the necklaces, bracelets, and other items that adorned the upper-class women of Jerusalem (Isa. 3:18). God promises that he will replace these luxuries with articles of shame when he judges the city. The NIV uses it in another passage to render a different Hebrew word (2 Sam. 1:24; NRSV, “luxury”).

fines. See PUNISHMENT.

finger. Although the fingers are an extension from the palm, they often stand for the whole hand (cf. the parallelism in Isa. 59:3). PRIESTS used a finger to sprinkle the sacrificial blood (Lev. 4:6 et al.). The fingers were used in conversation, as in most cultures, to add to the expression of the mouth (Prov. 6:13). Accusation was made, and still is, by pointing (Isa. 58:9). In addition, the finger could be used as a unit of measure (Jer. 52:21).

Several passages in the Bible use the word finger figuratively (e.g., 1 Ki. 12:10; Matt. 23:4). Special interest attaches to the anthropomorphic expression, “the finger of God,” a striking way of referring to God's power (see ANTHROPOMORPHISM). The Egyptian magicians said, after one of the plagues of MOSES which they could not duplicate, “This is the finger of God” (Exod. 8:19), meaning, “This is beyond the power of man to do” (cf. also Deut. 9:10; Ps. 8:3).

In a very important passage, Jesus is quoted as saying that he was driving out demons “by the finger of God” and that these miracles indicated the arrival of the KINGDOM OF GOD (Lk. 11:20). In the parallel passage in Matthew the words are “by the Spirit of God” (Matt. 12:28). It is possible that Luke preserved the Semitic figure and that Matthew interpreted it so as to bring out clearly the connection between this miracle and his earlier reference to the Holy Spirit (v. 18, citing Isa. 42:1). In any case, Jesus was claiming to have divine power and to inaugurate God’s reign in fulfillment of the OT promises.

fining pot. KJV rendering of a Hebrew term that refers to a melting pot used for refining metals (Prov. 17:3; 27:21; NIV, “crucible”).

fir. See PLANTS.

fire. The use of fire is implied in Scripture as early as Gen. 4:22, which states that TUBAL-CAIN “forged all kinds of tools out of bronze and iron.” In the account of the Abrahamic COVENANT (15:17) one reads of a smoking firepot and a flaming torch. Later, God “rained upon Sodom and upon Gomorrah brimstone and fire” (19:24 KJV; NIV, “burning sulfur”). In the institution of the Aaronic priestly ceremonies, God sent fire from heaven to consume the first offering (Lev. 9:24) to show his acceptance. This fire was to be kept burning continually (6:9). When NADAB and ABIHU, the two sons of AARON, offered “unauthorized fire,” probably when intoxicated (10:1, 9-10), God’s fiery judgment descended on them and destroyed them. The final destiny of the enemies of God is the “fiery lake” (Rev. 19:20; 20:10, 14). This world will some day be consumed by fire (2 Pet. 3:7-12). God uses “fire” not only for judgment but also for testing, and so we learn that the works of all believers will be tested as by fire (1 Cor. 3:12-15). God’s glory is accompanied by fire (Ezek. 1:27). Our Lord is pictured with eyes as a flame of fire, hinting at his work of judgment (Rev. 1:14). Fire is used to refine gold and to cleanse us (Mal. 3:2).

fire, lake of. See HELL; HINNOM, VALLEY OF.

fire, pillar of. See CLOUD, PILLAR OF.

firebrand. This English term occurs seldom in the OT, being used variously to render several Hebrew words, such as zēq H2415, referring to some kind of flaming missile (only Prov. 26:18; for other Hebrew words, see Job 41:19 NIV; Isa. 7:4; 50:11 NRSV).

firepan. A container for carrying live or dead coals. The Hebrew term (maḥtâ H4746) refers to objects that had three different functions in the SACRIFICE and WORSHIP of the OT. (1) Firepans were used to carry coals to and from the altar of burnt offering (Exod. 27:3; 38:3; Num. 4:14). (2) The containers could also be used in combination with the snuffers of the golden LAMPSTAND, probably as receptacles to catch the pieces of burned wick (Exod. 25:38; 37:23; Num. 4:9; KJV, “snuff dishes”; NIV and NRSV, “trays”). (3) Finally, the Hebrew term could refer to a CENSER (Lev. 10:1; 16:12; Num. 16:6; et al.).

firkin. See WEIGHTS AND MEASURES.

firmament. Traditional rendering for Hebrew rāqîaʿ H8385, a difficult word that seems to suggest beaten metal plate. The Hebrew term is used only with reference to the sky (Gen. 1:6-8 et al.), viewed apparently as an “expanse” (NIV) or “vault” (RSV) or “dome” (NRSV). While Genesis indicates that the rāqîaʿ was formed to separate the mass of waters and divide them into two layers, little can be inferred from that. The SEPTUAGINT rendered the term with Greek stereōma G5106 (“solidity, foundation, firmness, steadfastness”; cf. Col. 2:5), which was in turn rendered firmamentum by Jerome in the Latin Vulgate, and thus “firmament” in the KJV. The firmament is mentioned always in the context of CREATION: nine times in the Genesis account, but also in the Psalms and the Prophets (Ps. 19:1; 150:1; Ezek. 1:22-26; 10:1; Dan. 12:3). It seems probable that the Hebrew term reflects everyday experience in the human perception of nature: the firmament is thus simply the place where God put the sun, moon, and stars, and where birds fly (Gen. 1:14-17, 20).

first and last. See ALPHA AND OMEGA.

firstborn. The Hebrew word for “firstborn” (bēkōr H1147) is used chiefly of human beings, but it can also be applied to animals (Exod. 11:5). From earliest times it was recognized that God had the first claim on animals (Gen. 4:4). Among the ancestors of the Hebrews, the firstborn offspring of humans and animals were sacrificed to the deity. Because the firstborn of the Israelites were preserved at the time of the first Passover, every firstborn male of man and beast became consecrated to God (Exod. 13:2; 34:19). The beasts were sacrificed, while the firstborn sons were redeemed (Exod. 13:11-15; 34:20; cf. Lev. 27:6). At Sinai the Levites were substituted for the Israelite firstborn (Num. 3:12, 41, 46; 8:13-19). On the thirtieth day after birth the father brought his firstborn son to the priest and paid five shekels to redeem him from service in the temple (cf. Lk. 2:27).

Among the Israelites the firstborn son possessed special privileges. He succeeded his father as the head of the house and received as his share of the inheritance a double portion. For that reason, sometimes the meaning of the term is figurative, denoting priority or supremacy. Israel was God's "firstborn son" (Exod. 4:22; Jer. 31:9). As the firstborn son had special priority, so Israel was privileged over other nations. Similarly, Christ is the "firstborn" of the Father (Heb. 1:6), having preeminent position over others in relation to him. He is "firstborn among many brothers" (Rom. 8:29), that is, sovereign above those related to him in the new creation. He is "the firstborn of all creation" (Col. 1:15 NRSV), a statement misunderstood by the Arians of the fourth century and modern-day Jehovah's Witnesses, who make him a created being and not God. The proper meaning is that Christ, truly God, stands in a relationship of priority or sovereignty over all creation (cf. NIV).

firstfruits. In acknowledgment of the fact that all the products of the land came from God, and to show thankfulness for his goodness, the Israelites brought as an offering a portion of the fruits that ripened first. These were looked on as a pledge of the coming HARVEST. Such an offering was made both on behalf of the nation (Lev. 23:10, 17) and by individuals (Exod. 23:19; Deut. 26:1-11). These firstfruits went for the support of the priesthood.

In a figurative use, Jesus is the firstfruits of all who die in faith; that is, the RESURRECTION of believers is made possible and is guaranteed by his resurrection (1 Cor. 15:20). Believers, in turn, are "a kind of firstfruits" of all that God created (Jas. 1:18); creation will share in the redemption of the children of God (Rom. 8:19-21).

fish. See ANIMALS.

Fish Gate. An entrance on the N wall of JERUSALEM. King MANASSEH is said to have "rebuilt the outer wall of the City of David, west of the Gihon spring, as far as the entrance of the Fish Gate and encircling the hill of Ophel" (2 Chr. 33:14; the gate was rebuilt after the EXILE, Neh. 3:3). It was apparently located between the JESHANAH GATE and the Tower of HANANEL, and one of the choirs proceeded past it at the dedication of the walls (Neh. 12:39). It presumably obtained its name from a fish market nearby (cf. 13:16). Elsewhere it is mentioned with the Mishneh or SECOND DISTRICT of the city (Zeph. 1:10). The Fish Gate was likely near the NW corner of the TEMPLE mount.

fishhook. Not only the means of catching fish as is done today, but also of keeping them, at least for a time (cf. Amos 4:2 with Job 41:1-2). Peter generally used a net, but see Matt. 17:27, where the Lord told him to cast a hook (so KJV and other versions; the NIV translates with the more idiomatic phrase, “throw out your line”).

fishing. See OCCUPATIONS AND PROFESSIONS.

fitch. See PLANTS.

flag. See PLANTS.

flagon. A large vessel used for holding liquors. The NRSV uses it several times where the NIV prefers “pitcher” or “jar” (Exod. 25:29 et al.). The KJV uses it wrongly several times to translate a Hebrew word that really means “raisin cake” (2 Sam. 6:19; 1 Chr. 16:3; Cant. 2:5; Hos. 3:1).

flagstaff. Term used by the NIV and other modern versions in one passage where God warns the people that they will flee until they are left “like a flagstaff on a mountaintop, / like a banner on a hill” (Isa. 30:17). The Hebrew term apparently could refer to poles of various kinds, for in its other two occurrences it clearly means “mast [of a ship]” (Isa. 33:23; Ezek. 27:5).

flask. A small container, usually with a narrow neck. The term is occasionally used by English versions, for example, to render Hebrew pak H7095 (“small jug, vial”), which occurs in two passages (1 Sam. 10:1; 2 Ki. 9:1, 3) or Greek angeion G31, used once with reference to jars of oil (Matt. 25:4 NRSV).

flat nose. The KJV translation of a Hebrew word used only once to describe one of the conditions that rendered a man unfit for priestly service (Lev. 21:18). Some believe the word refers to the condition that often accompanies a cleft palate. The NRSV renders it, “one who has a mutilated face”; NIV simply, “disfigured.”

fleece. The shorn wool of a sheep. The first of the shearing was to be given to the priesthood, as a part of their means of support (Deut. 18:4). GIDEON’s experience as related in Jdg. 6:37-40 has given rise to the idiom “putting out a fleece” when seeking God’s guidance through some observable means.

flesh. Literally, the soft part of the bodies of people and animals. However, the term (Heb. bāsār H1414, Gk. sarx G4922) is often used figuratively in the Bible and plays a significant role in theological formulations. In many of these passages, a literal rendering can be confusing and misleading, so the NIV and other modern versions usually resort to more idiomatic translations. Thus the phrase “every living thing of all flesh” (Gen. 6:19 KJV) is rendered by the NIV simply as “all living creatures.” Similarly, “the God of the spirits of all flesh” (Num. 16:22 KJV) becomes in the TNIV, “God of every human spirit.”

In the NT, the term flesh can refer to our ordinary human constitution as opposed to our mental and moral qualities: “the spirit indeed is willing, but the flesh [NIV, body] is weak” (Matt. 26:41 KJV). Very important is the application of the word to the human nature deprived of the Spirit of God and dominated by SIN. This theological usage is difficult to translate, and the NIV uses such renderings as “unspiritual” (Col. 2:18), “world” (2 Cor. 10:2), “human effort” (Gal. 3:3), and especially “sinful nature” (Rom. 8:3-13; Gal. 5:13-24). See also HOLY SPIRIT.

fleshhook. KJV term for one of the sacrificial implements used in the TABERNACLE and the TEMPLE (Exod. 27:3; 38:3; Num. 4:14; 1 Chr. 28:17; 2 Chr. 4:16; NIV, “meat fork” or “fork”). What appears to be the same device is described as a three-pronged instrument used to remove meat from a boiling pot (1 Sam. 2:13-14).

flesh pot. This term is used by the KJV once in a passage where the Israelites complain that, when living in Egypt, they used to sit around “pots of meat” (NIV) eating whatever they wanted (Exod. 16:3). These pots were large metal kettles used not only for cooking meat (2 Ki. 4:38; Ezek. 11:3), but also for boiling water (Jer. 1:13) and for washing (Ps. 60:8).

flies. See ANIMALS.

flint. See MINERALS.

float. This English term is used by the KJV to render two Hebrew words for “raft,” each of which occurs only once (1 Ki. 5:9; 2 Chr. 2:16).

flock. A collection of sheep under the care of a shepherd, sometimes including goats also (Gen. 27:9). The larger animals such as cattle, camels, and donkeys were counted as herds, not flocks. Israel lived in OT times in a pastoral civilization, and a man’s flocks made up most of his wealth, providing clothing, food, milk, and animals for sacrifice. Figuratively, ISRAEL and the CHURCH are counted as flocks, and God is the Good Shepherd (Isa. 40:11; Matt. 26:31; Lk. 12:32; 1 Pet. 5:2-3).

flood, the. The great deluge that occurred during the days of NOAH, recorded in Gen. 6-9 and mentioned frequently elsewhere in the Bible.

I. Historical background of flood interpretations. The Noahic flood has been a subject for discussion among scientists and theologians for many centuries. During the Middle Ages, the church was the authority in all areas of thought. Science as we know it today did not exist, for with its theological orientation the church looked with disfavor on observations that did not have theological explanations. It was only natural then that when the early geologists observed many thousands of feet of sedimentary rocks (formed from smaller particles of rocks or chemically precipitated from solution) in the mountains of Europe and the British Isles, they turned to the church for an explanation. The easiest answer for the layers of sediments was that they were laid down by the flood.

As the sedimentary layers were studied further, problems arose when it was discovered that not all the layers were contemporaneous. It was also readily observed that some sediments had been deposited, hardened into rock, folded into mountain ranges, eroded off, and then covered with new sediments. At some places the sedimentary rock layers were cut by formerly molten rock material, which indicated volcanic activity after the sediments were deposited. Sixteenth- and seventeenth-century scientists attempted to harmonize the interpretation of field observations with church tradition.

As a result, many interpretations of the meaning and physical characteristics of the flood have been suggested, modified, abandoned, and sometimes repropounded. These interpretations have produced some highly improbable explanations of the events of the deluge and have so confused the issue that it is difficult to separate the intelligent from the fanciful. The reality of the flood can hardly be questioned, however, because of the many references to it in both the OT and NT (Gen. 6-8; 9:11, 28; 10:1, 32; Matt. 24:38-39; Lk. 17:27; 2 Pet. 2:5).

II. The purpose of the flood. An important aspect of the deluge is that God preserved some individuals, for Noah and his family were saved from destruction by going into an ark that Noah made according to God's specifications, and in which he gathered animals and birds preserved to replenish the earth.

It is apparent from Gen. 6:5-7 and other passages such as 2 Pet. 2:5-6 that the flood was brought on the earth as a judgment on the sins of the people. They had become so sinful that "the LORD was grieved that he had made man on the earth" (Gen. 6:6). The Bible refers to the flood in connection with the judgment at the second coming of the Lord (Matt. 24:39) and with the destruction of SODOM and GOMORRAH (Lk. 17:27-29; 2 Pet. 2:5-6).

Cuneiform tablet (c. 1635 B.C.) containing the Epic of Atrahasis, one form of the Babylonian flood story.

The purpose of God, as stated in Gen. 6:7, indicates that the judgment was not against the inanimate rocks or against plants but against “men and animals, and creatures that move along the ground, and birds of the air.”

III. The phenomena of the flood. In the following passage, however (Gen. 6:11-13), the earth is included in the judgment. There is again difference of opinion as to the meaning of the statement, “I am going to put an end to all people, for the earth is filled with violence because of them. I am surely going to destroy both them and the earth.” That the earth was not utterly destroyed as it will be in the last times (2 Pet. 2:10) is apparent. Some writers would interpret Gen. 6:13 to mean that great geologic catastrophes overwhelmed the earth’s surface, while others point out that Gen. 6:6-7, 12-13 all stress that it was the sin of living things that was to be punished and that the effect on the inanimate rocks of the world was only incidental to punishing the human race.

Despite all attempts at scientific explanation of the minute details of the flood, there seems to be no doubt that God worked a miracle in causing it. In 2 Pet. 3:5-6 the flood is compared with the creation of the world and is a miracle of the same order. In the same passage (vv. 7-10), the final destruction of the world is given the same miraculous explanation as the Noahic flood.

IV. The source of the flood. The biblical account of the accumulation and dispersal of the waters of the flood is very brief. In Gen. 7:11 the source of the water is described as “all the springs of the great deep burst forth, and the floodgates of the heavens were opened.” The Hebrew noun translated “deep” is the same used in 1:2. That this does not necessarily include all the oceans is shown by its use in Isa. 51:10, where it refers to the escape of the Israelites in “the depths of the sea” (the Red Sea). The mention of “springs” could mean that water rose from the ocean or from fresh water springs on the earth or both.

V. Suggested causes of the flood. Some would prefer to believe that the expression “the springs of the great deep burst forth” indicates that the ocean (actually the Persian Gulf, an arm of the ocean) invaded the land. Others have assumed this implies volcanic activity and that some of the water of the flood was “juvenile water,” which is formed from the oxygen and hydrogen that may occur as separate elements in the molten rock deep in the earth’s crust. This school of thought would also attribute to this verse a great deal of diastrophism (movements of the solid crust that result in a relative change of position of the rock formations concerned). This could account for the sinking of the mountains of the earth so that they could be covered more easily by the waters of the deluge.

To attribute volcanic activity to Gen. 7:11 is highly speculative, for at no place in the Genesis account is any more specific description of conditions given. The fact that igneous rock (rock formed by the cooling of molten rock materials) is found between layers of sedimentary rock is not good evidence for volcanic activity at the time of the flood. Sediments that have been laid down during historic time have been cut by lava from present-day volcanoes. It has also been observed that the oldest layers are also cut by igneous rocks. It seems apparent, therefore, that volcanic activity has gone on throughout the world's history. It is not possible to designate any particular rock body as being coincident with the flood.

"The floodgates of the heavens were opened" has been accepted as a description of rain. Some have seen this as a torrential downpour greater than normally experienced on the earth today. A hypothesis has been proposed that the earth from the time of its creation was surrounded by a canopy of water in some form until the time of the flood. The canopy was supposedly made of water vapor, ice, or liquid water. It is proposed that the transfer of the canopy's water from around the earth to the earth would cause rain for many days.

The canopy idea, although firmly entrenched in literature, has doubtful biblical authority, though some cite older versions of Ezek. 1:22 in support of it. Again it should be noted that if a miraculous explanation for the flood is accepted, physical explanations are not necessary.

VI. The duration of the flood. The Hebrews used a solar calendar in contrast to the Babylonian lunar month and the Egyptian arbitrary 365-day year. Most authorities would put the number of days from the time the rain started (Gen. 7:11) to the time Noah left the ark (8:14) between 371 and 376 days.

VII. Traditions of the flood. Traditions regarding a disastrous flood that occurred long ago are handed down by many peoples. Isolated tribes in all parts of the world have been found to have such traditions. This is not surprising, considering the destruction caused by present-day floods as well as hurricanes and tornadoes accompanied by great rains. A tribe occupying a limited area could be destroyed completely by one storm. Any survivors would date their civilization from such an event.

TABULATED CHRONOLOGY OF THE FLOOD
1. The making of the ark (Gen 6:14)
2. Collection of the animals (Gen 7:9)	seven days before the rain started
3. Springs of the great deep burst forth and the floodgates of heaven were opened (Gen 7:11)	second month, seventeenth day in Noah's 600th year
4. Rain (Gen 7:12)	forty days and forty nights
5. All the high hills covered (Gen 7:19)
6. Water flooded the earth (Gen 7:24)	150 days
7. Water receded from off the earth (Gen 8:3)	150 days
8. Ark rested on the mountains of Ararat (Gen 8:4)	seventh month, seventeenth day
9. Water decreased (Gen 8:4)
10. Tops of mountains seen (Gen 8:5)	tenth month, first day
11. Noah waited (Gen 8:6)	forty days
12. Noah sent out a raven and a dove; dove returned (Gen 8:7-9)
13. Noah waited (Gen 8:10)	seven days
14. Noah sent forth dove again (Gen 8:10); dove returned with olive branch (Gen 8:11)	seven days
15. Noah waited (Gen 8:12)	seven days
16. Noah sent out a dove, which did not return (Gen 8:12)	seven days
17. Noah removed covering; face of the ground was dry (Gen 8:13)	first month, first day, Noah's 601st year
18. Earth dried; Noah left ark (Gen 8:14)	second month, twenty-seventh day

The Hebrews, Assyrians, and Babylonians who lived within the area of the Tigris-Euphrates basin, all had traditions of a great flood. These narratives stated the purpose of the flood to be punishment because the world was full of violence, but the Hebrew account remained simple and credible, whereas the other accounts became complex and fanciful. Only the biblical account retained a monotheistic viewpoint. Although it is not possible to affirm dogmatically that all of these three histories had a common origin, it seems probable that they did.

VIII. The universality of the flood. One of the great differences of opinion in describing the deluge concerns its extent. Traditionally, most biblical interpreters considered the submergence to be universal; that is, it covered the entire globe including the highest mountains. The reasons mentioned in defense of this viewpoint include the fact that universal terms are used in the Genesis account. "All the high mountains under the entire heavens were covered" (Gen. 7:19), and "every living thing that moved on the earth perished" (7:21). It has been pointed out that if the flood had been local, there would have been no need for an ark to preserve Noah, for God could have directed him to move with the animals to an area that was not to be submerged.

The fact that many civilizations have flood traditions has been cited as an evidence for a universal flood. The same evidence, however, could be used to argue for a local flood, because the accounts of floods in other parts of the world are less like the Hebrew tradition than those of the Assyrians and Babylonians, who lived in the same area as the Hebrews.

Today many conservative scholars defend a local flood. The crux of their argument seems to center in the covenant relation of God to man. He deals with certain groups, such as the children of Israel. The reasoning in regard to Noah is that Noah was not a preacher of righteousness to peoples of other areas but was concerned with the culture from which Abraham eventually came. Physical arguments have also been raised against a universal flood: origin and disposal of the amount of water necessary to make a layer 6 mi. (10 km.) thick over the whole world; the effect on plant life of being covered for a year; the effect on fresh water life of a sea that contained salt from the ocean; and the fact that many topographic features of the earth (such as cinder cones) show no evidence of erosion by a flood and are thought to be much older than the Genesis flood could possibly be.

IX. Chronology of the flood. There is not any general agreement among conservative scholars concerning the actual date of the deluge. Although Ussher in his chronology placed the flood at 2348 B.C., most scholars today hold to an earlier date. Scholars who have advocated that the earth has developed to its present condition by a series of major calamities have been called catastrophists. These consider the Noahic flood as the greatest of these catastrophes and believe that the Pleistocene ice age was related to the flood. Many catastrophists believe the flood was associated in some way with the end of the Pleistocene ice age and so accept a date of about 10,000 B.C. The lack of consensus with regard to the details of the flood should make all aware of the danger of placing so much importance on the interpretation of this event that the other lessons of the Bible are missed.

flora. See PLANTS.

flour. Fine-crushed and sifted grain, generally wheat or rye or barley (Jdg. 7:13). Eastern flour was not quite as fine or as white as ours, and thus the bread was more wholesome. The “grain offerings” were of flour (Lev. 6:14-15).

flower. See PLANTS.

flute. See MUSIC AND MUSICAL INSTRUMENTS.

flux, bloody. KJV rendering of a Greek word referring to dysentery (Acts 28:8). See DISEASES.

fly. See ANIMALS.

foal. See ANIMALS.

fodder. The mixed food of cattle, generally from several kinds of grain sown together (Job 6:5; 24:6; Isa. 30:24).

fold. A pen in which to keep sheep or goats. Folds were used chiefly as a protection from wild beasts at night. They consisted of a walled enclosure, preferably near water, and often with a small tower inside. Sometimes flocks of more than one shepherd were kept overnight in the same fold, with one shepherd taking care of the animals. In the morning the sheep would be carefully counted when the shepherds came to reclaim their flocks. The word “fold” is used in some versions to render several Hebrew words (Jer. 23:3; Hab. 3:17; et al.) and one Greek word (Jn. 10:1, 16).

folly. See FOOLISHNESS, FOLLY.

food. Nutritive material taken into a living organism to sustain life, to promote growth and the repair of the tissues, and to give energy for the vital processes. The Bible says little about food for animals. Bible animals for the most part are herbivorous, though carnivorous ones are mentioned. Some omnivorous animals, like pigs, are mentioned, but almost always in a contemptuous way (Matt. 7:6). Pigs were forbidden as food (Isa. 65:4).

At the very beginning of human history, ADAM's food for his first day was probably some ripe fruit. Before SIN had entered the world, God possibly prescribed a vegetarian diet, both for man and beast (Gen. 1:29-30), but one must not build too much on silence here as regarding the content of diet. By the time that NOAH built the ark, there was a distinction between clean and unclean beasts (7:2-3), and when God made his covenant with Noah after the flood (9:3-4), flesh was expressly permitted as food. BLOOD was forbidden, and it seems that the reason for this prohibition was as much theological as sanitary (cf. Lev. 17:11). Coming down now to the time of MOSES, FAT was also prohibited as food (3:16-17), and again, the reason given is religious, not hygienic. In the time of the restoration (Neh. 8:10) NEHEMIAH encouraged the people to "enjoy choice food" (KJV "eat the fat") while celebrating a national "thanksgiving day." One might imagine here that Nehemiah had forgotten that "all the fat is the LORD's" (Lev. 3:16) until one notices that the Hebrew word in Nehemiah could just as well be rendered "dainties" and refers probably to the various rich confections of which Eastern people are so fond.

The animals most frequently mentioned in the Bible are the domestic herbivorous animals, and these are divided sharply into two classes: the clean and the unclean (see Lev. 11). The clean animals were to be used for food and for sacrifice, and the four-footed ones were distinguished by their hoofs and by whether they chewed the cud. The camel chews the cud but does not have a split hoof and so was considered unclean, though its milk was and is used by desert-dwellers. Pigs have a split hoof but do not chew the cud and so were ceremonially unclean. They were perhaps prohibited as food because of the mischievous trichina spiralis, a worm that has long infested pigs; from half-roasted pork it can enter the human body and create great harm. Of the seafood that was reckoned unclean the principal ones were oysters and shrimps. One can easily realize how dangerous they would be in a land where climate was hot and there was no refrigeration. In other words, sanitary reasons seem to account for many of the distinctions between "clean" and "unclean" foods.

In Palestine and Syria, fresh fruit can be obtained throughout the year. Oranges last in the spring until the very short season of apricots arrives. After the apricots come the plums, figs, pomegranates, etc., which last until the grapes appear; and they in turn remain until the oranges and lemons are again in season.

The preparation of food differs from Western custom. Generally meat is eaten not in steaks and roasts, but cut up and served with rice and often imbedded in "coosa" (a kind of squash) or wrapped in cabbage or grape leaves. The bread is not as white and fine as is ours but is far more healthful. A common laborer often takes as his lunch two hollow loaves of bread, one filled with cheese and the other with olives. There were several sorts of sweets, of which dried figs boiled in grape molasses (Gen. 43:11) was one of the best known. Near the sea, fish were very commonly eaten. Various kinds of fruit and vegetables were used: beans, lentils, millet, melons, onions, gourds; also spices: cummin, mint, mustard, and salt; and honey.

Food is a figure of spiritual sustenance. PETER tells his readers to “crave pure spiritual milk, so that by it you may grow up in your salvation” (1 Pet. 2:2). Peter was writing to young Christians, but PAUL clearly distinguishes between Scripture that can be likened to “milk for babes” and that which can be compared with “strong meat,” or solid food (1 Cor. 3:1-2).

foolishness, folly. The opposite of WISDOM, with which the OT often contrasts it (Eccl. 2:13). The fool exhibits many characteristics ranging from simple stupidity (Prov. 7:7, 22) and a hot temper (14:17) to wickedness (Gen. 34:7), atheism (Ps. 14:1), and rejection of God (Job 2:9-10). In the NT it can mean thoughtlessness (Gal. 3:3) or lack of intelligence (Rom. 1:21). PAUL says that the preaching of the cross is “foolishness” to the lost (1 Cor. 1:18). In Matt. 23:17 the Lord called the SCRIBES and PHARISEES fools, not implying intellectual stupidity but spiritual blindness. Men can be clever in mind, but at the same time be fools in spiritual matters.

foot. The lowest extremity of the leg. Because it comes in contact with the earth, the foot is thought to be less honorable than the hand or the head. But in the Christian church “the foot” (i.e., the lowest member) should not suffer a feeling of inferiority or of envy and say, “Because I am not a hand, I do not belong to the body” (1 Cor. 12:15), nor should the more prominent directing member (“the head”) say to the foot, “I don’t need you!” (12:21). In the East shoes are ordinarily removed when entering a house, and the lowest servant is detailed to wash the feet of the visitor. The priests, before entering the tabernacle in divine service, washed their feet as well as their hands at the laver, just outside, so that no trace of defilement would accompany their service. (For spiritual application see Jn. 13:10; Heb. 10:22.) In lands where irrigation is practiced, men use shovels to move the earth for the larger channels, but a foot will suffice for a small channel to water a furrow (Deut. 11:10). To completely humiliate an enemy, one sometimes put his foot on the captives’ necks as Joshua’s captains did (Josh. 10:24).

footman. This term is used by the KJV a dozen times, usually to render Hebrew raglî H8081, “foot soldier” (1 Sam. 4:10 et al.), distinguished from the soldier who rides on horseback or in a chariot. In the PENTATEUCH, however, the Hebrew word is apparently used to contrast between adult men and children (Exod. 12:37; Num 11:21). The KJV also uses the word “footman” twice to render other Hebrew expressions (1 Sam. 22:17 [“guard”]; Jer. 12:5 [“foot-runner”]).

footstool. A word used in Scripture both literally (2 Chr. 9:18) and figuratively: of the earth (Isa. 66:1; Matt. 5:35); of the temple (Lam. 2:1); of the ark (Ps. 99:5); and of subjection, especially of heathen enemies by the messianic King (Ps. 110:1; Lk. 20:43; Acts 2:35).

footwashing. Though never a major Hebrew rite, the washing of hands and feet of the PRIESTS did have a place in the Mosaic ritual (Exod. 30:17-21). It may indeed be that all ablutions of the Bible are ritual rather than sanitary, though they rise out of assumed sanitary practices. Guests ordinarily were offered water and vessels for washing the feet (Gen. 18:4; 19:2; 24:32; 43:24; Jdg. 19:21). As a special act of affection or humility, the host or hostess might even wash a guest’s feet (1 Sam. 25:41). A “sinful woman” spontaneously and gratefully served the Lord in this way (Lk. 7:36-44).

At the Last Supper the Lord, taking a towel and basin during the meal (Jn. 13:4-10), proceeded to wash the disciples’ feet and to wipe them with the towel. HUMILITY was not the only, or even the main, lesson Jesus was seeking to teach. It is clear that Jesus was giving this act the symbolic significance of spiritual cleansing (v. 10). Some denominations believe footwashing to be an ordinance, citing 1 Tim. 5:10 in addition to Jn. 13. Several arguments have been advanced against this view, especially the silence of Acts and the Epistles.

forbear. See PATIENCE.

ford. A shallow place in a stream where people and animals can cross on foot. In the small streams of PALESTINE and SYRIA, fording places are quite frequent and can easily be found simply by following the main roads, which in many cases are mere bridle paths. Such probably were the fords of the JABBOK (Gen. 32:22), where Jacob halted, and of the ARNON (Isa. 16:2). The JORDAN, however, is a strong and rapid stream, and its fording places are few and far between. When Israel crossed, God miraculously stopped the waters upstream by a landslide. JOSHUA’s spies (Josh. 2:7) evidently forded the Jordan, and EHUD (Jdg. 3:28) took the same place to prevent Moabites from crossing there. Farther up the river and about two hundred years after Ehud, JEPHTHAH made his famous “shibboleth test” at a ford of the Jordan (12:5-6).

forehead. Because of its prominence, appearance of the forehead often determines our opinion of the person. In Ezek. 16:12 KJV reads “I put a jewel on thy forehead,” but NIV (more correctly) has “I put a ring on your nose.” The forehead is used as a very dishonorable word where in the KJV we read of a “harlot’s forehead” (Jer. 3:3; NIV, “brazen look of a prostitute”) indicating utter shamelessness. At the same time it stands for courage, as when God told EZEKIEL (Ezek. 3:9) that he had made the prophet’s forehead harder than flint against the foreheads of the people. The forehead is also the place for the front of a crown or mitre (Exod. 28:38), where the emblem of holiness on AARON’S forehead would make the gifts of the people acceptable before the Lord. A mark was put on the foreheads of the men of Jerusalem who mourned for its wickedness, and they were spared in a time of terrible judgment (Ezek. 9:4). Similarly in Rev. 7 God’s servants were sealed by an angel, and it seems that this seal not only saved the elect ones but showed forth their godly character. In the ages of glory that are to come, the name of God will be marked on the foreheads of his own people (Rev. 22:4).

foreigner. See STRANGER.

foreknowledge; foreordination. See ELECTION AND PREDESTINATION.

forerunner. This English term occurs once in the KJV and other versions as the rendering of Greek prodromos G4596 (Heb. 6:20; NIV, “who went before us”). The term is applied to Jesus as having entered the Holy of Holies (cf. Exod. 26:33-35; 40:20-21) ahead of us and on our behalf. This meant that the ancient order of priests which started with MELCHIZEDEK (Gen. 14:17-20) now came to its fulfillment and completion in the last priest, the messianic priest-sacrifice. Christ is therefore the precursor of all believers, who may now enter into the presence of Yahweh himself (Rom. 8:15; Gal. 4:6).

foresail. The principal sail hung to the front mast of a SHIP (Acts 27:40).

foreskin. The prepuce, a fold of skin that covers the glans of the penis. The rite of CIRCUMCISION, which was to take place on the eighth day after birth, consisted in cutting the foreskin, an act that symbolized the COVENANT God made with ABRAHAM and his descendants (Gen. 17:11-14). Its spiritual significance is made explicit by MOSES: “Circumcise, then, the foreskin of your heart, and do not be stubborn any longer” (Deut. 10:16 NRSV; cf. Jer. 4:4; 9:25; Rom. 2:25-29; Col. 2:13). In the NT, the Greek term is used mainly in a figurative sense, meaning either “[the state of] uncircumcision” (e.g., Gal. 5:6) or “uncircumcised people” (e.g., Eph. 2:11; this usage may have originated among Greek-speaking Jews as a slur against GENTILES).

The forested area on the lower flanks of Mt. Gilboa.

forest. A piece of land covered with trees naturally planted, as distinguished from a park where human intervention is more evident. In ancient times, most of the highlands of CANAAN and SYRIA except the tops of the high mountains were covered with forests. Several forests are mentioned by name, those of LEBANON most often, for these were famous for the cedar and the fir trees. HIRAM of TYRE (1 Ki. 5:8-10) brought down cedar and fir trees from the forest of Lebanon to the sea and floated them southward to the port that SOLOMON had constructed, from which his servants could transport the timbers to JERUSALEM. Solomon’s “Palace of the Forest of Lebanon” (7:2) was apparently his own house and was so named because of the prevalence of cedar in its structure. The crucial battle of ABSAOM’s rebellion was fought in a wood or forest in Ephraim (2 Sam. 18), and “the forest claimed more lives that day than the sword” (18:8). See EPHRAIM, FOREST OF.

foretell. This verb is used rarely in English Bible versions (e.g., Mk. 13:23 KJV). See PROPHETS.

forge. See MINERALS.

forgiveness. The act of pardoning or setting aside punishment and resentment for an offense. The offense may be a deprivation of a person's property, rights, or honor; or it may be a violation of moral law. The normal conditions of forgiveness are REPENTANCE and the willingness to make reparation or ATONEMENT; and the effect of forgiveness is the restoration of both parties to the former state of relationship.

God forgives sins because of the atoning death of Christ. Those forgiven by God before the INCARNATION were forgiven because of Christ, whose death was foreordained from eternity. Christ's atonement was retroactive in its effect (Heb. 11:40). The deity of Christ is evidenced by his claim to the power to forgive sins (Mk. 2:7; Lk. 5:21; 7:49). Just as God has forgiven us, so we must forgive others (Matt. 5:23-24; 6:12; Col. 1:14; 3:13). Jesus taught that forgiveness is a duty, and that no limit should be set to the extent of forgiveness (Lk. 17:4). An unforgiving spirit is one of the most serious of sins (Matt. 18:34-35; Lk. 15:28-30). The offended party is, when necessary, to go to the offender and try to bring him to repentance (Lk. 17:3).

fork. This term occurs in English Bible versions as the rendering of various words. BEZALEL, the chief architect of the TABERNACLE, was also a skillful metal artificer, and among the implements he made for it were bronze forks (Exod. 27:3; 38:3; Num. 4:14). DAVID provided gold to make implements, including forks, for the TEMPLE, and HIRAM made some of bronze (1 Chr. 28:17; 2 Chr. 4:16). What appears to be the same device is described as a three-pronged instrument used to remove meat from a boiling pot (1 Sam. 2:13-14). A WINNOWING FORK is referred to both in the OT (Jer. 15:7) and in the NT (Matt. 3:12; Lk. 3:17), used figuratively of God's JUDGMENT.

former rain. See RAIN.

fornication. This English term, which generally refers to sexual intercourse between persons not married to each other, is used by the KJV and other versions a few times in the OT (e.g., Ezek. 16:26), but primarily in the NT to render the Greek noun porneia G4518 (usually translated "sexual immorality" in the NIV). Out of seven lists of evils in the writings of PAUL, this Greek word (or the related adjective pornos G4521) is included in five of them (1 Cor. 5:11; 6:9; Gal. 5:19; Eph. 5:3; Col. 3:5) and is first on the list each time. Because the term can be applied to various situations, its meaning must be determined by the context of each passage.

fort, fortification, fortress. Every major CITY in ancient times was fortified by a wall and its citadel. The KJV often speaks of such cities as “fenced,” the NIV as “fortified.” Even before the Israelites entered Canaan, they were terrified by the reports of cities “fortified and very large” (Num. 13; Deut. 1:28). JERUSALEM was so well fortified by the JEBUSITES that it was not until the time of DAVID that the city was captured by the Israelites. Usually the city was built on a hill, and the fortifications followed the natural contour of the hill. Many times there was both an inner and an outer wall. The walls were built of brick and stone and were many feet thick. After the Israelites entered the land they too built fortified cities (Deut. 28:52; 2 Sam. 20:6).

Fortunatus. for´chuh-nay´tuhs (Gk. Phortounatos G5847, from Lat. fortunatus, “blessed, fortunate”). A prominent member of the Corinthian church, mentioned only in 1 Cor. 16:17 (some MSS also insert it in v. 15). He is named second in a three-man delegation that brought a letter from the church to PAUL at EPHESUS (cf. 7:1). Their presence “refreshed” Paul, giving him the desired contact with that church. They may have returned with the letter that we call 1 CORINTHIANS (cf. the subscription at the end of the letter according to many MSS, followed by the KJV).

Fortune. See GAD (DEITY).

fortune-telling. See DIVINATION.

forty. A frequently mentioned NUMBER in the Bible, often having symbolical significance. It was used as the approximate time span of a generation and to designate an extended period of testing, repentance, vigil, or punishment. It is associated with important new developments in the unfolding drama of redemption, such as the FLOOD, the EXODUS, the united monarchy, ELIJAH and the prophetic era, the life of CHRIST, and the birth of the CHURCH (Gen. 7:4, 12, 17; 8:6; Exod. 24:18; Num. 14:33; 32:13; Deut. 9:25; 2 Sam. 5:4; 1 Ki. 11:42; Jon. 3:4; Matt. 4:2; Acts 1:3; 7:23, 29-30).

Forum Appii. See APPIUS, FORUM OF.

foundation. The basis on which something stands or is supported. The word is used of the CREATION, when God “laid the earth’s foundation” (Job 38:4; Ps. 78:69). In contrast with the disappearance of the wicked, the righteous are “an everlasting foundation” (Prov. 10:25 KJV; NIV, “stand firm forever”). This heightens the description of the Lord’s anger as causing the foundations of the earth to tremble (Isa. 24:18), as well as mountains (Ps. 18:7) and heaven (2 Sam. 22:8). The NT speaks of the man who built his foundation on a rock (Lk. 6:48). CHRIST is the foundation of the CHURCH (1 Cor. 3:11); the apostles and prophets are the foundation on which Christians are built, with Christ as the chief cornerstone (Eph. 2:20), and a good foundation can be built up by those “rich in this present world” by valuing more highly God’s rich bounty (1 Tim. 6:17-19). And God’s “solid foundation” stands firm and immovable (2 Tim. 2:19).

Foundation Gate. This name occurs only in the account of JOSIAH’s coronation (2 Chr. 23:5); in the parallel passage it is called SUR (2 Ki. 11:6). The location of this gate is unknown; it was probably on an inner perimeter, close to the temple and the palace (some have thought it was the same as the HORSE GATE, where ATHALIAH was put to death, 2 Ki. 11:16; 2 Chr. 23:15).

fountain. A spring of water issuing from the earth. In a country near the desert, all sources of water, such as springs, pools, pits, cisterns, and fountains, are of great importance. Many towns and other locations are named for the springs at their sites: ENAIM, “two springs” (Gen. 38:21); EN GEDI, “spring of young goat” (Josh. 15:62); and a dozen others (cf. English “Springfield” or the French “Fontaine-bleau”). In the story of the FLOOD, “the fountains of the great deep” were broken up (Gen. 7:11 KJV), referring to the great convulsions of the earth’s surface that, with the rain, caused the deluge; in the preparation of the earth, the Son of God (Wisdom personified) was with the Father before there were “springs abounding with water” (Prov. 8:24). The word is used both literally and figuratively, both pleasantly and unpleasantly. Figuratively, it refers in the KJV to the source of hemorrhages (Lev. 20:18; Mk. 5:29). In Proverbs, compare “a muddied spring or a polluted well” (25:26) with “a fountain of life” (13:14; 14:27). In the bridegroom’s praise of his pure bride (Cant. 4:15) she is “a garden fountain.” In the curse of EPHRAIM (Hos. 13:15), “his spring will fail” is a terrible punishment; but on the pleasant side, DAVID speaks (Ps. 36:9) of “the fountain of life,” as being with the Lord. In the Lord’s conversation with the woman at the well (Jn. 4:14), he told her of “a spring of water welling up to eternal life.” Among the delights of heaven will be “the spring of the water of life” (Rev. 21:6).

Fountain Gate. One of the entrances to JERUSALEM, mentioned after the EXILE (Neh. 2:14; 3:15; 12:37). Located in the SE section of the wall restored after the return, it was apparently adjacent to “the steps of the City of David on the ascent to the wall,” and near “the house of David” and “the Water Gate on the east” (12:37). A Bronze Age tower recently excavated may have been part of the Fountain Gate.

fowl. See BIRDS.

fowler. A bird-catcher. Because fowlers used snares, gins, bird-lime, etc. and caught their prey by trickery, “fowler” is used to describe those who try to ensnare the unwary and bring them to ruin (Ps. 91:3; 124:7).

fox. See ANIMALS.

frankincense. See PLANTS.

freedman. This term, referring to an emancipated SLAVE, is used by the NIV and other versions to render Greek apeleutheros G592, which occurs only once in a figurative sense: “For he who was a slave when he was called by the Lord is the Lord’s freedman; similarly, he who was a free man [eleutheros G1801] when he was called is Christ’s slave” (1 Cor. 7:22; cf. Gal. 4:22-23, 30; Rev. 6:15). See also FREEDMEN, SYNAGOGUE OF THE; LIBERTY.

Freedmen, Synagogue of the. When STEPHEN began to perform wonders among the people, he was opposed by “members of the Synagogue of the Freedmen (as it was called)—Jews of Cyrene and Alexandria as well as the provinces of Cilicia and Asia” (Acts 6:9; KJV, “Libertines”). In this passage, the Greek word for FREEDMAN is not apeleutheros G592 but the Latin loanword Libertinos G3339. The Synagogue of the Freedmen has been linked by some to a first-century inscription that mentions the building of a SYNAGOGUE by its chief and priest Theodotus, son of Vettenu.

freedom. See LIBERTY.

freewill offering. See SACRIFICE AND OFFERINGS.

fret. This English verb, in its common intransitive meaning “to be vexed, troubled,” appears rarely in modern versions (the NIV and NRSV, e.g., use it in Ps. 37:1, 7-8; Prov. 24:19). The word, however, had a broader meaning in the time of the KJV, which uses it to render various Hebrew terms. Note, for example, the expression “a fretting leprosy” (Lev. 13:51-52; NIV, “a destructive mildew”), as well as the meaning “become annoyed, angry” (Isa. 8:21).

friend, friendship. Besides references to friendship in various forms, such as HOSPITALITY, the term friend occurs frequently in the Bible. Although the word can be used as a simple term of familiar, kindly address (Matt. 20:13; 22:12), it usually means a well-disposed acquaintance, dependable companion, or helpful neighbor (Gen. 38:20; Jer. 6:21; Lk. 11:5-8; 14:10; 15:6, 9), a political adherent (1 Sam. 30:26; 2 Sam. 3:8; 15:37; 1 Ki. 4:5; Jn. 19:12), or a person dear as one’s own soul (Deut. 13:6 KJV). There are false friends as well as true ones (Prov. 18:24); friends who fail one (Job 6:14, 27; Lam. 1:2; Zech. 13:6) as well as friends who prove faithful (Ps. 35:14; Prov. 17:17; Jn. 15:13).

Perhaps the most notable instance of human friendship in the Bible is that of DAVID and JONATHAN (1 Sam. 18:1-4; 19:1-7; 20:1-42; 2 Sam. 1:25-26). According to some scholars, PAUL’s epistle to the PHILIPPIANS exhibits the formal characteristics of Greco-Roman “letters of friendship” or “family letters.” The highest friendship the Bible speaks of is friendship with God (esp. ABRAHAM’s, 2 Chr. 20:7; Isa. 41:8; Jas. 2:23), whose direct opposite, enmity with God, is friendship with the world (Jas. 4:4).

fringe. See TASSEL.

frog. See ANIMALS.

frontlet. See DRESS.

frost. Usual in winter on the hills and high plains in Bible lands. Frosts in the late spring do great damage to fruit. The MANNA in the wilderness is compared to frost (Exod. 16:14). Frost is an evidence of God’s power (Job 38:29).

fruit. The fruits most often mentioned in Scripture are the grape, pomegranate, fig, olive, and apple, all of which are grown today. The word fruit is often used metaphorically: “the fruit of your womb” (Deut. 7:13), “the fruit of their schemes” (Prov. 1:31). The fruit of the HOLY SPIRIT consists of the Christian virtues (Gal. 5:22-23).

fruits, first. See FIRSTFRUITS.

fuel. In ancient times, wood, charcoal, various kinds of thorn bushes, dried grass, and the dung of camels and cattle were used as fuel. There is no evidence that coal was used by the Hebrews as fuel; their houses had no chimneys (Isa. 9:5, 19; Ezek. 4:12; 15:4, 6; 21:32).

fulfillment. See ESCHATOLOGY; FULLNESS OF TIME; PROPHETS.

fuller. See OCCUPATIONS AND PROFESSIONS.

fuller's field. An area just outside of JERUSALEM where fullers or washermen washed the cloth material they were processing. A highway and a conduit for water passed through it (Isa. 7:3; 36:2; NIV, “Washerman’s Field”). It was so near the city that the Assyrian Rabshakeh, standing and speaking in the field, could be heard by those on the city wall (2 Ki. 18:17). Its exact site is uncertain.

fuller's soap. An alkali prepared from the ashes of certain plants and used for cleansing and fulling new cloth. The word is used figuratively in Mal. 3:2 (NIV, “launderer’s soap”).

fullness of time. This expression, used by PAUL in Gal. 4:4, indicates the “right” or “proper” time for Christ’s advent. The expression does not mean the “full term” of prenatal human life (“born of woman”), but rather the right time chosen by the Father (“God sent forth”). This “right time” was determined by God’s plan of REDEMPTION and prepared for by historical developments: the completion of the OT era and messianic expectation, as well as cultural, political, and religious factors in the Roman world. These developments provided fertile soil for the ministry of the MESSIAH, the founding of the CHURCH, and the rapid spread of the GOSPEL. Paul's language, however, calls attention to the theme of eschatological fulfillment: Jesus' coming marks "the last days" when God's promises are coming to pass. See also ESCHATOLOGY.

funeral. The word does not occur in the KJV, and in the NIV is found only twice, both times as an adjective (Jer. 16:5; 34:5). Funeral rites differed with the place, the religion, and the times; except for royal BURIALS in Egypt, the elaborate ceremonies we use today were not held. Generally in Palestine there was no embalment and the body was buried a few hours after death, sometimes in a tomb but more often in a cave. Coffins were unknown. The body was washed and often anointed with aromatic spices (Jn. 12:7; 19:39). The procession of mourners, made up of relatives and friends of the deceased, was led by professional mourning women, whose shrieks and lamentations pierced the air. It was an insult to a man's reputation to be refused proper burial (Jer. 22:19). The "Tombs of the Kings" on the east side of JERUSALEM and the "garden tomb" (where some believe that our Lord's body was laid) are evidences of the two types of burial. In Egypt the bodies were embalmed so skillfully that many of them are recognizable today after the lapse of thousands of years.

furlong. See WEIGHTS AND MEASURES.

furnace. This term is used to translate a variety of words, especially Hebrew kûr H3929, which refers to a furnace for smelting metals (Prov. 17:3; 27:21). In the Bible the word is used only in the metaphorical sense of suffering permitted by God in punishment or discipline. The deliverance of Israel from Egypt was like being taken from the midst of an iron-smelting furnace (Deut. 4:20; 1 Ki. 8:51; Jer. 11:4). God told Israel that he had refined them in the furnace of affliction (Isa. 48:10). See OVEN.

Furnaces, Tower of the. See OVENS, TOWER OF THE.

furnishings, furniture. In the Bible the principal reference to furnishings is in the articles in and about the TABERNACLE and the TEMPLE. The main items were the large altar and the laver, outside; then the table of the bread of the Presence, the lampstand or "candlestick," and the altar of incense in the Holy Place; then in the Most Holy Place the ark of the covenant (Exod. 25-40). Generally beds were mats, spread on the floor and rolled up during the day, though Og of BASHAN is said to have had a bed of iron (Deut. 3:11). The tables in OT times were generally very low and people sat on the floor to eat. Royal tables were often higher (Jdg. 1:7), as were those in NT times (Mk. 7:28).

furrow. The long trench made by a plow in its path (Job 31:38; 39:10; Ps. 65:10; et al.). The furrow was usually made with a single-handled wooden plow pulled by an animal. Iron was available after DAVID's period, but wood continued to be used in many instances. See AGRICULTURE.

future life. See ESCHATOLOGY; LIFE.

G

Gaal. gay´uhl (Heb. gaʿal H1720, possibly “beetle” or “loathing”). Son of Ebed and leader of a revolt against ABIMELECH son of GIDEON (Jdg. 9:26-41). Gaal and his relatives had moved into SHECHEM and had gained the trust of the city’s inhabitants. While they were having a great banquet, Gaal and the Shechemites became drunk and scoffed at Abimelech. In the midst of their revelry, Gaal boasted that with adequate support he could overthrow Abimelech. When ZEBUL, the ruler of Shechem, heard this, he sent word to Abimelech urging him to quell the rebellion at once. He advised Abimelech to set an ambush around the city during the night. The next morning, as Gaal and Zebul stood in the city gate watching, they saw the troops of Abimelech arise from hiding and approach the city. Zebul challenged Gaal to make good his boast to overthrow Abimelech. Gaal and his men were defeated and driven from the field, and they were repulsed from the city by Zebul. The next day Abimelech captured Shechem, destroyed it, and sowed it with salt. This was seen by the Scripture writer as the just judgment of God on the Shechemites who supported Abimelech in the assassination of his seventy brothers (cf. vv. 56-57).

Gaash. gay´ash (Heb. gaʿaš H1724, “quake”). A name used to identify a mountain and its ravines. Mount Gaash is described as being in the hill country of EPHRAIM and just S of TIMNATH SERAH, where JOSHUA was buried (Josh. 24:30; Jdg. 2:9). The ravines are referred to as the area from which HIDDAI, one of David’s mighty men, came (2 Sam. 23:30; 1 Chr. 11:32 [Hurai]). The precise location is unknown, but it must have been approximately 20 mi. (32 km.) SW of SHECHEM and 15 mi. (24 km.) NW of JERUSALEM.

Gaba. See GEBÄ.

Gabbai. gab´bi (Heb. gabbay H1480, possibly “[tax] gatherer”). One of the leaders from BENJAMIN who volunteered to settle in JERUSALEM after the return from the EXILE (Neh. 11:8). Instead of the two names “Gabbai, Sallai,” some scholars emend the Hebrew text to read “men of valor” (cf. ESV).

Gabbatha. gab'uh-thuh (Gk. Gabbatha G1119; possibly from Aram. gbt ܓܒܬ, a word of uncertain meaning). The ARAMAIC (KJV, “Hebrew”) name for “the Stone Pavement,” an unknown location in JERUSALEM where PILATE judged Jesus (Jn. 19:13). The fact that Gabbatha lay outside the PRAETORIUM (governor’s residence, 19:9, 13) would indicate either the palace of HEROD in the W part of Jerusalem or the fortress of ANTONIA in the E. The latter, at the NW corner of the TEMPLE area, has been favored by the identification at this spot of a large area of pavement, beneath the present church of the Dames de Sion, as belonging to the fortress. Some of the stone slabs still bear marks suggestive of Roman soldiers’ games. However, more recent work indicates that this pavement was not built prior to A.D. 70, and so Gabbatha should probably be identified with a podium that apparently stood on the E side of Herod’s palace.

Gabriel. gay'bree-uhl (Heb. gabrî'el H1508, “[strong] man of God” or “God is my warrior”; Gk. Gabriēl G1120). An ANGEL mentioned four times in Scripture, each time bringing a momentous message. He interpreted to DANIEL the vision of the ram and the goat (Dan. 8:16-17); later he explained the vision of the seventy weeks (9:21-22). Gabriel announced to ZECHARIAH the birth of JOHN THE BAPTIST, forerunner of the MESSIAH (Lk. 1:11-20); and he was sent to Mary with the unique message of Jesus’ birth (1:26-38). His credentials are the ideal for every messenger of God: “I am Gabriel. I stand in the presence of God, and I have been sent to speak to you and to tell you this good news” (1:19). The Bible does not define his status as an angel, but he appears as an archangel in the PSEUDEPIGRAPHIA (1 Enoch 9 et al.).

Gad. gad (gād H1514, “fortunate”). (1) Seventh son of JACOB; he was the firstborn of ZILPAH, LEAH’s handmaid (Gen. 30:9-11). Of his personal life nothing is known except that he had seven sons at the time of the descent into EGYPT (46:16).

Tribal territory of Gad.

The tribe descended from Gad numbered 45,650 adult males at the census at SINAI (Num. 1:24-25), but at the second census their number had fallen to 40,500 (26:18). Their position on the march was S of the TABERNACLE, next to REUBEN. These two tribes and the half-tribe of MANASSEH remained shepherds like their forefathers, and because of their “very large herds and flocks” (32:1) they requested of MOSES the rich pasture lands E of JORDAN for their possession. This was granted (Josh. 18:7) on the condition that they accept their responsibility and accompany the nine and a half tribes across Jordan in warfare against the Canaanites. The warriors of these two and a half tribes took the lead in the conquest of W Palestine (1:12-18; 4:12) and returned to their families with JOSHUA’s blessing (22:1-9). Fearing that the Jordan would alienate their children from the fellowship and faith of the western tribes, they erected a huge altar as evidence of their unity in race and faith (22:10-34; see Ed). A satisfactory explanation removed the thought of war, which seemed inevitable at first.

The territory of the Gadites, difficult to define, had formerly been ruled by SIHON, king of the AMORITES. It lay chiefly in the center of the land E of Jordan, with the half-tribe of Manasseh on the N and Reuben to the S. The northern border reached as far as the Sea of KINNERETH (Josh. 13:27); the southern border seems to have been just above HESHBON (13:26), though cities below Heshbon were built by Gad (Num. 32:34). One of these is DIBON, where the famous MOABITE STONE was found.

Jacob's words in Gen. 49:19 seem to describe the military prowess of the Gadites. MOSES said of them: "Blessed is he who enlarges Gad's domain! Gad lives there like a lion" (Deut. 33:20). Because they trusted in the Lord and cried to him for help, they totally defeated the HAGRITES (1 Chr. 5:18-22). It was natural for men of such faith and ability to extend their borders as far as GILEAD (5:16). The Gadites who joined DAVID were "brave warriors, ready for battle.... Their faces were the faces of lions, and they were as swift as gazelles in the mountains" (12:8). Other famous men of Gilead or Gad were BARZILLAI (2 Sam. 17:27; 19:31-40) and ELIJAH. The land of Gad was along the battlefield between SYRIA and ISRAEL (2 Ki. 10:33). Gad finally was carried captive by ASSYRIA (2 Ki. 15:29; 1 Chr. 5:26), and AMMON seized their land and cities (Jer. 49:1).

(2) The seer or prophet of King DAVID. He advised David to get out of the stronghold and flee from SAUL into Judah (1 Sam. 22:5). Later he gave David his choice of punishment from the Lord for his sin in numbering the soldiers of Israel (24:11-17; 1 Chr. 21:9-17) and told him to build an altar to the Lord on the threshing floor of ARAUNAH (2 Sam. 24:18). Gad assisted in arranging the musical services of the TEMPLE (2 Chr. 29:25) and recorded the acts of David in a book (1 Chr. 29:29).

Gad (deity). gad (Heb. gad H1513, "fortune"). A Semitic god of good fortune, mentioned with MENI (Isa. 65:11; modern versions usually render these two names respectively as "Fortune" and "Destiny"). Some scholars find a reference to this deity in LEAH's naming of GAD, her son through ZILPAH (Gen. 30:11). The popularity of the worship of this god among the Canaanites may be reflected in the place names BAAL GAD (Josh. 11:17; cf. 12:7; 13:5) and MIGDAL GAD (15:37; cf. also the personal names GADDI and GADDIEL, Num. 13:10, 11). Gad has sometimes been equated with the Babylonian god MARDUK and with the planet Jupiter. See also DESTINY.

Gad, river (valley) of. According to the KJV, the commanders in charge of DAVID's census encamped "in Aroer, on the right side of the city that lieth in the midst of the river of Gad, and toward Jazer” (2 Sam. 24:5; ASV, “the Valley of Gad”). This rendering is problematic, however. Recent versions have a comma after the word “river” or “valley” (NIV, “gorge”) and translate the rest of the verse, “toward Gad and on to Jazer” (NRSV; similarly NIV, “and then went through Gad and on to Jazer”).

Gadara, one of the Decapolis cities, was a few miles SE of the Sea of Galilee (the lake is visible on the top right).

Gadara, Gadarene. gad´uh-ruh, gad´uh-reen (Gk. Gadara [not found in NT], Gadarēnos G1123). Gadara was a city of TRANSJORDAN, about 6 mi. (10 km.) SE of the southern end of the Sea of Galilee, and one of the cities of the DECAPOLIS. Its inhabitants, the Gadarenes, were predominantly non-Jewish. The only NT reference to the Gadarenes is the account of the healing of two demoniacs and the drowning of the swine in the Sea of Galilee (Matt. 8:28). The parallel passages, which mention only one demoniac, refer to the same episode, but they use the term “Gerasenes” (Mk. 5:1; Lk. 8:26; cf. v. 37). In all of these references there are textual variants, reflecting some difficulty in the identification of the place. This problem is resolved if one remembers that each reference is to the country of the Gadarenes-Gerasenes. The geographical and historical sources suggest that the area designations probably overlapped; Gadara was the chief city of the immediate area, whereas Gerasa may have referred to a wider area. Matthew gives a specific reference to the Gadarenes, Mark and Luke a more general reference to Gerasenes. Although topographical maps show hills all along the SE shore of the Sea of Galilee, geographers who visited the area say the only place to locate the drowning swine incident is a strip of steep coastline near Gergesa, the present-day Kersa (see GERASENE). Gadara is identified today as Muqeis, or Umm Qeis, overlooking the S valley of the Yarmuk River. The ruins are extensive, including remnants of two amphitheatres, a basilica, a temple, colonnades, large residences, and an aqueduct, all showing the size, beauty, and importance of the city. Another Gadara is mentioned by JOSEPHUS as “the capital of Perea” (War 4.7.3), but he may have confused it with Gerasa.

Gaddi. gad´di (Heb. gaddî H1534, possibly “my [good] fortune” or short form of GADDIEL). Son of Susi, a leader of the tribe of MANASSEH, and one of the twelve spies whom MOSES sent from the wilderness of PARAN to spy out the land of Canaan (Num. 13:11).

Gaddiel. gad´ee-uhl (Heb. gaddî ʾēl H1535, possibly “my fortune is God”). Son of Sodi, a leader of the tribe of ZEBULUN, and one of the twelve spies whom MOSES sent from the wilderness of PARAN to spy out the land of Canaan (Num. 13:10).

gadfly. See ANIMALS.

Gadi. gay´di (Heb. gādî H1533, possibly “my [good] fortune” or short form of GADDIEL). The father of MENAHEM, king of Israel (2 Ki. 15:14, 17).

Gadite. gad´it. See GAD.

Gaham. gay´ham (Heb. gaḥam H1626, possibly “bright flame”). Son of NAHOR (brother of ABRAHAM) by his concubine REUMAH (Gen. 22:24).

Gahar. gay´hahr (Heb. gaḥar H1627, derivation uncertain). The ancestor of some temple servants (NETHINIM) who returned with ZERUBBABEL from exile in BABYLON (Ezra 2:47; Neh. 7:49).

Gai. gi (Heb. gay ʾ H1628, “valley”). According to some, Gai was the name of a place mentioned together with EKRON as the limit to which the Israelites chased the PHILISTINES after the victory of DAVID over GOLIATH (1 Sam. 17:52 ASV; KJV, “the valley”). On the basis of some MSS of the SEPTUAGINT, the NIV and other modern versions emend the Hebrew text to read GATH.

Gaius. gay'yuh's (Gk. Gaios G1127, from Lat. Gaius [for Gavius, from gaudeo, "rejoice"], a very common name often abbreviated C. for Caius). (1) A Macedonian Christian; as a travel companion of PAUL, he and ARISTARCHUS were seized by the mob during the Ephesian riot (Acts 19:29).

(2) A Christian from DERBE, listed among those waiting for Paul at TROAS (Acts 20:4). The men mentioned here were apparently the delegates assigned by the churches to go with Paul to Jerusalem with the collection (see CONTRIBUTION).

(3) A Christian in CORINTH; one of two men whom Paul names as having been baptized by him, contrary to his usual practice (1 Cor. 1:14, 17). He is doubtless the same as the Gaius who provided hospitality for Paul when he wrote ROMANS from Corinth on the third journey (Rom. 16:23). That he was host also to "the whole church" implies that the Corinthian church met in his spacious home. Tradition has made him the bishop of THESSALONICA, and some would identify him with Titius JUSTUS (Acts 18:7).

(4) The addressee of John's third epistle (3 Jn. 1). The apostle had a deep affection for him, commended him for his hospitality, and desired his continued support for missionaries (vv. 2-8).

Galal. gay'lal (Heb. gālāl H1674, possibly "tortoise"). (1) One of the Levites who resettled in JERUSALEM after the EXILE (1 Chr. 9:15). He is not identified in any other way.

(2) Son of JEDUTHUN and grandfather of OBADIAH (Abda); the latter is listed among the Levites who resettled in Jerusalem after the exile (1 Chr. 9:16; Neh. 11:17). Since Jedu-thun was a prominent temple musician (1 Chr. 16:42 et al.), it is likely that both this Galal and #1 above, as well as the other Levites mentioned in the passage, had the same profession.

Galatia. guh-lay'shuh (Gk. Galatia G1130). The designation in NT times of (1) a broad territory in north-central Asia Minor and (2) a Roman PROVINCE covering a smaller region in the southern part of that territory, but some additional areas as well. The name was derived from the people called Keltai, that is, Celtic tribes from ancient Gallia or Gaul (roughly modern France and Belgium). After having invaded MACEDONIA and GREECE about 280 B.C., they crossed into Asia Minor on the invitation of Nikomedes I, king of BITHYNIA, to aid him in a civil war. After ravaging far and wide, they were finally confined to the north-central part of Asia Minor, where they settled as conquerors and gave their name to the territory. Their chief city-centers were Ancyra, Pessinus, and Ravium. In 189 B.C. the Galatians were subjugated by ROME and continued as a subject kingdom under their own chiefs, and after 63 B.C. under kings. On the death of King Amyntas in 25 B.C., the Galatian kingdom was converted into a Roman province called Galatia. The province included not only some of the area inhabited by the Galatians but also parts of PHRYGIA, PISIDIA, LYCAONIA, and Isauria. The term Galatia henceforth carried a double connotation: (1) geographically, to designate the territory inhabited by the Galatians; (2) politically, to denote the entire Roman province. The cities of ANTIOCH, ICONIUM, LYSTRA, and DERBE, evangelized by PAUL on his first missionary journey, were in the province of Galatia.

Overview of GALATIANS

Author: The apostle PAUL.

Historical setting: Disputed. According to one view, Paul was writing to churches in the northern region of GALATIA during his third journey (c. A.D. 55), probably from EPHESUS (perhaps from elsewhere during the second journey c. A.D. 51). According to others, the letter was written from Syrian ANTIOCH to communities in the Roman province of southern Galatia prior to the Jerusalem Council of Acts 15 (A.D. 49), making Galatians the earliest Pauline letter known. A third view accepts that the addressees were South Galatians, but dates the letter after the council. In any case, this epistle was motivated by the Galatians' error in accepting the JUDAIZERS' doctrine, namely, that GENTILES must be circumcised and submit to the Mosaic LAW if they want to be part of the people of God.

Purpose: To counter the message of the false teachers by demonstrating the truth of the GOSPEL of GRACE, including its implications for Christian conduct.

Contents: After an introductory paragraph (Gal. 1:1-10), the apostle defends his authority (1:11—2:21), expounds the doctrine of JUSTIFICATION by FAITH (3:1—4:31), clarifies the nature of Christian liberty (5:1—6:10), and ends with some forceful statements (6:11-18).

The name Galatia occurs in 1 Cor. 16:1; Gal. 1:2; 2 Tim. 4:10; and 1 Pet. 1:1 (in the last passage some scholars think the reference may be to the European Gaul). In Acts 16:6 and 18:23 LUKE uses the adjective in a phrase that probably means “the Phrygian-Galatian region.” Although some have thought that the reference here is to the old ethnographic designations, others have argued that it means the section of Phrygian territory that was included in the new province of Galatia. Paul’s general practice of using political designations points to that usage also in Gal. 1:2 and 1 Cor. 16:1. If Galatia in Gal. 1:2 refers to the Roman province, then the churches addressed were those founded on the first missionary journey (Acts 13-14); those who believe it means the old ethnographic territory of Galatia have to posit a period of Pauline evangelization of that area not described by Acts.

Galatians, Letter to the. guh-lay’shuhnzh. A letter addressed by the apostle PAUL to the Christian churches in GALATIA. It is a short but very important document, containing his passionate polemic against the perversion or contamination of the GOSPEL of God’s GRACE. It has aptly been described as “the Magna Carta of spiritual emancipation,” and it remains as the abiding monument of the liberation of Christianity from the trammels of legalism.

The contents of the letter so unmistakably reveal the traces of Paul’s mind and style that its genuineness has never been seriously questioned even by the most radical NT critics. The testimony of the early church to its integrity and Pauline origin is strong and unambiguous. Written to “the churches of Galatia,” it is the only letter by Paul that is specifically addressed to a group of churches. They were all founded by Paul (Gal. 1:8, 11; 4:19-20), were all the fruit of a single mission (3:1-3; 4:13-14), and were all affected by the same disturbance (1:6-7; 5:7-9). Paul had preached to them the gospel of the free grace of God through the death of Christ (1:6; 3:1-14). The Galatians warmly and affectionately received Paul and his message (4:12-15). The converts willingly endured persecution for their faith (3:4) and “were running a good race” when Paul left them (5:7).

The startling information received by Paul that a sudden and drastic change in attitude toward him and his gospel was taking place in the Galatian churches caused the writing of the letter. Certain Jewish teachers, who professed to be Christians and acknowledged Jesus as MESSIAH, were obscuring the simplicity of the gospel of free grace with their propaganda. They insisted that to faith in Christ must be added CIRCUMCISION and obedience to the Mosaic LAW (Gal. 2:16; 3:2-3; 4:10, 21; 5:2-4; 6:12). Paul realized clearly that this teaching neutralized the truth of Christ’s all-sufficiency for salvation and destroyed the message of justification by faith. By means of this letter Paul sought to save his converts from this fatal mixing of law and grace.

Because of the geographical and the political connotation of Galatia in NT times, two views concerning the location of the Galatian churches are advocated. The North-Galatian theory, which interprets the term in its old ethnographic sense to denote the territory inhabited by the Galatian tribes, locates the churches in north-central Asia Minor, holding that they were founded during the second missionary journey (according to a debated interpretation of Acts 16:6). The South-Galatian theory identifies these churches with those founded on the first missionary journey (Acts 13-14), located in the Roman PROVINCE of Galatia. The former was the unanimous view of the church fathers. They naturally adopted that meaning since in the second century the province was again restricted to ethnic Galatia and the double meaning of the term disappeared. The majority of the modern commentators support the latter view for the following reasons: it was Paul's habit to use provincial names in addressing his converts; it best explains the familiar reference to Barnabas in the letter; Acts 16:6 gives no hint of such a protracted mission as the older view demands; the older view cannot explain why the Judaizers would bypass the important churches in South Galatia; known conditions in these churches fit the picture in the letter.

Views concerning the place and date of composition are even more diverse. Advocates of the North-Galatian theory generally assign the letter to Paul's third missionary journey, probably while the apostle was in EPHESUS. South-Galatian advocates vary considerably; some place it before the Jerusalem Conference (and written from Syrian ANTIOCH), others place it on the second missionary journey (perhaps during the ministry at CORINTH), and others place it as late as the third missionary journey.

The effort to date it before the Jerusalem Conference faces definite chronological difficulties. This early dating is not demanded by the silence of the letter concerning the conference decrees; the decrees were already known to the Galatians (Acts 16:4), and Paul, in writing the letter, would desire to establish his position on grounds independent of the Jerusalem church. Since he had apparently already visited the churches twice (Gal. 1:9; 4:13), a date after Paul's second visit to the churches in S Galatia seems most probable (c. A.D. 52). During that second visit Paul had sought by warning and instructions to fortify his converts against the danger (1:9; 4:16; 5:3). The impact of the Judaizers on the Galatians threatened to destroy his work. The result was this bristling letter.

The contents of Galatians make evident Paul's purpose in writing. The first two chapters show that he was compelled to vindicate his apostolic authority. The Judaizers, in order to establish their own position, which contradicted Paul's teaching, had attempted to discredit his authority. Having vindicated his apostolic call and authority, Paul next sets forth the doctrine of JUSTIFICATION to refute the teaching of the Judaizers. A reasoned, comprehensive exposition of the doctrine of justification by faith exposed the errors of legalism. Since the Judaizers asserted that to remove the believer from under the law opened the floodgates to immorality, Paul concluded his presentation with an elaboration of the true effect of liberty on the Christian life, showing that the truth of justification by faith logically leads to a life of good works. The letter may be outlined as follows:

- I. The introduction (Gal. 1:1-10).
 - A. The salutation (1:1-5).
 - B. The rebuke (1:6-10).
- II. The vindication of his apostolic authority (1:11—2:21).
 - A. The reception of his gospel by revelation (1:11-24).
 - B. The confirmation of his gospel by the apostles at Jerusalem (2:1-10).
 - C. The illustration of his independence (2:11-21).
- III. The exposition of justification by faith (3:1—4:31).
 - A. The elaboration of the doctrine (3:1—4:7).
 - 1. The nature of justification by faith (3:1-14).
 - 2. The limitations of the law and its relations to faith (3:15—4:7).
 - B. The appeal to drop all legalism (4:8-31).
- IV. The nature of the life of Christian liberty (5:1—6:10).
 - A. The call to maintain their liberty (5:1).
 - B. The peril of Christian liberty (5:2-12).
 - C. The life of liberty (5:13—6:10).
- V. The conclusion (6:11-18).

Galeed. gal'ee-ed (Heb. gal'ēd H1681, “[stone] heap of witness”). The Hebrew name that JACOB gave to the heap of stones erected as a memorial to the covenant of reconciliation and nonaggression between himself and LABAN, his father-in-law (Gen. 31:47-48). Laban called the heap of stones JEGAR SAHADUTHA (Aram. for “heap of witness”), and it was also known as MITZPAH (“watchtower,” v. 49). Some have identified Galeed with Khirbet Jel'ad, S of the JABBOK River, but others think the incident took place before Jacob crossed the river on his way S. This story perhaps provides the reason why this territory in TRANSJORDAN has been named GILEAD (cf. Gen. 31:25).

Galilean. gal'uh-lee'uhn (Gk. Galilaios G1134, from Heb. gālīl H1665, "Galilee"). KJV Galilaean. The name applied by both Jews and Gentiles to the inhabitants of GALILEE, the portion of Syria-Palestine N of the Plain of ESDRAELON and spreading E to the shores of the Lake of Galilee and W to the Mediterranean Sea. This area was little settled by the Jews after the return from the EXILE, but later the Hasmoneans (see MACCABEES) conquered it and incorporated its mixed population of Arameans and Hellenistic peoples into the Jewish state. It was to these people that JOHN THE BAPTIST and JESUS CHRIST had preached, and from this group the first circle of our Lord's disciples were drawn and his closest apostles chosen (cf. Jn. 4:45). In the Gospels and Acts it is clear that Galileans were easily distinguishable to their fellow Jews by their speech. The classic passage is, of course, the accusation by the bystanders against Simon PETER and his denial (Mk. 14:70; Lk. 22:59; cf. also Acts 2:7). The characteristic of this speech was no doubt its vocabulary, accent, and syntax.

Galilee. gal'uh-lee (Heb. gālīl H1665, used with the definite article and meaning "the circuit, the district"; Gk. Galilaia G1133). The geographical area in PALESTINE bounded on the N by the Li-tani (Leontes) River, on the W by the MEDITERRANEAN Sea to Mount CARMEL, on the S by the northern edge of the Plain of ESDRAELON (though at times the plain itself is included), and on the E by the JORDAN Valley and the Sea of Galilee. This region measures approximately 50 mi. (80 km.) N to S and 30 mi. (50 km.) E to W. The Plain of Esdraelon (or JEZREEL) was a vital communications link between the coastal plain and the center of Palestine. For this reason, decisive battles were often fought here for possession of this desirable pass. The city of MEGIDDO was important for the control of the valley, and lends its name to ARMAGEDDON, where the conflict between CHRIST and the armies of the ANTICHRIST is predicted to occur (Rev. 16:16).

An imaginary E-W line from the Plain of ACCO to the N end of the Sea of Galilee divided the country into Upper and Lower Galilee. "Galilee of the Gentiles" refers chiefly to Upper Galilee, which is separated from LEBANON by the Leontes River. It was the territory of ASHER and NAPHTALI, where the ruins of KEDESH Naphtali, one of the cities of refuge, can now be seen (Josh. 20:7; 21-32). In this region lay the twenty towns given by SOLOMON to HIRAM, king of TYRE, in payment for timber from Lebanon (1 Ki. 9:11). The land was luxurious and productive, a rugged mountainous country of oaks and terebinths interrupted by fertile plains. It was said that Asher in the W would eat fat for bread and yield royal dainties and dip his feet in oil (Gen. 49:20; Deut. 33:24-25). The olive OIL of Galilee has long been esteemed as of the highest quality. Lower Galilee was largely the heritage of ZEBULUN and ISSACHAR. Less hilly and of a milder climate than Upper Galilee, it included the rich Plain of Esdraelon and was a “pleasant” land (Gen. 49:15) that would yield “treasures hidden in the sand” (Deut. 33:19). The sand of these coasts was especially valuable for making glass. Important caravan trade routes carried their busy traffic through Galilee from EGYPT and S Palestine to DAMASCUS in the NE as well as E and W from the Mediterranean to the Far East.

The northern part of Naphtali was inhabited by a mixed race of Jews and pagans (Jdg. 1:33). Its Israelite population was carried away captive to ASSYRIA and was replaced by a colony of pagan immigrants (2 Ki. 15:29; 17:24), hence called “Galilee of the nations [or Gentiles]” (Isa. 9:1; Matt. 4:13, 15-16). During and after the EXILE, the predominant mixture of Gentile races impoverished the worship of Judaism. For the same reason the Galilean accent and dialect were noticeably peculiar (Matt. 26:73). This caused the southern Jews of purer blood and orthodox tradition to despise them (Jn. 7:52). NATHANAEAL asked, rather contemptuously, “Nazareth! Can anything good come from there?” (1:46). Yet its very darkness was the Lord’s reason for granting more of the light of his presence and ministry to Galilee than to self-satisfied and privileged Judea. He was sent for “a light for the Gentiles” (Isa. 42:6) as well as to the “lost sheep of Israel” (Matt. 15:24). Wherever he found faith and repentance, he bestowed his blessing, whereas unbelief often hindered his activity (13:58). He preached his first public sermon in the synagogue at NAZARETH in Lower Galilee, where he had been brought up (Lk. 4:16-30). His disciples came from Galilee (Matt. 4:18; Jn. 1:43-44; Acts 1:11; 2:7); in CANA of Galilee he performed his first miracle (Jn. 2:11). CAPERNAUM in Galilee, which became his new home (Matt. 4:13; 9:1), is where the first three Gospels present his major ministry. Galilee’s debasement made some of its people feel their need of the Savior. This and its comparative freedom from priestly and pharisaical prejudice may have been additional reasons for its receiving the larger share of the Lord’s ministry.

Upper and Lower Galilee.

After the death of HEROD the Great in 4 B.C., Herod Antipas governed the tetrarchy of Galilee (Lk. 3:1) until A.D. 39. Jesus referred to him as “that fox” (13:32). Sepphoris was his capital at first, 3 mi. (5 km.) N of Nazareth, but about A.D. 20 he built a new capital on the shore of the Sea of Galilee and named it TIBERIAS, after the reigning emperor. Herod AGRIPPA I succeeded him and took the title of “king.” After his death in 44 (Acts 12:23) Galilee was joined for a while to the Roman province of SYRIA, after which it was given to AGRIPPA II. It became the land of ZEALOTS and patriots who, in their hatred of foreign rule and in their longing for the MESSIAH, incited the populace to rebellion, and this led Rome to destroy JERUSALEM in A.D. 70. After the fall of Jerusalem, Galilee became famous for its rabbis and schools of Jewish learning. The Sanhedrin or Great Council was moved to Sepphoris and then to Tiberias on the western shore of the Sea of Galilee. This is most interesting in light of the fact that when Herod Antipas built Tiberias on top of a cemetery, strict Jews utterly abhorred the place. The Mishnah was compiled here, and the Gemara was added, forming the Palestinian TALMUD. The remains of splendid synagogues in Galilee, such as those at Capernaum and KORAZIN, still attest to the prosperity of the Jews there from the second to the seventh century.

Galilee, Sea of. So called from its location E of GALILEE, it is also called the Lake of GENNESARET (Lk. 5:1), since the fertile Plain of Gennesaret lies on the NW (Matt. 14:34). The OT calls it the Sea of KINNERETH (Heb. “harp-shaped,” Num. 34:11; Josh. 13:27), from the town so named on its shore (Josh. 19:35), of which Gennesaret is probably the corruption. The Sea of TIBERIAS is another designation (Jn. 6:1; 21:10), associated with the city of Tiberias, the capital of HEROD Antipas. All its names were derived from places on the western shore.

Aerial view of the Sea of Galilee (looking N).

Located some 60 mi. (100 km.) N of JERUSALEM, its bed is but a lower depression of the JORDAN Valley. The surface of the water is c. 685 ft. (210 m.) below the level of the MEDITERRANEAN and it varies in depth up to 150 ft. (45 m.). As the Jordan River plunges southward on its course from Mount HERMON to the DEAD SEA, it enters the Sea of Galilee at its N end and flows out of its S end, a distance of 13 mi. (21 km.). The greatest width of the sea is 8 mi. (13 km.), at MAGDALA. The view from the NAZARETH road to Tiberias is beautiful. The bare hills on the W, except at Khan Minyeh (present CAPERNAUM) where there is a small cliff, are recessed from the shore. From the eastern side, the western hills appear to rise out of the water to a height of c. 2,000 ft. (610 m.), while far to the N can be seen snowy Mount Hermon. The eastern hills rise from a coast of 0.5 mi. (1 km.) in width and are flat along the summit. The whole basin betrays its volcanic origin, and this accounts for the cliffs of hard porous basalt and the hot springs at Tiberias, famous for their medicinal value. The warm climate produces tropical vegetation—the lotus thorn, palms, and indigo. The Plain of Gennesaret on the NW abounds with walnuts, figs, olives, grapes, and assorted wild flowers. The fresh water is sweet, sparkling, and transparent, with fish in abundance. The gospel accounts picture fishing as a prosperous industry here in biblical times, but today, instead of fleets of fishing vessels, only a boat or two is seen. On these shores Jesus called his first disciples, four of whom were fishermen, and made them fishers of men (Matt. 4:18; Lk. 5:1-11).

The Sea of Galilee is noted for its sudden and violent storms caused by cold air sweeping down from the vast naked plateaus of Gaulanitis, the Hauran, and Mount Hermon through the ravines and gorges and converging at the head of the lake where it meets warm air. Jesus rebuked just such a storm (Mk. 4:39). Here also Jesus walked on the tempestuous water (Matt. 14:22-34; Mk. 6:45-53; Jn. 6:15-21).

The Sea of Galilee was the focus of Galilee's wealth. Nine cities of 15,000 or more stood on its shores. To the NW was Capernaum, the home of PETER and ANDREW (Mk. 1:29) and where MATTHEW collected taxes (Matt. 9:9). It was the scene of much of Jesus' Galilean ministry. Below this, on the western side, was Magdala, home of MARY Magdalene; 3 mi. (5 km.) S was Tiberias, the magnificent capital of Galilee. On the NE corner was BETHSAIDA, the native town of PHILIP, Andrew, and Peter (Jn. 1:44) and one-time capital of Philip the Tetrarch. GERGESA lay to the south. Of these towns—once thriving with dyeing, tanning, boat building, fishing, and fish curing—two are now inhabited, namely Magdala, consisting of a few mud huts, and Tiberias.

gallery. This term is used by many Bible versions to render a Hebrew architectural term of uncertain meaning referring to some sections of the TEMPLE that EZEKIEL saw in a vision (Ezek. 41:15-16; 42:3, 5). This feature is not mentioned in the description of SOLOMON's temple. Some have compared the structure of Ezekiel's building, apparently with terraces or recessed upper stories, with the design of the Babylonian ZIGGURAT or stage-tower temple. Others think the term refers to passages or streets.

galley. See SHIPS.

Gallim. gal'im (Heb. gallîm H1668, "heaps"). A village in BENJAMIN, N of JERUSALEM, near GIBEAH of SAUL and ANATHOTH; Palti (PALTIEL) son of Laish, to whom Saul gave his daughter, was from Gallim (1 Sam. 25:44; Isa. 10:30).

Gallio. gal'ee-oh (Gk. Galliōn G1136). Lucius Junius Gallio Annaeanus was PROCONSUL of ACHAIA in A.D. 51-52 or 52-53, in residence at CORINTH. His brother, the well-known philosopher Seneca, said of him, "No mortal was ever so sweet to one as Gallio was to all." The book of Acts recounts that the Jews in Corinth, alarmed at the inroads that the GOSPEL was making, brought PAUL before Gallio. The Jews hoped to convince the proconsul that Paul was guilty of an offense against a lawful religion, and hence against the Roman government itself (Acts 18:12-17), but Gallio rejected their argument. The Greeks then beat the chief ruler of the SYNAGOGUE, but Gallio remained indifferent to the incident. A more stern governor might have arrested the violence at once, but in the providence of God, Gallio's action amounted to an authoritative legal decision that Paul's preaching was not subversive against ROME. This gave the apostle the protection he needed to continue his preaching there. Gallio did not become a Christian; he died by committing suicide.

gallows. A pole for executing and exhibiting a victim by hanging or impalement. A gallows 75 ft. (23 m.) high was ordered by HAMAN to execute MORDECAI (Esth. 5:14; 6:4).

Gamad. See GAMMAD.

Gamaliel. guh-may'lee-uhl (Heb. gamlî'ēl H1697, "God is my completion [or reward]"; Gk. Gamaliēl G1137). (1) Son of Pedahzur; a leader of the tribe of MANASSEH who was chosen to aid in the wilderness census and to bring the tribe's offering (Num. 1:10; 2:20; 7:54, 59; 10:23).

(2) A famous Jewish sage who advised moderation in the treatment of the apostles and who had earlier been PAUL's teacher (Acts 5:34; 22:3). He was one of the prominent rabbis whose rulings are mentioned in the Mishnah (see TALMUD). That document states, "When Rabban Gamaliel the Elder died, the glory of the Law ceased and purity and abstinence died" (m. Soṭah 9:15). He was reportedly the grandson of none other than HILLEL, but this and other similar traditions cannot be confirmed. (He is sometimes confused with his grandson, Gamaliel II, a very influential rabbi at the end of the first century.) When the enraged SANHEDRIN sought to kill the apostles for their bold testimony to Christ, Gamaliel stood up in the council and urged judicious caution on the ground that if the new doctrine was of God they could not overthrow it, and if it were of man it would fail (Acts 5:34-39). Because he was held in esteem by all the people, his counsel was valued, and God used it to give a needed respite to the infant church. Inasmuch as Gamaliel believed in God's sovereign control, his advice was sound; but also underlying it was the premise of pragmatism that what succeeds is good and what fails is evil.

game. Wild animals hunted for sport or food (Gen. 25:28; 27:3-7 et al.; KJV, “venison”). Men such as ISHMAEL (21:20) and ESAU (25:27) were renowned for their hunting skills. Game consisted chiefly of partridge, gazelle, and hart meat (Deut. 12:15), along with roebucks in the time of SOLOMON (1 Ki. 4:23).

The Royal Game of Ur (found with other boards in graves dating to c. 2600 B.C.) was apparently one of the most popular games of the ancient world. Two players competed to race from one end of the board to the other.

games. Not much is known about the amusements of the ancient Israelites, partly because the earnestness of the Hebrew character did not give them prominence. Instead of public games, the great religious feasts gave them their occasions for national gatherings. There are references to DANCING (Ps. 30:11; Jer. 31:13; Lk. 15:25). The dance led by JEPHTHAH’s daughter (Jdg. 11:34) and the dances of the Israelite women mentioned elsewhere (1 Sam. 18:6; 21:11; 29:5) were public celebrations of military victories. Religious dancing was engaged in by MIRIAM and the women of Israel after the crossing of the RED SEA (Exod. 15:20), by the Israelites around the golden calf at SINAI (32:19), and by DAVID before the ARK OF THE COVENANT (2 Sam. 6:14, 16; cf. also Ps. 149:3; 150:4). Of course, children of every race have their games. ZECHARIAH prophesied that “the city streets will be filled with boys and girls playing there” (Zech. 8:5). In the NT the only children’s game mentioned is that of mimicking the wedding dance and the funeral wail to the music of the flute (Matt. 11:16-17; Lk. 7:32).

The public games of GREECE and ROME were familiar to the Christians and non-Christians of the first century, providing the NT writers with rich source material to illustrate spiritual truths. Condemned criminals were thrown to lions in the arena as punishment and for sport. In 1 Cor. 15:32 PAUL alludes to fighting with beasts at EPHESUS. When a Roman general returned home victorious, he led his army in a triumphal procession, at the end of which trailed the captives who were condemned to fight with beasts. Paul felt that, in contrast to the proud Corinthians, the apostles had been put “on display, at the end of the procession, like men condemned to die in the arena” (1 Cor. 4:9).

God had made them a spectacle to be gazed at and made sport of in the arena of the world. NERO used to clothe the Christians in beast skins when he exposed them to wild beasts. (Cf. 2 Tim. 4:17, “I was delivered from the lion’s mouth.”)

In 1 Cor. 9:24-25 Paul alludes vividly to the Isthmian games, celebrated every two years on the Isthmus of CORINTH. Held in honor of the Greek gods, the festival consisted of foot races, horse races, chariot contests, jumping, wrestling, boxing, and throwing the discus and javelin. To the Greeks they were events of patriotic pride, a passion rather than a pastime, and thus made a suitable image of earnestness in the Christian race: “Do you not know that in a race all the runners run, but only one gets the prize? Run in such a way as to get the prize. Everyone who competes in the games goes into strict training. They do it to get a crown that will not last; but we do it to get a crown that will last forever.” The coveted crown was a garland made of laurel, olive leaves, or pine needles; our crown is incorruptible (1 Pet. 1:4) and therefore demands greater fidelity. If the competitor did not strive “according to the rules,” he was not crowned (2 Tim. 2:5). He had to keep to the bounds of the course, having previously trained himself for ten months with chastity, abstemious diet, the enduring of cold and heat, and extreme exercise.

As in boxing, so in the Christian race Paul beat his body and brought it under subjection, so that when he preached (“heralded”—the herald announced the name and country of each contestant and displayed the prizes) to others, he would not be rejected but receive the winner’s crown (cf. Jas. 1:12). In view of the reward, Paul denied himself and became a servant of all in order to win more people to Jesus Christ. Christians do not beat the air, missing their opponent, but they fight certainly, with telling blows on the enemy (1 Cor. 9:26-27). As the runner looks intently at the goal and discards every encumbrance, so Christians run, throwing aside not only sinful lusts but even harmless and otherwise useful things that would slow them down. They must run with “perseverance” the race set before them, fixing their eyes on Jesus, “the author and perfecter” of their faith (Heb. 12:1-2).

Paul used the same figure in addressing the Ephesians (Acts 20:24) and the Philippians (3:12-14). The Colossians were urged to let God’s peace rule in their hearts (Col. 3:15); the Greek verb here is brabeuō G1093, which originally meant “to judge as umpire, to award prizes in contests.” Other allusions to the language of games are in Eph. 6:12, “our struggle [palē G4097, ‘wrestling’] is not against flesh and blood,” and 2 Tim. 4:7, “I have fought the good fight [agōn G74, ‘contest, struggle’], I have finished the race.” See also 1 Tim. 6:12; Rev. 2:10.

Gammad. gam’uhd (assumed name of a site, based on the gentilic gammādîm H1689, “Gammadites”). Also Gamad. In his poetic description of TYRE, EZEKIEL says, “Men of Arvad and Helech / manned your walls on every side; / men of Gammad / were in your towers” (Ezek. 27:11; KJV, “Gammadims”). The context suggests that the reference is to a city in P^{HOENICIA}, otherwise unknown. Proposals include Kumidi (modern Kamid el-Loz, N of Mt. HERMON), Qmd (a town mentioned in Egyptian sources and thought to be on or near the coast N of Byblos [G^{EBAL}]), and others.

Gammadim. See G^{AMMAD}.

Gamul. gay’muhl (Heb. gāmûl H1690, perhaps “benefit” or “weaned”). A leader of the Levites, appointed by lot as the head of the twenty-second course of priests during D^{AVID}’s time (1 Chr. 24:17). See also B^{ETH} G^{AMUL}.

gangrene. See D^{ISEASES}.

garden. A cultivated piece of ground, planted with flowers, vegetables, shrubs, or trees, fenced with a mud or stone wall (Prov. 24:31) or thorny hedges (Isa. 5:5), often guarded by a watchman in a lodge (1:8) or tower (Mk. 12:10) to drive away wild beasts and robbers. The quince, citron, almond, and other fruits, herbs, and various vegetables and spices are mentioned as growing in gardens. A reservoir cistern, or still better a fountain of water, was essential to a good garden (cf. Cant. 4:15, “a garden fountain,” i.e., a fountain sufficient to water many gardens).

The occurrence of no fewer than 250 botanical terms in the OT shows the Israelite fondness for flowers, fruits, and pleasant grounds (see P^{LANTS}). These are still a special delight to those living in a hot, dry country. Every house court or yard generally had its shade tree. The vine that grew around the trellis or an outside staircase was the emblem of the living and fruitful wife and happy home within (Ps. 128:3). The “orchards” (KJV) or “parks” (NIV) were larger gardens especially for fruit trees (the Heb. word is pardēs H7236; see P^{ARADISE}). S^{OLOMON}’s gardens and fruit orchards with pools of water for irrigation (Eccl. 2:4-6) very likely suggested the imagery of Cant. 4:12-15. The “king’s garden” (2 Ki. 25:4; Neh. 3:15; Jer. 39:4; 52:7) was near the pool of S^{ILOAM}.

The Hebrews used gardens as B^{URIAL} places. The field of M^{ACHPELAH}, A^{BRAMHAM}’s burial ground, was a garden with trees in and around it (Gen. 23:17). M^{ANASSEH} and A^{MON} were buried in U^{ZZA}’s garden (2 Ki. 21:18, 26). The Garden of G^{ETHSEMANE} served Jesus as a retreat for meditation and prayer (Matt. 26:36; Jn. 18:1-2). In idolatrous periods gardens were the scenes of superstition and image worship, the awful counterpart of the primitive EDEN (Isa. 1:29; 65:3; 66:17). The new paradise regained by the people of God (Rev. 22:1-5) suggests in a fuller way the old paradise planted by God but lost through sin (Gen. 2:8).

The believer is a garden watered by the HOLY SPIRIT (Jer. 2:13; 17:7-8; Jn. 4:13-14; 7:37-39). “A well-watered garden” expresses abundant happiness and prosperity (Isa. 58:11; Jer. 31:12) just as “a garden without water” (Isa. 1:30) expresses spiritual, national, and individual barrenness and misery.

Gareb (person). gair’ib (Heb. gārēb H1735, “scabby”). An ITHRITE warrior included in DAVID’s elite group, the Thirty (2 Sam. 23:38; 1 Chr. 11:40). The Ithrites were a clan from KIRIATH JEARIM (1 Chr. 2:53).

Gareb (place). gair’ib (Heb. gārēb H1736, “scabby”). A hill in or near JERUSALEM. JEREMIAH prophesied that God’s city would be rebuilt “from the Tower of Hananel to the Corner Gate. The measuring line will stretch from there straight to the hill of Gareb and then turn to Goah” (Jer. 31:38-39). Because the Tower of HANANEL was on the N wall (though its precise location is uncertain), with the CORNER GATE apparently guarding the NW approach to Jerusalem, some traditions locate Gareb on the W side of the city and GOAH farther S, but these sites have not been identified.

garland. This term, referring to a band of intertwined flowers or leaves, is used by the NIV to render a Hebrew word that occurs only twice in a metaphorical sense, indicating honor and joy (Prov. 1:9; 4:9). The NRSV uses it a few additional times as a rendering of various other words (e.g., Prov. 14:24 et al.; Acts 14:13). See also CROWN; WREATH.

garments. See DRESS.

Garmite. gahr'mit (Heb. garmî H1753, perhaps from gerem H1752, “bone”). A gentilic, used only to identify a Judahite named KEILAH, whose genealogical connection to the descendants of JUDAH is not specified (1 Chr. 4:19). Since no town by the name “Gerem” or the like is anywhere mentioned, some have speculated that the description “Garmite” may have referred to his bony or strong appearance.

garner. As a noun meaning “granary” or “barn,” this term is used a few times in the KJV (Ps. 144:13; Joel 1:17; Matt. 3:12; Lk. 3:17), but not in the NIV and other modern versions. The verb to garner (“to gather and store”) is used occasionally in recent translations (e.g., Isa. 62:9 NRSV).

garrison. A military post (or the troops assigned to it), often in a strategic frontier area, primarily for defensive purposes. Larger military units would be needed for an offensive drive. Garrisons were placed by the PHILISTINES in the Judean region of Israel (1 Sam. 14:1-15; NIV, “outpost”). Once DAVID brought these garrisons under his control, he then placed his own garrisons in ARAM and EDOM (2 Sam. 8:6, 14). See also ARMY.

Gashmu. See GESHEM.

Gaspar. gas'pahr. In late Christian tradition, the name of one of the MAGI who traveled to BETHLEHEM (Matt. 2:1-12).

Gatam. gay'tuhm (Heb. ga tām H1725, derivation uncertain). Son of Eliphaz, grandson of ESAU, and head of an Edomite clan (Gen. 36:11, 16; 1 Chr. 1:36).

gate. The entrance to enclosed buildings, grounds, or cities. It was at the gates of a CITY that the people of the ANE went for legal business, conversation, bargaining, and news. The usual gateway consisted of double doors plated with metal (Ps. 107:16; Isa. 45:2), for wooden doors without iron plating were easily set on fire (Jdg. 9:52; Neh. 2:3, 17). Some gates were made of brass, as was the “gate called Beautiful” of Herod’s TEMPLE (Acts 3:2), more costly than nine others of the outer court that had been “poured over” with gold and silver (Josephus, War 5.5.3). Still others were of solid stone (Isa. 54:12; Rev. 21:21). Massive stone doors are found in ancient towns of SYRIA, single slabs several inches thick and 10 ft. (3 m.) high, turning on pivots above and below. Gates ordinarily swung on projections that fitted into sockets on the post and were secured with bars of wood (Nah. 3:13) or of metal (1 Ki. 4:13; Ps. 107:16; Isa. 45:2).

As the weakest points in a city's walls, the gates were often the object of enemy attack (Jdg. 5:8; 1 Sam. 23:7; Ezek. 21:15, 22) and therefore were flanked by towers (2 Sam. 18:24, 33; 2 Chr. 14:7; 26:9). To "possess the gates" was to possess the city (Gen. 24:60). Gates were shut at night and opened again in the morning (Deut. 3:5; Josh. 2:5, 7).

The entrance to the Israelite city of Dan was guarded by a massive gate complex (dating to the Iron Age).

Markets were held at the gate, and the main item sold there often gave its name to the gate; possible examples are the SHEEP GATE, FISH GATE, HORSE GATE (Neh. 3:1, 3, 28). The gate was the place where people met to hear an important announcement (2 Chr. 32:6; Jer. 7:2; 17:19-27) or the reading of the LAW (Neh. 8:1, 3), or where the elders transacted legal business (Deut. 16:18; 21:18-20; Josh. 20:4; Ruth 4:1-2, 11). The psalmist complained, "Those who sit at the gate mock me, and I am the song of the drunkards" (Ps. 69:12); that is, he was an object of abusive language not only among the drunks but in the grave deliberations of the judges in the place of justice. The gate was also the king's or chief's place of audience (2 Sam. 19:8; 1 Ki. 22:10). DANIEL "sat in the gate" of King NEBUCHADNEZZAR as ruler over the province of BABYLON (Dan. 2:48-49 KJV; NIV, "remained at the royal court"). Regarded as specially sacred, the threshold in Assyrian palaces bore cuneiform inscriptions and was guarded by human-headed bulls with eagles' wings. In Israel, sentences from the law were inscribed on and above the posts and gates of private houses (Deut. 6:9). King JOSIAH destroyed the high places near the gates that were used for heathen sacrifices (2 Ki. 23:8).

Figuratively, gates refer to the glory of a city (Isa. 3:26; 14:31; Jer. 14:2) or to the city itself (Ps. 87:2; 122:2). In Matt. 16:18 the statement that the gates of HADES will not overcome the CHURCH is a reference either to the failure of the infernal powers to defeat the church or to the church's greater power to retain her members than the grave has over its victims.

gate between the two walls. This entrance is mentioned only three times in the OT (2 Ki. 25:4; Jer. 39:4; 52:7). All three references are in the same context: JERUSALEM was under siege by NEBUCHADNEZZAR's army in 587 B.C., and ZEDEKIAH and his army fled eastward by night through "the gate between the two walls" to the JORDAN Valley. This gate was near the KING'S GARDEN (which in turn was in the vicinity of the Pool of SILOAM, Neh. 3:15), and several scholars have identified it with Nehemiah's FOUNTAIN GATE. Others believe it is the same as the POTSHERD GATE (Jer. 19:2).

Gath. gath (Heb. gat H1781, "winepress"; gentilic gittî H1785, "Gittite"). One of the five great PHILISTINE cities, the others being ASHDOD, GAZA, ASHKELON, and EKRON (Josh. 13:3; 1 Sam. 6:17). Its people were the Gittites, including GOLIATH and other giants (2 Sam. 21:19-22). In harmony with this fact is the record of the ANAKITES' presence in Gath after JOSHUA had destroyed the neighboring territory (Josh. 11:22). It was one of the five cities to which the Philistines carried the ARK OF THE COVENANT and whose people God afflicted with an outbreak of tumors (1 Sam. 5:8-9).

DAVID fled from SAUL to Gath, where he feigned madness to save his life (1 Sam. 21:10-15). The second time he visited Gath, King ACHISH assigned him ZIKLAG as a residence (27:2-6). During his sixteen months there, David won the confidence of the king through subterfuge and intrigue (27:7—29:11). Some of David's 600 followers were Gittites, one of whom was his loyal friend ITTAL. They may have attached themselves to him at this time or when he defeated the Philistines (2 Sam. 8:1; 15:18-21). Although David conquered it (1 Chr.

18:1), Gath retained its own king (1 Ki. 2:39). REHOBAM, SOLOMON's son, rebuilt and fortified the town (2 Chr. 11:8). Later, HAZAEL, king of Aram (SYRIA), captured Gath from JEHOASH, king of Judah (2 Ki. 12:17), but UZZIAH won it back (2 Chr. 26:6). In a reference to the fall of this walled city, AMOS sounds a warning to those at ease in ZION (Amos 6:12). The omission of Gath from the later lists of the five cities (Amos 1:6, 8; Zeph. 2:4-5; Zech. 9:5-6) indicates it had lost its place among them by that time.

The site of Gath is uncertain. It lay on the border between Judah and Philistia, between SOCOH and Ekron (1 Sam. 17:1, 52). Tell eṣ-Ṣafi, c. 25 mi. (40 km.) SSE of JOPPA, favors this description, lying on a hill at the foot of Judah's mountains, some 10 mi. (16 km.) SE of Ekron.

Gath Hopher. gath-hee'fuhr (Heb. gat ḥēper H1783, "winepress by the [water] pit"). KJV Gittah-hepher. A border town of the tribe of ZEBULUN, to the E, next to the territory of NAPHTALI (Josh. 19:13); it was the home of the prophet JONAH (2 Ki. 14:25). The town is probably to be identified with Khirbet ez-Zurraḥ, about 3 mi. (5 km.) NE of NAZARETH. Nearby, to the N, is the modern village of Meshhed, the traditional site of Jonah's tomb.

Gath Rimmon. gath-rim'uhn (Heb. gat-rimmôn H1784, "winepress by the pomegranate tree"). (1) A town in the territory of DAN (Josh. 19:45). It was one of four cities from this tribe allotted to the LEVITES descended from KOHATH (Josh. 21:24; 1 Chr. 6:69), and it may have been one of the CITIES OF REFUGE (see 1 Chr. 6:67 NRSV; cf. NIV note). Gath Rimmon is usually identified with Tell Jerisheh, 4.5 mi. (7 km.) NE of JOPPA and just S of the Yarkon River.

(2) A town of the one-half tribe of MANASSEH, W of the JORDAN, and one of two cities from this tribe allotted to the Kohathite Levites (Josh. 21:25). Some have identified this Gath Rimmon with modern Rummaneh, NW of TAANACH, but many scholars believe that the name here is a scribal error (repeating the name of the Danite town in the previous verse) and so emend it to BILEAM, found in the parallel passage (1 Chr. 6:69).

Gaulanitis. See GOLAN.

Gaza. gay'zuh, gah'zuh (Heb. ʿazzâ H6445, "strong"; gentilic ʿazzâtî H6484, "Gazite" [Josh. 13:3, KJV "Gazathites"; Jdg. 16:2]). KJV also Azzah (Deut. 2:23; 1 Ki. 4:24; Jer. 25:20). The southernmost of the five chief cities of the PHILISTINES in SW Palestine, the others being ASHDOD, ASHKELON, EKRON, and GATH. Originally a seaport, the town moved to a hill 3 mi. (5 km.) inland on the great caravan route between SYRIA and EGYPT. Here it became an important rest stop on the edge of the desert and a popular trading center. Its position and strength (the meaning of its name) made it the key of this line of communications.

Gaza was assigned by JOSHUA to the tribe of JUDAH (Josh. 15:47), but as the ANAKITES were still present (11:22; 13:3), it was not conquered until after Joshua's death (Jdg. 1:18). The Philistines soon recovered it (Jdg. 13:1), and SAMSON perished there while destroying his captors (16:1, 21). SOLOMON ruled over it (1 Ki. 4:24), but it was HEZEKIAH who gave the decisive blow to the Philistines (2 Ki. 18:8). God through AMOS threatened Gaza with destruction by fire for her transgressions (Amos 1:6). This was fulfilled by one of the pharaohs of Egypt (Jer. 47:1). The predictions that Gaza would be forsaken (Zeph. 2:4) and that its king would perish (Zech. 9:5, referring to the Persian satrap) were fulfilled by ALEXANDER THE GREAT, who took the city in 332 B.C., after it had resisted his siege for two months. He bound Betis the satrap to a chariot and dragged him around the city; he killed 10,000 of Gath's inhabitants, selling the rest as slaves. The town was desolated again by fire and sword by the MACCABEES in 96 B.C. In turn, Gaza passed under the control of Syria and Rome.

PHILIP met the ETHIOPIAN EUNUCH on "the road—the desert road—that goes down from Jerusalem to Gaza" (Acts 8:26). After NT times, Gaza was for a time the seat of a Christian church and a bishop in the midst of Greek culture and temples, but most of its people turned to Islam in A.D. 634. Modern Ghuzzeh is the metropolis of the Gaza Strip; to the N lies an extensive olive grove whose fruit is used to make soap. The city's trade in corn is considerable, the corn still being ground by millstones such as Samson was forced to work at in his prison house at Gaza (Jdg. 16:21).

Looking S toward the hilltop on which the ancient site of Geba once stood.

Gazez. gay'ziz (Heb. gāzēz H1606, possibly “[sheep] shearer” or “born at shearing time”). (1) Son of CALEB by his concubine Ephah (1 Chr. 2:46). But this individual may be the same as #2 below.

(2) Son of Haran, grandson of Caleb, and nephew of #1 above (1 Chr. 2:46). Some have thought that the words “Haran was the father of [lit., begat] Gazez” are an explanatory addition to the previous statement, in which case there was only one person by this name, Caleb’s grandson.

Gazite. gay'zit. See GAZA.

Gazzam. gaz'uhm (Heb. gazzām H1613, possibly “caterpillar”). Ancestor of some temple servants (NETHINIM) who returned to Jerusalem with ZERUBBABEL (Ezra 2:48; Neh. 7:51).

Geba. gee'buh (Heb. geba H1494, “hill”). KJV also Gaba. A city in the territory of the tribe of BENJAMIN (Josh. 18:24); it was assigned to the LEVITES (Josh. 21:17; 1 Chr. 6:60). SAUL and JONATHAN may have encamped there when the PHILISTINES were at MICMASH (1 Sam. 13:16; the NIV, however, regards Geba here and in Jdg. 20:10, 33 as a spelling variant of GIBEAH). It was possibly in Geba also that DAVID began to smite the Philistines (2 Sam. 5:25; NIV, GIBEON, following LXX and 1 Chr. 14:16). ASA built a fortress in Geba with stones from RAMAH (1 Ki. 15:22; 2 Chr. 16:6). JOSIAH defiled the high places where the priests had burned incense from Geba, the N limit of JUDAH, to the S limit, BEERSHEBA (2 Ki. 23:8). Geba is coupled with Ramah in the lists of those returning from BABYLON (Ezra 2:26; Neh. 7:30), and it is one of the cities where Benjamites lived after the EXILE (Neh. 11:31) and from which singers came and sang at the dedication of the temple (12:29). It was one of the stopping points of the Assyrian army on its approach to Jerusalem (Isa. 10:29). Geba is to be identified with modern Jeba^c, c. 6 mi. (10 km.) NNE of Jerusalem, and 2 mi. (3 km.) E of Ramah.

Gebal. gee´buhl (Heb. gēbal H1488, “boundary”; gentilic giblî H1490, “Gebalite” [KJV, “Giblite”]). (1) A non-Israelite town or region associated with such nations as EDOM, MOAB, and AMMON (Ps. 83:7); it was probably in TRANSJORDAN, SE of the Dead Sea.

(2) A city in PHOENICIA on the Mediterranean Sea; modern Jebeil (Jubayl), 18 mi. (29 km.) NNE of Beirut. It was called Gubla by the Assyrians and Babylonians, while the Greeks and the Romans knew it as Byblos (because the city was a major exporter of writing material, the Gk. word byblos came to mean “[papyrus] scroll”). Once a flourishing port and trading center, its most valuable export was pine and cedarwood from LEBANON. The city was also noted for shipbuilding and stonecutting. Excavations have revealed that Gebal is one of the oldest towns in the world; occupation of the site has been traced to Neolithic times. Before the end of the third millennium B.C., Canaanites in Gebal had developed a syllabic script modeled on the Egyptian hieroglyphics (see WRITING). The Gebalites were considered master builders and able seamen (1 Ki. 5:18; Ezek. 27:9). Their land is mentioned as one of those that were not conquered by the Israelites (Josh. 13:5).

Geber. gee´buhr (Heb. geber H1506, “man, strong one”). Son of Uri and one of the twelve district governors who supplied provisions for SOLOMON and the royal household; he was in charge of the twelfth district in GILEAD (1 Ki. 4:19). Some have thought that this passage is a duplication of the sixth district (v. 13), but Geber may have been responsible for the southern parts of Gilead; see BEN-GEBER.

Gebim. gee´bim (Heb. gēbîm H1481, “pits”). A village of the tribe of BENJAMIN mentioned only in the poetic listing of the conquests of ASSYRIA (Isa. 10:31). The passage mentions Gebim between MADMENAH and NOB, but none of these locations has ever been confidently identified. The context also mentions ANATHOTH, which was 2.5 mi. (4 km.) NE of JERUSALEM, so Gebim was probably in that vicinity.

gecko. See ANIMALS.

Gedaliah. ged´uh-li´uh (Heb. gēdalyāhû H1546, “great is Yahweh”). (1) Son of JEDUTHUN and a temple musician under DAVID (1 Chr. 25:3, 9).

(2) Son of AHIKAM, grandson of SHAPHAN, and governor of Judah after the fall of JERUSALEM to the Babylonians (2 Ki. 25:22-26; Jer. 40:6—41:18). His family’s political moderation, shown by his father’s protection of JEREMIAH, probably made him acceptable to the Babylonians (Jer. 26:24). MIZPAH, his headquarters during his two-month rule, served as a rallying point for various groups of Hebrew soldiers and nobility. He avoided political intrigue in rejecting the scheme of JOHANAN son of Kareah to murder ISHMAEL son of Nethaniah. He, many Jewish leaders, and the Babylonian garrison were assassinated by Ishmael. Gedaliah’s partisans, fearing Babylonian reprisals, then fled to Egypt, forcing Jeremiah the prophet to go with them.

(3) Son of Pashhur; he was one of the officials who opposed Jeremiah and put him in a cistern (Jer. 38:1-6).

(4) A descendant of JESHUA son of Jozadak, listed among the priests in EZRA’s time who agreed to put away their foreign wives (Ezra 10:18).

(5) Son of Amariah and grandfather of the prophet ZEPHANIAH (Zeph. 1:1).

Gedeon. See GIDEON.

Geder. gee´duhr (Heb. geder H1554, “stone wall”; gentilic gēdērî H1559, “Gederite”). A Canaanite city conquered by the Israelites (Josh. 12:13). It is listed after DEBIR and before ARAD, which may indicate a location either in the SHEPHELAH or in the NEGEV, but the site has not been identified. One of DAVID’s officials, BAAL-HANAN the Gederite (1 Chr. 27:28), was apparently from this town.

Gederah. gi-dee´ruh (Heb. gēdērāh H1557, “stone-walled pen”; gentilic gēdērātî H1561, “Gederathite”). (1) A town within the tribal territory of JUDAH located in the SHEPHELAH (Josh. 15:36; NIV regards Gederah and GEDEROTHAIM as the same place). Together with NATAIM, Gederah is listed as inhabited by clans of skilled craftsmen who served as potters for the king (1 Chr. 4:23; KJV has “plants and hedges” for “Netaim and Gederah”). Its location is unknown, although various sites have been proposed.

(2) A town in the tribal territory of BENJAMIN. We know of this village only because one of the Benjamite warriors who joined DAVID at ZIKLAG was named JOZABAD the Gederathite (1 Chr. 12:4). Some have identified this Gederah with modern Jedireh, a short distance from GIBEON.

Gederathite. gi-dee´ruh-thit. See GEDERAH.

Gederite. gi-dee´rit. See GEDER.

Gederoth. gi-dee´roth (Heb. gēdērôt H1558, “stone-walled pens”). A town in the tribal territory of JUDAH located in the SHEPHELAH (Josh. 15:31). In the time of AHAZ, Gederoth was one of several towns occupied by the PHILISTINES (2 Chr. 28:18). Gederoth was no doubt located near the Judah-Philistia border, but the precise site is unknown.

Gederothaim. gi-dee´ruh-thay´im (Heb. gēdērōtayim H1562, “[two] stone-walled pens”). A town in the tribal territory of JUDAH located in the SHEPHELAH (Josh. 15:36). It is the last name in a list of fifteen towns that were part of the tribe’s third administrative district, but the text speaks of “fourteen towns and their villages.” The NIV rendering treats Gederothaim as an alternate name for GEDERAH, thus bringing the total to fourteen. If Gederothaim is a distinct town, its location is unknown.

Gedor. gee´dor (Heb. gēdôr H1529 and H1530, “wall”). (1) A town in the tribal territory of JUDAH located in the hill country (Josh. 15:58). It is usually identified with Khirbet Jedur, 7.5 mi. (12 km.) NNW of HEBRON. According to many scholars, the description “Penuel was the father of Gedor” (1 Chr. 4:4) means that PENUEL founded or was an early inhabitant of this Judahite city. It is also possible that the Gedor mentioned later in the passage (v. 18) refers to the same town and that JERED was another important figure associated with it.

(2) A town in a valley settled by Simeonites (1 Chr. 4:39-40). It is described as a land very spacious and peaceful, with good pasture. The location is unknown, and some scholars, following the SEPTUAGINT, emend the name to GERAR.

(3) A town in the tribal territory of BENJAMIN and the home of JOELAH and ZEBADIAH, two of the warriors who joined DAVID at ZIKLAG (1 Chr. 12:7). Attempts have been made to identify this Gedor with #1 above or with Khirbet Gadeirah, N of el-Jib. Other scholars believe the text is corrupt.

(4) Son of Jeiel and descendant of BENJAMIN; his brother NER was the grandfather of SAUL (1 Chr. 8:31; 9:37).

Ge Harashim. gi-hair'uh-shim (Heb. gê' ḥ> ʾrāšîm H1629, "valley of the craftsmen"). The genealogy of the Judahite clan of KENAZ refers to a certain JOAB as "the father [i.e., founder] of Ge Harashim. It was called this because its people were craftsmen" (1 Chr. 4:14; KJV, "valley of Charashim"). The same Hebrew expression (with a slight spelling variation), referring probably to the same area, occurs in a list of places where the Benjamites resettled after the EXILE: "... in Lod and Ono, and in the Valley of the Craftsmen" (Neh. 11:35). It should probably be identified with one of the valleys bordering the Plain of SHARON.

Gehazi. gi-hay'zi (Heb. gêḥāzî H1634, possibly "valley of vision"). The servant of the prophet ELISHA. He first appeared when Elisha sought to reward the Shunammite woman for her hospitality (2 Ki. 4:8-37; see SHUNEM). When she declined any reward, Gehazi said, "Well, she has no son and her husband is old." Elisha promised her that she would bear a child, and within a year the child was born. When the child had grown, he died of sunstroke, and the woman went with her sorrow to the prophet. He sent Gehazi with instructions to lay the prophet's staff on the face of the child, "but there was no sound or response." Elisha then came himself and restored the child to life. Elisha had Gehazi call the woman to receive her son.

Gehazi is mentioned again in connection with the story of NAAMAN (2 Ki. 5:1-27). Elisha refused any reward from Naaman after this Aramean general was healed, but Gehazi ran after him and asked for something. Naaman gave him more than he asked. Gehazi hid his booty before he reached home, but Elisha knew what had happened and invoked on Gehazi the leprosy of which Naaman had been cured.
