On a later occasion, Gehazi reported to the king "all the great things Elisha has done" (2 Ki. 8:4-6). When he told how the Shunammite woman's son was restored to life, the woman herself appeared and asked the king to restore to her the property she abandoned on the advice of Elisha during a seven-year famine. The king ordered her fully compensated. Because Gehazi appeared in the court of the king, it has been inferred that he had repented and had been healed of his leprosy, though 5:27 renders this doubtful. He showed no resentment against Elisha. Gehazi was an efficient servant, but weak enough to yield to greed. He lacked his master's clear moral insight and stamina, and he had no such relation with Elisha as Elisha had with Elijah.

Gehenna. gi-hen'uh (Gk. geenna G1147, from Heb. gê-hinnōm, “Valley of Hinnom”; Aram. gêhinnām). In the Greek NT, this name refers to the final place of punishment of the ungodly and is usually translated HELL. The word derives from the Hebrew phrase for “the Valley of [Ben] Hinnom,” identified with the Wadi er-Rababi, just S and to the W of JERUSALEM (see HINNOM, VALLEY OF). This ravine formed part of the border between the tribes of JUDAH and BENJAMIN (Josh. 15:8; cf. 18:16), and it was still recognized as the border after the EXILE (Neh. 11:30-31). Here Kings AHAZ (2 Ki. 16:3; 2 Chr. 28:3) and MANASSEH (2 Ki. 21:6; 2 Chr. 33:6) sacrificed their sons to MOLECH (Jer. 32:35). For this reason JOSIAH defiled the place (2 Ki. 23:10). After referring to these idolatrous practices (Jer. 7:31-32), Jeremiah prophesied a great slaughter of the people there and in Jerusalem (19:1-13).

After the OT period, Jewish APOCALYPTIC writers began to call the Valley of Hinnom the entrance to hell, later hell itself. In Jewish usage of the first century A.D., Gehenna referred to the intermediate state of the godless dead, but there is no trace of this sense in the NT. The NT distinguishes sharply between HADES, the intermediate, bodiless state, and Gehenna, the state of final punishment after the RESURRECTION of the body. Gehenna existed before the judgment (Matt. 25:41). The word occurs twelve times in the NT, always translated “hell” (ASV, RSV margin “Gehenna”). Eleven times it is on the lips of Jesus: as the final punishment for calling one's brother a fool (5:22); for adultery, when the severest measures have not been taken to prevent commission of this offense (5:29-30); in a warning about whom to fear (Matt. 10:28; Lk. 12:5); and others (Matt. 18:9; Mk. 9:43, 45, 47). A hypocrite is called a “son of hell” (Matt. 23:15) who cannot escape “being condemned to hell” (23:33). James 3:6 speaks of the “tongue” as “a fire...set on fire by hell.”

A fire was kept burning in the Valley of Hinnom to consume the garbage deposited there by the residents of Jerusalem. Terms parallel to Gehenna include “fiery furnace” (Matt. 13:42, 50), “fiery lake” (Rev. 19:20; 20:14-15), “lake of burning sulfur” (20:10), “eternal fire” (Jude 7); “hell” (2 Pet. 2:4; here the Greek text has Tartarus, a name for the place of punishment of the wicked dead).

Geliloth. gi-li'loth (Heb. gēlîlôt H1667, “circles [of stone],” thus “circuit, territory”; cf. GALILEE). (1) An area on the SE boundary of the tribe of BENJAMIN, near EN SHEMESH and facing the Pass of ADUMMIM (Josh. 18:17). In the corresponding description of the NE boundary of JUDAH, possibly the same place is referred to as GILGAL (15:7). The precise location is unknown. Some have thought that Geliloth refers to a general region, not a specific site. Cf. #2 below.

(2) A place “near the Jordan in the land of Canaan” where “the Reubenites, the Gadites and the half-tribe of Manasseh built an imposing altar” (Josh. 22:10-11). Many believe, however, that the Hebrew text does not give a place name but should rather be translated, “the region near the Jordan” (cf. NRSV).

gem. See MINERALS.

Gemalli. gi-mal’i (Heb. gēmallî H1696, derivation uncertain). The father of AMMIEL, a Danite; the latter was one of the twelve spies sent by MOSES into the Promised Land (Num. 13:12).

Gemara. guh-mah’ruh. See TALMUD.

Gemariah. gem’uh-ri’uh (Heb. gēmaryâ H1701 [Jer. 29:3] and gēmaryāhû H1702, “Yahweh has fulfilled”). (1) Son of a certain HILKIAH; he was an emissary to NEBUCHADNEZZAR from King ZEDEKIAH charged with the task of carrying JEREMIAH’s message to the captive Jews (Jer. 29:3).

(2) Son of SHAPHAN the royal secretary; he was one of the officials who urged King JEHOIAKIM not to destroy the scroll of Jeremiah (Jer. 36:10-12, 25). It was from Gemariah’s room, in the upper courtyard of the temple, that BARUCH read the words of Jeremiah to the people (v. 10). His brother AHIKAM was also an important functionary, and his son MICAIAH was the one who reported the reading of the scroll by Baruch (v. 13). The name “Gemariah son of Shaphan,” almost certainly referring to the same individual, survives in a seal impression dated to the time of the destruction of Jerusalem.

genealogy. A list of ancestors or descendants, descent from an ancestor, or the study of lines of descent. Genealogies are compiled to show biological descent, the right of inheritance, succession to an office, or ethnological and geographical relationships. The word genealogy (or the adj. genealogical) occurs more than twenty times in English Bibles, especially in the books of Chronicles (1 Chr. 4:33 et al.; 2 Chr. 12:15 et al.; cf. also Neh. 7:5; 1 Tim. 1:4; Tit. 3:9; Heb. 7:3), but most Bible genealogies are introduced by other words, such as

“the book of the generations of,” or “these are the generations of,” or are given without titles.

Bible genealogies are not primarily concerned with mere biological descent. The earliest, a family register of CAIN’s descendants, is found in Gen. 4:17-22; by its emphasis on occupations (JABAL, cattleman; JUBAL, musician; TUBAL-CAIN, metal worker), it shows when new features of the culture were introduced. The genealogy of the line of SETH (4:25-26; 5:1-32), a list of long-lived individuals, contrasts with the genealogy in 10:1-32, which is clearly a table of nations descended from the three families of NOAH’s sons, SHEM, HAM, and JAPHETH. Many of the names are Hebrew plurals (the -im suffix) signifying people groups rather than individuals. The scope of biblical genealogies narrows to the chosen people and their close relatives (11:10-22, Shem to ABRAHAM; 22:20-24, Abraham’s near kin). Next are the children of Abraham by HAGAR (16:15; 25:12-18), by SARAH (21:1-3; 25:19-28), and by KETURAH (25:1-4); then the children of JACOB (29:31—30:24; 35:16-26) and of his brother ESAU (ch. 36).

Cuneiform tablet containing the genealogy of the Hammurabi dynasty (prob. from Sippar, 17th cent. B.C.). It lists the names of the kings of Babylon down to Ammiditana.

Jacob’s posterity who came into EGYPT are carefully enumerated (Gen. 46:8-27), and part of them again (Exod. 6:14-27) to bring the genealogy down to MOSES and AARON; the inclusion of brief mention of the sons of REUBEN and SIMEON before the fuller genealogy of the LEVITES may indicate that this list was taken from an earlier one. Numbers 26:1-56 records a census following genealogical relationships, for the purpose of equitable division of the land. The military organization of the Israelites for the wilderness journey was by genealogy (Num. 1-3); this included the priests and Levites (3:11-39) and provided for a tax and offerings (7:11-89) for the support of religion (3:40-51), as well as the order of march in peace or war (ch. 10). Many other references to persons must be taken into account in attempting a complete genealogy. Ruth 4:17-22 picks up the genealogy of JUDAH from his son PEREZ, to carry it down to DAVID, whose children are listed: those born in HEBRON (2 Sam. 3:2-5) and in JERUSALEM (5:13-16).

The major genealogical tables of the OT are in 1 Chr. 1-9. They use most of the earlier genealogical material, but show differences that are puzzling to us today. Satisfactory solutions are not available for many of these. Mistakes in copying would account for some; differences in the purpose of the recorders for others. The books of KINGS and CHRONICLES contain information about the family relationships of the kings of Judah and of Israel. The books of EZRA and NEHEMIAH name by families those who returned with ZERUBBABEL from Babylonian EXILE, including many whose descent could not be traced (Ezra 2:1-63; 8:1-20; Neh. 7:7-63). Ezra 7:1-6 gives Ezra's own line of descent from Aaron, and 10:18-44 names those who had married foreign women. Other lists include the names of those who helped rebuild the walls of Jerusalem (Neh. 3); those who helped Ezra proclaim the law of God (8:1-8); those who sealed the covenant to keep the law (10:1-27); the leading inhabitants in Jerusalem (11:1-10), in nearby Judah (11:20-24), and in more remote villages of Judah and Benjamin (11:25-36). An additional chapter deals with the priests who accompanied Zerubbabel (12:1-9), the succession of high priests from Jeshua to Jaddua (12:10-11), the "heads of the priestly families" in the days of Joiakim (12:12-21), Levites in this period (12:22-26), princes and priests who took part in the dedication of the wall of Jerusalem (12:31-42). The prophets usually began their books with some indication of their genealogy (Isa. 1:1; Jer. 1:1; Ezek. 1:3; Hos. 1:1; Joel 1:1; Jon. 1:1; Zeph. 1:1; Zech. 1:1).

For Jesus' lineage, see GENEALOGY OF JESUS CHRIST. Other NT persons generally appear without indication of their descent. Occasionally the father is named (e.g., "James and John, the sons of Zebedee," Lk. 5:10). PAUL cherished his pure Hebrew descent (Phil. 3:4-5). The genealogies mentioned in 1 Tim. 1:4 and Tit. 3:9 are sometimes thought to refer to a pagan Gnostic series of beings intermediate between God and the created earth (see GNOSTICISM). However, it is more likely that the rabbinic emphasis on human genealogies is meant, because the false teachers seem to be Jewish and the term genealogies is not used by pagan authors of the pagan Gnostic series.

It is certain that the NT shows far less concern for the genealogy of human beings than does the OT. In the OT, God was bringing together a chosen people who would be a nation peculiarly devoted to preserving his revelation until, in the fullness of time, he sent his Son, who would draw to himself a new people, united not by descent from a common human ancestry but by a genealogy of one generation only: children of God by a new and spiritual birth.

genealogy of Jesus Christ. Two genealogies of Jesus are given in the NT: Matt. 1:1-17 and Lk. 3:23-38. MATTHEW traces the descent of Jesus from ABRAHAM and DAVID, and divides it into three sets of fourteen generations each, probably to aid memorization. There are fourteen names from Abraham to (and including) David. From David to JOSIAH, and counting David a second time, there are fourteen names (David is named twice in Matt. 1:17). From Jeconiah (JEHOIACHIN) to Jesus there are fourteen names. Matthew omits three generations after Joram (JEHORAM)—namely AHAZIAH, Joash (JEHOASH), and AMAZIAH (1 Chr. 3:11-12). Such an omission in Hebrew genealogies is not peculiar to Matthew. He names ZERAH as well as PEREZ and mentions the brothers of JUDAH and of Jeconiah, which is unusual. Contrary to Hebrew practice, he names five women: TAMAR, RAHAB, RUTH, BATHSHEBA, and MARY, each name evoking associations, dark or bright, with the history of the chosen people. Matthew carefully excludes the physical paternity of JOSEPH by saying “Joseph, the husband of Mary, of whom was born Jesus” (Matt. 1:16; the word “whom” is fem. sing. in the Gk. text). The sense of “begat” (KJV) in Hebrew genealogies was not exact. It indicated immediate or remote descent, an adoptive relation, or legal heirship, as well as procreation.

LUKE’s genealogy moves back in time from Jesus to ADAM. Between Abraham and Adam it is the same as in 1 Chr. 1:1-7, 24-28, or the more detailed genealogies in Genesis, making allowance for the different spelling of names in transliteration from Hebrew or Greek. From David to Abraham, Luke agrees with OT genealogies and with Matthew. Between Jesus and David, Luke’s list differs from Matthew’s, and there is no OT record to compare with Luke’s, except for NATHAN’s being one of David’s sons, and for the names of SHEALTIEL and ZERUBBABEL. At this point the two genealogies crossed, through adoption or otherwise.

As Matthew gave the line of the kings from David to Jeconiah, it is probable that from Shealtiel to Joseph he named those who were heirs to the Davidic throne. Luke’s record then would be that of physical descent, though crossing the royal line at one point. In Lk. 3:23—where the KJV has, “And Jesus himself began to be about thirty years of age, being (as was supposed) the son of Joseph, which was the son of Heli”—the question arises as to how much should be considered parenthetical. Some would include “of Joseph” in the parenthesis: “(as was supposed of Joseph),” making HELI in some sense the father of Jesus, perhaps his maternal grandfather. This construction is awkward. Another supposition is that Joseph is really the son-in-law of Heli, through his marriage to Mary, possibly Heli’s daughter. If both genealogies are those of Joseph, his relationship to Heli must be different from his relationship to Jacob. Scholars have wrestled with the problems of the two genealogies from the second century, when pagan critics raised the difficulty. Many explanations have been more ingenious than convincing, involving complicated and uncertain inferences.

In a widely accepted view, Matthew gives the legal descent of heirship to the throne of David, through Joseph, while Luke gives the physical descent of Jesus through Mary. Matthew is concerned with the kingship of Jesus, Luke with his humanity. Both make plain his VIRGIN BIRTH, and therefore his deity. The agreement of Matthew and Luke on these facts is obvious, and their differences only accentuate their value as independent witnesses, whose testimony was prompted by the HOLY SPIRIT, not by collaboration with each other. Matthew’s genealogy establishes the legal claim to the throne of David through his foster-father Joseph; Luke’s establishes his actual descent from David through Mary. Luke 1:32 says that Mary’s child “will be called the Son of the Most High. The Lord God will give him the throne of his father David.” Romans 1:3-4 agrees: Jesus “as to his earthly life a descendant of David,” which could only be through Mary; and he was “appointed the Son of God in power by his resurrection from the dead” (TNIV; cf. also 2 Tim. 2:8). Isaiah 11:1 indicates that the Messiah is to be physically a descendant of David’s father Jesse. The genealogies must be seen in the light of this fact (see Matt. 22:41-46 and parallels with the answer in Rom. 1:4).

general. This term, referring to a high-ranking military officer, occurs rarely in Bible versions. The NRSV, for example, uses it once in the OT (Jdg. 4:7; cf. also 1 Chr. 27:34 KJV). The word is occasionally used in the NT as a translation of Greek chiliarchos G5941, meaning literally “commander of a thousand,” but used in Roman times of military TRIBUNES who led COHORTS consisting of about 600 men, and also more generally of high-ranking officers (e.g., NIV Rev. 6:15; 19:18). See ARMY.

generation. A group of related persons who belong to the same stage in the line of descent. The word can also refer to a body of individuals who happened to be born about the same time, and especially to contemporaries who share social and cultural traits. The biblical words rendered “generation” correspond closely, but not fully, to the English term. The Hebrew noun dôr H1887 has a broad range of meaning: it may refer to a period of time as well as to the individuals who live during an age. The word is used (usually in the sing.) of many generations to come (Deut. 7:9), as well as of a specific living generation, such as the one that died in the wilderness (2:14). The average length of a generation is often assumed to be forty years, for in the wilderness all Israelites over twenty died within that time. A second Hebrew term, tôlēdôt H9352, can refer not only to “contemporaries” (e.g., Gen. 6:9), but also of a line of “descendants” (5:1), and even of a “[family] history” or “account” (2:4; 25:19; 37:2).

In the NT, the Greek noun genea G1155 is usually translated “generation” but can also be rendered in other ways (e.g., NIV “kind,” Lk. 16:8; “time,” Acts 15:21). It is used in the GENEALOGY of Matt. 1. Many times Jesus speaks of the faithless and perverse generation that opposed him (Matt. 17:17 et al.), where the reference is taken by some to be the Jewish nation. A special problem is raised by Jesus’ statement, “this generation will certainly not pass away until all these things have happened” (24:34 and parallels). Some understand the term in a strictly temporal sense and claim that Christ mistakenly expected the end in his own time. Others argue for the meaning “race, clan, nation,” and hold that the verse predicts the continuation of the Jewish people until Christ’s return. Still others believe that the statement has no temporal reference at all but rather stresses the certainty of Christ’s words: “people such as these [i.e., sinful humanity] will not pass away until all these things have taken place.” This assurance thus corresponds precisely to the next statement: “Heaven and earth will pass away, but my words will never pass away” (v. 35).

Genesis, Book of. The first book of the Bible. In the Jewish tradition the book is named from its first word, bērē šīt (“in the beginning”). The English name derives from the SEPTUAGINT (Gk. Genesis, “origin, beginning”) and is found also in the Latin tradition. While much of the book is concerned with origins, the name Genesis does not reflect its total scope, for the larger portion of the book consists of the history of the PATRIARCHS and concludes with the record of JOSEPH’s life.

I. The authorship of Genesis. The question of the authorship of Genesis has been the subject of debate for over two centuries. Tradition ascribes the book to MOSES, but the application of source-critical methodology has partitioned Genesis into a number of sources attributed to various authors writing at widely diverse times in Israelite history. The identification of these sources (known simply as J, E, D, P, etc.) is based on several criteria such as style, usage of the divine name, alleged contradictions, linguistic peculiarities, and development of the Israelite religion. More recent trends have tended to modify this approach, putting less emphasis on traditional historicist methodology and more on literary or canonical concerns.

The concept of Mosaic authorship does not indicate that Moses was the first to write every word of each account in the book of Genesis. It is generally understood today to mean that much of his work was compilation. Many historical accounts in Genesis predate Moses by great expanses of time. There is no reason why he could not have arranged these ancient accounts into the literary structure of the book.

Overview of GENESIS

Author: Anonymous, but comments elsewhere in the Bible seem to support the traditional view that MOSES is responsible for the PENTATEUCH as a whole.

Historical setting: The initial composition of the book must have taken place during the wilderness wanderings (either late in the 15th or early in the 13th cent. B.C.; those who reject Mosaic authorship usually date the book after the EXILE, while acknowledging that much of the material is several centuries earlier).

Purpose: To provide a historical-theological account of the long period from the CREATION to the time of JOSEPH, with emphasis on God's choosing of Abram (ABRAHAM) and his descendants; to provide those fundamental truths about God on which the rest of the Bible is built.

Contents: From the creation to Abraham's settling in HARAN (Gen. 1-11); God's COVENANT with Abraham (12:1—25:18); God's dealings with ISAAC and JACOB (25:19—36:43); God's preservation of Joseph (chs. 37-50).

Proponents of the Mosaic authorship of Genesis point to such evidence as the author's knowledge of EGYPT (Gen. 13:10) and the Egyptian language (41:43-45), archaisms in the language of Genesis (such as imprecision in the gender of certain nouns and pronouns), ancient customs recorded in Genesis that are paralleled in other cultures of the second millennium B.C., and the orderly and purposeful arrangement of the book.

II. Archaeological background of Genesis. Excavations at a number of sites in the ANE have tended to support the antiquity and historical integrity of significant portions of the book of Genesis. For example, work at Yorgan Tepe, the site of ancient Nuzi, has yielded thousands of tablets, most of which have been dated to the fifteenth century B.C. These tablets record several legal and societal practices that are strikingly similar to customs recorded in the patriarchal narratives. For example, RACHEL's theft of the household gods of LABAN (Gen. 31:34) may be understood against the background of the Nuzi custom of determining INHERITANCE rights by the possession of the family gods. Apparently Rachel wished to insure her husband's right to the property she felt was his (cf. 31:14-16). Also, the practice of taking a concubine to produce an heir when a married couple was childless is well known, both in Genesis (16:3; 30:4, 9) and the Nuzi material. The similarity between the customs of Nuzi and those of the patriarchs gives strong support to the origin of the patriarchal accounts in a period very early in Hebrew history.

It has been asserted that the mention of camels in numerous passages in Genesis may be an anachronism, because evidence for the domestication of camels cannot be found before the end of the twelfth century B.C. However, camel bones have been discovered at Mari (25/24 cent.) and in Palestine (2000 to 1200) at various archaeological sites. Evidence for the domestication of the camel may be found in texts from the Old Babylonian period (c. 2000/1700) and a Sumerian text from Nippur.

III. Content of Genesis. The book may be divided roughly into three parts. Genesis 1-11 records events from the CREATION to the death of TERAH, the father of ABRAHAM. Chapters 12-36 constitute a history of the patriarchs Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob. Chapters 37-50 present a sustained narrative that records the account of JOSEPH.

The first section begins with the account of creation. There were other ancient cultures that produced creation accounts. For example, the Babylonian creation epic Enuma Elish depicts the origin of the physical phenomena. It is commonly held that the Genesis accounts are dependent on the Babylonian creation account. Linguistic evidence for such dependence has been sought in the Hebrew word tēhôm H9333 (“deep”), which occurs in Gen. 1:2. This word is said to find a counterpart in the word Tiamat, the name of a goddess in Enuma Elish. The evidence, however, speaks against direct dependence (see DEEP). It may also be noted that the style and content of the two accounts are vastly different. The Babylonian account depicts the Creation as taking place as a result of the sexual union of the gods Apsu and Tiamat. It is patently mythical and pagan in its orientation. After thorough examination, A. Heidel concluded that the similarities between the two accounts “are not so striking as we might expect....In fact, the divergences are much more far-reaching and significant than are the resemblances, most of which are not any closer than what we should expect to find in any two more or less complete creation versions” (The Babylonian Genesis [1963], 130).

The FALL of the human race is recorded in Gen. 2-3. This event had profound significance, not only for the relationship of human beings to God but also for their relationships to others as well. No longer does an intimate relationship with God exist, as it did in the garden. Murder (4:8, 23) and the lust for renown (4:17, 23-24; 6:1-4) now characterize the human race. These conditions led to the destruction of the race by a FLOOD (6:5—9:17). The question of the universality of the flood cannot be answered precisely from the biblical texts because of the ambiguity of the word “all” in the statement “all the high mountains...were covered” (7:19), which in Hebrew need not be understood in an absolute sense. Yet, it is difficult to conceive of the Noachic flood only as a local phenomenon in view of the fact that the waters apparently covered Mount ARARAT (8:3-4). The presence of a flood account in many ethnological contexts, as well as the evidence of fossils found in various sites throughout the world are often appealed to as support for a universal flood. The human race’s effort to establish a name for itself culminated in the erection of the Tower of BABEL (11:1-9). The destruction of the tower by divine intervention was accompanied by the confusion of language, which led to the geographical distribution of the race (11:8).

The patriarchal accounts that begin at Gen. 12:1 are of great importance to the theology of both Testaments, for they record the first formal statement of the promise to Abraham. The promise, which later was put into the form of a COVENANT (15:12-21), guaranteed an inheritance to the people of God in all ages. It thus became a formalized statement that was invested with the authority of the divine oath. Among the elements of this covenant are the promise that Abraham's descendants would inherit the land of Canaan (12:7; 15:18-20), the promise that Abraham would be the father of a great nation (12:2; 17:2), and the promise of Gentile inclusion in the blessings of the covenant (12:3). When God gave the promise that Abraham would be the father of multitudes, that promise seemed unlikely to be fulfilled, because Abraham and his wife SARAH were well along in years (17:17-19). However, the integrity of the promise was maintained in the birth of ISAAC (17:19; cf. 21:1-7). The Genesis narratives set forth Abraham's FAITH as the central element in his relationship with God (15:6). His faith was given concrete expression in his willingness to sacrifice his son Isaac according to the word of God (22:1-9; cf. Jas. 22:22-23).

The Genesis narratives give the least attention to the patriarch Isaac. But the promise is not absent from the account of his life (Gen. 26:23-25). The narrative concerning JACOB also centers on the continuation of the promise-covenant in the patriarchal line. The elements of the promise were reiterated to him when he was forced to flee his home because he had deceived his father (27:18-45). Jacob is the progenitor of the twelve tribes of Israel (35:22-23). When his name was changed from Jacob to ISRAEL he gave a name to the Hebrew tribes (32:27-28).

A large portion of Genesis records the life of JOSEPH, Jacob's son by RACHEL. Basic to this narrative is its recounting of the way in which the Hebrews came to reside in the land of Egypt. It was due to a famine that was apparently widespread in Egypt and Canaan. Joseph had wisely provided for such emergencies, and Jacob and his sons came to Egypt to pasture their flocks. Joseph recognized his family, from whom he had been separated for many years, and settled them in the land of Egypt (Gen. 47:11-12). The narratives concerning Joseph provide the historical background for the Book of Exodus, which records the bondage of the Israelites in Egypt and their subsequent exodus from that land. These narratives also look back to the period of Egyptian bondage mentioned in the Abrahamic covenant (15:13-14).

Gennesaret. gi-nes'uh-ret (Gk. Gennēsaret G1166, derivation uncertain, possibly from Heb. kinneret H4055). A small plain located on the NW side of the Sea of Galilee. The name should be associated primarily with an area mentioned in two NT references as the place where Jesus landed when he crossed the lake after feeding the 5,000 (Matt. 14:34; Mk. 6:53). The plain borders on the NW shore of the Sea of Galilee between CAPERNAUM and MAGDALA. It is less than 4 mi. (6 km.) long, running N and S along the shore, and about 1 mi. (less than 2 km.) wide. The land is level, rising gently from the Sea of Galilee, which is c. 650 ft. (200 m.) below the MEDITERRANEAN. Hills rise sharply on three sides. The main road from Capernaum to TIBERIAS runs through close to the sea shore. During the time of Christ, Gennesaret was regarded as the garden spot of Palestine, producing an abundance of wild trees and flowers, as well as important crops.

Gentile. A non-Jewish person. This English term (derived from late Lat. gentilis, “pagan”; cf. Vulg. Acts 19:10) occurs occasionally in OT versions as a rendering of Hebrew gôy H1580, “people, nation” (pl. gôyim, e.g., Isa. 42:6), but more frequently in the NT to translate Greek ethnos G1620, “nation, tribe” (Matt. 4:15 et al.). Sometimes it is used also to translate Hellēn G1818, “Hellene, Greek” (e.g., Jn. 7:35 KJV; Acts 14:1 NIV).

In times of peace, considerate treatment was accorded Gentiles under OT law (e.g., Num. 35:15; Deut. 10:19; 24:14-15; Ezek. 47:22). Men of Israel often married Gentile women, of whom RAHAB, RUTH, and BATHSHEBA are notable examples, but the practice was frowned on after the return from EXILE (Ezra 9:12; 10:2-44; Neh. 10:30; 13:23-31). Separation between Jew and Gentile became more strict, until in the NT period the hostility was complete. Persecution embittered the Jewish people, who sometimes retaliated by hatred of everything pertaining to Gentiles and by avoidance, so far as was possible, of contact with foreigners. The intensity of this feeling varied, however, and it gave way before unusual kindness (Lk. 7:4-5).

While the teachings of Jesus ultimately broke down “the middle wall of partition” between Jew and Gentile, as is seen in the writings of PAUL (Rom. 1:16; 1 Cor. 1:24; Gal. 3:28; Eph. 2:14; Col. 3:11) and in Acts, Jesus limited his ministry to Jews, with rare exceptions (the half-Jewish SAMARITANS, Jn. 4:1-42; the SYROPHOENICIAN woman, Matt. 15:21-28; Mk. 7:24-30; the Greeks in Jn. 12:20-36). He instructed his twelve disciples, “Do not go among the Gentiles or enter any town of the Samaritans” (Matt. 10:5); but he did not repeat this injunction when he sent out the Seventy (Lk. 10:1-16; NIV, “seventy-two”). Jesus’ mission was first to “his own” (Jn. 1:11), the chosen people of God, but ultimately to “all who received him” (1:12). Limitations of time held his ministry on earth within the bounds of Israel; reaching the Gentiles was left to the activity of the HOLY SPIRIT working through his disciples. Thus in the book of Acts, following the appointment of Paul as the apostle to the Gentiles (Acts 9:15), the Gentiles become increasingly prominent (cf. Paul's discussion in Rom. 11:11-36).

Genubath. gi-nyoo´bath (Heb. gēnubat H1707, possibly “foreigner”). Son of HADAD, an Edomite prince (1 Ki. 11:20). When the country of EDOM was invaded by DAVID's army, Hadad, who was still a boy, fled to EGYPT. In time, he married a sister of Queen TAHPANES, and out of this union Genubath was born. The child was raised by Tahpanes and lived with PHARAOH's children in the royal palace.

Geon. gee´on. KJV Apoc. form of GIHON (Sir. 24:27).

Gera. gee´ruh (Heb. gērā › H1733, possibly from gēr H1731, “sojourner”). A name borne by several men from the tribe of BENJAMIN. Unfortunately, the genealogical lists of this tribe have suffered greatly in the course of transmission and can be correlated only partially. It is possible that “son of Gera” in some of the passages below means “belonging to the clan of Gera.”

(1) Fourth son of Benjamin and grandson of JACOB (Gen. 46:21; the name is missing from the parallel list in Num. 26:38-41). See BEKER #1.

(2) Second son of BELA and grandson of Benjamin (1 Chr. 8:3; the name is missing from the parallel list in 7:7). See the next three entries.

(3) Seventh son of Bela and grandson of Benjamin (1 Chr. 8:5; the name is missing from the parallel list in 7:7). Since it is very unlikely that two sons of Bela were given the same name, some scholars believe that the text has been corrupted and that this Gera was the son of Ehud; see #4 below.

(4) Third son of Ehud (1 Chr. 8:7). This text too is emended by some scholars.

(5) The father of EHUD, the Israelite judge (Jdg. 3:15). This Gera may be the same as #2 above, and his son Ehud may be the same individual mentioned in ##3-4 above.

(6) The father of SHIMEI (2 Sam. 16:5; 19:16, 18; 1 Ki. 2:8). Shimei was a Benjamite from BAHURIM who belonged to the clan of SAUL and who cursed DAVID when the latter was fleeing from ABSALOM.

gerah. See WEIGHTS AND MEASURES.

Gerar. gee´rahr (Heb. gērār H1761, meaning uncertain). A town and probably also a district S of GAZA and SW of the southern border of CANAAN near the MEDITERRANEAN Sea. In its first occurrence (Gen. 10:19), Gerar is used as a reference point marking the southern end of the territory of the Canaanites. ABRAHAM and SARAH are said to have dwelt in Gerar (in the district between KADESH and SHUR), where they came in contact with its king, ABIMELECH (20:1-2). This same ruler, or possibly another in the royal line who also had the title Abimelech, is called king of the PHILISTINES in a similar encounter that ISAAC and his wife REBEKAH had with him (26:1, 6-11; cf. also 26:26). Following these experiences, Isaac encamped in the valley of Gerar (26:17), probably the present Wadi esh-Shariḥah, where Isaac dug wells and experienced difficult relations with the herdsmen of the area (26:20). Centuries later, ASA king of Judah, with the help of God, routed Ethiopian invaders and pursued them to Gerar and plundered that whole region (2 Chr. 14:13-14). The town Gerar should probably be identified with Tell Abu Hureireh (Tel Haror), about 9 mi. (15 km.) SE of Gaza and 17 mi. (27 km.) NW of BEERSHEBA. This site has been excavated and shows a long period of occupation, including that part of the Middle Bronze period when the patriarchs lived (1800-1600 B.C.).

Gerasa. See GERASENE.

Gerasene. ger´uh-seen (Gk. Gerasēnos G1170, gentilic of Gerasa [Jos. War 2.18.1 §458 et al.]). An inhabitant of Gerasa, a city in TRANSJORDAN, situated about 35 mi. (55 km.) SE of the S end of the Sea of Galilee (see GALILEE, SEA OF). Gerasa was one of the cities of the DECAPOLIS. The NT references (Mk. 5:1; Lk. 8:26; cf. v. 37) describe Jesus' healing of the demoniac "Legion" and the drowning of the swine in the Sea of Galilee (cf. Matt. 8:28). The Greek MSS preserve variant spellings of the name in each gospel. The best text in Matthew reads “Gadarenes” (see GADARA), but in Mark and Luke, “Gerasenes” (some MSS preserve “Gergesenes” and “Gergustenes”). The town of Gergesa, not to be confused with either Gerasa or Gadara, was probably located midway along the E bank of the Sea of Galilee; Gadara is about 6 mi. (10 km.) SE from the S end of the Sea of Galilee; and Gerasa is another 30 mi. (50 km.) to the SE.

The fact that Matthew places the healing of “Legion” in the “region of the Gadarenes,” whereas Mark and Luke place it in the “country of the Gerasenes,” may be explained on the historical grounds that geographical boundaries overlapped, and on the exegetical consideration that “region” embraced a wide area around the cities. Most scholars today hold that near Gergesa was the precise site for the healing of “Legion.” This view agrees with the general description of the site (Mk. 5:1; Lk. 8:26). In this immediate area, steep hills come down to the shoreline and fit the story of the swine rushing headlong into the sea. No other place on the E side of the sea fits this requirement of the story. The mountainside has caves and hewn tombs where, according to Mark and Luke, the demoniac had taken shelter. The site is identified today with the town of Kursi (spelled variously), just below Wadi es-Samak.

The town of Gerasa, on the other hand, was situated near the JABBOK River about 18 mi. (29 km.) E of the JORDAN, about 20 mi. (32 km.) N of Philadelphia (OT RABBAH in AMMON). Archaeologists identify it with the modern Jerash. At this distance from the Sea of Galilee, Gerasa could not have been the site of the healing of “Legion.” It is doubtful that Jesus ever visited it. Excavations at the modern Jerash clearly show that Gerasa was a large and important city already in Jesus’ time. The excavations uncovered what is to date the best preserved Roman city in Palestine. These ruins date from the second to the seventh centuries and show that the city flourished during this period as a center for religion, culture, and commerce.

Gerizim. ger'uh-zim (Heb. gērizîm H1748). A mountain of SAMARIA, now known as Jebel et-Tur, 2,850 ft. (870 m.) high, SW of Mount EBAL. A main N-to-S road of Palestine runs through the valley, so that this pass is of strategic military importance. Moses commanded that when the Israelites came into the Promised Land, the blessing for keeping the law should be spoken from Mount Gerizim and the curse for not obeying it from Mount Ebal (Deut. 11:29; 27:4-26), six tribes standing on the slopes of each peak (27:11-14). It is conjectured by some that Mount Gerizim was selected for the blessing because, from the point of view of one looking eastward, it would be on the right or "fortunate" side. See BLESS, BLESSING.

From the top of Mount Gerizim, JOTHAM shouted his parable of the trees to the men of SHECHEM in the valley below, reminding them of all that his father GIDEON had done for them (Jdg. 9:7-21). After the Israelites, returning from Babylonian EXILE, refused to let the mixed races of Samaria help rebuild JERUSALEM (Ezra 4:1-4; Neh. 2:19-20; 13:28), the Samaritans built themselves a temple on Mount Gerizim. The Samaritan woman referred to it as "this mountain" (Jn. 4:20-21), where her people worshiped in the open after their temple was destroyed by the MACCABEES. The small Samaritan community of Nablus still celebrates the Passover on Mount Gerizim. Samaritan tradition maintains that ABRAHAM attempted to sacrifice ISAAC on this mountain (Gen. 22:1-19), that at a nearby SALEM he met MELCHIZEDEK (14:17-20), and that JACOB's dream (28:10-17) occurred at Khirbet Lanzah on Mount Gerizim. A rock with a cup-shaped hollow that could have been used for libations is the traditional altar of the Samaritan temple.

Gershom. guhr'shuhm (Heb. gēršōm H1768, derivation uncertain; by popular etymology, “an alien there”). (1) Firstborn son of MOSES. When ZIPPORAH gave birth to him in MIDIAN, “Moses named him Gershom, saying, ‘I have become an alien [gēr H1731] in a foreign land” (Exod. 2:22; cf. 18:3). The only other information given about him is his genealogical data and, probably, the account of his CIRCUMCISION (4:24-26; his name does not actually appear in this passage). According to the book of Judges, a descendant of Gershom named JONATHAN served as priest for the Danites. See DAN. Jonathan made use of idols, however, and his descendants continued this practice until the EXILE (Jdg. 18:30; the KJV, following the MT, has “Gershom, son of Manasseh” [see MANASSEH #3]). Another descendant of Gershom, SHEBUEL, was an officer in charge of the treasuries during the time of DAVID (1 Chr. 23:15-16; 26:24).

(2) A descendant, and probably clan leader, of PHINEHAS who returned from BABYLON with EZRA (Ezra 8:2).

(3) Variant form of GERSHON in 1 Chronicles.

Gershon. guhr'shuhn (Heb. gēršōn H1767, possibly from GERSHOM; gentilic gēršunnî H1769, “Gershonite”). First son of LEVI, born to him before JACOB and his family went to Egypt (Gen. 46:11). In the Hebrew text of Chronicles, this name almost always appears as Gershom (the only exceptions are 1 Chr. 6:1 [MT 5:27] and 23:6), but the NIV uses the spelling Gershon whenever the reference is to the son of Levi. Biblical references to Gershon focus on the Levitical line that descended from him. In the book NUMBERS, the Gershonites are divided into two families or clans: LIBNI (apparently called LADAN in 1 Chr. 23:7) and SHIMEI (Num. 3:18, 21). The number of male Gershonites “a month old or more who were counted was 7,500” (3:22); their leader was ELIASAPH son of Lael (3:24). They camped immediately to the W of the TABERNACLE (3:23) and “were responsible for the care of the tabernacle and tent” (3:25).

The Gershonites were assigned lands within the holdings of Issachar, Asher, and Naphtali in Palestine proper, and in the holdings of the half tribe of Manasseh in TRANSJORDAN (Josh. 21:6, 27-33; 1 Chr. 6:62, 71-76). This assignment of land placed the Gershonites in the northernmost extremes on both sides of the Jordan. Although their northern homelands were far from JERUSALEM, biblical evidences show that the Gershonites shared in the central religious life of the nation. One hundred and thirty Gershonites helped bring the ARK OF THE COVENANT to Jerusalem (1 Chr. 15:7). A Gershonite, ASAPH son of Berechiah, was the chief of the temple musicians under DAVID (16:4-5). The later prominence of the Asaphite clan of temple musicians probably originates from this office. HEMAN son of Joel was another important Gershonite official (15:17; “son of Joel” may refer to a Gershonite clan).

Geruth Kimham. gih-r’ooth-kim’ham (Heb. gērût kimhām H1745, possibly “lodging place of KIMHAM”). Also Geruth Chimham. Unidentified place near BETHLEHEM (perhaps named after the son of BARZILLAI, 2 Sam. 19:37-40). After the murder of GEDALIAH, whom NEBUCHADNEZZAR had appointed governor over Judah, Hebrew forces led by JOHANAN son of Kareah fled and stayed in Geruth Kimham on their way to Egypt (Jer. 41:17).

Gesham. See GESHAN.

Geshan. gesh’uhn (Heb. gêšān H1642). KJV Gesham (some later editions). Son of Jahdai, from the tribe of JUDAH, possibly a descendant of CALEB, although the genealogical connection is not stated (1 Chr. 2:47).

Geshem. gesh’uhm (Heb. gešem H1774, possibly “[born during] rain season”; variant form gašmû H1776 [Neh. 6:6, KJV “Gashmu”]). One of NEHEMIAH’S opponents in the rebuilding of the walls of Jerusalem (Neh. 2:19; 6:1-2, 6). He was important enough to serve as witness to the Jews’ alleged treason. His title, “the Arab,” may identify him as the governor of EDOM, but scholars have more generally identified him with a N Arabian king referred to as “Gashm son of Shahr” in an inscription from DEDAN in ARABIA and as “Gashm king of Kedar” in an Aramaic inscription from Egypt.

Geshur. gesh’uhr (Heb. gēšûr H1770, possibly “bridge”; gentilic gēšûrî H1771, “Geshurite”). (1) A country just E and NE of the Sea of Galilee, corresponding to the southern part of the Golan Heights. This area, along with the land of the Maacathites, was one of the borders of the territory given to JAIR, of the tribe of MANASSEH (Deut. 3:14). The same boundary is mentioned as the limit of the area that the Israelites were able to capture (Josh. 12:5), and its inhabitants are listed as among those whom the Israelites were not able to drive out and who continued to live within Israel (13:11, 13). The Geshurites, along with the Arameans (SYRIA), took HAVVOTH JAIR (formerly possessed by Jair the Manassite) and other places from the Israelites (1 Chr. 2:23). One of DAVID’s wives, MAACAH, was the daughter of TALMAI, king of Geshur (2 Sam. 3:3; 1 Chr. 3:2). When ABSALOM (son of David and Maacah) killed his half-brother AMNON, he fled to his grandfather Talmi in Geshur for protection (2 Sam. 13:37-38; cf. 14:23, 32; 15:8).

(2) The term Geshurites apparently can also refer to a people S of the PHILISTINES near SINAI, whose land was not taken originally by the Israelite forces at the time of the conquest (Josh. 13:2). When David was in exile with ACHISH king of GATH, he and his men made raids upon these Geshurites (and other peoples) and led Achish to believe that he was attacking his own people (1 Sam. 27:8).

Gether. gee’thuhr (Heb. geter H1788, meaning unknown). Son of ARAM and grandson of SHEM, included in the Table of Nations (Gen. 10:23). In the parallel list (1 Chr. 1:17), the phrase “the sons of Aram” is missing from the MT, making it appear that Gether was a son of Shem and thus a brother of Aram. It is possible that this passage intends to list the descendants of Shem without distinguishing generations (cf. NRSV), but many scholars believe that the phrase in question dropped out by scribal mistake at an early stage in the textual transmission of the book (cf. NIV).

These ancient olive trees found in the courtyard of the Church of All Nations (possibly the site of Gethsemane) are nearly 1,500 years old.

Gethsemane. geth-sem'uh-nee (Gk. Gethsēmani G1149, prob. from Heb. gat šēmānî, “oil press”). The place of Jesus’ agony and arrest (Matt. 26:36-56; Mk. 14:32-52; Lk. 22:39-54; Jn. 18:1-12). Matthew and Mark refer to it simply as “a place”; Luke does not give the name but says that the place was one to which Jesus customarily went and that it was on the Mount of OLIVES. John, without naming it, explains that it was a garden across the KIDRON Valley from JERUSALEM. The traditional site, today cared for by the Franciscans, is not far from the road, near the bridge over the Kidron, and is laid out in neat gardens. Within are eight large olive trees. If Emperor Titus destroyed all the trees around Jerusalem during the siege of A.D. 70, as JOSEPHUS asserts, these trees cannot be as old as the time of Jesus, but they are certainly ancient, and they add to the atmosphere of a place of Christian devotion. Armenian, Greek, and Russian churches claim other olive groves nearby as the correct site. It is without doubt in the vicinity. The sufferings of Christ as his hour approached—portrayed by Matthew, Mark, and Luke—and the humiliation of his arrest, told by all four evangelists, concentrate the reverent thought and feeling of believers, so that the very name Gethsemane evokes the love and adoration due the Savior who prayed there.

Geuel. gyoo'uhl (Heb. gē'û'ēl H1451, possibly “loftiness of God”). Son of Maki, from the tribe of GAD; he was one of the twelve spies sent out by MOSES to reconnoiter the Promised Land (Num. 13:15).

Gezer. gee'zuhr (Heb. gezer H1618, possibly "confined space"). A major city of the N SHEPHELAH, allotted to the tribe of EPHRAIM and assigned to the Levites. It is identified with modern Tell el-Jezer, about 18 mi. (29 km.) NW of JERUSALEM, between the Valley of SOREK and the Valley of AIJALON. It lies S of the main road from Jerusalem to Jaffa (Haifa) and E of the railroad. Its military importance, overlooking main routes through the country, has led to its occupation in many periods of history. The Egyptians captured Gezer about 1500 B.C., but their power decreased a century or so later. When Israel entered the land, HORAM king of Gezer came to help LACHISH (Josh. 10:33), whose king had been killed in the battle of the day on which the sun stood still. Horam and his army were completely destroyed, but Gezer was not taken. The king of Gezer is listed among those whom Joshua defeated (12:12). Gezer is on the S boundary of EPHRAIM, near BETH HORON (Josh. 16:3-10; 1 Chr. 7:28). The inhabitants of Gezer were not driven out (Josh. 16:10; Jdg. 1:29) but later became slave labor. Gezer was one of the cities given to the Kohathite LEVITES (Josh. 21:21; 1 Chr. 6:67). DAVID defeated the PHILISTINES as far as Gezer (2 Sam. 5:25 [KJV, "Gazer"]; 1 Chr. 14:16; 20:4), but it remained for SOLOMON to reduce the people of Gezer to forced labor and to rebuild the city, which the pharaoh of Egypt had taken and burned and later given to Solomon as a dowry with his daughter (1 Ki. 9:15-17).

Gezer was occupied in the Greek period. Though not mentioned in the NT, it was known in NT times as Gazara. The Crusaders fortified Gezer, and it has undergone several changes of ownership since then. Archaeological remains fully illustrate the life of the people. Excavations have revealed a stepped water tunnel 216 ft. (66 m.) long, dating to the time of Solomon. City gates were also found from the time of Solomon matching those found at HAZOR (cf. 1 Ki. 9:15-16). A "high place" dating to about 1600 B.C. was found here as well as a tenth-century calendar containing a Hebrew inscription of seven lines and citing an annual cycle of agricultural activities. It is one of the oldest-known pieces of Hebrew writing. The capture of Gezer is mentioned in the stele of Pharaoh Merneptah about 1220.

ghost. This English term, which in modern usage refers specifically to the SPIRIT of a dead person that appears in bodily likeness, is very frequently used by the KJV to render Hebrew rûaḥ H8120 and Greek pneuma G4460, which normally refer to the vital life principle of a person, or to the essence of God, or to the HOLY SPIRIT (however, Lk. 24:37 and 39 uses pneuma in the sense of "ghost"; the parallels have phantasma G5753, Matt. 14:26; Mk. 6:49). The NRSV also uses “ghost” a few times to render Hebrew ʾôb H200 (e.g., Isa. 8:19; NIV, “medium”). See DIVINATION; FAMILIAR SPIRIT.

Ghost, Holy. See HOLY SPIRIT.

Giah. gi’uh (Heb. gîḥa H1632, “spring”). An unidentified site within the territory of the tribe of BENJAMIN, mentioned as being on the route of ABNER’s flight from JOAB and ABISHAI (2 Sam. 2:24). It is said to have been E of GIBEON (emended to GEB A by some scholars) and near a hill named AMMAH, probably close to the edge of the wilderness.

giant. The first mention of giants in the Bible is in Gen. 6:4 (KJV), where the NIV and other modern versions have “Nephilim,” a Hebrew word of uncertain etymology but possibly meaning “fallen ones” (see SONS OF GOD). Nephilim were found in Canaan when the spies went through the land (Num. 13:33). Beside these men of great stature, the spies felt like grasshoppers. The Hebrew word rendered “giant” by the KJV at Job 16:14 means simply “mighty man, warrior.” For other terms alluding to giants, see ANAKITES and REPHAITES. See also GOLIATH.

Gibbar. gib’ahr (Heb. gibbār H1507, “[strong] man”). The ancestor of one of the families who returned with ZERUBBABEL from EXILE (Ezra 2:20). Some have argued that Gibbar here is a textual corruption of the place name GIBEON (cf. Neh. 7:25).

Gibbethon. gib’uh-thon (Heb. gibbētôn H1510, “hill, ridge”). A PHILISTINE city allotted to the tribe of DAN (Josh. 19:44) and assigned to the LEVITES (21:23). It was while NADAB, son of Jeroboam, was besieging Gibbethon that BAASHA murdered him and assumed the crown of Israel for himself (1 Ki. 15:27). Later, the Israelite army was again trying to wrest Gibbethon from the Philistines when word reached them that ZIMRI had murdered Baasha’s son, ELAH, and proclaimed himself king. On hearing this, the army proclaimed OMRI king, and Zimri committed suicide (16:15-20). The city is identified either with Tell Melat (some 15 mi./24 km. SE of JOPPA and 3 mi./5 km. W of GEZER) or with Ras Abu Humeid (a short distance farther NE; but see GITTAIM).

Gibea. gib'ee-uh (Heb. gib ʿā H1495, “hill” or possibly “highlander”). Son of Sheva and grandson of CALEB, included in the genealogy of JUDAH (1 Chr. 2:49).

Gibeah. gib'ee-uh (Heb. gib ʿāh H1497 [gib ʿat in Josh. 18:28], “hill”; gentilic gib ʿātī H1503, “Gibeathite”). The name of several locations in PALESTINE. Because much of Palestine is hilly country, it is not surprising that a name meaning “hill” was widely used and that various names of similar meaning might create confusion. GIBEON, properly the chief city of the HIVITES who tricked Israel into an alliance to avoid being massacred (Josh. 11:19), can be mistaken for Gibeah of SAUL (2 Sam. 21:6) and for GEBa (1 Chr. 14:16; cf. 2 Sam. 5:25). Again, Geba and Gibeah should properly refer to different places, but the MT reads Geba in Jdg. 20:10 and 33, where the reference is probably to Gibeah; in v. 31, on the other hand, it reads Gibeah when Geba (according to some, Gibeon) is probably intended. At least four places named Gibeah can be distinguished.

(1) A town in the hill country of the tribe of JUDAH (Josh. 15:57). It is perhaps the same city identified elsewhere as the home of MICAIAH, the mother of King ABIJAH (2 Chr. 13:2; but see #2 below). Moreover, some believe that GIBEa, described as a grandson of CALEB, refers to this town (1 Chr. 2:49). Modern el-Jeba^c (c. 7.5 mi./12 km. WSW of BETHLEHEM) has been proposed as a possible identification of Judahite Gibeah, but this location is improbable, since the context of Josh. 15:57 suggests the area SE of HEBRON.

(2) A town (or hill) in the hill country of the tribe of EPHRAIM; it was the home of the priest PHINEHAS, grandson of AARON, and provided the burial place of Phinehas's father, ELEAZAR (Josh. 24:33). Nothing else is known about such a city, unless it was the home of King Abijah's mother (see #1 above). Some believe that the word in this passage should be understood as a common noun, “in the hill that belonged to Phinehas.” If it does refer to a town, the location cannot be determined.

(3) A hill—known as Gibeath Elohim, “Gibeah [Hill] of God”—in the tribal territory of BENJAMIN where the PHILISTINES had an outpost and where SAUL met a procession of prophets (1 Sam. 10:5, 10). It has been identified with various sites, including Gibeah of Saul (see #4 below), Gibeon, and Geba.

(4) Finally, there is the Gibeah of Benjamin (1 Sam. 13:15), also known as Gibeah of Saul (11:4); it is probably the same as Gibeath (Josh. 18:28 KJV).

This Gibeah was first identified with Tell el-Ful (about 3.5 mi./5 km. N of Jerusalem) in the 19th cent., a proposal later confirmed by W. F. Albright. More recently some scholars have argued that it is the same as Geba (Jeba^c, a few miles farther to the NE). It is possible that Tell el-Ful was the original site and that Saul built a fortress there (Gibeah of Saul), but that since the city itself had been destroyed, its name (Geba/Gibeah) was transferred to the neighboring site of Jeba^c. By far the most important city by this name in the biblical account, Gibeah of Benjamin first comes into prominence in the book of Judges. Here a LEVITE's concubine was raped and abused, and this event brought war between Benjamin and the rest of Israel (Jdg. 19-20). The transactions at Gibeah during the reign of Saul are recorded in 1 Sam. 10:26; 11:4; 13:2, 15-16; 14:2; 14:16; 15:34; 22:6; 23:19; 26:1. Here seven of Saul's descendants were hanged to satisfy the vengeance of the Gibeonites (21:6; NRSV has Gibeon). One of David's mighty men was from Gibeah of Benjamin (2 Sam. 23:29; 1 Chr. 11:31). The people of Gibeah fled when the Assyrians marched toward them (Isa. 10:29). Hosea called for a warning (Hos. 5:8) at Gibeah because of the sins Israel had committed "as in the days of Gibeah" (9:9; 10:9); the sins of Saul's reign had been remembered for centuries.

Gibeath Haaraloth. gib´ee-uhth-hay-air´uh-loth (Heb. gib ʿat hā ʿārālôt H1502, "hill of the foreskins"). A hill in the vicinity of JERICHO where CIRCUMCISION was performed on the Israelites who were born after the EXODUS (Josh. 5:3). Presumably, the place received its name because of this event.

Gibeon lies at a critical internal crossroads in Palestine.

Gibeon. gib´ee-uhn (Heb. gib ʿōn H1500, “hill”; gentilic gib ʿōnî H1498, “Gibeonite”). An important city in the hill country of BENJAMIN, identified with modern el-Jib, about 6 mi. (10 km.) NW of JERUSALEM (in 1 Chr. 8:29 and 9:25, “the father of Gibeon” is probably an epithet for a major figure in the early history of the city). Gibeon was one of the cities of Benjamin given to the priests (Josh. 21:17). At the time of the conquest, JOSHUA was deceived by the ambassadors of Gibeon into making a treaty with them (ch. 9), promising not to destroy them. When he discovered the deception, he spared their lives but made them woodcutters and water carriers. A coalition of Canaanite kings attacked Gibeon because they had made peace with Joshua (ch. 10). Joshua came to the aid of Gibeon, and in the battle that followed, Joshua called on the sun to stand still to give him time for more fighting (alluded to in Isa. 28:21). No other city made peace with Israel (Josh. 11:19). Gibeon was the chief of four HIVITE cities (9:17).

ABNER and JOAB met in battle at a pool at Gibeon, the remains of which may still be seen. Here, two groups of twelve men fought an indecisive contest, and the remaining forces joined in a disastrous battle (2 Sam. 2:8-28; 3:30), following which Abner and Joab agreed to a cessation of the fighting. At a great stone in Gibeon, Joab murdered AMASA (20:8-10). DAVID defeated the PHILISTINES from Gibeon on the N to GEZER on the S (1 Chr. 14:16). ZADOK the priest was assigned to minister at the high place in Gibeon (16:39-40; 21:29). SOLOMON, at the outset of his reign, came to Gibeon to sacrifice and there in a dream he chose wisdom above other gifts that God offered him (1 Ki. 3:3-15; 2 Chr. 1:2-13). Again Solomon received a message from the Lord here (1 Ki. 9:1-9). People from Gibeon returned to Jerusalem from the EXILE and helped rebuild the walls (Neh. 3:7; 7:25). JEREMIAH confronted a false prophet from Gibeon in the temple (Jer. 28:1). The town was the scene of a rescue of Israelites during the Assyrian occupation (41:11-16).

J. B. Pritchard excavated the site in 1957-62. All the remains are from the Iron Age (Israelite period) and later, except for a few traces of the Late Bronze Age. The main discoveries were two water tunnels, a large pool (mentioned in 2 Sam. 2:13) in which pottery vessels were found with the name Gibeon stamped on them in Hebrew, some houses, a wine cellar, and some fortifications.

Gibeonite. gib'ee-uh-nit. An inhabitant of GIBEON. The Gibeonites were apparently HIVITES (Josh. 9:3, 7); they are also described as AMO-RITES (2 Sam. 21:2). Because of the deceitful manner in which they gained the favor of JOSHUA, they were made slave laborers for menial tasks such as chopping wood and drawing water (Josh. 9). The Gibeonites and their allies, at the time of the conquest by Joshua, controlled a tetrapolis—BEEROTH, KEPHIRAH, KIRIATH BAAL, and Gibeon. Much later, during a prolonged famine, DAVID inquired of the Lord and learned that the cause was blood-guilt because SAUL had earlier massacred the Gibeonites; therefore David turned over to them seven descendants of Saul for vengeance (2 Sam. 21:1-9). A Gibeonite was leader of David's thirty mighty men (1 Chr. 12:4). Gibeonites helped repair the walls of JERUSALEM (Neh. 3:7).

Giblite. See GEBAL.

Giddalti. gi-dal'ti (Heb. giddaltî H1547, "I brought up" or "I magnify [God]"). Son of HEMAN, the king's seer (1 Chr. 25:4). The fourteen sons of Heman, along with the sons of ASAPH and JEDU-THUN, were set apart "for the ministry of prophesying, accompanied by harps, lyres and cymbals" (v. 1). The assignment of duty was done by lot, and the twenty-second lot fell to Giddalti, his sons, and his relatives (25:29).

Giddel. gid'uhl (Heb. giddēl H1543, possibly short form of GEDALIAH). (1) Ancestor of a family of temple servants (NETHINIM) who returned with ZERUBBABEL from the EXILE (Ezra 2:47; Neh. 7:49).

(2) A servant of SOLOMON whose descendants returned with Zerubbabel from the exile (Ezra 2:56; Neh. 7:58).

Gideon. gid'ee-uhn (Heb. gid'ôn H1549, "one who cuts, hewer"). KJV NT Gedeon. Son of Joash the Abiezrite, from the tribe of MANASSEH, and the fifth recorded judge of Israel (Jdg. 6-8); also called JERUB-BAAL ("let Baal contend," 6:32 et al.; JERUB-BESHETH in 2 Sam. 11:21). The family lived in OPHRAH not far from Mount GERIZIM (not the Ophrah of Benjamin listed in Josh. 18:23). Gideon had become a noted warrior (Jdg. 6:12), perhaps by waging "underground" warfare against the marauding Midianites (see MIDIAN). The extent to which the people had been enslaved is shown by the fact that Gideon had to hide in a winepress to do the threshing (6:11). A supernatural fire that consumed Gideon's sacrifice (6:17-23) attested to the fact that the messenger who called Gideon to lead Israel was from God.

Gideon responded to the call and, with the help of some friends, overthrew the altar of BAAL and cut down the sacred grove around it. He erected instead a new altar, naming it Yahweh-Shalom, "The LORD is Peace" (Jdg. 6:24). For his daring feat the followers of Baal wanted to kill him, but his father intervened.

Gideon then issued a call to adjoining tribesmen to war against the Midianites. Having gathered a formidable host, he sought confirmation of his task and so put forth the famous test of the fleece (6:36-40). As further assurance, he was instructed to slip into the enemy's camp, and there he overheard one soldier tell another of a dream and interpret it to mean that Gideon's smaller army would win the battle (7:9-14). To prevent human boasting over victory, God instructed Gideon to reduce his force to three hundred picked men by (1) letting the faint-hearted go home and (2) choosing only those men who were cautious enough to lap the water with their hands to their mouths (7:1-8).

By strategy involving psychological warfare, Gideon's small band surprised the enemy in a night attack. Three groups of one hundred each attacked from three directions. At the proper time a signal was given, shields for the lights were removed, and trumpets blared. The sleeping Midianites were terrified. So complete was their rout that they killed one another in their mad flight (Jdg. 7:15-22). Gideon then called on his allies to join in the chase. Ephraim captured two of the kings (8:1-3). Gideon pursued the other two northward and captured them near the confluence of the Sea of Galilee and the Jordan (8:4-21). Thus the country was delivered all the way to the Jordan (7:22-23; 8:1-21). When his people wanted to make him king, Gideon refused and instead called for an offering of the golden trinkets that had been captured from the Midianites. With these he made an EPHOD, either an image of Yahweh or a sacred vestment worn by a priest in the sanctuary. Because of its worth and beauty, it later became an object of worship (8:24-27). Gideon's ability and statesmanship are shown in his long and fruitful ministry of forty years as judge (8:28). During his life he had seventy-one sons (8:30)—one, ABIMELECH, by a concubine of SHECHEM (8:31). After Gideon's death idolatry returned (8:32-35), Abimelech seized an opportune time, engaged mercenaries, invaded the land of Gideon, and destroyed all the seventy sons except JOTHAM, who escaped by hiding (9:1-6).

Gideoni. gid'ee-oh'ni (Heb. gid'ōnî H1551, in form, a gentilic of GIDEON, but meaning uncertain). Father of ABIDAN; the latter was the leader of the tribe of BENJAMIN in the wilderness wanderings (Num. 1:11; 2:22; 7:60, 65; 10:24).

Gidom. gi'duhm (Heb. gid'ōm H1550, possibly “cutting off, clearing”). An unknown location, probably in the E side of the territory of BENJAMIN (Jdg. 20:45). After the rape of the Levite's mistress in GIBEAH, the other tribes of Israel went to battle against the Benjamites, who “fled toward the desert to the rock of Rimmon.” Along the flight, the Israelites killed 5,000 Benjamites and pressed after them “as far as Gidom,” where 2,000 more died. Some scholars have thought that the Hebrew word gid ʿōm should be understood as a verbal form and translate the text, “to their cutting down,” that is, until the Benjamites were slaughtered (cf. NEB).

gift. This English term is used variously in Bible versions to render numerous Hebrew words, especially minhâ H4966 and mattān H5508; the most common Greek terms are dōron G1565 and charisma G5922 (the latter is in the NT restricted to the favors that God grants, both physical and spiritual). In Israel, gifts were presented not only to one’s immediate family to mark a betrothal, marriage, birth, or death, but also to superiors in political and religious hierarchy and to the palace and temple. The ultimate gifts are those given to God as tokens of faith and dependence; however, Scripture insists upon the sincerity of the heart. See also CONTRIBUTION; CORBAN; GIFTS, SPIRITUAL; SACRIFICE AND OFFERINGS.

gifts, spiritual. The apostle PAUL uses the noun charisma G5922 (“favor, something graciously bestowed, gift”) in combination with pneumatikos G4461 (“spiritual”) only once, when writing to the Romans: “I long to see you so that I may impart to you some spiritual gift to make you strong” (Rom. 1:11). Elsewhere he uses either of these terms by itself, almost always in the plural (charismata, Rom. 12:6 et al.; pneumatika, 1 Cor. 12:1 and 14:1), to designate the special endowments that the HOLY SPIRIT bestows on believers for the benefit of the CHURCH as a whole (cf. 1 Cor. 12:4-11; cf. Rom. 12:6-8; 2 Cor. 1:11; 1 Pet. 4:10). They include the ability to speak an unlearned tongue (1 Cor. 14:1-33), the interpretation of tongues (12:30; 14:27-28), power to drive out evil spirits (Matt. 8:16; Acts 13:7-12), special ability in healing the sick (1 Cor. 12:9), prophecy (Rom. 12:6), and special wisdom and knowledge (1 Cor. 12:8). Paul told the CORINTHIANS to diligently seek these gifts (12:31), but he pointed out that “the most excellent way” (12:31) was an emphasis on FAITH, HOPE, and LOVE, among which love is the greatest gift (13:13). The fruit of the Spirit is described in Gal. 5:22-23.

Everyone is accountable for any gift given to him or her (1 Cor. 4:7; 1 Pet. 4:10). Claims of having such gifts are to be tested by doctrine (1 Cor. 12:2-3) and on moral grounds (Matt. 7:15; Rom. 8:9). The ability to preach is a spiritual gift (1 Cor. 2:4; 2 Tim. 1:6). To know the deep things of God requires spiritual insight (1 Cor. 2:11-16). The gifts are distributed by the Holy Spirit as he wills (1 Cor. 12:11; Heb. 2:4).

Gihon. gi'hon (Heb. gîḥôn H1633, “a bursting forth, spring”). (1) One of the four headwaters into which the river in E_{DEN} separated (Gen. 2:10-14). The name perhaps suggests that it arose either from a large spring or from a cataract. Because the Gihon River is described as winding through the land of C_{USH} (E_{THIOPIA}), some have argued that the reference is to the N_{ILE}, but this identification, like others, seems to overlook the fact that the T_{IGRIS} and E_{UPHRATES}, two of the other headwaters, do not flow out of a common source; hence the account does not literally fit today's geography.

(2) Gihon was the name also of a noted spring near J_{ERUSALEM}. S_{OLOMON} was anointed there to succeed D_{AVID} (1 Ki. 1:32-40). That the spring provided a good supply of water is shown by the fact that H_{EZEKIAH}, during his prosperous reign, had its water diverted by a tunnel to serve the growing population of Jerusalem (2 Chr. 32:27-30). Recent discoveries show that this tunnel was connected with the Pool of S_{ILOAM}, where the people of the city went to draw water. Remains of an ancient canal have been found through which the water once entered and it may be of this that Isaiah wrote (8:6). This spring was originally controlled by the J_{EBUSITES} (2 Sam. 5:6), who cut a tunnel to bring it near enough to the wall for water to be drawn without exposing their women to raiders.

Gilalai. gil'uh-li (Heb. gilălāy H1675, meaning uncertain). A priestly musician who participated in the dedication of the rebuilt wall of J_{ERUSALEM} under E_{ZRA} (Neh. 12:36).

Gilboa, Mount. gil-boh'uh (Heb. gilbōa H1648, prob. “hill country”). A mountain or range of mountains (today Jebel Fuquah), about 8 mi. (13 km.) long and 3-5 mi. (5-8 km.) wide, lying to the E of the Plain of E_{SDRAELON}, on the border between S_{AMARIA} and G_{ALILEE}, some 17 mi. (27 km.) SW of the Sea of Galilee. The highest peak, Sheikh Burqan, is only c. 1,700 ft. (520 m.) above sea level, but it falls off rather abruptly on the E to the J_{ORDAN}, 2,000 ft. (610 m.) below. The western slope inclines more gradually to Esdraelon, 300 ft. (90 m.) above sea level. The name Gilboa occurs in Scripture only in connection with the last battle and the death of S_{AUL} and his three sons, which took place on this western slope (1 Sam. 31; 2 Sam. 1; 21:12; 1 Chr. 10:1-8).

Gilead. gil'ee-uhd (Heb. gil'ād H1680, possibly “rugged country,” but see G_{ALEED}; gentilic gil'ādî H1682, “Gileadite”). The name of three persons and of a geographical area. (1) Son of M_{AKIR}, grandson of M_{ANASSEH}, and eponymous ancestor of the Gileadite clan (Num. 26:29-30; 27:1; 36:1; Josh. 17:1; Jdg. 5:17; 1 Chr. 2:21, 23; 7:14, 17). According to one passage (Num. 32:40; cf. Josh. 17:1), MOSES gave the land of Gilead (see below, #4) to Makir, suggesting that the latter named his son after the name of the land.

(2) The father of JEPHTHAH; because Jephthah was born of a prostitute, Gilead's legitimate sons drove him away (Jdg. 11:1-2).

(3) Son of Michael and descendant of GAD (1 Chr. 5:14; the Gadites lived in Gilead and other areas, v. 16).

(4) A large mountainous region E of the JORDAN. Often mentioned in the OT, the name Gilead in its broadest sense can be applied to all of Israelite TRANSJORDAN (e.g., Josh. 22:9, where it is contrasted to the land of CANAAN, i.e., Cisjordan) or to the entire central section of that area (2 Ki. 10:33). More precisely, Gilead was located in the foothills N of the Plain of Mishor. It was bounded on the W by the Jordan River, extended near the YARMUK on the N, to the S–N branches of the JABBOK and the Arabian desert to the E, and to the ARNON on the S. Its cities included JABESH GILEAD, MAHANAIM, MIZPAH, RAMOTH GILEAD, and SUCCOTH. In NT times, as a part of the kingdom of HEROD the Great and his son Herod Antipas, it was known as PEREA. The name is still preserved today in several locations (e.g., Jebel Jel'ad). In OT times it was a lush region with good forests, rich grazing lands, and abundant moisture.

Beside the Jabbok in Gilead, JACOB had his reconciliation with ESAU (Gen. 32:22—33:15). When CANAAN was allocated to the Israelites, Gilead fell to the Reubenites, Gadites, and to half the tribe of Manasseh (Deut. 3:13). An account of the conquest of the region is found in Deut. 2 and 3. Moses was permitted to see the plain before his death (34:1). After the land was conquered a great altar was erected beside the JORDAN so that true worship would not be forgotten (Josh. 22:10).

JAIR, a Gileadite, served for twenty years as judge over Israel (Jdg. 10:3). JEPHTHAH, a great-grandson of MANASSEH, was also a judge. Being the son of a concubine, he was banished by his brothers, but when Gilead was in dire distress, he was recalled by the elders (11:1-3). He defeated the Ephraimites and prevented fugitives from crossing the Jordan by resorting to the noted password SHIBBOLETH (12:1-7). ABSALOM gathered his forces in Gilead when he rebelled against DAVID (2 Sam. 15:13-23). The Gileadites finally fell into gross IDOLATRY (Hos. 6:8; 12:11), were overcome by the Aramean king HAZAEL (2 Ki. 10:32-34), and were led into captivity by TIGLATH-PILESER king of Assyria (15:27-29).

Gilead became famous because of some of its products. BALM was exported to TYRE (Ezek. 27:17); JEREMIAH knew of its curative power (Jer. 8:22; 46:11; 51:8). The Ishmaelites who came from Gilead and bought Joseph carried balm to Egypt (Gen. 37:25).

Gilgal. gil'gal (Heb. gilgāl H1652 [with def. article, except Josh. 5:9; 12:23], "circle [of stones]," thus "circuit, territory"). The name of several locations. The most important of these, JOSHUA's encampment near the JORDAN, will be treated last.

(1) A town in the tribal territory of EPHRAIM. The prophets ELIJAH and ELISHAH are said to have gone "from Gilgal" (2 Ki. 2:1) to BETHEL (v. 2) and on to JERICO (v. 4). On the basis of such limited information, some have identified this Gilgal with the modern town of Jiljulieh, about 7 mi. (11 km.) N of Bethel, but the site cannot be confirmed. It was possibly the same place where later Elisha threw flour in the pot of death, making the stew harmless (4:38-41). In addition, Mounts EBAL and GERIZIM are elsewhere said to be "near the great trees of Moreh, in the territory of those Canaanites living in the Arabah in the vicinity of Gilgal" (Deut. 11:29-30). This description indicates a place near SHECHEM, and thus likely the same area mentioned in 2 Kings. Because the broader context of Deuteronomy speaks of the Israelites' entering the Promised Land, however, some scholars argue that this Gilgal must be the same as #4 below.

(2) A region where the Canaanite city of GOIIM (NIV, "Goyim") was located; the name is included in a list of conquered monarchs (Josh. 12:23; the KJV reads, "of the nations of Gilgal"). Because it is mentioned next to DOR (in Naphath Dor) and before TIRZAH, some think the area may have been on the eastern edge of the SHARON Plain. The SEPTUAGINT, however, has GALILEE (rather than Gilgal), a reading followed by the NRSV and other versions.

(3) A town or region on the NE boundary of the tribe of JUDAH, facing the Pass of ADUMMIM, “south of the gorge” (Josh. 15:7). Because Adummim is about 6 mi. (10 km.) SW of JERICHO, some have identified this Gilgal with #4 below, but the latter was clearly much closer to Jericho. A similar passage (18:17, which describes the SE boundary of BENJAMIN) refers to GELILOTH as facing the Pass of Adummim, and many scholars believe that Geliloth and Gilgal are variant forms of the same name.

(4) The Gilgal most frequently mentioned in the Bible is a site “on the eastern border of Jericho” where the Israelites camped soon after entering the Promised Land (Josh. 4:19). There they built a monument of twelve stones (v. 20), the rite of CIRCUMCISION was performed (5:8), and the Passover was celebrated (5:10). From this site, the Israelites set out to march around Jericho for seven days. Apparently, Gilgal was their base camp as they made attacks on the hill country, for JOSHUA was found at Gilgal by the GIBEONITES after AI was destroyed and after he had built an altar on Mount Ebal (8:30; 9:6). From Gilgal, the Israelites left to defend Gibeon and returned to Gilgal victorious (10:15, 43). Later, Gilgal became one of three cities on SAMUEL’s circuit (1 Sam. 7:16). SAUL was made king in Gilgal (11:14-15), which became a base of military operations (13:4 et al.). Here Saul sought to placate Samuel after he had disobeyed by salvaging some cattle for booty and permitting the enemy king to live (15:7-15). Gilgal is often identified with Khirbet el-Mefjir, just NE of Jericho, but another proposal is Khirbet en-Nitleh (3 mi./5 km. SE of Jericho).

Gilo. See GILOH.

Giloh. gi’loh (Heb. gilōh H1656, possibly “rejoicing”; gentilic gīlōnî H1639, “Gilonite”). A town in the hill country of S JUDAH (Josh. 15:51). It was the home of DAVID’s counselor, AHITHOPHEL (2 Sam. 15:12; 23:34 [RSV, “of Gilo”]). Some have identified Giloh with modern Khirbet Jala, about 5 mi. (8 km.) NNW of HEBRON, but others prefer an otherwise unknown location farther S.

Gilonite. See GILOH.

gimel. gim’uhl (Heb. gîmel [not used in the Bible], meaning uncertain). The third letter of the Hebrew alphabet (ג), with a numerical value of three. Its sound corresponds to that of English “hard” g (but following a vowel, it later became a soft fricative, that is, allowing some breath to go through).

Gimzo. gim´zoh (Heb. gimzô H1693, perhaps “[place of] sycamore tree”). A town in the SHEPHELAH wrested from King AHAZ by the PHILISTINES (2 Chr. 28:18). Gimzo is identified with modern Jimzu, some 5 mi. (8 km.) N of GEZER and 15 mi. (24 km.) SSE of JOPPA.

gin. Term used by the KJV for SNARE (Job 18:9 et al.).

Ginath. gi´nath (Heb. gînat H1640, possibly “protector”). The father of TIBNI; the latter contended with OMRI for the throne of Israel after the death of ZIMRI (1 Ki. 16:21-22).

Ginnetho, Ginnethoi. See GINNETHON.

Ginnethon. gin´uh-thon (Heb. ginnētôn H1715 [in Neh. 12:4, gintôy], perhaps “gardener”). A priest who returned from BABYLON with ZERUBBABEL and JESHUA (12:4; KJV, “Ginnetho”; NRSV, “Ginnethoi”). He was among those who affixed their seals to the covenant of NEHEMIAH (10:6). In the days of JOIAKIM, the head of his family was Meshullam (12:16).

girdle. See DRESS.

Girgashite. guhr´guh-shit (Heb. gîrgāšî H1739). A Canaanite tribe descended from HAM through his son CANAAN (Gen. 10:6) and included in various lists of peoples dispossessed by the Israelites (Gen. 15:21; Deut. 7:1; Josh. 3:10; 24:11; 1 Chr. 1:14; Neh. 9:8; in Jdt. 5:16, “Gergesites”). The Bible gives no indication of the tribe’s locality. Some have suggested a connection with Karkisha, a HITTITE city in ASIA MINOR; others have identified the Girgashites with the Gergesenes (see GERASENE). These and other proposals remain unconfirmed.

girl. This English term is used in Bible versions to render primarily Hebrew na ʿārāh H5855 and Greek korasion G3166. It must be noted that among ancient peoples there was little in the way of a differentiation between the stages of infancy to old age. Such terms as boy or girl are therefore imprecise, and must be interpreted by the context in which they occur. See CHILD.

Girzite. guhr'zit (Heb. girzî H1747). A Canaanite tribe that, along with those of the Geshurites and Amalekites, was raided by DAVID while he lived in ZIKLAG (1 Sam. 27:8; see GESHUR; AMALEK). Such a tribe is otherwise unknown, and a Hebrew variant is gizrî, that is, "Gizrite" (cf. KJV, "Gezrite"), which would refer to an inhabitant of GEZER. Many scholars have thought, however, that Gezer was too far N for it to be involved in this account. Some have argued that the pair of names Geshurites and Girzites (or Gizrites) is the result either of a careless scribal repetition (dittography) or of a conflation of two different texts and that therefore the original reading was simply "Geshurites." While the solution to this problem remains uncertain, one must allow for the possibility that a people by the name of Girzites did indeed live "in the land extending to Shur and Egypt."

Gispa. gish'puh (Heb. gišpā H1778). KJV Gispa. A supervisor, along with ZIHA, of the temple servants (NETHINIM) living on the hill of OPHEL (Neh. 11:21). Some have thought that he should be identified with HASUPHA, who is elsewhere mentioned next to Ziha (Ezra 2:43; Neh. 7:46).

Gittah-hepher. git'uh-hee'fuhr. KJV alternate form of GATH HEPHER (in Josh. 19:13).

Gittaim. git'ay-im (Heb. gittayim H1786, "[two] winepresses"). A village at the NE edge of the PHILISTINE plain, usually identified with Ras Abu Humeid/Hamid, about 14 mi. (22 km.) SE of JOPPA and 3.5 mi. (6 km.) NW of GEZER, but there are other proposals. Gittaim became a refuge for the indigenous population of BEEROTH (2 Sam. 4:3). After the return from the EXILE in Babylon, Gittaim was settled by Benjamites (Neh. 11:33).

Gittite. git'it. An inhabitant of GATH.

gittith. git'ith (Heb. gittîth H1787). Often capitalized. A musical term used only in the titles of three psalms (Ps. 8; 81; 84). The meaning of the term is uncertain. It may refer to a lyre or other musical instrument distinctive to the PHILISTINE city of GATH, or to a type of melody associated with that city. Others believe it is derived directly from the Hebrew word for “winepress” (gat H1780), thus referring to a tune sung at the grape harvest or specifically at the Feast of Tabernacles. Other suggestions have been made.

Gizonite. gi’zoh-nit (Heb. gizônî H1604). A descriptive term applied to a certain Hashem, one of DAVID’s mighty men (1 Chr. 11:34; the parallel list in 2 Sam. 23:32 says “the sons of Jashen” instead of “Hashem the Gizonite”). The term is gentilic in form and thus appears to refer to an inhabitant of a town named “Gizo” or “Gizon,” but such a place is unknown; perhaps it indicates a family name.

Gizrite. See GIRZITE.

glad tidings. See GOSPEL.

glass. See MINERALS; MIRROR.

glass, sea of. See SEA OF GLASS.

glaze. This English term is used by the NIV and other modern versions in Prov. 26:23, where the Hebrew phrase meaning “silver dross” (cf. KJV) is often emended to “like glaze,” perhaps referring to a shiny metallic oxide of lead that has been used for millennia as a pigment (litharge) and as a glaze on pottery. Subsequent research, however, has challenged this emendation, and the TNIV restores the traditional rendering.

glean. This verb means “to gather the grain left behind by the reapers.” The Mosaic law allowed for gleaning by the POOR (Lev. 19:9-10; 23:22), a practice beautifully illustrated in the story of RUTH and BOAZ (Ruth 2:3, 7-8, et al.). The concept is used metaphorically by the prophets (Isa. 17:5-6; Jer. 6:9; Mic. 7:1).

glorification. See EXALTATION OF CHRIST; GLORY; RESURRECTION.

glory. Great honor or praise; used especially of God's majestic splendor. Several Hebrew words have been translated "glory," but the most frequent one is kābôd H3883, which has a broad range of meaning: "weight, burden, wealth, magnificence, honor." It can be used of human beings to indicate personal influence or substance. JOSEPH, for example, says to his brothers, "Tell my father about all the honor [kābôd] accorded me in Egypt" (Gen. 45:13; cf. 31:1). HAMAN also recounted all "the glory of his riches" (Esth. 5:11; NIV, "his vast wealth"; cf. Ps. 49:16-17; Isa. 16:14; 17:4; 61:6; 66:11).

The glory of God is the worthiness of God, more particularly, the presence of God in the fullness of his attributes in some place or everywhere. It is in this sense that ISAIAH reports the words of the SERAPHIM that "the whole earth is full of his glory" (Isa. 6:3), meaning that the Lord in his full person, deity, and majesty is present in every place. Again, when the Lord says of the TABERNACLE that it would be consecrated by his glory (Exod. 29:43), he means that without diluting or diminishing his full deity he will himself dwell in the great tent and make it holy by his presence. MOSES asked that he might see the Lord's glory (33:18), and the Lord responded that he would himself proclaim his name to him, that is, make Moses aware of all the glorious attributes and capacities that the one and only God possesses (33:19—34:8). Sometimes the Lord allowed his glory to become visible. Since the cloudy-fiery pillar was the place where he was present, there were occasions (e.g., 16:10) when there was a manifestation of his presence. Possibly the same was true in Exod. 40:34-35: either there was an awesome manifestation of the Lord's presence or an overwhelming sense that God was there so that Moses dared not come near. Later thought defined this indwelling presence of God as the SHEKINAH (or "indwelling").

Artistic motif of Jesus' transfiguration (from the Church of Transfiguration on Mt. Tabor).

In the NT, the distinctive Greek word for "glory" is doxa G1518. This noun means "opinion" or "reputation" in classical literature, a sense occasionally reflected in the NT (e.g., Jn. 12:43; cf. 5:41-43; 7:18). Almost always, however, the use of the word coincides with the meanings of Hebrew kābôd: brightness (“the glory of the Lord shone around them,” Lk. 2:9; cf. 2 Cor. 3:9); outward human splendor (“Solomon in all his glory,” Matt. 6:29; cf. 1 Cor. 11:15); national splendor (“all the kingdoms of the world and their glory,” Matt. 4:8; cf. Rev. 21:24); honor (“you are our glory and joy,” 1 Thess. 2:20). Chiefly, the word refers to the revelation of God in Christ: “the Son is the radiance of God’s glory” (Heb. 1:3). The apostle John declares: “We have seen his glory” (Jn. 1:14; cf. v. 18). It was seen in the MIRACLES (2:11) and in the TRANSFIGURATION (2 Pet. 1:16-17). He is “our glorious Lord” (Jas. 2:1). In his incarnate life, the Shekinah glory of God is seen. As for the saints, glory culminates in the changing of their bodies to the likeness of their glorified Lord (Phil. 3:20).

glossolalia. glos’uh-lay’lee-uh. See TONGUES, GIFT OF.

gluttony. The term glutton can be used to render the participle of a Hebrew verb that means “to be frivolous, profligate” (Deut. 21:20; Prov. 23:20-21). In the NT, it renders Greek phagos G5741 (Matt. 11:19; Lk. 7:34) and gastēr G1143 (lit., “belly,” Tit. 1:12). See TEMPERANCE.

gnashing the teeth. This expression is used in Hebrew poetic passages to indicate the hatred and scorn of enemies (Job 16:9; Ps. 35:16; 37:12; 112:10; Lam. 2:16). A similar usage occurs in the NT with reference to the rage of STEPHEN’s enemies (Acts 7:54). More frequently, however, the image is found repeatedly in the sayings of Jesus concerning the remorseful gnashing of teeth by those excluded from heaven (Matt. 8:12; 13:42, 50; 22:13; 24:51; 25:30; Lk. 13:28; see HELL).

Gnosticism. nos’tuh-siz’uhm. Derived from Greek gnōsis G1194, “knowledge,” this term is variously applied to certain movements within, or in relation to, early Christianity. Although some scholars use it with reference to teachings within the period when the NT was written, the word more accurately describes systems of knowledge in opposition to orthodox Christianity in the second and third centuries. It appears that some church members, embarrassed by the lowly origins of Christianity (birth in a stable, traveling teacher, death on a cross, etc.), linked aspects of traditional Christianity with attractive ideas taken from Greek philosophy and Eastern religion, magic, and astrology. We call the resulting complex systems Gnosticism.

Their main themes were as follows: The true God is pure spirit and dwells in the realm of pure light, totally separated from this dark world. This world is evil, for it is made of matter, and matter is evil. The true God will have nothing to do with it, for it was created by a lesser god and was a mistake. People in this world are normally made of body and mind, but in a few there is a spark of pure spirit. Such “spiritual” people need to be rescued from this evil world; thus there is need for a Savior. Jesus, who is pure spirit even though he appears to be body and mind, is the Savior who comes from the true God in light to bring knowledge of the spiritual realm of light. Therefore those who have the spark of spirit can receive the knowledge and be reunited with the true God.

Within the NT there are references to claims to knowledge and WISDOM (e.g., 1 Cor. 1:17-31; 8:1; 13:8) that could be the roots of the growth that led to developed Gnosticism. There was a heresy in the church of COLOSSE (Col. 2:8-23) and false teaching in the churches TIMOTHY knew (1 Tim. 1:4-7; 4:3-7; 2 Tim. 2:18; 3:5-7) that may be termed a false gnōsis (1 Tim. 6:20). Then in the epistles of John there are references to false teaching about the reality of the humanity of Jesus (1 Jn. 4:3; 2 Jn. 7). But there is certainly nothing in the NT of the developed kind of false doctrines that the teachers of the church had to face a century or so later.

goad. A sharp stick used for prodding cattle, particularly during plowing. It could have an iron tip (cf. 1 Sam. 13:21) and also could be utilized for cleaning PLOWS, probably with a blade on the other end. SHAMGAR used an oxgoad as a spear while killing 600 PHILISTINES (Jdg. 3:31). In a metaphorical sense, the words of the wise are compared to goads as they encourage and rebuke (Eccl. 12:11). The only NT use of the term concerns Christ’s rebuke to PAUL on the DAMASCUS road for kicking against the goads (Acts 26:14), which refers not to “the prickings of an uneasy conscience over his persecuting activity but [to] the new forces which were now impelling him in the opposite direction to that which he had hitherto pursued” (F. F. Bruce, The Acts of the Apostles: The Greek Text with Introduction and Commentary, 3rd ed. [1990], 501, which includes parallels to this proverb in classical literature).

Goah. goh’uh (Heb. gō ʿā [or gō ʿet] H1717, possibly from gā ʿā H1716, “to low, below”). KJV Goath. An area in or near JERUSALEM that would serve as one of the boundaries prophesied for the rebuilt city (Jer. 31:39; the Hebrew text has the locative form gō ʿātā). See GAREB (PLACE).

Gob. gob (Heb. gôb H1570, meaning uncertain). An unknown location where DAVID's men battled the PHILISTINES on two occasions (2 Sam. 21:18-19). It was possibly a town close to GATH (mentioned in vv. 20 and 22). Because the parallel passage has GEZER (1 Chr. 20:4), some scholars believe the text in Samuel is corrupt, while others think that Gezer and Gob were alternate names for the same place. In addition, many Hebrew MSS read NOB, a variant preferred by some on the basis of the personal name ISHBI-BENOB (2 Sam. 21:16). Still other scholars identify Gob with GIBBETHON.

goblet. This English term is used variously in Bible versions to render words and expressions referring to drinking vessels. It occurs only once in the KJV (Cant. 7:2) and in the NRSV (Esth. 1:7). The NIV uses it a few other times as well (e.g., Isa. 51:17, 22).

God. The Bible does not contain a formal definition of this term, yet God's being and attributes are displayed on every page537"indent">I. God is a Spirit. These words mean that God is a nonmaterial personal being, self-conscious and self-determining. The definition contains three adjectives, each modifying seven nouns. The descriptive units in which these words are combined are not logically separable but are inextricably woven together, and thus they delineate the unity and the integrated complexity of God's attributes. The analysis cannot be exhaustive but only descriptive.

II. God is infinite. The infinity of God is not an independent attribute. If we were to say, "God is the infinite," without specification, the meaning would be pantheistic, equal to saying, "God is everything." In using the word "infinite," we must always be specific, as follows:

© The Israel Museum, Jerusalem.

Within this text, written in the later Jewish script, the Tetragrammaton (YHWH, God's covenant name) occurs in paleo-Hebrew letters (first line, second word from right margin).

Infinite in his being. This doctrine is intended to teach that God is everywhere. The omnipresence of God is vividly brought out in such Scriptures as Ps. 139. God is not physically, relatively, or measurably big. The word “immensity” is used by good theologians, but it conveys to some minds a false impression, as though God were partly here and partly there, like a giant, or an amorphous mass, or a fluid. The omnipresence of God means that wherever we are, even if we are like the fugitive Jacob at Bethel (Gen. 28:16), God himself is there. It is easier to conceive of God's omnipresence by saying, “Everything everywhere is immediately in his presence.” Finite creatures can act instantaneously in a limited area. Everything within our reach or sight is immediately in our presence, in the sense that distance is no problem. So in an absolutely perfect sense, everything in the universe is immediately in the presence of God.

Infinite in his wisdom. This phrase designates God's omniscience. The Bible throughout regards God's omniscience as all-inclusive, not dependent on a step-by-step process of reasoning. God's knowledge does not increase or diminish when the temporal events of his redemptive program take place. He eternally knows what he has known in the past and what he will know in the future.

Infinite in his power. These words point to his omnipotence, his ability to do with power all that power can do, his controlling all the power that is or can be.

Infinite in his holiness, justice, and goodness. These words signify God's moral attributes. Holiness is regarded in the Bible as his central ethical character. Basic ethical principles are revealed by the will of God and derived from and based on the character of God. “Be holy because I am holy” (Lev. 11:44-45). Justice refers to his administration of rewards and punishments among the personal beings of the universe. Goodness in this context indicates his love, his common grace toward all, and his special grace in saving sinners.

Infinite in his truth. This is the attribute that designates the basis of all logic and rationality. The axioms of logic and mathematics, and all the laws of reason, are not laws apart from God to which God must be subject. They are attributes of his own character. When the Bible says that “it is impossible for God to lie” (Heb. 6:18; Tit. 1:2), it is not contradicting his omnipotence. How much power would it take to make two times two equal five? Truth is not an object of power. There is no mere tautology in the Bible, as though the multiplication tables were true by mere divine fiat. As in ethics, so in rationality, the biblical writers constantly appeal to the truth of God’s immutable character. “He cannot deny himself” (2 Tim. 2:13 KJV).

Just as the adjective “infinite,” in the definition we are considering, applies to all the specified attributes, so the words “eternal” and “unchangeable” similarly apply to all.

Eternal. This means without temporal beginning or ending, or in a figurative sense “eternal” may designate (as in the words “eternal life”) a quality of being suitable for eternity. That God existed eternally before the creation of the finite universe does not imply a personal subject with no object, for God is triune. See TRINITY. The idea that eternity means timelessness is nowhere suggested in the Bible. This false notion doubtless came into Christian theology under the influence of Aristotle’s “Unmoved Mover,” the influence of which is strong in Thomas Aquinas. That the Bible does not teach that God is timeless is an objective, verifiable fact.

Unchangeable. This term points to the perfect self-consistency of God’s character throughout all eternity. This is not a static concept, but dynamic, in all his relations with his creatures. That God brings to pass, in time, the events of his redemptive program is not contradictory. The notion that God’s immutability is static immobility (as in Thomism) is like the notion of timelessness and is contrary to the biblical view. The God of the Bible is intimately and actively concerned in all the actions of all his creatures.

III. God is known by his acts. Supremely, “God...has spoken to us by his Son” (Heb. 1:1-2). Further, his “invisible” being, that is, his “eternal power and divine character” are “known” and “clearly seen” by “what has been made” (Rom. 1:20). “The heavens declare the glory of God” (Ps. 19; Rom. 10:18). It is customary to distinguish between “natural revelation,” all that God has made, and “special revelation,” the Bible. See REVELATION.

IV. God is known in fellowship. That God is known by faith, beyond the mere cognitive sense, in fellowship with his people, is one of the most prominent themes throughout the Bible. Moses, leading his people in the exodus, was assured, “My Presence will go with you, and I will give you rest.” And Moses replied, “If your Presence does not go with us, do not send us up from here” (Exod. 33:13-14). The Bible abounds in invitations to seek and find fellowship with God (e.g., Ps. 27; Isa. 55).

Other gods are referred to in the Bible as false gods (Jdg. 6:31; 1 Ki. 18:27; 1 Cor. 8:4-6) or as demonic (1 Cor. 10:19-22).

Godhead. A synonym of godhood or divinity, this English term is used to designate the state, dignity, condition, or quality of a deity, and in Christian theology, of the self-revealed God. The word occurs in the KJV as the rendering of two related Greek words: theion G2521 and theiotēs G2522 (Rom. 1:20; Col. 2:9; NIV, “divine being” and “Deity”). The first word, with the definite article, was in general Greek use for “the divine,” which pagan religions saw in almost everything, and PAUL employed it in addressing a heathen audience, but in a context that urges personal faith in the living God (Acts 17:29; NIV, “divine being”). The second word was also used by non-Christians with reference, for example, to ARTEMIS; Paul uses it in association with the Creator’s power upon which all creatures are dependent (Rom. 1:20; NIV, “divine being”), but also applies it to the incarnate CHRIST (Col. 2:9; NIV, “Deity”).

godless. This term, referring to someone who does not acknowledge God, is most often used in the sense “wicked” or “impious.” Neither it nor its cognate noun godlessness occurs in the KJV (which prefers ungodly and ungodliness), but the term is sometimes used in modern versions to render various Hebrew and Greek words (e.g., Job 8:13; Isa. 10:6; Rom. 1:18; Heb. 12:16). See GODLINESS; HOLINESS; RIGHTEOUSNESS.

godliness. Piety toward God, including the proper conduct that springs from a right relationship with him. It is not belief in itself, but the devotion toward God and love to others that result from that belief. Religious FAITH is empty without godliness (2 Tim. 3:5). The Greek term eusebeia G2354 (“reverence, piety, religion”) is found fifteen times in the NT, mostly in the PASTORAL LETTERS (also Acts 3:12; 1 Pet. 1:3, 6-7; 3:11). It is the sum total of religious character and actions, and it produces both a present and a future state of happiness. It is not right action that is done from a sense of duty, but is the spontaneous virtue that comes from the indwelling Christ and reflects him.

Gog. gog (Heb. gôg H1573, perhaps related to Akk. gāgu, “costly pottery”). (1) Son (or descendant) of Shemaiah, from the tribe of REUBEN (1 Chr. 5:4). The names in this list may be included among the herdsmen who settled in the desert E of GILEAD (vv. 8-9).

(2) In an important prophecy, EZEKIEL speaks of “Gog, of the land of Magog, the chief prince of Meshech and Tubal” (Ezek. 38:2; see also vv. 3-23 and 39:1-16). He is viewed as the demonic and sinister leader of ungodly peoples far distant from Israel, whom he leads in a final assault against the people of God. Gog is ignominiously defeated by the intervention of Yahweh upon the mountains of Canaan. The conflict is alluded to in the NT (Rev. 20:7-9). The origin and identification of the name Gog is uncertain, though many scholars identify him as Gyges, king of Lydia (the Assyrian Gugu, c. 660 B.C.). See LYDIA (PLACE). MAGOG (possibly meaning “the land of Gog”) was no doubt located in ASIA MINOR and may refer to Lydia. With Gog are associated many peoples: not only MESHECH and TUBAL, of whom he is prince, but also Persia, Cush, Put, Gomer, Sheba, Dedan, and Tarshish—all of whom come from widely separated parts of the earth as a mighty host, like a cloud, to do battle against Israel under the mighty Gog. But God’s judgment comes upon the enemies of Israel. Every kind of terror is summoned by Yahweh against Gog, whose defeat is so great that his vast armaments serve as fuel for Israel for seven years, and whose dead are so numerous that it takes all Israel seven months to bury them. Gog appears again in Rev. 20:7-9, where SATAN is depicted after the MILLENNIUM as gathering the godless nations of the whole earth—symbolically represented by Gog and Magog—against the saints and the beloved city, but they are destroyed and cast into the lake of fire.

Goiim, Goyim. goi'im (Heb. gôyim H1582, “nations”). (1) A territory ruled by a king named TIDAL, who joined KEDORLAOMER and other rulers in waging war against the CITIES OF THE PLAIN (Gen. 14:1, 9; NIV and most versions, “Goiim”; TNIV, “Goyim”; KJV, “Tidal king of nations”). The location of Goiim is debated. If Tidal is the HITTITE name Tudhalia (Tudkhaliyas), then the identification of Goiim with a region in SYRIA would fit the biblical references.

(2) A city in “Gilgal” whose king is included in the list of rulers defeated by JOSHUA (Josh. 12:23; NIV, “Goyim in Gilgal”; the NRSV, “Goiim in Galilee” [following LXX]; KJV, “of the nations of Gilgal”). See discussion under GILGAL #2.

Prehistoric “circles” located on the Golan Heights.

Golan. gohˈluhn (Heb. gôlān H1584, possibly “enclosure”). A city in BASHAN assigned to the tribe of MANASSEH. Chosen by MOSES as one of three CITIES OF REFUGE E of the JORDAN, it was allotted to the descendants of GERSHON as a Levitical city (Deut. 4:43; Josh. 20:8; 21:27; 1 Chr. 6:71). The name Golan/Gaulan later became attached to the adjoining country. Most probably the territory corresponds to modern Jaulan (Golan Heights), an area bounded by Mount HERMON on the NE, the Jordan and the Sea of Galilee on the W, and the Yarmuk River on the S. The ancient city of Golan is usually identified with modern Sahm el-Jolan, some 18 mi. (29 km.) E of the Sea of Galilee, on the E bank of the river el-ʾAllan.

Golgotha. gol'guh-thuh (Gk. Golgotha G1201, from Aram. gulgultā 𐤒, “skull”). The ARAMAIC name of the “Place of the Skull,” an area near JERUSALEM where CHRIST was crucified. This name appears but three times in the Bible, in parallel passages of the Gospels (Matt. 27:33; Mk. 15:22; Jn. 19:17). Luke, as usual, does not use the Semitic word but only its corresponding Greek term, kranion G3191, “skull” (Lk. 23:33), which the Vulgate in turn translates with Latin calvaria, thus KJV, “Calvary.” The author of Hebrews indicates that Jesus suffered “outside the city gate” (Heb. 13:12). Therefore, Golgotha “was near the city” (Jn. 19:20), but not within the city wall in NT times. Although many places around the holy city have been suggested as the site of Calvary, only two are serious contenders for the spot of both the crucifixion and the burial. One primary claim to the site is the Church of the Holy Sepulchre, whose history goes back to the fourth century. It is within the walls of the old city today, but its supporters maintain that the NT city wall would place it outside the city. The other major contender for the site of Calvary is known today as the Garden Tomb and/or Gordon’s Calvary. It is a hill or knoll and is certainly outside the city walls (both modern and NT). A garden and a tomb (in fact, several tombs) are in the immediate vicinity. The topographical feature of the hill that makes it look like a skull would not have been present in NT times. Since the Church of the Holy Sepulchre is a highly decorated building on top of a site, and the scene of much activity, a good imagination is required to see a garden tomb there, but it does have a stronger historical claim.

Goliath. guh-li’uhth (Heb. golyāt H1669, meaning unknown). A warrior from GATH during the reign of SAUL (late 11th cent. B.C.). Representing the PHILISTINES in the Valley of Elah (about 15 mi./24 km. W of BETHLEHEM; see ELAH, VALLEY OF), he challenged the Israelites to send an opponent. His challenge went unaccepted until DAVID visited the battleground to bring food to his brothers. David felled the giant with a stone shot from a sling and cut off his head with Goliath’s own sword (1 Sam. 17). The height of Goliath was six cubits and a span (17:4), over 9 ft. (almost 3 m.). His coat of mail was 5,000 shekels, about 125 lbs. (57 kg.); his spearhead, 600 shekels, about 15 lbs. (7 kg.; 17:5, 7). His sword was kept at NOB under priestly jurisdiction and later given to David by AHIMELECH, the priest, when David fled from SAUL (21:9; 22:10). (The Goliath of 2 Sam. 21:19 may have been the son of the giant whom David killed. See discussion under ELHANAN.)

Gomer. goh'muhr (Heb. gōmer H1699 [H1700 in Hos. 1:3], perhaps “completion”). (1) First son of JAPHETH and grandson of NOAH; father of Ashkenaz, Riphath, and Togarmah (Gen. 10:2-3; 1 Chr. 1:5-6). Gomer is mentioned in Ezek. 38:6 as supporting an attack on Israel that will fail because the Lord is defending his people. The reference is probably to Gomer's offspring, the Cimmerians (Akk. Gimirrai, Gk. Kimmerioi), who were forced out of S Russia by the SCYTHIANS and settled in ASIA MINOR at the end of the eighth century B.C.

(2) Daughter of Diblaim and wife of HOSEA, the eighth-century prophet in Israel during the reign of JEROBOAM II (Hos. 1:3-8). The Lord asked Hosea to take to himself “an adulterous wife” (v. 2; NRSV, “a wife of whoredom”), so he married Gomer and by her had children to whom were given illustrative, or symbolic, names. This marriage pictured the Lord's relationship with his people, who had gone astray into IDOLATRY. Hosea is later told to marry “an adulteress” (3:1); some believe that this too is a reference to Gomer after she had left Hosea, being bought again and asked to abstain from harlotry. Whether or not this is Gomer, it illustrates that though God's people sin, he loves them and wants them to return to him, but to refrain from sin. Some argue that these are not actual marriages but simply illustrations.

Gomorrah. guh-mor'uh (Heb. ʿāmōrâ H6686, perhaps “flooded place”; Gk. Gomorra G1202). A city located in the Valley of SIDDIM, probably at the S end of the DEAD SEA. Together with SODOM, it became infamous because of the circumstances of its destruction. Sodom and Gomorrah became bywords for the judgment of God (cf. Isa. 1:9-10; 13:19; Jer. 23:14; 49:18; 50:40; Amos 4:11; Zeph. 2:9). In the NT there are allusions to these ancient examples of God's retributive wrath (Matt. 10:15; Rom. 9:29; 2 Pet. 2:6; Jude 7). Gomorrah is first mentioned as the S or E extent of the Canaanite territory (Gen. 10:19). The book of Genesis also records the meeting of ABRAHAM with the angels and their warning to LOT of the imminent destruction of Sodom and Gomorrah (Gen. 18-19). Lot escaped and “the LORD rained down burning sulfur on Sodom and Gomorrah” (19:24). The location of Gomorrah is unknown. Some have argued that it was at the N end of the DEAD SEA, but the more widely accepted view is that Gomorrah and the other cities are sunken beneath the shallow waters of the Dead Sea, S of the Lisan peninsula.

gong. The expression “resounding gong” is used by PAUL to illustrate the futility of the gift of glossolalia if unaccompanied by LOVE (1 Cor. 13:1). See also good. This adjective, which occurs hundreds of times in the Bible, is usually the rendering of Hebrew tôb H3202 (e.g., Gen. 1:2) and Greek agathos G19 (e.g., Matt. 7:11) or kalos G2819 (e.g., Matt. 3:10). The terms have a wide variety of related meanings that often shade off into one another, such as “kind, gracious” (of people, 1 Sam. 25:15; of God, Ps. 86:5); “befitting, appropriate” (2 Sam. 17:7; 1 Cor. 5:6); “highly esteemed” (of a name, Eccl. 7:1); “agreeable, pleasant” (of fruit, Gen. 3:6; of a word, Prov. 15:23); “upright, righteous” (1 Sam. 12:23; Matt. 5:45).

In the Bible, God himself is the Good: he is the source of all goodness, and thus there is no good apart from him. “No one is good—except God alone” (Mk. 10:18). It follows that we cannot know the good unless we know God in a right relationship and do his expressed will. Since goodness is intrinsic to God, all that he does is necessarily good. He declared his own CREATION good (Gen. 1). The disorder, disruption, evil, and SIN that now prevail throughout his world are the result of the rebellion of moral beings originally created good. God’s REVELATION of himself in history was an increasing revelation of his goodness. He made man and woman in his image for fellowship with himself. Even when they flouted him in the FALL, God’s loving interest in them continued; he showed his goodness by immediately taking steps to undo the disastrous effects of the fall. His election of Israel as his people, the exodus, the giving of the law, his many deliverances of Israel, the promise and preparation for the coming of the Messiah—all these were evidences of God’s goodness; as were the incarnation, the atoning death of his Son, the resurrection, Pentecost. Some day his goodness will be acknowledged by all of his creation; and he will be all in all. Because of the fall, we are by nature corrupt and capable of doing nothing that is really good (Rom. 7), but because of God’s provision in Christ and the Holy Spirit, we can live a life of obedience to and fellowship with our creator.

goodman. This term is used by the KJV once in the OT (Prov. 7:19), and several times in the Gospels in the phrase “goodman of the house,” to render Greek oikodespotēs G3867, “master of the house, householder, landowner” (Matt. 20:11 et al.). See HOUSEHOLDER.

This region was probably between the NEGEV and the hill country, and it may have received its name from the town of Goshen; see #1 above.

(3) A region in EGYPT where JACOB and his family settled (Gen. 45:10 et al.). Goshen is closely linked, and apparently to be identified, with the land and city of RAMESES (Raamses), on the eastern side of the NILE delta (47:11). At the time of the EXODUS, the Hebrews were still in Goshen (Exod. 8:22; 9:26), and they began their travel from Rameses (Exod. 12:37; Num. 33:3), which city they had helped to build (Exod. 1:11). As the Hebrews also had to work at PITHOM (Exod. 1:11), Goshen should preferably be within reasonable reach of that city. Furthermore, Goshen lay on a route from Palestine into Egypt, and near the residence of JOSEPH's pharaoh (cf. data in Gen. 45:10; 46:28, 29; 47:1-6). The region was a good place for keeping cattle (46:34; 47:6) and had room for settlers. Goshen can readily be placed in the territory between Saft el-Henneh in the S (at the W end of Wadi Tumilat) and Qantir in the N and NE.

gospel. The Christian message, or good news, of REDEMPTION proclaimed by CHRIST and his apostles. The English term gospel (from Old Eng. gōd, “good,” and spell, “tale, talk”) renders Greek euangelion G2295 (from eu G2292, “well,” and angellō G33, “to announce”). This Greek word is used a dozen times in Matthew and Mark (where modern versions usually render it “good news,” e.g., Matt. 4:23), a few times in other books (Acts 15:7; 20:24; 1 Pet. 4:17; Rev. 14:6), and most frequently in the Pauline letters (almost sixty times, e.g., Rom. 1:1).

Through the gospel, the HOLY SPIRIT works for the SALVATION of human beings (Rom. 1:15-16). In the NT the word never means a book (one of the four GOSPELS); instead, it always refers to the good tidings that Christ and the apostles announced. It is called “the gospel of God” (Rom. 1:1; 1 Thess. 2:2, 9); “the gospel about Jesus Christ” (Mk. 1:1; Rom. 15:19); “the gospel of God’s grace” (Acts 20:24); “the gospel of peace” (Eph. 6:15); “the gospel of your salvation” (1:13); and “the gospel of the glory of Christ” (2 Cor. 4:4). The gospel has to do entirely with Christ. It was preached by him (Matt. 4:23; 11:5), by the apostles (Acts 16:10; Rom. 1:15), and by the evangelists (Acts 8:25). Not until the second century was the word applied to the writings concerning the message of Christ.

Gospels. The first four books of the NT, which relate the life, teachings, death, and resurrection of CHRIST. Originally, the term GOSPEL had reference to the message of salvation through Christ, and only later was the term used to designate written documents. The impact of Jesus’ life compelled his disciples to present his message to the public. By repeating the significant features of his ministry and his accompanying precepts, following the general order of his biography, they formulated a body of teaching that may have varied in detail with each recital, but that maintained the same general content.

The existence of this standardized message is confirmed by the NT itself. PAUL, in the letter to the GALATIANS, mentions an early visit to JERUSALEM and says: “I went in response to a revelation and set before them the gospel that I preach among the Gentiles” (Gal. 2:2). In 1 Cor. 15:1-5 he defines that gospel clearly. A similar presentation is afforded by the report of PETER’s address in the house of CORNELIUS, the Gentile centurion. After sketching the baptism, life, death, and resurrection of Jesus, Peter concluded: “[God] commanded us to preach to the people and to testify that he is the one whom God appointed as judge of the living and the dead. All the prophets testify about him that everyone who believes in him receives forgiveness of sins through his name” (Acts 10:42-43).

From such samples of apostolic preaching one may conclude that the facts of Jesus’ life constituted the gospel, which was interpreted and applied to suit the occasion on which it was preached. This gospel, which was initially proclaimed in oral form, has been transmitted through the writings called the “Gospels.” Although Matthew, Mark, Luke, and John differ considerably in detail, they agree on the general outline of Jesus' career, on the supernatural character of his life, and on the high quality of his moral precepts. From the earliest period of the church they have been accepted as authoritative accounts of his life and teachings.

I. Character of the Gospels. Reduced to writing, the gospel message constitutes a new type of literature. Although it is framed in history, it is not pure history, for the allusions to contemporary events are incidental, and the Gospels do not attempt to develop them. They contain biographical material, but they cannot be called biography in the modern sense of the word, since they do not present a complete summary of the life of Jesus. The Gospels are not sufficiently didactic to be called opinions of their writers. The chief purpose of the Gospels is to create faith in Christ on the part of their readers, who may or may not be believers. Nothing exactly like them can be found either in the OT, to which their writers referred frequently, or in the Greek and Roman literature contemporary with them.

Aerial view looking NE at Wadi Qilt along the road to Jericho, where the parable of the Good Samaritan is set. Only the Gospel of Luke reports this story from Jesus' teaching.

Of the numerous accounts and fragments that were composed to perpetuate the ministry and teaching of Jesus, only four are accorded a place in the NT: Matthew, written by Jesus' disciple Matthew Levi, the tax-gatherer; Mark, from the pen of John Mark, an inhabitant of Jerusalem and a companion of Barnabas and Paul; Luke, the first half of a history of Christianity in two volumes (Luke and Acts) by an associate of Paul; and John, a collection of select memoirs by John, the son of Zebedee. Although the traditional authorship of all four canonical Gospels has been disputed, there are strong arguments in their favor, even if, for one or two of them, the Evangelist's relation to the finished work may have been indirect rather than direct. Other Gospels, such as The Gospel of Peter or The Gospel of Thomas, are later productions of the second and third centuries and usually represent the peculiar theological prejudices of some minor sect.

II. Origin of the Gospels. The existence of the oral gospel is attested by Papias, bishop of Hierapolis in Phrygia, one of the earliest of the church fathers (c. A.D. 80-140). A quotation from the preface to his Interpretation of our Lord's Declarations, preserved in a historical work by Eusebius, indicates that he still depended on the transmission of the gospel content by the living voice. "But if I met with any one who had been a follower of the elders anywhere, I made it a point to inquire what were the declarations of the elders...for I do not think that I derived so much benefit from books as from the living voice of those that were still surviving" (quoted in Eusebius, Ecclesiastical History 3.39). In the time of Papias, not more than two or three of the original band of Jesus' disciples would still be living, and he would be compelled to obtain his information from those who had heard the apostles. Nevertheless, he preferred the oral testimony to written record. Irrespective of the value of Papias's judgment, his words indicate that the contents of the apostolic preaching were still being transmitted by word of mouth two generations after the crucifixion, simultaneously with the use of whatever written records existed.

A clue to the transition from oral preaching to written record is provided by explanatory statements in the Gospels of Luke and John. In the introduction to his work, Luke asserts that he was undertaking to confirm in writing what his friend THEOPHILUS had already learned by word of mouth (Lk. 1:1-4). He spoke of facts that were taken for granted among believers and indicated that there had already been numerous attempts to arrange them in orderly narratives. Since his use of the word narrative implies an extended account, there must have been a number of "gospels" in circulation that he considered to be either inaccessible or else unsatisfactory. If his use of language permits deductions by contrast, these rival gospels were the opposite of his own. They were partial in content, drawn from secondary sources, and perhaps were not organized by any consecutive line of thought. They may have been random collections of sayings or events that had no central theme, or they may not have contained enough biographical material to afford an adequate understanding of Jesus' life.

Luke affirms on the contrary that he had derived his facts from those who "from the first were eyewitnesses and servants of the word" (Lk. 1:2). Not only had his informants shared in the events of which they spoke, but also they had been so affected that they became propagandists of the new faith. Luke had been a contemporary of these witnesses and had investigated personally the truth of their claims, so that he might produce an orderly and accurate record of the work of Christ.

John also committed his Gospel to writing so that he might influence others to faith in Christ as the Son of God (Jn. 20:30-31). He did not profess to give an exhaustive account of Jesus' activities, but took for granted that many of them would be familiar to his readers. The selective process that he used was determined by his evangelistic purpose and theological viewpoint.

Although Matthew and Mark are less explicit concerning their origins, the same general principles apply. The introduction of Matthew, "A record of the genealogy of Jesus Christ the son of David, the son of Abraham" (Matt. 1:1), duplicates the phraseology of Genesis (Gen. 5:1) to convey the impression that, like that OT book, it is giving a significant chapter in the history of God's dealing with the human race. Mark's terse opening line, "The beginning of the gospel about Jesus Christ, the Son of God" (Mk. 1:1), is a title, labeling the following text as a summary of current preaching. Neither of these two offers any reason for its publication, but one may deduce fairly that all of the Gospels began in an attempt to preserve for posterity what had hitherto existed in the minds of the primitive witnesses and in their public addresses.

There has been some question whether the Gospels were first published in ARAMAIC (the language of Palestine, where the church began) or in GREEK. Eusebius quoted Papias's statement that Matthew composed his history in the Hebrew dialect and everyone translated it as he was able (Eccl. Hist. 3.39). Without the original context, these words are ambiguous. Papias does not make clear whether by "Hebrew" he meant the speech of the OT, or whether he really meant Aramaic. He does not specify whether Matthew's contribution was simply collected notes of Matthew from which others composed a gospel, or whether Matthew had already formed an organized narrative that was translated. He does imply that before the Gentile expansion had made the literature of the church Greek, there was a body of material written in Hebrew or Aramaic. Papias's statement has aroused a great deal of controversy, and some have argued that one or more of the Gospels were originally written in Aramaic. It is more likely that the Gospels originated in the evangelistic preaching to the Gentile world, and that they were written in Greek, though they contained an Aramaic background.

III. Composition of the Gospels. The personal reminiscences of the apostolic band, plus the fixed content of their preaching, constituted the materials from which the Gospels were constructed; and the purpose of the individual writers provided the method of organization. Both Luke (Lk. 1:1-4) and John (Jn. 20:30-31) pledge accuracy of historical fact before they proceed with interpretation, and the same may safely be assumed of Matthew and Mark. All the Gospels were composed for use in the growing movement of the church; they were not written solely for literary effect. Matthew obviously wished to identify Jesus with the MESSIAH of the OT by pointing out that he was the fulfillment of prophecy and that he was intimately related to the manifestation of the KINGDOM OF GOD. Mark, by his terse descriptive paragraphs, depicted the Son of God in action among men. Luke used a smoother literary style and a larger stock of parables to interest a cultured and perhaps humanistic audience. John selected episodes and discourses that others had not used in order to promote belief in Jesus as the Son of God.

IV. Publication of the Gospels. Where and when these documents were first given to the public is uncertain. The earliest quotations from the gospel material appear in the APOSTOLIC FATHERS (the letters of Ignatius, the Epistle of Barnabas, the Teaching of the Twelve Apostles, and the Epistle of Polycarp). All of these quotations or allusions bear a stronger resemblance to the text of Matthew than to that of any other gospel. If, as Papias said, Matthew was first written for the Hebrew or Aramaic church in Jerusalem, it may have been the basis for a Greek edition issued from Antioch during the development of the Gentile church in that city. It would, therefore, have been put into circulation some time after A.D. 50 and before the destruction of Jerusalem in 70.

Clement of Alexandria (c. A.D. 200) described the writing of the Gospel of Mark: "When Peter had proclaimed the word publicly at Rome, and declared the gospel under the influence of the Spirit; as there was a great number present, they requested Mark, who had followed him from afar, and remembered well what he had said, to reduce these things to writing, and that after composing the Gospel he gave it to those who requested it of him. Which, when Peter understood, he directly neither hindered nor encouraged it" (Eusebius, Eccl. Hist. 6.14). Irenaeus, Clement's contemporary, confirmed this tradition, adding that Mark handed down Peter's preaching in writing after his death. If Mark's Gospel represents the memoirs of Peter, it is possible that its content did not become fixed in literary form until A.D. 65 or later.

The Gospel of Luke may have been a private document, sent first of all to Luke's friend and patron, Theophilus. The adjective "most excellent" (Lk. 1:3) implies that he probably belonged to the equestrian order (perhaps holding some official position; see EXCELLENT, MOST) and that the dual work Luke-Acts was calculated to remove any lingering doubts that he may have entertained concerning the historical and spiritual verities of the Christian faith. Luke can hardly have been written later than the year 62, since it must have preceded Acts, which was written about the end of Paul's first imprisonment.

The last chapter of John's Gospel tries to correct a rumor that he would never die. The rumor, begun by a misunderstanding of Jesus' remark to Peter about John, would have been strengthened by the fact that John had attained an advanced age at the time when the concluding chapter was written. It is possible that it can be dated before A.D. 50, but most conservative scholars place it about 85. Traditionally it has been ascribed to the apostle John, who ministered at EPHESUS in the closing years of the first century.

V. The Synoptic Problem. The three Gospels of Matthew, Mark, and Luke are called synoptic, from a Greek word meaning “to see the whole together, to take a comprehensive view.” They present similar views of the career and teaching of Christ and resemble each other closely in content and in phraseology.

The numerous agreements between these Gospels have raised the question whether the relationship between them can be traced to common literary sources. Almost the entire content of the Gospel of Mark can be found in both Matthew and Luke, while much material not found in Mark is common to the two other Gospels. On the other hand, each Gospel has a different emphasis and organization. The “Synoptic Problem,” as it is called, may be stated as follows: If the three Gospels are absolutely independent of each other, how can one account for the minute verbal agreements in their text? On the other hand, if they are copied from each other, how does one explain the differences? A further question arises concerning their authority: are they, then, truly writings inspired by God, or are they merely combinations of anecdotes that may or may not be true?

Numerous theories have been propounded to account for these phenomena. The most popular has been the documentary theory, which assumes that Matthew and Luke were composed independently of each other by combining the Gospel of Mark with a hypothetical document called “Q” (from the German Quelle, meaning “source”), containing chiefly sayings of Jesus. Some scholars have argued for the addition of two other hypothetical sources, M for Matthew, L for Luke, embodying the private knowledge or research of the two writers.

While this hypothesis seemingly solves the problem of the verbal resemblances, it is not entirely satisfactory. The existence of “Q” is at best only a probability; no copy of it has ever been found. It has been pointed out that extant collections of the “Sayings of Jesus” dating from the second and third centuries should probably be assigned to the Gnostics, who in turn were dependent either on oral tradition or on the canonical Gospels for their text. These documents, which have been considered analogous to “Q,” and therefore as justifying the hypothesis of its existence, are themselves secondary. It is more likely that the common didactic passages of Matthew and Luke are drawn from utterances that Jesus repeated until they became fixed in the minds of his disciples and were reproduced later in the Gospels.

The discipline called “form criticism” has advanced another alternative. In an attempt to ascertain the development of “the gospel before the Gospels,” it has suggested that they were composed out of individual reminiscences of Jesus’ deeds and bits of his teaching that were first preserved and circulated by his followers. Through repetition and selection these accounts took permanent shape and were incorporated into a general sequence that constituted the gospel narratives. Advocates of form criticism have separated the unitary sections of the Gospels into various classes: the passion story of Jesus' last days; the paradigms, accounts of Jesus' deeds that illustrate the message; tales of miraculous occurrences told to interest the public; morally edifying legends of saintly persons; sayings of Jesus that preserve his collected teachings in speeches or in parables.

This modification or oral tradition injects a greater uncertainty into the process of literary history. If the Synoptic Gospels are merely different arrangements of independent blocks of text, the problem of origins is multiplied. While sections of the Gospels may have been used for illustrative purposes, and while certain parts of them, like the SERMON ON THE MOUNT, might have once been a separate collection of sayings (or deeds, as the case may be), the fact that they were composed in the first century by trustworthy disciples of Jesus precludes fraud or unreliability.

Form criticism is one branch of the wider discipline of "tradition criticism" that, when applied to the Gospels, has its counterpart in "redaction criticism." Tradition criticism focuses attention on the gospel material that each evangelist received, whether it came to him orally or to some degree in written form; redaction criticism is concerned with the way in which each evangelist handled the material he received. Redaction criticism reminds us that the writers of the Gospels were no mere scissors-and-paste compilers, that each of them was an author in his own right, with his own interpretation and purpose.

Perhaps the best solution of the Synoptic Problem is to recognize that all three Gospels are dealing with the life of the same Person, whose deeds and utterances were being continually preached as a public message. Constant repetition and frequent contact between the preachers tended toward fixing the content of the message. From the Day of Pentecost, the "apostle's teaching" possessed some definite form, for it was used in instructing inquirers (Acts 2:42). As the church expanded, the written accounts were created to meet the demand for instruction, and they reproduced the phraseology and content of the oral teaching. Each gospel, however, was shaped to its own purpose and audience, so that the variations in wording reflected the differences of interest and environment. Matthew was written for Christians with a Jewish background; Mark, for active Gentiles, probably Romans; Luke, for a cultured and literary Greek. All three, however, bear united witness to the supernatural character and saving purpose of Jesus Christ.

VI. The problem of John's Gospel. The fourth gospel differs markedly in character and in content from the synoptics. Excluding the feeding of the five thousand and the passion narrative, there are few points of agreement with the others. So radical are the differences that the veracity of John has been challenged on the grounds that if it is historical, it should coincide more nearly with the Synoptics.

For this reason some have held that the fourth gospel was written in the second century as the church's reflection on the person of Christ, phrased in terms of the Greek LOGOS doctrine. The discovery of the Rylands Fragment—a small scrap of papyrus on which a few verses of John were written—demonstrated that by the beginning of the second century the Gospel of John was circulated as far as southern Egypt. Since the handwriting of the fragment can be dated about A.D. 130, the Gospel must have been written earlier. It could not have been a late product of church tradition.

The language of John does not necessitate a Hellenistic origin. The existence of the concepts of light and of darkness, truth and falsehood, living waters, and others in the Dead Sea Scrolls show that John need not have drawn his vocabulary from Hellenism, but that many of his terms were a part of contemporary Judaism. The Gospel of John is the account of an eyewitness writing in his later years and interpreting the person of Christ in the perspective of his Christian experience.

VII. Canonicity. The Gospels were among the first writings to be quoted as sacred and authoritative. Individual passages are quoted or alluded to in Ignatius of Antioch (c. A.D. 116), the Epistle of Barnabas, and the Shepherd of Hermas, which were written in the early part of the second century. Justin Martyr (c. 140) mentions the Gospels explicitly, calling them “Memoirs of the Apostles” (First Apology 66). Marcion of Sinope (c. 140) included a mutilated edition of the Gospel of Luke in the canon of Scripture that he promulgated at Rome; he may have known the other Gospels but rejected them because of the presence of what he regarded as Jewish corruptions. Tatian (c. 170), an Assyrian who was converted in Rome under the ministry of Justin and later became an Encratite, produced the first harmony of the Gospels, called the Diatessaron. It included only the familiar four, weaving their text together into one continuous narrative. Only a few traces of the Diatessaron are still available in translations or in commentaries, but the existence of this work proves that Matthew, Mark, Luke, and John were already the chief sources of information concerning the life and works of Jesus in the first half of the second century.

Growing intercommunication between the churches and the need for strengthening their defenses against heresy and the attacks of pagan critics promoted the interest of the churches in a canon of the Gospels. By 170 the four Gospels were securely established as the sole authorities. According to Irenaeus's contention, “It is not possible that the Gospels can be either more or fewer in number than they are. For since there are four zones of the world in which we live and four principal winds...it is fitting that she [the church] should have four pillars, breathing out immortality on every side” (Against Heresies 3.11.8). Irenaeus's argument may not be cogent, but the fact that he acknowledged only four indicates the sentiment of his times. The Muratorian Canon, a fragmentary manuscript of the seventh or eighth century containing a list of accepted books earlier than 200, included in its original form the four Gospels; they were used by Tertullian of Carthage (c. 200), Clement of Alexandria (c. 200), Origen of Alexandria (c. 250), and Cyprian of Carthage (c. 250); and they appear in the manuscript texts of the Chester Beatty Papyri and of the Old Latin version, both in existence before 300. Eusebius (c. 350) and the fathers following him excluded all other Gospels from their official list, leaving these four the undisputed, supreme authorities for knowledge of the life and work of Jesus Christ. government. The control and administration of public policy. Human sovereignty as it is exercised in the state has its source in divine sovereignty. See SOVEREIGNTY OF GOD. The starting point is the doctrine of CREATION. All that exists owes its beginning to God's creative act and to his sustaining power. Since all is dependent upon him, so everything is subject to him, whether the solar system, the world of nature, or human society. God's sovereign authority over human beings is expressed in LAW. The law of God, declared to human beings in their fallen condition, is his gracious corrective to SIN.

The ancient nation of Israel was unique in that it was organized as a THEOCRACY. Although the precise form of government varied during the nation's history, the underlying conviction was always there in the OT that the Lord is the true ruler of his people. Whoever exercised rule over the nation, the ultimate authority belonged to God. Within the CHURCH, Christ's kingship is the dominant truth. The government that is exercised by the spiritual leaders within the redeemed community is really the mediation of the royal government of Christ. To a greater degree than in Israel, the ideal of creation is realized. However, because the church is comprised of people who, although justified, are still sinful, the final realization is yet future, and the Christian still prays, "Thy kingdom come."

For most believers in NT times, the state was the Roman empire, paganistic and powerful. But it was established by divine decree. So Christ accepted the authority of CAESAR as the legal authority in civil affairs (Matt. 22:15-22), even though Caesar controlled Palestine by force of arms. PETER counseled the same attitude. Christians were to honor the emperor (1 Pet. 2:17). PAUL, in an emphatic statement (Rom. 13), insisted that all human authority is derived from God. The obvious corollary to the divinely given authority of the state is the obligation to submit to the laws of the land. Obedience to duly constituted civil authority is written into the canons of Christian conduct. To honor the emperor did not mean for Peter simply to pay lip service to the dignity of his office. It meant a readiness to obey the laws that the emperor promulgated, and to submit if need be to the penalties imposed on disobedience. The issue of disobedience for the sake of conscience will be discussed later.

God's purpose in thus ordaining the power of government is a gracious one. It is to restrain evil and punish wrongdoers. Thus the demands of the law for honesty and preservation of life reflect the demands of God. The same applies to the payment of TAX, an echo of Jesus' teaching about Caesar's rights. Since the state is divinely ordained and since obviously it requires money to carry out its divinely appointed function, the citizen must pay taxes to furnish the necessary resources. The Christian, says Paul, will pay taxes for conscience' sake.

There are, however, limits to the obedience that the state may demand. It is one thing when the state imposes repressive measures that may be very hard to accept, or even when the state acts unjustly. In such cases submission is due. It is a very different matter when the demands of the state conflict with the law of God. Where there is a conflict of loyalties the higher one must take precedence, "We must obey God rather than men!" (Acts 5:29). Although the Lord was quite insistent that one must render to Caesar the things that are Caesar's, he added an important and qualifying requirement, "and to God what is God's" (Lk. 20:25).

government, church. See CHURCH; DEACON; ELDER.

governor. An official appointed to exercise control and administer a province or territory. The English term is used in Bible versions to render a variety of Hebrew terms (1 Ki. 10:15 et al.). In the NT, "governor" usually is the rendering of Greek hēgemōn G2450, "leader, chief" (e.g., Matt. 10:18). During the Roman period, the various territories were constituted in different ways, and their governors were of different ranks. The rulers of senatorial PROVINCES, which were kept under control without difficulty, were appointed by the senate and given the title PROCONSUL, their term usually running for one year. Governors of imperial provinces, which were apt to cause trouble for Rome, were appointed by the emperor personally for an indefinite term of office and were called legates. The governor of a subdivision of an imperial province was also appointed by the emperor and given the title PREFECT (before the reign of CLAUDIUS, apparently) or PROCURATOR.

Gozan. goh'zan (Heb. gôzān H1579, from Akk. Guzana). City and region of the upper valley of the Khabur River (biblical HABOR, a tributary of the EUPHRATES). The capital, modern Tell Halaf, lies on the river where it crosses the border between Syria and Turkey, some 200 mi. (320 km.) E of the NE tip of the MEDITERRANEAN Sea. The region was conquered by the Assyrians (2 Ki. 19:12; Isa. 37:12), and later TIGLATH-PILESER III, king of ASSYRIA, transported Israelites from TRANSJORDAN to Gozan (1 Chr. 5:26). It is also one of the areas to which Israelites were deported after SAMARIA fell to Assyria in 722 B.C. (2 Ki. 17:6; 18:11). Excavations at Tell Halaf have uncovered an ancient culture; the relics of its pottery are thought to date back to as far as 4000 B.C.

grace. A term used by the biblical writers with a considerable variety of meaning: (1) that which affords joy, pleasure, delight, charm, sweetness, loveliness; (2) good will, loving-kindness, mercy, etc.; (3) the kindness of a master toward a slave. Thus, by analogy, grace has come to signify the kindness of God to human beings (Lk. 1:30). The Greek term, charis G5921 was common in secular usage, but when taken up into the message of Christ it was to become filled out with a new and enriched content. The NT writers, at the end of their various letters, frequently invoke God's gracious favor on their readers (Rom. 16:20; Phil. 4:23; Col. 1:19; 1 Thess. 5:28). More specifically, the word grace is used to express the concept of kindness given to someone who does not deserve it: hence, undeserved favor, especially that kind or degree of favor bestowed on sinners through Jesus CHRIST (Eph. 2:4-5). Grace, therefore, is that unmerited favor of God toward sinners whereby, for the sake of Christ—the only begotten of the Father, full of grace and truth (Jn. 1:14)—he has provided for their redemption. He has from all eternity determined to extend favor toward all who have FAITH in Christ as Lord and Savior.

The relationship between LAW and grace is one of the major themes of PAUL's writings (Rom. 5:1, 15-17; 8:1-2; Gal. 5:4-5; Eph. 2:8-9). Grace is likewise without equivocation identified as the medium or instrument through which God has effected the SALVATION of all believers (Tit. 2:11). Grace is also regarded as the sustaining influence enabling the believer to persevere in the Christian life (Acts 11:23; 20:32; 2 Cor. 9:14). Thus, grace is not merely the initiatory act of God that secures the believers' eternal salvation, but also that which maintains it throughout all of the Christian's life. It is also used as a token or proof of salvation (2 Cor. 1:5). A special gift of grace is imparted to the humble (Jas. 4:6; 1 Pet. 5:5). Grace can also refer to the capacity for the reception of divine life (1 Pet. 1:10).

graft. A horticultural process by which the branches of the wild olive tree in eastern lands are cut back so that branches from a cultivated olive may be inserted and grafting take place. Paul makes use of this practice in reverse (Rom. 11:17-24): the wild branches, the GENTILES, are thought of as "grafted in" to the good stock of the parent tree, the children of Israel. This deliberate inversion, certainly not a foolish mistake, heightens rather than diminishes the picturesque figure of speech conveying the eternal truth of the rejection of Israel and the status of the church.

grate, grating. A grill or network of bars. The word is used to render Hebrew mikbār H4803, referring to the bronze lattice-work or mesh that, underneath a projecting ledge, surrounded the lower half of the ALTAR of burnt offering (Exod. 27:4-5; 35:16; 38:4-5, 30; 39:39). Various functions have been attributed to the grating itself, for example, to protect the altar and to support the ledge above it.

gratitude. The condition or quality of being grateful; an emotion or sentiment of thankfulness. No motif more adequately recalls the nature of biblical FAITH than gratitude or thanksgiving. In the OT the verb “to give thanks” is yādāh H3344, which can also be translated “to praise” and “to confess”; the word for “thanksgiving” is the cognate noun tôdâ H9343. Thanksgiving comprises the special note of the Psalter; yet Israel’s gratitude to Yahweh rings throughout her history. King DAVID appointed certain Levites “to make petition, to give thanks, and to praise the LORD” (1 Chr. 16:4). This practice was continued by SOLOMON (2 Chr. 5:13; 7:6), by HEZEKIAH (31:2), and by the exiles who returned from Babylon (Neh. 11:17).

In the NT thanksgiving to God both for his work (Lk. 17:16) and for his person (2:38) is a major theme. The Greek noun eucharistia G2374 is used fifteen times in the NT and is usually translated “thanksgiving” (1 Cor. 14:16 et al.). The cognate verb eucharisteō G2373, “to give thanks,” occurs almost forty times. The concept abounds in PAUL’s epistles (Rom. 1:8; 7:25; 2 Cor. 9:15; Col.

1:12; 1 Tim. 1:12). The NT writers urged their fellow Christians to be grateful (Eph. 5:4; Col. 3:15; Heb. 13:15; Jas. 1:2, 9; 1 Pet. 4:12-14).

Gratitude is pleasing to God (Ps. 92:1) because it is commanded (Ps. 50:14; Phil. 4:6), because Christ set the example (Matt. 11:25; 26:27; Jn. 6:11; 11:41), and because the heavenly host is engaged in it (Rev. 4:9; 7:11-12; 11:16-17). Gratitude can be expressed for (1) the goodness and mercy of God (Ps. 106:1; 107:1; 136:1-3), (2) the gift of Christ (2 Cor. 9:15), (3) Christ's power and reign (Rev. 11:17), (4) deliverance from indwelling sin (Rom. 7:23-25), (5) the nearness of God's presence (Ps. 75:1), (6) our desire to give for God's work (1 Chr. 29:6-14), (7) the supply of our physical needs (Rom. 14:6-7; 1 Tim. 4:3, 4), (8) victory over death and the grave (1 Cor. 15:57), (9) wisdom and might (Dan. 2:23), (10) the triumph of the gospel (2 Cor. 2:14), (11) the reception of God's word (1 Thess. 2:13), (12) the conversion of souls (Rom. 6:17), (13) faith (Rom. 1:8; 2 Thess. 1:3), love (2 Thess. 1:3), and zeal (2 Cor. 8:16) manifested in others, (14) grace bestowed upon others (1 Cor. 1:4; Phil. 1:3-5; Col. 1:3-6), (15) ministers appointed by God (1 Tim. 1:12), (16) all men (1 Tim. 2:1), and (17) everything God permits (2 Cor. 9:11; Eph. 5:20).

grave. See BURIAL; SHEOL; TOMB.

graveclothes. This English term is used by the KJV once to render a Greek noun meaning "bandage" or "binding material" (Jn. 11:44; NIV, "strips of linen"). Before BURIAL the body was washed, perhaps anointed with spices, wrapped in a linen winding sheet, with hands and feet bound with gravebands, and the face covered with a napkin.

gravel. A mix of rock fragments or pebbles. The term is used to render a Hebrew word that occurs twice in a figurative sense. In Prov. 20:17 it is used of a liar, showing the consequences of deceitfulness: "he ends up with a mouth full of gravel." In Lam. 3:16 the prophet complains, "He has broken my teeth with gravel; / he has trampled me in the dust."

graven image. An image of wood, stone, or metal, shaped with a sharp cutting instrument as distinguished from one cast in a mold (Isa. 30:22; 44:16-17; 45:20 KJV; NIV, "idols"). Images were, however, sometimes cast and then finished by the graver (40:19). Such images were used by the Canaanites (Deut. 7:5), by the Babylonians, and by others (Jer. 50:38; 51:47, 52). The Israelites were forbidden by the Decalogue to make them (Exod. 20:4).

gray. This term occurs about a dozen times in the OT, always with reference to gray HAIR as an indication of old age (Gen. 43:38 et al.). The word does not occur in the NT.

great. This English adjective can be used to render several terms, especially Hebrew gādôl H1524 (Gen. 1:16 et al.) and Greek me-gas G3489 (Matt. 4:16 et al.). In addition, words that primarily mean “much, many” can sometimes be translated “great” (e.g., Gen. 7:11; Matt. 2:18). These and other expressions are used in a wide variety of contexts, but the Bible views greatness primarily as an attribute that should be applied to GOD (e.g., Ps. 48:1; Tit. 2:13), his qualities (such as his “great love,” Ps. 17:7), and his deeds (Rev. 15:3).

Grecia. gree’shuh. KJV alternate form of GREECE (only Dan. 8:21; 10:20; 11:2).

Grecian. gree’shuhn. A native or inhabitant of GREECE; a speaker of the GREEK LANGUAGE. The KJV uses this term once in the OT (Joel 3:6), and three times in the NT (Acts 6:1; 9:29; 11:20 [NIV, “Grecian Jews” in the first two passages, “Greeks” in the last]).

Christianity reaches Greece.

Greece. greeks. A geographical area on the S Balkan Peninsula, including the islands and surrounding coasts of the Aegean Sea, and inhabited primarily by speakers of the GREEK LANGUAGE. Greece and its associated island groups form the SE end of southern Europe's mountain system, a rugged peninsula and archipelago, not rich in fertile or arable land. The southward movement of the Indo-European-speaking tribes, who became the Greek people, ended here. These tribes, or their predecessors, had established ordered life in the peninsula and islands by the twelfth century B.C. Their civilization vanished before 1000 B.C., in a dark age of destruction and invasion occasioned by further waves of wandering tribes. Out of four centuries of chaos emerged the complex of peoples on island and mainland who are called the Greeks. Their own generic name was Hellenes, but Greece was a portion of the land that, lying in the NW, naturally came first to the attention of Rome. After the common fashion of popular nomenclature, the name of the part that first became known was extended to include the whole. Mediated through ROME, the term Greece was applied to all Hellas, and all Hellenes were called Greeks by Western Europe.

Geography, as always, played a part in the history of the people. The formation of the city-state was a natural development in an isolated plain or in a river valley ringed by precipitous terrain. Seafaring naturally developed from the nearness of the sea. And from seafaring and the dearth of fertile land in a rugged peninsula, sprang colonization and the spread of Greek colonies that marked the first half of the pre-Christian millennium. As early as the eighth century B.C., Greek ports and trading posts were scattered from the Crimea to Cadiz. In these same centuries the first flowering of Greek thought and poetry began. In Ionia the foundations of scientific and philosophical thought were laid. On Lesbos, in those same years, Sappho and Alcaeus wrote supreme lyric poetry. In short, the active, inquisitive, brilliant, inventive Greek race was visible in full promise around the eastern end of the Mediterranean Sea before the bright flowering of fifth-century ATHENS. That century was one of the great golden ages of human culture. Greece, interpreted by the dynamic people of Attica in one brief noontide of human spirit, made immortal contributions to literature, art, philosophy, and political thought. Everything Greek in all future centuries was deepened and colored by the achievement of Athens. Hellenism, which had centuries of dynamic life ahead of it, was shaped by Athens in the short years of its spiritual supremacy. The glory of Athens faded, and her strength was sapped in lamentable war with the dour and uncreative autocracy of Sparta.

On the ruins of a Greece fatally weakened from within, Philip of Macedon, in the mid-fourth century B.C., built his empire. His son ALEXANDER THE GREAT, in one of the strangest acts of conquest in all history, extended that empire to India, swept the vast state of Persia out of existence, and, as his father had unified Greece, brought under his single rule the great complex of states and kingdoms that lay between the Dardanelles and the Indus, the Caspian and the Nile. When Alexander died in Babylon at the age of thirty-three in 323 B.C., his generals divided the world; and out of the division arose the Oriental kingdoms that the Romans conquered when their empire rounded the Mediterranean Sea.

The Greek language, Greek thought, and Greek culture, in the wake of Alexander, provided a unifying element in all the Middle East. Without the vast flow of the Greek tide eastward, the NT could not have been born. Greece provided its language and fashion of thought. Hellenism was a stimulus to the human mind. To reason, question, and speculate, was a habit with the Greeks. Hence the logical mind of Greek-speaking PAUL of TARSUS, heir of both Hellenism and Judaism. Hence the “Grecians” of the NT—STEPHEN, for example, and PHILIP—who sweep fresh, bold, and vigorous into the life of the early church, ready to reform and to rethink old concepts. Paul needed his Greek education, as he needed the Judaism of GAMALIEL. Paul’s synthesis of the covenants, so compelling in its logic, so fundamental in Christian theology, was the work of a Greek Jew.

It was his thought, having been trained in the Hellenism of Tarsus, that solved the problem of the Testaments and brought out from the stores of Judaism the wares that Christians could recognize and use.

greed. An excessive desire to acquire more than one has (esp. wealth and material possessions), usually leading to inappropriate behavior. This English term occurs primarily as the rendering of Greek pleonexia G4432 (Lk. 12:15 et al), but the concept is expressed in many different ways. See COVETOUSNESS.

Greek language. The language of GREECE, spoken continuously from very ancient times until the present day. As a member of the Indo-European family, Greek is related to many languages, both eastern (e.g., Persian, Sanskrit) and western (e.g., German, Russian, Latin, and esp. Armenian); but it is very clearly distinctive as well, being the only member of its own branch (contrast, e.g., the Germanic branch, consisting not only of German, but also Dutch, English, the Scandinavian languages, and so on).

The discovery and decipherment of the Mycenaean tablets demonstrated that an early form of Greek was spoken in the Peloponnesus several centuries before the time once favored for the arrival in the area of the Hellenic tribes. The piecemeal nature of their southward infiltration, and the firm geographical subdivisions of the area they occupied, led to the survival into literary times of several dialects: Attic-Ionic, spoken in Attica and the Ionic areas of Asia Minor, with associated islands; Achaean, which included the Aeolic of Lesbos and the dialects of Thessaly and Boeotia, together with the undocumented dialect of the Arcado-Cyprian; and Western Greek, including under that name the dialects of Phocis, Locris, Elis, and Aetolia, together with the Doric of the Peloponnesus, the Peloponnesian colonies, and Magna Grecia.

Of these dialects, Attic achieved the supreme position because of the worth and greatness of the literature in which it found expression. It was the Attic dialect with which ALEXANDER THE GREAT (himself a Macedonian rather than Greek) conquered the cultures of the ancient world. Even before Alexander's time, the Attic dialect had spread to other parts of the Greek world; this process was however greatly accelerated when Alexander imposed Greek culture on eastern races. This modified Attic speech became the lingua franca of the ancient world, and grammarians referred to it as hē koinē dialektos, "the common dialect." It was characterized by some changes in phonology, especially the pronunciation of certain vowels, as well as simplification in the morphology and syntax. With regard to vocabulary, many words from Greek dialects other than Attic became common in the Koine, and contact with foreign languages resulted in numerous loanwords.

Because the Greek of the NT is, in various respects, markedly different from the language found in most Greek literature, some scholars have argued in the past that the NT language must have been a peculiar Jewish-Greek dialect or even a language specially created by the Holy Spirit to communicate the gospel. It is of course true that the NT (like any other literary corpus of related writings) includes a distinctive vocabulary; it is also true that the influence of the SEPTUAGINT (which often reflects the use of Hebrew words and expressions), as well as the Semitic background of the apostles, left a mark on the NT language. Nevertheless, the modern discovery in Egypt of many thousands of everyday documents on PAPYRUS demonstrated clearly that biblical Greek is, fundamentally, the common language of the day, that is, the Koine. While the level of literary sophistication varies from book to book, the NT authors wrote in the simple, colloquial language of the people while avoiding both the near-illiteracy or vulgarity sometimes found in the papyri and, at the other extreme, the artificial and archaizing forms of the Atticists. If we focus on style, however, we may indeed speak of biblical Greek as a coherent whole, colored by occasional Semitic idioms and enriched by a vocabulary that gave clear expression to revealed truth.

Greek versions. See SEPTUAGINT; TEXT AND VERSIONS (OT).

green. This English term is used to render a variety of words and expressions, such as Hebrew yereq H3764, a noun meaning “green [plant], verdure” (Gen. 1:30 et al.). The Greek adjective chlōros G5952 can be translated “green” (e.g., Mk. 6:39), but this term covers a wide range, including “pale green” or simply “pale” (cf. Rev. 6:8), “greenish-yellow,” and even “yellow” (it can be applied to honey, for example).

greet. To salute or welcome upon meeting a person or in a written communication. This English verb is found in the OT mainly as the rendering of the Hebrew expression šā'al lē-šālôm, “to inquire about [someone’s] welfare” (Exod. 19:7; Jdg. 18:15; 1 Sam. 10:4; et al.), although the verb bārak H1385, “to bless,” can also be used in this way (e.g., 2 Ki. 4:29). The Hebrew noun šālôm H8934 (“completeness, welfare, peace”) is even today the conventional term for “Hello!” and can be used in a letter with the sense “Greetings!” (cf. Aram. šēlām H10720 in Ezra 4:17). This usage is reflected in our Lord’s instruction to his disciples. “When you enter a house, first say, ‘Peace to this house’” (Lk. 10:5), and in Paul’s use of Greek eirēnē G1645 (“peace”) at the beginning of his letters (Rom. 1:7 et al.). In Hellenistic times, the conventional way of beginning a letter was to use the infinitive of the verb chairō G5897, “to rejoice” (e.g., Acts 15:23; Jas. 1:1). Paul’s unusual formula, “Grace [charis G5921] and peace,” combines the Hebrew greeting with a Christianized form of the Greek salutation.

grief. See MOURN; SORROW; TRIBULATION.

grind. A procedure by which GRAIN was reduced to flour through being pulverized between two large stones (e.g., Isa. 47:2; Lk. 17:35). Small hand mills sometimes had holes in the center of the top stone through which the grain was poured (Matt. 24:41). Larger community mills were often powered by animals (Mk. 9:42). See MILL.

grisled. An archaic term used by the KJV to render Hebrew bārōd H1353, meaning “spotted, mottled, dappled,” and occurring in two passages that describe the appearance of goats and horses respectively (Gen. 31:10-11; Zech. 6:3, 6).

grove. This English term is found occasionally in modern versions with its usual sense of “orchard” (e.g., Deut. 6:11). In the KJV it is used (with one exception, Gen. 21:33) to render Hebrew āšērâ H895, the name of a Canaanite goddess, ASHERAH (e.g., 1 Ki. 18:19), though the term occurs more frequently with reference to the wooden cult objects or “sacred poles” (NRSV) by which she was represented (Exod. 34:13 et al.; NIV, “Asherah poles”; the incorrect guard. A soldier or group of soldiers assigned to protect an important person or to keep watch over prisoners. In ancient times oriental monarchs had attached to their persons a body of picked men to protect them and carry out their wishes on important confidential matters. POTIPHAR, to whom the Midianites sold JOSEPH, was the captain of PHARAOH's guard, and NEBUZARADAN held the same position in NEBUCHADNEZZAR's bodyguard (Gen. 37:36; 41:10, 12; 2 Ki. 25:8; Jer. 52:12). The men who formed the royal bodyguard were often foreigners. DAVID had a corps of 600 foreign mercenaries, made up of KERETHITES and PELETHITES, of whom BENAIAH was the captain (2 Sam. 20:23). They accompanied DAVID on his flight from ABSALOM (2 Sam. 15:18), and formed SOLOMON's escort on the day he was crowned (1 Ki. 1:38, 44). HEROD Antipas ordered a member of his guard to bring to him the head of JOHN THE BAPTIST on a platter (Mk. 6:27; NIV, "executioner"). PILATE told the Jews to make the tomb of Jesus secure with a guard of soldiers—undoubtedly, the temple police (Matt. 27:65-66).

Guard, Gate of the. This name occurs only once, in the account of the dedication of the rebuilt wall of JERUSALEM (Neh. 12:39; not to be confused with "the gate of the guards" in the temple precincts [2 Ki. 11:19; see UPPER GATE]). Some have suggested that this entrance should be identified with the MUSTER GATE (3:31; NIV, "Inspection Gate"); others argue that it should be linked with the court (courtyard) of the guard (3:25; Jer. 32:2 et al.). In either case, the precise location of this gate is not known.

guardian. Someone who watches over or protects. This English term is used occasionally in some Bible versions to render various Hebrew and Greek words. Of special interest is the Greek noun epitropos G2208, which means basically "a person to whom some task or property has been entrusted." PAUL illustrated the position of Jews under the law by means of a minor in a household who was under the authority of "guardians and trustees" until a certain age (Gal. 4:2; KJV, "tutors and governors"). Under Roman law, the epitropos was the legal guardian of a child—potentially if his father was alive, actually if he had died. A trustee (oikonomos G3874) was responsible for the child's financial affairs until he was twenty-five. When he came of age, he was free and entered into his INHERITANCE.

Gudgodah. gud-goh'duh (Heb. gudgōdâ H1516, meaning uncertain). A station in the wilderness wanderings of the Israelites (Deut. 10:7). The name is thought to be a variant of Gidgad. See HOR HAGGIDGAD.

guest room. This expression (KJV, "guestchamber") is used of the place where Jesus and his disciples ate the PASSOVER on the eve of the CRUCIFIXION (Mk. 14:14; Lk. 22:11; the same Gk. word is translated "inn" in Lk. 2:7). It refers to a room that provided facilities for temporary lodging or for banqueting. The NIV and other versions use "guest room" also to render a different Greek word in one passage (Phlm. 22; cf. Acts 28:23).

guile. This English term, meaning "skillful deceit," occurs eleven times in the KJV, but less frequently in modern translations (not at all in the NIV). Well-known passages where the KJV uses the term include Jesus' statement regarding NATHANAEL, "Behold an Israelite indeed, in whom is no guile!" (Jn. 1:47; NIV, "in whom there is nothing false"), and PETER's affirmation that Christ "did no sin, neither was guile [NIV, deceit] found in his mouth" (1 Pet. 2:22; this passage is a quotation of Isa. 53:9, where the KJV, curiously, uses "deceit"). See LIE.

guilt. The deserving of punishment because of the violation of a law or a breach of conduct. In the OT, the concept of guilt is largely ritualistic. A person could be guiltless before both God and the nation (Num. 32:22); on the other hand, one could be guilty because of unwitting SIN (Lev. 5:17). Israel, moreover, was viewed as an organic whole: what one does affects all. There is collective responsibility for sin; when ACHAN sinned, for example, all Israel suffered (Josh. 7). The prophets stressed the ethical and personal aspects of sin and of guilt. God is less interested in ritual correctness than in moral obedience. Jesus stressed the importance of a right heart attitude in distinction from outwardly correct acts and taught that there are degrees of guilt, depending on a person's knowledge and motive (Lk. 11:29-32; 12:47-48; 23:34). PAUL likewise recognized differences of degree in guilt (Acts 17:30; Eph. 4:18), though also stating that the law makes everyone guilty before God (Rom. 3:19).

Guni. gyoo'ni (Heb. gûnî H1586, possibly “partridge”; gentilic gûnî H1587, “Gunite”). (1) Second son of NAPHTALI and grandson of JACOB (Gen. 46:24; 1 Chr. 7:13); his descendants are called Gunites (Num. 26:48).

(2) A member of the tribe of GAD who settled in GILEAD; he was grandfather of a certain Ahi who is described as head of the clan (1 Chr. 5:15). The connection between these men and the other Gadites mentioned in the context is ambiguous.

Gur. guhr (Heb. gûr H1595, possibly “sojourning”). An incline near IBLEAM (modern Belameh) where AHAZIAH was mortally wounded by JEHU's men as he fled from the threat of assassination after the death of Joram (2 Ki. 9:27).

Gur Baal. guhr-bay'uhl (Heb. gûr-bā ʿal H1597, “sojourn of the lord”). A city in the NEGEV inhabited by Arabians (and possibly by PHILISTINES also), whom UZZIAH conquered with the help of God (2 Chr. 26:7). Since the verse mentions also the MEUNITES, Gur Baal was probably in or near the territory of EDM, SE of the DEAD SEA, but its precise location is unknown.

gutter. This English term is used by the NIV in only one passage as the rendering of a Hebrew word that occurs in an architectural context with reference to the channel around the ALTAR (Ezek. 43:13-14, 17; NRSV, “base”). The KJV uses it in two passages: in one of them it refers to a water trough (Gen. 30:38, 41); in the other it renders Hebrew šinnôr H7562, probably meaning “water shaft,” and referring to the tunnel that DAVID recommended to his soldiers as a way of entering Jerusalem to conquer it (2 Sam. 5:8). Dating back to pre-Israelite times, it may be “Warren's Shaft” in the SE hill that leads from the GIHON Spring to within the city wall.

gymnasium. In Greece the gymnasium (from Gk. gymnos G1218, “naked”) was originally a place of training for the Olympic games and other athletic contests. By the fourth century B.C. it had become as well an educational and cultural center for Greek youths, and was regarded as an essential feature of a city. It derived its name from the fact that the competitors exercised naked. The gymnasium consisted of a number of large buildings, which contained not merely places for each kind of exercise—running, boxing, wrestling, discus throwing, etc.—but also baths, a covered portico for practice in bad weather and in wintertime, and outside porticos where philosophers and writers gave public lectures and held disputations. Most of the education of boys and young men was obtained in gymnasiums. In ATHENS there were three great gymnasiums, each consecrated to a particular deity. The Greek institution of the gymnasium never became popular with the Romans, and it was held in horror by orthodox Jews. Nevertheless, a gymnasium was erected in JERUSALEM by hellenizing Jews in the time of ANTIOCHUS Epiphanes, who tried to compel the Jews to give up Judaism (1 Macc. 1:10, 14; 2 Macc. 4:9, 12; 4 Macc. 4: 20). Strict Jews opposed it because it introduced heathen customs and led Jewish youths to exercise naked in public and to be ashamed of the mark of their religion, CIRCUMCISION. PAUL alluded to the exercises of the gymnasium several times: boxing (1 Cor. 9:26), wrestling (Eph. 6:12), and racing (1 Cor. 9:24; Gal. 5:7; Phil. 3:12-14). See GAMES.

Haahashtari, Haashtari. hay'uh-hash'tuh-ri (Heb. hā ʾăḥāštārî H2028, a gentilic form meaning “the Ahashtarite[s]”). Son of Ashhur by Naarah and a descendant of JUDAH, although the precise genealogical connection is unclear (1 Chr. 4:6). The term is probably a family name reflecting descent from an otherwise unknown person presumably named Ahashtar.

Habakkuk, Book of. huh-bak'uhk (Heb. ḥābaqqûq H2487, possibly the name of a garden plant, or derived from ḥābaq H2485, “to clasp, embrace”). The eighth book of the Minor Prophets. Of the man Habakkuk nothing is known outside of the book that bears his name. Legendary references to him (in the APOCRYPHA and elsewhere) appear to have no historical value. Traditional scholars believe the book to be a unity, the work of one author, Habakkuk, produced in Judah during the Chaldean (Babylonian) period. The reasons for this view are found in the book itself. The temple still stands (Hab. 2:20; 3:19) and the rise of the Babylonian power is predicted (1:5-6). Some recent scholars emend the Hebrew word kaśdîm H4169 (“Chaldeans”) in 1:6 to read kittiyyîm H4183 (“Cypriots,” thus “Greeks”), and understand it to refer to the Macedonian Greeks under ALEXANDER THE GREAT. They therefore date the book to this much later period. There is no good reason to make this emendation.

Overview of HABAKKUK

Author: The prophet Habakkuk.

Historical setting: The book was written during the final decline of the southern kingdom of Judah, probably after the rise of the Babylonian king NEBUCHADNEZZAR (605 B.C.), but before the fall of JERUSALEM (586).

Purpose: To show God's perspective in the midst of evil and suffering and thus to encourage the righteous to remain faithful.

Contents: Habakkuk's first question and God's reply (Hab. 1:1-11).
Habakkuk's second question and God's reply (2:11—2:20).
Habakkuk's prayer (ch. 3).

The Neo-Babylonian or Chaldean empire first came to prominence when the Babylonian king NEBUCHADNEZZAR defeated the Egyptians at the battle of CARCHEMISH in 605 B.C. and reestablished BABYLON as the seat of world power. The prophecy of Habakkuk could hardly have been given before 605. JERUSALEM fell to Nebuchadnezzar in 587. The book must be placed somewhere between these dates, probably during the reign of the Judean king JEHOIAKIM. Some date the book earlier, believing that the Chaldeans were known to Judah before Carchemish and emphasizing the unexpectedness of the attack mentioned by Habakkuk (Hab. 1:5). Still, a date soon after 605 seems to be preferred.

In modern times the unity of the book has been questioned. The psalm of Hab. 3 is certainly somewhat different in style from the rest of the book, but this is hardly a sufficient reason to deny it to Habakkuk. The theory that all psalms were postexilic in Israel is now discredited. The theme of the prose part (chs. 1-2) is the same as that of the psalm. And there are obvious similarities of language. The third chapter is specifically ascribed to Habakkuk (3:1), and there seems to be no good internal indication that he was not its author.

The first two chapters set forth Habakkuk's prophetic oracle. Twice the prophet is perplexed and asks for divine enlightenment; twice he is answered. First he is concerned over the violence and sin of his people, the Judeans. Why are these wicked men not punished (Hab. 1:2-4)? God answers that he is about to send the Babylonians to judge Judah (1:5-11). This answer plunges Habakkuk into a greater perplexity: How can a righteous God use the wicked Babylonians to punish Judah, which, though it has become apostate, is still better than the Babylonians (1:12-17)? God's answer is that the proud conquerors will themselves be punished (2:2-20). The Babylonians are puffed up with self-sufficient pride, but in this hour of national calamity the righteous will live by his faithfulness, that is, by his constancy. The prophet sees only two ways of looking at life: in faith or in unbelief. This statement naturally becomes important to the NT writers and is quoted in Rom. 1:17; Gal. 3:11; and Heb. 10:38. The second answer to Habakkuk concludes with a series of woes against the Babylonians (Hab. 2:5-20).

The third chapter is called “a prayer of Habakkuk the prophet” (Hab. 3:1). In a moving lyric poem the prophet records his final response to God’s message of judgment. He describes the divine revelation in terms of a story theophany (3:2-15) but concludes that no matter what comes he will trust in God (3:16-19).

Habazziniah. hab´uh-zì-ni´uh (Heb. ḥābazzînyâ H2484, possibly “Yahweh has made me abundant [or joyful]”). KJV Habaziniah. Grandfather of JAAZANIAH, who was the leader of the RECAPITES (Jer. 35:3).

habergeon. A sleeveless coat of mail. The term is used by the KJV a few times (Exod. 28:32 et al.).

Habiru, Hapiru. hah-bee´roo, hah-pee´roo. The name of a people group mentioned in the AMARNA Tablets (15th cent. B.C.) as among those who were intruders into PALESTINE. The name also appears in Babylonian, Hittite, and Hurrian texts, some as early as the eighteenth century B.C. The same name appears in Egyptian records as Apiru as late as the twelfth century. ABRAHAM is the first person in the Bible to bear the name HEBREW (ʿibrî H6303, Gen. 14:13), and some scholars infer that the Habiru are identical with the biblical Hebrews. The meaning of Habiru seems to be “wanderers” or “fugitives.” It is not an ethnic designation, for the Habiru of these various texts were of mixed racial origin, including both Semites and non-Semites. The name Habiru describes more than the Hebrews, therefore, but it came to be associated with them particularly. Even so, the connection, if there is any, of the Hebrews with the Habiru remains obscure.

Habor. hay´bor (Heb. ḥābôr H2466). A tributary of the EUPHRATES River, flowing through the district of GOZAN, to the banks of which SHALMANESER and SARGON transported the exiled Israelites (2 Ki. 17:6; 18:11; 1 Chr. 5:26). The river originates in the mountains of SE Turkey and is now known by the name Khabur.

Hacaliah. hak´uh-li´uh (Heb. ḥākalyâ H2678, perhaps “wait for Yahweh”). KJV Hachaliah; TNIV Hakaliah. Father of NEHEMIAH (Neh. 1:1; 10:1).

Hachilah. See HAKILAH.

Hachmoni. See H_{ACMONI}.

Hacmoni. hak´moh-ni (Heb. ḥakmōnî H2685, possibly “wise”; if gentilic, “Hacmonite”). Also Hachmoni; TNIV Hakmoni. (1) Father of J_{ASHOBEAM}; the latter was a chief officer among D_{AVID}’s mighty men (1 Chr. 11:11). However, the Hebrew expression “the son of Hacmoni” should perhaps be understood as “the Hacmonite” (cf. NIV). In the parallel passage (2 Sam. 23:8), Jashobeam is called “Josheb-Basshebeth, a Tahkemonite,” probably the result of a copyist’s mistake.

(2) Father of Jehiel, who was in charge of David’s sons (1 Chr. 27:32); it is possible, though less likely, that here too the term should be taken as a gentilic, and the phrase rendered, “Jehiel the Hacmonite.”

Hadad. hay´dad (Heb. ḥāḏad H2524 [only #1 below], possibly “sharp, fierce”; hāḏad H2060, prob. “thunderer”). (1) Son of I_{SHMAEL} and grandson of A_{BRAHAM} (Gen. 25:15 [KJV, “Hadar,” following the Bomberg ed. of the Heb. text]; 1 Chr. 1:30 [“Hadar” in a few Heb. MSS]).

(2) Son of Bedad and a king of E_{DOM} who is said to have defeated M_{IDIAN}; his capital was Avith (Gen. 36:35-36; 1 Chr. 1:46-47). His dates are unknown.

(3) Another Edomite king of uncertain date; his capital was Pau, and the text includes a reference to his wife, Mehetabel daughter of M_{ATRED} (Gen. 36:39 [“Hadar” in most Heb. MSS]; 1 Chr. 1:50-51 [“Hadar” in a few Heb. MSS]).

(4) An Edomite prince who was an adversary of S_{OLOMON} (1 Ki. 11:14-22, 25). After J_{OAB} defeated the Edomites and occupied their country, Hadad was taken to Egypt as a young boy. There P_{HARAOH} welcomed him and later gave him his wife’s sister in marriage, so Hadad’s son was brought up in the court of Egypt. After the death of D_{AVID}, Hadad returned to Edom and attempted to stir up the Edomites against the rule of Solomon, apparently with some success.

Stela with representation of Baal-Hadad (from Ras Shamra, 15-13th cent. B.C.).

(5) The name of an ancient Semitic deity (also known as Adad, the Akk. form). Although not directly mentioned in the Bible, this god was worshiped in PALESTINE, SYRIA, and MESOPOTAMIA from about the time of ABRAHAM on. Hadad is frequently mentioned in the RAS SHAMRA texts as the proper name of BAAL, a storm-god who manifests himself in thunder, lightning, and rain (the name Hadad prob. means “thunderer”). He is the dying and rising god, like TAMMUZ of Mesopotamia. He is also a warrior god and is represented as a warrior standing on a bull, carrying a mace and a thunderbolt, with the horns of a bull on his helmet. The name Hadad functions as a divine element in such compound names as BEN-HADAD, HADADEZER, and HADAD RIMMON.

Hadadezer. hay’dad-ee’zuhr (Heb. hădad ʿezer H2061, “Hadad is help”). KJV Hadarezer (following many Heb. MSS). Son of REHOB and king of ZOBAB in ARAM (SYRIA), whose kingdom in the time of DAVID extended as far eastward as the EUPHRATES and as far southward as AMMON. There are three accounts in the OT of conflicts between him and David (though some scholars argue that these passages refer to only one or two distinct battles). In each, Hadadezer was defeated, and finally he was made tributary (2 Sam. 8:3-8; 10:5-14; 10:15-18).

After these wars, David put a garrison in DAMASCUS and received a tribute from Hadadezer.

Hadad Rimmon. hay´dad-rim´uhn (Heb. hădad-rimmôn H2062; Aramean and Akkadian deities, respectively, both probably meaning “thunderer”). The prophet ZECHARIAH predicted, “On that day the weeping in Jerusalem will be great, like the weeping of [or for] Hadad Rimmon in the plain of Megiddo” (Zech. 12:11). The name is thought by some to refer to a place, possibly alluding to the mourning that took place after the death of JOSIAH (2 Ki. 23:29-30; 2 Chr. 35:20-25). Others understand Hadad Rimmon to be a dying-and-rising vegetation god whose worship involved annual ritual mourning. See HADAD #4 and RIMMON (DEITY).

Hadar. hay´dahr (Heb. hădar H2076 [not in NIV], “splendor”). This name, a textual variant of HADAD, occurs twice in the KJV (Gen. 25:15; 36:39; in the latter passage, NRSV has “Hadar” as well).

Hadarezer. See HADADEZER.

Hadashah. huh-dash´uh (Heb. hădāšâ H2546, “new”). A town in the lowland of the tribe of JUDAH (Josh. 15:37). Hadashah was in the same district as LACHISH and EGLON, but its location is unknown.

Hadassah. huh-das´uh (Heb. hădassâ H2073, “myrtle”). The Hebrew name of ESTHER (Esth. 2:7). Hadassah was apparently her original name, that is, given to her at birth, even though she was more commonly known by the Akkadian (or Persian) name, Esther.

Hadattah. See HAZOR HADATTAH.

Hades. hay´deez (Gk. hadēs G87, etymology disputed, perhaps from the negative particle a and the verb idein, “[that which is] not seen,” “the invisible one”). In Greek mythology, the god of the netherworld, but the term was then applied to the underworld itself, that is, the abode of the dead. The term, as used in the NT, is contrasted with the final punishment of the wicked and reflects the OT concept of SHEOL. Although the Greek word is uniformly translated as ^{HELL} in the KJV, this latter term is properly thought of as the final destiny of the wicked and thus as the appropriate rendering of Greek geenna G1147 (see ^{GEHENNA}).

The NT generally does not give definite light on Hades. In Matt. 11:23 (cf. Lk. 10:15) our Lord says that ^{CAPERNAUM} will go down into Hades. The preposition “down” points to the OT teaching that Sheol is inside the earth (Ps. 139:8; Amos 9:2), and the following verse (Matt. 11:24) puts the day of judgment for both ^{SODOM} and Capernaum later than the stay in Hades. In the parable of the rich man and ^{LAZARUS} (Lk. 16:19-31) the rich man is pictured as being tormented in Hades but able to see in the distance ^{ABRAHAM} with Lazarus by his side. He asks for a drop of water to cool his tongue and for a message to be sent to his five brothers who are still alive on earth, and in each case his request is denied. In the first Christian sermon (Acts 2:25-31), ^{PETER} quotes from Ps. 16:8-11, proving from it that our Lord arose from the dead and was not left in Hades. In the book of Revelation, ^{DEATH} and Hades are four times associated (Rev. 1:18; 6:8; 20:13-14), being treated as almost synonymous terms. In the last verse mentioned, death and Hades are to be cast into the lake of fire, that is, doomed to utter destruction.

Hadid. hay´did (Heb. ḥādîd H2531, possibly “sharp”). A town listed with ^{LOD} and ^{ONO} as having been resettled by hundreds of Jews after the ^{EXILE} (Ezra 2:33; Neh. 7:37); those returning were “descendants of the Benjamites from Geba” (Neh. 11:31-35). Hadid is probably to be identified with ^{ADIDA} (1 Macc. 12:38; 13:13) and with the modern el-Haditheth, about 3.5 mi. (5 km.) ENE of Lod (Lydda).

Hadlai. had´li (Heb. ḥadlāy H2536, prob. “stout,” fig. “successful”). Father of ^{AMASA}; the latter was a leader in the tribe of ^{EPHRAIM} during the reign of ^{PEKAH} king of Israel (2 Chr. 28:12).

Hadoram. huh-dor´uhm (Heb. ḥādôrām H2066, possibly “^{HADAD} is exalted”). (1) Son (or descendant) of ^{JOKTAN} son of ^{EBER} (Gen. 10:27; 1 Chr. 1:21). Some scholars identify the name with Dauram, a locality in Yemen; Hadoram thus may have been the name of a S Arabian tribe.

(2) Son of ^{TOU} (Toi) king of ^{HAMATH}; he was sent by his father with presents to ^{DAVID} “to greet him and congratulate him on his victory in battle over Hadadezer, who had been at war with Tou” (1 Chr. 18:10). In the parallel passage (2 Sam. 8:10), he is called ^{JORAM}; some consider this name a textual corruption, but others interpret it as the Israelite equivalent (that is, using an abbreviated form of Yahweh rather than the pagan name Hadad).

(3) A variant form of ADONIRAM (2 Chr. 10:18).

Hadrach. had´rak (Heb. ḥadrāk H2541, meaning unknown). TNIV Hadrak. A locality N of Israel against which ZECHARIAH prophesied (Zech. 9:1). Grouped with DAMASCUS, HAMATH, TYRE, and SIDON, Hadrach is probably the same as the Ḥatarikka mentioned in some Assyrian inscriptions. It is identified with modern Tell Afis, about 28 mi. (45 km.) SW of Aleppo.

Hadrak. TNIV form of HADRACH.

Hadrian. hay´dree-uhn. Emperor of ROME, A.D. 117-138. Publius Aelius (Traianus) Hadrianus was born, probably in Spain, in the year 76. Before he was ten years old, his father died, and the future emperor TRAJAN (a relative) became one of his guardians. His military career began during the reign of DOMITIAN, and after Trajan became emperor, Hadrian held several posts, including the governorship of SYRIA. Shortly after Trajan’s death, Hadrian was recognized as emperor. His two decades of rule were uneven. He was a cultured man, devoted to Greek literature and showing great interest in philosophy, science, and architecture. The famous Hadrian’s Wall, marking the frontiers of the empire in Britain, signaled an end to Roman expansion. In the year 130 Hadrian visited JUDEA and took several steps, such as banning CIRCUMCISION, that provoked Jewish sensibilities. A revolt was inevitable, and BAR KOKHBA rose against Rome in 132. By 135 the rebellion had been crushed, Jerusalem made into a Roman colony named Aelia Capitolina, and the nation of Israel brought to an end. Hadrian died three years later.

Haeleph. hay-ee´lif (Heb. hā ʿelep H2030, “the ox”). A town in the tribal territory of BENJAMIN listed between ZELA and JERUSALEM (Josh. 18:28; KJV, “Eleph”). The location of the city is unknown.

Hagab. hay´gab (Heb. ḥāgāb H2507, “locust”). Ancestor of a family of temple servants (NETHINIM) who returned after the EXILE with ZERUBBABEL (Ezra 2:46; the name is absent in the parallel list, Neh. 7:48, prob. because a scribe inadvertently skipped “Akkub Hagab” after writing the similar name “Hagabah”).

Hagaba, Hagabah. hag'uh-buh (Heb. ḥăgābâ H2509 [ḥăgābā › in Bomberg ed. at Neh. 7:48], “locust”). Ancestor of a family of temple servants (NETHINIM) who returned after the EXILE with ZERUBBABEL (Ezra 2:45; Neh. 7:48). The usual English spelling “Hagaba” in Nehemiah derives from a printed edition of the Hebrew Bible published in 1524-25, but is not supported by the MSS.

Hagar was sent out into the wilderness of Beersheba. (View to the SE.)

Hagar. hay'gahr (Heb. hāgār H2057, meaning uncertain). KJV NT Agar. Concubine of Abram (ABRAHAM) and mother of ISHMAEL. Hagar was an Egyptian handmaid to Sarai (SARAH), wife of Abram. God had promised Abraham a son and heir (Gen. 15:4), but Sarai was barren. Following the marital customs of the times, she gave Hagar to her husband as her substitute (16:1-16). When Hagar saw that she had conceived, she despised her mistress, causing trouble in the household. Hagar was driven out, but the angel of the Lord appeared and sent her back to her mistress (16:7-14). When her son Ishmael was fourteen years old, his father one hundred, and Sarah ninety, ISAAC was born. At a great feast held in connection with Isaac's weaning, Ishmael scoffed at the proceedings (21:9), so Sarah insisted that Hagar and her son be cast out, and Abraham unwillingly complied. God told Abraham that Ishmael's descendants would become a nation. Hagar is last seen taking a wife for her son out of the land of Egypt, her own land (21:1-21). PAUL made Hagar's experience an ALLEGORY of the difference between law and grace (Gal. 4:21-31).

Hagarene, Hagarite, Hagerite. hag'uh-reen, hag'uh-rit, hay'guh-rit. KJV forms of HAGRITE.

Haggadah. hah'gah-dah', huh-gah'duh (Heb. haggādâ or aggādâ [Aggadah], from nāgad H5583 hiphil, “to tell, narrate”). Also Haggada, Aggada(h); pl. haggadoth, aggadoth. Traditional Jewish literature that is not legal in character; it may also refer to a specific story or lesson. Its counterpart is HALAKAH. Whereas the latter denotes authoritative rabbinic teaching in respect to the Mosaic law, especially as deposited in the Mishnah (see TALMUD), Haggadah is didactic discourse mainly concerned with edification. It is usually based upon homiletical exegesis and has a moral purpose in view, but the word often functions as a catch-all term to include anything nonhalakic. In modern usage, the Haggadah refers to a book that contains the story of the exodus and the Passover ritual.

Haggai, Book of. hag'i (Heb. ḥaggay H2516, “[born] on a feast day”). The tenth book of the Minor Prophets. Little is known of Haggai's personal history. He lived soon after the Babylonian EXILE and was contemporary with ZECHARIAH (cf. Hag. 1:1 with Zech. 1:1).

Overview of HAGGAI

Author: The prophet Haggai.

Historical setting: Postexilic JERUSALEM during the second year of the Persian king DARIUS I (520 B.C.), at a time when the Jewish returnees had ceased to rebuild the TEMPLE (cf. ZECHARIAH, BOOK OF).

Purpose: To admonish the Israelites for failing to construct the temple.

Contents: The book records the following four messages (delivered on four different days during a three-month period): the need to complete rebuilding the temple (Hag. 1:1-15); the promise of God's presence (2:1-9); blessings for a defiled people (2:10-19); the final victory (2:20-23).

After their return from the captivity, the Israelites set up the altar on its base, established daily worship, and laid the foundation for the second TEMPLE; then they were compelled to cease building for some years. However, although times were hard, the people were able to build finely paneled houses for themselves (Hag. 1:4). Meanwhile kings succeeded one another in PERSIA. CYRUS, favored of God and friend of the Jews (2 Chr. 36:22; Isa. 44:28), passed away in 529 B.C.; his son Cambyzes reigned 529-522, followed for only seven months in 522 by the Pseudo-Smerdis (a usurper); then arose DARIUS Hystaspes (mentioned by Ezra, Haggai, and Zechariah), who helped and encouraged the Jews to go ahead and who allowed no opposition. In the second year of Darius (520) Haggai fulfilled his brilliant mission of rebuking and encouraging the Jews. The five short messages that make up his book are identified by date and cover only three months and twenty-three days; and in those few weeks the whole situation changed from defeat and discouragement to victory. Zechariah assisted Haggai in the last month of his recorded ministry (Zech. 1:1-6).

In order to make the dates clearer to modern readers, we will give the months their approximately equivalent names in our calendar. On September 1, 520 B.C., the Lord spoke through Haggai, and instead of addressing the people at large, the prophet went straight to “headquarters,” that is, to ZERUBBABEL the prince and to Joshua (JESHUA) the high priest. The people had stopped building the Lord’s house though they were quite able to build their own, and God’s message was, “Give careful thought to your ways.” The punishment for their neglect had been futility; they labored much but produced little. God used “weather judgments” to bring them to their senses. The leaders heeded the message and, with the best of the people, began immediately to build; on September 24 God’s short message was, “I am with you” (Hag. 1:13). A month later, the people were tempted to be discouraged when they contrasted their present effort with the former magnificent temple, and so God told them, “The glory of this present house will be greater than the glory of the former house” (2:9). This message was delivered on October 21, and it contained the notable statement, “The silver is mine and the gold is mine.” The fourth and fifth messages came in one day, December 24, 520. In the fourth, Haggai said that holiness is not contagious, though evil is, and Israel’s change in attitude would cause God to change chastening into blessing. In the last message (2:20-23), God predicted a shaking of the nations but at the same time a great reward to Zerubbabel. Perhaps his reward was inclusion as an ancestor of our Lord in both the royal line (Matt. 1:13) and the line recorded in Luke (Lk. 3:27).

Haggedolim. hag’uh-doh’lim (Heb. haggēdôlîm H2045, “the great ones”). Father of ZABDIEL; the latter was a chief officer among the priests that settled in Jerusalem after the EXILE (Neh. 11:14; KJV renders, “Zabdiel, the son of one of the great men”).

Haggeri. See HAGRI.

Haggi. hag´ee (Heb. ḥaggi H2515, “[born] on a feast day”; gentilic ḥaggi H2515, “Haggite”). Son of GAD and eponymous ancestor of the Haggite clan (Gen. 46:16; Num. 26:15).

Haggiah. ha-gi´uh (Heb. ḥaggiyyâ H2517, “feast of Yahweh”). Son of Shimei and a descendant of LEVI through MERARI (1 Chr. 6:30).

Haggite. See HAGGI.

Haggith. hag´ith (Heb. ḥaggiṯ H2518, “[born] on a feast day”). One of DAVID’s wives and the mother of ADONIJAH (2 Sam. 3:4; 1 Ki. 1:5, 11; 2:13; 1 Chr. 3:2).

Hagiographa. hag´ee-og´ruh-fuh. A term meaning “Sacred Writings” (from Gk. hagios G41 and graphê G1210) and applied to the third division of the Hebrew Bible, after the Law (the PENTATEUCH) and the Prophets (which includes Joshua, Judges, Samuel, and Kings, as well as Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, and the Minor Prophets). Also known simply as the Writings or Ketubim, this section consists of the following books: Psalms, Proverbs, Job, Song of Solomon, Ruth, Lamentations, Ecclesiastes, Esther, Daniel, Ezra, Nehemiah, and 1-2 Chronicles.

Hagri. hag´ri (Heb. ḥagērî H2058, perhaps “wanderer”). The father of MIBHAR, who was one of DAVID’s mighty warriors (1 Chr. 11:38; KJV, “Haggeri”). The parallel passage has “Bani the Gadite” (2 Sam. 23:36), but some MSS of the SEPTUAGINT have “the son of Hagri,” and this reading is adopted by the NIV. See also HAGRITE.

Hagrite. hag´rit (Heb. ḥagērî H2058, possibly “wanderer” or “descendant of Hagar”). The name of an Arabian tribe living in the region E of GILEAD (some think the tribe may have been ARAMEAN). In the time of King SAUL, the Israelites twice inflicted a crushing defeat upon them in war and seized their lands (1 Chr. 5:10, 19-22; KJV, “Hagarites”). DAVID appointed Jaziz the Hagrite to look after his flocks (27:30-31; KJV, “Hagerite”). A psalm of ASAPH makes mention of them along with MOAB, EDOM, and the ISHMAELITES, all of whom were enemies of Israel living in TRANSJORDAN (Ps. 83:6; KJV, “Hagarenes”). The ethnological relationship of the Hagrites with HAGAR (Gen. 16) is uncertain. The Hagrites and other Arab tribes are mentioned in an inscription of TIGLATH-PILESER III (745-727 B.C.).

Hahiroth. See P_I HAHIROTH.

Hai. See A_I.

hail, hailstones. Hail consists of frozen raindrops, though hailstones are often much larger than any single raindrop. When the hailstones fall, they often cohere, forming solid masses, which can do great damage to crops and even endanger life. Hailstones are not common in P_ALESTINE, but they are not unusual and can be very severe. Hail is often mentioned in the Bible, and always as an instrument of God's judgment. A severe hail was the seventh plague in Egypt (Exod. 9:18-34). The A_MORITES were smitten by hailstones at BETH HORON, so that more died from the hailstones than were smitten with the sword by the Israelites (Josh. 10:11). The Scriptures often speak of hail as a means of punishing the wicked (Isa. 28:2, 17) and as a symbol of God's anger, both in the OT (Ezek. 38:22; Hag. 2:17) and in the NT (Rev. 8:7; 11:19; 16:21).

hair. Although all mammals have hair (e.g., goats, 1 Sam. 19:13; camels, Mk. 1:6), the term is usually applied to human beings (Heb. šē ʿār H8552 or ša ʿārâ H8553; Gk. thrix G2582). Hair varies in length, color, and structure among the different races and seems to be intended by God for protection, for beauty, and for identification. The peoples of the Bible lands were generally black-haired, though red-haired individuals are fairly common among the people of Israel. Hebrews and Arabs (cf. Rev. 9:8) wore their beards long as a mark of dignity, but the Egyptians were clean-shaven (Gen. 41:14). The men of Israel were not to clip off the edges of the B_EARD (Lev. 19:27), and this prohibition explains the "prayer-locks" in front of the ears of Orthodox Jewish men today.

The word hair is used in several figurative contexts: "not a hair of his head will fall to the ground" (1 Sam. 14:45); "my sins...are more than the hairs of my head" (Ps. 40:12). Hair was a mark of beauty and sometimes of pride. A_BSALOM's hair (2 Sam. 14:26; 18:9), of which he was inordinately proud, caused his death. S_AMSON's uncut hair was a symbol of his N_AZIRITE dedication; and when he lost his hair, his strength went with it (Jdg. 13:7; 16:17-20). In NT times the length of the hair was one mark of distinction between the sexes, and P_AUL said that nature teaches that long hair is a shame for a man but a glory for a woman (1 Cor. 11:14-16).

Hakaliah. hak´uh-li´uh. TNIV form of H_{ACALIAH}.

Hakeldamah. See A_{KELDAMA}.

Hakilah. huh-ki´luh (Heb. ḥākîlâ H2677, meaning uncertain). A hill in the wilderness of JUDAH, S of JESHIMON, where the strongholds of HORESH were located; there DAVID took refuge when SAUL pursued him (1 Sam. 23:19; 26:1). Saul pitched his camp on the hill (26:3). It is described as being within the wilderness of ZIPH (23:19), which is a few miles SE of HEBRON, but the site has not been identified.

Hakkatan. hak´uh-tan (Heb. haqqāṭān H2214, “the little one”). Father of Johanan and descendant of Azgad; Johanan was one of the family heads who returned to Jerusalem with EZRA (Ezra 8:12).

Hakkore. See E_N HAKKORE.

Hakkoz. hak´oz (Heb. haqqôṣ H2212, “the thorn”). KJV Koz (except in 1 Chr. 24:10). The head of a priestly family at the time of DAVID (1 Chr. 24:10). His descendants returned from the Babylonian captivity, but could not serve because they were unable to document their claim to priestly rank (Ezra 2:61; Neh. 7:63). One of his descendants, MEREMOTH, was involved in repairing the wall of Jerusalem (Neh. 3:4, 21).

Hakmoni. hak´moh-ni. TNIV form of H_{ACMONI}.

Hakupha. huh-kyoo´fuh (Heb. ḥāqûpā H2979, “crooked”). Ancestor of a family of temple servants (NETHINIM) who returned from exile with ZERUBBABEL (Ezra 2:51; Neh. 7:53).

Halachah. See H_{ALAKAH}.

Halah. hay´luh (Heb. ḥālāḥ H2712). One of the places to which kings of ASSYRIA deported Israelites on the capture of SAMARIA (2 Ki. 17:6; 18:11; 1 Chr. 5:26).

Halah was apparently on the way to GOZAN, but its location is uncertain. Among various proposals, one that has gained favor is Ḥalabbu, the name of a town and a district NE of NINEVEH. The name Halah occurs also as a conjecture in the NRSV (Obad. 20).

Halak, Mount. hay'lak (Heb. ḥālāq H2748, “smooth” or “bare”). A mountain in the NEGEV described as rising toward SEIR; it formed the southern limit of the conquests of JOSHUA (Josh. 11:17; 12:7). Many scholars identify it with Jebel Halaq, on the NW side of the Wadi Marra, and some 28 mi. (45 km.) SE of BEERSHEBA.

Halakah. hah'lah-kah' (Heb. hālākâ, “walk, practice, ruling, law,” from hālak H2143, “to go, walk, behave”). Also Halacha(h), Halakhah; pl. halakot(h), halakhot(h). This term in rabbinic studies can refer either to a specific legal ruling (in which case the word is usually lowercased) or to the general literary category of legal material, contrasted with HAGGADAH. The concept thus encompasses all the laws, ordinances, and legal decisions of the rabbis that determined the Jewish way of life—religious, social, political, and civil. It was believed by the PHARISEES and their followers that God had given to MOSES on Mount SINAI not only the written law that was embodied in the PENTATEUCH, but also a large mass of oral law which he communicated to the Jewish people and which the rabbis passed on until it was written down in the Mishnah. See TALMUD. The object of the Halakah, which involved the interpretation and the reinterpretation of the Mosaic law through a long succession of Jewish teachers from the time of EZRA onward, was to state in detail and to apply to all possible cases the principles laid down in the TORAH.

half-shekel. See MONEY.

half-tribe of Manasseh. See MANASSEH.

Halhul. hal'huhl (Heb. ḥalḥûl H2713, derivation uncertain). A town in the hill country of the tribe of JUDAH, listed first in a district of six towns (Josh. 15:58). It is identified with modern Ḥalḥul, 4 mi. (6 km.) N of HEBRON.

Hali. hay`li (Heb. ḥālī H2718, “adornment”). A town in the tribal territory of ASHER, listed between HELKATH and BETEN (Josh. 19:25). The site is now identified with Khirbet Ras ʿAli (or a location nearby), some 11 mi. (18 km.) SSE of ACCO.

hall. This English term is used variously in Bible translations to render several words and expressions. Among the buildings SOLOMON erected after the completion of the TEMPLE was “the Hall of Pillars” (NRSV, 1 Ki. 7:6; NIV, “a colonnade”), the purpose of which is not stated. Apparently, one went through it to reach “the throne hall, the Hall of Justice” (NIV), where Solomon sat in judgment on cases brought before him. The royal palace in SUSA, the winter capital of the Persian kings, included a structure called “the king’s hall” (Esth. 5:1; lit., “the house of the king,” which is rendered “the king’s palace” earlier in the same verse). The banquet hall (Dan. 5:10) where King BELSHAZZAR saw the handwriting on the wall was in BABYLON, which for centuries was one of the great cities of antiquity. The author of the Acts of the Apostles says that when Jews in EPHESUS rejected and opposed PAUL’s message, he left the synagogue where he had been teaching for three months and went to the “lecture hall” of TYRANNUS, where the apostle taught daily for two years (Acts 19:9). This hall was probably a part of some GYMNASIUM, which normally included not only areas for exercise and sports, but also gardens and halls that were made use of by teachers, poets, and philosophers for giving recitations and lectures.

Hallel. hal'el (Heb. hallēl, from hālal H2146, piel, “to praise”). Rabbinic term for several groups of psalms of praise. The expression Great Hallel usually denotes Ps. 136, though it can refer to Ps. 120-136. “Hallel” can be applied also to Ps. 146-148, but the most significant group is the Egyptian Hallel, Ps. 113-118. These psalms were recited in Jewish homes during the course of the Passover observance and in public temple and synagogue services for various FEASTS. It doubtless played its customary role in the Lord’s last Passover observance with his disciples (cf. Matt. 26:30).

hallelujah. hal'uh-loo'yuh (Heb. halēlû [from hālal H2146, piel, “to praise”] and yāh H3363 [short form of Yahweh]; Gk. hallēlouia G252). A Hebrew expression that is invariably translated “Praise the LORD”; the corresponding Greek term in the NT is transliterated “hallelujah” (KJV, “alleluia”). In the OT text, the expression consists of two words. When it was borrowed by Greek and other languages, however, it was treated as one word. Hallelujah, like AMEN, has practically become a universal word. It is an acclamation of PRAISE of the highest order. Its use is limited altogether to songs of praise, appearing only in Psalms and Revelation.

Hallohesh. huh-loh'hesh (Heb. hallôḥēš H2135, “the whisperer”). Father of SHALLUM; the latter was “ruler of a half-district of Jerusalem” in the time of NEHEMIAH and repaired a section of the walls of Jerusalem (Neh. 3:12; KJV, “Haloresh”). This Hallohesh is probably the same man listed among those who sealed the covenant with Nehemiah (10:24).

hallow. To render or treat as holy, to sanctify or consecrate. This English term is used over thirty times in the KJV but is less common in modern versions. The NIV uses it only in the context of the LORD’S PRAYER (Matt. 6:9; Lk. 11:1). See CONSECRATION; DEDICATION; HOLINESS; SANCTIFICATION.

Haloresh. KJV form of HALLOHESH.

Ham (person). ham (Heb. ḥām H2769, possibly “warm, hot”). Also Cham (some older English versions). Second son of NOAH and brother of SHEM and JAPHETH (Gen. 5:32; 6:10; 7:13; 9:18, 22; 10:1, 6, 20; 1 Chr. 1:4, 8). Ham had four sons, CUSH, MIZRAIM (Egypt), PUT, and CANAAN (Gen. 10:6). He is identified as the ancestor of the Egyptians and of the peoples who were under the control of EGYPT in NE Africa, ARABIA, and CANAAN (with the exception of NIMROD). His name serves also as the patronymic of his descendants (Ps. 78:51; 105:23, 27; 106:22; possibly also 1 Chr. 4:40 [NIV, “Hamites,” supplied also in v. 41], but this reference may allude to an otherwise unknown place). The term Hamitic was commonly used in the past to designate a group of languages in N Africa, including Egyptian, that are related to the Semitic languages (the label Hamito-Semitic is seldom used today by scholars, who prefer the term Afroasiatic). According to Gen. 9:20-25, Noah became intoxicated, and he lay uncovered in a drunken stupor; Ham saw him and told his brothers. When Noah awoke and learned what had happened, he cursed Ham’s son Canaan and said that his descendants would be the slaves of the descendants of Shem and Japheth.

Ham (place). ham (Heb. hām H2154). The name of a city whose inhabitants, the ZUZITES, were subdued by KEDORLAOMER and his allies in the time of ABRAHAM (Gen. 14:5). The site is usually identified with modern Tell Ham in N Jordan.

Haman. hay’muhn (Heb. hāmān H2172, possibly from Old Pers. hamanā, “illustrious”). Son of Hammedatha and prime minister of PERSIA under XERXES (Esth. 3:1 et al.). He is also called the Agagite, a name that links him with the king of the AMALEKITES that SAUL was told to destroy (1 Sam. 15). Haman became the bitter enemy of MORDECAI, the uncle of ESTHER, because Mordecai, being a Jew, would not prostrate himself before him like the other subjects of the king (Esth. 3:2). He therefore determined in revenge not only to kill Mordecai but also to exterminate all the Jews in the Persian empire, and received from Xerxes a decree to do this (3:8-9). Through the intervention of Esther, however, the people were saved, and Haman died on the very gallows he had prepared for Mordecai.

Hamath. hay’math (Heb. ḥāmāt H2828, possibly “fortress”; gentilic ḥāmātī H2833, “Hamathite”). KJV also Hemath (1 Chr. 13:5; Amos 6:14). A city of SYRIA (ARAM) c. 120 mi. (190 km.) N of DAMASCUS. One of the most ancient surviving cities on earth, Hamath was built on both banks of the ORONTES River; it was surrounded by hills and had a warm and humid climate. In the days of DAVID, Hamath had a king of its own (2 Sam. 8:9). JEROBOAM II, the last powerful king of the northern tribes (2 Ki. 14:23-28), recovered Hamath for Israel. The city has had a checkered history for thousands of years. For a time it was under the power of Assyria (18:34), later under the power of Babylonia (Jer. 39:5). Still later ANTIOCHUS Epiphanes of Syria (c. 175-164 B.C.) renamed it Epiphaneia after himself. Today it is largely Muslim but has a large admixture of Christians. The city is dominated by its citadel hill, which no doubt contains layers of many different civilizations.

Hamath, entrance of. This (or a similar) expression is used by some Bible versions to render a Hebrew phrase which is better regarded as a place name, LEBO HAMATH (Num. 13:21 et al.).

Hamathite. hay'muh-thit (Heb. ḥāmātî H2833). The Hamathites are listed as a nation descended from CANAAN (Gen. 10:18; 1 Chr. 1:16). Presumably, they were early settlers of the city of HAMATH.

Hamath Zobah. hay'math-zoh'buh (Heb. ḥāmāt ṣôbâ H2832, possibly “fortress of Zobah”). A city conquered by SOLOMON, apparently near TADMOR in the region of HAMATH (2 Chr. 8:3). Some have identified Hamath Zobah with the city of Hamath itself, while others have conjectured that it is a different city also called Hamath, but situated in the territory of ZOBAB, an ARAMEAN kingdom that Assyrian records say reached as far as the EUPHRATES. It is also possible that the double name simply indicates the extent of Solomon's conquests, that is, the combined regions of Hamath and Zobah.

Hammath (person). ham'ath (Heb. ḥammat H2830, possibly “hot [spring]”). A man included in the genealogy of CALEB and described as the father of the house of RECAB; he was the ancestor of the KENITES (1 Chr. 2:55; KJV, “Hemath”). Some scholars connect, or even identify, Hammath with the city of the same name; see HAMMATH (PLACE).

Hammath (place). ham'ath (Heb. ḥammat H2829, “hot [spring]”). A fortified city in the tribal territory of NAPHTHALI (Josh. 19:35). It is probably the same as HAMMON #2 (1 Chr. 6:76) and HAMMOTH DOR (Josh. 21:32). Hammath is generally identified with the modern Ḥammam Ṭabariyeh, famous for its hot baths, c. 2 mi. (3 km.) S of TIBERIAS on the W shore of the Sea of Galilee.

Hammedatha. ham'uh-day'thuh (Heb. hammēdātā H2158, possibly from Pers. amadāta, “strongly made”). The father of HAMAN, who was the chief minister of XERXES and a bitter enemy of the Jews (Esth. 3:1, 10; 8:5; 9:10, 24).

Hammelech. ham'uh-lek. KJV transliteration of a Hebrew word that should be rendered “the king” (Jer. 36:26; 38:6).

hammer. Marks on building stones and other evidences indicate that the type of hammers available in the ancient world corresponded roughly to the types still used in the Near E today. The Hebrew term maqqebet H5216, refers to a relatively small tool used for driving nails and pegs (Jdg. 4:21), dressing surfaces of building stone (1 Ki. 6:7), and decorating wooden idols (Jer. 10:4; metal idols, Isa. 44:12). Another term, paṭṭîš H7079, is once used for the large sledge hammer used to crack boulders (Jer. 23:29) and once for a blacksmith's hammer (Isa. 41:7); it is also used figuratively of Babylon's earth-shaking role as the “hammer of the whole earth” (Jer. 50:23).

Hammolecheth. See HAMMOLEKETH.

Hammoleketh. ha-mol'uh-keth (Heb. hammōleket H2168, “the queen”). Also Hammolecheth. Daughter of MAKIR by his wife MAACAH and granddaughter of MANASSEH; she is described as the sister of GILEAD and as having given birth to three children (1 Chr. 7:18).

Hammon. ham'uhn (Heb. ḥammôn H2785, possibly “hot [spring]”). (1) A town included in the boundary description of the tribe of ASHER (Josh. 19:28). The location of Hammon has been debated, but most scholars identify it with modern Khirbet Umm el-^cAwamid in Lebanon, about 14.5 mi. (23 km.) NNE of ACCO.

(2) A Levitical town in the tribal territory of NAPHTALI; it was assigned to the LEVITES descended from GERSHON (1 Chr. 6:76). This Hammon is generally identified with Hammath (Josh. 19:35) and Hammoth Dor (21:32), on the W shore of the Sea of Galilee. See further HAMMATH (PLACE).

Hammoth Dor. ham'uhth-dor' (Heb. ḥammōt dō r H2831, “hot [spring] of Dor”). A Levitical town in the tribal territory of NAPHTALI; it was assigned to the LEVITES descended from GERSHON (Josh. 21:32). Hammoth Dor is probably an alternate name for Hammath (Josh. 19:35) and Hammon (1 Chr. 6:76), on the W shore of the Sea of Galilee. See further HAMMATH (PLACE).

Hammuel. ham'yoo-uhl (Heb. ḥammû ʾēl H2781, meaning uncertain). KJV Hamuel. Son of Mishma and descendant of SIMEON through Shaul (1 Chr. 4:26).

Hammurabi. ham'uh-rah'bee (Akk. ḥammu [“Sun” or “kinsman” or “nation”] + rabi [“great, vast”] or rapi [“healing”]). Also Hammurapi. This name was borne by several individuals in the ANE, but special importance attaches to the sixth king of the first dynasty of BABYLON, who brought that city to its century-and-a-half rule over S Mesopotamia, known as the Old Babylonian Kingdom. He was an AMORITE, the name given to a Semitic group that invaded the FERTILE CRESCENT about 2000 B.C., destroying its civilization and establishing their own Semitic culture. The widely accepted date for his reign is 1792-1750 B.C. (suggested alternatives include 1728-1686 and 1642-1626). Hammurabi is not mentioned in the Bible, although some earlier scholars thought that he should be identified with AMRAPHEL (Gen. 14:1, 9).

Hammurabi made Babylon one of the great cities of the ancient world. Archaeologists have discovered that its streets were laid out in straight lines that intersect approximately at right angles, an innovation that bears witness to city planning and strong central government, both little known in Babylon before this time. MARDUK, the god of Babylon, now became the head of the pantheon, and his temple, Etemenanki, became one of the wonders of the ancient world. Many letters written by Hammurabi have been found. These show his close attention to the details of his realm and enable us to call him an energetic and benevolent ruler.

Hammurabi began the first golden age of Babylon—the second being that of NEBUCHADNEZZAR, over a thousand years later. He systematically unified all of the old world of Sumer and Akkad (S Mesopotamia) under his strongly centralized government. The prologue to his famous law code describes his administration: "Anu and Enlil [the sky and storm gods] named me to promote the welfare of the people, me, Hammurabi, the devout, god-fearing prince, to cause justice to prevail in the land, to destroy the wicked and the evil, that the strong might not oppress the weak, to rise like the sun over the black-headed [people], and to light up the land. Hammurabi the shepherd, called by Enlil, am I; the one who makes affluence and plenty abound...the one who revived Uruk, who supplied water in abundance to its people; the one who brings joy to Borsippa...who stores up grain for mighty Urash...the savior of his people from distress, who establishes in security their portion in the midst of Babylon...that justice might be dealt the orphan and the widow....I established the law and justice in the language of the land, thereby promoting the welfare of the people."

By far Hammurabi's most famous claim to fame is his law code. The code is inscribed on a magnificent stele of black diorite, 8 ft. (2.5 m.) high, found at ^{SUSA} in 1902. Formerly it had stood in Babylon, but the Elamites carried it off when they conquered Babylon in the twelfth century B.C. It is now in the Louvre in Paris. At the top of the stele is a finely sculptured scene showing Hammurabi standing before the sun god Shamash (the patron of law and justice), who is seated and is giving the laws to Hammurabi. Beneath the scene the laws are inscribed in beautiful cuneiform characters in fifty-one columns of text.

It is now known that Hammurabi's was not the first attempt to systematize the laws of Babylonia. Fragments of several previous law codes have been found. Ur-nammu of Ur and Lipit-Ishtar of Isin both promulgated earlier codes, and another was known in Eshnunna. But Hammurabi's code is the most complete expression of early Babylonian law, and undoubtedly incorporated many laws and customs that went back to far earlier times. Hammurabi did not invent these laws; he codified them. The monument contains not only the code, but also a prologue and an epilogue, which narrates his glory and that of the gods whom he worshiped, blessed those who would respect his inscription, and cursed future vandals who might deface it.

The law code itself included nearly three hundred paragraphs of legal provisions concerning commercial, social, domestic, and moral life. There are regulations governing such matters as liability for (and exemption from) military service, control of trade in alcoholic drinks, banking and usury, and the responsibility of a man toward his wife and children, including the liability of a husband for the payment of his wife's debts. Hammurabi's code was harsher for upper-class offenders than on a commoner committing the same offense. Death was the penalty not only for homicide but also for theft, adultery, and bearing false witness in cases involving the accused's life. But the graded penalties show a great advance on primitive laws, and contemporary legal texts show that the harsher penalties were rarely exacted.

Women's rights were safeguarded. A neglected wife could obtain a divorce. A concubine who had become a mother was entitled to the restitution of whatever she had brought with her or a pecuniary indemnity appropriate to her social position. If a house fell on its owner or a doctor injured a patient, the one who built the house or treated the patient might suffer death, mutilation, or at least a heavy fine.

Students of the Bible are especially interested in the comparison of Hammurabi's code with the Mosaic legislation of the Bible. There are many similarities. In both a false witness is to be punished with the penalty he had thought to bring on the other person. Kidnapping and breaking into another person's house were capital offenses in both. The biblical law of DIVORCE permits a man to put away his wife, but does not extend to her the same right as did Hammurabi. Both codes agree in prescribing the death penalty for ADULTERY. The principle of retaliation, on which a number of Hammurabi's laws were based, is vividly stated in Exod. 21:23-25.

How are these similarities to be explained? It is obvious that Hammurabi could not have borrowed from MOSES, for Moses lived several centuries after Hammurabi. Direct borrowing in the other direction also seems very unlikely. Most scholars today agree that the similarities are to be explained by the common background of the Hebrews and Babylonians. Both were Semitic peoples, inheriting their customs and laws from their common ancestors. At first this explanation seems to run counter to the biblical claim that Moses' law was given by divine REVELATION. A closer examination of the PENTATEUCH will show that the Hebrews, before they came to SINAI, followed many of the regulations set forth in the law (e.g., penalties against murder, adultery, fornication, Gen. 9:6 and 38:24; the levirate law, 38:8; clean and unclean animals, 8:20; Sabbath, 2:3 and Exod. 16:23, 25-29). Moses' law consisted of things both old and new. What was old (the customs the Hebrews received from their ancient Semitic ancestors) was here formally incorporated into the nation's constitution. Much is new, especially the high view of the nature of God and the idea that law is an expression of this nature (Lev. 19:2).

Hamonah. huh-moh'nuh (Heb. hāmônâ H2164, "roaring" or "horde"). The name of a city in the symbolical valley of HAMON GOG, where the defeated armies of GOG will be buried (Ezek. 39:16). The Hebrew clause is problematic, and some scholars emend the text.

Hamon Gog. hay'-muhn-gog' (Heb. hāmôn gôg H2163, "horde of Gog"). The name of "the valley of those who travel east toward the Sea"; this place will be named Hamon Gog because there the forces of GOG will be destroyed and buried (Ezek. 39:11, 15). The valley is said to be "in Israel" and—if the NIV rendering "toward the Sea" is correct—probably located W of the DEAD SEA (perhaps alluding to the ESDRAELON Valley). However, the NRSV translates, "the Valley of the Travelers [Heb. hā ʿōbērîm] east of the sea" (cf. also TNIV), which suggests a place in TRANSJORDAN (unless "the sea" refers to the MEDITERRANEAN). If so, the allusion may be to the ABARIM mountain range in MOAB. Given the symbolic nature of the passage, it is likely that the prophet does not intend a specific known site. See TRAVELERS, VALLEY OF.

Hamor. hay'mor (Heb. hāmôr H2791, "[male] donkey"). The father of SHECHEM; he is called a HIVITE (Gen. 33:19; 34:2 et al.). When JACOB returned from PADDAN ARAM, he bought a piece of ground from the sons of Hamor (this plot of land would later become the burial place of JOSEPH, Josh. 24:32; in Acts 7:16 [KJV, "Emmor"]), the purchase is attributed to ABRAHAM, perhaps a telescoping of two events). DINAH, Jacob's daughter, was violated by Shechem, and in revenge the sons of Jacob slew Hamor, Shechem, and all the males of the city (Gen. 34). During the period of the judges, the inhabitants of the city of Shechem were called "men of Hamor" (Jdg. 9:28); they suffered a severe defeat from ABIMELECH, a ruler of the Israelites.

hamstring. To cripple by cutting the leg tendons (KJV, "hough"). This cruel treatment of animals, justified only by extreme necessity, is alluded to several times in the OT (Gen. 49:6; Josh. 11:6, 9; 2 Sam. 8:4; 1 Chr. 18:4).

Hamuel. See HAMMUEL.

Hamul. hay'muhl (Heb. hāmûl H2783, possibly "spared" or "pitied"; gentilic hāmûlî H2784, "Hamulite"). Son of PEREZ, grandson of JUDAH, and ancestral head of the Hamulite clan (Gen. 46:12; Num. 26:21; 1 Chr. 2:5).

Hamutal. huh-myoo'tuhl (Heb. ḥāmûṭal H2782, possibly “my father-in-law is dew [or protection]”; cf. ABITAL). The mother of JEHOAHAZ and ZEDEKIAH, kings of Judah; she was the daughter of a certain Jeremiah of Libnah and the wife of King JOSIAH (2 Ki. 23:31; 24:18; Jer. 52:1).

Hanameel. See HANAMEL.

Hanamel. han'uh-mel (Heb. ḥānam ʿēl H2856, “God is gracious”). KJV Hanameel. Son of Shallum and cousin of JEREMIAH the prophet (Jer. 32:7-9). Hanamel owned a field in ANATHOTH, and when Jerusalem was besieged, he asked Jeremiah, as nearest relative, to buy it (cf. Lev. 25:25).

Hanan. hay'nuhn (Heb. ḥānān H2860, prob. short form of ELHANAN or HANANEL, “God is gracious,” or a similar name). (1) Son of Shashak and descendant of BENJAMIN; listed among the heads of families who lived in JERUSALEM (1 Chr. 8:23; cf. v. 28). His genealogical connection is unclear.

(2) Son of Azel and descendant of King SAUL (1 Chr. 8:38; 9:44).

(3) Son of Maacah, included among DAVID's mighty men (1 Chr. 11:43).

(4) Son of Igdaliah; Hanan is described as “the man of God” (although this epithet perhaps applies to Igdaliah), and his sons occupied a chamber in the temple into which JEREMIAH brought the family of the RECABITES (Jer. 35:4).

(5) Ancestor of a family of temple servants (NETHINIM) who returned to Palestine after the EXILE (Ezra 2:46; Neh. 7:49).

(6) A LEVITE who helped EZRA instruct the people in the law (Neh. 8:7); he is probably the Hanan listed among the Levites who sealed the covenant (10:10). Some believe he is also the same as #9 below.

(7-8) Two leaders of the people who sealed the covenant (Neh. 10:22).

(9) Son of Zaccur; NEHEMIAH appointed him as assistant to those who were in charge of the temple storerooms (Neh. 13:13). See also #6 above.

Modern reconstruction of the Antonia Fortress, possibly built on the location of the Tower of Hananel. (View to the NW from the temple court.)

Hananel, Tower of. han´uh-nel (Heb. ḥānan ʾēl H2861, “God is gracious”). KJV Hananeel. The name of a tower on the N wall of JERUSALEM, between the FISH GATE and the Tower of the HUNDRED, not far from the SHEEP GATE (Neh. 3:1; 12:39). The Tower of Hananel must have been a significant landmark, for it is mentioned in two prophetic passages that deal with the rebuilding of Jerusalem (Jer. 31:38; Zech. 14:10). Its precise location is uncertain.

Hanani. huh-nay´ni (Heb. ḥānānî H2862, prob. short form of HANANIAH, “Yahweh is gracious”). (1) Father of the prophet JEHU (1 Ki. 16:1, 7; 2 Chr. 19:2; 20:34). Described as “the seer,” Hanani rebuked King ASA for relying on the ARAMEANS; the king “was so enraged that he put him in prison” (2 Chr. 16:7-10).

(2) Son of HEMAN, DAVID’s seer (1 Chr. 25:4). Hanani and his thirteen brothers were set apart “for the ministry of prophesying, accompanied by harps, lyres and cymbal” (v. 1). When lots were cast to determine the duties of the Levitical singers, he, along with his sons and relatives, received the eighteenth lot (v. 25).

(3) One of the descendants of IMMER who agreed to put away their foreign wives in the time of EZRA (Ezra 10:20).

(4) A brother (or relative) of NEHEMIAH who brought news to SUSA of the distressing condition of the Jews in Palestine (Neh. 1:2). He was subsequently made one of the governors of Jerusalem (7:2).

(5) A musician who took part in the dedication of the walls of Jerusalem after the return from exile (Neh. 12:36). Some have suggested that this Hanani is the same as #3 or #4 above.

Hananiah. han'uh-ni'uh (Heb. ḥānanyā H2863, “Yahweh is gracious”). A popular Jewish name, especially after the EXILE. It is possible that some of the references in EZRA and NEHEMIAH treated separately in this article speak of the same individual.

(1) Son of ZERUBBABEL and father of Pelatiah and Jeshaiah (1 Chr. 3:19, 21).

(2) Son of Shashak and descendant of BENJAMIN; listed among the heads of families who lived in Jerusalem (1 Chr. 8:24; cf. v. 28).

(3) Son of HEMAN, DAVID's seer (1 Chr. 25:4). Hananiah and his thirteen brothers were set apart “for the ministry of prophesying, accompanied by harps, lyres and cymbal” (v. 1). When lots were cast to determine the duties of the Levitical singers, he, along with his sons and relatives, received the sixteenth lot (v. 23).

(4) A royal official under King UZZIAH of Judah; under his direction, Jeiel the secretary and Maa-seiah the officer mustered the army (2 Chr. 26:11).

(5) Son of Azzur and a false prophet who opposed JEREMIAH (Jer. 28). A native of GIBEON, Hananiah prophesied that King JECONIAH and the Jewish captives in Babylon would soon return to Jerusalem, bringing with them the vessels of the temple that NEBUCHADNEZZAR had carried away. In reply, Jeremiah told him that he would die within the year because he had made the people believe a lie. Jeremiah's words were fulfilled when Hananiah died in the seventh month of that year.

(6) Father of a certain Zedekiah; the latter was one of the high officials of Judah under King JEHOIAKIM (Jer. 36:12).

(7) Father of Shelemiah and grandfather of Irijah (Jer. 37:13); the latter was captain of the guard and arrested JEREMIAH on the charge of intending to desert to the Babylonians.

(8) One of the companions of DANIEL; his name was changed to SHADRACH by the Babylonians (Dan. 1:6-7).

(9) One of the descendants of Bebai who agreed to put away their foreign wives in the time of Ezra (Ezra 10:28).

(10) A perfume-maker who helped Nehemiah rebuild the wall of Jerusalem (Neh. 3:8).

(11) Son of Shelemiah; he helped repair the wall above the HORSE GATE (Neh. 3:30). This Hananiah may be the same as #10 above.

(12) Commander of the citadel in Jerusalem. Described as “a man of integrity” who “feared God more than most men do,” he was appointed joint ruler of the city along with Hanani, Nehemiah's brother (Neh. 7:2).

(13) A leader of the people who sealed the covenant with Nehemiah (Neh. 10:23).

(14) Head of the priestly family of Jeremiah in the days of JOIAKIM the high priest (Neh. 12:12). He is probably the same priest who played the trumpet at the dedication of the walls of Jerusalem (v. 41).

hand. One of the most frequently used words in Scripture, occurring over 1,600 times. Besides its literal use, it occurs in many figurative senses as well. It very often stands for power (Gen. 9:2). To put one's hand under another's thigh (24:2, 9; 47:29) meant to take a solemn oath, evidently related to covenant obligations; to put one's hand on the head meant blessing (48:14) and signified ordination (1 Tim. 4:14; 2 Tim. 1:6).

In the OT the hand is also the symbol of personal agency. When the Lord is said to stretch out his hand, it means that he is taking personal action in whatever case or situation is involved, and this usage carries over into the NT (e.g., 1 Sam. 5:11; Jn. 10:29; Acts 4:30). Correspondingly, for human beings the hand signifies a person in action (e.g., 1 Sam. 26:23); and we should understand in this light the idiom by which the Hebrew expresses the consecration of priests to their holy duties: "to consecrate" is "to fill the hand" (e.g., Exod. 29:9 Heb.; NIV, "ordain"), that is, to dedicate every capacity of personal action for the service and use of the Lord.

To be placed at the right hand of royalty is a high honor and, of course, at "the right hand" of God is incomparably higher. "The LORD says to my Lord: 'Sit at my right hand'" (Ps. 110:1), showing the supreme position of the Son of God. When he judges the nations (Matt. 25:31-46), separating "sheep" from "goats," "he will put the sheep on his right [hand] and the goats on his left," showing that the left hand is equally the place of dishonor. In a trial the accuser stood at the right hand of the accused, as is shown in Zech. 3:1, where Satan is the accuser; but our Advocate stands also at our right hand to defend us (Ps. 16:8; 109:31).

handbreadth. This term indicates a measurement of about three inches based on the width of the hand at the base of the four fingers (cf. Jer. 52:21). Three handbreadths equaled a span, and six handbreadths a cubit, but the long cubit had an extra handbreadth (Ezek. 40:5; see WEIGHTS AND MEASURES). The term is used metaphorically for the brevity of man's life (Ps. 39:5).

handicraft. See OCCUPATIONS AND PROFESSIONS.

handkerchief. This English term is used once to render Greek soudarion G5051 (from Lat. sudarium, “face-cloth,” Acts 19:12). The reference is probably to “sweat rags” tied by PAUL about his head while active as a leather worker; these were brought to sick people in EPHESUS for healing purposes. The Greek term can also refer to the cloth used as a face or head covering (Jn. 11:44; 20:7; KJV, “napkin”), and more generally of any “piece of cloth” (Lk. 19:20).

handle. This English term, as noun or verb, is used variously in Bible translations to render several words and expressions (e.g. 1 Ki. 7:34 NIV; Isa. 10:15 NRSV; Lk. 24:39 KJV). Some passages include the term “handle” as a part of an idiom (Prov. 16:20 KJV; 2 Tim. 2:15 NIV).

handmaid, handmaiden. Term used by the KJV to render words that are better translated “maidservant” (NIV) or “slave-girl” (NRSV) or simply “servant” (cf. Gen. 16:1; Jdg. 19:19; Acts 2:18). These terms are sometimes used by women with reference to themselves as an expression of humility (e.g., Ruth 2:13; 1 Sam. 1:11; Lk. 1:38). See also MAID.

hands, imposition of. See LAYING ON OF HANDS.

handwriting. See WRITING.

Hanes. hay’neez (Heb. ḥānēs H2865). An Egyptian city, mentioned with ZOAN (Tanis), in a passage that condemns those who look for protection from PHARAOH (Isa. 30:4). It is probably to be identified with Heracleopolis Magna, capital of the northern part of Upper EGYPT, about 50 mi. (80 km.) S of MEMPHIS and just S of the Fayum.

hanging. Death by hanging is mentioned several times in the Bible (e.g., Esth. 2:23 et al.). In the case of AHITHOPHEL (2 Sam. 17:23) and JUDAS ISCARIOT (Matt. 27:5), it was self-inflicted. In some passages, however, the terms used denote impaling, gibbeting, or crucifixion (see CROSS). This often was done to the corpse after death (Gen. 40:19, 22; 41:13; Deut. 21:22; Lam. 5:12) but not always. Ezra 6:11 indicates that a living man was to be impaled and left to die. PAUL asserts that Jesus became a curse by being hung upon a tree (Gal. 3:13, quoting from Deut. 21:23), his point being that Jesus bore the accursed death due to sin vicariously, so that those who deserved it could be set free.

Haniel. See HANNIEL.

Hannah. han´uh (Heb. ḥannâ H2839, “grace, favor”). One of the two wives of ELKANAH. Peninnah, the other wife (1 Sam. 1:2), had children; but Hannah was barren for a long time and, as is common in polygamous households, “her rival kept provoking her” (1:6). The fact that Elkanah loved Hannah and gave her a double portion (1:5) only increased the hatred and jealousy in Peninnah’s heart. Hannah, however, was a godly woman, and she prayed for a son and vowed to give him to the Lord as a perpetual NAZIRITE (1:11). The priest ELI saw Hannah’s lips moving in silent prayer and rebuked her for what he thought was drunkenness. She replied very humbly and Eli apologized. The family returned home; Hannah conceived and became the mother of SAMUEL, the great prophet of Israel and the last of the judges. Hannah’s praise (2:1-10) shows that she was a deeply spiritual woman. Mary’s song, “the Magnificat,” resembles Hannah’s (Lk. 1:46-55). Mary, like Hannah, praised God when she was expecting a baby by miraculous conception. Each woman rejoiced in the Lord; each expressed in marvelous fashion God’s way of dealing with the proud and with the humble (cf. Ps. 113:7-9).

Hannathon. han´uh-thon (Heb. ḥannātôn H2872, apparently from ḥēn H2834, “charm, favor”). A town on the N border of the tribal territory of ZEBULUN (Josh. 19:14). Located on a major highway, Hannathon is mentioned in extrabiblical sources. It is identified with modern Tell el-Bedeiwiye, about 2 mi. (3 km.) W of NAZARETH.

Hanniel. han´ee-uhl (Heb. ḥannî ʾēl H2848, “God was gracious”). KJV also Haniel (1 Chr. 7:39). (1) Son of Ephod; he was a leader from the tribe of MANASSEH, chosen to assist in the distribution of the land (Num. 34:23).

(2) Son of Ulla and descendant of ASHER, included among the “heads of families, choice men, brave warriors and outstanding leaders” (1 Chr. 7:39-40).

Hanoch. hay´nok (Heb. ḥănôk H2840, possibly “dedicated” or “initiated” [see ENOCH]; gentilic ḥănôkî H2854, “Hanochite”). TNIV Hanok. (1) Son of MIDIAN and grandson of ABRAHAM by KETURAH (Gen. 25:4; 1 Chr. 1:33 [KJV, “Henoch”]). The name may be related to a location in ARABIA.

(2) Eldest son of REUBEN, grandson of JACOB, and ancestor of the Hanochite clan (Gen. 46:9; Exod. 6:14; Num. 26:5; 1 Chr. 5:3).

Hanok. hay'nok. TNIV form of HANOCH.

Hanukkah. hah'nuh-kuh (Heb. ḥănukkâ H2853, “dedication”). See DEDICATION, FEAST OF.

Hanun. hay'nuhn (Heb. ḥānûn H2842, “favored”). (1) Son and successor of NAHASH, king of the Ammonites (2 Sam. 10:1-4; 1 Chr. 19:1-6; see AMMON). Upon the death of Nahash, DAVID sent a message of condolence to Hanun. This gesture was misinterpreted, and the messengers were grossly insulted and dishonored. The result was a war that David waged against Hanun, and the Ammonites lost their independence. David appointed the brother of Hanun, SHOBI, in his place (2 Sam. 17:27).

(2) Son of Zalaph; after the return from EXILE, he assisted in repairing the VALLEY GATE in JERUSALEM and about 500 yards of the wall (Neh. 3:13, 30; according to some scholars, however, these passages refer to two different men).

Hapharaim. haf'uh-ray'im (Heb. ḥăpārayim H2921, “two pits”). KJV Haphraim (some editions). A town on the frontier of the tribal territory of ISSACHAR, listed after SHUNEM (Josh. 19:19). Its location is debated.

Hapiru. See HABIRU.

happiness. See JOY.

Happizzez. hap'uh-zez (Heb. happiṣṣēṣ H2204, apparently piel form of pāṣaṣ H7207 [polel, “to shatter”] with definite article). The leader of a priestly family whom DAVID appointed by lot as the head of the eighteenth division for temple duties (1 Chr. 24:15; KJV, “Aphses”). The name Happizzez may be a clan designation, possibly connected with the town of BETH PAZZEZ.

Hara. hair´uh (Heb. hārā H2217, perhaps related to har H2215, “mountain”). One of the places to which TIGLATH-PILESER, the king of Assyria, exiled the tribes of Reuben, Gad, and half of Manasseh in 734-732 B.C. (1 Chr. 5:26). It is mentioned along with HALAH, HABOR, and the river GOZAN—all places in N MESOPOTAMIA. Several identifications have been proposed, but the name Hara is omitted in the SEPTUAGINT, and it is also missing in the Hebrew text of the parallel passages (2 Ki. 17:6; 18:11). Many scholars believe that the text in Chronicles is corrupt, and several emendations have been suggested.

Haradah. huh-ray´duh (Heb. ḥārādāh H3011, “[place of] fear”). A camping station in the wilderness journeys of the Israelites (Num. 33:24-25). The name suggests that some otherwise unknown incident here may have caused anxiety among the people. It was located between Mount Shepher and Makheloth, but none of these sites can be identified.

Haran (person). hair´uhn (Heb. hārān H2237, possibly “mountaineer”; the place name Haran renders a different Hebrew word). (1) Son of TERAH, brother of ABRAHAM and NAHOR, and father of LOT and two daughters, Milcah and Iscah (Gen. 11:26-31). Haran died in UR before his father Terah set out to go to CANAAN.

(2) Son of CALEB by his concubine Ephah, included in the genealogy of JUDAH (1 Chr. 2:46).

(3) Son of SHIMEI and descendant of GERSHON; he was one of the Levites who headed the families of LADAN (1 Chr. 23:9).

Haran (place). hair´uhn (Heb. ḥārān H3059, from Akk. ḥarrānu, “road” [i.e., crossroads]; Gk. Charran G5924). Also Harran; KJV NT Charran. A city of MESOPOTAMIA situated c. 24 mi. (39 km.) SE of Urfa (Edessa) on the river Balikh, a tributary of the EUPHRATES. It was an important commercial center because of its location on one of the main trade routes between Babylonia and the Mediterranean: CARCHEMISH lay some 50 mi. (80 km.) W, and GOZAN about the same distance E. The place name Haran is to be distinguished from HARAN (PERSON), which renders a different Hebrew word.

Terah, father of Abram (ABRAHAM) emigrated to Haran with his family (Gen. 11:31). After Terah’s death, Abram left this city to go into the land of Canaan (12:4). His brother NAHOR remained in Haran, and Abraham later sent his servant there to find a wife for his son ISAAC among his relatives (24:4).

Afterward JACOB, at the request of his father Isaac, came to this same area in search of a wife (29:4-5). In the time of HEZEKIAH, RABSHAKEH, an officer of SENNACHERIB, when delivering a propaganda lecture to the people of JERUSALEM, mentioned that Haran and other cities in the same area had been conquered by ASSYRIA (2 Ki. 19:12; Isa. 37:12). EZEKIEL mentions this city as one of those that carried on trade with TYRE (Ezek. 27:23).

Haran.

Haran is often referred to in Assyrian and Babylonian records. The Akkadian name means “road,” probably because this city was located at the intersection of the N–S trade route from DAMASCUS and the E–W route between CARCHEMISH and NINEVEH. A center of worship of the moon-god Sin was established there in very early times. The city and temple were destroyed in the wars of the Assyrian kings. After the fall of Nineveh in 612 B.C., some Assyrian refugees fled to Haran and held out there until 610. Nabonidus, the king of Babylon, who delighted in restoring old temples, rebuilt the city and temple and reinstated the worship of the moon-god there about seventy-five years later.

Beehive homes from the early part of the twentieth century now cover the village of Haran, a region once inhabited by Abraham and his ancestors. (View to the S.)

Hararite. hair´uh-rit (Heb. hārārî H2240, possibly “mountain dweller”). An epithet applied to two (or three) of DAVID’s heroes. SHAMMAH son of Agee, who was one of the Three, achieved a great victory over the PHILISTINES (2 Sam. 23:11 [cf. vv. 32b-33a, possibly referring to a different person]; 1 Chr. 11:34 has SHAGEE instead of Shammah). Another Hararite included in the list of the Thirty is AHIAM son of Sharar (2 Sam. 23:33b; 1 Chr. 11:35 has “Ahiam son of Sacar”). The term Hararite may refer to a clan or, more probably, a location; if the latter, it may indicate a specific town (one suggestion is AROER) or some general mountainous area (cf. English hillbilly).

Harbona. hahr-boh´nuh (Heb. ḥarbônā H3002 and ḥarbônâ H3003, from Pers. kherbân, “donkey driver”). KJV also Harbonah. One of the seven EUNUCHS sent by XERXES king of PERSIA to bring Queen VASHTI to a royal feast (Esth. 1:10). It was Harbona who later suggested that HAMAN be hanged on the same gallows that Haman himself had erected for MORDECAI (7:9).

harbor. The sheltered part of a body of water. This noun is used twice in the NIV (Isa. 23:10, in an oracle concerning TYRE and TARSHISH; Acts 27:12, with reference to FAIR HAVENS). As a verb meaning “to hold on to a negative thought in the mind,” harbor occurs in several passages (Deut. 15:9 et al.).

hardening, spiritual. Both the OT and the NT use a variety of terms in several combinations to express the idea of stubborn human resistance to God (e.g., Exod. 7:3; Deut. 2:30; 2 Chr. 30:8; Ezek. 2:4). Of special interest are the statements that God hardened PHARAOH’s heart (Exod. 7:3; 10:1; 14:4) and that Pharaoh hardened his own heart (9:34-35; 13:15). PAUL appeals to the SOVEREIGNTY OF GOD in discussing Pharaoh (Rom. 9:18), although the factor of human responsibility through repeated warnings is clearly involved (cf. 1 Sam. 6:6; Rom. 1:21-25). Hardening one’s heart brings punishment (Prov. 29:1), as is evident in Israel’s resistance at MERIBAH (Ps. 95:8). Refusal to listen, to obey, or to be thankful characterize the hardened heart, and Israel is portrayed as a prime example of this condition (2 Ki. 17:14; Neh. 9:16-17; Heb. 3:8). The disciples’ hearts were said to be hardened or dull when they failed to understand the miracle of the loaves (Mk. 6:52; 8:17). Gentile unbelievers are alienated from God because of their ignorance and hardness of heart (Eph. 4:18). With reference to Israel, PAUL states that while the elect obtained salvation, “the others were hardened” (Rom. 11:7; cf. v. 25; see ELECTION). Here the individuals themselves are described as being hardened, but elsewhere he says that “their minds were made dull” (2 Cor. 3:14).

harem. This English term (from Arabic ḥarīm, “forbidden”) denotes the building assigned to the wives and concubines of one man; the word often refers to the women themselves. Modern versions use it as the rendering of a Hebrew phrase meaning literally, “house of the women” (Esth. 2:3, 9, 11, 13-14; the NIV uses it also in vv. 8 and 15, where the Heb. simply has “the women”). In addition, it is possible that a harem is in view in Eccl. 2:8 (so NIV; lit., “a mistress and mistresses”).

Hareph. hair’if (Heb. ḥārēp H3073, possibly “sharp, shrewd”). Son of HUR, descendant of CALEB, and “father” (i.e., founder or ruler) of BETH GADER; listed in the genealogy of JUDAH (1 Chr. 2:51).

Hareth. See HERETH.

Harhaiah. hahr-hay’yuh (Heb. ḥarhāyâ H3015, derivation unknown). Father of Uzziel; the latter was one of the goldsmiths who helped to repair the walls of Jerusalem after the EXILE (Neh. 3:8).

Harhas. harh’has (Heb. ḥarḥas H3030, derivation unknown). Father of Tikvah and grandfather of Shallum; the latter was “keeper of the wardrobe” and the husband of HULDAH the prophetess (2 Ki. 22:14). The name is given as HASRAH (and father of Tokhath) in the parallel passage (2 Chr. 34:22).

Har-heres. See HERES #1.

Harhur. hahr'huhr (Heb. ḥarḥûr H3028, possibly “raven” or “[born during mother’s] fever”). Ancestor of a family of temple servants (NETHINIM) who returned after the EXILE (Ezra 2:51; Neh. 7:53).

Harim. hair'im (Heb. ḥārim H3053, “consecrated”). (1) The leader of a priestly family whom DAVID appointed by lot as the head of the third division for duties in the sanctuary (1 Chr. 24:8). He is possibly the same priest listed as the ancestor of a family of 1,017 people that returned from the Babylonian captivity with ZERUBBABEL (Ezra 2:39; Neh. 7:42), some of whom had married foreign wives and agreed to divorce them (Ezra 10:21). Perhaps this is the same priestly family (or a member of it also named Harim) that joined in sealing the covenant of NEHEMIAH (Neh. 10:5).

(2) Ancestor of a family of 320 people that returned from the Babylonian captivity with Zerubbabel (Ezra 2:32; Neh. 7:35). Because this list includes many geographic names, Harim here may refer to a town. Some members of this family had married foreign wives and agreed to divorce them (Ezra 10:31). The same family (or a member of it also named Harim) joined in sealing the covenant of NEHEMIAH (Neh. 10:27). Malkijah, a descendant of this family (or the son of the individual Harim) helped repair a section of the wall of JERUSALEM as well as the Tower of the OVENS (Neh. 3:11).

It should be noted that many scholars identify four or more different individuals (or families) by the name of Harim.

Hariph. hair'if (Heb. ḥārîp H3040, “sharp, brisk” or “[born at] harvest-time”). Ancestor of a family of 112 members that returned from exile with ZERUBBABEL (Neh. 7:24; called “Jorah” in Ezra 2:18). The same family (or a member of it also named Hariph) joined in sealing the covenant of NEHEMIAH (Neh. 10:19).

harlot. See PROSTITUTE.

Har-magedon. See ARMAGEDDON.

Harmon. hahr'muhn (Heb. harēmôn H2236, meaning unknown). A city or region to which the powerful and unjust women of SAMARIA were to be exiled (Amos 4:3; KJV, “the palace”). No place with this name is known, and the text is widely thought to be corrupt. Many emendations have been proposed (cf. NIV mg., “O mountain of oppression”), but none has been generally accepted.

harmony of the Gospels. An edition of the GOSPELS that seeks to show the agreement or coherence among them. Gospel harmonies may take two forms: (1) works that interweave material from all four Gospels into one chronological narrative, and (2) arrangements (“synopses”) of the Gospels, especially the synoptics, in parallel columns according to some chronological scheme. The earliest harmony, Tatian’s Diatessaron, was produced c. A.D. 170 and used the first method. Many modern “harmonies” are better described as synopses, for they do not necessarily assume agreement among the Gospels. They are an important tool for comparative study.

Harnepher. hahr´nuh-fuhr (Heb. ḥarneper H3062, “Horus [an Egyptian deity] is good”). Son (or descendant) of Zophah, included in the genealogy of ASHER (1 Chr. 7:36). The name Harnepher, however, may be a clan designation or even a place name (some have speculated that it was derived from an Egyptian outpost in Palestine).

harness. This English term, as noun or verb, is used a few times in Bible translations to render several Hebrew words. It can be used of hitching up chariots (1 Ki. 18:44) and yoking cows (1 Sam. 6:7). The KJV also uses this English word in its older sense of “armor” (1 Ki. 22:34; 2 Chr. 18:33).

Harod. hair´uhd (Heb. ḥārōd H3008, “trembling”; gentilic ḥārōdî H3012, “Harodite”). (1) A spring at which GIDEON encamped with his men while preparing for battle with the Midianites (Jdg. 7:1). Some have speculated that SAUL encamped at this spring (1 Sam. 29:1, “the spring in Jezreel”) before his fatal battle with the PHILISTINES (cf. 31:1). Harod is generally identified with Ein Jalud, 9 mi. (14 km.) WNW of BETH SHAN.

(2) The epithet Harodite is applied to two of DAVID’s mighty warriors, Shammah and Elikah (2 Sam. 23:25; cf. 1 Chr. 11:27, “Shammoth the Harorite”). Some associate this name with #1 above, but many scholars believe it refers to an unrelated town also named Harod, possibly to be identified with modern Khirbet el-Haredhan, c. 5 mi. (8 km.) SE of JERUSALEM.

Haroeah. huh-roh´uh (Heb. hārō ʾeh H2218, “the seer”). Son (or descendant) of SHOBAH, included in the genealogy of CALEB (1 Chr. 2:52); probably the same as REAIAH (1 Chr. 4:2).

Harorite. hay´roh-rit (Heb. hărôrî H2229). Epithet applied to Shammoth, one of DAVID’s mighty warriors (1 Chr. 11:27); probably the same as SHAMMAH the Harodite. See HAROD.

Harosheth Haggoyim. huh-roh´shith-huh-goi´im (Heb. hărōšet haggôyim H3099, “woodland of the nations”). A Canaanite town and the home of SISERA, from which he led his forces against DEBORAH and BARAK (Jdg. 4:13), and to which his army fled after his defeat (v. 16). Its location is uncertain, and some think it was not a town at all but, as its name suggests, a general woodland region in GALILEE of the Gentiles or in JEZREEL.

harp. See MUSIC AND MUSICAL INSTRUMENTS.

harpoon. This English term is used to render a Hebrew word that occurs only once (Job 41:7; KJV, “barbed irons”), in parallel to “fishing spears”; both weapons are said to be futile in the battle with LEVIATHAN.

Harran. See HARAN.

© Dr. James C. Martin

The Harod Spring at the base of Mt. Gilboa.

harrow. As a verb, this English term, meaning “to break up and smooth the soil,” is a possible rendering of Hebrew śidēd H8440, which occurs three times (Job 39:10 KJV; Isa. 28:24 NIV, NRSV; Hos. 10:11 NRSV). The precise meaning of the Hebrew verb, however, is disputed; some scholars argue for the sense “to plow furrows [that function as boundaries].” For the use of harrow as a noun, see PICK.

Harsha. hahr’shuh (Heb. ḥaršā H3095, possibly “deaf” or “mute”). Ancestor of a family of temple servants (NETHINIM) who returned from the EXILE (Ezra 2:52; Neh. 7:54).

hart. See ANIMALS.

Harum. hair’uhm (Heb. hārûm H2227). Father of Aharhel and a descendant of JUDAH through ASHHUR (1 Chr. 4:8; cf. v. 5).

Harumaph. huh-roo’maf (Heb. ḥārûmap H3018, “split nose”). Father of Jedaiah; the latter helped in repairing the walls of JERUSALEM in the time of NEHEMIAH (Neh. 3:10).

Haruphite. huh-roo’fit (Heb. ḥārûpî H3020; cf. HAREPH, HARIPH). Epithet applied to Shephatiah, one of the warriors from BENJAMIN who joined DAVID at ZIKLAG (1 Chr. 12:5; Ketib, “Hariphite”). It is not clear whether the term indicates geographic origin or connection to a clan.

Haruz. hair’uhz (Heb. ḥārûš H3027, possibly “gold” or “diligent”). Father of MESHULLEMETH, who was the mother of AMON, king of Judah (2 Ki. 21:19). The name may be either Phoenician or Arabic.

harvest. The economy of the Israelites was strictly agricultural. See AGRICULTURE. Harvest time was a very significant event for them. They had three each year. The barley reaping (Ruth 1:22) came in April-May; the wheat harvest (Gen. 30:14) was about six weeks later, in June-July; and the ingathering of the fruits of tree or vine took place in September-October.

Grain crops were reaped with sickles, and the cut stalks were laid in bunches that were carried to the THRESHING FLOOR. Some laws governed these simple harvest operations. The corners of the fields were not to be reaped, and the scatterings of the cut grain were not to be picked up. The part of the crop thus left was for the poor people to use (Lev. 23:22). The owner was required each year to present the FIRSTFRUITS of the crop as an offering to God before he could take any of it for his own use (23:10, 14). Stalks of grain that grew up without being sown were not to be harvested (25:5). With a new orchard or vineyard the fruit was not to be gathered for three years, and the fourth year's crop had to be given entirely to the Lord. So the owner had to wait until the fifth year to get any fruit for himself (19:23-25).

The Lord fitted the three main religious feasts that he prescribed for the people into this agricultural economy. The Passover came in the season of the barley harvest (Exod. 23:16). Seven weeks later at time of the wheat harvest the Feast of Pentecost occurred (34:22). The Feast of Tabernacles was observed in the seventh month, which was the period of the fruit harvest (34:22). See FEASTS.

Harvest is a picture of the blessing upon the returning captivity of Judah (Hos. 6:11). More frequently, the wielding of the sickle in harvest portrays the judgment upon the nations of the world (Joel 3:13). The NT repeats this image of judgment (Rev. 14:15). Jesus compares the harvest to the KINGDOM OF GOD, which grows by stages (Mk. 4:29). The separation of the weeds and wheat will occur at the "harvest" of the kingdom (Matt. 13:30). Christ used the harvest to represent a world of souls that is ready to be reached with the gospel. The fields are ready to be harvested, "but the workers are few" (Matt. 9:37).

Hasadiah. has'uh-di'uh (Heb. ḥāsadyâ H2878, "Yahweh is faithful"). Son of ZERUBBABEL and descendant of DAVID through SOLOMON (1 Chr. 3:20), possibly born in Palestine (see HASHUBAH).

Hasenuah. See HASSENUAH.

Hashabiah. hash'uh-bi'uh (Heb. ḥāšabyâ H3116, "Yahweh has taken account"). (1) Son of Amaziah, descendant of MERARI, and ancestor of ETHAN, who was a LEVITE musician in the time of DAVID (1 Chr. 6:45).

(2) Son of JEDUTHUN, father of Azrikam, ancestor of Shemaiah, and a Levite musician (1 Chr. 9:14; 25:3, 19; Neh. 11:15). This Hashabiah was the head of the twelfth company of temple musicians appointed by lot under David.

(3) A ruler from HEBRON in the time of David who, along with his relatives, was "responsible in Israel west of the Jordan for all the work of the LORD and for the king's service" (1 Chr. 26:30).

(4) Son of Kemuel and an officer over the tribe of LEVI under King David (1 Chr. 27:17).

(5) A leader of the Levites in the reign of JOSIAH who gave liberally toward the sacrifices (2 Chr. 35:9).

(6) A prominent Levite who returned from the EXILE with EZRA; he is usually associated with SHEREBIAH (Ezra 8:19; Neh. 12:24). He was also one of the priests entrusted with the temple treasures that were brought to Jerusalem (Ezra 8:24). Moreover, this Hashabiah may have been the same one who as “ruler of half the district of Keilah” helped to repair the wall (Neh. 3:17) and who affixed his seal to the covenant of NEHEMIAH (10:11).

(7) One of the descendants of PAROSH who agreed to divorce their foreign wives (Ezra 10:25 NRSV, following the LXX [MT, “Malkijah”]). See MALKIJAH ##4-6.

(8) Son of Mattaniah, descendant of ASAPH, and grandfather of UZZI; the latter was chief officer of the Levites (Neh. 11:22).

(9) Head of the priestly house of HILKIAH in the time of JOIAKIM the high priest (Neh. 12:21).

Hashabnah. huh-shab’nuh (Heb. ḥāšabnâ H3118, possibly “[Yahweh] has taken account of me”). One of leaders of the Israelites who sealed the covenant under NEHEMIAH (Neh. 10:25).

Hashabneiah. hash’uhb-nee’yah (Heb. ḥāšabnēyâ H3119, “Yahweh has taken account of me”). KJV Hashabniah. (1) Father of Hattush; the latter helped rebuild the walls of Jerusalem in the time of NEHEMIAH (Neh. 3:10).

(2) One of the LEVITES who offered prayer in the ceremonies that preceded the sealing of the covenant (Neh. 9:5). Some scholars identify him with HASHABIAH #6.

Hashabniah. See HASHABNEIAH.

Hashbaddanah. hash-bad’uh-nuh (Heb. ḥāšbaddānâ H3111, derivation uncertain). KJV Hashbadana. One of the prominent men who stood near EZRA when the law was read at the great assembly (Neh. 8:4).

Hashem. hay’shim (Heb. hāšēm H2244). A GIZONITE whose sons are included among DAVID’s mighty men (1 Chr. 11:34; however, the Heb. expression bēnē hāšēm could be read as “the sons of the name,” with the possible meaning, “famous men”). Many scholars emend the text by omitting “the sons of” (cf. NRSV) and changing “Hashem” to “Jashen” (cf. 2 Sam. 23:32).

Hashmonah. hash-moh´nuh (Heb. ḥāšmōnâ H3135, derivation uncertain). A place at which the Israelites stopped during their wilderness journey (Num. 33:29-30). It was evidently located between Mithcah and Moseroth, but the site is unknown.

Hashub. See H_{ASSHUB}.

Hashubah. huh-shoo´buh (Heb. ḥāšubâ H3112, possibly “considered [by Yahweh]” or “[highly] esteemed”). Son of ZERUBBABEL and descendant of DAVID through SOLOMON (1 Chr. 3:20). Some scholars suggest that the word is not a name and emend the text to “after his return,” indicating that the subsequent names refer to Zerubbabel’s sons born in Palestine.

Hashum. hay´shuhm (Heb. ḥāšum H3130, “broad nose”). (1) Son of DAN (Gen. 46:23 NRSV, following LXX; MT, HUSHIM; see also SHUHAM).

(2) Ancestor of a family of 223 (or 328) members who returned from the EXILE (Ezra 2:19; Neh. 7:22). Some members of this family had married foreign wives and agreed to divorce them (Ezra 10:33).

(3) One of the prominent men who stood near EZRA when the law was read at the great assembly (Neh. 8:4). He may be the same Hashum who affixed his seal to the covenant (10:18).

Hashupha. See H_{ASUPHA}.

Hasideans, Hasidim. See M_{ACCABEE}.

Hasmonean. See M_{ACCABEE}.

Hasrah. haz´ruh (Heb. ḥasrâ H2897, derivation uncertain). Father of Tokhath and grandfather of SHALLUM; the latter was “keeper of the wardrobe” and the husband of HULDAH the prophetess (2 Chr. 34:22). The name is given as HARHAS (and father of Tikvah) in the parallel passage (2 Ki. 22:14).

Hassenaah. has´uh-nay´uh (Heb. hassēnā ךָ H2189, meaning uncertain). The father (or ancestor) of a family that rebuilt the FISH GATE (Neh. 3:3). Many believe, however, that the form Hassenaah should be understood as the definite article plus SENAAH (Ezra 2:35; Neh. 7:38), which may well be a place name. If so, “the sons of Hassenaah” means perhaps “the people from the [region of] Senaah.” See also HASSENUAH.

Hassenuah. has´uh-noo´uh (Heb. hassēnu ךָ H2190, meaning uncertain). KJV Hasenuah. Father of Hodaviah and ancestor of Sallu, from the tribe of BENJAMIN; Sallu is mentioned as one of the first to resettle in JERUSALEM (1 Chr. 9:7). In a parallel list of postexilic Benjamites, Hassenuah is mentioned as father (or ancestor) of a certain Judah who was in charge of the Second District of Jerusalem (Neh. 11:9; KJV, “Senuah”). The name is possibly a variant form of HASSENAAH and SENAAH.

Hashhub. hash´uhb (Heb. ḥaššûb H3121, “considerate” or “[highly] regarded” or “one to whom has been reckoned”). KJV also Hashub (in Nehemiah). (1) Son (meaning prob. a descendant) of PAHATH-MOAB; along with Malkijah son of Harim, he helped repair a section of the wall of JERUSALEM as well as the Tower of the OVENS (Neh. 3:11). He is probably the same Hashhub mentioned along with a certain Benjamin as having made repairs in front of their house (v. 23).

(2) One of the Israelite leaders who sealed the covenant in the time of EZRA (Neh. 10:23).

(3) Father of Shemaiah; the latter was a leader of the MERARI clan among the LEVITES and is mentioned as having settled in Jerusalem after the return from the captivity (1 Chr. 9:14; Neh. 11:15).

Hassophereth, Sophereth. ha-sof´uh-rith, sof´uh-rith (Heb. hassōperet H2191, “the [office of] scribe” or “the guild of scribes”; also sōperet H6072). Ancestor of a family of SOLOMON’S SERVANTS who returned after the EXILE (“Hassophereth” in Ezra 2:55; “Sophereth” in Neh. 7:57; KJV has “Sophereth” in both passages).

Hasupha. huh-soo´fuh (Heb. ḥāšûpā ךָ H3102, possibly “stripped” or “prematurely born”). KJV Hashupha (in Nehemiah). Ancestor of a family of temple servants (NETHINIM) who returned after the EXILE (Ezra 2:43; Neh. 7:46).

hat. See DRESS.

hate, hatred. An intense aversion or active hostility that is expressed in settled opposition to a person or thing. Hatred is a response that usually comes from anger, fear, or a sense of injury, as when ESAU is said to have hated JACOB (Gen. 27:41; NIV, “held a grudge against”). The apostle PAUL condemned hatred, listing it as one of the works of the flesh (Gal. 5:20). Also, the OT includes a clear prohibition of hatred between kindred (Lev. 19:17).

God is said to hate IDOLATRY and false worship (Deut. 12:31; 16:22; Jer. 44:4) and even Israel’s WORSHIP when it was external only (Isa. 1:14; Amos 5:21; Mal. 2:13-16). There is a special and sometimes problematic usage in the OT, where God is said to love Jacob but to hate Esau (Mal. 1:2-3), to hate evildoers (Ps. 5:5), and to hate that which was evil (Prov. 6:16). The emotional connotation we normally associate with hatred should be subtracted from such passages; God must not be understood to act on the human plane of anger and hostility. In connection with Esau, “hate” is almost equivalent to the acknowledgement of a divine selectivity: Jacob he chose and Esau he rejected.

Jesus modified the teaching of his contemporaries by insisting that although they had heard it said they were to love their neighbors but hate their enemies, they should rather love their enemies and do good to those who hated them (Matt. 5:43; Lk. 6:27). Jesus’ words of admonition to his disciples seem strange in light of another statement, “If anyone comes to me and does not hate his father and mother, his wife and children, his brothers and sisters—yes, even his own life—he cannot be my disciple” (Lk. 14:26). Clearly, however, the disciples were being instructed not that they should be hostile toward those nearest and dearest to them, but rather that even those nearest and dearest to them must be given second place to the disciples’ loyalty and affection for Jesus. Nothing must be allowed to interfere with our commitment to the cause of Christ, especially not our own selfish desires or ambitions.

The antithesis of LOVE to hatred is especially emphasized in the Gospel of John, which expresses a sharp Semitic juxtaposition in the imagery of LIGHT and DARKNESS (Jn. 3:20). In the same context, it is the love of God in Jesus Christ that has become operative in the world to destroy the hatred of the light; and even though the disciples are hated by the world, they are to reveal to it the love of Christ that is stronger than hate (17:14, 20-26).

Hathach. hay´thak (Heb. hātāk H2251, possibly Pers., “good one” or “courtier”). KJV Hatach; TNIV Hathack. A EUNUCH under King XERXES assigned to attend Queen ESTHER (Esth. 4:5-6, 9-10). He served as a messenger between Esther and MORDECAI after HAMAN plotted to kill the Jews.

Hathak. hay´thak. TNIV form of HATHAK.

Hathath. hay´thath (Heb. hātāt H3171, “dread” or “weakling”). Son of OTHNIEL and grandson of Kenaz (CALEB’s younger brother), included in the genealogy of JUDAH (1 Chr. 4:13).

Hatipha. huh-ti´fuh (Heb. hāṭîpā › H2640, “captured”). Ancestor of a family of temple servants (NETHINIM) who returned from the captivity (Ezra 2:54; Neh. 7:56).

Hatita. huh-ti´tuh (Heb. hāṭîṭā › H2638, meaning uncertain). Ancestor of a family of gatekeepers who returned with ZERUBBABEL from the captivity (Ezra 2:42; Neh. 7:45).

hatred. See HATE, HATRED.

Hattil. hat´uhl (Heb. hāṭṭîl H2639, possibly “talkative”). Ancestor of a family of SOLOMON’S SERVANTS who returned from the captivity (Ezra 2:57; Neh. 7:59).

Hattush. hat´uhsh (Heb. hāṭṭûš H2637, meaning unknown). (1) Son of Shemaiah and descendant of DAVID through ZERUBBABEL and SHECANIAH; he is apparently the same Hattush mentioned among the family heads who returned from the captivity (1 Chr. 3:22; Ezra 8:2; some scholars emend these texts on the basis of 1 Esd. 8:29 [“Hattush the son of Shecaniah”]).

(2) Son of Hashabneiah; he was one of the Israelites who helped repair the wall of JERUSALEM under NEHEMIAH (Neh. 3:10).

(3) A priest who sealed the covenant with Nehemiah (Neh. 10:4); he is probably the same man listed among those who returned with Zerubbabel and JESHUA (12:2).

Hauran. haw´ruhn (Heb. ḥawrān H2588, derivation uncertain). A great plain situated on a plateau 2,000 ft. (610 m.) high E of the JORDAN River and N of the land of GILEAD. In ancient times it was called BASHAN. Its soil is of volcanic origin and is very rich, making the region famous for its wheat crops. In the Bible, the name Hauran is mentioned only by EZEKIEL in his description of the boundaries of the land of Israel in the millennial age (Ezek. 47:16, 18). The Israelites never had a very great hold on this area. Its openness to the E made it a frequent prey to robbers from the desert. Under the Romans, HEROD ruled over it as part of his realm, and he greatly encouraged settlement by stopping the robber raids. It was then known as Auranitis. Christianity flourished there from the second century A.D. until the seventh century, when it was overthrown by the Muslims. Today Hauran is an integral part of Syria.

Havilah. hav´uh-luh (Heb. ḥāwîlâ H2564, “sandy”). (1) Son of CUSH and grandson of HAM (Gen. 10:7; 1 Chr. 1:9). His name is probably related to the geographical area discussed in #3 below.

(2) Son of JOKTAN, grandson of EBER, and descendant of SHEM (Gen. 10:29; 1 Chr. 1:23). His name is probably related to the geographical area discussed in #3 below.

(3) A land described as being bounded by one of the four rivers of the Garden of EDEN, the PISHON, and as being rich in gold, resin, and onyx (Gen. 2:11-12). The region—or perhaps a different place bearing the same name—is mentioned with SHUR (prob. in N SINAI) as one of the limits of the territory of the AMALEKITES (25:18) and SAUL is said to have defeated the Amalekites in this area (1 Sam. 15:7, though it is widely thought that Havilah here is a textual corruption). The location of Havilah is disputed. Many scholars connect the name with Arabic Ḥaulan, which refers both to an area in SW ARABIA (Yemen) and to an ancient tribal federation that still lives there. Some have even suggested that the individuals mentioned in ##1 and 2 above represent two branches of this Arabian tribe. Others prefer to locate Havilah in W or NW Arabia.

Havvoth Jair. hav´oth-jay´uhr (Heb. ḥawwōt yā ʾîr H2596, “villages of Jair”). KJV Havoth-jair (Num. 32:41; Jdg. 10:4), Bashan-havoth-jair (Deut. 3:14); “towns of Jair” (1 Chr. 2:23). A group of thirty villages captured by JAIR, a descendant of MANASSEH (Num. 32:41; Jdg. 10:4; 1 Chr. 2:22-23). Jair captured both GILEAD and BASHAN, and this latter district evidently contained thirty more towns (Deut. 3:14; Josh. 13:30; 1 Ki. 4:13; 1 Chr. 2:23). The phrase Havvoth Jair applied only to the villages in Gilead. There are, however, alternate explanations for the differences among the texts.

hawk. See BIRDS.

hay. See PLANTS (under grass).

Hazael. hay'zay-uhl (Heb. ḥāzā'ēl H2599 [also ḥāzāh'ēl], “God has seen”). One of the most powerful of the kings of ARAM (SYRIA), ruling from c. 843 to c. 796 B.C. He is first mentioned in 1 Ki. 19:15-17, where ELIJAH at Mount Horeb was told by God that he would anoint Hazael king over Aram. At this time he was a high officer in the court of BEN-HADAD II, king of Aram (2 Ki. 8:7-9). Subsequently, he killed Ben-Hadad by smothering him with a wet cloth, and Hazael became king in his stead (8:10-15).

Soon after, Hazael fought against the combined forces of JEHOAM and AHAZIAH at RAMOTH GILEAD (2 Ki. 8:28-29; 9:14-15). He frequently defeated JEHU in battle, devastating all his country E of the Jordan from the ARNON Rive in the S to BASHAN in the N (10:32-33). During the reign of JEHOAHAZ, Jehu's successor, he repeatedly encroached upon the territory of Israel, which was kept from complete destruction only by God's mercy (13:3, 22-23). Hazael also moved into SW Palestine, taking GATH; he compelled the king of Judah to pay a heavy bribe for sparing JERUSALEM (12:17-18; 2 Chr. 24:23, 24). It was not until the death of Hazael that Israel was able successfully to check the aggression of Aram under Ben-hadad III, the son of Hazael (2 Ki. 13:24-25).

In the Black Obelisk from CALAH, SHALMANESER III records that in 842 B.C. he joined battle with Hazael. He claims that the Aramean king was defeated, losing 6,000 warriors, 1,121 chariots, and 470 horsemen. In another inscription Shalmaneser refers to Hazael as the “son of a nobody,” and mentions that Hazael had “seized the throne” and rebelled against him. Among the spoils taken from Damascus by Assyria, and found by archaeologists at Arslan Tash (Hadathah), were an ivory inlay from the side of a bed, with the words engraved on it, “Bar Ama to our Lord Hazael in the year ...,” and another ivory tablet, possibly a part of the same bed, showing in relief a god or king in Phoenician-Aramean style, which some scholars believe is actually a portrait of Hazael himself.

Hazaiah. huh-zay'yuh (Heb. ḥāzāyâ H2610, "Yahweh has seen"). Son of Adaiah, descendant of JUDAH through Shelah, and ancestor of Maaseiah; the latter was a provincial leader who settled in Jerusalem after the EXILE (Neh. 11:5).

Hazar Addar. hay'zuhr-ad'uhr (Heb. ḥāṣar-ʾaddār H2960, "settlement of Addar"). A site marking the S border of CANAAN (Num. 34:4). It was apparently between KADESH BARNEA and AZMON, but the precise location is unknown. The most common identification is modern ʿAin Qedeis (c. 51 mi./82 km. SW of BEERSHEBA). The parallel passage (Josh. 15:3) is thought by some to break up the name Hazar Addar into two, HEZRON and ADDAR; others believe that Addar and Hazar Addar are identical and to be distinguished from Hezron.

Hazar Enan. hay'zuhr-ee'nuhn (Heb. ḥāṣar ʿênān H2966, "settlement of Enan" [in Ezekiel, ḥāṣar ʿênôn]). Also Hazar Enon. A site marking the ideal NE boundary of Israel (Num. 34:9-10), apparently between DAMASCUS and HAMATH (Ezek. 47:17; 48:1). Some scholars in the past identified it with the modern Hadr at the foot of Mount HERMON, not far from DAN (PLACE) and more than 30 mi. (48 km.) SW of Damascus, but now it is generally believed to be the same as Qaryatein, a full 70 mi. (113 km.) NE of Damascus. If the latter is correct, the envisioned territory of Israel would be almost twice as large as it was during most of its history.

Hazar Gaddah. hay'zuhr-gad'uh (Heb. ḥāṣar gaddâ H2961, "settlement of Gad"). Also Hazar-gaddah. A town in the NEGEV, the extreme S of the tribal territory of JUDAH (Josh. 15:27). It is mentioned between Moladah and Heshmon, but its precise location is unknown.

Hazar-hatticon. See HAZER HATTICON.

Hazarmaveth. hay'zuhr-may'vith (Heb. ḥāṣar-māwet H2975, "village of Maveth [death]"). Son of JOKTAN, grandson of EBER, and descendant of SHEM (Gen. 10:26; 1 Chr. 1:20). His name appears to be preserved in Arabic Ḥadramaut, applied to a S Arabian tribe and to a fruitful valley running parallel to the Arabian sea coast for about 200 mi. (320 km.). In the days of its greatest glory (5th cent. B.C. and 1st–2nd cent. A.D.) it was the home of a great civilization, with its capital at Shabwa. See also SABTA, SABTAH.

Hazar Shual. hay'zühr-shoo'uhl (Heb. ḥăṣar šû ʿāl H2967, “fox habitat”). A village in the NEGEV, lying within the tribal territory of JUDAH, but assigned to SIMEON (Josh. 15:28; 19:3; 1 Chr. 4:28). It was resettled by the Israelites after the EXILE (Neh. 11:27). It is always mentioned in close relationship with BEERSHEBA, but its precise location is unknown.

Hazar Susah, Hazar Susim. hay'zühr-soo'suh, hay'zühr-soo'sim (Heb. ḥăṣ ar sūsâ H2963 [alternate pl. form, ḥăṣar sūsîm H2964], “mare farm, horse enclosure”). A city in the SW part of the tribal territory of JUDAH, but assigned to SIMEON (Josh. 19:5; called “Hazar Susim” in 1 Chr. 4:31). Some scholars believe that the town was originally called SANSANNAH (listed in the parallel passage, Josh. 15:31), and that it was renamed because SOLOMON may have kept there the horses he brought from Egypt and sold to the Hittites and Syrians (1 Ki. 4:26; 9:19; 10:29). In any case, the location is unknown.

Hazazon Tamar. haz'uh-zon-tay'muhr (Heb. ḥaṣṣôn tāmār H2954, “gravel terrain of Tamar [date-palm]”). TNIV Hazezon Tamar. After KEDORLAOMER and his allies defeated the HORITES in SEIR, “they turned back and went to En Mishpat (that is, Kadesh), and they conquered the whole territory of the Amalekites, as well as the Amorites who were living in Hazazon Tamar” (Gen. 14:7). This description, along with the subsequent narrative, suggests that Hazazon Tamar was located S or SW of the DEAD SEA, and some scholars identify it with Tamar (1 Ki. 9:18; Ezek. 47:18-19; 48:28), which is generally thought to be modern ʿAin Ḥuṣḥ, c. 23 mi. (37 km.) SSW of the S tip of the Dead Sea. See discussion under TAMAR (PLACE). Elsewhere, however, Hazazon Tamar is identified with EN GEDI (2 Chr. 20:2), which lies on the W shore of the Dead Sea, midpoint between the N and S tips. It seems unlikely, but not impossible, that Kedorlaomer fought the Amorites in En Gedi. Perhaps the name Hazazon Tamar was applied to more than one site distinguished by palm groves.

hazel. See PLANTS.

Hazelelponi. See HAZZELELPONI.

Hazer Hatticon. hay'zühr-hat'uh-kon (Heb. ḥāṣēr hattîkôn H2962, “settlement of Hatticon” or “middle court”). Also Hazar-hatticon; TNIV Hazer Hattikon. A place said to be on the border of HAURAN and named among the boundaries of ideal Israel (Ezek. 47:16). It is generally thought to be a scribal error or a variant name for HAZAR ENAN.

Hazerim. huh-zih-r'ím. The KJV transliteration of Hebrew ḥăṣ̣ērîm, plural form of the common noun ḥăṣ̣ēr H2958, “village” (Deut. 2:23).

Hazeroth. huh-zih-r'oth (Heb. ḥăṣ̣ērôt H2972, “settlements”). A camping station of the Israelites during their wilderness wanderings (Num. 11:35; 12:16; 33:17-18; Deut. 1:1). It was here that AARON and MIRIAM quarreled with MOSES regarding his marriage to a CUSHITE WOMAN and his claim that God spoke only through him (Num. 12:1-15). Hazeroth is generally identified with ʿAin Khadra (Ḥudrat), some 30 mi. (48 km.) NE of Jebel Musa (see SINAI), on the way to AQABAH.

Hazon Tamar. haz'uh-zon-tay'muhr. TNIV form of HAZAZON TAMAR.

Haziel. hay'zee-uhl (Heb. ḥăzî ʾēl H2609, possibly “God has seen” or “vision of God”). Son of SHIMEI and a LEVITE descended from GERSHON (1 Chr. 23:9). The text is difficult and emendations have been proposed.

Hazo. hay'zoh (Heb. ḥăzô H2605, derivation uncertain). Son of NAHOR by his wife MILCAH; nephew of ABRAHAM (Gen. 22:22). The passage as a whole seems to indicate the origins of a dozen ARAMEAN tribes, and the name Hazo is usually associated with Assyrian Ḥazu (mentioned in an inscription of ESARHADDON), referring to a mountainous region in N ARABIA.

Hazor. hay'zor (Heb. ḥăṣ̣ôr H2937, “enclosure”). (1) One of the southernmost towns within the tribal territory of JUDAH (Josh. 15:23). It was situated in the NEGEV, near the country of EDM (v. 21), but its precise location is unknown. See also HAZOR HADATTAH.

Hazor in Naphtali.

(2) An alternate name for KERIOTH HEZRON, also included in the list of the southernmost towns of Judah (Josh. 15:25).

(3) A town within the tribal territory of BENJAMIN listed among the places settled by those who returned from the EXILE (Neh. 11:33). Its location is uncertain, though some have identified it with Khirbet Hazzur (some 3 mi./5 km. NW of JERUSALEM).

(4) An otherwise unknown group of desert settlements against which JEREMIAH prophesied (Jer. 49:28-33). The oracle speaks of “the kingdoms of Hazor” and associates them with KEDAR (a N Arabian tribe). Although some have thought Hazor was an Arab settlement in S Palestine, most scholars believe that the name referred to associated villages inhabited by semi-nomadic peoples in W or NW ARABIA (and Kedar may have been one of the kingdoms in the league).

At the height of its power, Hazor in Naphtali was the largest city of ancient Israel. (View to the E.)

(5) A large and important city in N NAPHHTALI, within the tribal territory of NAPHHTALI. When the Israelites entered Palestine, the land was a conglomeration of little city-states or kingdoms, and of various groups united by tribal ties (for the former, see Josh. 11:1; and for the latter, 11:3). This Hazor was reckoned as “the head of all those kingdoms” in Joshua’s day, and its king, JABIN, led them against Joshua, who almost annihilated them. Nearly two centuries later, another Jabin (Jdg. 4) reigning at Hazor was reckoned as king of Canaan, but God used DEBORAH and BARAK to subdue and destroy him. Hazor, having a strategic location in the hills about 5 mi. (8 km.) W of the waters of MEROM, was fortified by SOLOMON (1 Ki. 9:15). Its Israelite inhabitants were carried away into captivity (2 Ki. 15:29) in ASSYRIA by TIGLATH-PILESER about the middle of the eighth century B.C. The site, modern Tell el-Qedah, is located some 10 mi. (16 km.) N of the Sea of Galilee, and is 200 acres in its full extent (upper and lower areas). Hazor was the largest city ever built in Palestine during the biblical period, accommodating up to 40,000 inhabitants. It was dug first by archaeologist J. Garstang in 1928 and more extensively by Y. Yadin in 1955-58, 1968-70. Yadin discovered twenty-two strata of occupation including what he believed to be clear evidence of Joshua’s destruction. A unique water tunnel was found, along with city gates similar to those at GEZER and MEGIDDO, dating to the time of Solomon (though some date them slightly later).

Hazor Hadattah. hay’zor-huh-dat’uh (Heb. ḥā-šôr ḥădattâ H2939, “New Hazor [enclosure]”). Also Hazor-haddattah. One of the southernmost towns within the tribal territory of JUDAH (Josh. 15:25; KJV reads two names, “Hazor, Haddattah”). Several towns in the NEGEV bore the name HAZOR, but their precise locations are unknown. The second component of the name Hazor Hadattah is the Aramaic word for “new” (cf. Heb. HADASHAH), which seems unusual. Some have speculated that the town was settled by residents of Hazor in NAPHHTALI who had closer contact with Aramaic-speaking populations.

Hazzelelponi. haz’uh-lel-poh’ni (Heb. ḥaššēlelpônî H2209, perhaps “shade my face”). KJV Hazelelponi. Daughter of ETAM, included in the genealogy of JUDAH (1 Chr. 4:3). The name is highly unusual, however, and various emendations have been proposed (e.g., some have thought that the names of two different daughters have been merged, or that the name was simply Hazlel).

Hazzobebah. haz’oh-bee’buh (Heb. ḥaššōbēbâ H2206, meaning uncertain). Son of Koz, included in the genealogy of JUDAH (1 Chr. 4:8). The first syllable of the name appears to be the Hebrew definite article, and thus the NRSV and other versions render, “Zobebah.” It may be the name of a clan.

he (letter). hay (Heb. hē ך, meaning uncertain). The fifth letter in the Hebrew alphabet (ה), with a numerical value of five. Its sound corresponds to that of English h (but it is usually silent at the end of a word, where it serves to represent vowel sounds).

head. Both the brain case and the face are included in the head, considered to be the seat of life or the SOUL, although the Jews regarded the HEART as the seat of the intellect, and often used “head” (Heb. rō ר H8031) to stand for the whole person (Acts 18:6, Gk. kephalē G3051). The word applies to animals, such as the bull’s head of the burnt offering (Lev. 1:4), and to inanimate objects in phrases like, “Lift up your heads, O you gates” (Ps. 24:7), the four heads of rivers (Gen. 2:10), and the head stone (Zech. 4:7, a concept also applied to Christ, Matt. 21:42; see CORNERSTONE).

Injury to the head was a chief form of defeating an enemy (Ps. 68:21). Decapitation, a custom likewise practiced in ASSYRIA AND BABYLONIA, added insult to injury (1 Sam. 17:51). On the other hand, anointing the head was a symbol of joy and prosperity (Ps. 23:5; Heb. 1:9), and dedication to priestly service (Exod. 29:7). Leaders are heads (Isa. 9:15). Christ is the head of the CHURCH (which is his BODY) and of all CREATION (Eph. 1:22), every human being (1 Cor. 11:3), and all rule and authority (Col. 2:10). The husband is the head of the woman. Because of the Greek custom of veiling of women, as opposed to the Jewish practice, PAUL urged the Corinthian women to be obedient to the local standards of decency and order, and to cover the head in worship. Men, however, pray with uncovered heads. See COVERING THE HEAD.

heap of stones. The act of raising a heap of stones could be a symbol and reminder of a shameful act. After ACHAN and his family were stoned and burned, a pile of stones was heaped over their slain bodies (Josh. 7:26; cf. 8:29; 2 Sam.

18:17). A heap of stones could also symbolize a COVENANT made between two persons, as in the case of JACOB and LABAN at MIZPAH (Gen. 31:46-52; see GALEED). Finally, piles of stones could indicate God's judgment upon a sinful city or family (Job 15:28; Isa. 37:26; Jer. 9:11; Hos. 12:11).

heart. Aside from some literal references to the physical organ, the term heart in the Bible (Heb. lēb H4213 and lēbāb H4222; Gk. kardia G2840) usually refers to the “inner person,” or the seat of mental functions (where one remembers, thinks), or the seat and center of all physical and spiritual life—the SOUL or MIND as the fountain of thoughts, passions, desires, affections, appetites, purposes, endeavors. The Hebrew terms occur almost 800 times in the OT; the Greek term occurs almost 150 times in the NT.

In ancient times, as today, different parts of the body were used figuratively as the seat of different functions of the soul; and the ancient usage often differs from the modern. In expressing sympathy, we might say, “This touches my heart,” where the ancients might say, “My bowels were moved for him” (Cant. 5:4 KJV; cf. Ps. 7:9 in KJV [“the righteous God trieth the hearts and reins”] with NIV [“...who searches minds and hearts”]). This reflects a difference in common figurative usage; it is not a question of truth and error in ancient or modern psychology. The NT was written mostly by Jews and so is colored by Hebrew thinking and usage; for example, “they do always err in their heart” (Heb. 3:10 KJV) may mean that they are wrong in both their thinking and their affections. Often the word heart implies the whole moral nature of fallen humanity (e.g., “The heart is deceitful above all things, and beyond cure,” Jer. 17:9; cf. 17:10).

hearth. In ancient times homes were heated very differently from the way they are today. In the houses of the poorer people the hearth consisted of a depression in the floor of a room in which a fire was kindled for cooking or for warmth. Chimneys were unknown; smoke escaped from the house as it could, or through a latticed opening for the purpose. The better houses were heated by means of a brazier of burning coals. The brazier was a wide, shallow pan that could also be used for cooking. (See Gen. 18:6; Ps. 102:3; Isa. 30:14; Jer. 36:22-23; Hos. 13:3; Zech. 12:6.)

heat and cold. See PALESTINE (under climate).

heathen. This term is frequently used by the KJV to render Hebrew and Greek words that more properly mean “nation(s)” (Lev. 25:44 et al.; Acts 4:25 et al.), although many contexts do indicate the sense of “pagan, one who does not acknowledge the true God” (e.g., Matt. 6:7). See GENTILE.

heaven. (1) Cosmologically, one of the two great divisions of the universe, the earth and the heavens (Gen. 1:1; 14:19). In the visible heavens are the stars and planets (Gen. 1:14-17; Ezek. 32:7-8). Later Jews divided the heavens into seven strata, but there is no evidence for this in the Bible, though Paul spoke of being caught up into the third heaven (2 Cor. 12:2). The term “heaven of heavens” (Deut. 10:14; 1 Ki. 8:27; Ps. 148:4) is “highest heavens” in NIV.

(2) The abode of God (Gen. 28:17; Ps. 80:14; Isa. 66:1; Matt. 5:12) and of the good angels (Matt. 24:36). It is the place where the redeemed will someday be (Matt. 5:12; 6:20; Eph. 3:15), where the Redeemer has gone and intercedes for the saints, and from where he will someday come for his own (1 Thess. 4:16).

(3) The inhabitants of heaven (Lk. 15:18; Rev. 18:20).

Heaven, Queen of. See QUEEN OF HEAVEN.

heavenly. That which relates to HEAVEN. The relevant Greek adjectives (ouranios G4039, epouranion G2230) are used with reference to spiritual truths and to the divine and eternal realm. The meaning is best understood in context. Jesus contrasted “the earthly things,” concerning the rebirth of men on earth, with “the heavenly things,” concerning the revelation of his divine person from heaven (Jn. 3:12). In the book of HEBREWS, the TABERNACLE is characterized as a copy and shadow of the “heavenly” sanctuary (Heb. 8:5): it contains “heavenly things,” which are purified by the high priestly offering of Christ (9:23). “Heavenly” here should be associated directly with “heaven itself” and “the presence of God” (9:24).

PAUL used the phrase in three distinguishable senses. (a) The sphere of thought is futurist eschatology in 1 Cor. 15, where the glorious nature of the RESURRECTION bodies of believers is seen in analogy to the heavenly bodies of the stars (vv. 40, 48-49). (b) In EPHESIANS the context is that of “realized” eschatology: by virtue of a present or “realized” union with Christ, the believer is the recipient of spiritual blessings “in the heavenly realms” (Eph. 1:3, 20; 2:6; 3:10; 6:12). (c) Finally, the simple idea of locale is present in Paul’s reference to heaven (Phil. 2:10) and Christ’s heavenly kingdom (2 Tim. 4:18).

heavens, new. The expression “new heaven(s) and a new earth” is a technical term in the eschatological language of the Bible to define and describe the final, perfected state of the created universe. See ESCHATOLOGY. The conception of a re-created universe has its origin in the biblical account of CREATION (Gen. 1:1, where the phrase “the heavens and the earth” is meant to embrace the whole of the created universe). “Heavens” in the primitive worldview was meant to describe all that is above the earth—the sky with its heavenly bodies—and therefore should be distinguished from HEAVEN as the dwelling place of God that is outside the realm of the created universe. The promise of a re-creation of the heavens and the earth arises not out of some inherent lack or evil in the material universe, but because of human sin and God’s subsequent curse (3:17). The idea of a renewed or re-created universe is present in substance in many passages: Isa. 51:16; Matt. 19:28; 24:29-31, 35; Mk. 13:24-27, 31; Rom. 8:19-23; 2 Cor. 5:17; Heb. 12:26-28. Specific mention of “new heaven(s) and a new earth” is found in Isa. 65:17; 66:22; 2 Pet. 3:13; Rev. 21:1.

heave offering. See SACRIFICE AND OFFERINGS.

Heber. heeˈbuhr (Heb. heber H2491, “associate, companion”; gentilic hebrî H2499, “Heberite”). (1) Son of Beriah, grandson of ASHER, and eponymous ancestor of the Heberite clan (Gen. 46:17; Num. 26:45; 1 Chr. 7:31-32).

(2) A KENITE who separated himself for a time from the main body of Kenites and settled near KEDESH, W of the Sea of Galilee (Jdg. 4:11). Heber’s clan established friendly associations with JABIN king of HAZOR, who was an enemy of Israel. The king’s commander, SISERA, having been defeated by BARAK, fled for refuge to Heber’s settlement. Sisera went into the tent of Jael, Heber’s wife (4:17). Jael, however, betraying the alliance between Jabin and her husband, took this opportunity to kill Sisera (4:18-22; 5:24-27).

(3) Son of MERED, “father” (i.e., “ruler/founder”) of SOCO, and descendant of JUDAH, although his precise genealogical connection is unclear (1 Chr. 4:18).

(4) Son of ELPAAL and descendant of BENJAMIN (1 Chr. 8:17).

(5) KJV alternate form of EBER (1 Chr. 5:13; 8:22; Lk. 3:35).

Hebrew language. With the exception of ARAMAIC in a few passages (Ezra 4:8—6:18; 7:12-26; Dan. 2:4—7:28; Jer. 10:11), Hebrew is the language of the OT. The term Hebrew was first used as a designation for individuals or a people and only later denoted a language. See HEBREW PEOPLE. The OT refers to the language not as “Hebrew” but as “the language of Canaan” (Isa. 19:18) or “the Jews’ language” (2 Ki. 18:26 et al. KJV). With close affinity to Ugaritic, Phoenician, Moabite, and other Canaanite dialects, Hebrew is usually placed in the NW branch of the Semitic language family. Other related languages include Arabic, Akkadian, and especially Aramaic. With few exceptions, extant texts of ancient Hebrew are those of the OT and certain of the APOCRYPHA and PSEUDEPIGRAPHIA. Inscriptions employing the language include the SILOAM Inscription from the eighth century B.C. and the Gezer Calendar from the tenth century.

In large measure, OT Hebrew is self-explanatory. However, the Ugaritic tablets from RAS SHAMRA shed much light on the meaning of the Hebrew Bible, and since the structure and vocabulary were so very similar in the various Semitic tongues, much cognate language help is available for the understanding of the language of the Israelites. The Greek translation of the OT, the SEPTUAGINT, is also of much value in interpretative study of biblical Hebrew.

Though Aramaic is itself a very ancient language, so that the presence of “Aramaisms” in the OT may indicate an early rather than a late date for the passages in which they occur, from the time of the EXILE onward Hebrew was spoken less and less and correspondingly the use of Aramaic flourished. Some of the DEAD SEA SCROLLS were written in Hebrew, which was also the vehicle for the writing of such Jewish religious literature as the Mishnah and the Midrashim in the early centuries of our era. The language was used in medieval times for biblical commentaries and philosophical and literary works. In modern Israel, Hebrew has again become a living tongue.

The historical origins of the language are somewhat obscure but go back beyond 2000 B.C. The OT literature, written over a period of more than a thousand years, reveals a minimum of stylistic changes, though loanwords and new ways of expression became more or less noticeable with the passing of years, especially after the exile. It is also true that at a given time dialectal differences existed, a fact attested by the narrative in Jdg. 12, in which Ephraimites were unable to pronounce the “sh” of their neighbors to the south.

With its short sentences and simple coordinating conjunctions, ancient Hebrew lent itself well to the vivid expression of events. These features, together with parallelism and rhythm and special meanings and constructions, made Hebrew poetry, as found in the Psalms and to a large extent in the Prophets, most expressive and strikingly effective.

Hebrew of Hebrews. A phrase used by PAUL to describe himself (Phil. 3:5). The apostle, defending his integrity and recounting his pedigree for the benefit of his readers, claims that he was of pure Hebrew stock and had retained the language and traditions of his ancestors, unlike some Jews who had adopted GREEK language and customs.

Hebrew people. Members of the nation of ISRAEL (see also JEW). The term ‘ibrî H6303 has traditionally been derived from EBER (‘ēber H6299), the grandson of SHEM and ancestor of ABRAHAM (Gen. 10:24; 11:16). Others have derived the term directly from the verb ‘ābar H6296, “to pass, cross over, go beyond”; thus a Hebrew would be “one from the other side,” that is, beyond the JORDAN (cf. Josh. 1:2 et al.) or beyond the EUPHRATES. Jews quite uniformly have used “Israel” and “the children of Israel” (later “Jews”) in referring to themselves, finding in such terminology treasured religious and national associations. Foreigners thought of them as “Hebrews” (Exod. 1:16; 2:6), and they so identified themselves in speaking to non-Jews (Gen. 40:15; Exod. 10:3; Jon. 1:9). Also, in contexts involving contrasts between Israelites and people of other nations, the same phenomenon appears (Gen. 43:32; Exod. 1:15; 2:11; 1 Sam. 13:3; 14:21).

Since the discovery of the AMARNA tablets, an effort was made to identify the nationality of the HABIRU mentioned in these documents. Some have argued that this term is not the name of a people but that it indicates wandering peoples greatly restricted as regards financial means and without citizenship and social status. Ancient records show the Habiru to be scattered over W Asia for centuries until about 1100 B.C. Nomadic peoples, mostly Semitic—sometimes raiders, sometimes skilled artisans—they frequently offered themselves as mercenaries and slaves, with individuals occasionally rising to prominence. In EGYPT, the Israelites were reduced to a lowly position and later moved about in the wilderness. Using the etymology mentioned above, some have suggested that the Hebrews were “those who crossed over” in the sense of trespassing, thus, “trespassers.”

Overview of Hebrews

Author: Anonymous (some parts of the early church attributed it to PAUL; suggestions include BARNABAS, APOLLOS, and others).

Historical setting: Addressed to Hebrew Christians (possibly living in or near ROME) who were suffering persecution and who were tempted to return to JUDAISM, thus abandoning the uniqueness of CHRIST and his priestly ministry. The letter was probably written shortly before A.D. 70, but some date it later.

Purpose: To prevent the apostasy of the readers by establishing the superiority of Christ over the old covenant.

Contents: The superiority of Christ over the angels (Heb. 1-2), over MOSES and JOSHUA (chs. 3-4), and over the Aaronic priesthood (chs. 5-7); the obsolescence of the old covenant (chs. 8:1—10:18); perseverance in faith (10:19—12:29); various exhortations and greetings (ch. 13).

In the NT, the name Hebrews serves to differentiate between the Greeks and Hellenistic culture on the one hand and Jews and their traditional life and speech on the other (Acts 6:1). Most NT references to the “Hebrew” language in the KJV (Jn. 5:2 et al.) probably refer to ARAMAIC, that is, the language normally spoken by the Hebrew people at the time (but in Rev. 9:11 and 16:16 the reference is to Hebrew proper).

Hebrews, Letter to the. The longest of the non-Pauline letters in the NT. Traditionally it follows the thirteen letters attributed to PAUL, although the order varies among the MSS (in the great uncials it comes between Paul’s nine letters to churches and his four to individuals).

I. Authorship. The writer of Hebrews did not attach his name to the letter, and thus there has been much discussion since the second century as to who wrote this document. Early Christians held various opinions. Those on the eastern shore of the MEDITERRANEAN and around ALEXANDRIA associated the book with Paul. Origen (A.D. 185-254) held that the thoughts of the book were Paul's, but the language and composition were someone else's. In N Africa, Tertullian (155-225) thought that BAR-NABAS was the author. Although the letter was apparently first known in ROME and (1 Clement, dated around 95, cites Hebrews frequently), for 200 years Christians in Rome and the West were unanimous in their opinion that Paul did not write Hebrews. These early Christians did not say who wrote it.

Present-day Christians should hardly be dogmatic about an issue that from the very beginning of the church has been surrounded with uncertainty. A careful study of the letter in the Greek text discloses some important things about the author. (1) The letter has a polished Greek style, like that of a master rhetorician. The continuous use of this style is unlike Paul's. (2) The vocabulary, figures of speech, and manner of argument show an Alexandrian and Philonic influence (see PHILO). Paul, having come from TARSUS and having been educated in JERUSALEM, did not have such a background. (3) Both Paul and the writer of Hebrews quote the OT frequently. But the way they introduce their quotations is quite different. Paul's formulas—"just as it has been written" (nineteen times), "it has been written" (ten times), "the Scripture says" (six times), "the Scripture proclaims good tidings beforehand" (one time)—never occur in Hebrews. Paul's manner of introducing quotations puts the reader's attention on the content quoted. The writer of Hebrews, as an orator, puts the stress on the one who speaks. For him the Father, Christ, or the Holy Spirit is speaking.

Many present-day scholars favor APOLLOS as the possible writer of Hebrews. He was a Jew, born in Alexandria, a learned and cultured man, well-versed in the Scriptures (Acts 18:24). Being orally taught the way of the Lord, Apollos was teaching about Jesus even when he knew only the baptism of JOHN THE BAPTIST (18:25). He was a man of enthusiasm. PRISCILLA and AQUILA, Paul's friends, led Apollos to a fuller knowledge of Christ (18:26). After he received this knowledge, he was a man of courage. He left EPHESUS for ACHAIA to help the believers there (18:27). He consistently used the Scriptures in his public preaching (18:25). Paul testifies to Apollos's capability in 1 Cor. 1-4. Perhaps his polished rhetorical style was a contributing cause to the Apollos party that was found in CORINTH (1 Cor. 3:4-6). Apollos's modesty and desire to avoid friction are seen in 1 Cor. 16:12. He was still an active coworker of Paul late in Paul's ministry (see Tit. 3:13). In Apollos one can explain all of Hebrews' similarities with Paul as well as the distinct differences from Paul.

II. Original readers. As far as we can determine, the letter was first known in Rome and the West. Its first readers were Jewish Christians who spoke and wrote Greek. The brief statement "Those from Italy send you their greetings” (Heb. 13:24) certainly favors the readers’ being located in Italy. If the writer had been in Italy, he would have named the precise place. A letter from any city in the United States would not say, “Those from the United States send greetings”; but if the letter came from an interior city of India or Brazil where Americans were present, such a greeting would be appropriate. Hence, it appears there were Italian Christians with the writer somewhere outside of Italy as he penned this letter. The writer knows the readers well. He refers to their spiritual dullness (5:11-14), their faithful ministering to the saints (6:9-10), and their experiences after their conversion (10:32-36). Their first leaders seem to have died (13:7), while their present leaders are continually engaged in the task of watching over the flock (13:17). To these the writer sends greetings (13:24).

Although we cannot be absolutely certain, it seems best to regard the original readers as being located somewhere in Italy. Many roads led to Rome. These believers may have been in one of the cities nearer or farther from the capital. Paul himself spent seven days with the brothers in PUTEOLI (Acts 28:13-14). They could have been in Rome or its suburbs. As the writer pens this letter, TIMOTHY has departed from him and is absent—very likely on some tour of churches. As soon as he appears (or if he comes soon), the writer and Timothy together will visit the readers (Heb. 13:23).

III. Outline and summary of content—An outline shows the centrality of Jesus Christ in the Book of Hebrews.

A. Prologue: course and climax of divine revelation (Heb. 1:1-3)

B. Preeminence of Christ himself (1:4—4:13)

1. Superiority of Christ to angels (1:4-14)
2. Warning: peril of indifference to these truths (2:1-4)
3. Reason Christ became human (2:5-18)
4. Christ’s position is greater than that of Moses (3:1-6)
5. Warning: unbelief brings temporal and eternal effects (3:7—4:13)

C. Priesthood of Jesus Christ (4:14—10:18)

1. Importance of his priesthood for the believer’s conduct (4:14-16)
2. Qualifications of a high priest (5:1-10)
3. Warning: immaturity and apostasy are conquered only by faith, long suffering, and hope (5:11—6:20a)
4. Melchizedek’s eternal successor (6:20b—7:28)
5. Heavenly sanctuary and new covenant (8:1-13)

6. Priestly service under the old covenant and the new (9:1-28)

7. Inadequacy of the sacrifices under the law contrasted with the efficacy and finality of Christ's sacrifice (10:1-18)

D. Perseverance of Christians (10:19—12:29)

1. Attitudes to be sought and attitudes to be shunned (10:19-39)

2. Faith in action—illustrious examples from the past (11:1-40)

3. Incentives for action in the present scene and in the future goal (12:1-29)

E. Postscript: exhortations, personal concerns, benediction (13:1-25)

Although God spoke to the fathers by the prophets, he has now spoken by his Son. In the prologue we see the distinctiveness of the Son. He is before history, in history, above history, the goal of history, and the agent who brings about a cleansing of people from sins committed in history. He shares the essence of Deity and radiates the glory of Deity. He is the supreme revelation of God (Heb. 1:1-3).

The writer's first main task is to make clear the preeminence of Christ (Heb. 1:4—4:13). He is superior to ANGELS. They assist those who will be heirs of salvation. Christ, by virtue of who he is, of God's appointment, and of what he has done, stands exalted far above them. It would be tragic to be careless of the great salvation that he proclaimed. He will achieve the promise that all things will be in harmonious subjection to man. He can do this because he is fully man and has provided the expiation for sins. He is superior to MOSES, for Moses was a servant among the people of God, while Christ is a Son over the people of God. It would be tragic to cease trusting him. Unbelief kept one entire generation of Israelites from Canaan. Christians are warned of such unbelief. FAITH is emphasized as well as zeal to enter into the eternal rest of God. Both the GOSPEL of God and God himself scrutinize people.

The second major emphasis in the letter falls on the priesthood of Christ (Heb. 4:14—10:18). Qualifications, conditions, and experiences of the Aaronic priesthood are listed in comparison to Christ as a priest. Before further developing this theme, the writer warns his readers of their unpreparedness for advanced teaching. Only earnest diligence in the things of God will bring them out of immaturity. Christ as a priest, like MELCHIZEDEK, is superior to the Levitical priesthood because his life is indestructible. He is both priest and sacrifice. His priesthood is eternal. His sanctuary is in heaven and his blood establishes the validity of the new covenant, which is also an eternal covenant. His one offering on behalf of sins is final—it is for all time. Likewise he has made perfect for all time those who are in the process of being sanctified.

The last main section of Hebrews deals with the response of Christians (10:19—12:29). Perseverance on the part of Christians springs out of fellowship with God, activity for God, faith in God, and a consciousness of what lies ahead. Then, in concluding the letter, the writer puts stress on the CROSS as the Christian altar and the resurrection of the Shepherd of the sheep as the basis for God's action. Such redemptive-historical events move the believer to action (13:1-25).

IV. Teaching. Much is said about Christ. He is fully God and fully man. He is active in CREATION. The ATONEMENT of Christ, as both priest and sacrificial victim, is developed in detail. In the role of a priest, he is a leader and guide. He also is the revealer of God. Great depth is achieved in all of these teachings about Christ's person and work. The HOLY SPIRIT is mentioned only seven times—three times in reference to the inspiration of the OT, once in regard to the work of Christ, once in regard to the apostate's rejection of Christianity, and twice in regard to the believer. The old and new COVENANTS are compared and reasons for the superiority of the new or eternal covenant are given.

The doctrine of SIN in Hebrews focuses attention on unbelief and the failure to go on with God to the eternal city. Shadow and reality are carefully contrasted. Heaven is the scene of reality. Earth is concerned with both shadow and reality. Christ is the bridge between the temporary and the eternal. The people of God are looked on as migrating from a transitory setting to an abiding city. This migration involves God's Word; the matter of testing, discipline, or punishment; faithfulness; and God's activity in sanctifying or making holy. The Christian life is developed in the framework of this heavenly pilgrimage. ESCHATOLOGY or last things involves the obtaining of eternal rest, a final shaking of heaven and earth, the personal return of Christ, and glory belonging to God for ever and ever.

Hebron (person). hee'bruhn (Heb. ḥebrôn H2497, "associate, companion"; gentilic ḥebrônî H2498, "Hebronite"). (1) Son of KOHATH, grandson of LEVI, and uncle of MOSES (Exod. 6:18; Num. 3:19, 27; 1 Chr. 6:2, 18; 15:9; 23:12, 19; 24:23); eponymous ancestor of the Hebronite Levitical clan, which played an important role during the time of DAVID (Num. 3:27; 26:58; 1 Chr. 26:23, 30-31).

(2) Son of MARESHAH and great-grandson of CALEB (1 Chr. 2:42-43). The Hebrew text is difficult and variously emended. According to the SEPTUAGINT, Mareshah (not Mesha) was the firstborn of Caleb, in which case Hebron would be Caleb's grandson; according to other reconstructions, Hebron is removed from Caleb by several generations. There may be a connection between Hebron son of Mareshah and HEBRON (PLACE).

Hebron (place). hee'bruhn (Heb. ḥebrôn H2496, "association"). A city located about 20 mi. (32 km.) SSW of JERUSALEM on the main road to BEERSHEBA. Hebron has one of the longest records of continuous occupation. Though lying in a shallow valley, it is about 3,000 ft. (915 m.) above sea level and 4,300 ft. (1,310 m.) above the DEAD SEA, which lies a few miles E of Hebron. The hills about the city still bear choice grapes, and the Jewish people there make a fine wine. The Valley of ESHCOL, from which the spies brought an immense cluster of grapes (Num. 13:22-24), runs quite near Hebron. The town's original name was KIRIATH ARBA (Josh. 14:15; 15:13).

The region of Hebron looking to the W.

Hebron is replete with historical interest. It was a camping place for Abram (ABRAHAM); here he moved his tent and lived by the “great trees of Mamre” (Gen. 13:18, mistranslated in KJV as “the plain of Mamre”). MAMRE was close to Hebron, and here Abram built an altar to the Lord. The only land that Abram owned, though God had promised him Canaan (15:18-21), was the field of MACHPELAH near Mamre, which he purchased from the HITTITES as a burial place for SARAH (Gen. 23:17-20; Heb. 11:8-10). In this cave Sarah and Abraham, later ISAAC and REBEKAH, then JACOB and LEAH, were buried. At the partition of Canaan after the partial conquest, Hebron and its environs were given to CALEB to conquer (Josh. 14:6-15), and he did so (15:14-19); but later the city itself was given to the Kohathite LEVITES (1 Chr. 6:55-56), though Caleb’s descendants kept the suburban fields and villages. When DAVID was king over Judah, but not yet over all Israel, his capital city was Hebron for seven and a half years. There the elders of Israel anointed him king over all Israel (2 Sam. 5:3-5). Later he moved the capital to Jerusalem. When ABSALOM rebelled against his father, he made Hebron his headquarters and there prepared his coup d’état (2 Sam. 15:7-12). (With regard to Josh. 19:28 KJV, see EBRON.)

hedge. This noun is used by the NIV twice, in both cases with reference to thorn shrubs (Isa. 5:5; Mic. 7:4). Verbal expressions are used figuratively to refer to God's protecting care (Job 1:10) or his constraint (3:23). The KJV uses the noun in other passages, mainly in figurative contexts (e.g., Ps. 80:12; Ezek. 13:5).

heel. The Hebrew word ʿāqēb H6811 is twice used in a literal sense of ESAU's heel, which JACOB grasped while still in the womb of REBEKAH (Gen. 25:26; Hos. 12:3). Elsewhere, the term heel is use in a figurative sense. In the protevangelium (Gen. 3:15), God said that the seed of the woman would bruise the serpent's head, but the serpent would bruise his heel—clearly a reference to the conflict between Satan and the Son of God and the utter defeat Christ would administer to the foe responsible for his crucifixion at Calvary (cf. 49:17, 19; Job 18:9). The psalmist laments that the bosom friend whom he trusted and who dined at his table lifted his heel against him, that is, spurned him with brutal violence or perhaps kicked him when he was down (Ps. 41:9). Jesus referred to this statement at the Last Passover and applied it to himself; the bosom friend who ate with him and then betrayed him was JUDAS ISCARIOT (Jn. 13:18).

Hegai. heg'i (Heb. hēgē H2043 and hēgay H2051, derivation uncertain). EUNUCH of King XERXES in charge of the HAREM; he was entrusted with the women from whom the king intended to choose a queen to replace VASHTI (Esth. 2:3 [KJV, "Hege"], 8, 15). ESTHER quickly won Hegai's favor, and he provided her with special treatment (v. 9). Another part of the harem was the responsibility of SHAASGAZ (v. 14).

Hege. See HEGAI.

Heglam. heg'luhm (Heb. heglām, from gālā H1655, hiphil "to take into exile"). Son of EHUD and father of Uzza and Ahihud (1 Chr. 8:7 NRSV). The passage is difficult, however, and it is possible that a person named Heglam did not exist. The Hebrew text rendered by the NRSV as "Gera, that is, Heglam" can be rendered "Gera, who deported them" (so NIV; cf. KJV).

heifer. See ANIMALS.

heifer, red. See RED HEIFER.

heir. See INHERITANCE.

Helah. hee'luh (Heb. ḥel āh H2690, “necklace”). One of the two wives of ASHHUR (apparently founder of the town of TEKOA), who is included in the genealogy of JUDAH; she had four children (1 Chr. 4:5, 7).

Helam. hee'luhm (Heb. ḥêlām H2663, meaning unknown). A town in TRANSJORDAN to which the ARAMEANS under HADADEZER retreated after JOAB initially routed them; there they were subsequently defeated by DAVID (2 Sam. 10:16-17). Some identify Helam with Alema (1 Macc. 5:26), which is modern ḥAlma in HAURAN, c. 50 mi. (80 km.) S of DAMASCUS and c. 35 mi. (56 km.) E of the Sea of Galilee.

Helbah. hel'buḥ (Heb. ḥelbâ H2695, possibly “forest” or “fruitful”). A town in the tribal territory of ASHER from which Israel could not expel the Canaanites (Jdg. 1:31). Similarity in the consonants and location leads many scholars to identify Helbah with AHLAB (1:31) and MAHALAB (Josh. 19:29) at modern Khirbet el-Maḥalib, 4 mi. (6 km.) NE of TYRE on the coast.

Helbon. hel'bon (Heb. ḥelbôn H2696, possibly “forest” or “fruitful”). A city or region mentioned by EZEKIEL in his lamentation over TYRE (Ezek. 27:18). From Helbon wine was imported to Tyre by traders of DAMASCUS. It is probably to be identified with the Valley of Halbun, some 12 mi. (19 km.) N of Damascus. The area has been famous from ancient times for its fine wines, preferred even by kings.

Heldai. hel'di (Heb. ḥelday H2702, possibly “mole”). (1) A descendant of OTHNIEL from the town of NETOPHAH who served as captain of the temple guard for the twelfth monthly course (1 Chr. 27:15). He is probably the same as HELED.

(2) One of a group of Jewish exiles who brought gold and silver from BABYLON to help those who had returned under ZERUBBABEL; from these gifts a crown was to be made for Joshua (J^{ESHUA}) the high priest (Zech. 6:10; in v. 14 the MT has hēlem [cf. KJV, “Helem”], apparently a scribal error or an alternate name for Heldai).

Heleb. See HELED.

Helech. hee’lik (Heb. hēlēk H2662). TNIV Helek. A city or region that, along with ARVAD (a Phoenician island town), supplied sailors and soldiers for TYRE (Ezek. 27:11). Although several identifications have been suggested, perhaps the least objectionable proposal is to equate Helech with Assyrian Ḫilakku, that is, CILICIA, in SE ASIA MINOR. The SEPTUAGINT and the KJV (“thine army”) interpret the Hebrew word not as a name but as the common noun ḥayil H2657 with suffix (2nd person fem. sing.). This view is preferred by some scholars.

Heled. hee’lid (Heb. hēled H2699, possibly “mold”; in 2 Sam. 23:29, most Heb. MSS have hēleb, possibly “fruitful”). Son of Baanah from the town of NETOPHAH; he is included in the list of DAVID’s mighty men (23:29 [KJV, “Heleb”]; 1 Chr. 11:30).

Helek. hee’lik (Heb. hēleq H2751, “portion, lot”; gentilic ḥelqî H2757, “Helekite”). (1) Son of GILEAD and great-grandson of MANASSEH; eponymous ancestor of the Helekite clan (Num. 26:30). Elsewhere, however, “the sons of Helek” (Josh. 17:2, lit. trans.) are listed with other Manassite clans as receiving an inheritance W of the Jordan, in distinction from the Gileadites, who were granted territory in TRANSJORDAN.

(2) TNIV form of HELECH.

Helem. hee’lim (Heb. hēlem H2152, meaning uncertain). (1) Son of Heber and great-grandson of ASHER (1 Chr. 7:35); many scholars emend the text to HOTHAM (on the basis of v. 32).

(2) A variant form of HELDAI (Zech. 6:14 KJV and other versions, following the MT).

Heleph. hee’lif (Heb. hēlep H2738, possibly “replacement [place]” or “marsh grass [settlement]”). The (western) starting point of the southern boundary of the tribe of NAPHTALI (Josh. 19:33). The precise location of Heleph is uncertain, but many scholars identify it with Khirbet ʿIrbadeh, about 3 mi. (5 km.) NE of Mount T_{ABOR}.

Helez. heeʿliz (Heb. ḥeleṣ H2742, possibly “[God/Yahweh] has rescued”). (1) One of DAVID’s mighty men, identified as “the Paltite” (2 Sam. 23:26), meaning probably a native of BETH PELET or perhaps a descendant of PELET the Calebite; in the parallel list he is called “the Pelonite” (1 Chr. 11:27), a term of unknown derivation and maybe a scribal misspelling. He is probably the same as “Helez the Pelonite, an Ephraimite,” commander of the seventh division (27:10).

(2) Son of Azariah, included in the genealogy of JUDAH (1 Chr. 2:39).

Heli. heeʿli (Gk. Ēli G2459 [some edd. Hēli or Hēlei], from Heb. ʿēlî H6603, possibly “lofty” or “[God/Yahweh] is high”). Son of MATTHAT and father of JOSEPH according to Luke’s GENEALOGY OF JESUS CHRIST (Lk. 3:23). Because the parallel passage lists Matthan son of Eleazar as the father of Joseph (Matt. 1:15), some regard Heli as his grandfather, perhaps corresponding to Eleazar. Others argue that Luke gives Mary’s genealogy, in which case Heli is really her father, not Joseph’s.

Heliopolis. heeʿlee-opʿuh-lis (from hēlios G2463, “sun,” and polis G4484, “city”). This name occurs in the NIV as the rendering of Hebrew ʾāwen H225, corresponding to Egyptian ʾIwnw (Ezek. 30:17; KJV, AVEN; NRSV, ON); in the NRSV it is used to render bêt šemeš, “house of the sun” (Jer. 43:13; KJV, “Beth-shemesh”; NIV, “the temple of the sun”). Heliopolis was an ancient city in EGYPT, sacred to the sun-god RE and located in Tell el-Hisn, near el-Matarieh, about 10 mi. (16 km.) out of Cairo to the NNE. It first attained prominence in the Old Kingdom (Pyramid Age) of Egyptian history, when the pharaohs used a solar symbol for their tombs and adopted the title “Son of Re.” The main temple in Heliopolis accordingly was that of Re, or Reē-Atum, the site being marked by the remains of a great enclosure and by the sole remaining obelisk of Sesostri I (c. 1900 B.C.). This was doubtless the structure at which Joseph’s father-in-law POTIPHERAH (POTIPHAR) subsequently served as “priest of On” (high priest in Heliopolis?), an affiliation reflected by his name, which means “gift of Re” (Gen. 41:45, 50; 46:20).

Three OT passages appear to refer to Heliopolis. The CITY OF DESTRUCTION in Isa. 19:18 is possibly a Hebrew pun for City of the Sun, that is, Heliopolis. Ezekiel’s judgment on Egypt (Ezek. 30:17) included Aven, perhaps also a pun (ʾāwen, “wickedness,” for ʾôn H228, “On” or Heliopolis). Similarly, Jeremiah threatened that NEBUCHADNEZZAR of Babylon would ravage Egypt's temples with fire, and "break the obelisks of Heliopolis" (Jer. 43:13 NRSV).

Helkai. hel'ki (Heb. ḥelqāy H2758, short form of ḥilqiyyāhû H2760, "Yahweh is my portion" [see HILKIAH]). The head of a priestly house who returned from exile with ZERUBBABEL (Neh. 12:15).

Helkath. hel'kath (Heb. ḥelqat H2762, "smooth place" or "plot of ground"). A town that served to mark the boundary of the tribal territory of ASHER (Josh. 19:25). It was one of four cities from this tribe that were assigned to the LEVITE family descended from GERSHON (21:31; called HUKOK in the parallel passage, 1 Chr. 6:75). Its precise location is uncertain, but two possible identifications are Khirbet el-Harbaj, c. 12 mi. (19 km.) S of ACCO, and Tell el-Qassis, some 5 mi. (8 km.) farther S and closer to the exit of the valley of ESDRAELON.

Helkath Hazzurim. hel'kath-haz'yoo-rim (Heb. ḥelqat haṣṣurîm H2763, meaning debated). A place near the pool of GIBEON where twelve men under JOAB fought to the death with an equal number from ABNER's forces (2 Sam. 2:16); the precise location is unknown.

hell. This English word (from a Germanic root meaning "concealed place" or "underworld") is used by the KJV in the OT to render Hebrew šē'ôl H8619 (Deut. 32:22 et al.; see SHEOL); in the NT it renders Greek hadēs G87 (Matt. 11:23 et al.; see HADES) and geenna G1147 (5:2 et al.; see GEHENNA). The NIV and other modern versions use it almost exclusively as a translation of this last term, which refers to the Valley of HINNOM (Wadi er-Rababi, just SW of JERUSALEM), the location of the notorious sacrificial offering by fire of children to the god MOLECH (2 Chr. 28:3; 33:6; cf. 2 Ki. 23:10; Jer. 7:32; 19:6). The apocalyptic book of 1 Enoch states that there would be an abyss filled with fire S of Jerusalem into which ungodly Israelites would be thrown. Later the idea was extended so that this place was conceived to be the scene of fiery punishment for all of the ungodly. Still later, when the place of punishment was conceived of as under the earth, the idea of fiery torment was maintained. (The English term occurs also as part of a phrase used to render tartaroō G5434, "to send to hell," 2 Pet. 2:4. In Gk. mythology, Tartarus was the name of a deep abyss below Hades where the Titans were imprisoned, but in time the term became roughly equivalent to Hades.)

Some ancients believed that this cave at Caesarea Philippi (modern Panias) was an entrance into the Underworld.

The real existence of hell is irrefutably taught in Scripture as both a place of the wicked dead and a condition of retribution for unredeemed man. The nature of hell is indicated by the repeated reference to eternal punishment (Matt. 25:46), eternal fire (Matt. 18:8; Jude 7), everlasting chains (Jude 6), the pit of the Abyss (Rev. 9:2, 11), outer darkness (Matt. 8:12), the wrath of God (Rom. 2:5), second death (Rev. 21:8), eternal destruction from the face of God (2 Thess. 1:9), and eternal sin (Mk. 3:29). While many of these terms are symbolic and descriptive, they connote real entities, about whose existence there can be no doubt. The duration is explicitly indicated in the NT. As the everlasting life of the believer is to be endless, just so the retributive aspect of hell refers to the future infinite age (Matt. 18:8; 25:41, 46; Mk. 3:29; 2 Thess. 1:9; Heb. 6:2; Jude 7).

Hell is, therefore, both a condition of retribution and a place in which the retribution occurs. In both of these aspects the three basic ideas associated with the concept of hell are reflected: absence of righteousness, separation from God, and judgment. The absence of personal righteousness, with its correlative of the presence of personal unrighteousness, renders the individual unable to enter a right relationship with the holy God (Mk. 3:29). The eternal state of the wicked, therefore, will involve a separation from the presence of God (Jn. 3:36). The concept of judgment is heightened by the note of finality in the warnings against sin (Matt. 8:12). When all else has been said about hell, however, there is still the inescapable fact taught by Scripture that it will be a retributive judgment on the spirit of sinners, the inner essence of their being. The severity of the judgment will be on the fixed character of a person's essential nature—the soul, which will involve eternal loss in exclusion from Christ's kingdom and fellowship with God.

Hellenism. (from Hellēn G1818, “Greek”). The civilization and culture of ancient GREECE; especially, the dissemination and adoption of Greek thought, customs, and lifestyle. It often implies the fusion of Greek and non-Greek culture. (Among classical scholars, the term Hellenistic is primarily a chronological designation, covering the period from Alexander to the beginnings of the Roman empire. In biblical scholarship, the term has a broader connotation and is roughly equivalent to Greco-Roman.)

ALEXANDER THE GREAT, who was taught by Aristotle, devoted his life to conquering the world for the spread of Greek culture. He was convinced of the superiority of the Greek way of life and carried with him on his campaigns copies of Homer's Iliad and Odyssey. His eleven years of conquest changed the course of history, introducing a new lifestyle that affected every nation conquered, even the Jewish nation. Alexander and his successors broke down the old national, political, cultural, and religious establishment and introduced Greek culture by establishing new colonies and cities, by rapidly spreading the Koine (see GREEK LANGUAGE), and by the intermarriages of the Greeks with the Asiatics. When the SELEUCID empire gained control of Palestine in 198 B.C., the Jewish people came under severe pressure to hellenize, and many resisted it, leading to the Maccabean War beginning in 168 (see MACCABEE). The influence of Hellenism in Palestine, however, could not be totally prevented. The entrenchment of Greek culture can more readily be seen among the Jews of the Diaspora (DISPERSION), especially in ALEXANDRIA (see PHILO JUDAEUS).

Hellenistic influence is apparent early in the church's history (in Gk. literature, the term Hellēnistēs G1821 occurs for the first time in the NT, Acts 6:1; 9:29; 11:20; in the last passage, some early witnesses have Hellēnas, i.e., Greeks or Gentiles). According to Acts 6:1, there was a dispute in the Christian community at JERUSALEM between the Hebrews and the Hellenists (KJV, "Grecians"; NIV, "Grecian Jews") because the widows of the Hellenistic group were being neglected in the daily allocation from the common pool of property. Some have thought that these Hellenists were non-Jews, but most scholars believe that the passage refers to Jews who spoke Greek (in contrast to the "Hebrews," who spoke Hebrew or, more likely, Aramaic). These "Hellenists" were probably Jews from the Diaspora who had returned to Palestine. (See PAUL; STEPHEN.) In the past, some scholars argued that such individuals had a liberal attitude to the adoption of Greco-Roman ways and that they would often have been in conflict with the stricter Jews native to Judea. Diaspora Jews, no doubt, were sometimes viewed with suspicion, but it is widely agreed now that the evidence does not support a sharp dichotomy between Hellenistic and "Hebraic" Jews with regard to their approach to the Mosaic law.

Hellenists. See HELLENISM.

helmet. See ARMS AND ARMOR.

Helon. hee'lon (Heb. hēlōn H2735, “strong”). Father of ELLIAB; the latter was a leader of the tribe of ZEBULUN at the time of MOSES (Num. 1:9; 2:7; 7:24, 29; 10:16).

Helper. See ADVOCATE; HOLY SPIRIT.

helpmeet. This English noun, meaning “helpmate,” does not occur in the Bible, but apparently was coined due to a popular misunderstanding of the KJV rendering, “I will make him an help meet [i.e., a helper suitable] for him” (Gen. 2:18, 20 KJV). See ADAM; EVE.

helps. In the NT there are four lists of “gifts” that God has given to his church (Rom. 12:6-8; 1 Cor. 12:7-11, 28-31; Eph. 4:11-12; see GIFTS, SPIRITUAL), and these are not to be confused with the officers who are listed elsewhere. “Helps” are mentioned only in 1 Cor. 12:28, and the term refers to the ability to perform helpful works in a gracious manner.

hem (of a garment). The part of the outer garment (upper or lower) that would hang down loosely. The Hebrews were instructed to wear TASSELS on the four corners of the outer garment as a constant reminder of the commandments (Num. 15:38-39; Deut. 22:12). AARON’S robe was to have golden bells and pomegranates on its hem (Exod. 28:33-34; 39:24-26). The hem or fringe of Jesus’ garment plays an important role with the hemorrhaging woman who believed that she would be healed if she could but touch the hem of his cloak; Jesus responded to her faith and granted her request (Lk. 8:43-48).

Hemam. hee'mam (Heb. hēmām H2123). Son of the clan chief LOTAN and grandson of SEIR the HORITE (Gen. 36:22 KJV). The NIV reads HOMAM on the basis of the parallel passage (1 Chr. 1:39), whereas the NRSV renders it HEMAN.

Heman. hee'muhn (Heb. hēmān H2124). (1) Son of the clan chief LOTAN and grandson of SEIR the HORITE (Gen. 36:22 NRSV, following the LXX). The KJV follows the MT, HEMAM, whereas the NIV has HOMAM (1 Chr. 1:39).

(2) Son (or descendant) of ZERAH and grandson (or more distant descendant) of JUDAH (1 Chr. 2:6). He is also listed as one of “the sons of Mahol” (meaning perhaps “members of the musical guild”) who were regarded as wise men (1 Ki. 4:31). See DARDA; ETHAN; MAHOL.

(3) Son of Joel and grandson of SAMUEL; a Kohathite prophet-musician (see KOHATH) whom DAVID appointed to lead in the musical services (1 Chr. 6:33; 2 Chr. 5:12). He is usually mentioned along with ASAPH and ETHAN (JEDUTHUN): they were responsible for sounding the trumpets, the bronze cymbals, and other instruments (1 Chr. 15:17, 19; 16:41-42); and some of their sons were set apart “for the ministry of prophesying, accompanied by harps, lyres and cymbals” (25:1). Heman, also called “the king’s seer,” had fourteen sons and three daughters, divinely given to him “through the promises of God to exalt him” (25:4-6).

Hemath. See HAMATH; HAMMATH.

Hemdan. hem’dan (Heb. ḥemdān H2777, possibly “desirable”). Son of the clan chief DISHON and grandson of SEIR the HORITE (Gen. 36:26; also 1 Chr. 1:41 NIV [following a significant number of Heb. and Gk. MSS], where KJV has “Amram” and NRSV “Hamran” [MT, ḥamrān]).

hemlock. See PLANTS.

hemorrhage. See DISEASE.

hemorrhoids. See DISEASE.

hen. See BIRDS (under chicken).

Hen (person). hen (Heb. ḥēn H2835, “gracious”). Son of a certain Zephaniah; he was one of several men to whom was given the crown that was made for Joshua (JESHUA) the high priest (Zech. 6:14; NRSV, “Josiah”). Hen was apparently another name, or perhaps a descriptive title (cf. NIV mg.) for Josiah son of Zephaniah; if so, it was in his house that the crown was made (v. 10).

Hena. hen´uh (Heb. hēna ¢ H2184, meaning uncertain). One of several Syrian city-states vanquished by SENNACHERIB (2 Ki. 18:34; 19:13; Isa. 37:13). Because Hena is listed along with HAMATH and ARPAD (also SEPHARVAIM and IVVAH), it is thought to have been located in N SYRIA. Some scholars, noticing that Hena and Ivvah are not mentioned in similar lists (2 Ki. 17:24; Isa. 36:19), and suspecting that they are not true geographical names, have suggested that they are pagan deities or that the text is corrupt.

Henadad. hen´uh-dad (Heb. hēnādād H2836, “favor of [the god] HADAD”). Father or ancestor of a family of priests who helped rebuild the temple under ZERUBBABEL (Ezra 3:9), assisted in repairing the wall of JERUSALEM in the time of NEHEMIAH (Neh. 3:18, 24), and signed the covenant (10:9).

henna. See PLANTS.

Enoch. See ENOCH; HANOCH.

Hepher (person). hee´fuhr (Heb. hēper H2918, possibly “protector”; gentilic heprî H2920, “Heph-erite”). (1) Son of GILEAD, descendant of MANASSEH, father of ZELOPHEHAD, and ancestor of the Hephherite clan (Num. 26:32; 27:1; Josh. 17:2-3). His clan may be associated with HEPHER (PLACE).

(2) Son of ASHHUR (apparently founder of the town of TEKOA) by his wife Naarah; included in the genealogy of JUDAH (1 Chr. 4:6).

(3) A MEKERATHITE, included among DAVID’s mighty warriors (1 Chr. 11:36; his name is missing in the parallel list in 2 Sam. 23).

Hepher (place). hee´fuhr (Heb. hēper H2919, possibly “protector” or “[water] hole”). A Canaanite royal city whose king was defeated by JOSHUA (Josh. 12:17). Presumably, it was part of the “land of Hepher,” which became the third administrative district under BEN-HESED in the time of SOLOMON (1 Ki. 4:10). Possible identifications are el-Ifshar (c. 25 mi./40 km. NNE of JOPPA and only 3 mi./5 km. from the coast) and Tell el-Muhaffar in the hill country of MANASSEH (c. 2 mi./3 km. NW of DOTHAN).

Hephzibah. hef'zi-buh (Heb. ḥep̄ṣî-bāh H2915, “my delight is in her”). (1) Wife of King HEZEKIAH and mother of King MANASSEH (2 Ki. 21:1).

(2) Symbolic name of ZION (Isa. 62:4; the NRSV translates the name, “My Delight Is in Her”). See BEULAH.

herald. A messenger who proclaims important news. The term is used occasionally in Bible versions (e.g., Dan. 3:4; 1 Tim. 2:7; 2 Tim. 1:11). A herald was usually a representative of a royal or government official having as his specific responsibility the bearing of a message. The message and whom he represented was his primary concern, and he was to remain secondary.

herb. See PLANTS.

herd. Both before and after the conquest of Canaan, the Israelites were a pastoral people for the most part. The herds consisted of the larger ANIMALS, as contrasted with the flocks of sheep, goats, etc. The cattle were used in plowing and threshing and for sacrifice but were not commonly fattened for food.

herdsman. See OCCUPATIONS AND PROFESSIONS.

Heres. hihr'iz (Heb. ḥeres H3065, possibly “sunny”). (1) “Mount Heres” (NRSV, “Har-heres”) is mentioned, along with AIJALON and SHAALBIM, as one of the places from which the tribe of DAN could not drive out the AMORITES (Jdg. 1:34-35). It is usually identified with the town of IR SHEMESH (“city of the sun,” Josh. 19:41) which in turn is probably the same as BETH SHEMESH (“house of the sun,” Josh. 15:10 et al.), on the boundary between Judah and Dan. However, it would be unusual to call a village a har H2215 (“mountain”), and some scholars prefer to identify it with a mountain range on the E side of the Valley of Aijalon.

(2) The “Pass [or Ascent] of Heres” was apparently a place E of the JORDAN from which GIDEON returned after defeating two kings of MIDIAN (Jdg. 8:13). The text can be interpreted differently, however (KJV translates, “before the sun was up”). If it is indeed a geographical reference, the site is unknown.

See also CITY OF DESTRUCTION.

Heresh. hih^rish (Heb. hereš H3090, “silent, mute”). A LEVITE, listed among those who returned from the EXILE (1 Chr. 9:15; his name is omitted in the parallel, Neh. 11:15).

heresy. This English term is derived (through French and Latin) from Greek hairesis G146, which meant “a taking” or “choice,” hence “opinion, way of thinking.” In the Hellenistic period it came to mean “[political] preference,” then “system, sect, faction.” Not till the second century A.D. did the word come to mean specifically a position or doctrine at variance with established, orthodox church doctrine (though this was a natural development from negative uses in the NT). In the book of Acts, the word is applied to the religious “parties” of the SADDUCEES and PHARISEES (Acts 5:17; 15:5). PAUL was accused of being “a ringleader of the Nazarene sect” (24:5; cf. 24:14; 28:22). A negative element is more apparent when the apostle speaks about the “factions” present in the Corinthian church (1 Cor. 11:19 NRSV; NIV, “differences”), for in the same context he uses the stronger term schisma G5388, “division, split” (vv. 10, 18; cf. also Gal. 5:20). The NT use closest to the later technical, theological meaning is found in 2 Pet. 2:1, which states that false teachers “will secretly introduce destructive heresies [NRSV, opinions], even denying the sovereign Lord who bought them—bringing swift destruction on themselves.” This language implies willful departure from accepted teaching.

Hereth. hih^rith (Heb. heret H3101, meaning uncertain). KJV Hareth. The name of a forest in the tribal territory of JUDAH where DAVID hid after he left his parents in MOAB for their safety (1 Sam. 22:5). Its location is unknown.

heritage. See INHERITANCE.

Hermas. huh^rmuhs (Gk. Hermas G2254). One of several Christians in Rome that PAUL greets by name in his letter to the church there (Rom. 16:14b; note that the KJV, following the TR, reverses the names “Hermas” and “Hermes”). It was thought by some in the ancient church that he was the author of Shepherd of Hermas; this work, however, was probably composed over a period of time in the second century (see APOSTOLIC FATHERS).

hermeneutics. See INTERPRETATION.

Hermes (deity). huhr'meez (Gk. Hermēs G2258). In Greek mythology, the son of ZEUS and Maia (a Titan nymph), known among the Romans as Mercury. Diverse ideas were associated with him, but he was best known as the messenger of the gods; he was often represented with traveler's cap, winged sandals, and herald's staff. Preferring persuasion to violence, he could be viewed as the god of oratory (the term hermeneutics is derived from his name). It is this role that prompted the people of LYSTRA to identify PAUL, being "the chief speaker," with Hermes (Acts 14:12; KJV, "Mercurius"), while BARNABAS was identified with Zeus. Such a response may have as its background the story of an aged couple who lived in that general region and who entertained Jupiter and Mercury without realizing who they were.

Hermes (person). huhr'meez (Gk. Hermēs G2258). One of several Christians in Rome that PAUL greets by name in his letter to the church there (Rom. 16:14a; note that the KJV, following the TR, reverses the names "Hermas" and "Hermes"). This was a common name, especially among slaves, probably because Hermes was the god of good fortune.

Hermetic writings. A collection of religious and philosophical tractates, the main body of which is known as the Corpus Hermeticum (or simply Hermetica), probably dating around the second or third century A.D. The title of the literature is derived from the name Hermes Trismegistus ("thrice greatest"). See HERMES (DEITY). The work, which probably originated in EGYPT though written in Greek, was a typical product of Hellenistic syncretism. The extant material is in various forms, ranging from the discourses and dialogues of the main corpus of eighteen works (the best-known treatise being the initial one, Poimandres) to a number of fragments, some of which are in the Gnostic library of NAG HAMMADI (see GNOSTICISM).

Hermogenes. huhr-moj'uh-neeZ (Gk. Hermogenēs G2259, "born of HERMES"). Named with PHYGELUS as among the disciples in proconsular ASIA who abandoned PAUL when he rightly expected their support (2 Tim. 1:15). Some view it as a doctrinal defection; others as a refusal to testify in Paul's behalf during the second imprisonment at Rome for fear of sharing Paul's fate.

Mount Hermon, northern boundary of the Promised Land.

Hermon. huhr'muhn (Heb. ḥermôn H3056, possibly “place of consecration [or of the ^{BAN}]”). The mountain that marks the southern terminus of the Antilebanon range. A line drawn from DAMASCUS to TYRE will pass through Mount Hermon at its middle point and will practically coincide with the northern boundary of PALESTINE. The ridge of Hermon is about 20 mi. (32 km.) long. It has three peaks, two of them rising over 9,000 ft. (2,740 m.). Hermon has had several names: the ancient AMORITES called it SENIR, while the people of SIDON called it SIRION (Deut. 3:9), though perhaps different peaks are in view (cf. 1 Chr. 5:23; Cant. 4:8). The Arabs call it Jebel esh-Sheikh or “Mountain of the Old Man,” perhaps because of its white head, but more likely because of its dignity. (See also SIYON.) Hermon is awe-inspiring whether seen from the NE at Damascus, from the W back of Sidon, from the SW at NAZARETH, or from the SE at HAURAN. The Lord’s TRANSFIGURATION almost certainly occurred on its slopes, for he was at CAESAREA PHILIPPI just S of the mountain only a week before.

Hermonites. huhr'muh-nits. KJV rendering of ḥermônîm, plural form of ḥermôn H3056 (Ps. 42:7; NIV, “heights of Hermon”). See HERMON.

Herod. her'uhd (Gk. Hērōdēs G2476). The ruling dynasty in Jewish PALESTINE during the period of Roman domination. When the general Pompey organized the eastern parts of the Roman empire in 63 B.C., he appointed Hyrcanus II to be the high-priestly ruler over much of Palestine. An Idumean by the name of Antipater was Hyrcanus’s senior officer. Gabinius modified Pompey’s arrangement in 57 by reducing Hyrcanus’s authority and dividing the ethnarchy into autonomous communities. Notable services rendered at ALEXANDRIA to Julius CAESAR in 48 led to the restoration of Hyrcanus’s authority and the appointment (in 47) of Antipater to the procuratorship of Judea. Antipater had, in fact, been the leading spirit in the policy that won Caesar’s favor, and Antipater used his advantage with an astuteness that foreshadowed the career of his son. He persuaded the now-aged Hyrcanus to appoint Phasaël, Antipater's eldest son, to the prefecture of JERUSALEM, and Herod, his second son, to the governorship of GALILEE.

When Antipater was murdered in 43 B.C., his two sons succeeded to his position in Hyrcanus's court. It was the year after Julius Caesar's assassination. Jubilant that Caesar's plan for a decisive campaign on the vulnerable eastern frontier of Rome was shelved, the PARTHIANS, the perennial military problem of the NE, were restive. In 40 they penetrated Palestine, carried off Hyrcanus, and drove Phasaël, also a captive, to suicide. Herod eluded both military action and Parthian treachery. He withdrew from Jerusalem, shook off pursuit by clever rearguard skirmishing near BETHLEHEM, and escaped to EGYPT. Outwitting Cleopatra and reaching Rome through the perils of winter voyaging, Herod set his case before Octavian and Antony. It is a remarkable tribute to his charm, daring, political acumen, and consummate diplomacy that he won the support of both triumvirs who were so soon to divide in disastrous rivalry.

The thirteen years that lay between the assassination of Caesar and the emergence of Octavian as the victorious AUGUSTUS, after Antony's defeat at Actium in 31 B.C., were a time of paralysis and uncertainty throughout the Roman world. Herod saw in such confusion the opportunity for decisive action. Landing at Acre (ACCO) in 39, with only the promise of Roman favor, Herod went to claim his kingdom and to unseat the Parthian puppet, Antigonus. Palestine's hill country, deserts, and walled cities called for a variety of military strategies. Herod showed himself the able master of varied types of war. The two years of tireless activity made him, by the age of thirty-six, the master of his inheritance and revealed all the facets of his amazing personality. He was a ruthless fighter but at the same time a cunning negotiator, a subtle diplomat, and an opportunist. He was able to restrain his Roman helpers and simultaneously circumvent the Jews. Between 39 and 37 Herod revealed those qualities that enabled him for thirty-four years to govern subjects who hated him, to work within the major framework of Roman imperial rule, to steer a safe course through political dilemma, and to pursue a dual policy without ruinous contradiction.

In 30 B.C. Herod succeeded in retaining the favor of Octavian. He was confirmed in his kingdom, and for the rest of his life he never departed from the policy of supporting the emperor and in all ways promoting his honor. The restored town of SAMARIA was called Sebaste, the Greek equivalent of Augustus; CAESAREA was built to form a harbor on the difficult open coast of Palestine, providing Rome a base on the edge of a turbulent province, and forming a center of Caesar-worship in the land of the nationalistic and monotheistic Jews.

Herod followed a policy of hellenization, establishing games at Jerusalem and adorning many of the Hellenistic cities of his domain (see HELLENISM). At the same time he sought to reconcile the Jews, who hated his pro-Roman and hellenizing policies and who never forgave him for his Edomite blood (see EDOM). During the great famine of 25 B.C. in Judea and Samaria, Herod spared no trouble or private expense to import Egyptian corn. In the eighteenth year of his reign (20) he began to build the great Jerusalem TEMPLE, which was forty-three years under construction (Jn. 2:20). However, nothing he did served to win metropolitan Jewry. It was Herod's policy to crush the old aristocracy, even though he was married to Mariamme, the heiress of the Jewish Hasmonean house. He built up a nobility of service, drawing on both Jews and Greeks. He sought subtly to channel messianic ambitions of the baser sort in his direction by encouraging the political party of the HERODIANS (Mk. 3:6; 12:13), whose policy seems to have been the support of the royal house and a hellenized society. Politically, this royalist group was descended from the old hellenizing apostates of Maccabean times (see MACCABEE and cf. the "Antiochians" of 2 Macc. 9:9-14). They were probably Jews of the DISPERSION, from whom Herod also recruited his subservient priesthood, and were SADDUCEES in religion. Such varied patronage and support produced checks and balances in the composite society of Herod's kingdom that made for stability of rule, but of course did nothing to reconcile the divided elements of the populace, metropolitan and Hellenistic Jews, Sadducees and PHARISEES, people and hierarchy. It was only the common challenge of Christ that could draw together such dissidents as Sadducees and Pharisees, the Romans and the priests—just as it healed, according to a surprising side remark of Luke (Lk. 23:12), a rift between Herod Antipas and Pilate.

To manage a situation so complex, and to survive, demanded uncommon ability and an ordered realm. Of Herod's ability there is no doubt, and with his foreign mercenaries, his system of fortresses, and the centralized bureaucracy that he built, he gave Palestine order and even opportunity for economic progress. At the same time Herod was a cruel and implacable tyrant. His family and private life were soiled and embittered by feuds, intrigue, and murder. The king's sister Salome and his son Antipater by Doris, his first consort, seem to have been in league against Mariamme, his favorite wife. Mariamme was put to death in 29 B.C. and her two sons, Alexander and Aristobulus, in 7 B.C. Antipater himself was put to death by Herod in the last days of Herod's reign. Herod died in 4 B.C. The murder of the innocent babies of BETHLEHEM (Matt. 2) falls within the context of his final madness. JOSEPHUS's grim picture (War 1.33.5) of the physical and mental degeneration of the aging king is detailed enough for diagnosis. It is the picture of an arteriosclerotic who had once been athletic and vigorous but who became increasingly prone to delusions of persecution and uncontrollable outbursts of violence, the results of hypertension and a diseased brain.

Herod's will divided the kingdom. Archelaus, son of Malthace, a Samaritan woman, took JUDEA and IDUMEA—by far the choicest share. Herod Antipas, of the same mother, received GALILEE and PEREA; and Philip, son of a Jewish woman named Cleopatra, took Iturea, Traconitis, and associated districts in the NE. Archelaus, who inherited his father's vices without his ability, took the title of king and bloodily quelled the disorders that broke out in Jerusalem. The result was a wide uprising, which required the intervention of Varus, governor of SYRIA. It was at this time that the Holy Family returned from Egypt (Matt. 2:22-23): “But when [Joseph] heard that Archelaus was reigning in Judea in place of his father Herod, he was afraid to go there...he withdrew to the district of Galilee, and he went and lived in a town called Nazareth.”

It was imperative for Archelaus to reach Rome and secure from Augustus confirmation of his position before the situation in Palestine could be presented in too lurid a light by his enemies. Archelaus’s petition was opposed in person by Herod Antipas and by a Jewish embassy. Somewhat surprisingly, Augustus declared in favor of Archelaus, though he denied him the royal title. The incident may have provided the background for the parable of the pounds (Lk. 19:11-27). Archelaus was the “man of noble birth” who went “to have himself appointed king.” The facts were no doubt brought to mind by the sight of the palace that Archelaus had built at JERICHO, where the story was told (Josephus, Ant. 17.13.1). Archelaus maintained his stupid and tyrannical reign for ten years. In A.D. 6 a Jewish embassy finally secured his deposition and banishment to Gaul. Judea fell under procuratorial rule. Coponius, a Roman knight, was appointed governor. A tax-census was the first administrative necessity, and this precipitated the revolt of Judas of Gamala and the emergence of the ZEALOTS as a sinister force in Palestinian politics. Archelaus rebuilt and restored his father’s palace at Jericho, as the palace had been burned down at Herod’s death. It was discovered and excavated in 1951.

Herod Antipas (the word is an abbreviation for Antipater) equaled his father in having a long reign. “That fox,” Christ called the ruler of Galilee (Lk. 13:32), an epithet that has reference to the Herodian cunning, his subtle diplomacy, and his astute management of a difficult situation—qualities that enabled Antipas to retain his puppet position and petty royal power until A.D. 39. It was probably some time before 23 that Herod Antipas met the evil genius of his later years, the dynamic HERODIAS, wife of his half-brother Philip. This brother, who is not to be confused with the tetrarch of Iturea mentioned earlier, was the son of an unnamed wife of Herod I. As the daughter of Aristobulus, son of Herod I and Mariamme, Herodias was Philip’s niece as well as his wife. They lived quietly in Rome, and it was here that Antipas met Herodias.

It is difficult to say who was primarily to blame for the notorious liaison that took Herodias back to Palestine as the unlawful wife and queen of Antipas. She remained loyal to him in his later misfortunes, though offered release by Caligula, and the immoral partnership of the two seems to have been cemented by genuine physical attraction and community of temperament. But trouble dogged the union. According to Josephus, Herod Antipas’s rightful queen, daughter of the Nabatean king ARETAS, heard of the liaison before the couple reached Palestine and escaped first to the fortress of Machaerus and then to her father's capital of Petra, before her returning husband could detain her. Herod therefore came home to find a troublesome frontier war on his lands. He celebrated his birthday, the tragic feast described in Mk. 6:14-29, at the stronghold of Machaerus. The death of JOHN THE BAPTIST occurred here also, for after his denunciation of Herod's sin the preacher of the wilderness had been imprisoned in this fortress. The crime so dramatically contrived was the final turning point in Herod's life. Until then, according to a strange remark in the second gospel (6:20), there had been some faint aspiration for good: "Herod feared John and protected him, knowing him to be a righteous and holy man. When Herod heard John, he was greatly puzzled; yet he liked to listen to him."

Antipas's campaign against his father-in-law Aretas ended disastrously. Antipas was forced to appeal to Rome for help, and the task was assigned to Vitellius, governor of Syria. The affair dragged on until A.D. 37 when Rome's ruler TIBERIUS died. A prey to the uncertainty that was increasingly to attend changes in the Roman principate, Vitellius hesitated, and Antipas never won revenge. Two years later Antipas fell. He had been trusted by Tiberius, who appreciated his continuation of his father's pro-Roman policy, to which the foundation of TIBERIAS on Galilee was a solid monument. Tiberius, in the last year of his principate (36), had even used Herod as a mediator between Rome and Parthia. Presuming on this notable imperial favor, and incited by Herodias, Herod petitioned Caius Caligula, Tiberius's successor, for the title of king. He was, however, deposed by that incalculable prince on a suspicion of treasonable conduct, a charge leveled by Herod AGRIPPA I, his nephew. Herodias accompanied the man she had ruined morally and politically into obscure exile. SALOME her daughter, the dancer of the Machaerus feast, married her uncle Philip, tetrarch of Iturea, about 30. After Philip died in 34, she married her cousin Aristobulus, king of Chalcis, North of Abilene in the Antilebanon hill country.

Philip of Iturea seems to have been the best of Herod's three surviving sons (Josephus, Ant. 17.2.4). His remote province insulated him from some of the problems of Jewry, but he seems to have been a man of generous mold and notable justice. He beautified the town of CAESAREA PHILIPPI and marked his continuation of the Herodian pro-Roman policy by changing the name of the northern BETHSAIDA to Julias, after Augustus's unfortunate daughter.

The deceased Philip's vacant tetrarchy was the first foothold of the third Herod to be mentioned in the NT (Acts 12:1). Herod Agrippa I—grandson of Herod I, son of Aristobulus, and brother of Herodias—had been brought up in Rome under the protection of Tiberius's favorite son, Drusus. He had all the Herodian charm and diplomatic subtlety, and this explains how, as the boon companion of the mad Caligula, he was able to deter that prince from the final folly of setting up his statue in the temple at Jerusalem (Josephus, Ant. 18.8).

Such an achievement demanded not only clever wits but also courage of no mean order. In A.D. 37, on Caligula's succession as emperor, Herod Agrippa was granted Philip's realm. Galilee and Perea were added when Antipas and Herodias were exiled. The malicious word in Rome had paid rich dividends. With his grandfather's subtlety, Agrippa knew how to survive a succession.

When Caligula was assassinated in 41, Agrippa, who had played his cards with remarkable astuteness, remained in the favor of CLAUDIUS, Caligula's successor, who turned over to Agrippa's control the whole area of his grandfather's kingdom. He succeeded to such power, moreover, with the consent and the favor of the Jews. The old Jewish hostility to the Idumean dynasty had vanished, and even the Pharisees were reconciled. Luke's account (Acts 12:20-23) of the king's shocking death in his royal seat of Caesarea is substantiated by Josephus's longer narrative (Ant. 19.8.2). Josephus looked on this Herod with admiration as the last great Jewish monarch, yet the correspondence between Josephus's and Luke's accounts is remarkable. In both accounts the pomp and circumstance of Agrippa's royal estate is notable.

Agrippa died in 44, and his reign was therefore brief. Whether it would have long survived under a less indulgent emperor or under an imperial government that had already vetoed his proposal to fortify Jerusalem, is a matter that his early death left undecided. It is possible for modern medicine to diagnose the intestinal complaint described by Luke in the accepted terminology of his day. A symptom is a visible, violent, and agonizing peristalsis. Luke uses a single adjective, translated by the English phrase "eaten of worms," for the cause of Herod's death. Agrippa was only fifty-four years of age. After his death Palestine fell wholly under Roman rule, a takeover facilitated by the consolidation under Agrippa of the old Herodian domains. There was considerable disorder over the next four years.

Agrippa left a teen-age son, whom CLAUDIUS made king of Chalcis in A.D. 48. In 53 the territory of Philip the tetrarch and Lysanias were added to this realm, together with an area on the western side of Galilee, including Tiberias. The appointment carried the title of king, so in 53 the son became AGRIPPA II, last of the Herodian line. He appears only in the brilliant account in Acts 25, where, as FESTUS's guest, he and his sister BERNICE (with whom he was thought to have an inappropriate relationship) heard the defense of PAUL. Another sister was the wife of Antonius FELIX, the procurator of Judea, whom Festus had succeeded.

In the account of the examination of Paul we see a vivid and revealing picture of the deference Rome was prepared to pay to a puppet king. Perhaps it is more accurate to say that here we see the respect that Rome undoubtedly owed to a remarkable royal house that had been a major bastion of Roman peace in the Middle East for three generations. In the king himself is seen a typical Herod of the better sort: royal, intelligent, pro-Roman, but vitally interested in Judaism, which, with unusual understanding, he saw to be the key to the history of his land.

With this event, which is difficult to date precisely, Agrippa and the Herodian line disappear from history. Festus died in A.D. 64. One brief reference in Josephus reveals that Agrippa lived on in the garrison town of Caesarea to see the vast ruin and destruction of his country in the Great Revolt of 66 to 70. So ended the Herods, an astonishingly able family, whose pro-Roman policy went far to postpone the inevitable clash between Rome and the Jews, and played, in consequence, an unwitting but significant part in holding the peace during the formative years of the Christian church in Palestine.

Herodians. hi-roh´dee-uhnz (Gk. Hērōdianoī G2477). A party, mentioned in the Gospels, who cooperated with the PHARISEES on two different occasions in opposition to Jesus (Mk. 3:6; 12:13 [= Matt. 22:16]). Composed of the name HEROD and a common suffix, the term designates partisans of Herod the Great or his dynasty. A more specific identification is a matter of conjecture, and varied suggestions concerning them have been made: soldiers of Herod; courtiers of Herod; Jews belonging to the northern tetrarchies ruled by sons of Herod; supporters of Jewish aspirations for a national kingdom who favored Herodian rule versus direct Roman rule; political supporters of Antipas. Of these, the last is most probable and receives wide support. Unlike the Pharisees, they were not a religious party but rather a political group concerned with the interests of the Herodian dynasty. Theologically, their membership doubtless cut across recognized party lines. They may have had Sadducean proclivities, but the Gospels never suggest that the Herodians are to be equated with the SADDUCEES. That Matt. 16:6 substitutes “Sadducees” for “Herod” in Mk. 8:15 (a few MSS read “Herodians”) does not establish the identity; Matthew simply omits the reference to Herod or the Herodians and names another group.

Herodias. hi-roh´dee-uhs (Gk. Hērōdias G2478). A wicked granddaughter of HEROD the Great who married her uncle Philip; but his brother Antipas saw her at Rome, desired her, and married her. JOHN THE BAPTIST reproved Herod Antipas for his immoral action (Lk. 3:19-20) and was put in prison for his temerity (Matt. 14:3-12; Mk. 6:14-29). This did not satisfy Herodias, so by a sordid scheme she secured his death. Later Antipas was banished to Spain. Herodias accompanied him and died there.

Herodion. hi-roh´dee-uhn (Gk. Hērōdiōn G2479). A Christian at Rome to whom PAUL sent greetings (Rom. 16:11). The apostle refers to him as his syngenēs G5150 (“kinsman”), meaning that he was either Paul’s blood-relative or, more likely, a fellow Jew. The name suggests that he may have been a freedman of the HEROD family and perhaps a member of the household of ARISTOBULUS (v. 10). See also HERODIUM.

Herodium. hi-roh´dee-uhm (Gk. Hērōdeion). Also Herodion. A fortress palace built by HEROD the Great as a memorial to himself. It is identified as modern Jebel el Fureidis, c. 4 mi. (6 km.) SE of BETHLEHEM. It was built on a mountain that was artificially heightened and had a conical shape. It was one of a chain of palace-fortresses Herod erected to protect his kingdom. In the year 40 B.C., Herod had defeated at this spot PARTHIANS and Jews, and he built the citadel in memory of the great victory he achieved there (Jos. War 1.13.8). It was begun about 24 B.C. and completed by 15 B.C.

Heroes, House of the. A building somewhere in the SE area of postexilic JERUSALEM (Neh. 3:16; KJV, “house of the mighty”; NRSV, “house of the warriors”). Nothing else is known about this place, but it may have been an older structure that served as barracks for the military during the monarchy.

heron. See BIRDS.

Heshbon. hesh´bon (Heb. ḥešbôn H3114, perhaps “reckoning, account”). A city in TRANSJORDAN, c. 15 mi. (24 km.) ENE of the N tip of the DEAD SEA and less than 4 mi. (6 km.) NE of Mount NEBO. Originally part of MOAB, it was captured by the AMORITE king SIHON, who made it his capital. Heshbon was then taken from Sihon by the Israelites under MOSES on their way to Canaan (Num. 21:25-30; Deut. 1:4; 2:24-30; et al.). It was located within the tribal territory of REUBEN on its border with GAD, and the Reubenites rebuilt it after the conquest of Canaan (Num. 32:3, 37). Apparently absorbed by the Gadites, Heshbon was then assigned to the LEVITES descended from MERARI (Josh. 21:39; 1 Chr. 6:81). The town subsequently must have fallen again into the hands of the Moabites, for the prophets repeatedly mention it in their denunciations of Moab (Isa. 15:4; 16:8-9; Jer. 48:2, 34, 45; 49:3). The name Heshbon is apparently preserved in the modern city of Ḥesban in Jordan, some 12 mi. (19 km.) SW of Amman. Ruins of the city, which come chiefly from the Roman period, lie on the summit of a hill and are about a mile in circuit. Nearby there is a large ruined reservoir, which may be the “pools of Heshbon” mentioned in the Song of Solomon (Cant. 7:4). Archaeological evidence, however, has led some scholars to believe that the OT site itself may be in nearby Jalul.

Heshmon. hesh´mon (Heb. ḥešmôn H3132, possibly “smooth field”). A town in the NEGEV, the extreme S of the tribal territory of JUDAH (Josh. 15:27). It was apparently near BETH PELET, but its precise location is unknown.

heth (letter). hayth (Heb. ḥêt). Also het and cheth. The eighth letter of the Hebrew alphabet (ח), with a numerical value of eight. Although in modern Hebrew it is pronounced as a velar fricative (ḥ, consisting of a vibration of the uvula), in biblical times it was probably a pharyngeal sound (ḥ, a constriction of the throat muscles). These two sounds were distinct phonemes in proto-Semitic (and are preserved as such in Arabic), but they merged in Hebrew and other Semitic languages.

Heth (person). heth (Heb. ḥêt H3147). Son of CANAAN, grandson of HAM, and eponymous ancestor of the HITTITES. The Hebrew form is rendered “Heth” by the KJV in all its occurrences (Gen. 10:15; 23:3-20; 25:10; 27:46; 49:32; 1 Chr. 1:13). The NRSV has the name “Heth” only in the Table of Nations (Gen. 10:15; 1 Chr. 1:13); elsewhere it renders the name as “Hittite(s).” The NIV uses “Hittite(s)” throughout.

Hethlon. heth´lon (Heb. ḥetlôn H3158, derivation uncertain). In EZEKIEL’S vision, Hethlon is one of the places marking the ideal N boundary of Israel; a road passing by it leads from the MEDITERRANEAN to LEBO HAMATH (Ezek. 47:15; 48:1). The site is unknown, though some places on the Lebanese coast have been proposed, including modern Heitela, NE of Tripoli.

hewer. The expression “hewers of wood” (KJV; NIV, “woodcutters”) was apparently a special social classification; it was imposed on the GIBEONITES, residents of four towns in the area of Jerusalem because they had tricked JOSHUA into a treaty (Josh. 9:21, 23, 27). This status, which is better defined as forced labor, was very low on the social ladder. Joshua also delegated the Gibeonites to be “drawers of water” (9:27 [NIV, “water carriers”]; cf. Deut. 29:11), which would fit with their low class status. Some of them became the later temple servants (N_{ETHINIM}).

Hexateuch. hek’suh-tyook. This term (from Gk. hex, “six,” and teuchos, “book”) is used by some scholars as a designation for the first six books of the Bible (cf. P_{ENTATEUCH}, “five books”). It derives from the theory that the original compilation of books pertaining to the early background and establishment of the commonwealth of Israel included the book of Joshua, rather than Deuteronomy, as its last component.

Hezeki. See H_{IZKI}.

Hezekiah. hez’uh-ki’uh (Heb. ḥizqiyyāhû H2625 [with several spelling variations], “Yahweh has strengthened me”; Gk. Hezekias G1614). (1) An ancestor of the prophet ZEPHANIAH (Zeph. 1:1 [KJV, “Hizkiah”]); possibly the same as #5, below.

(2) The head of a family that returned from the EXILE (Ezra 2:16; Neh. 7:21; 10:17 [KJV, “Hizkijah”]).

(3) Son of Neariah and postexilic descendant of D_{AVID} (1 Chr. 3:23 KJV; see H_{IZKIAH}).

(4) Son of AHAZ, descendant of David, and king of Judah; three accounts are given of his reign (2 Ki. 18-20; 2 Chr. 29:1-32; Isa. 36-39). Hezekiah probably reigned from 716/15 to 687/86 B.C. (some scholars date his reign about a decade earlier). During this period, ASSYRIA was still a mighty power; and EGYPT, though weak, was still strong enough to oppose Assyria. Judah's position, on the main road between Egypt and Assyria, was a very precarious one. Hezekiah's grandfather JOTHAM reigned at Jerusalem when Hezekiah was a child, and though he was in some ways a good king, he allowed the people to sacrifice and burn incense in the HIGH PLACES. Because of Judah's growing apostasy, the Lord permitted the ARAMEANS and the northern kingdom to trouble Jerusalem. In Hezekiah's youth and early manhood, his weak and wicked father Ahaz was king. He went so far as to follow the abominable rites of the Moabites by burning children in the fire (2 Chr. 28:3), in spite of the warnings of the prophets Hosea, Micah, and Isaiah. For a while Hezekiah was associated in the government with his father, but because of his father's incapacitation he was made active ruler. He began his reign, at the age of twenty-five, in troubled and threatening times. Some counseled him to side with Egypt against Assyria; others favored surrender to Assyria to save themselves from Egypt. Isaiah warned against trusting in foreign alliances. One of the first acts of Hezekiah was the cleansing and reopening of the TEMPLE, which his father had left closed and desecrated. After this was accomplished, the Passover feast was celebrated (2 Chr. 30). The idolatrous altars and high places were destroyed.

From the fourth to the sixth year of Hezekiah's reign the northern kingdom was in trouble. SARGON finally destroyed SAMARIA and deported the people to Assyria. Hezekiah became ill, probably from a carbuncle, and almost died; but God granted him a fifteen-year extension of life (2 Ki. 20:1-11). After Hezekiah's recovery, MERODACH-BALADAN of BABYLON sent an embassy ostensibly to congratulate him, but actually to persuade him to join a secret confederacy against the Assyrian power. This was the great crisis for Hezekiah, and indeed for Judah. During his illness he had received from God not only the promise of recovery, but also the pledge that the Lord would deliver Jerusalem from the Assyrians (Isa. 38:6-7). The ambassadors of Merodach-Baladan were intent also on freeing Jerusalem from the Assyrians—but by force of arms and the power of a military alliance. The question facing Hezekiah was therefore whether to walk the way of FAITH that the Lord would keep his promise, or to take the way of "works," setting out to liberate the city by his own abilities and clever policies. When ISIAH learned that Hezekiah had entertained the ambassadors and their suggestion, he knew that all was over for Judah and immediately predicted the Babylonian captivity (39:5-7). Hezekiah paid a high price for dabbling in rebellion. Assyria compelled Judah to pay heavy tribute; and to obtain it, Hezekiah even had to strip the plating from the doors and pillars of the temple. Shortly after (but related earlier, 2 Ki. 18:13—19:37), Assyria decided to destroy Jerusalem, but God saved the city by sending a sudden plague that in one night killed 185,000 soldiers. After Hezekiah's death, his son MANASSEH succeeded him (20:21).

Hezion. hee'zee-uhn (Heb. ḥezyôn H2611, possibly “vision” or “lop-eared”). Father of Tabrimmon and grandfather of the ARAMEAN king, BEN-HADAD (1 Ki. 15:18). He may be the same as REZON (11:23).

Hezir. hee'zuhr (Heb. ḥēzîr H2615, “boar”). (1) A descendant of AARON whose family in the time of DAVID made up the eighteenth division of priests (1 Chr. 24:15).

(2) A leader of the people who signed the covenant of NEHEMIAH (Neh. 10:20).

Hezrai. See HEZRO.

Hezro. hez'roh (Heb. ḥešrô H2968, derivation uncertain). A Carmelite included in the list of DAVID's mighty warriors (2 Sam. 23:35 [KJV, “Hezrai,” following many Heb. MSS]; 1 Chr. 11:37). On the tenuous grounds that Hezron was from the city of CARMEL, some have speculated that he may have been a servant of NABAL who fled from his master to join David.

Hezron (person). hez'ruhn (Heb. ḥešrôn H2969, derivation uncertain; gentilic ḥešrônî H2971, “Hezronite”; Gk. Hesrôm G2272). (1) Son of REUBEN, grandson of JACOB, and eponymous ancestor of the Hezronite clan (Gen. 46:9; Exod. 6:14; Num. 26:6; 1 Chr. 5:3). Some scholars argue that the Reubenites were assimilated into the tribe of Judah and that these Hezronites became a Judahite clan; see #2 below.

(2) Son of PEREZ and grandson of JUDAH; father of JERAHMEEL, RAM, CALEB (Kelubai), and SEGUB (the latter by the daughter of MAKIR, a Manassite, whom Hezron married at sixty); eponymous ancestor of the Hezronite clan within the tribe of Judah; and ancestor of DAVID (Gen. 46:12; Num. 26:21; Ruth 4:18-19; 1 Chr. 2:5, 9, 18, 21, 24-25; 4:1). Hezron is included in the GENEALOGY OF JESUS CHRIST (Matt. 1:3; Lk. 3:33).

Hezron (place). hez´ruhn (Heb. ḥeṣrôn H2970, possibly “enclosure, settlement”). A town on the S border of the tribe of JUDAH (Josh. 15:3). Hezron was apparently somewhere between KADESH BARNEA and ADDAR, but the precise location is unknown. Regarding the parallel passage (Num. 34:4), see the discussion under HAZAR ADDAR.

Hiddai. hid´i (Heb. hidday H2068, possibly “splendor [of God]”). An Ephraimite from the ravines of GAASH, included in the list of DAVID’s mighty warriors (2 Sam. 23:30; called “Hurai” in the parallel, 1 Chr. 11:32).

Hiddekel. See TIGRIS.

Hiel. hi´uhl (Heb. ḥîʾēl H2647, possibly “brother of God” or “God lives [here]”). A man of BETHEL who in the days of King AHAB rebuilt the city of JERICHO, and the loss of whose sons, ABIRAM and SEGUB, was interpreted as the fulfillment of a curse pronounced by JOSHUA upon anyone who might rebuild the city (1 Ki. 16:34; cf. Josh. 6:26). It is uncertain whether Hiel sacrificed his sons or whether they died a natural death.

Hierapolis. hi´uh-rap´uh-lis (Gk. Hierapolis G2631, “sacred city”). A city in the Lycus Valley, part of the region of PHRYGIA in W ASIA MINOR (its only NT mention is Col. 4:13). Hierapolis received its name from the fact that it was the seat of worship of important deities. The location was on the right bank of the Lycus River about 8 mi. (13 km.) above its confluence with the Maeander. Tradition connects the apostle PHILIP with the church; and Papias, notable disciple of JOHN THE APOSTLE, was born there. Great ruins survive.

hieroglyphics. See WRITING.

higgaion. hi-gay´yon (Heb. higgāyôn H2053). A musical term of uncertain meaning, used in conjunction with Selah (Ps. 9:16). The Hebrew word is used three other times, once with the meaning “melody, sounding, playing” (Ps. 92:3; elsewhere “meditation, planning” (Ps. 19:14) and “murmur, talk” (Lam. 3:62).

high places. It seems to be inherent in human nature to think of God as dwelling in the heights. From earliest times people have tended to choose high places for their WORSHIP, whether of the true God or of the false gods they have invented. The reason for this is that the so-called gods were in fact the barely personified forces of nature; they were empty of moral character and therefore one could not appeal to them in the same sense as one could appeal to the God of Israel. They had made no promises and extended no covenant to their people. All, therefore, that the worshipers could do was choose an exposed site where the “god” was likely to see what they were doing and to perform there some act comparable to what they wished their god to do for them. See BAAAL; IDOLATRY.

In CANAAN the high places had become the scenes of orgies and human sacrifice connected with the idolatrous worship of these imaginary gods; and so, when Israel entered the Promised Land they were told, “Drive out all the inhabitants of the land before you. Destroy all their carved images and their cast idols, and demolish all their high places” (Num. 33:52). Figured stones were covered with crude carvings, sometimes more or less like geometrical figures, or with talismans or other signs presumably understood by the priests and used to mystify or terrorize the worshipers. Israel partly obeyed the divine injunction but largely failed. In Jdg. 1:19-35 we read of the failure of eight different tribes to drive out the people of the land, and though “Israel served the LORD throughout the lifetime of Joshua and of the elders who outlived him” (Josh. 24:31; Jdg. 2:7), they soon relapsed into idolatry, used the high places for the worship of the Baals, and “provoked the LORD to anger.”

Before God would use GIDEON to drive out the Midianites (Jdg. 6:25), Gideon had to throw down his father’s altar to Baal and the image (“Asherah pole”) that was beside it. Before SOLOMON built the TEMPLE, there was a mixed condition of worship. The tent of meeting (i.e., the TABERNACLE) with most of its furniture was at the high place at GIBEON, several miles N of JERUSALEM, though David had brought the ark to Jerusalem. Solomon went to the high place at Gibeon to offer sacrifice, and there God heard his prayer and granted him surpassing wisdom (2 Chr. 1:1-13). Later some godly kings, including HEZEKIAH (31:1), destroyed the high places, whereas others, including his son MANASSEH, relapsed and rebuilt them (33:3). After Manasseh had been punished and had repented, he was restored to his throne and resumed the temple worship; but the people “continued to sacrifice at the high places, but only to the LORD their God” (33:17). Through Manasseh’s early influence, the people had gone so far into APOSTASY that they could not repent; but through the godliness of JOSIAH, the judgment was delayed until after his death. His great “housecleaning” is described in 2 Ki. 23:1-25. God’s attitude toward the godly kings and toward the wicked ones like AHAB in the north and AHAZ and Manasseh in the south depended largely on their attitude toward the high places.

high priest. See PRIEST.

Hilen. hi'luhn (Heb. hîlên H2664). A Levitical town in the hill country of the tribe of JUDAH, assigned to the descendants of KOHATH (1 Chr. 6:58, according to many Heb. MSS; the MT reads hîlêz). The parallel passage has HOLON (Josh. 21:15).

Hilkiah. hil-ki'uh (Heb. hîlqiyyâ H2759, hîlqiyyâhû H2760, "Yahweh is my portion"). (1) Son of Amzi, descendant of MERARI, and ancestor of the LEVITE musician ETHAN (1 Chr. 6:45).

(2) Son of HOSAH and descendant of Merari; he was a Levite gatekeeper during the time of DAVID (1 Chr. 26:11).

(3) Father of ELIAKIM, who was palace administrator under King HEZEKIAH (2 Ki. 18:18, 26, 37; Isa. 22:20; 36:3).

(4) Father of JEREMIAH the prophet and a priest in ANATHOTH (Jer. 1:1). It is often suggested that he descended from ABIATHAR, David's high priest, whom SOLOMON exiled to Anathoth for supporting ADONIJAH (1 Ki. 2:26-27).

(5) Father of GEMARIAH, who carried a message from Jeremiah to the captive Jews (Jer. 29:3).

(6) Son of Shallum (Meshullam), high priest in the time of King JOSIAH, and ancestor of EZRA; this is the Hilkiah who helped Josiah in his religious reforms and who found the Book of the Law in the temple (2 Ki. 22:4-14; 23:4; 1 Chr. 6:13; 9:11; 2 Chr. 34:9-22; 35:8; Ezra 7:1; Neh. 11:11).

(7) One of the leaders of the priests who returned from EXILE with ZERUBBABEL and JESHUA (Neh. 12:7); his son or descendant Hashabiah later became leader of his priestly family (v. 21).

(8) One of the prominent men who stood near EZRA when the law was read at the great assembly (Neh. 8:4). He may be the same as #7 above.

hill country. A term applied to any region of hills and valleys that could not quite be called mountainous. In Scripture it generally applies to the higher part of JUDEA (Lk. 1:39, 65) and in the OT to the southern part of LEBANON E of SIDON (Josh. 13:6; NIV, “mountain region”). See also EPHRAIM, HILL COUNTRY OF; PALESTINE; SHEPHELAH.

Hillel. hil’uhl, hi-lel’ (Heb. hillēl H2148, prob. “he has praised”). (1) Father of ABDON; the latter led Israel for eight years during the time of the judges (Jdg. 12:13, 15).

(2) A Jewish scholar (c. 60 B.C. to A.D. 20), reputed to have played a foundational role in the development of the oral law. He and his contemporary Shammai mark the beginning of the Tannaitic period in rabbinic history, although it is difficult to determine the historical value of statements attributed to them (see TALMUD). According to tradition, Hillel was head of the SANHEDRIN during part of the reign of King HEROD. A native of BABYLON, he studied Torah in JERUSALEM under the famed teachers there. The legends that are told of Hillel magnify his kindness and gentleness and contrast him with his colleague, Shammai, a native Judean, who was said to be of a harsher disposition, impatient, and irascible. The personalities of Hillel and Shammai are also reflected in their interpretation of the law, Hillel being more humanitarian and liberal, Shammai more stringent and conservative. These tendencies were later reflected in the two schools associated with their names, although in many specific cases the “House of Hillel” ruled with greater stringency than that of Shammai. Especially after A.D. 70, the generally progressive school of Hillel became preeminent, thus giving direction to the course of classical Judaism.

hin. See WEIGHTS AND MEASURES.

hind. See ANIMALS.

hinge. This English term, referring to a device that allows a DOOR or lid to turn, is used rarely in Bible versions (e.g., Prov. 26:14). Most of the ancient hinges were of a pivot type that would fit into a socket (cf. 1 Ki. 7:50 KJV).

Aerial view of Jerusalem (looking NE). The Hinnom Valley lies to the W and S of the Old City.

Hinnom, Valley of (Ben). hin'uhm (Heb. hinnōm H2183, derivation uncertain). A valley running southward from the Jaffa Gate at the W side of JERUSALEM, then turning eastward and running S of the city until it joined the Valley of the KIDRON. It was a part of the boundary between JUDAH on the S (Josh. 15:8) and BENJAMIN on the N (18:16). Nothing is known of the “son of Hinnom” except that he lived before JOSHUA’s time and presumably owned the valley. It seems to have been a dumping ground and a place for burning. TOPHETH was here (2 Ki. 23:10), where human sacrifices had been offered to MOLECH, and so it was later to be called “the Valley of Slaughter” (Jer. 19:6). The Hebrew for Valley of Hinnom (gê-hinnōm) transliterated into Greek as geenna G1147, which became the word for HELL (see GEHENNA). Jesus uses it in referring to the final destination of the wicked; and probably “the fiery lake of burning sulfur” (Rev. 19:20; 20:10, 14-15; 21:8) is a description of the same terrible place.

hip. This English term is used a few times in Bible versions to render Hebrew yārēk H3751, which properly refers to the upper THIGH. JACOB was struck on the socket of his hip (Gen. 32:25; KJV, “the hollow of his thigh”) to reduce his feeling of self-sufficiency and to make him lean upon God. This Hebrew term is used alongside another word meaning “thigh” or “leg” (šôq H8797) when the biblical writer says that SAMSON struck the PHILISTINES šôq ʿal-yārēk (Jdg. 15:8), an unusual expression that the KJV and NRSV render somewhat literally, “hip and thigh,” while the NIV interprets it to mean “viciously.”

hippopotamus. See ANIMALS.

Hirah. hi'ruh (Heb. ḥîrâ H2669, derivation uncertain). A Canaanite man from the town of ADULLAM with whom JUDAH stayed after leaving his brothers (Gen. 38:1 NIV; according to the NRSV, Judah “settled near” Hirah). Subsequently Hirah is described as a friend of Judah (vv. 12, 20); he was sent to get back the pledge that Judah had given to a woman he thought was a prostitute (in reality, TAMAR; see vv. 13-26).

Hiram, Hiram. hi'ruhm, hyoor'uhm (Heb. ḥîrām H2671, ḥîrôm H2670 [1 Ki. 5:10, 18; 7:40], ḥûrām H2586 [only in Chronicles]; from Phoen. ḥrm, “my brother is lifted up”). To avoid confusion, the NIV uses “Hiram” for #1 below and “Hiram” for #2; in the Hebrew text, however, both forms are used for both individuals.

(1) The king of TYRE during the reigns of DAVID and SOLOMON, with whom they had peaceful and friendly relations. After David captured JERUSALEM and made it his capital, Hiram sent him wood, carpenters, and stonemasons to build his palace (2 Sam. 5:11). When Solomon ascended the throne, he asked Hiram for help in building a TEMPLE and a new palace, projects that took him twenty years to complete. Hiram sent him wood—cedar, pine, and algum—from the forests of LEBANON and all the gold he needed (1 Ki. 5:1-9; 2 Chr. 2:3-10), together with all the skilled workmen necessary for erecting and furnishing them. In return, Solomon sent him every year “twenty thousand cors of wheat as food for his household, in addition to twenty thousand baths of pressed olive oil” (1 Ki. 5:11). He also gave Hiram twenty cities in GALILEE, but when Hiram inspected them, he told Solomon he was not well pleased with them (1 Ki. 9:10-14). When Solomon built a fleet of ships at EZION GEBER in EDOM, on the shore of the RED SEA, Hiram sent him experienced seamen to work with Solomon’s men on the ships. Once every three years they brought to Solomon gold, silver, ivory, apes, and peacocks (1 Ki. 10:22; 2 Chr. 9:21).

(2) A skilled craftsman sent by King Hiram to Solomon to help him build his palace and the temple. He is also called Hiram-Abi (ḥîrām ʾābî H2587, 2 Chr. 2:13 [KJV, “Hiram my father”; cf. LXX]; ḥûrām ʾābîw, 4:16 [KJV, “Hiram his father”]; the second element may be a title). His father was a native of Tyre of a family of craftsmen, but his mother was of the Israelite tribe of NAPHTALI (1 Ki. 14:2); according to 2 Chr. 2:13, she was of the daughters of DAN. (2 Chr. 2:13).

hireling. This English term, which today has a negative connotation (someone who does menial or even offensive work for pay), is used several times in the KJV (e.g., Job 7:1; Jn. 10:12-13). Modern versions prefer such renderings as “laborer” and “hired hand.” See LABOR; WAGES.

hiss. To make a sharp sibilant sound (like a prolonged s or sh), an act of special meaning in many Near Eastern cultures. The English term is used by the KJV and other versions mainly to render the Hebrew verb šāraq H9239, “to whistle,” which occurs a dozen times in the OT (Job 27:23 et al.). Because hissing is used to express derision, the NIV often renders it with “scoff” (e.g., 1 Ki. 9:8).

history. A narrative of events or the study of the past. God often has been isolated from history or too closely linked with it. Karl Marx refused even to consider divine activity in history because history is the outcome of matter in motion. Many of the theological existentialists so link God with what they call holy history that he is uninterested in the historical events resulting from human action. Others invert biblical ideas. PROVIDENCE is replaced by progress, eternity by TIME, and the MILLENNIUM by an earthly Utopia brought about by human activity in a secular setting. The Bible, however, links the events of SALVATION with empirically verifiable history except for CREATION (Heb. 11:3) and the final consummation of history (2 Pet. 3; see ESCHATOLOGY). The historical narratives of the Bible are not neutral accounts; they involve judgment and interpretation. Nevertheless, the writers of Scripture evidently gave great importance to the truthfulness and reliability of the events described. LUKE in particular shows concern with the method of the historian: the prologue to his gospel is a summary of much of what one finds concerning historical methodology in the best modern manuals on that subject. For example, he points out in his prologue that he used several secondary narratives of the life of Christ. His use of the word “us” (Lk. 1:1-2) and “also” (v. 3) suggests that he thought these were valid documents. And like modern historians, he emphasized his use of firsthand information of eyewitnesses.

Basalt stela of the Hittite goddess Kubaba holding a mirror and standing beneath a winged sun-disk (9th cent. B.C., from Birecik, N of Carchemish).

Hittite. hit'tit (Heb. ḥittî H3153, cf. also běně-ḥēt, “the sons of HETH” [Gen. 23:3 et al.]; represented in cuneiform as ḥatti). The Hittites were an ancient Indo-European people who lived in ANATOLIA and N SYRIA. In the strict sense, the name applies to the Hattians, whose origins can be traced to the third millennium B.C. and who were a dominant civilization in the second. The OT employs the expressions “sons of Heth” and “Hittites” synonymously. The former expression, which has reference to HETH (Gen. 10:15; 1 Chr. 1:13), the eponymous ancestor of the “Hittites,” occurs only in Genesis (Gen. 10:15; 23:3, 5, 7, 10, 16, 20; 25:10; 27:46 [“daughters of Heth”]; 49:32). It is used to designate the “Hittites” only of the patriarchal age and no others. The term ḥittî, on the other hand, has a much broader reference and is found not only in Genesis (15:20; 23:10; et al.), but also throughout the historical and prophetic literature of the OT. With reference to the many meanings that the term Hittite bears in scholarly literature, it may be noted that in the OT it denotes only two groups. There is no reference in the OT under this term to the Indo-European Hittites of Asia Minor. Nor is there any allusion to the Hattians. In the OT, the term Hittites refers either to an ethnic group in PALESTINE during the patriarchal age, the period of the exodus, and the period of the conquest, or to the “neo-Hittite” peoples and kingdoms of Syria during the first millennium B.C. Whatever the geographic origin of the “Hittites” of Palestine in the patriarchal age, it is clear that they have been thoroughly semitized, for none of their personal names can be satisfactorily interpreted as Indo-European or HURRIAN.

During the age of the Hebrew monarchy, other “Hittites” appear in the narratives, but these are foreigners rather than aboriginal inhabitants of Palestine. They are, in fact, the “neo-Hittites” of Syria. SOLOMON’s Hittite wives, unlike ESAU’s, were foreigners he married for political reasons, along with women from Egypt, Moab, Ammon, Edom, and Sidon (1 Ki. 11). The “kings of the Hittites” mentioned elsewhere (2 Ki. 7:6-7; 2 Chr. 1:17) were powerful monarchs from Syria. In this category one would wish to place URIAH the Hittite, the faithful soldier in DAVID’s army. The hard core of David’s army consisted of foreign mercenary troops, who were undeterred by petty local allegiances from following him without question (2 Sam. 15). Since David’s northern border reached all the way to the EUPHRATES (8:3), it is surely likely that among his mercenaries would be a sizable number of Syrian “Hittites.”

There is evidence of Hittite influences on the literature and culture of Israel. Some have argued, for example, that the structure of the biblical COVENANT at Sinai be understood as preserving a very ancient treaty form best known from, but not originating in, the Hittite suzerainty treaties with Syrian vassal states during the second millennium B.C. Each of the elements in that form finds a striking counterpart in the OT passages relating to the Sinai covenant as well as in the book of DEUTERONOMY. Another area of possible Hittite influence is the science of historiography. From the earliest periods of Sumerian and Egyptian history, documentary records were kept of important events. The lists of such events can in a very loose sense be termed HISTORY. Historical writing in the sense in which we encounter it, as in the writings of Herodotus (“the father of history-writing”) is found in only two areas of the ANE. Only in Hatti and ancient Israel is there evidence of historical writing that probes for causes, and which seeks to express a kind of moral philosophy of history. Some scholars have suggested an indirect influence here by the second millennium culture of the Hittites upon the late second millennium and early first millennium culture of the Hebrews.

Hivite. hiv’it (Heb. hiwwî H2563, derivation uncertain). One of the names appearing in the lists of peoples dispossessed by the Israelites (Exod. 3:8, 17; 13:5; 23:23, 28; 33:2; 34:11; Deut. 7:1; 20:17; Josh. 3:10; 9:1; 11:3; 12:8; 24:11; Jdg. 3:5; 1 Ki. 9:20, cf. 2 Chr. 8:7). In the Table of Nations, the Hivites are included as descendants of CANAAN (Gen. 10:17). They were located in the LEBANON hills (Jdg. 3:3) and in the HERMON range (Josh. 11:3). In the reign of DAVID they are listed after SIDON and TYRE (2 Sam. 24:7), implying their location near these cities. HAMOR, the father of SHECHEM, is called a Hivite (Gen. 34:2). The inhabitants of GIBEON to the N of JERUSALEM are also identified as Hivites (Josh. 9:7; 11:19). A certain ZIBEON is apparently identified both as a Hivite and as a Horite (Gen. 36:2, 20), and the SEPTUAGINT twice reads Horite where MT has Hivite (Josh. 9:7; Gen. 34:2). Clearly these strange ethnic designations confused the scribes. It has been maintained that, since no name that closely resembles Hivite has yet been found in extrabiblical sources, the biblical name should be viewed as a corruption of Horite, and that both Hivites and Horites should be seen as groups related culturally and linguistically to the HURRIANS.

Hizki. hiz'ki (Heb. ḥizqî H2623, “[Yahweh] has strengthened me”). KJV Hezeki. Son of ELPAAL and descendant of BENJAMIN (1 Chr. 8:17).

Hizkiah. hiz-ki'uh (Heb. ḥizqiyyâ H2624, “Yahweh has strengthened me” or “Yahweh is my strength”; see HEZEKIAH). (1) KJV alternate form of HEZEKIAH (Zeph. 1:1; see also Heb. text of 2 Ki. 18:1, 10, 13-16; Neh. 7:21; 10:17; Prov. 25:1).

(2) Son of Neariah and a postexilic descendant of DAVID (1 Chr. 3:23; KJV, “Hezekiah”).

Hizkijah. hiz-ki'juh. KJV alternate form of HEZEKIAH (Neh. 10:17).

hoarfrost. Alternate term for FROST.

Hobab. hoh'bab (Heb. ḥōbāb H2463, possibly “beloved” or “crafty”). Son of REUEL the Midianite (Num. 10:29). Reuel was another name for JETHRO, father-in-law of MOSES; Hobab was therefore the sister of ZIPPORAH and Moses' brother-in-law. Because Hobab, as a native of MIDIAN, would have been very familiar with the desert regions in the SINAI peninsula, Moses invited him to guide the Israelites in their travels (vv. 29-32). Although Hobab's final response is not recorded, the text seems to imply that he consented; moreover, his descendants are later associated with the Israelites (Jdg. 1:16; 4:11). The latter passage raises a difficulty by referring to the KENITES as “descendants of Hobab the father-in-law of Moses” (NRSV). According to some scholars, Hobab was another name for Jethro/Reuel, but in this verse it may be better to translate “brother-in-law” (cf. NIV).

Hobah. hoh´buh (Heb. ḥôbâ H2551, meaning uncertain). A city or region N of DAMASCUS to which ABRAHAM pursued the defeated armies of KEDORLAOMER and his allies (Gen. 14:15). The location is unknown, though some have identified it with modern Hoba (c. 55 mi./88 km. NNW of Damascus, on the road to Palmyra/TADMOR), and others with ancient Ube/Upi, a territory of which Damascus was part.

Hobaiah. hoh-bay´yuh (Heb. ḥoʿbayyâ H2469, “Yahweh has hidden [or protected]”). Ancestor of a postexilic family that was unable to prove its priestly descent (Ezra 2:61 [KJV, NRSV, “Habaiah”]; Neh. 7:63 [KJV, “Habaiah”]).

Hod. hod (Heb. hôd H2087, “majesty, vigor”). Son of Zophah and descendant of ASHER (1 Chr. 7:37).

Hodaiah. See HODAVIAH #4.

Hodaviah. hod-uh-vi´uh (Heb. hôdawyâ H2089 [with spelling variations], “praise Yahweh”). (1) A clan chief of the half-tribe of MANASSEH; he and others are described as “brave warriors, famous men, and heads of their families” (1 Chr. 5:24).

(2) Son of Hassenuah and descendant of BENJAMIN; his grandson Sallu was among those who resettled in Jerusalem after the EXILE (1 Chr. 9:7; cf. vv. 1-3; apparently called “Joed” in Neh. 11:7).

(3) Ancestor of a family of LEVITES who returned from the EXILE (Ezra 2:40; 3:9 [KJV, “Judah,” following MT]; Neh. 7:43 [KJV, NRSV, “Hodevah”]).

(4) Son of Elioenai and postexilic descendant of SOLOMON (1 Chr. 3:24 [KJV, “Hodaiah”]).

Hodesh. hoh´desh (Heb. ḥôdeš H2545, “new [moon]”). One of the wives of SHAHARAIM, a Benjamite; she bore him seven children (1 Chr. 8:9-10). Instead of “his wife Hodesh,” some render “his new wife”; apparently he married her after divorcing Hushim and Baara (v. 8).

Hodevah. See HODAVIAH #3.

Hodiah. hoh-di'uh (Heb. hōdiyyâ H2091, “majesty of Yahweh”). KJV Hodijah (except 1 Chr. 4:19). (1) Father or ancestor of KEILAH the Garmite and ESHEMOA the Maacathite; he is included in the genealogy of JUDAH and also identified as having married the sister of a certain Naham. Hodiah’s place in the genealogy is unclear, and to avoid this difficulty, the KJV interprets the verse to refer back to MERED, adds a pronoun, and renders, “the sons of his wife Hodiah.” Others emend the text.

(2) A LEVITE who helped EZRA instruct the people in the law (Neh. 8:7). He is probably the same person mentioned among those who led the people in confession and worship (9:5) and among the Levites who signed the covenant with NEHEMIAH (10:10).

(3) Another Levite who sealed the covenant (Neh. 10:13).

(4) One of the lay leaders of the people who signed the covenant (Neh. 10:18).

Hoglah. hog'luh (Heb. hōglâ H2519, “partridge”). The third of the five daughters of ZELOPHEHAD of the tribe of MANASSEH (Num. 26:33). Since Zelophehad had no sons, Hoglah and her sisters requested ELEAZAR the priest that they be allowed to inherit their father’s property, and the request was granted (27:1-11; 36:11; Josh. 17:3-4). Some see a connection between her and the town of BETH HOGLAH.

Hoham. hoh'ham (Heb. hōhām H2097, meaning unknown). King of HEBRON during the time of JOSHUA (Josh. 10:3). Hoham formed a league with four other AMORITE kings to make war on GIBEON because its inhabitants had signed a treaty of peace with Joshua. The five kings were decisively defeated in a battle at BETH HORON, and after being shut up in a cave at MAKKEDEH in which they had taken refuge, they were put to death (vv. 4-26).

holiday. When King XERXES chose ESTHER as his queen, he gave a great banquet and “provided a holiday throughout the provinces” (Esth. 2:18). The Hebrew term, which occurs only here, is interpreted by some in the sense of “amnesty” or “remission of taxes” (e.g., RSV, NJPS; the KJV has “release”).

The Hebrew word for “holy” (qdš) was printed on the turban of the high priest.

holiness. The state or quality of being morally pure and separate from evil. According to some scholars, holiness is the most typical concept in the OT faith. It is revealed chiefly in the Hebrew adjective qādôš H7705 (“holy, sacred”) and its various cognates. Some scholars believe that the root idea is “separateness,” but the etymology of the word is disputed. In the OT the adjective holy is a distinctly religious term and is used exclusively in relation to God. It may refer either to God himself or to what has been sanctified by him. Primarily, however, it is God who is holy (Exod. 15:11; Isa. 6:3). There is no holiness unassociated with him. Holiness is not a human quality, nor is it an impersonal concept. Its divine provenance is everywhere insisted on in the OT.

The concept of holiness is expressed in the NT through various terms, but especially the adjective hagios G41, which recurs some 230 times, as well as several of its cognates. This adjective can be used as a substantive (e.g., of sacrificial meat, Matt. 7:6; of the sanctuary, esp. in the plural, Heb. 8:2 et al.). The expression ho hagios, “the Holy One,” is used of God the Father in the Greek OT, but only of Christ the Son in the NT (Mk. 1:24 et al.; cf. Acts 2:27), unless 1 Jn. 2:20 is an exception. In the SEPTUAGINT, hagios is consistently utilized to render the Hebrew adjective qādôš, and the fact that this Greek term was appropriated wholly in the interests of the OT view of holiness is determinative for NT usage. Out of four or five Greek terms that could be rendered “holy,” hagios is the least frequent in classical literature, and so the concept of holiness became filled with fresh content. What became increasingly evident in the OT is overwhelmingly explicit in the NT: that holiness means the pure, loving nature of God, separate from evil, aggressively seeking to universalize itself; that this character is inherent in places, times, and institutions intimately associated with worship; and that holiness is to characterize human beings who have entered into personal relationship with God.

The words holiness and holy do not occur in Genesis, though they are implied in the dread that the presence of God inspires (Gen. 28:16-17), but from Exod.

3:5 on, where God reveals his name and nature, holiness is constantly stressed. Only samples of the many biblical references will be given here. God is “majestic in holiness” (Exod. 15:11); he acts with “his holy arm” (Isa. 52:10); his words and promises are holy (Ps. 105:42; Jer. 23:9); his name is holy (Lev. 20:3; 1 Chr. 29:16); his Spirit is holy (Ps. 51:10; Isa. 63:10-11; see HOLY SPIRIT). Places are made holy by God’s special presence: his dwelling in heaven (Deut. 26:15), his manifestation on earth (Exod. 3:5; Josh. 5:15), the tabernacle (Exod. 40:9), the temple (2 Chr. 29:5, 7), Jerusalem (Isa. 48:2), Zion (Obad. 17). Anything set apart for sacred uses was holy: the altars and other furniture of the tabernacle (Exod. 29:37; 30:10, 29), animal sacrifices (Num. 18:17), food (Lev. 21:22), the tithe (27:30), firstfruits (19:24; 23:20), anything consecrated (Exod. 28:38), the anointing oil and incense (30:23-25, 34-38). Persons connected with holy places and holy services were holy: priests (Lev. 21:1-6) and their garments (Exod. 28:2, 4), Israel as a nation (Jer. 2:3), Israel individually (Deut. 33:3), many things connected with Israel (1 Chr. 16:29). Times given to worship were holy (Exod. 12:16; 16:23; 20:8; Isa. 58:13).

In the NT the holiness of things is less prominent than that of persons. What in Isa. 6:3 was a personal revelation to the prophet is proclaimed to all from heaven in Rev. 4:8, with power and glory. God is holy and true (6:10). In one of his prayers, Jesus addressed God in this way: “Holy Father” (Jn. 17:11); and 1 Pet. 1:15 repeats the assertion of Lev. 19:2 that God is holy and his people are to be holy. Jesus’ disciples are to pray that the name of God may be treated as holy (Matt. 6:9; Lk. 1:2). The holiness of Jesus Christ is specifically stressed. Evil spirits recognize him as “the Holy One of God” who has come to destroy them (Mk. 1:24; Lk. 4:34). Jesus is holy because of his wondrous birth (Lk. 1:35). The father set him apart “as his very own” and made him holy (Jn. 10:36). He is “holy and true” (Rev. 3:7). To the Jerusalem church Jesus is “the Holy and Righteous One” (Acts 3:14), the “holy servant Jesus” (4:27, 30), fulfilling the prophecy of Isa. 42:1-4, quoted in Matt. 12:16-21. In Heb. 9 Christ is the fulfillment of OT priesthood and sacrifice, in both of which capacities he had to be holy (2:11).

The holiness of the CHURCH is developed in the NT. As in the OT, Jerusalem is holy (Matt. 4:5; 27:53; Rev. 11:2), so is the temple (Matt. 24:15; Acts 6:13) and the new temple, the church, collectively (Eph. 2:21-22) and individually (1 Cor. 3:16-17). STEPHEN refers to Mount Sinai as “holy ground” (Acts 7:33) and PETER to the Mount of Transfiguration as “the holy mount” (2 Pet. 1:18 KJV; NIV, “sacred mountain”). The Scriptures are holy (Rom. 1:2; 2 Tim. 3:15). The law is holy (Rom. 7:12). Since the earthly holy place, priests, cult apparatus, sacrifices, and services were holy, much more are the heavenly (Heb. 8:5). The church is a holy nation (1 Pet. 2:9). The argument of Rom. 11:11-32 rests the holiness of Gentile Christians on their growing out of the root (11:16) of Jesse (15:12). Christ died for the church in order to make it holy (1 Cor. 1:2; sanctified in Christ Jesus, 1 Cor. 6:11; Eph. 5:26). The church as a whole, the local churches, and individual Christians are holy, “called...saints” (Rom. 1:7; 1 Cor. 1:2; 2 Cor. 1:1; Eph. 1:1; Phil. 1:1; Col. 1:2; “saints” being a translation of hagioi, “holy ones”). The life of the individual Christian is to be a living, holy sacrifice (Rom. 12:1), not only through death (Phil. 2:17), but through life itself (1:21-26). In the OT the sacrifice was a thing, separate from the offerer; in the NT it is the offerer himself. Holiness is equated with purity (Matt. 5:8; 23:26; 1 Tim. 1:5; 2 Tim. 2:22; Tit. 1:15; Jas. 1:27), a purity that in Acts 18:6; 20:26 is innocence. The means of purification is the truth of the Word of God (Jn. 17:17). The “holy kiss” in the early churches was a seal of holy fellowship (1 Cor. 16:20; 2 Cor. 13:12; 1 Thess. 5:26). Holiness is prominent throughout the book of Revelation.

Holiness Code. A common designation for the legal corpus found in Lev. 17-26, thought by many to have had an independent origin; often referred to simply as H. See LEVITICUS, BOOK OF.

Holon. hohˈlon (Heb. ḥōlôn H2708, possibly “sandy”). (1) A town in the hill country of the tribe of JUDAH (Josh. 15:51); it was later assigned to the LEVITES descended from KOHATH (21:15; called HILEN in the parallel passage, 1 Chr. 6:58). The site is unknown, though a location S or SW of HEBRON seems likely.

(2) A city in the plain of MOAB against which JEREMIAH pronounced judgment (Jer. 48:21). It was probably located N of the ARNON River, but the site is unknown.

holy day. God calls the SABBATH “my holy day” (Isa. 58:13; in Exod. 35:2 the word “day” is supplied by the KJV and NIV). The phrase can be used of other special ceremonial days (Neh. 10:31).

The southern steps of the temple at Jerusalem. The apostle Peter, filled with the Holy Spirit, probably preached from these steps on the day of Pentecost.

Holy Spirit. In Christian theology, the third person of the TRINITY (the KJV usually renders “Holy Ghost”). The Hebrew and Greek words that are translated “spirit” are respectively rûaḥ H8120 and pneuma G4460, both meaning literally “wind, breath.” Both came to be used for the unseen reality of living beings, especially God and man. Therefore, breath and wind are symbols of the Holy Spirit (Gen. 2:7; Job 32:8; 33:4; Ezek. 37:9-10; Jn. 20:22). Other symbols are the dove (Matt. 3:16; Mk. 1:10; Lk. 3:22; Jn. 1:32), oil (Lk. 4:18; Acts 10:38; 1 Jn. 2:20), fire for purification (Matt. 3:11; Lk. 3:16; Acts 2:3-4), living water (Isa. 44:3; Jn. 4:14; 7:37-39) and earnest or guarantee of all that God has in store for us (2 Cor. 1:22; Eph. 1:13-14).

There is a rich revelation of the Spirit of the Lord in the OT, running along the same lines as that in the NT and directly preparatory to it. Customarily we think of the Spirit of God in the OT as powerfully endowing chosen individuals for great tasks, but actually his work ranges much more widely.

First, we notice that the Spirit is God’s agent in CREATION (e.g., Gen. 1:1; Ps. 33:6; 104:30). For animals (Isa. 34:16) and human beings (Job 27:3) alike (cf. Isa. 42:5), created life is the work of the Holy Spirit.

Second, the Spirit is the agent in the providential work of God in the moral sphere, the areas of history and ethical relationships. Though the actual translation of Gen. 6:3 is uncertain, it is by his Spirit that God senses and reacts to wickedness on earth. According to Ezek. 1:14, 20, the Spirit is the power by which the sovereign God controls the complexities of life on earth (cf. Isa. 4:4; 30:1; 63:14). The godly person knows that his sin offends the Holy One and he fears quenching the Spirit (Ps. 51:11)—this is the form that the Lord’s judgment on the disobedient SAUL took (1 Sam. 16:14).

Third, the Spirit is known in the OT as a personal endowment. He indwells the people of God as a whole (Hag. 2:5), just as he was among them at the exodus (Isa. 63:11). He endowed BEZALEL for artistic skill (Exod. 31:3) and many others for mighty deeds (Jdg. 3:10 and 6:34 [lit., “clothed himself with Gideon”]; 11:29; 13:25; 1 Sam. 11:6). These references correspond to what the NT speaks of as the “filling” of the Spirit, that is, a special endowment for a special task (cf. Acts 4:8); but there is also the constant endowment of individuals (Num. 11:17, 29; 27:18; 1 Sam. 16:13), especially those individuals who stood directly in the great messianic line (Isa. 11:2; 42:1; 48:16; 61:1). The OT, indeed, looks forward to the messianic day as a time of special enjoyment of the Spirit of God (Isa. 32:15; 44:3; 59:21; Ezek. 36:27; 39:29; Joel 2:28-29). The verb “to pour out” is notable in these references and points to a hitherto unknown abundance.

Fourth, the Spirit inspired the PROPHETS (Num. 11:29; 24:2; 1 Sam. 10:6, 10; 2 Sam. 23:2; 1 Ki. 22:24; Neh. 9:30; Hos. 9:7; Joel 2:28-29; Mic. 3:8; Zech. 7:12). In all these references the personality of the Spirit is notable.

Moreover, the Spirit is wise (Isa. 40:13; cf. 11:2; Dan. 4:8-9, 18), he is vexed by sin and rebellion (Isa. 63:10), and he is at rest when SIN has been dealt with (Zech. 6:8). He is holy (Ps. 51:13; Isa. 63:10) and good (Neh. 9:20; Ps. 143:10). We note that this is the same sort of evidence that we would adduce from the NT for holding that the Spirit of God is “he,” not “it.” But, like the NT, the OT goes further. Psalm 139:7 shows that the Spirit is the very presence of God himself in all the world. The Spirit of God is God himself actually present and in operation. In Isa. 63:10, when the people vex the Spirit, God becomes their enemy; in 63:14 the work of the Spirit giving rest is parallel to the act of God leading his people. The ascription of HOLINESS (e.g., Ps. 51:13) accords to the Spirit the character and personality of God.

That the Holy Spirit has power and influence is plain from Acts 1:8; that he is a person, the NT makes clear in detail: he dwells with us (Jn. 14:17), teaches and brings to remembrance (14:26), bears witness (15:26), convinces of sin (16:8), guides, speaks, declares (16:13, 15), inspires the Scriptures and speaks through them (Acts 1:16; 2 Pet. 1:21), speaks to his servants, (Acts 8:29), calls ministers (13:2), sends out workers (13:4), forbids certain actions (16:6-7), and intercedes (Rom. 8:26). He has the attributes of personality: love (Rom. 15:30), will (1 Cor. 12:11), mind (Rom. 8:27), thought, knowledge, words (1 Cor. 2:10-13). The Holy Spirit can be treated in certain respects as one may treat a human person: he can be lied to and tempted (Acts 5:3-4, 9), resisted (7:51), grieved (Eph. 4:30), insulted (Heb. 10:29), blasphemed against (Matt. 12:31). The Holy Spirit is God, equated with the Father and the Son (Matt. 28:19; 2 Cor. 13:14). Jesus speaks of him as of his other self (Jn. 14:16-17), whose presence with the disciples will be of greater advantage than his own (16:7). To have the Spirit of God is to have Christ (Rom. 8:9-12). God is spirit in essential nature (Jn. 4:24) and sends his Holy Spirit to live and work in people (14:26; 16:7).

In the Gospels, as in the OT, the Holy Spirit comes upon certain persons for special reasons: John the Baptist and his parents (Lk. 1:15, 41, 67), Simeon (2:25-27), and Jesus as a man (Matt. 1:18, 20; 3:16; 4:1; Mk. 1:8, 10; Lk. 1:35; 3:16, 22; 4:1, 14, 18; Jn. 1:32-33). Jesus promises the Holy Spirit in a new way to those who believe in him (Jn. 7:37-39; cf. 4:10-15); also as “what my Father has promised” in Lk. 24:49; covered in fuller detail in Acts 1:1-8. Jesus taught the nature and work of the Holy Spirit in the Upper Room Discourse (Jn. 14:16, 26; 15:26; 16:7-15). This work is to dwell in the disciples as Comforter or ADVOCATE; to teach all things; to help believers remember what Jesus said; to testify of Jesus; to reprove the world of sin, righteousness, and judgment; to guide the disciples into all truth; not to speak on his own initiative, but to speak only what he hears; to show the disciples things to come; and to glorify Jesus by showing the things of Jesus to the disciples. After his resurrection, Jesus “breathed on” the disciples (Thomas being absent) and said, “Receive the Holy Spirit” (Jn. 20:22). This was not the complete enduement of the Holy Spirit that Jesus had taught and promised and that occurred at PENTECOST, but it was provisional and enabled the disciples to persevere in prayer until the promised day.

At Pentecost a new phase of the revelation of God to people began (Acts 2)—as new as when the Word became flesh in the birth of Jesus. With the rushing of a mighty wind and what appeared to be tongues of fire, the disciples were all filled with the Holy Spirit and spoke in foreign languages (listed in 2:9-11). The excitement drew a crowd of visitors to the feast, to whom Peter explained that the prophecy of Joel 2:28-32 was being fulfilled in accordance with the salvation that Jesus of Nazareth had accomplished by dying on the cross. Another 3,000 souls were added by baptism to the 120 disciples, and thus began the fellowship of apostolic teaching, of breaking of bread and of prayer, the fellowship that is the church. When the first crisis that threatened the extinction of the early church was passed, again “they were all filled with the Holy Spirit” (Acts 4:31), binding them more closely together. When the first Gentiles were converted, the Holy Spirit was poured out on them and they spoke in tongues (10:44-48); likewise when Paul met a group of John the Baptist's disciples, the Holy Spirit came on them (19:1-7).

The NT is full of references to the work of the Holy Spirit in the lives of believers (Rom. 8:1-27): he gives gifts (1 Cor. 12:14); our "body is a temple of the Holy Spirit" (6:19); and he works in us "the fruit of the Spirit" (Gal. 5:22-23). Being "filled with the Spirit" (Eph. 5:18) means that one experiences Christ living within (Rom. 8:9-10). As the heavenly Father is God and his Son Jesus Christ is God, so the Holy Spirit is God. The Holy Spirit as well as the Son was active in creation; he was active on certain occasions in his own person in OT times and more intensively in the Gospels; and in Acts and the Epistles he becomes the resident divine agent in the church and in its members. Teaching concerning the Holy Spirit has been both neglected and distorted, but the subject deserves careful attention as one reads the NT.

Homam. hoh'amam (Heb. hômām H2102, derivation uncertain). Son of the clan chief LOTAN and grandson of SEIR the HORITE (1 Chr. 1:39). The parallel passage reads HEMAM (Gen. 36:22 KJV; the NRSV has HEMAN, following LXX), though the NIV regards this form as an alternate of Homam and thus uses the latter in both passages.

honey. Early regarded as among "the best products of the land" (Gen. 43:11), honey was found in clefts of the rocks (Deut. 32:13; Ps. 81:16) and in the comb on the ground (1 Sam. 14:25-43). Job 20:17 speaks of brooks of honey and butter, indicating abundance due to the domestication of bees. Canaan was "a land flowing with milk and honey" (Exod. 3:8; Ezek. 20:15), Assyria "a land of olive trees and honey" (2 Ki. 18:32). Honey was a product of Palestine (Jer. 41:8; Ezek. 27:17). SAMSON ate wild honey found in the carcass of a lion (Jdg. 14:8-18). Honey became a common food (2 Sam. 17:29) even in times of scarcity (Isa. 7:15, 22). It was never part of a sacrifice, but it was a firstfruits offering (Lev. 2:11; 2 Chr. 31:5). Strained honey was kept in a jar or cruse (1 Ki. 14:3). Honey is a recommended food, but in moderation (Prov. 24:13; 25:16, 27; 27:7; Ezek. 16:13, 19). Honey is a standard of comparison for pleasant things, good or bad (Prov. 16:24; 5:3; Song of Songs 4:11; 5:1; Ezek. 3:3; Rev. 10:9). John the Baptist ate honey (Matt. 3:4; Mk. 1:6).

honor. In antiquity, the dual concepts of honor and SHAME played a very important role in the ordering of society, and recent scholarship has paid increasing attention to the significance of this cultural theme for biblical interpretation. In a more general sense, honor is an enviable esteem, a valuable reward for excellence in station, character, or service. It is paid in thought, word, deed, or substance (cf. Isa. 29:13; Prov. 3:9). Primarily, God is to be honored, but all people are to “honor the Son just as they honor the Father” (Jn. 5:23; cf. Mk. 6:4). All that is sacred is to be honored, such as the SABBATH (Isa. 58:13-14) and MARRIAGE (Heb. 13:4). PAUL told the Christians in Rome to pay “honor to whom honor is due” (Rom. 13:7 NRSV). The fifth commandment requires us to honor our parents (Exod. 20:12; Eph. 6:2-3), and Jesus rebuked the PHARISEES and SCRIBES for undermining this injunction (Matt. 15:4-6). Ancient laws pronounced the death penalty on those who dishonored parents in act or word (Exod. 21:15, 17; Lev. 20:9). PETER exhorted his readers to honor everyone, especially “the king” (i.e., the emperor, 1 Pet. 2:17), and Paul asked slaves to honor their masters (1 Tim. 6:1).

hook. This term occurs in English Bibles as the rendering of several words, including Hebrew wāw H2260 (used of the gold and silver connectors or pegs from which various hangings were suspended in the TABERNACLE, Exod. 26:32 et al.) and ḥāḥ H2626 (used, for example, of a ring put on the nose of a captive or an animal, 2 Ki. 19:28; Ezek. 19:4; et al.). In the NT, Greek ankistron G45 refers to a fish-hook (Matt. 17:27).

hope. The most common Hebrew noun for “hope” is tiqwāh H9536 (Ruth 1:12 et al.), although other terms or expressions can signify attitudes that are related to hope. According to the Bible, no one should put his trust in riches (Job 31:24; Ps. 52:7; Lk. 12:13-21; 1 Tim. 6:17), or hope in human beings rather than God (Ps. 118:8-9; 146:3-4; Jer. 17:5-6). Reliance on idols is futile (Jer. 48:13; Hab. 2:18-19), and dependence on other nations is, to say the least, uncertain (Ps. 33:10; Isa. 19:3; 20:5-6; 31:1, 3; 37:6-7; Ezek. 29:13-16). Misplaced hope may prove false, and in some cases sinful. But it should be observed that even where an instance of hope is viewed as sinful, hope itself is nowhere in the Bible regarded as evil. Throughout the Bible, hope is considered a desirable attribute of human life. Even JOB in all his suffering does not curse hope as a cruel tantalizer, but laments the fact that his days are swifter than a weaver's shuttle and come to their end without hope (Job 7:6).

In the NT, the corresponding Greek noun elpis G1828 and its cognate verb elpizō G1827 occur more than eighty times. The apostle PAUL sets up ABRAHAM as an example: "Against all hope, Abraham in hope believed and so became the father of many nations" (Rom. 4:18). Elsewhere he identifies hope as a gift of the HOLY SPIRIT that, with FAITH and LOVE, is an essential characteristic of the Christian when prophecies, tongues, and knowledge pass away (1 Cor. 13:8, 13). The biblical concept of hope is not mere expectation and desire, as in Greek literature, but includes trust, confidence, refuge in the God of hope (Rom. 5:2-5; 15:13). Christ in you is the hope of glory (Col. 1:27; cf. 1 Tim. 1:1). All creation hopes for redemption (Rom. 8:19-25). PETER says that we have "a living hope through the resurrection of Jesus Christ" (1 Pet. 1:3). JOHN THE APOSTLE adds that we purify ourselves by our hope that "when he appears, we shall be like him" (1 Jn. 3:2-3).

The plain N of Aphek where Hophni and Phinehas died in battle. (View to the N.)

Hophni. hof'ni (Heb. ḥopnî H2909, derivation uncertain). Son of ELI, who was the high priest at SHILOH (1 Sam. 1:3; 2:34; 4:4, 11, 17). Hophni and his brother PHINEHAS were greedy and rapacious when ministering as priests before the altar of Yahweh (2:12-17), and they acted immorally with the women who served at the entrance to the TABERNACLE (2:22). Not content with the share of the sacrifices assigned to them, they demanded the best part of the animal raw before the offering had been made. All this, together with their immorality, brought great discredit to their father Eli. He remonstrated with them, but not severely enough. In consequence God's judgment was pronounced against him and his house first by an unknown prophet and later through SAMUEL (2:27-36; 3:11-14). Hophni and Phinehas died in the battle against the PHILISTINES at APHEK; and Eli fell down and died when he heard of their death. This rejection of the house of Eli provides the setting for the emergence of a rightful priest, Samuel.

Hophra. hof'ruh (Heb. ḥopra ϵ H2922, from Egyp. ḥaꜣꜣibreꜣ, meaning possibly "Re [the sun-god] is long-suffering"). Fourth king of the 26th dynasty in EGYPT. Better known as Apries (through Gk. adaptation), this PHARAOH reigned nineteen years, 589-570 B.C. When NEBUCHADNEZZAR II of Babylon besieged JERUSALEM in 589, Hophra rashly marched against him at the appeal of ZEDEKIAH of Judah. As soon as the Babylonians turned from Jerusalem to meet him, the pharaoh seems to have retreated homeward, thus affording the Hebrews no relief (Jer. 37; cf. Ezek. 17:15, 17). Hophra's end was prophesied by Jeremiah (Jer. 44:30, sole biblical reference to Hophra by name) and resulted from a military defeat in LIBYA and a consequent revolt against him in Egypt.

hopper. See ANIMALS (under grasshopper).

Hor. hor (Heb. hōr H2216, possibly equivalent to har H2215, "mountain"; the name always appears in the phrase hōr hāhār, "Hor, the mountain"). (1) A mountain on the border of the land of EDOM at the foot of which the Israelites encamped on their journey from KADESH to the Promised Land (Num. 20:22-23). It was here that God told MOSES and AARON that, because of their sin at MERIBAH, Aaron would die on Mount Hor in the sight of the people of Israel. The two men ascended the mount with ELEAZAR, Aaron's son, and there Moses removed Aaron's high priestly garments and put them on Eleazar; then Aaron died, 123 years old. This was in the fortieth year after Israel had come out of Egypt (Num. 33:33-37; in Deut. 10:6 it is said that Aaron died at MOSERAH, possibly a neighboring area). Islamic tradition identifies Mount Hor with Jebel Nebi Harun ("Mountain of the Prophet Aaron"), which rises some 4,800 ft. (1,460 m.) and is approximately half-way between the S end of the DEAD SEA and the N end of the Gulf of AQABAH. A more likely site is Jebel Madurah, a mountain c. 15 mi. (24 km.) NE of Kadesh, on the NW border of EDOM.

(2) Another mountain peak with the same name was to mark the N boundary of Israel's promised inheritance (Num. 34:7-8). Its exact location is unknown, but it was undoubtedly a prominent peak in the LEBANON range between the MEDITERRANEAN and LEBO HAMATH.

Horam. hor'am (Heb. hōrām H2235, meaning unknown). King of GEZER; when LACHISH was attacked by the Israelites, Horam came to its assistance, "but Joshua defeated him and his army—until no survivors were left" (Josh. 10:33; cf. 12:12).

Horeb. hor'eb (Heb. hōrēb H2998, "dry, desolate"). See SINAI, MOUNT.

Horem. hor'em (Heb. hō'rēm H3054, possibly "consecrated" or "[small] rock crevice"). A fortified town in the hill country of NAPHTALI (Josh. 19:38). It was probably in N GALILEE, but the precise site is unknown.

Horesh. hor'esh (Heb. hōreš H3092, found only in its locative form, hōrēšâ, and usually with the definite article, "the woodland"). A place in the Desert of ZIPH where DAVID took refuge from SAUL; there David and JONATHAN made a compact (1 Sam. 23:15-18). The "strongholds at Horesh" are further identified as being on the hill of HAKILAH and S of JESHIMON (v. 19). Though the precise location is uncertain, it is often identified with Khirbet Khoreisa, about 6 mi. (10 km.) S of HEBRON. A few scholars, however, have thought that the word should be understood as a common noun (thus "the thicket in the Desert of Ziph") rather than as a place name.

Hor Haggidgad. hor'huh-gid'gad (Heb. hōr haggidgād H2988, "cave of Gidgad"). KJV Hor-hagidgad. A station of the Israelites in the wilderness, located between BENE JAAKAN and JOTBATHAH (Num. 33:31-33); apparently the same as GUDGODAH (Deut. 10:7). The site is unknown, though one proposed identification is Wadi Ghadhaghedh.

Hori. hor'i (Heb. hōrî H3036, derivation uncertain). (1) Firstborn son of LOTAN and grandson of SEIR the HORITE (Gen. 36:22; 1 Chr. 1:39). He was no doubt the ancestor of a tribal group in EDOM. The form of his name is the same as that of the gentilic “Horite,” but the connection between the personal and the ethnic name is unclear. Perhaps Hori was viewed as the Horite par excellence.

(2) Father of Shaphat; the latter was the leader from the tribe of SIMEON included among the twelve spies sent by MOSES to explore the land of Canaan (Num. 13:5).

Horim. See HORITE.

Horite. hor’it (Heb. hōrî H3037, perhaps “cave dweller” or “nobleman” or “son”). Also Horim. Phonetically, this name is the OT Hebrew equivalent of extrabiblical HURRIAN, but the OT references to “Horites” do not fit what we know about the Hurrians, a non-Semitic people. The personal names of the “Horites” in Gen. 36:20-30 are inconsistent with Hurrian patterns and seem rather to be Semitic. It is moreover claimed that no archaeological evidence exists for Hurrian settlements in EDOM or TRANSJORDAN in general, whereas the OT reports “Horites” living there (Gen. 14:6; Deut. 2:12, 22). These people, whom we may refer to as E Horites, and who were driven out and destroyed by the Edomites, were apparently not Hurrians. On the other hand, it is thought by some that the name Horite originally stood in two places where the Hebrew text has HIVITE (see LXX Gen. 34:2 and Josh. 9:7; cf. also Isa. 17:9). If so, these passages would refer to a group that we may call W Horites, because they are said to reside in the region to the W of the Jordan. They are to be kept distinct from the E Horites, the predecessors of the Edomites. The W Horites, it is claimed by some, are non-Semites related to the peoples called Hurrians in extrabiblical texts of the 2nd millennium B.C.

Hormah. hor’muh (Heb. hormâ H3055, possibly “consecration, destruction” or “rock crevice”). One of the southernmost cities of the tribe of JUDAH, located in the NEGEV, toward the boundary of EDOM (Josh. 15:30; cf. v. 21); it was subsequently allotted to the tribe of SIMEON (Josh. 19:4; 1 Chr. 4:30). Hormah is first mentioned in Num. 14:45, which records that when the Israelites rashly invaded Canaan at KADESH against the will of God, the Amalekites and Canaanites defeated and pursued them as far as Hormah. On another occasion, the Israelites vowed to the Lord that if he would help them conquer the Canaanites, they would utterly destroy their cities (Num 21:1-2, using the verb hāram H3049, “to consecrate, devote [to destruction], place under the ban”; see DEVOTED THING). God answered their prayer, they conquered the Canaanite towns, and “the place” (referring either to a cluster of cities or only to the specific spot of the defeat) was named Hormah (Num. 21:3). Later, JOSHUA is said to have conquered the king of Hormah (Josh. 12:14). Moreover, the book of Judges relates that many years later “the men of Judah went with the Simeonites their brothers and attacked the Canaanites living in Zephath, and they totally destroyed the city. Therefore it was called Hormah” (Jdg. 1:17). A possible explanation is that at the time of MOSES the Israelites were satisfied with the defeat of the Canaanites of ARAD and deferred until a later time the total fulfillment of the vow. The location of Hormah/Zephath is uncertain.

horn. This term, usually the rendering of Hebrew qeren H7967, can refer literally to the bony structure projecting from the head of rams and other animals (e.g., Gen. 22:13), but it is also used as a symbol of power, victory, and salvation (e.g., Ps. 18:2; cf. Lk. 1:69). Musical instruments were made from rams’ horns (see MUSIC AND MUSICAL INSTRUMENTS). See also HORNS OF THE ALTAR.

horned owl. See BIRDS (under owl).

horns of the altar. The four protrusions at the corners of a hewn stone ALTAR, a feature common to the ancient world (Exod. 27:2 et al.). Blood of sacrificial animals was put on these protrusions on certain occasions (Exod. 30:10; Lev. 4:7, 18, 25, 30, 34; 16:18; cf. Ezek. 43:20). To cut off its horns rendered an altar useless for religious purposes (Amos 3:14). A person seeking sanctuary might catch hold of the horns of the altar in the temple, but this did not save ADONIJAH (1 Ki. 1:50-51; 2:28-34). In a striking figure, JEREMIAH stated that the sin of Judah was engraved “on the tablets of their hearts and on the horns of their altars” (Jer. 17:1).

Horonaim. hor’uh-nay’im (Heb. ḥôrōnayim H2589, prob. “twin caves”). (1) A place near BAAL HAZOR, mentioned in connection with the killing of AMNON by the men of ABSALOM (2 Sam. 13:34; Baal Hazor is mentioned in v. 23). The mention of Horonaim comes from the SEPTUAGINT and is accepted by the NIV and other versions (the KJV, following the MT, reads differently). If Horonaim is indeed original here, the reference is probably to “the twin Horons,” that is, Upper and Lower BETH HORON (c. 12 mi./19 km. SW of Baal Hazor).

(2) A city of MOAB, mentioned in two prophetic oracles (Isa. 15:5; Jer. 48:3, 5, 34). The name Horonaim occurs also in the MOABITE STONE, where King MESHA states that he fought against it and presumably conquered it (cf. ANET, 322). The city was apparently near LUHITH at the foot of a descent (Jer. 48:5), but the exact location of both towns is unknown. It probably lay on one of the roads leading from the Moabite plateau to the ARABAH.

Horonite. hor'uh-nit (Heb. ḥōrōnî H3061). An epithet applied to SANBALLAT, who opposed NEHEMIAH in his attempt to restore Jerusalem (Neh. 2:10, 19; 13:28). The name may denote a citizen of HORONAIM in MOAB or, more probably, of BETH HORON.

horse. See ANIMALS.

Horse Gate. An entrance on the E wall of JERUSALEM (Jer. 31:40). Restored by NEHEMIAH (Neh. 3:28), it was apparently N of the WATER GATE and S of the EAST GATE (vv. 26, 29), therefore near the SE corner of the TEMPLE. Queen ATHALIAH is said to have been killed “at the entrance of the Horse Gate on the palace grounds” (2 Chr. 23:15; cf. 2 Ki. 11:16), but some argue that this was a different entrance, situated between the palace and the temple, and that it led to the stables in the Palace of the Forest of Lebanon.

horse leech. See ANIMALS (under leech).

Hosah (person). hoh'suh (Heb. ḥōsāh H2880, possibly “refuge”). A LEVITE descended from MERARI whom DAVID made a gatekeeper of the tent housing the ARK OF THE COVENANT when it was brought into JERUSALEM (1 Chr. 16:38). He and his family were later part of the organization of the gatekeepers (26:10-11) and were made responsible for providing guards for the SHALLEKETH Gate on the W (26:16).

Hosah (place). hoh'suh (Heb. ḥōsāh H2881, possibly “refuge”). A town on the N border of the tribal territory of ASHER, near TYRE on the MEDITERRANEAN coast (Josh. 19:29). Its precise location is uncertain, though many scholars identify it with ancient Usu and modern Tell Rashidiyeh, a coastal town c. 3 mi. (5 km.) SSE of Tyre.

Overview of HOSEA

Author: The prophet Hosea son of Beerī.

Historical setting: Hosea began his ministry in the northern kingdom of ISRAEL c. 750 B.C., during the last years of King JEROBOAM II, and was still active at the beginning of the reign of HEZEKIAH, king of JUDAH, c. 715. He thus witnessed the final decline of the northern kingdom, which came to an end in 722.

Purpose: To show that Israel, by repudiating the Sinaitic COVENANT, had become a faithless wife, committing spiritual adultery against her divine spouse; and to bring the nation to repentance.

Contents: Using his marriage as an illustration, Hosea depicts the relations of Israel with her God (Hos. 1-3); he then denounces the immorality and idolatry of the nation (chs. 4-8), prophesies its destruction (chs. 9-13), and urges the people to return to the Lord so that they may enjoy future blessings (ch. 14).

hosanna. hoh-zan'uh (Gk. hōsanna G6057, a transliteration of Heb. [or possibly Aram.] hōšā'ā nnā), “Save, please,” though this precise form is not attested). This term was originally a Hebrew invocation addressed to God (found only in Ps. 118:25 [KJV, “Save now”], which uses the more common long form of the imperative (hōšī'ā nnā). Later it apparently came to be used as a joyous acclamation, an ascription of praise to God. The English transliteration hosanna appears in Bible versions only in connection with Jesus’ triumphal entry into Jerusalem on Palm Sunday. Three of the evangelists give accounts of this incident, containing both identical and supplementary phrases (Matt. 21:9; Mk. 11:9-10; Jn. 12:13).

Hosea, Book of. hoh-zay'uh (Heb. hōšēa' H2107, “salvation,” or short form of hōšā'yā H2108, “Yahweh has saved” [see HOSHAIH]; Gk. Hōsēe G6060). First book of the Minor Prophets. The name in Hebrew is identical with that of HOSHEA, the last king of Israel (2 Ki. 17:1); it is also the original form of the name of JOSHUA (Num. 13:16; Deut. 32:44). Of all the prophetic material contained in the OT, the writings of Hosea were the only ones to come from the northern kingdom of Israel. This notable eighth-century B.C. prophet lived during a period of great national anxiety. He was born during the reign of JEROBOAM II (c. 786-746), the last great king of Israel, and according to the superscription of his book (Hos. 1:1) he exercised his prophetic ministry in Israel when UZZIAH (c. 783-743), JOTHAM (c. 742-735), AHAZ (c. 735-715), and HEZEKIAH (c. 715-686) reigned in Judah. While Hosea did not mention the events referred to in Isa. 7:1 and 2 Ki. 16:5, in 733 he certainly experienced the raids of the Assyrian ruler TIGLATH-PILESER III on GALILEE and TRANSJORDAN.

The time of Hosea was marked by great material prosperity. Under Jeroboam II the northern kingdom experienced a degree of economic and commercial development unknown since the early days of the united kingdom. The development of city life attracted many people from the agricultural pursuits that had formed the basis of the Israelite economy, and this presented serious problems at a later time. Characteristic of this period was the rise of successful middle-class businessmen, which was offset by the appearance of an urban proletariat or working class. The latter came into being because of the wanton demands made by the luxury-loving upper classes on the increasingly impoverished peasants and smallholders. As the latter succumbed to economic pressure, they were compelled to abandon their property and seek whatever employment was available in urban centers. Thus there resulted an ominous social gap between the upper and lower classes, a serious portent for the future of the national economy.

Hosea prophesied that God would “break Israel’s bow in the Valley of Jezreel” (Hos. 1:5). (View to the ENE toward Mt. Moreh.)

Nothing is known of Hosea’s background, except that his father’s name was Beerī. Hosea was evidently an educated person and probably came from a town in Ephraim or Manasseh. A man of profound spiritual vision, he was gifted with intellectual qualities that enabled him to comprehend the significance of those unhappy events that marked his domestic life and interpret them as a timely reminder of divine love toward awayward, sinful Israel. Ever since the days of Joshua the religious life of the Israelites had been dominated by the influence of corrupt Canaanite worship, which by the time of AMOS and Hosea virtually had become the religion of the masses. The deities chiefly venerated were the fertility god BAAL and the goddess ASHERAH. Both deities were often worshiped under the form of bulls and cows, so that when Jeroboam I set up two golden calves, one at DAN and the other at BETHEL (1 Ki. 12:28), he was encouraging the people to indulge in the fertility religion of Canaan. The cultic rites were celebrated several times each year and were marked by drunkenness, ritual prostitution, acts of violence, and indulgence in pagan forms of worship at the shrines. See IDOLATRY.

Hosea saw that this form of worship was the exact opposite of what God desired of his people. The Sinaitic COVENANT emphasized the exclusive worship of the Lord by a nation holy to him. However, the religious life of the covenant people had degenerated to the point of becoming identified with the shameless immoral worship of the pagan Canaanite deities. It was Hosea's primary duty to recall wayward Israel to its obligations under the agreement made at SINAI. On that occasion Israel had voluntarily made a pact with God that involved surrender, loyalty, and obedience. As a result, Israel had become God's son (Hos. 11:1; cf. Exod. 4:22) by adoption and divine grace. Of necessity the initiative had come from God, but Hosea saw that it was important to emphasize the free cooperative acceptance of that relationship by the Israelites. Hence he stressed that Israel was really God's bride (Hos. 2:7, 16, 19), and employed the marriage metaphor to demonstrate the voluntary association of the bride with her divine lover.

The catalyst of Hosea's prophetic message is his marriage to a woman named GOMER. There are two major views of this relationship. The proleptic view holds that Gomer was pure when she married Hosea but later proved unfaithful. Another major view holds that she was a harlot when the prophet married her. Either way, the shock effect of Hosea's marital difficulties would have had telling impact on the people of his community. The children born of this marriage were given symbolic names indicating divine displeasure with Israel. After Gomer had pursued her paramours, she was to be brought back and with patient love readmitted to Hosea's home, there to await in penitence and grief the time of restoration to full favor. This was a clear picture of wayward Israel in its relationship with God and showed the unending faithfulness of the Almighty.

The remainder of the prophecy (Hos. 4-14) is an indictment of Israel, delivered at various times from the later days of Jeroboam II to about 730 B.C. The style of this section is vigorous, though the Hebrew text has suffered in transmission, making for difficulties in translation. The first three chapters have been regarded by some as allegorical. Though the book is generally held to be a unity, critical writers have maintained that interpolations and editorial material occur throughout the work.

The book may be outlined as follows:

Hosea's unhappy marriage and its results (chs. 1-3).

The priests condone immorality (ch. 4)

Israel's sin will be punished unless she repents (ch. 5)

Israel's sin is thoroughgoing; her repentance half-hearted. (ch. 6)

Inner depravity and outward decay (ch. 7)

The nearness of judgment (ch. 8)

The impending calamity (ch. 9)

Israel's guilt and punishment (ch. 10)

God pursues Israel with love (ch. 11)

An exhortation to repentance, with promised restoration (chs.12-14)

hosen. This archaic English word is used by the KJV to render an unusual Aramaic noun that probably means "trousers" (Dan. 3:21).

Hoshaiah. hoh-shay'yuh (Heb. hōšā yā H2108, "Yahweh has saved [or helped]"). (1) A leader of Judah who took a prominent part in the ceremonial processions at the dedication of the walls of JERUSALEM (Neh. 12:32).

(2) Father of AZARIAH; the latter was one of the army officers opposed to JEREMIAH (Jer. 43:2). Elsewhere (42:1 [LXX 49:1]), the MT has "Jezaniah son of Hoshaiah" (see JAAZANIAH), but there the NRSV follows the SEPTUAGINT in reading "Azariah son of Maaseiah." If Jezaniah/Jaazaniah is the same person as Azariah, then his father Hoshaiah was a MAACATHITE (2 Ki. 25:23; Jer. 40:8).

Hoshama. hosh'uh-muh (Heb. hōšāmā ◊ H2106, prob. "Yahweh has heard"). Son of King Jeconiah (i.e., JEHOIACHIN), apparently born after the royal family was led away into exile in BABYLON (1 Chr. 3:18).

Hoshea. hoh-shee'uh (Heb. hōšēa ◊ H2107, "salvation," or short form of hōšā yā H2108, "Yahweh has saved"). The name in Hebrew is identical with that of HOSEA the prophet.

(1) Original name of JOSHUA son of Nun before MOSES changed it (Num. 13:8, 16; KJV, "Oshea"); apparently he was known by both names for a time (Deut. 32:44 MT).

(2) Son of Azaziah; he was an officer of DAVID set over the tribe of EPHRAIM (1 Chr. 27:20).

(3) One of the leaders of the people who set their seal to the covenant of NEHEMIAH (Neh. 10:23).

(4) Son of Elah and last king of Israel (2 Ki. 15:30; 17:1-6; 18:1, 9-10). Hoshea ruled for nine years (732-724 B.C.) during a time of social and moral upheaval when a total of six kings came to the throne of Israel in a period of only fourteen years (746-732). Hoshea became king by forming a conspiracy against and murdering his predecessor PEKAH son of Remaliah (15:30), apparently due to the utter failure of Pekah's policy of resistance to ASSYRIA. This policy had ended in complete defeat. Hoshea reigned as the vassal king of Assyria, under heavy tribute (cf. 17:3). Nothing is known of the details of his reign except the laconic evaluation of the editor of 2 Kings: "He did evil in the eyes of the LORD, but not like the kings of Israel who preceded him" (17:2). Tiglath-Pileser III died in 727 B.C. and SHALMANESER V succeeded him. This change probably led Hoshea, apparently seeking such an opportunity, to withhold tribute and so declare independence. At the same time he sought help from Egypt, sending messengers to Pharaoh So. Shalmaneser marched against Israel in 724. Hoshea capitulated and paid tribute, but he was too badly compromised to clear himself. Shalmaneser, doubting his loyalty, imprisoned him (17:3-4). Nothing more is heard of him.

hospitality. Although the word occurs only a few times in the Bible (e.g., Rom. 12:13; 16:23; 1 Tim. 3:2; 5:10; Tit. 1:8; 1 Pet. 4:9; 3 Jn. 8), the idea appears as early as ABRAHAM (Gen. 14:17-19). One might be entertaining angels unawares (Heb. 13:2) as Abraham did (Gen. 18), graciously inviting chance passers-by, washing their feet, preparing fresh meat and bread for them (18:1-8), and accompanying them when they left (18:16). LOT entertained the same angels (ch. 19). The extreme to which protection of a stranger might be carried is illustrated in that incident (19:4-9). REBEKAH showed kindness to Abraham's servant, giving him and his camels water and receiving various gold ornaments as a reward (24:15-28). LABAN seconded her hospitality (24:29-31); JACOB fared well in the same household (29:1-14). JOSEPH's hospitality to his brothers had a purpose (43:15-34). As a refugee, MOSES found welcome with REUEL, after helping his daughters water their flocks (Exod. 2:15-22). MANOAH entertained an angel (Jdg. 13:2-23), combining hospitality with a burnt offering. The plight of a stranger in a city where only one old man showed the ancient virtue of hospitality is told in Jdg. 19:11-28. The common people continued to be hospitable (1 Sam. 28:21-25; 2 Ki. 4:8-10).

Jesus exercised hospitality when he fed 5,000 (Matt. 14:15-21; Mk. 6:35-44; Lk. 9:12-17; Jn. 6:4-13), 4,000 (Matt. 15:32-38; Mk. 8:1-9), and, after the resurrection, his disciples (Jn. 21:4-13). He received hospitality from grudging PHARISEES (Lk. 7:36-50; 14:1-14) and loving hospitality in a home at BETHANY (Matt. 21:17; 26:6-13; Mk. 14:3-9; Lk. 10:38-42; Jn. 12:1-8). Jesus invited himself to ZACCHAEUS's house and was shown hospitality there (Lk. 19:5-10). The owner of the upper room gladly gave Jesus and his disciples use of the room for the Last Supper (Matt. 26:17-30; Mk. 14:12-26; Lk. 22:7-39; Jn. 13:1-18:1). The disciples at EMMANUS were hospitable to Jesus even when they did not recognize him (Lk. 24:29-32). Jesus taught hospitality by the parable of the Good Samaritan (Lk. 10:30-37), and he told his disciples where they would and would not find it (Matt. 10:11-15; Lk. 10:5-12). The apostles were entertained and churches begun in hospitable homes (see especially Acts of the Apostles).

host. For the sense "someone who entertains guests," see HOSPITALITY; for the sense "multitude, army," see ARMY and HOST OF HEAVEN.

hostage. This English term is used to render a Hebrew phrase that means literally, "sons of the pledges" (i.e., captives kept as surety against further political upheavals), which occurs only in the record of the victory of JEHOASH of Israel over AMAZIAH of Judah, when hostages were carried off to SAMARIA (2 Ki. 14:14 = 2 Chr. 25:24). Similar records from cuneiform sources indicate that such hostages were treated as members of a special social class and often integrated into the conquering society. Although they were in jeopardy, they were not slaves or servants.

host of heaven. This phrase is used by the KJV and other versions as a literal rendering of a Hebrew phrase that occurs eighteen times in the OT (Deut. 4:19 et al.; cf. in the NT Lk. 2:13; Acts 7:42). The NIV uses a variety of translations, such as "heavenly array" (Deut. 4:19) and "starry hosts" (2 Ki.

17:16). Although the most frequent meaning of the Hebrew noun šābā [◌] H7372 may have to do with warfare or an ^{ARMY}, it does not seem that this sense is the most fundamental. At least some passages do not bear that meaning easily (Num. 4:3). In this light, is the host of heaven to be thought of as an army of heaven, or a group of beings inhabiting heaven?

In most of the passages, the phrase probably has reference to heavenly bodies, either in general or in reference to stars in particular. These are mentioned in several different connections. For example, the host of heaven is not to receive worship (Deut. 4:19; 17:3). On the other hand, various passages show that Israel did worship the host of heaven. It is mentioned in the summary of the sins of the northern kingdom (2 Ki. 17:16 et al.; see also ^{QUEEN OF HEAVEN}). Sometimes the host of heaven is seen as the object of God's creative activity, rendering obedience to the divine will. It may be that the "host" of Gen. 2:1 (KJV) is a broader conception: the host of heaven and earth, including the whole of creation. The host of heaven was made by divine breath (Ps. 33:6), named and controlled by God (Isa. 40:26; 45:12).

Although "host of heaven" most frequently means heavenly bodies, there are a few passages where it clearly means something else. According to 1 Ki. 22:19 (= 2 Chr. 18:18), the prophet ^{MICAH} saw the host of heaven standing beside God's throne conversing with the Lord, and in v. 21 they are called spirits. This conception of the host of heaven as angelic beings is also seen in Lk. 2:13, where the phrase must refer to ^{ANGELS}.

hosts, Lord of. See ^{LORD OF HOSTS}.

Hotham. hoh'thuhm (Heb. hôtām H2598, "signet, seal"). (1) Son of Heber and great-grandson of ^{ASHER} (1 Chr. 7:32; apparently called ^{HELEM} in v. 35).

(2) A man from ^{AROER} who was the father of Shama and Jeiel, two of ^{DAVID}'s mighty warriors (1 Chr. 11:44; KJV, "Hothan," following LXX).

Hothan. See ^{HOTHAM} #2.

Hothir. hoh'thuhr (Heb. hôtîr H2110, possibly "abundance"). Son of ^{HEMAN}, the king's seer (1 Chr. 25:4). The fourteen sons of Heman, along with the sons of ^{ASAPH} and ^{JEDUTHUN}, were set apart "for the ministry of prophesying, accompanied by harps, lyres and cymbals" (v. 1). The assignment of duty was done by lot, and the twenty-first lot fell to Hothir, his sons, and his relatives (25:28).

hough. See HAMSTRING.

hour. The OT does not use a specific Hebrew term for “hour” (in the sense of a unit of time marking intervals during the day), for apparently the Israelites had no system of equal hours for dividing the day. In the earlier periods of OT history, the only divisions of the natural day were morning, noonday, and evening (Gen. 1:5; 43:16). The night appears under the threefold division of first, middle, and morning watches (Exod. 14:24; Jdg. 7:19; Lam. 2:19). The Babylonians must have been among the first to adopt the division of twelve equal parts for the day, for Herodotus (Hist. 2.109) testifies that the Greeks derived this custom from them. The sun ^{DIAL} of AHAZ (2 Ki. 20:11; Isa. 38:8) was undoubtedly introduced from Babylonia.

Although the Greek term pēchys G4388 (“forearm, cubit”) should perhaps be rendered “hour” in one saying of Jesus (Matt. 6:27 = Lk 12:25), the standard term is hōra G6052, which the NT uses in different ways. (1) It may signify a brief period of time of no definite length (Matt. 26:40). (2) It is used in connection with the broad divisions of time, that is, third, sixth, and ninth hour (corresponding roughly to our 9 a.m., noon, and 3 p.m.); for example, the third and the ninth were the regular times of worship in the temple (Acts 2:15; 3:1), the times for the morning and evening sacrifice. (3) The Greek term may also refer to a definite period of time, that is, one twelfth of the day; although only one NT passage expressly mentions the twelve hours of the day (Jn. 11:9), there are references to “two hours” (Acts 19:34), the “seventh hour” (Jn. 4:52), the “tenth hour” (1:39). (4) An “hour” may be simply the point of time at which an event occurs (Matt. 8:13; 9:22 [NIV, “moment”]; 15:28). (5) The term is used of the appointed time of God’s intervention in history (Matt. 24:36, 44, 50; 25:13; Mk. 13:32; Lk. 12:12, 39, 46; 22:53; Rev. 3:3, 10; 9:15; 14:7, 15; 18:10); see ^{ESCHATOLOGY}. (6) Another theological use is with reference to God’s appointed time for specific events in the life of Christ. Jesus again and again made clear that the Father had a fixed time for every event in his life. This is evident especially in the Gospel of John (Jn. 2:4; 12:23, 27; 13:1; 17:1), but the other Gospels also make it clear (Matt. 26:45; Mk. 14:35; Lk. 22:53); and the disciples of Jesus were aware of it, at least in retrospect (Jn. 7:30; 8:20). There was nothing accidental in the life of Jesus; everything he did was done according to the will of his Father. See also ^{TIME}.

house. Words for “house” (mainly Heb. bayit H1074, Gk. oikia G3864 and oikos G3875) are very frequent throughout the Bible and include a wide variety of meanings. It is used in the OT to refer to a “household” or “family” (Exod. 2:1), the ^{TABERNACLE} (23:19; 34:26) or ^{TEMPLE} (1 Ki. 5:3-7:1) as the house of God, and a temple of heathen gods (Jdg. 16:23-30; 1 Sam. 31:9-10). It might be a nomad tent (Gen. 14:13-14; cf. 18:1; 27:15) or a building in a city (19:2-11). God contrasts tent with house in 2 Sam. 7:6. JACOB called a place outdoors marked by a stone “the house of God” (28:17-22). In the NT, oikia usually indicates a building; sometimes it refers to the inhabitants of a house (Matt. 12:25; Mk. 3:25; Jn. 4:53; 1 Cor. 16:15; Phil. 4:22) or even to the human BODY (2 Cor. 5:1). In 2 Cor. 5:1 (KJV), the “earthly house” is the present physical body, while the “eternal” one is the future RESURRECTION body. The related term oikos can also refer to a building (Matt. 9:6-7), but often to its inhabitants (Lk. 19:9; Acts 11:14) or to descendants (Matt. 10:6; Lk. 1:33) or to the temple (Matt. 12:4; 21:13; Mk. 2:26; 11:17; Lk. 6:4; 11:51; 19:46; Jn. 2:16, 17; Acts 2:47, 49).

We read of no shelters in EDEN, for probably none were needed in its mild climate; but CAIN built a CITY (Gen. 4:17), which could have been a tent-city or a cave-city. After the FLOOD, NIMROD is credited with the building of several cities (10:10-12), where archaeologists have uncovered the remains of early houses. In MESOPOTAMIA burned bricks joined with bitumen were used in place of stone (11:3). Elaborate houses in UR, of the period when ABRAHAM lived there (11:31), have been excavated. He abandoned these luxurious surroundings to live in a tent (12:8) in the Land of Promise. Abraham found houses in EGYPT (12:15), at least one for the PHARAOH. LOT, when separated from Abraham, at first moved his tent to SODOM (13:12) but later lived in a house (19:2-11). Finally Lot took refuge in a cave (19:30). The house of LABAN may well have been a tent (24:31-32, 29:13-14). When JOSEPH arrived in Egypt, there were houses there: POTIPHAR’s (39:2-5), that of the captain of the guard in the prison (40:3), Joseph’s own house (43:16-34; 44:14), and Pharaoh’s (45:16). The law made provision in advance of the settlement in Canaan for the cleansing of a stone house in which there was leprosy (Lev. 14:33-55). Israelite spies stayed in a house in JERICHO (Josh. 2:1) with a roof where stalks of flax were dried (2:6) and with a window (2:15); the house was built into the city wall (2:15).

After the conquest under JOSHUA, the Israelites came increasingly to live in houses in the cities and towns of Canaan; though some, like the RECAPITES (Jer. 35:7, 10), continued to live in tents, and some took refuge in caves in times of uncertainty (1 Ki. 19:9). House walls were often of rough stone as much as 3 ft. (1 m.) thick and often of unburned clay brick (Job 4:19), sometimes protected with a casing of stone slabs. In larger buildings the stones were squared, smoothed, and pointed. To enter the ordinary small house, from the street one first entered a forecourt, with a covered portion on one side. From the forecourt, doors opened into a living room, with two small bedchambers beyond. When sons married, additions were made as space permitted by using the court, complicating the design. Especially on a hilly site, a large boulder would be built into the corner to support the walls, the most necessary stone being called the CORNERSTONE (Isa. 28:16). The importance of dedicating a new house (in earliest times by sacrifices) was recognized by excusing a man from military duty until he had done so (Deut. 20:5).

The floor of a house might be a leveled surface of stone, more often beaten clay. The rich often had a stone slab floor. SOLOMON'S temple had a floor of cypress boards (1 Ki. 6:15). For doors there were square openings in the wall with a stone or wood lintel, doorposts (Exod. 12:22-23; 1 Ki. 6:31), and a stone threshold. Doors might be of textiles, leather, or rushes, but wooden doors fastened by a bar were used early. Stone sill and head-sockets indicate pivot hinges, requiring sturdier construction of the door. A key is referred to as early as Jdg. 3:25. Locks (Cant. 5:5) may have been bolts. Hearths were provided, but no chimney, the smoke escaping through doors and windows. Braziers or firepots were also used (Jer. 36:22). Windows were high, small openings with covers like the doors for protection; some had lattices.

Roofs had beams with transverse rafters covered with brushwood and overlaid with mud mixed with chopped straw. They were flat and were beaten and rolled. The roof was used for WORSHIP (2 Ki. 23:12; Jer. 19:13; 32:29; Acts 10:9). ABSALOM pitched his tent on the roof for publicity (2 Sam. 16:22). Three thousand PHILISTINES used the roof of their temple as a grandstand (Jdg. 16:27), illustrating its strength, while its weakness was demonstrated when SAMSON pushed apart the middle pillars on which the structure depended. There were outside stairs leading to the roof of a house and its "upper chamber." In some cases the "upper room" may have been inside the house. In the living room a raised brick platform ran across one side of the room (in the Hellenistic period at least), sometimes with ducts to heat it, and on this the family spread their bedding by night or sat by day. In cold weather the cattle might be admitted to the lower part of the living room of a poor family. PALACES were much more elaborate (1 Ki. 7:1-12). There is a sharp contrast between the humble homes of the common people and the luxurious dwellings of kings and the very rich in Egypt, Mesopotamia, Palestine under the Hebrew monarchy and after, and in Greece and Rome of the Hellenistic period.

A Christian community, many of whose members were slaves, would be familiar with the lavish contents of large houses (2 Tim. 2:20). While Christians at first continued to worship in temple and SYNAGOGUE, from the beginning they met also in private homes (Acts 1:13; 2:2, 46). Worship in homes was a well-established pattern in Paul's ministry (Rom. 16:5; 1 Cor. 16:19; Col. 4:15; Phlm. 2). Special buildings for Christian churches do not appear in the NT. The FAMILY had been the religious unit from the beginning of creation; worship centered in the house, from tent to palace. Tabernacle and temple were "the house of God." In the NT the house where a Christian family lived was open to other Christian brothers and sisters to worship together; and when the temple was destroyed and the synagogue was closed to Christians, the church in the home became the sole refuge of the believer, until special buildings were erected. Thus the sanctifying influences of corporate worship were added to the human associations that made a house a home.

household. See FAMILY.

householder. This English term (as well as "goodman of the house") is used in the KJV to render Greek oikodespotēs G3867, "master [or owner] of the house." The word, which appears only in the Synoptic Gospels, is applied to differentiate between employer and employee in Jesus' parables (Matt. 13:27 et al.). It is used also to describe Christ himself in his overlordship of the KINGDOM OF GOD (Lk. 13:25). The rendering "householder" is used consistently by the RSV (in NRSV only at Matt. 13:27), but more recent translations prefer "master of the household," "landowner," etc.

household gods. See IDOLATRY; TERAPHIM.

House (Palace) of the Forest of Lebanon. See FOREST.

House of the Heroes. See HEROES, HOUSE OF THE.

howling creatures. See ANIMALS (under jackal).

Hozai. hoh'zi (Heb. hōzāy H2559 [not in NIV]). According to the MT (followed by NJPS), the apparent name of the author of a chronicle or history in which the prayer of MANASSEH, his sinfulness, and certain of his impious acts were recorded (2 Chr. 33:19 [KJV mg., “Hosai”]). Most versions, however, translate “the seers” (following one Hebrew MS and the SEPTUAGINT).

Hubbah. huh'buḥ (Heb. ḥubbâ H2465 derivation uncertain). Son of Shomer (KJV, “Shamer”; NRSV, “Shemer”) and descendant of ASHER (1 Chr. 7:34; KJV, “Jehubbah,” following a textual variant).

Hukkok. huh'kok (Heb. ḥûqôq H2982). A town on the W border of the tribal territory of NAPHTALI (Josh. 19:34; NJPS, “Hukok”). It has often been identified with Yaquq, some 3 mi. (5 km.) NW of GENNESARET. Others, objecting that Yaquq is much too far to the E, propose Khirbet el-Jemeijmeh, 15 mi. (24 km.) W of Gennesaret. See also HUKOK.

Hukok. hyoo'kok (Heb. ḥûqôq H2577). A town within the tribal territory of ASHER assigned to the LEVITES descended from GERSHON (1 Chr. 6:75). Some think it may be the same as HUKKOK, but the parallel passage (Josh. 21:31) leads most scholars to identify it with HELKATH.

Hul. huhl (Heb. ḥûl H2566, meaning uncertain). Son of ARAM and grandson of SHEM, included in the Table of Nations (Gen. 10:23). In the parallel list (1 Chr. 1:17), the phrase “the sons of Aram” is missing from the MT, making it appear that GETHER was a son of Shem and thus a brother of Aram. It is possible that this passage intends to list the descendants of Shem without distinguishing generations (cf. NRSV), but many scholars believe that the phrase in question dropped out by scribal mistake at an early stage in the textual transmission of the book (cf. NIV).

Huldah. huhl'duh (Heb. ḥuldâ H2701, “mole, weasel”). A prophetess who lived during the reign of King JOSIAH (2 Ki. 22:14-20; 2 Chr. 34:22-28). Identified as the wife of SHALLUM, who was the “keeper of the wardrobe,” Huldah lived in the SECOND DISTRICT of JERUSALEM (cf. Zeph. 1:10). HILKIAH the priest, SHAPHAN the scribe, and some others, having been commanded by Josiah to seek an oracle from the Lord concerning the lawbook found in the TEMPLE, came to her to fulfill the request. She then prophesied judgment and disaster upon Jerusalem and its people, but not for Josiah, since his reading of the lawbook had led to repentance. For him she relayed God's message, "I will gather you to your fathers, and you will be buried [lit., be gathered to your grave] in peace. Your eyes will not see all the disaster I am going to bring on this place" (1 Ki. 22:20).

human nature, humanity. What has traditionally been called "the doctrine of man" is the biblical teaching concerning human beings in their relation to God and his CREATION. It includes the following truths: (1) As Creator, God made the human species, male and female (Gen. 1-2). Human beings are a part of the created order as a single species (Acts 17:26), but they are also separate from the animal world with a special relationship both to God and to the created order.

(2) God made man in the image and likeness of himself (Gen. 1:26-27; Ps. 8:5). This points to that which separates humans from the animals in terms of their moral conscience, self-knowledge, and capacity for a spiritual communion with his Creator. All human beings thus have two aspects, a bodily and a spiritual (BODY and SOUL, or body and MIND, or body and SPIRIT), and so have the capacity to relate fully both to the created order and to their Creator.

(3) This capacity has been seriously restricted, misdirected, and abused because of SIN. ADAM and EVE, the first pair of human beings, freely chose to disobey the divine command and to assert their will against that of their Creator. They lost their personal communion with God, and this had repercussions for the whole of their lives and relationships. It also had an effect on their children and their children's children (Gen. 3; Rom. 5:12-19).

(4) Whatever their historical and social context, human beings have found themselves capable, on the one hand, of great heroism, public service, personal kindness and goodness; and, on the other hand, of self-centeredness, pride, self-pity, and cruelty (Mk. 7:20-23). They show signs both of being God's special creation and of being sinful creatures (Rom. 7:14-25).

(5) The eternal Son of God became Man in order to provide salvation from sin and a new, permanent relationship with God both in this world and, more fully, in the world to come. As such, Jesus Christ is called the "last Adam" (1 Cor. 15:45; cf. Rom. 5:14-19), and the world to come is "the new heaven and earth" (Rev. 21:1).

(6) Thus in Christ human beings are restored to their right and proper relationship both with their Creator and with his created order (Col. 1:15-20).

(7) Either as unbeliever or believer, each human being is held by God to be a responsible creature, and so each person will be judged at the Last Judgment (Rom. 2:16).

human sacrifice. See CHEMOSH; JEPHTHAH; MOLECH.

humiliation of Christ. See INCARNATION; KENOSIS.

humility. The concept of humility shades off in various directions, but the central thought is freedom from pride—lowliness, meekness, modesty, mildness. There is a “false humility” (Col. 2:18, 23; NRSV, “self-abasement”). God humbles people to bring them to obedience (Deut. 8:2). To humble ourselves is a condition of God’s favor (2 Chr. 7:14) and his supreme requirement (Mic. 6:8). God dwells with the humble (Isa. 57:15). Humility is encouraged (Prov. 15:33; 18:12; 22:4). To the Greeks humility was weak and despicable, but Jesus made it the cornerstone of character (Matt. 5:3, 5; 18:4; 23:12; Lk. 14:11; 18:14). Jesus by his humility drew people to himself (Matt. 11:28-30; Jn. 13:1-20; Rev. 3:20). PAUL emphasized the humility of Jesus (2 Cor. 8:9; Phil. 2:1-11), commanded us to be humble toward one another (Rom. 12:10; 1 Cor. 13:4-6; Phil. 2:3-4), and spoke of himself as an example (Acts 20:19). PETER exhorted humility before the brethren and before God (1 Pet. 5:5-6).

Humtah. huhm’tuh (Heb. ḥumṭâ H2794, “[place of] lizard”). A town in the hill country within the tribal territory of JUDAH (Josh. 15:54). It was apparently near HEBRON, but its precise location is unknown.

Hundred, Tower of the. The name of a tower on the N wall of the city of JERUSALEM, located between the Tower of HANANEL and the SHEEP GATE; it was restored by Eliashib the high priest and his fellow priests (Neh. 3:1; 12:39; KJV, “tower of Meah”). Both the Tower of the Hundred and the Tower of Hananel protected the NW approach to the TEMPLE area.

hunger. This word and the term FAMINE are both used by KJV and modern translations to represent the Hebrew word rā‘āb H8280, which may refer not only to an individual’s hunger but also to acute and general lack of food (similarly Gk. limos G3350). It is not always clear in a given context which is meant. In a few passages individual hunger is meant (e.g. Deut. 28:48; Jer. 38:9), but the great majority of the uses of the word refer to famine. The cognate verbs are more often used of the individual (Prov. 19:15; Matt. 5:6 et al.), but they also can be used in the sense, “to experience famine” (Gen. 41:55).

hunter. See OCCUPATIONS AND PROFESSIONS.

Hupham. hyoo'fuhm (Heb. ḥûpām H2573, derivation uncertain; gentilic ḥûpāmî H2574, "Huphamite"). Son of BENJAMIN, grandson of JACOB, and eponymous ancestor of the Huphamite clan; the name occurs only in a census list (Num. 26:39). He is probably to be identified with HUPPIM (Gen. 46:21; 1 Chr. 7:12). See also NOHAH.

Huppah. hup'uh (Heb. ḥuppāh H2904, possibly "shelter"). The leader of a priestly family whom DAVID appointed by lot as the head of the thirteenth division for duties in the sanctuary (1 Chr. 24:13).

Huppim. hup'im (Heb. ḥuppîm H2907, derivation uncertain). Son or descendant of BENJAMIN (Gen. 46:21), usually identified with HUPHAM (Num. 26:39). Elsewhere (1 Chr. 7:12) he is called a son or descendant of Ir (presumably the same as Iri, apparently a grandson of Benjamin, v. 7), but some understand this occurrence as a gentilic, "Huppites" (cf. NIV in vv. 12 and 15, though in the latter passage many scholars suspect textual corruption). See also MUPPIM and SHEPHUPHAM.

Huppite. See HUPPIM.

Hur. huhr (Heb. ḥûr H2581, possibly "son," but derivation disputed). (1) A prominent Israelite who aided AARON in holding aloft the hands of MOSES at REPHIDIM so that the Israelites could win over the AMALEKITES (Exod. 17:10-13). He also assisted in the ruling of the tribes during Moses' absence on Mount SINAI (24:14).

(2) Son of CALEB (the son of Hezron), but primarily identified as the grandfather of BEZALEL (one of the craftsmen who built the TABERNACLE, Exod. 31:2; 35:30; 38:22; 1 Chr. 2:19-20, 50; 2 Chr. 1:5). He is also called a "son" (that is, descendant) of JUDAH and "father" (i.e., founder) of BETHLEHEM (1 Chr. 4:1, 4).

(3) A king of MIDIAN in alliance with SIHON the AMORITE; Hur and four other Midianite rulers, along with BALAAM, were defeated and put to death by the Israelites (Num. 31:1-8; Josh. 13:21).

(4) According to the KJV, the father of one of the twelve district governors who supplied provisions for SOLOMON and the royal household (1 Ki. 4:8).

Modern versions, however, do not render the Hebrew as “the son of Hur,” but rather understand the name of this officer to be BEN-HUR, who was perhaps a descendant of #2 above.

(5) Father of a certain REPHAIAH who was “ruler of a half-district of Jerusalem” in the time of NEHEMIAH and who repaired a section of the wall (Neh. 3:9). It is possible that “son of Hur” identifies Rephaiah as belonging to a clan descended from #2 above.

Hurai. hyoor’i (Heb. ḥûray H2584). See HIDDAI.

Huram. hyoor’uhm (Heb. ḥûrām H2586, “my brother is lifted up”). (1) Son of Bela and grandson of BENJAMIN (1 Chr. 8:5).

(2) A king of TYRE, allied with DAVID and SOLOMON. See HIRAM #1.

(3) A skilled craftsman from Tyre employed by Solomon to build his palace and the temple. See HIRAM #2.

Huram-Abi. hyoor’uhm-ay’bi (Heb. ḥûrām ābî H2587). See HIRAM #2.

Huri. hyoor’i (Heb. ḥûrî H2585, possibly “son,” but derivation disputed). Son of Jaroah and descendant of GAD (1 Chr. 5:14).

Hurrians. hoor’ee-uhnz. A non-Semitic people group that figured prominently in the ANE during the second millennium B.C. Although the name HORITE is sometimes associated with them, the Hurrians are probably not referred to in the Bible. Groups designating themselves as Hurrians (or writing a language identified elsewhere with them) have been attested all over the ANE. Appearing as early as the middle of the third millennium B.C., they occupied the great half-circle of the Taurus Mountains from N of CARCHEMISH to the country of Namar, around Lake Van, and perhaps as far S as the Upper Zab River. Their language, which is still only partially understood, seems related to only one other known language—Urartian, in which the kings of Urartu (see ARARAT) near Lake Van composed inscriptions c. 900-600 B.C. The greatest political achievement of the Hurrians was the kingdom of Mitanni, whose capital was Washukkanni in the Middle EUPHRATES Valley. At its height (c. 1400), Mitanni dominated Kizzuwatna and N SYRIA on the W, ASSYRIA in the central region, and Nuzi in the E.

The degree of Hurrian cultural influence on the peoples of southern and central PALESTINE was far less than that in Syria and N MESOPOTAMIA and ASIA MINOR. Since ABRAHAM emigrated into Palestine from the E via the HARAN region in Upper Mesopotamia, he brought with him many customs acquired while he lived in that city. Many hitherto obscure aspects of the patriarchal narratives, chiefly having to do with legal customs, have been remarkably clarified by the tablets from Nuzi, a Hurrian settlement in northern Iraq, E of the TIGRIS. The presence in Palestine proper of Hurrians can be shown by Hurrian names. One of them is ARAUNAH, the individual from whom DAVID purchased the site for the future TEMPLE of Yahweh (2 Sam. 24:18-25; cf. 1 Chr. 21:18-30). Clay tablets found in TAANACH and SHECHEM in central Palestine also contain Hurrian personal names. In the OT, several groups that appear to be Hurrian bear the names Jebusite, Horite, and even HIVITE (note that in Gen. 34:2 and Josh. 9:7, the LXX has “Horite” for MT “Hivite,” possibly reflecting scribal confusion between r and w). It is possible that HAMOR the Hivite, who is connected with the town of Shechem, was a Hurrian. Other Hivite centers were at GIBEON (Josh. 3-7; 11:19), and in the LEBANON (Jdg. 3:3) and HERMON (Josh. 11:3) mountains.

husbandman. See OCCUPATIONS AND PROFESSIONS.

Hushah. hoosh´uh (Heb. ḥûšâ H2592, perhaps “haste”; gentilic ḥuṣâtî H3144, “Hushathite”). Son of Ezer and descendant of JUDAH (1 Chr. 4:4). However, the word “father” in that verse probably means “founder” or “ruler,” in which case Hushah was a Judean town, perhaps the same as modern HUSAN (c. 4.5 mi./7 km. W of BETHLEHEM). The term Hushathite (that is, an inhabitant of Hushah or someone belonging to a clan that bore that name) is applied to a warrior named SIBBECAI (2 Sam. 21:18; 1 Chr. 11:29; 20:4; 27:11; apparently the same as Mebunnai in 2 Sam. 23:27).

Hushai. hoosh´i (Heb. ḥûšay H2593, possibly short form of HASHABIAH, “Yahweh has taken account”). (1) An ARKITE, from the territory W of BETHEL (Josh. 16:1-2), who was DAVID’s adviser and “friend” (1 Chr. 27:33). David asked Hushai to pretend to favor ABSALOM, in order that he might defeat the counsel of AHITHOPHEL, David’s former counselor, who had gone over to Absalom (2 Sam. 15:32-37). Ahithophel and Hushai both advised Absalom how to defeat David (16:15—17:4), but Absalom adopted Hushai's advice. Hushai then sent word to David to escape across the Jordan (17:15-22). When Ahithophel found that his advice was not taken, he hanged himself (17:23).

(2) Father of BAANA; the latter was one of the twelve officers commissioned to supply provisions for King SOLOMON's court (1 Ki. 4:16). Some have thought that this Hushai is the same as #1 above, but it seems improbable that the son of an Arkite (i.e., someone with roots in the tribe of BENJAMIN) would have been placed in charge of a town in ASHER.

Husham. hoosh'uhm (Heb. ḥûšām H2595, possibly "big-nosed"). A royal figure from TEMAN (some say TEMA) who succeeded Jobab as king of EDOM (Gen. 36:34-35; 1 Chr. 1:45-46). He lived "before any Israelite king reigned" (Gen. 36:31).

Hushathite. See HUSHAH.

Hushim. hoosh'im (Heb. ḥušîm H3123 [with spelling variations], derivation unknown). (1) Son (Heb., "sons") of DAN and grandson of JACOB (Gen. 46:23). He is elsewhere called SHUHAM (Num. 26:42), and the relationship between the two names is unclear.

(2) Son (Heb., "sons") of AHER and descendant of BENJAMIN (1 Chr. 7:12; NRSV). However, the NIV takes this name as a true plural and renders, "the Hushites." Some scholars emend the genealogy and propose that the reference here is to the same person(s) as in #1 above.

(3) One of the wives of SHAHARAIM, a Benjamite; she bore him two children (1 Chr. 8:8, 11).

Hushite. See HUSHIM #2.

Huzzab. huh'zuhb. According to the KJV, Huzzab is the name of a city that was to be taken captive (Nah. 2:7 [Heb. 2:8]). The Hebrew word in question, however, can be understood as a common verb meaning, “It is decreed” (thus NIV and other modern versions). Several other interpretations have been proposed.

Hyksos gold jewelry from Tell el-^cAjjul (prob. ancient Sharuhén) dating to the 17th cent. B.C.

Hyksos. hik'sohs (Gk. Hyksōs or Hykoussōs, from Egyptian ḥkꜣw-hꜣswt, “rulers of foreign lands”). Term used by the Egyptian historian Manetho for the foreign rulers of the 15th and 16th dynasties in EGYPT, but wrongly interpreted by him as “shepherd kings.” The 108 years of the main Hyksos 15th dynasty may be reckoned at c. 1648-1540; the “16th dynasty” consisted of petty local princelings subordinate to the main Hyksos rulers. The origins and rise to power of the Hyksos are much discussed. The JOSEPHUS version of Manetho with its sweeping invasion may be less realistic than the picture of an internal coup d'état in the E NILE delta and MEMPHIS presented in the other views. The ousted dynasty found refuge in THEBES, perhaps as vassal of the Hyksos kings. The career of JOSEPH may have fallen into the late 13th dynasty and early Hyksos period. Apparently, the Hyksos dynasty largely took over the existing Egyptian administrative machine. Its rulers adopted pharaonic style, including the title “Son of Re.” The surviving names of Hyksos rulers are usually W Semitic when not assimilated to Egyptian, such as Khayan, ʾAnat-har, etc. (according to Manetho, the Hyksos came from Phoenicia). Before the Hyksos' takeover, Semitic kings had already occasionally ruled Egypt in the 13th dynasty.

Hymenaeus. hi'muh-nee'uhs (Gk. Hymenaios, “pertaining to Hymen,” the god of marriage). A heretical teacher at EPHESUS who opposed PAUL, mentioned with ALEXANDER (1 Tim. 1:20) and with PHILETUS (2 Tim. 2:17). That he is mentioned first in both passages implies that he was the leader among these false teachers.

hypocrisy. In the OT, the KJV uses this term to translate a Hebrew word that is better rendered “godless” (Job 8:13 et al.). In the NT, the Greek word hypokrisis G5694 (with its cognates) is applied to human conduct that was externally religious but insincerely motivated, that is, the simulation of goodness. In classical authors, the term had no evil connotation and could be used in various contexts. It was, however, especially the part of an actor in a Greek drama represented by this term that influenced its subsequent development. By the time the OT was translated into Greek, the word had taken on negative connotations.

No sin was so sternly denounced by Jesus as that of hypocrisy. The PHARISEES were guilty at this point, and Jesus both summed up the case against them and warned his disciples against such conduct by the use of this term (Lk. 12:1). Jesus did not charge all Pharisees with hypocrisy, but he did indicate that they were especially prone to this sin; it was the natural consequence of their teaching. Some of them were play actors of the first order: they had sacrificed truth to appearance and were concerned more about reputation than they were about reality (Matt. 23:27-28). The topic comes up also in the Epistles. Hypocrites are denounced because they seduce believers from the way of God in the name of religion. They persuade others to listen to them rather than to God (1 Tim. 4:2; 1 Pet. 2:1). PAUL in GALATIANS charges PETER, BARNABAS, and other Jewish Christians with dissimulation because they ate with Gentile Christians at ANTIOCH OF SYRIA, but only until the JUDAIZERS came; then they refused to do so under the pressure of those strict traditionalists (Gal. 2:11-21). In this context the term hypocrisy need not be taken as indicating evil motives; rather, it reflects the broader sense of “play-acting.”

ibex. See ANIMALS.

Ibhar. ib´hahr (Heb. yibḥār H3295, “[Yahweh] chooses [him]”). One of the sons of DAVID born at JERUSALEM (2 Sam. 5:15; 1 Chr. 3:6; 14:5). All that is known of him is that his mother was a wife, not a concubine, of David.

ibis. See BIRDS.

Ibleam. ib´lee-uhm (Heb. yiblē ʿām H3300, meaning uncertain). A Canaanite town allotted to the tribe of MANASSEH but apparently located within the territory of ISSACHAR and ASHER (Josh. 17:11). Manasseh was unable to drive the Canaanites from this city (Jdg. 1:27). AHAZIAH, king of Judah, was slain by JEHU when he fled by chariot at the ascent of GUR, which was near Ibleam (2 Ki. 9:27). The town was on the southern point of the JEZREEL Valley proper; it is identified with the Levitical city BILEAM (1 Chr. 6:70) and with modern Khirbet Belameh, about 16 mi. (26 km.) N of SHECHEM and 12 mi. (19 km.) SE of MEGIDDO.

Ibneiah. ib-nee´yah (Heb. yibnēyâ H3307, “Yahweh builds up”). Son of Jehoram and descendant of BENJAMIN; listed among those who returned from the Babylonian EXILE and resettled in JERUSALEM (1 Chr. 9:8).

Ibnijah. ib-ni´juh (Heb. yibniyyâ H3308, “Yahweh builds up”). Descendant of BENJAMIN and ancestor of Meshullam; the latter is listed among those who returned from the Babylonian EXILE and resettled in JERUSALEM (1 Chr. 9:8).

Ibri. ib´ri (Heb. ʿibrî H6304, “Hebrew”). Son of Jaaziah and descendant of LEVI through MERARI (1 Chr. 24:27); listed among “the rest” of the Levites in the time of DAVID (cf. vv. 20, 31).

Ibsam. ib´sam (Heb. yibśām H3311, “fragrant”). KJV Jibsam. Son (or descendant) of TOLA and grandson (or more distant descendant) of ISSACHAR; he is described as head of his family, which probably means he was a military officer (1 Chr. 7:2).

Ibzan. ib´zan (Heb. ʾibṣān H83, prob. “swift”). One of the minor judges (Jdg. 12:8-10). All that is known about him is that he came from BETHLEHEM (prob. the town by that name in Zebulun), where he was also buried; that he led Israel for seven years; and that he had thirty sons and thirty daughters for whom he secured an equal number of husbands and wives from abroad.

ice. Because of the mildness of the climate, ice is almost never seen in PALESTINE and SYRIA except on the highest mountains. HAIL is common in the winter and is sometimes very destructive. At heights of about 4,000 ft. (1,220 m.), a little ice sometimes forms during the night in winter, but it melts in the sun the next day. Ice is mentioned in the Bible three times in connection with the power of God (Job 37:10; 38:29; Ps. 147:17). The word is used once in a figurative sense to describe treacherous friends, who are like torrents of water “darkened by thawing ice” (Job 6:16).

Ichabod. ik´uh-bod (Heb. ʾî-kābôd H376, possibly “inglorious” or “where is the glory?”). The name given to the son of PHINEHAS (one of ELI’s two evil sons) by his mother when she bore him on her deathbed. News arrived from the battle of APHEK that the PHILISTINES had killed both HOPHNI and PHINEHAS and captured the ARK OF THE COVENANT of the Lord. When their father heard this tragic news, he fell backward and broke his neck. Phinehas’s wife, upon hearing that her husband and father-in-law had died and that the ark was gone, immediately went into labor. In her despondency she named the child Ichabod, saying, “The glory has departed [lit., gone into exile] from Israel” (1 Sam. 4:21-22). Ichabod’s nephew, AHIJAH (i.e., AHIMELECH), was the priest who stayed with SAUL and his 600 men at GIBEAH (14:3).

Iconium. i-koh´nee-uhm (Gk. Ikonion G2658). A city of ASIA MINOR that PAUL and BARNABAS visited after they had been expelled from ANTIOCH in PISIDIA (Acts 13:51—14:5). They revisited the city on their return journey to Antioch (14:21). On his second missionary journey Paul, accompanied by SILAS, stopped off at Iconium to read the letter sent out by the Jerusalem Council on the Judaizing question, and at nearby LYSTRA he took young TIMOTHY with him as his associate (16:1-5). In 2 Tim. 3:11 Paul alludes to persecutions endured by him at Antioch, Iconium, and Lystra.

In the first century Iconium was one of the chief cities in the southern part of the Roman province of GALATIA. It was a city of immemorial antiquity and was situated near the western end of a vast, level plain, with mountains a few miles toward the W, from which streams flowed that made it a veritable oasis. Two important trade routes passed through it, and it was on the road leading to EPHESUS and ROME. Its geographical position makes it the natural capital of LYCAONIA. Archaeological inscriptions found there show that the Phrygian language was spoken there for two centuries after the time of Paul, though at neighboring Lystra the natives spoke “the Lycaonian language” (Acts 14:11). Emperor HADRIAN made the city a Roman colony. The city has had a continuing history and is now known as Konya, still the main trading center of the Lycaonian plain.

Idalah. id´uh-luh (Heb. yid ʾālâ H3339, possibly from a root meaning “jackal”). A town in the tribal territory of ZEBULUN, named with SHIMRON and BETHLEHEM (Josh. 19:15; not to be confused with Bethlehem of Judah). Its location is uncertain, but a possible identification is modern Khirbet el-Ḥuwarah, about 6.5 mi. (10.5 km.) W of NAZARETH.

Idbash. id´bash (Heb. yidbāš H3340, “honey-sweet” or “honey-brown”). Son of Etam, included in the genealogy of JUDAH (1 Chr. 4:3, following LXX; on the textual problem see ETAM).

Iddo. id´oh (Heb. ʿiddō ʾ H6333 [with many spelling variations], possibly short form of ADAIAH). (1) Father of Abinadab, who was one of SOLOMON’s twelve district officers (1 Ki. 4:14):

(2) Son of Joah and descendant of LEVI through GERSHON (1 Chr. 6:21; apparently the same as ADAIAH, v. 41).

(3) Son of a certain Zechariah; he was an officer appointed by DAVID over the half-tribe of MANASSEH in GILEAD (1 Chr. 27:21).

(4) A seer (also called a prophet) who received visions concerning SOLOMON and JEROBOAM (2 Chr. 9:29), recorded genealogies associated with REHOBOAM (12:15), and composed “annotations” respecting ABIJAH (13:22). His writings served as a source for the Chronicler’s material.

(5) The leader of a group of Levites at CASIPHIA who provided EZRA with attendants for the temple upon their return to Jerusalem after the EXILE (Ezra 8:17).

(6) One of the priests and Levites who returned with ZERUBBABEL to Jerusalem (Neh. 12:4). Because his priestly family was headed by someone named Zechariah (v. 16), this Iddo is probably the grandfather of the prophet ZECHARIAH (Zech. 1:1, 7; Ezra 5:1; 6:14).

idleness. The Scriptures criticize the idle person when the situation demands effort and work (e.g., Prov. 31:27; 19:15; 1 Thess. 5:14; 1 Tim. 5:13 et al.), as well as the busy person who speaks “idle words” (KJV), that is, who uses meaningless and careless language (Matt. 12:36). Idleness can be both a failure to respond to a situation calling for action and a busy loquaciousness that speaks to no purpose. The Scriptures call for purposeful work and also for purposeful rest (Exod. 20:8-11). The biblically enjoined SABBATH rest is not to be confused with idleness: such rest comes after labor, and implies not laziness but an enjoyment of what has been accomplished. In biblical thought, work as mere busyness is not virtuous. The opposite of idleness is not activity, but such purposeful activity as achieves its purpose and can thereupon be entered into and enjoyed. The “busybody” is, therefore, a person who is very active but to no good purpose, and the idle man is the unproductive man, who does nothing and comes to a time of need.

idolatry. This term (Gk. eidōlolatRIA G1630, from eidōs G1626, “that which is seen, appearance,” and latreia G3301, “service, worship”) refers to the WORSHIP of idols, though in a derived sense it can refer to blind or excessive devotion to something or someone. In biblical times, idolatry included two forms of departure from the true religion: (1) the worship of false gods, whether by means of images or otherwise; (2) the worship of the Lord by means of images. All the nations surrounding ancient ISRAEL were idolatrous, though their idolatry assumed different forms. The early Semites of MESOPOTAMIA worshiped mountains, springs, trees, and blocks of stone—things in which the deity was supposed to be in some sense incarnate. A typical example of such wooden representations is the sacred pole or Asherah pole. This was the idol of Gideon's clan; Gideon destroyed it (Jdg. 6:25-32). The religion of the Egyptians focused mostly on the veneration of the SUN and of the NILE River as sources of life. They also had a number of sacred animals: the bull, cow, cat, baboon, crocodile, etc. Some of the deities were represented with human bodies and animal heads. Among the Canaanites, religion took on a very barbarous character. The chief gods were personifications of life and fertility. The gods had no moral character whatsoever, and worship of them carried with it demoralizing practices, including child sacrifice, prostitution, and snake worship. Human and animal images of the deities were worshiped. When the Israelites conquered the land they were commanded to destroy these idols (Exod. 23:24; 34:13; Num. 33:52; Deut. 7:5).

The horror and scorn of the biblical writers toward idolatry may be gauged by the variety of terms used for "idol" or "image": ṭāwen H224, "trouble, sorrow" (Isa. 66:3); ṭēmâ H399, "terror" (Jer. 50:38; cf. NRSV); ṭēlîl H496, "worthlessness" (Lev. 19:4); gillûlîm H1658, "rolled about, [shapeless] blocks" (Ezek. 20:31); miplešet H5145, "horrible thing, a cause of trembling" (1 Ki. 15:13); ṭā-šāb H6773, "shape" or "distress" (1 Sam. 31:9). All these words express the lifelessness and absence of true deity in an idol or image. Theologically, idolaters thought of their gods as spiritual beings (or forces) of cosmic significance. The OT insists, however, that the heathen worship idols and nothing more (cf. Ps. 115:2-8; Isa. 44:6-20). This is a straightforward contradiction of the theology held by the pagans and a demonstration of the rigorous MONOTHEISM of the OT.

The first clear case of idolatry in the Bible is the account of RACHEL stealing her father's TERAPHIM, which were images of household gods (Gen. 31:19). Such images were used in Babylonia. Without JACOB's knowledge, Rachel stole them from LABAN and carried them with her to Canaan. During their long sojourn in Egypt, the Israelites defiled themselves with the idols of the land (Josh. 24:14; Ezek. 20:7). MOSES defied these gods by attacking their symbols in the plagues of Egypt (Num. 33:4). In spite of the miracles of their redemption from Egypt, the Israelites insisted on having some visible shape with which to worship God; and at SINAI, while Moses was absent, they persuaded AARON to make them a golden calf, an emblem of the productive power of nature with which they had become familiar in Egypt (see CALF WORSHIP). The second commandment, forbidding people to make and bow down to images of any kind, was directed against idolatry (Exod. 20:4-5; Deut. 5:8-9). This sin seems to have been shunned until the period of the judges, when the nation was caught up in it again.

Figurine of the Canaanite god El, made of bronze with gold leaf (from Megiddo, 1400-1200 B.C.).

The whole of Judges tells of successive apostasies, judgments, and times of repentance. The narrative concerning MICAH (Jdg. 17-18) is an illustration of how idolatry was often combined with outward worship of God. It is significant that JONATHAN, a Levite and a grandson of Moses, assumed the office of priest to the images of Micah and that later he allowed himself to be persuaded by some Danites, who had stolen Micah's idol, to go with them as the priest of their tribe. He became the first of a line of priests to officiate at the shrine of the stolen idols all the time that the TABERNACLE was at SHILOH.

The prophet SAMUEL persuaded the people to repent of their sin and to renounce idolatry; but in SOLOMON's reign the king himself made compromises that affected disastrously the whole future of the kingdom. Solomon's wives brought their own heathen gods with them and openly worshiped them. REHOBOAM, Solomon's son by an Ammonite mother, continued the worst features of his father's idolatry (1 Ki. 14:22-24). JEROBOAM, first king of the northern kingdom, effected a great and permanent schism in the religion of Israel when he erected golden calves at BETHEL and at DAN and had his people worship there instead of in JERUSALEM. The kings who followed Jeroboam in the northern kingdom differed little from him. One of them, AHAB, to please his Sidonian queen JEZEBEL, built a temple and an altar to BAAL in SAMARIA (16:31-33), while she put to death as many prophets of the Lord as she could find (18:4-13). Baal worship came to be identified with the kingdom of Israel, and no king ever rose up against it.

Things went somewhat better in the southern kingdom. HEZEKIAH restored the TEMPLE services, which had been abandoned during his father's reign, but the change was only outward (2 Chr. 28-29; Isa. 29:13). Not long before the destruction of Jerusalem by Babylonia, JOSIAH made a final effort to bring about a purer worship, but it did not last (2 Chr. 34). Not even the captivity cured the Jews of their idolatrous tendencies. When EZRA went to Jerusalem from Babylon, he found to his dismay that many Jews had married foreign wives and that the land was filled with abominations (Ezra 9:11). More than 200 years later, when ANTIOCHUS Epiphanes tried to eradicate Judaism and hellenize the Jews, many of them obeyed his command to offer sacrifices to idols, although his action led to the Maccabean war (see MACCABEE).

In the ritual of idol worship the chief elements were: offering burnt sacrifices (2 Ki. 5:17), burning incense in honor of the idol (1 Ki. 11:8), pouring out libations (Isa. 57:6), presenting tithes and the firstfruits of the land (Hos. 2:8), kissing the idol (1 Ki. 19:18), stretching out the hands to it in adoration, prostrating oneself before it, and sometimes cutting oneself with knives (18:26, 28). Some of these practices were analogous to the worship of the Lord.

For an Israelite, idolatry was the most heinous of crimes. In the OT the relation between God and his covenant people is often represented as a marriage bond (Isa. 54:5; Jer. 3:14), and the worship of false gods was regarded as religious harlotry. The penalty was death (Exod. 22:20). To attempt to seduce others to false worship was a crime of equal enormity (Deut. 13:6-10). The God of Israel was a jealous God who brooked no rivals.

In the NT, references to idolatry are understandably few. The Maccabean war resulted in the Jews becoming fanatically opposed to the crass idolatry of OT times. The Jews were never again tempted to worship images or gods other than the Lord. Jesus, however, warned that to make possessions central in life is also idolatry, and said, "You cannot serve both God and Money" (Matt. 6:24). Paul, in Rom. 1:18-25, teaches that idolatry is not the first stage of religion, from which humans by an evolutionary process emerge to monotheism, but it is the result of deliberate religious apostasy. When people sins against the light of nature and refuse to worship the Creator revealed by nature, God as a punishment withdraws the light, and they then descend into the shameful absurdities of idolatry. Christians in apostolic times, many of whom were converted from heathenism, are repeatedly warned in the letters of the NT to be on their guard against idolatry (e.g., 1 Cor. 5:10; Gal. 5:20). The OT conception of idolatry is widened to include anything that leads to the dethronement of God from the heart, as, for example, covetousness (Eph. 5:5; Col. 3:5).

A special problem arose for Christians in connection with meat offered to idols (Acts 15:29; 1 Cor. 8-10). Some of the meat sold in butcher shops had been bought from heathen temples. Should a Christian make careful inquiry about the meat he purchased, and would he countenance or indirectly support idolatry if he bought meat that had been offered to an idol? Or should a Christian invited to dinner by a friend ask before accepting the invitation whether he would be eating meat that had been offered to an idol? Many Christians had real qualms about eating such meat, while others, feeling themselves “strong” spiritually, were convinced that there was no harm in it at all. PAUL urges against the latter that they should not be careless, for even though idols are nothing, they still are a tangible expression of demons who are back of them; and, moreover, Christians should never insist on their “rights,” if such insistence will cause the weak to stumble. They should be governed by the law of LOVE. In the last book of the Bible the apostle JOHN THE APOSTLE predicts a time of idolatrous apostasy in the last days, when the Beast and his image will be accorded divine honors (Rev. 9:20; 13:14).

View of Idumea (looking NW from the northern Negev to the southern Shephelah).

Idumea. id'yoo-mee'uh (Gk. Idoumaia G2628, from Heb. ʿēdôm H121; the Gk. term is often used by the SEPTUAGINT with reference to EDM). Also Idumaea. One of the regions from which crowds came to follow Jesus (Mk. 3:8). After the destruction of JERUSALEM in 586 B.C., many Edomites moved to S Palestine; the numbers of settlers increased when the NABATEANS conquered the ancient land of Edom in TRANSJORDAN. The area from BEERSHEBA in the NEGEV to BETH ZUR (not far from HEBRON) came to be known as Idumea. During the intertestamental period, the Idumeans were enemies of the Jews, but they were eventually conquered by the Maccabees and forced to adopt the Jewish religion. Herod the Great was an Idumean and thus was formally regarded as a Jew.

Iezer. i-ee'zuhr (Heb. ʾîezer H404, “help,” apparently short form of Abiezer; gentilic ʾîezrî H405, “Iezerite”). Son of Gilead, descendant of Manasseh, and ancestor of the Iezerite clan (Num. 26:30; KJV, “Jeezer”). He is probably the same as Abiezer, the son of Gilead’s sister (1 Chr. 7:18); if so, Gilead was considered his male progenitor for genealogical purposes.

Igal. i'gal (Heb. yigʾāl H3319, “[Yahweh] redeems”). (1) Son of Joseph and descendant of Issachar; one of the twelve spies sent by Moses to Canaan (Num. 13:7).

(2) Son of Nathan from Zobah; one of David’s mighty warriors (2 Sam. 23:36). The parallel list, which appears to have suffered textual corruption, reads “Joel the brother of Nathan” (1 Chr. 11:38).

(3) Son of Shemaiah and descendant of David in the line of Zerubbabel (1 Chr. 3:22; KJV, “Igeal”). According to some scholars, the phrase “and the sons of Shemaiah” (NIV has simply “and his sons”) should be omitted, in which case both Shemaiah and Igal were sons of Shecaniah. See Hattush #1.

Igdaliah. ig'duh-li'uh (Heb. yigdalyāhû H3323, “Yahweh is great”). Father of a certain Hanan who is described as “the man of God” (although this epithet perhaps applies to Igdaliah), and whose “sons” (possibly a reference to a prophetic guild) occupied a chamber in the temple into which Jeremiah brought the family of the Recabites (Jer. 35:4).

ignorance. In some instances, ignorance in biblical usage denotes merely an innocent lack of information (Acts 23:5; 2 Cor. 1:8). In its distinctively biblical meaning, it is a specifically religious rather than an intellectual concept. Ignorance is a quality, not of the academically unschooled, but of the sinner. It is a result of sin and refers to the lack of the knowledge of God. Thus ignorance no more indicates an intellectual state of poverty than WISDOM is a state of intellectual fullness. To know religious TRUTH is knowledge; to practice religious truth is wisdom; to know truth and not to practice it is FOOLISHNESS. Not to know religious truth and, consequently, to live in untruth, is ignorance.

PAUL says about the “princes of this world” who crucified Christ that they knew not the wisdom of God, “for had they known it, they would not have crucified the Lord of glory” (1 Cor. 2:8 KJV). Sins done in ignorance are of course sinful, and those who commit such sins are culpable. Nonetheless, sins done in ignorance incur less guilt than sins done in full knowledge of their sinful character and which, accordingly, incur greater guilt. Thus PILATE’s guilt for the crucifixion of Christ is less than that of the Jews (Jn. 19:11); but even the Jews were not fully conscious of the nature of their act, and Jesus, therefore, invoked their forgiveness, “Father, forgive them, for they do not know what they are doing” (Lk. 23:34). The same lesser guilt and greater forgivability of sins done in ignorance appears in Paul’s admission that he was a blasphemer and a persecutor of the church, and indeed the worst of sinners (1 Tim. 1:15) but that he obtained mercy because he acted “in ignorance and unbelief” (1:13 KJV).

There is, however, a willful ignorance of God’s truth. There is a knowledge of God given in the things that are made that pagans sinfully suppressed (Rom. 1:18), exchanged for a lie (v. 25), and were therefore without excuse (v. 20) and were accordingly punished (vv. 24-32). Yet even such sins of willful ignorance of the truth given in general REVELATION incur less culpability than sins of willful ignorance against the economy of special revelation; the former shall perish without law but the latter shall be judged by the law. Sins done either in ignorance, or willfully against the knowledge of God given to all men in the general revelation “that enlightens every man” (Jn. 1:9), can be overlooked by God and can also be followed by REPENTANCE and FORGIVENESS (which is more than being overlooked). However, that willful ignorance which is the consequence of a conscious rejection of the knowledge of the truth revealed in Christ and made known in the gospel proclamation, God will not overlook but subject to a divine judgment and fire that will devour the enemies of Christ (Heb. 10:26-27).

Im. i’im (Heb. ‘iyyîm H6517, “[place of] ruins”). (1) One of the southernmost cities of the tribe of JUDAH, located in the NEGEV, toward the boundary of EDMON (Josh. 15:29). Although not included in the parallel passages (Josh. 19:3; 1 Chr. 4:29), Im, like other towns in those lists, may have been allotted to SIMEON. Its location is unknown.

(2) KJV and TNIV form of IYIM.

Ije-abarim. See IYE ABARIM.

Ijon. i'jon (Heb. ʿiyyôn H6510, possibly “heap”). A town in N Israel, apparently within the tribal territory of NAPHTALI in the Huleh Valley, mentioned as having been conquered by BEN-HADAD of DAMASCUS (1 Ki. 15:20; 2 Chr. 16:4) and later by TIGLATH-PILESER of ASSYRIA (2 Ki. 15:29). The site is probably to be identified with modern Tell ed-Dibbin in Lebanon, 9 mi. (14 km.) N of ABEL BETH MAACAH.

Ikkesh. ik'ish (Heb. ʿiqqēš H6837, “crooked” [perhaps referring to a physical defect]). A man from TEKOA; his son Ira was one of DAVID’s thirty mighty warriors and the commander of a division of 24,000 men (2 Sam. 23:26; 1 Chr. 11:28; 27:9).

Ilai. i'li (Heb. ʿīlay H6519, derivation uncertain). An AHOHITE, one of DAVID’s thirty mighty warriors (1 Chr. 11:29; called ZALMON in 2 Sam. 23:28).

Illyricum. i-lihr'i-kuhm (Gk. Illyrikon G2665). A Roman PROVINCE in the western portion of the Balkan peninsula N of GREECE. Now principally occupied by Yugoslavia and Albania, it was bounded in antiquity by the Adriatic, the Eastern Alps, the Danube, the Shar-Dagh and the Ceraunian mountains. The seacoast boasted of good harbors and the coastal plains were sunny and fertile, but the interior was mountainous and cold. The Greeks were first attracted to the region because of the mines, but the ferocious and piratical nature of the people prevented extensive colonization. The inhabitants were conquered by the Romans in the third century B.C. In Rom. 15:19 PAUL, emphasizing the extent of his missionary activities, says that “from Jerusalem all the way around to Illyricum, I have fully proclaimed the gospel of Christ.” It is not clear whether Paul meant that Illyricum was the western boundary of the Eastern world and that he preached up to it, or that he actually preached and established churches there.

image, image worship. See IDOLATRY.

image of God. Two fundamental biblical truths about human beings is that they are created by God and that God made man, male and female, in his own image. They are God’s creatures, and there is therefore an infinite qualitative difference between them and God; yet they have been made like God in a way that the rest of creation has not. The passages in which it is expressly stated that man is made in God's image are Gen. 1:26-27; 5:1, 3; 9:6; 1 Cor. 11:7; Eph. 4:24; Col. 3:10; Jas. 3:9. To these should be added Ps. 8, for the CREATION narrative as it relates to human beings is given here in poetic form. Another passage where the idea is not directly stated but is implied is Acts 17:22-31—PAUL's address on Mars' Hill. The words "image" and "likeness," used together in Gen. 1:26-27, do not differ essentially in meaning, but strengthen the idea that man uniquely reflects God. They are, moreover, used interchangeably elsewhere. The Scriptures do not define precisely the nature of the image of God, and we should be careful not to single out any individual aspect or attribute as if it were in a special sense the "image." It is rather human persons in their entirety that are to be thought of as in the image of God. The primary meaning of the words "image" and "likeness" as shown by their use throughout the OT refers to outward, visible form (e.g., 1 Sam. 6:5; 2 Ki. 16:10), an actual copy.

Throughout the Bible the Lord manifests himself in human form—so much so that he is often at first simply described as "a man" (e.g., Jdg. 13:9-10). Often this is described as an accommodation, the Lord graciously taking the form that will make it easiest for us to understand him and communicate with him. God is spirit (Isa. 31:3; Jn. 4:24) and therefore essentially invisible and, though visible form is not part of the divine nature, yet there is an outward form that suits the invisible being of God. This is the form he takes when he wills to reveal himself visibly, and in this form he created man. The human body, therefore, has its own inalienable dignity and worth.

As we proceed through the opening chapters of Genesis, we see that there are other human distinctives that are specially mentioned. The union of the man and the woman in MARRIAGE is directly related to the image of God, a unity of two different but matching beings that constituted God's image (Gen. 2:21-24; 5:1-2). Likewise, when the Creator gives to the man and the woman their joint "dominion," this too is related to possession of the image of God (1:27-28). Furthermore, we note that a clear distinction is drawn between human beings and the animal creation in that God's command to be fruitful is imposed on the beasts (1:22, "...and said"), whereas the same command is addressed to humans (1:28, "...and said to them"). This observation opens to us the unique spiritual nature of man: the supreme and unique creature with whom the Creator holds communion. In 2:15-17 the special moral nature of humanity is brought out. In contrast with the instinctive life of the beasts, humans have been so created that they must order their lives in terms of stated moral ends and in the light of the foreseeable good. Finally, humans are seen in contrast with the beasts in terms of their rationality (2:19-20). They have the capacity to discern both similarity and difference in the world, to frame definitions (give names) and to bring a variety of phenomena into categories and order.

Here in essence is the work of both scientist and philosopher. In these six areas—physical, governmental, matrimonial, spiritual, moral, and intellectual—there is a summation of human nature and a view of this distinctive creature who alone was made in the image of God.

imagery. This English word is used once by the KJV to render Hebrew mašĕkîl H5381, which more properly means “image” or “idol” (Ezek. 8:12).

imagine. This English verb, in its earlier meaning “to think,” is used with some frequency by the KJV (Gen. 11:6 et al.). In modern versions it is used occasionally (e.g., Ps. 41:7; Eph. 3:20).

Imla. See IMLAH.

Imlah. imʾluh (Heb. yimlā ᵐ H3550 [1 Ki.] and yimlâ H3551 [2 Chr.], possibly “[God] fills”). Father of the prophet MICAIAH, who predicted the death of King AHAB in battle (1 Ki. 22:8-9; 2 Chr. 18:7-8 [KJV, “Imla”]).

Immanuel. i-manʾyoo-uhl (Heb. ʿimmānû ʿēl H6672, “with us [is] God”; Gk. Emmanouēl G1842). Also Emmanuel (NT KJV and other versions). The name given to the child born of the VIRGIN (Isa. 7:14; 8:8 [cf. v. 10]; Matt. 1:23). The birth of this child was foretold by Isaiah as a sign to King AHAB during the Syro-Ephraimitic war (Isa. 7). At this time (c. 735 B.C.) JUDAH was threatened by the allied forces of SYRIA and ISRAEL. They were trying to compel Judah to form an alliance with them against ASSYRIA, whose king, TIGLATH-PILESER, was attempting to bring the whole of W Asia under his sway. The prophet directed Ahaz to remain confident and calm in the Lord and not to seek aid from Tiglath-Pileser. To overcome the king's incredulity, he offered him a sign of anything in heaven or earth; but when the king evasively refused the offer, Isaiah bitterly chided him for his lack of faith and gave him a sign, the sign of "Immanuel."

Isaiah's words have led to much controversy and have been variously interpreted, chiefly because of the indefinite terms of the prediction and the fact that there is no record of their fulfillment in any contemporary event. A common explanation is that the event of the birth of the child is intended as a sign to Ahaz and nothing more—the woman in question being Isaiah's own wife or one of Ahaz's wives or perhaps someone else. The traditional Christian interpretation is that the emphasis should be laid on the virgin birth of our Immanuel, Jesus Christ, as Matthew does (Matt. 1:22-23). According to this view, Isaiah has in mind Israel's MESSIAH. When the prophet learns of the king's cowardice, God for the first time gives to him a revelation of the true King, who would share the poverty and affliction of his people and whose character and work would entitle him to the great names of Isa. 9:6. In this interpretation the essential fact is that in the coming of Immanuel people will recognize the truth of the prophet's words.

Immer (person). im'uhr (Heb. immēr H612, "lamb"). (1) A descendant of AARON whose family in the time of DAVID made up the sixteenth division of priests (1 Chr. 24:14). He thus became the ancestral head of that division and gave his name to an extensive family of descendants; among the priestly clans that returned from the EXILE, his was the second largest (1 Chr. 9:12; Ezra 2:37; Neh. 7:40; 11:13). Two members of his family at that time, Hanani and Zebadiah, were among those who agreed to put away their foreign wives (Ezra 10:20).

(2) Father of PASHHUR; the latter was chief officer of the TEMPLE in the time of JEREMIAH (Jer. 20:1). It is likely, however, that "son of Immer" here is an indication of ancestry, in which case this Immer would be the same as #1 above; the phrase then distinguishes Pashhur from another priest identified as the "son [descendant] of Malkijah" (21:1; Malkijah was the head of the fifth division, 1 Chr. 24:9).

(3) Father (or ancestor) of ZADOK, who made repairs to the wall of Jerusalem opposite his house, near the HORSE GATE (Neh. 3:29). This Immer too may be the same as #1 above.

Immer (place). im'uhr (Heb. immēr H613, "lamb"). One of five Babylonian places from which certain Jewish exiles returned who were unable to prove their Israelite ancestry (Ezra 2:59; Neh. 7:61). On the basis of the parallel passage in the APOCRYPHA (1 Esd. 5:36), some scholars argue that the reference is to a person. If Immer here is indeed a place name, its location is unknown.

immutability. The perfection of God by which he is devoid of all change in essence, attributes, consciousness, will, and promises. No change is possible in God, because all change must be to better or worse, and God is absolute perfection. No cause for change in God exists, either in himself or outside of him. The immutability of God is clearly taught in Scripture (Mal. 3:6; Ps. 102:26; Jas. 1:17) and must not be confused with immobility; immutability is consistent with constant activity and perfect freedom. God creates, performs miracles, sustains the universe, etc. When the Scriptures speak of his repenting, as in Jon. 3:10, one should remember that this is only an anthropomorphic way of speaking. God adapts his treatment of people to the variation of their actions and characters. When the righteous do wickedly, his holiness requires that his treatment of them must change.

Imna. im'nuh (Heb. yimnā ^c H3557, “[God] holds back” or “strong”). Son of Helem, listed among the brave warriors who were heads of families of the tribe of ASHER (1 Chr. 7:35; cf. v. 40). Some scholars believe that Imna is a variant of IMNAH and (through textual corruption) of IMRAH, both of which appear in the same genealogy (vv. 30, 36).

Imnah. im'nuh (Heb. yimnâ H3555, “fortunate” or “[God] assigns”). Son of ASHER, grandson of JACOB, and eponymous ancestor of the Imnite clan (Gen. 46:17 [KJV, “Jimnah”]; Num. 26:44 [KJV, “Jimna,” “Jimnites”]; 1 Chr. 7:30). See also IMNA.

imprecatory psalms. A number of OT psalms (esp. Ps. 2; 37; 69; 79; 109; 139; 143) contain expressions of an apparent vengeful attitude toward enemies. For some people, these expressions constitute one of the “moral difficulties” of the OT. We must note, however: (1) Imprecations are not confined to the OT, and, therefore, insofar as they constitute a moral problem, the problem pervades the Bible as a whole (cf. Lk. 11:37-52; Gal. 1:8-10; Rev. 6:10; 18:20; 19:1-6). We must be prepared to think, then, that what we find here is not a reprehensibly low morality but an aspect of the biblical view of the conflict between good and evil. (2) Many if not all of the imprecatory psalms contain (as well as the imprecation) theological and moral sentiments that we should wish to attain (e.g., Ps. 139). We can hardly, therefore, dismiss these psalms under some blanket condemnation as “OT morality.” (3) In fact, OT morality stoutly opposed a hostile and vindictive response to opponents (e.g., Lev. 19:14-18). (4) All the imprecatory psalms except Ps. 137 are prayers. They are addressed to God about opponents, and there is no suggestion in any of them that the psalmist either said any of these things to his adversary or ever intended to take vengeance into his own hands. Even if, therefore, it should be decided that these are reprehensible as prayers, the way of the psalmist is to be preferred to the modern practice of killing, maiming, bombing, and destroying those whom we think are our enemies. (5) The imprecatory psalms are full of longing for the vindication of the Lord’s good name. Over and over, the psalmist’s desire is not personal relief but that the Lord should be seen in his goodness and holiness (e.g., Ps. 58:11; 83:16-18). (6) Many of the actual imprecations do no more than ask God to do what he has at any rate said that he will do in such situations (e.g., 5:10; 54:5; 79:6-7). (7) The Bible teaches that there is a “pure anger.” The fact that we do not feel it and cannot express it does not mean that God’s people have never risen to such heights of holiness. Our problem may well be, also, that we have so allowed our sense of moral outrage to atrophy that we are incapable of identifying with a pure WRATH.

impurity. See CLEAN; PURIFICATION; UNCLEAN.

imputation. The act of attributing something to a person. The Hebrew verb ḥāšab H3108 (“to value, consider”) and the Greek verb logizomai G3357 (“to count, estimate, consider”) can both be used in the sense of setting to one’s account or reckoning something to a person. The biblical teaching on imputation applies to the doctrines of original sin, atonement, and justification.

Imputation of Adam’s sin to his posterity. The record of the FALL (Gen. 2-3), taken in connection with the subsequent history of the human race as recorded in the rest of the OT, implies that ADAM’s sin not only affected him but was also imputed to his posterity. This doctrine is more fully developed in the NT, especially in Rom. 5:12-21, where PAUL shows that it was by Adam’s SIN that death and sin entered the world and passed to all people. All were condemned and made sinners in Adam.

Imputation of the sin of humanity to Christ. This facet of imputation is not expressly stated in the Bible but is implied in those passages that affirm that CHRIST bore our sins and died in our place. Isaiah 53 teaches that the Servant of the Lord “took up our infirmities,” and God laid on him the iniquity of us all. PETER had this passage in mind when he wrote that Christ “himself bore our sins in his body on the tree” (1 Pet. 2:24). The same thought is expressed in 2 Cor. 5:21 and in Gal. 3:13. This truth is basic to the doctrine of the ATONEMENT.

Imputation of Christ’s righteousness to the believer. It is said in Gen. 15:6 that God reckoned RIGHTEOUSNESS to believing ABRAHAM, that is, God regarded him as righteous, attributing or crediting to him that which he did not have in himself. In Gal. 3:6 and Rom. 4:3 the apostle PAUL quotes this passage in arguing a person’s JUSTIFICATION by God through GRACE alone. Justification is a judicial act of God by which he declares righteous, on the ground of Christ’s expiatory work and imputed righteousness, those who put their FAITH in Christ as their Savior. The NT stresses that justification is absolutely free and unmerited so far as the sinner is concerned (Rom. 3:24; 5:15; Gal. 5:4; Tit. 3:7). Through faith, the merits of Christ’s suffering and obedience are imputed to sinners, and from then on they are viewed as just in God’s sight.

Imrah. im’ruh (Heb. yimrâ H3559, possibly “he rebels”). Son of Zophah and descendant of ASHER (1 Chr. 7:36). Some scholars emend the text to IMNAH.

Imri. im’ri (Heb. imrî H617, prob. short form of AMARIAH). (1) Son of Bani and descendant of JUDAH through PEREZ (1 Chr. 9:4). Some have thought he may be the same as the Amariah mentioned in a partially parallel passage (Neh. 11:4).

(2) Father (or ancestor) of Z_{ACCUR}; the latter helped rebuild the wall of Jerusalem in N_{EHEMIAH}'s time (Neh. 3:2).

incarnation. In Christian theology, this term (Lat. incarnatio, from carō [gen. carnis], “flesh”) refers to the event summed up in Jn. 1:14, “The Word became flesh and made his dwelling among us.” The doctrine of the incarnation is taught or assumed throughout the Bible (cf. 1 Tim. 3:16; Rom. 8:3). According to this teaching, the eternal SON OF GOD (see T_{RINITY}) became human, and he did so without in any manner or degree diminishing his divine nature. A somewhat detailed statement of the incarnation is found in Phil. 2:5-11. Christ Jesus, though he remained in the “form” of God (i.e., with all the essential attributes of God), took the “form” of a servant and died on the cross.

The VIRGIN BIRTH is necessary for our understanding of the incarnation. In the process of ordinary birth, a new personality begins. Jesus Christ did not begin to be when he was born. He is the eternal Son. The virgin birth was a miracle, wrought by the HOLY SPIRIT, whereby the eternal Son of God “became flesh,” that is, took to himself a genuine human nature in addition to his eternal divine nature. The Holy Spirit has never been thought of as the father of Jesus. Jesus was not half man and half god like the Greek mythological heroes. He was fully God, the Second Person of the Trinity. “In Christ all the fullness of the Deity lives in bodily form” (Col. 2:9). At the same time he became genuinely a man. To deny his genuine humanity is “the spirit of the antichrist” (1 Jn. 4:2-3).

The biblical data on the incarnation came to permanent doctrinal formulation at the council of Chalcedon, A.D. 451. That council declared that Christ was “born of the virgin Mary” and is “to be acknowledged in two natures, unconfusedly, unchangeably, indivisibly, inseparably...the property of each nature being preserved, and concurring in one Person.” This doctrine is concisely stated in the Westminster Shorter Catechism, Question 21: “The only Redeemer of God’s elect is the Lord Jesus Christ, who, being the eternal Son of God, became man, and so was, and continueth to be, God and man, in two distinct natures and one Person for ever.”

The creed of Chalcedon was the culmination of more than three centuries of discussion in which the main stream of Christian thought eliminated a variety of false interpretations as follows: (1) The Gnostic Docetae, condemned in 1 Jn. 4:2-3, denied the genuine humanity of Jesus and taught that he only appeared to suffer. (2) The Ebionites in the second century denied his deity. (3) The Arians, condemned at Nicea in A.D. 325, denied that his divine nature was equal with the Father’s. (4) The Apollinarians, condemned at Constantinople, in 381, denied that he had a complete human nature. (5) The Nestorians, condemned at Ephesus in 431, admitted the two natures but taught that he was two personalities. (6) The Eutychians, condemned at Chalcedon, in 451, taught that the two natures were so united and so changed that he was neither genuinely divine nor genuinely human. (7) The biblical doctrine of the incarnation formalized at Chalcedon, A.D. 451, as stated above, is the Christology of the true historical church.

But we need an understanding of the words of our doctrine, not just a formula to repeat. First, the emphasis on the unity of Christ’s personality means that he was, in himself, in his ego, his nonmaterial self, the same numerical identity, the same person. The person who was God and with God “in the beginning” before the created universe is the same person who sat wearily at the well of SYCHAR, the same person who said, “Father, forgive them,” on the cross. Second, the distinction of his natures means, and has always meant to the church, that Jesus is just as truly God as the Father and the Spirit are God, and at the same time, without confusion or contradiction, he is just as truly human as we are human. (His humanity as the “last Adam” is perfectly sinless, yet genuinely human, as was ADAM before the FALL.)

incense. Material which is burned to make a fragrant smoke; or the fragrant smoke thus produced. The most common Hebrew word for “incense,” occurring almost sixty times, primarily in the PENTATEUCH, is qēṭōret H7792 (Exod. 25:6 et al.). The term lēbōnâ H4247, often rendered “frankincense,” occurs over twenty times (Lev. 2:1-2 et al.; cf. Gk. libanos G3337, only Matt. 9:4). In the NT, the Greek word for “incense” is thymiama G2592 (only Lk. 1:10-11; Rev. 5:8; 8:3-4; 18:13).

In the OT, incense was compounded according to a definite prescription of gum resin, onycha, galbanum, and pure frankincense in equal proportions, and was tempered with salt (Exod. 30:34-35). It could not be made for ordinary purposes (Exod. 30:37; Lev. 10:1-7). Incense not properly compounded was rejected as “strange incense” (Exod. 30:9 KJV). The altar of incense was overlaid with pure gold and was set in the Holy Place of the TABERNACLE or TEMPLE, near the veil that concealed the Most Holy Place. Originally, to burn it was the prerogative of the high PRIEST, and he did so each morning when he dressed the lamps (30:1-9). On the Day of Atonement he brought the incense within the veil and burned it in a censer in the Most Holy Place, so that the atonement cover of the ark was enveloped in a cloud of fragrant smoke (Lev. 16:12-13). The Korahites were punished with death for presuming to take on themselves the right to burn incense (Num. 16); the sons of AARON died for offering it improperly (Lev. 10).

By the time of Christ, incense was offered by ordinary priests, from among whom one was chosen by lot each morning and evening (Lk. 1:9). The offering of incense was regarded as a solemn privilege. In offering incense, fire was taken from the altar of burnt offering and brought into the temple, where it was placed on the altar of incense, and then the incense was emptied from a golden vessel onto the fire. When the priest entered the Holy Place with the incense, all the people were obliged to leave the temple. A profound silence was observed by them as they prayed outside (1:9-10). When the priest placed the incense on the fire, he bowed reverently toward the Most Holy Place and retired slowly backward, lest he alarm the congregation and cause them to fear that he had been struck dead for offering unworthily (Lev. 16:13).

The use of incense in the temple may have been partly a sanitary measure, since the smell of blood from the many animal sacrifices must have polluted the atmosphere, and the air would have to be fumigated; but it is largely explained by the love for sweet odors. Incense was often offered to those one wished to honor. For example, when ALEXANDER THE GREAT marched against BABYLON, incense was offered on altars erected to him. The offering of incense was common in the religious ceremonies of nearly all ancient nations (Egyptians, Babylonians, Assyrians, Phoenicians, etc.) and was extensively used in the ritual of Israel. Incense was symbolic of the ascending PRAYER of the officiating high priest. The psalmist prayed, “May my prayer be set before you like incense” (Ps. 141:2). In Rev. 8:3-5 an angel burns incense on the golden altar, and smoke ascends with the prayer of saints.

India. The name occurs only twice in the Bible (Esth. 1:1; 8:9). This was the country that marked the eastern limit of the territory of XERXES (KJV, “Ahasuerus”). The Hebrew word (hōddû H2064) comes from the name of the Indus, Hondu, and refers not to the peninsula of Hindustan, but to the country adjoining the Indus (i.e., the Punjab, and perhaps also Scinde). Some have thought that this country is the HAVILAH of Gen. 2:11 and that the Indus is the PISHON. Many characteristic Indian products were known to the Israelites.

inheritance. Something received from an ancestor through a legal will or TESTAMENT. In the Bible, the term (the rendering mainly of Heb. naḥālāh H5709 and Gk. klēronomia G3100) is often used figuratively in a theological sense. A fundamental principle of Hebrew society was that real, as distinguished from personal, property belonged to the FAMILY rather than to the individual. This came from the idea that the land was given by God to his children, the people of Israel, and must remain in the family. The Mosaic law directed that only the sons of a legal wife had the right of inheritance. The FIRSTBORN son possessed the BIRTHRIGHT, that is, the right to a double portion of the father's possession; and to him belonged the duty of maintaining the females of the family (Deut. 21:15-17). The other sons received equal shares. If there were no sons, the property went to the daughters (Num. 27:8), on the condition that they not marry outside of their own tribe (36:6-9). If the widow was left without children, the nearest of kin on her husband's side had the right to marry her; and if he refused, the next of kin (Ruth 3:12-13). If no one married her, the inheritance remained with her until her death, and then reverted to the next of kin (Num. 27:9-11). An estate could not pass from one tribe to another. Since the land was so strictly tied up, testamentary dispositions or wills were not needed. This strong feeling regarding family hereditary privileges was chiefly responsible for the Jews' taking such care to preserve the family genealogies.

The term inheritance in Scripture came to be used with a definitely theological significance. In the OT at first it refers to the inheritance promised by God to ABRAHAM and his descendants—the land of CANAAN, “the land you gave your people for an inheritance” (1 Ki. 8:36; cf. Num. 34:2; Deut. 4:21, 38; 12:9-10; 15:4; Ps. 47:4; 105:9-11). The conquest of the land under the leadership of JOSHUA was by God's help, not by Israel's military prowess (Josh. 21:43-45). God directed the partitioning of the land among the tribes (Num. 26:52-56; Josh. 14:1-5; 18:4-9). Israel could continue to possess the land only on condition of faithfulness to God (Deut. 4:26-31; 11:8-9). Disobedience to God would result in the loss of the land, which could be recovered only by repentance and a new wholehearted submission to God (Isa. 57:13; 58:13-14).

The idea finds a further expansion and spiritualization in two other directions. Israelites came to learn that the Lord himself was the inheritance of his people (Jer. 10:16) and of the individual believer (Ps. 16:5-6; 73:26; 142:5), and that his inheritance is his elect, brought “out of Egypt, to be the people of his inheritance” (Deut. 4:20; cf. 32:9). This conception was later broadened until the Lord's inheritance is seen to include the GENTILES also (Ps. 2:8; Isa. 19:25; 47:6; 63:17).

The conception of inheritance is very prominent in the NT too, but now it is connected with the person and work of CHRIST, who is the heir by virtue of being the Son (Mk. 12:7; Heb. 1:2). Through Christ's redemptive work believers are sons of God by adoption and fellow-heirs with Christ (Rom. 8:17; Gal. 4:7). As a guarantee of “the promised eternal inheritance” (Heb. 9:15), Christ has given to them the HOLY SPIRIT (Eph. 1:14). The letter to the Hebrews shows that as Israel in the old covenant received her inheritance from God, so in the new covenant the new Israel receives an inheritance, only a better one. This inheritance, moreover, is not for Jews alone but for all true believers, including Gentiles (3:6). The inheritance is the KINGDOM OF GOD with all its blessings (Matt. 25:34; 1 Cor. 6:9; Gal. 5:21), both present and eschatological (Rom. 8:17-23; 1 Cor. 15:50; Heb. 11:13; 1 Pet. 1:3-4). It is wholly the gift of God's sovereign grace.

ink. A writing fluid whose chief ingredient was soot or black carbon. It was mixed with gum or oil for use on parchment, or with a metallic substance for use on PAPHYRUS. The early use of metallic ink in Israel is shown in the LACHISH letters (c. 586 B.C.). The DEAD SEA SCROLLS were written with ink made of carbon. The Letter of Aristeas says that the copy of the law sent to P^{TOLEMY} II was written in gold. The Egyptians must have used a good quality ink, as the bright colors in some papyri show. The ingredients for making ink were kept in a writing case. The word is used once in the OT (Jer. 36:18) and three times in the NT (2 Cor. 3:3; 2 Jn. 12; 3 Jn. 13).

inkhorn. This English term (meaning a vessel made from a horn and used to hold ink) is used by the KJV in only one passage (Ezek. 9:2-3, 11). The Hebrew word refers to a writing case for reed pens and some sort of container for ink near the upper end of the case. It was carried in the belt. Monuments of all periods show the Egyptian palette, a long narrow board with grooves for pens and circular hollows for ink.

inn. The Hebrew word mālôn H4869 (rendered “inn” by the KJV in Gen. 42:27; 43:21; Exod. 4:24) means “lodging place” or “camping ground.” It may refer to the camping place of an individual (Jer. 9:2); of a family on a journey (Exod. 4:24); of a caravan (Gen. 42:27; 43:21); of an army (2 Ki. 19:23); or even of a nation (Josh. 4:3, 8). In none of these references is there any implication of a structure, with the possible exception of the one in Jeremiah. When travelers could not find lodging in private dwellings they stayed in the open (cf. Gen. 19:2; 28:11; Jdg. 19:15).

When Mary and Joseph discovered that “there was no room for them in the inn” (Gk. katalyma G2906, Lk. 2:7), one should not think of anything resembling a hotel. More likely they found themselves in some sort of village guest house. Indeed, the same word is used to describe the upper room where Jesus ate the Passover with his disciples (Mk. 14:14; Lk. 22:11). It is in fact possible that Mary and Joseph had to stay in the lower level of a house (perhaps the home of a distant relative), where the animals were kept, because the normal living area was full. In the story of the good Samaritan, a different term is used (pandocheion G4106, Lk. 10:34). An innkeeper (pandocheus G4107, lit., “one who receives all”) is mentioned who is paid to provide food and lodging for the man who was left in his care. Something resembling a modern inn seems to be in view in this passage.

inner being. This phrase is used by the NIV and other translations to render Greek esō anthrōpos, (lit., “man inside,” Rom. 7:22 [KJV, “inward man”; NRSV, “inmost self”]; Eph. 3:16). The concept of an inner being is reflected elsewhere in the Bible. It refers to the true ego, whereas the outer person may or may not be a genuine portrayal of the inner being. In the period of the judges, for example, when Israel was clamoring for a king, SAMUEL, under divine guidance, had to make a distinction between the inner and outer person. Seven of JESSE’s sons were rejected, but DAVID, the youngest, was selected for king. Samuel explained, “Man looks at the outward appearance, but the LORD looks at the heart” (1 Sam. 16:7). The inner person is the real and dominant self. PAUL was a living example of the distinction in the better way, and consequently prayed that God would strengthen the Ephesians “with power through his Spirit in your inner being” (Eph. 3:16).

innocence. Freedom from guilt. This English noun and the adjective innocent are used variously in Bible version to render several Hebrew and Greek terms. Especially common is the Hebrew adjective nāqî H5929, which occurs a number of times in legal passages (Exod. 23:7; Deut. 19:10; et al.), but in other contexts as well (Job 4:7; Ps. 10:8; et al.). The primary Greek term for “innocent” is athōon G127 (in the NT only in Matt. 27:4, 24). In addition, a number of words that mean “clean,” “good,” or the like can properly be rendered “innocent” in some contexts (e.g., Gen. 20:4; Matt. 10:16).

Innocents, Massacre (Slaughter) of the. Phrase used to designate the murder by HEROD the Great of all the male children in BETHLEHEM two years old and under, when the MAGI failed to return and tell him where they found the infant Jesus (Matt. 2:16-18).

inquire. To seek information, especially to consult God with regard to his will. The people of Israel would come to MOSES to inquire of God in a dispute (Exod. 18:15 NRSV; cf. 33:7-11). The priestly EPHOD was a kind of pouch attached to the breastpiece of the high priest in which the sacred lots URIM AND THUMMIM were placed (28:28-30). JOSHUA was to come to the priest to inquire of God and receive answer by the use of these lots to determine when Israel should move (Exod. 28:30). DAVID resorted to the ephod on occasion when he was fleeing from Saul (1 Sam. 23:9-12). SAUL used the same method to decide a vexed question (14:41). In the NT direct PRAYER is the prevailing form of inquiry, both by teaching (Jas. 1:5) and by practice, as in the case of Jesus in the Garden of GETHSEMANE (Matt. 26:39), and PAUL, when he inquired of God about his nagging thorn in the flesh (2 Cor. 12:7-9).

I.N.R.I. These letters constitute the abbreviation of the supposed Latin inscription on the cross of Jesus: Iesus Nazarenus Rex Iudaeorum—"Jesus of Nazareth, King of the Jews." All four Gospels mention the inscription but vary as to the contents. The traditional Latin wording of the title seems to be based on Jn. 19:19 rather than on the synoptic parallels. The abbreviation I.N.R.I. is ascribed by tradition to Helena, Emperor Constantine's mother, who claimed to have discovered it on a board.

inscription. This English term is occasionally used in Bible versions, for example, with reference to the sign that had written on it the charge laid against Jesus (Mk. 15:26 NRSV; KJV, "superscription"; NIV, "written notice"). In biblical scholarship—as in historical study more generally—the discovery of ancient inscriptions, usually engraved on stone or other hard surfaces, is of immense value. In the case of manuscripts, that is, documents written on perishable material such as PAPYRUS, we normally are dealing with copies that are many times removed from the original writing. But when an inscription such as the MOABITE STONE (9th cent. B.C.) is discovered, scholars have direct access to an ancient document in its initial form. Inscriptions thus provide important inspiration. The supernatural work of the HOLY SPIRIT, who moves upon specially chosen individuals so that they may receive divine truth from him and communicate that truth in written form, the BIBLE. The use of the term inspiration for this doctrine derives from the KJV rendering of the Greek word theopneustos G2535 in 2 Tim. 3:16, which literally means “God-breathed” (so NIV). The key to its meaning may be gleaned from the OT concept of the divine breathing as producing effects that God himself is immediately accomplishing by his own will and power (see Ps. 33:6). By this word, therefore, PAUL is asserting that the written documents, called Holy Scripture, are a divine product. Precisely the same idea, but with different terminology, is set forth in 2 Pet. 1:19-21. In this passage the prophetic Word (i.e., Scripture) is contrasted with mere fables devised by human cunning. Scripture is more sure and trustworthy than the testimony of any eyewitness. The explanation for its unique authority lies in its origin. It was produced not as a merely human private interpretation of the truth but by God’s Spirit through the prophets.

In both 2 Tim. 3:16 and 2 Pet. 1:19-21 the fact of the divine productivity (spiration rather than inspiration) of the “Holy Writings” is thus explicitly asserted. This divine (in)spiration is further confirmed by a host of NT passages. The authors of Scripture wrote in or by the Spirit (Mk. 12:36). What the Scripture states is really what God has said (Acts 4:25; Heb. 3:7; and see especially the way OT quotations are introduced in Heb. 1:5-14). This is true whether or not in the particular passage cited the words are ascribed to God or are the statements of the human author. In the mind of the NT writers any passage of Scripture was really “spoken” by God. Jesus used the same type of reference, attributing directly to God the authorship of Scripture (Matt. 19:4-5).

Illustration of Luke writing under divine inspiration (from a 9th-cent. Gk. MS of the Gospels).

Because of the character of the God of Truth who “inspired” (or produced) the Holy Scriptures, the result of “inspiration” is to constitute the Bible as fully trustworthy and authoritative. Indeed, this absolute divine authority of Scripture, rather than its inspiration, is the emphasis of scriptural teaching about its own nature (see Ps. 19:7-14; 119:89, 97, 113, 160; Zech. 7:12; Matt. 5:17-19; Lk. 16:17; Jn. 10:34-35; 1 Thess. 2-13). Besides those passages directly teaching the authority of Scripture, such phrases as “It is written” (Matt. 21:13; Lk. 4:4, 8, 10), “it [or he] says” (Rom. 9:15; Gal. 3:16), and “Scripture says” (Rom. 9:17; Gal. 3:8) all clearly imply an absolute authority for the OT Scriptures.

These passages teaching the authority of Scripture indicate also the extent of inspiration. If the authority and trustworthiness of Scripture are complete, inspiration itself must also extend to all of Scripture. This completeness of inspiration and consequent authority of all Scripture is made explicit in such passages as Lk. 24:25: “How foolish you are, and how slow of heart to believe all that the prophets have spoken!” (see also Matt. 5:17-19; Lk. 16:17; Jn. 10:34-35). The completeness of inspiration is further established by the fact that Scripture lacks altogether any principle for distinguishing between (a) those parts of it that are inspired and thus possess binding authority and (b) supposedly uninspired parts that do not possess binding authority.

Inerrancy and infallibility as applied to the inspiration of Scripture, though not exactly synonymous terms, are nevertheless both correctly applied to Scripture in order to indicate that inspiration and authority are complete. The word inerrant suggests that the Scriptures do not wander from the truth. Infallible is stronger, suggesting an incapability of wandering from the truth (“Are you not in error because you do not know the Scriptures?” Mk. 12:24).

The method of inspiration is never developed in the Scriptures, although the basic fact that Scripture is produced by the power of God working in and through such a writer as a prophet indicates the mutual interworking of the divine and human hand. By pointing to a human author of Scripture (e.g., “David himself, speaking by the Holy Spirit, declared,” Mk. 12:36; “Moses wrote,” Mk. 12:19; and “Isaiah says,” Jn. 12:39), by stating his purpose in the writing of a book (e.g., Lk. 1:1-4; Jn. 20:30-31), and by acknowledging research in the preparation of the writing of Scripture (Lk. 1:2-3), the biblical authors make completely plain that the divine method of inspiration was not normally by a process of dictation.

At this point great caution should be taken not to read into the biblical idea of the origin of Scripture suggestions derived from the English word inspiration (or Latin inspiratio). The point of the biblical teaching is never a divine heightening of the human powers of the prophet (though the Bible does not deny that in certain instances such may have taken place). Rather, by all those inconceivable means at the disposal of a sovereign God, the Holy Spirit used the writers of Scripture to produce through them the message that he wished to communicate to us. God’s Spirit obviously did not need in every case to “inspire” (i.e., to raise to greater heights than ordinary) a Micah or a Luke; rather, God produced the writing he wished by his sovereign preparation and control of a man who could and freely would write just what God desired to be his divinely authoritative message to his people.

In summary, biblical inspiration (as distinguished from illumination) may be defined as the work of the Holy Spirit by which, through the instrumentality of the personality and literary talents of its human authors, he constituted the words of the Bible in all of its several parts as his written word to the human race and, therefore, of divine authority and without error.

integrity. Moral soundness; steadfast uprightness; incorruptibility. Although several Hebrew words can be translated “integrity,” this English term usually renders the noun tōm H9448, “completeness, wholeness, perfection” (1 Ki. 9:4; Prov. 19:1 et al.). In the NT, “integrity” is used by modern versions to render interest. In the OT there is no trace of any system of commercial credit. Large commercial loans were not made in ancient ISRAEL. Only the poor borrowed, and they did it to obtain the necessities of life. The LAW of MOSES forbade lending at interest to a fellow Israelite (Exod. 22:25) but permitted charging interest to a foreigner (Deut. 23:20). A needy Israelite might sell himself as a servant (Lev. 25:39; 2 Ki. 4:1). The prophets condemn the taking of interest as a heinous sin (Jer. 15:10; Ezek. 18:8, 13, 17). In the NT, references to the receiving of interest occur in two parables—of the pounds (Lk. 19:23) and of the talents (Matt. 25:27), and it is distinctly encouraged.

interpretation. The correct reproduction of the thoughts of another (either a writer or speaker), often from a different language. Especially when applied to the BIBLE, interpretation is sometimes called hermeneutics (from the Gk. verb hermēneuō G2257, “to express, explain, translate, interpret”). The term exegesis can be used as a synonym of interpretation, but it usually refers to a detailed and technical analysis of the text. Many distinguish between hermeneutics and exegesis by saying that the former deals with principles of interpretation (including philosophical issues) and the latter with practice and methods. The biblical material, written between 2,000 and 3,500 years ago, poses a special problem for the modern interpreter because it was formulated in environments and in languages considerably different from those that prevail in the modern world.

Biblical interpretation has a dual nature: (1) the problem of the language, and (2) the theological significance of the material. The discovery of the true meaning of all words and terms in any biblical passage is the place where interpretation begins. This is essentially an interpretation of language. It embraces such considerations as definition of words, contextual analysis, literary types and forms, historical analogy, and syntactical distinctives. In addition, biblical material is of such a nature as to demand special consideration. The doctrine of INSPIRATION holds the biblical interpreter to a proper regard for the fundamental character of Scripture. It demands a recognition of the theological significance of Scripture, resting upon the REVELATION of God that is not found in any other literature. The extraordinary character of Scripture transcends the usual and ordinary analysis of nonbiblical materials.

The language of the Bible is human language and, as such, is subject to the same principles and laws that govern the interpretation of any book or writing other than the Bible. If the language of the Bible were other than a true human language subject to the usual rules of human communication, there would be no basis for human beings to interpret or come by any trustworthy knowledge of its meaning. Because the books of the Bible are records in human speech, they must be handled in view of literary structure, literary form, and literary relations as any other book or writing. There are legitimate presuppositions to be brought to Scripture that cannot be brought to other books. Because the Bible has God as its ultimate author, it must be expected that its contents will bear true and faithful relation to that fact. Every means of the historical-critical method of interpretation should claim his attention: textual criticism, literary criticism, comparative religion criticism, historical criticism, etc. Beyond all of this, however, the HOLY SPIRIT is to be acknowledged as the only infallible interpreter of God's word.

I. Words. To interpret Scripture lexically, the interpreter should have some knowledge of the historical development of words in their meaning. At the same time, one should avoid the "etymological fallacy," that is, assuming that the meaning of a word can be found in its history (diachronic approach) rather than its conventional use in its current period (synchronic approach). An example of this is reading Hebrew meanings into Greek words used in the NT. It is more important to understand the usage of words by the particular writer being interpreted. Current usage rather than history alone must determine a word's meaning. An author can refer to a past use of a word, but the context must indicate he is doing so. A good lexicon is the best source of this information. The meaning of words should be considered in light of the different periods in the development of the biblical languages. Comparison should be made between different authors of the same period where such is possible.

II. Syntax. To interpret syntactically, the grammatical principles of the language in which the text was written must be understood. A grammar of that language is the source of such information. It must always be remembered that the function of grammar is not to determine the laws of language but to explain them. Language developed first, as a means of expressing thought; grammars were written later to explain the laws and principles of language as it functioned in expressing ideas. In the interpreter's native language, these meanings of grammatical constructions are more or less sensed at once subconsciously; but when work is being done in a foreign language, it is difficult to isolate and understand the ways of expressing thought peculiar to that language, or the idioms of the language. If the interpreter wishes to get the meaning from the text, it is necessary to have the viewpoint of the writer, and follow closely the idioms that the writer used.

III. Context. To interpret contextually it is necessary to have regard for the entire composition being interpreted. The nature of the composition is of paramount importance to the interpreter, whether it is a unified discourse or some other type of writing. The subject under discussion immediately surrounding the passage colors the interpretation also. Often a shade of meaning is given to words by the nature of the discussion of which they are a part. The division of the biblical text into chapters and verses has created a considerable problem for interpretation from time to time because the impression is given that the context is insignificant, that each verse stands alone. Also, the sections fail to correspond to the correct divisions of thought. A good example is Col. 2:21, which has been used not infrequently as a text for a sermon on temperance, when actually in its context it is a condemnation of asceticism.

IV. History. It is important for interpreters to discover the circumstances that surrounded and called forth the document being interpreted. The source of such information is in the introductory notes to a biblical book in some good commentary, or a special volume of introduction to the OT or the NT. The manners, customs, and psychology of the people associated with the book being studied are of tremendous importance to a correct understanding of the text. The study of the people would include their methods of recording history, figures of speech, types of literature, and their concept of time or chronology. Both general and particular historical works can supply this need for the interpreter.

V. Analogy of Scripture. One of the most important safeguards for interpreters is to do their work with a regard for the analogy of Scripture. He must use Scripture itself as a guide to understanding Scripture. Any bizarre interpretation of a passage that conflicts with the whole trend of Scripture must be judged to be wrong. Scripture confirms itself. A thorough and accurate knowledge of the biblical viewpoint is a necessity. It is hoped that interpreters seek to divest themselves of their prejudices and seek to read the text through the eyes of its author.

VI. Procedure. The hermeneutical process is not as complex as one might think. First, we must be aware of the genre or type of literature and utilize those rules of the language game that apply to each. Second, we should study the structural development of the passage and see how the various parts relate to the whole, thereby seeing how the context develops. Third, the interpreter needs to identify the grammatical and lexical components of the sentence to determine the probable meaning of the developing text. Fourth, one must use background information to fill in the gaps between what the author expected his original readers to understand and our world today. Fifth, we should look for the theological threads that tie the passage to others in the book and in the Bible as a whole. Finally, one must take a critical realist approach to testing conclusions, evaluating their adequacy and coherence, and comparing them to the conclusions of other scholars and of the community of faith as a whole.

intertestamental period. See APOCRYPHA; MACCABEE; PSEUDEPIGRAPHIA.

Iob. i'ohb (Heb. yôb H3410 [not in NIV]). Variant of JASHUB (Gen. 46:13 RSV and other versions, following MT).

iota. i-oh'tuh (Gk. iōta G2740). KJV jot. Seventh letter of the Greek alphabet. In the Hebrew/Aramaic alphabet, the corresponding consonant (׃, “yod”) is the smallest letter, and Jesus alludes to it in his statement, “Till heaven and earth pass, one jot or one tittle shall in no wise pass from the law, till all be fulfilled” (Matt. 5:17 KJV). See discussion under DOT.

Iphdeiah. if-dee'yah (Heb. yipdēyâ H3635, “Yahweh redeems”). KJV Iphedeiah. Son of Shashak and descendant of BENJAMIN; listed among the head of families that lived in Jerusalem (1 Chr. 8:25; cf. v. 28).

Iphedeiah. See IPHDEIAH.

Iphtah. if'tuh (Heb. yiptāḥ H3652, prob. “[God] opens”; see IPHTAH EL). KJV Jiphtah. A town in the SHEPHELAH, within the tribal territory of JUDAH (Josh. 15:43). Because it was in the same district as KEILAH and MARESHAH, some tentatively identify Iphtah with modern Tarqumiyeh, about 6 mi. (10 km.) NW of HEBRON.

Iphtah El. if'tuh-el' (Heb. yiptāḥ-ʾēl H3654, “God opens”). KJV Jiphtah-el. A valley on the N border of the tribe of ZEBULUN and the SE border of ASHER (Josh. 19:14, 27). Its location is uncertain, but two possibilities are Wadi el-Malik and Wadi ʾAbbelin.

Ir. ihr (Heb. ʿîr H6553, possibly “stallion [of donkey]” or “city”). (1) Descendant of BENJAMIN and (according to NIV) ancestor of the Shupites and Huppites (1 Chr. 7:12; see HUPPIM); some scholars have suggested that he is the same as IRI (v. 7).

(2) According to some scholars, the name of an otherwise unknown city mentioned by BALAAM in one of his oracles (Num. 24:19; cf. NRSV, NJPS). Most versions understand the term here as the common noun for “city.”

Ira. i’ruh (Heb. ʿîrā H6562, possibly “stallion [of donkey]” or “city”). (1) A Jairite identified as “David’s priest” (2 Sam. 20:26). Since the Jairites were probably descendants of JAIR—from the tribe of MANASSEH rather than LEVI—Ira could not have technically been a priest; perhaps the term “priest” here refers to some chief official in the service of the king (cf. the use of the same term in 2 Sam. 8:18, rendered “royal adviser” by NIV on the basis of 1 Chr. 18:17).

(2) Son of Ikkesh of TEKOA; he was one of David’s thirty mighty warriors and served as commander in charge of the division for the sixth month (2 Sam. 23:26; 1 Chr. 11:28; 27:9).

(3) An ITHRITE who was also one of David’s thirty mighty warriors (2 Sam. 23:38; 1 Chr. 11:40).

Irad. i’rad (Heb. ʿîrād H6563, derivation uncertain). Son of ENOCH and grandson of CAIN (Gen. 4:18).

Iram. i’ram (Heb. ʿîrām H6566, possibly “stallion [of donkey]”). Descendant of ESAU, listed among the clan chiefs of EDMOM (Gen. 36:43; 1 Chr. 1:54).

Iri. i’ri (Heb. ʿîrî H6565, possibly “my stallion [of a donkey]” or “my city”). Son of Bela, grandson of BENJAMIN, and family head (1 Chr. 7:7); some scholars identify him with IR (v. 12).

Irijah. i-ri’juh (Heb. yîr ʿiyyāyh H3713, “Yahweh sees”). Son of Shelemiah; he was an officer posted at the BENJAMIN GATE in Jerusalem who arrested JEREMIAH on the charge of planning to desert to the Babylonians (Jer. 37:13-14).

Ir-moab. ihr-moh’ab (Heb. ʿîr mō ʿāb, “city of Moab”). An otherwise unknown town on the ARNON River where BALAK went to meet BALAAM (Num. 22:36, NRSV, NJPS). Most versions, however, render the Hebrew phrase as “a [or the] city of Moab.”

Ir Nahash. ihr-nayˈhash (Heb. ʿîr nāḥāš H6560, “city of the serpent”). Son of Tehinnah and descendant of JUDAH (1 Chr. 4:12). More likely, the text should be rendered “Tehinnah the founder [or leader] of Ir [or of the city of] Nahash,” in which case the reference is to a Judahite town, perhaps to be identified with Deir Naḥas (c. 7 mi./11 km. W of KEILAH) or with Khirbet en-Naḥas in the ARABAH.

iron (metal). See MINERALS.

Iron (place). iˈron (Heb. yîr ʾôn H3712, meaning uncertain). RSV Yiron. A fortified town within the tribal territory of NAPHTALI (Josh. 19:39). It is identified with modern Yarun, some 22 mi. (35 km.) NE of ACCO.

Irpeel. ihrˈpee-uhl (Heb. yîrpē ʾēl H3761, “God heals”). A town allotted to the tribe of BENJAMIN (Josh. 18:27). It was in the same general area as GIBEON (v. 25) and neighboring towns, but its precise location cannot be ascertained.

irrigation. The most explicit reference to irrigation in the Bible is an assertion that the Egyptian practice is irrelevant to the Palestinian hills, where the “rain from heaven” would serve as a perpetual reminder of divine approval or disfavor (Deut. 11:10-17); but the contrast was relative, not absolute. See PALESTINE; RAIN. From Chalcolithic times, irrigation had become widespread in the FERTILE CRESCENT, and the exiles on the river or canal KEBAR were renewing contact with a system of perennial irrigation predating ABRAHAM. Larger centers of Palestine like BETH SHAN and JERICHO (with its powerful springs) long remained oases of irrigated productivity.

Ir Shemesh. ihr-shemˈish (Heb. ʿîr šemeš H6561, “city of the sun”). A town allotted to the tribe of DAN (Josh. 19:41). The Danites were unable to occupy the towns in this territory (v. 47), and Ir Shemesh apparently became part of JUDAH, where it was better known as BETH SHEMESH.

Iru. iˈroo (Heb. ʿîrû H6564, possibly “stallion [of donkey]” or “city”). Eldest son of CALEB, listed in the genealogy of the tribe of JUDAH (1 Chr. 4:15).

Isaac. i'zik (Heb. yisḥāq H3663, "he laughs"). Son of ABRAHAM and SARAH, half-brother of ISHMAEL, husband of REBEKAH. Isaac was born in the south country, probably BEERSHEBA (Gen. 21:14, 31), when Abraham was a hundred and Sarah ninety years old (17:17; 21:5). He was named Isaac because both Abraham and Sarah had laughed incredulously at the thought of having a child at their age (17:17-19; 18:9-15; 21:6). His birth must be regarded as a miracle. Twenty-five years after God had promised the childless Abraham and Sarah a son, the promise was fulfilled. He is thus rightly called the child of promise, in contrast with ISHMAEL, who was Abraham's son through HAGAR, Sarah's maid. When Isaac was eight days old, he was circumcised (21:4). Fearing future jealousy and strife between the two boys when she observed Ishmael mocking Isaac, Sarah tried to persuade Abraham to cast out Hagar and Ishmael. Abraham was loath to do this because he loved the boy and did so only when he received explicit direction from God, who said to him that his seed would be reckoned through Isaac, but he would also make a nation of Ishmael (21:9-13).

The next recorded event in the life of Isaac is connected with God's command to Abraham to offer him as a sacrifice on a mountain in the land of MORIAH (Gen. 22). His exact age then is not stated, but he is described as a "lad," able to carry the wood for the burnt offering up the mountainside. In this whole experience his unquestioning submission and obedience to his father stand out almost as remarkably as his father's FAITH. Bound on the altar and about to die, his life was spared when an angel of the Lord interposed and substituted for him a ram, which was offered up in his place. God's purpose in this great test of Abraham's faith is looked at in various ways, among the more important being the following: it is the last and culminating point in God's education of Abraham regarding the meaning of sacrificial obedience; it is a rebuke by God of the widespread heathen practice of sacrificing human beings; it is an object lesson to Abraham of the great sacrifice of the MESSIAH for the redemption of mankind.

Sarah died at HEBRON when Isaac was thirty-six years old (Gen. 23:1). At the age of forty Isaac married Rebekah, a kinswoman from MESOPOTAMIA (ch. 24); but he and his wife were childless until, in answer to prayer, twin sons, ESAU and JACOB, were born to them when he was sixty (25:20, 26). At a time of famine, God admonished him not to go down into EGYPT, as he had thought of doing, but to remain in the Promised Land; and he pledged his word to be with him. He went to the PHILISTINE city of GERAR, and there, fearing for his own life, he passed his wife off as his sister, as his father had done before him. He was justly rebuked by ABIMELECH the king for his duplicity (26:10). Isaac then pitched his camp in the Valley of Gerar and became so prosperous as a wheat-grower and herdsman that the envious Philistines began a systematic, petty harassment by stopping up the wells that his father had dug and he had opened again. Abimelech even advised him to leave the country in the interest of peace (ch. 26). Isaac subsequently returned to Beersheba. There the Lord appeared to him at night and promised to bless him for his father's sake. Realizing that God was with Isaac, Abimelech then came from Gerar to make overtures of peace, and the two men formally entered into a covenant (26:26-31). Probably at a considerably later period, Esau, at the age of forty, brought grief to Isaac and Rebekah by marrying two women of CANAAN (26:34-35).

The last prominent event in the life of Isaac is the blessing of his sons (Gen. 27). Esau, the elder, was his father's favorite, even though God had told him that the elder would serve the younger. Rebekah's favorite was Jacob (25:28). When Isaac was over a hundred years old, and dim of sight, and perhaps thinking that his end was near, he wished to bestow his last blessing on his elder son; but through Rebekah's cunning and guile Jacob the younger supplanted his brother, and the blessing of the BIRTHRIGHT was given to him. To save Jacob from the murderous wrath of Esau, who determined to kill him after his father's death, Rebekah induced Isaac to send Jacob into Mesopotamia, that, after his own example, his son might take a wife among his own kindred and not imitate Esau by marrying Canaanite women. Isaac invoked another blessing on Jacob and sent him away to LABAN in PADDAN ARAM (27:1—28:5).

Isaac is mentioned only once more—twenty years later, when Jacob returned from his sojourn in Mesopotamia, having married into Laban's family. Jacob found his father at MAMRE in Hebron. There Isaac died at 180 years of age, and his two sons, Esau and Jacob, buried him (Gen. 35:27-29).

The NT refers to Isaac almost a score of times. His sacrifice by Abraham is twice mentioned, in Heb. 11:17-18 and Jas. 2:21; but while the submission of Isaac is referred to, the stress is on the triumph of Abraham's faith. Isaac is contrasted with Ishmael, as the child of promise and the progenitor of the children of promise (Rom. 9:7, 10; Gal. 4:28; Heb. 11:18). In Jesus' argument with the SADDUCEES on the matter of RESURRECTION, he represents Isaac, although dead in human terms, as still living to God (Lk. 20:37). In the SERMON ON THE MOUNT, Jesus proclaimed that many would come from the east and the west to sit down with Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob in the kingdom of heaven (Matt. 8:11).

Of the three patriarchs, Isaac was the least conspicuous, traveled the least, had the fewest extraordinary adventures, but lived the longest. He was free from violent passions; quiet, gentle, dutiful; less a man of action than of thought and suffering. His name is always joined in equal honor with Abraham and Jacob.

Overview of ISAIAH

Author: The prophet Isaiah son of Amoz, though many scholars attribute parts of the book (esp. Isa. 40-66) to unknown authors living at the time of the EXILE.

Historical setting: Ministering in the southern kingdom of JUDAH, Isaiah began his prophetic work toward the end of the reign of King UZZIAH (c. 740 B.C.) and continued his service during the reigns of JOTHAM, AHAZ, and HEZEKIAH.

Purpose: To denounce the nation for its flagrant violations of the divine COVENANT, but also to bring hope by prophesying the coming of the MESSIAH, the SERVANT OF THE LORD.

Contents: The book begins with a harsh condemnation of Judah (Isa. 1-5), followed by an account of the prophet's commission (ch. 6) and the so-called "book of Immanuel" (chs. 7-12); it then moves to a condemnation of surrounding nations (chs. 13-23), followed by an apocalyptic vision (chs. 24-27) and by further prophecies of judgment and blessing (chs. 28-35). After a historical account of events in Hezekiah's reign (chs. 36-39), the book proclaims comfort to the exiles in Babylon (chs. 40-48), discloses God's plan for his Servant (chs. 49-55), and promises the future purification of his people (chs. 56-66).

Isaiah, Book of. i-zay'yuh (Heb. yēša yāhû H3833, "Yahweh is salvation [or victorious]"). KJV NT Esaias. The first and largest of the Major Prophets; probably the most widely cherished of the OT prophetic books. The prophet Isaiah, son of Amoz, is mentioned repeatedly in the book that bears his name and in 2 Ki. 19-20 (also 2 Chr. 26:22; 32:20, 32), but little is known about him. He was married and had two children to whom he gave significant names (Isa. 7:3; 8:3). Late tradition asserts that the prophet was martyred in the reign of MANASSEH.

I. Period. Isaiah prophesied during four reigns of kings of Judah, from UZZIAH to HEZEKIAH (Isa. 1:1). The first date given is the year of Uzziah's death (6:1), which probably occurred about 740 B.C. or several years later. The last historical event referred to is the death of SENNACHERIB (37:38), which occurred in 681. The most important events are the Syro-Ephraimitic war in the days of King AHAZ (7:1-9), which Isaiah treated, despite its devastation (2 Chr. 28:5-15), as almost insignificant compared with the far greater scourge from ASSYRIA, which was so soon to follow (Isa. 7:17-25). Assyria is the great enemy that much of chs. 7-39 deal with; and beyond it looms an even mightier foe, BABYLON, whose downfall is foretold already in chs. 13-14 and who is the great theme of ch. 40-48. Over against these terrible instruments of divine judgment Isaiah pictures the messianic hope, first in counseling unbelieving Ahaz, and repeatedly thereafter.

II. Analysis. The structure of Isaiah is, in its broad outlines, a simple one, but in its details it raises many problems. It may be briefly analyzed as follows.

A. Introduction (Isa. 1-5). The first chapter contains what has been called the “great arraignment.” Like so many of Isaiah’s utterances, it combines dire threatenings with urgent calls to REPENTANCE and gracious offers of FORGIVENESS and BLESSING. It is followed by the promise of world REDEMPTION (2:1-5). Then comes a series of threatening passages, including a detailed description of the finery of the women of JERUSALEM as illustrating the sinful frivolity of the people as a whole. The land is likened to an unfruitful vineyard, which will soon become desolate. It concludes with a series of six woes that end in gloom: “Even the light will be darkened by the clouds” (5:30).

B. The temple vision (Isa. 6). Whether this incident represents the initial call of Isaiah has been much debated. If the woe pronounced on himself by the prophet is to be understood as the seventh woe, intended to show that the prophet was as conscious of his own sin as of the sin of his people, we may assume that this chapter stands in its proper place chronologically and that this vision came to him some time after he began to prophesy. But the question must remain unsettled. It is a vision of the Holy God; and “Holy One of Israel” becomes one of Isaiah’s favorite titles for the Deity in whose name he speaks.

C. The Book of Immanuel (Isa. 7-12). This group of chapters belongs to the period of the Syro-Ephraimitic war (2 Ki. 16:1-20; 1 Chr. 28). In the midst of this time of peril, Isaiah utters the great prophecies regarding IMMANUEL (Isa. 7:14-16; 9:6-7; 11:1-10); and he concludes with a song of triumphant faith that ends with the assurance, “Great is the Holy One of Israel among you” (12:6). Here again woe (10:1-4) and threatening (10:5-19) stand in vivid contrast with messianic blessing (11:1-16).

D. Prophecies against the nations (Isa. 13-23). These are ten “oracles” (weighty, solemn, and grievous utterances) against nations that either were or would be a menace to God’s people: Babylon (13:1—14:27), Philistia (14:28-32), Moab (15-16), Damascus (17-18), Egypt (19-20), Babylon (21:1-10), Dumah (21:11-12), Arabia (21:13-17), Jerusalem (22), Tyre (23). Here prophecies regarding the near future (16:14; 21:16; cf. 22:20 with 37:2) appear along with others that refer to a more distant (23:17) or a quite remote time. Thus the fall of Babylon is so certain that Israel is told the taunt that will be sung on the day that Babylon falls. Compare 21:6-20, which describes it as having already taken place, with 39:6, which speaks of the Babylonian captivity as still future—a method of prophetic description frequently found in Isaiah. This group of prophecies is chiefly threatening, but it also contains wonderful promises of blessing. Israel’s mightiest foes will share with her in the future blessedness (19:23-25).

E. Diverse predictions (Isa. 24-35). The first chapter in this section looks far into the future. It is world-embracing and may be called an apocalypse (see APOCALYPTIC LITERATURE). The world judgment will be followed by songs of thanksgiving for divine blessing (chs. 25-26). A prophecy against EGYPT follows (ch. 27). Then there are again six woes (chs. 28-34), the last being a frightful curse on EDOM. This group also closes with a beautiful prophetic picture of future blessedness (ch. 35).

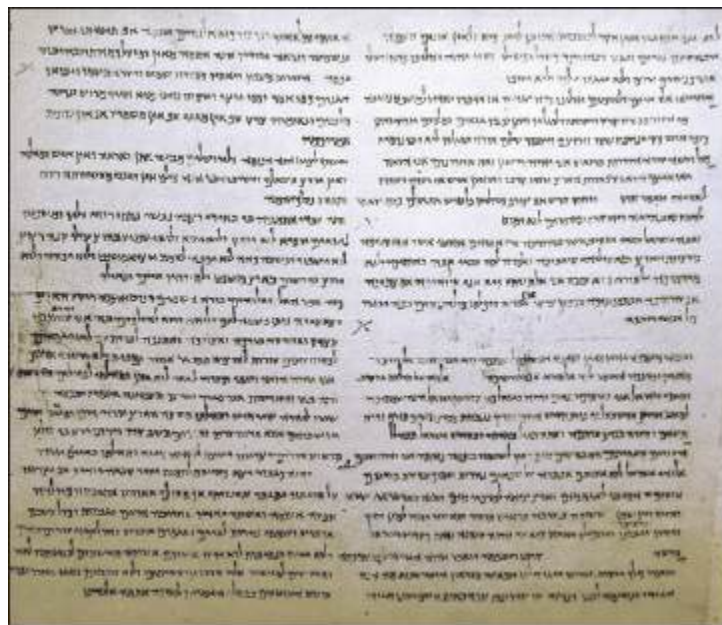

F. Historical section (Isa. 36-39; cf. parallel passages in Kings and Chronicles). These chapters describe the blasphemous threats of Sennacherib against Jerusalem, Hezekiah's appeal to Isaiah, who ridicules the invader, and the flight and death of the blasphemer (chs. 36-37)—one of the most thrilling episodes in the whole Bible. Probably Hezekiah's illness and the envoy of MERODACH-BALADAN (chs. 38-39) took place during the reign of SARGON king of Assyria and father of Sennacherib. If so, the arrangement is topical and intended to prepare for the prophecies of consolation that follow.

G. The Book of Consolation (Isa. 40-66). The words "Comfort, comfort my people" at the beginning of this section are clearly intended to give Israel a hope and consolation not to be gathered from Hezekiah's words, which they immediately follow. These chapters fall into three parts as is suggested by the refrain-like words, "There is no peace for the wicked," which occur at 48:22 and 57:21, and which have their terrible echo in Isaiah's final words (66:24).

Isaiah 40-48 deal with the coming of CYRUS and the fall of Babylon as proof of the power of the God of Israel both to foretell and to fulfill, in amazing contrast to the idols of the heathen, which can do neither. The utter folly of idolatry is portrayed most vividly in 44:9-20 and 46:1-11. The last mention of Babylon, "Leave Babylon, flee from the Babylonians" (48:20), is clearly to be thought of as describing flight from a doomed city, like the flight of LOT from SODOM. In the two remaining parts of the book there is no mention of either Assyria or Babylon except by way of reminiscence (52:4).

Isaiah 49-57 form a logical and climactic sequel to the preceding group of chapters. The figure of the "servant" is common to both. The word occurs twenty times in chs. 40-53. Nine times he is called Israel, Jacob, or Jacob-Israel. Six times the Lord calls him "my servant." The title is used in three senses: of the servant as deaf and blind (42:18-19), sinful and needing redemption (44:22; cf. 43:25); of the servant as faithful and as having a mission to Israel and the Gentiles (42:1-7; 49:1-6; 50:6-9); and finally of One who, himself innocent, suffers for the sins of others (52:13—53:12). The first three of these four passages, which are often called the "Servant Songs," can refer to the pious in Israel as sharing with their Lord in his mission of salvation. The last story is one of the most precious passages in the Bible. It speaks both of the humiliation of the Savior and also of the glory that is to follow. The greatness of the salvation secured by the Servant is described in glowing terms and its worldwide scope is made clear in 53:10-12 and again and again in the chapters that follow, especially 61:1-3. See SERVANT OF THE LORD.

Facsimile of the Great Isaiah Scroll (1QIsa^a) discovered in Qumran (2nd cent. B.C.).

Isaiah 58-66 continue the same general theme and reaches its height in 66:1-3, a passage that foretells that day of which Jesus spoke to the woman of SAMARIA, when the true worshiper will worship not in temples made with hands, but “in spirit and truth” (Jn. 4:21-24). Yet here again as constantly elsewhere, warning and denunciation alternate with offers and assurances of blessing. Thus Isa. 65:17, which speaks of the “new heavens and a new earth” (cf. 66:22), follows a denunciation of those who practice abominations. And the book closes with a reference to the torments of the reprobate.

III. Principal themes of Isaiah. Isaiah is preeminently the prophet of redemption. The greatness and majesty of God, his holiness and hatred of sin and the folly of idolatry, his grace and mercy and love, and the blessed rewards of obedience are constantly recurring themes. No wonder that the NT writers quote so often from Isaiah and that so much of Handel’s Messiah is taken from it. Redeemer and savior (or save, salvation) are among Isaiah’s favorite words. The words that describe the character of the promised Messiah (Isa. 9:6) are frequently on his lips: wonderful (25:1; 28:29; 29:14), counselor (19:17; 25:1; 28:29; 40:13-14, 16-17), mighty God (30:29; 33:13; 40:26-28; 49:20-26; 60:16), everlasting father (26:4; 40:28; 45:17; 55:3; 57:15; 60:19-20; 63:16; 64:8), prince of peace (26:12; 45:7; 52:7; 53:5; 55:12; 57:19; 66:12). Isaiah had a deep appreciation of beauty and wonder of the world of nature (e.g., ch. 35). A striking figure that he uses repeatedly is the “highway” (11:16; 19:23; 33:8; 35:8; 36:2; 40:3; 49:11; 57:14; 62:10). All the barriers that separate nation from nation and delay the coming of the King to his kingdom will be removed, and “the glory of the LORD will be revealed, and all mankind together will see it” (40:5).

IV. Importance. The importance of the book is indicated by how frequently it is quoted in the NT. Isaiah is quoted by name twenty-one times, slightly more than all the other writing prophets taken together; and there are many more allusions and quotations where his name is not given. He has been called the evangelist of the OT, and many of the most precious verses in the Bible come to us from his lips. The fact that the Lord began his public ministry at NAZARETH by reading from Isa. 61 and applying its prophetic words to himself (Lk. 4:16-21) is significant of the place that this book would come to hold in the Christian church.

V. Unity. The traditional authorship and unity of this book have been vigorously assailed for two centuries. The attack is not due to any discoveries that have been made, but to the new theory regarding prophecy that is widely prevalent today and minimizes or denies prediction, declaring that the OT prophet spoke only to the people of his own time and not to future generations. This theory is refuted by the fact that the NT frequently quotes the words of the prophets, notably Isaiah, as fulfilled in the earthly life of Jesus Christ. In Jn. 12:38-40 two quotations from Isaiah are brought together, the one from Isa. 53:1, the other from 6:9-10; and as if to make it quite clear that they have one and the same source, the evangelist adds: "Isaiah said this because he saw Jesus' glory and spoke about him."

The main argument for a "Second Isaiah" is that Cyrus is referred to as one who has already entered on his career of conquest (e.g., Isa. 41:1-2, 25); and it is claimed that the writer of all or part of chs. 40-66 must have lived at the close of the Babylonian captivity. We must note, therefore, that the prophets, notably Isaiah, often spoke as if they were eyewitnesses of the future events they described. The viewpoint or situation of the one who penned ch. 53 is Calvary. He describes the sufferings of the Servant as ended and depicts in glowing colors the glory that will follow, yet the prophet cannot have lived at that time. He must have lived many years, even centuries, before the advent of the One whose death he vividly portrays. Consequently, one must hold that neither in chs. 7-12 nor in ch. 53 the prophet predicted the coming and work of the Messiah; or one must hold that he could and did speak of future events, of the coming of Cyrus, of One greater than Cyrus, as if he were living in the glorious days of which he spoke. For those who accept the testimony of the Bible and hold the conception of predictive prophecy that it sets forth, the unity of Isaiah is not a discredited tradition but a well-accredited fact.

Isaiah, Martyrdom and Ascension of. See P_{SEUDEPIGRAPHIA}.

Iscah. ish´kuh (Heb. yiskâ H3576, derivation uncertain). TNIV Iskah. Daughter of HARAN and niece of ABRAHAM (Gen. 11:29).

Iscaiot. See JUDAS ISCARIOT.

Ishbaal. See ISH-BOSHETH.

Ishbah. ish´buh (Heb. yišbāḥ H3786, “[God] soothes” or “may [God’s wrath] subside” or “[God] congratulates”). Son of MERED (apparently by his wife BITHIAH, Pharaoh’s daughter) and father of ESHEMOA; included in the genealogy of JUDAH (1 Chr. 4:17; note that NRSV, to clarify the sense, includes here part of v. 18).

Ishbak. ish´bak (Heb. yišbāq H3791, possibly from a root that in Arabic means “to anticipate, surpass”). Son of ABRAHAM and KETURAH (Gen. 25:2; 1 Chr. 1:32); no descendants are mentioned.

Ishbi-Benob. ish´bi-bee´nob (Heb. yišbî bēnōb H3787, meaning unknown). A descendant of Rapha (see REPHAITES) of GATH whose bronze spearhead weighed more than seven pounds; fighting on the side of the PHILISTINES against the Israelites, he vowed to kill DAVID but was defeated by ABISHAI (2 Sam. 21:16-17, 22). As a result of this incident, the Israelite soldiers would not allow David to fight again.

Ish-Bosheth. ish-boh´shith (Heb. ʾiš-bōšet H410, “man of shame”). Son of SAUL; he was made king over Israel by ABNER in repudiation of DAVID’s claim to the throne (2 Sam. 2:8—4:12; NRSV, “Ishbaal”). He is also called ESH-BAAL (ʾešba ʿal H843), meaning “man of the Lord” or “the Lord exists,” which was probably his original name (1 Chr. 8:33; 9:39). The difference between Ish-Bosheth and Esh-Baal is generally attributed to an intentional alteration of the name of BAAL because of intense hatred for that pagan deity (this word, which means “lord,” could apparently be applied to Yahweh early in Israelite history). It is also possible that the name was given him as a result of his shameful demise. The appointment of Ish-Bosheth brought forth the question of the means of royal succession. David’s right was charismatic, Ish-Bosheth’s was hereditary, and the former prevailed. Ish-Bosheth was forty years of age when he was enthroned at MAHANAIM and reigned for only two years (2 Sam. 2:10). Abner transferred his loyalty to David as a result of an accusation by Ish-Bosheth (3:7-12; but Abner was murdered shortly thereafter, v. 27). Ish-Bosheth, lacking support, was finally assassinated (4:5-8).

Ish-hai. ish'hi (Heb. îš-ḥay, “man of life”). Father of Jehoiada and grandfather of BENAIAH (one of DAVID’s mighty warriors), according to 2 Sam. 23:20 KJV, following the Ketib (“what is written”). However, the Qere (the variant preferred by the MT) has ben-îš-ḥayil, lit., “son of a man of power,” an expression applied to Benaiah and probably meaning “valiant warrior” or the like; this reading (found in the parallel, 1 Chr. 11:22) is followed by most versions.

Ishhod. ish'hod (Heb. îšhôd H412, “man of splendor [or vitality]”). KJV Ishod. Son of HAMMOLEKETH, who was apparently the sister of GILEAD; included in the genealogy of MANASSEH (1 Chr. 7:18). It is unclear why his father’s name is not given. See discussion under ABIEZER #1.

Ishi (divine name). ish'i (Heb. îšî, from îš H408, “man, husband,” plus first person sing. pronoun). This name appears in the KJV of Hos. 2:16, “And it shall be at that day, saith the LORD, that thou shalt call me Ishi; and shalt call me no more Baali” (modern versions usually translate the first name with “my husband,” and the second with either “my Baal” [NRSV] or “my master” [NIV]). The Hebrew word for ba'al H1251 means “owner” or “lord,” but it too can mean “husband.” Because of its associations with the idolatrous worship of the pagan BAAL, the prophet declares that this name will not be used in the worship of the true God. Some have thought that this word, when it has the meaning “husband,” implies a formal or legal arrangement, and that the change of name may thus indicate also a return to a closer spiritual relationship.

Ishi (person). ish'i (Heb. yîš'î H3831, prob. short form of ISAIAH). (1) Son of Appaim and descendant of JUDAH through the line of JERAHMEEL (1 Chr. 2:31).

(2) A descendant of JUDAH (1 Chr. 4:20); his genealogical connection is unclear.

(3) A member of the tribe of SIMEON whose sons led 500 Simeonites in an invasion of the hill country of SEIR (1 Chr. 4:42).

(4) A head of family in the eastern part of the tribe of MANASSEH; he and several others are described as “brave warriors, famous men” (1 Chr. 5:24).

Ishiah. i-shi'uh. TNIV form of ISSHIAH.

Ishijah. i-shi'juh (Heb. yiššiyyâ H3807, prob. “Yahweh forgets”). NRSV Isshijah. One of the descendants of Harim who put away their foreign wives (Ezra 10:31).

Ishma. ish'muh (Heb. yišmā H3816, “[God] hears”; short form of ISHMAEL). Son of Etam and descendant of JUDAH (1 Chr. 4:3, NIV and other versions, following LXX). The MT is unintelligible; see discussion under ETAM #1.

The Wilderness of Paran, where Ishmael spent much of his life.

Ishmael. ish'may-uhl (Heb. yišmā ʿē l H3817, “God hears”; gentilic yišmē ʿē lî H3818, “Ishmaelite”). (1) Son of ABRAHAM by HAGAR, who was SARAH’s Egyptian maid. Sarah was barren (Gen. 16:1) and, in accordance with the custom of the age, she gave to Abraham her handmaid Hagar as his CONCUBINE, hoping that he might obtain a family by her. Abraham was then eighty-six years old and had been in CANAAN for ten years (16:3). When Hagar saw that she had conceived, she began to despise her mistress, so that Sarah complained bitterly to Abraham, who told her that since Hagar was her slave, she could do anything she wanted with her. Sarah made things so difficult for Hagar that she fled, and somewhere on the road to Egypt the angel of the Lord met her and told her to return to her mistress and submit herself to her. He encouraged her with a promise of many descendants. Ishmael was circumcised when he was thirteen (17:25). Abraham loved him, and even after God had promised him a son by Sarah, he fervently exclaimed, “If only Ishmael might live under your blessing!” (17:18).

At the weaning of ISAAC, the customary feast was held; and Sarah saw Ishmael, now a boy of sixteen, mocking Isaac. Jealous, and probably fearing future trouble if the boys were brought up together, Sarah urged Abraham to get rid of Ishmael and his slave mother, but he was unwilling until he was encouraged to do so by God. Sent away with bread and a bottle of water, Ishmael and his mother wandered about in the wilderness of BEERSHEBA. When he became faint for thirst and was on the verge of death, she put him in the shade of a shrub and sat nearby, “for she thought, ‘I cannot watch the boy die’” (Gen. 21:16). For the second time in Hagar’s life, the angel of the Lord appeared to her. He directed her to some water and renewed his former promise of Ishmael’s future greatness (21:19-20). Ishmael grew up and became famous as an archer in the wilderness of PARAN. His mother gave him in marriage to an Egyptian wife. When Abraham died, Ishmael returned from exile to help Isaac bury their father (25:9). He became the father of twelve sons and a daughter, whom Esau took for his wife. He died at the age of 137 (25:17). In Gal. 4:21-31 PAUL uses the lives of Ishmael and Isaac allegorically. Hagar represents the old covenant, and Sarah, the new; the rivalry between Ishmael and Isaac foreshadows the conflict in the early church between those who would cling to the ordinances of the law, which must pass away, and those who realize that through the grace of Christ there is freedom from the law.

(2) Son of Azel and descendant of BENJAMIN through SAUL (1 Chr. 8:38; 9:44).

(3) Father of a certain Zebadiah who was head of the tribe of Judah during the reign of JEHOSHAPHAT (2 Chr. 19:11).

(4) Son of Jehohanan; he was one of the commanders under JEHOIADA who took part in the revolt against ATHALIAH (2 Chr. 23:1).

(5) Son of Nethaniah, known primarily as the royal officer who assassinated GEDALIAH, the governor appointed by the Babylonians over Judah (2 Ki. 25:25; Jer. 40:7—41:18). Ishmael himself belonged to the royal family (2 Ki. 25:25; Jer. 41:1). After the destruction of JERUSALEM, he joined Gedaliah in MIZPAH. Perhaps hoping to lay a claim to the throne, Ishmael with ten of his men killed not only Gedaliah, but also the Jews who were with him in Mizpah and the Babylonian soldiers. The following day he slaughtered a large group of men who were bringing offerings to the temple. He then took the rest of the people captive and set out to join the Ammonites. The army officers, led by Johanan son of Kareah, pursued Ishmael and were able to rescue the captives, although Ishmael himself escaped.

(6) One of the descendants of Pashhur who agreed to put away their foreign wives (Ezra 10:22).

Ishmaelite. ish'may-uh-lit (Heb. yīšmē ʿē lî H3818). A descendant of ISHMAEL. The Bible refers to the Ishmaelites in connection with the story of JOSEPH (Gen. 37:25-28; 39:1), in the narrative of GIDEON and the Midianites (Jdg. 8:24), and in a list of enemies of Israel (Ps. 83:6). In addition, a certain JETHER the Ishmaelite is included in the genealogy of JUDAH (1 Chr. 2:17; called "Ithra the Israelite" in the MT of 2 Sam. 17:24), and the man in charge of DAVID's camels was an Ishmaelite named OBIL.

Twelve sons (or descendants) of Ishmael are listed in the Bible (Gen. 25:13-15; 1 Chr. 1:29-31), and most of these names correspond to Arabian tribes (or place names) attested in extrabiblical sources. It is clear that, no later than the eighth century B.C., the Ishmaelites formed a major tribal confederacy spread throughout most of N Arabia. Some scholars dispute that these tribes are to be linked with the biblical "sons of Ishmael," but the evidence seems to favor ethnic and political identity. In addition, there is reason to believe that the name Ishmaelite functions in the Bible as a generic term for desert tribal peoples, since it can apparently include the Midianites (cf. Gen. 37:28, 36 [MT, "Medanites"]; Jdg. 8:24 [cf. v. 22]).

Ishmaiah. ish-may'yuh (Heb. yīšma ʿyâ H3819, "Yahweh hears"). (1) One of the band of warriors, kinsmen of SAUL, who joined with DAVID when the latter took refuge at ZIKLAG (1 Chr. 12:4; KJV, "Ismaiah"). He was from GIBEON (as was Saul) and is described as "a mighty man among the Thirty, who was a leader of the Thirty."

(2) Son of Obadiah; he was a ruler appointed by David over the tribe of ZEBULUN (1 Chr. 27:19).

Ishmerai. ish'muh-ri (Heb. yīšmēray H3821, "[Yahweh] preserves"). Son of ELPAAL and descendant of BENJAMIN (1 Chr. 8:18); he is listed among the heads of families who lived in Jerusalem (cf. v. 28).

Ishod. See ISHHOD.

Ishpah. ish'puh (Heb. yīšpâ H3834, possibly "smooth or "bald"). KJV Ispah. Son of BERIAH and descendant of BENJAMIN (1 Chr. 8:16); he is listed among the heads of families who lived in Jerusalem (cf. v. 28). His father and uncle, however, are described as "heads of families of those living in Aijalon and who drove out the inhabitants of Gath" (v. 13).

Ishpan. ish´pan (Heb. yīšpān H3836, derivation uncertain). Son of Shashak and descendant of BENJAMIN (1 Chr. 8:22); he is listed among the heads of families who lived in JERUSALEM (cf. v. 28).

Ish-sechel. ish-see´kuhl (Heb. ʾiš šekel, “man of understanding”). This transliteration is used by some in Ezra 8:18 (e.g., ASV mg.) on the grounds that the context calls for a proper name. Most versions, however, take the words as common nouns (e.g., NRSV, “a man of discretion”; NIV, “a capable man”).

Ishtar. ish´tahr. The Sumero-Semitic goddess of love and fertility and, mainly in ASSYRIA, goddess of war. In SUMER she was known as Inanna (or [I]nnini). Ishtar was worshiped widely throughout Babylonia and Assyria, where temples were dedicated to her in the main cities and chapels in many towns. In addition, at BABYLON alone there were 180 wayside open-air shrines, where hymns and prayers to her as goddess of fertility were frequent. As “Lady of the lands,” she was revered throughout the ANE, though sometimes under other names. In the OT, Ishtar is referred to as ASHTORETH. The women of Judah were upbraided for making sacrificial cakes or incense for her under her title as QUEEN OF HEAVEN (Jer. 7:18; 44:19). According to Babylonian tradition, this goddess descended to the underworld in search of her missing lover TAMMUZ, with the result that fertility ceased and women wept (cf. Ezek. 5:14). In her various capacities, Ishtar is represented as the evening and morning star (Venus).

Ish-tob. ish´tob (Heb. ʾiš tōb, “man of Tob”). The KJV transliteration of a phrase that is better rendered “the men of Tob” (2 Sam. 10:6, 8). See TOB.

Ishuah. See ISHVAH.

Ishuai, Ishui. See ISHVI.

Ishvah. ish´vuh (Heb. yīšwâ H3796, perhaps “[God] rules”). Son of ASHER and grandson of JACOB (Gen. 46:17 [KJV, “Ishuah”]; 1 Chr. 7:30 [KJV, “Isuah”]). Because he does not appear in the list of Asherite clans (Num. 26:44-45), some suspect that the name Ishvah is the result of textual corruption of ISHVI; others speculate that he may have died childless.

Ishvi. ish'vi (Heb. yīšwî H3798, derivation disputed; gentilic yīšwî H3799, "Ishvite" [KJV, "Jesuite"]). (1) Son of ASHER, grandson of JACOB, and ancestor of the Ishvite clan (Gen. 46:17 [KJV, "Isui"]; Num. 26:44 [KJV, "Jesui"]; 1 Chr. 7:30 [KJV, "Ishuai"]).

(2) Son of King SAUL (1 Sam. 14:49; KJV, "Ishui"). While this passage lists only three sons of Saul, 1 Chronicles includes four: Jonathan, Malki-Shua, Abinadab, and Esh-Baal (= ISH-BOSHETH, 1 Chr. 8:33; 9:39). Many believe Ishvi is the same as Esh-Baal/Ish-Bosheth; others speculate that 1 Samuel preserves an earlier list, prior to the birth of Abinadab and Esh-Baal, and that Ishvi died before these last two sons were born.

island, isle. The Hebrew term î H362 can mean a true island (e.g., Ezek. 26:18; 27:6), dry land as distinct from wet (Isa. 42:15), and especially a coastland. Sometimes littoral regions are distinguished from interior (Esth. 10:1), and the nearby shores of PALESTINE (Isa. 20:6) and PHOENICIA (23:2, 6) are included. But more commonly distance is implied, especially where "the coastlands/islands of the nations," extending into the W MEDITERRANEAN, are in view (Gen. 10:5 [KJV, "isles of the Gentiles"; NIV, "maritime peoples"]; Zeph. 2:11). Though references are scattered, a notable concentration appears in the Major Prophets, and a definite pattern of Israelite geographical knowledge (based partially on Phoenician and Philistine contacts) seems implied. NT references, naturally more explicit, include MALTA and specific Aegean islands, while in Rev. 6:14 and 16:20 the broader idea reappears.

The Divided Kingdom.

Israel. iz'ray-uhl (Heb. yīsrā'ēl H3776, by popular etymology, “he struggles with God”; gentilic yīsrē'ēlî H3778, “Israelite”). This name is used in Scripture to designate: (1) an individual man, the son of Isaac (see JACOB); or (2) his descendants, the twelve tribes of the Hebrews; or (3) only the ten northern tribes, led by the tribe of EPHRAIM, as opposed to the southern, under the tribe of JUDAH.

When ABRAHAM was called out of UR of the Chaldees (Gen. 11:31; Neh. 9:7), the Lord’s redemptive purpose was to bring Abraham and his descendants into a saving, COVENANT relationship with himself (Gen. 17:7) and also to make of Abraham’s seed a nation in Palestine (17:8) and through them to some day bring salvation to the entire world (12:3; 22:18). God accordingly blessed Abraham’s grandson Jacob with many children. After a long stay in HARAN, Jacob returned to Palestine and “a man” wrestled with him, bringing him to a point of total submission (32:25; Hos. 12:4). By yielding his life to God’s purpose, Jacob achieved victory, and the man changed his name to Israel, saying, “because you have struggled with God and with men and have overcome” (Gen. 32:28; 35:10). Jacob’s twelve sons were, literally, the “children of Israel” (42:5; 45:21), but the phrase came to signify the whole body of God’s chosen and saved people (32:32; 34:7). It included Jacob’s grandchildren and all subsequent members of the household, as they proceeded to Egypt for a stay of 430 years (46:8; Exod. 1:7).

Reconstruction of the tabernacle from the time of Moses.

I. Mosaic period. In the space of approximately ten generations, God increased Israel from a clan of several hundred (Gen. 14:14; 46:27) to a nation of “six hundred thousand men on foot, besides women and children” (Exod. 12:37; cf. Num. 1:46), equipped with all the material and cultural advantages of Egypt (Exod. 2:10; 12:36; Acts 7:22). Their very increase, however, seems to have aroused the envy of the Egyptians (Exod. 1:8-10). Israel was thus enslaved and compelled to erect certain store-cities in the region of the eastern NILE delta (1:11; cf. Gen. 15:13) and was threatened with total national destruction under the anti-Semitic policy of the empire (Exod. 1:16). MOSES (born 1527 B.C.) was taken in by an Egyptian princess, but even he was forced to flee Egypt.

God, however, still remembered his covenant promises with Abraham (Exod. 2:24-25). At the death of the current PHARAOH (2:23), God appeared to Moses in a burning bush at Mount Sinai and commissioned him to deliver the enslaved people (3:10). Moses accordingly returned to the Egyptian court with the cry “This is what the LORD says: Israel is my firstborn son, and I told you, ‘Let my son go, so he may worship me.’ But you refused to let him go; so I will kill your firstborn son” (4:22-23). The new monarch, however, refused to heed the divine summons. Only after a series of ten miraculous plagues, climaxing in the death of all the firstborn of Egypt, was the hardhearted pharaoh compelled to yield to the Lord (12:31).

Israel marched eastward from GOSHEN toward the RED SEA (see EXODUS). But when the perfidious pharaoh pursued after the seemingly entrapped Hebrews (Exod. 14:3), the Lord sent a strong E wind that blew back the waters of the sea (14:21). Israel crossed, and then the Lord caused the waters to return so that the Egyptians were destroyed to the last man (14:28; excepting pharaoh, who is not mentioned after v. 10). When the Israelites reached Mount SINAI (19:1), God extended the covenant offer of reconciliation that he had made with Abraham and Jacob (Gen. 12:1-3; 28:13-15) so as to embrace the whole nation of the sons of Israel, promising, “Now if you obey me fully and keep my covenant, then out of all nations you will be my treasured possession. Although the whole earth is mine, you will be for me a kingdom of priests and a holy nation” (Exod. 19:5-6).

Israel was required to fulfill certain subjective conditions so as to share in this testamental inheritance: “If you keep my covenant, then...” Basically, they must in FAITH commit themselves to God, to be his people. As Moses proclaimed, “Hear, O Israel:...Love the LORD your God with all your heart” (Deut. 6:4-5). God provided Israel with his fundamental moral law, the Decalogue (Exod. 20:3-17; see COMMANDMENTS, TEN), together with elaborations in the various other codes of the PENTATEUCH. God also furnished them with his ceremonial LAW, to depict Israel’s reconciliation with their heavenly Father (e.g., Lev. 23:39-40) and to provide a symbolical way of FORGIVENESS, should they transgress his moral requirements (e.g., 6:1-3, 6-7). The ceremonies, however, gained their true effectiveness because they foreshadowed the ultimate redemptive work of Jesus Christ (Heb. 9:9-14, 23-24).

Eventually Israel broke up camp (Num. 10:11) and marched NE to KADESH on the southern border of the Promised Land of Canaan. But after taking forty days to spy out the land, all the tribal representatives except CALEB and JOSHUA reported unfavorably on attempting any conquest of Canaan: “But the people who live there are powerful, and the cities are fortified and very large” (13:28). Impetuous Israel then refused to advance into the Promised Land and prayed for a return to Egypt (14:4). Moses’ intercession did save them from immediate divine wrath; but the Lord still condemned them to wander for forty years in the wilderness, one year for each day of spying, until that entire generation died away (14:32-34).

Israel’s route of march, after an extended stay at Kadesh (Deut. 1:46), is described in Num. 33; but the various camps cannot be identified, except that they are known to have passed through EZION GEBER at the head of the Gulf of AQABAH before a final return to Kadesh (Num. 33:35-36). This rough, nomadic existence forced the people into a life of dependence on God, who tested them and yet at the same time cared for them miraculously (Deut. 2:7; 8:2-4). This training period was still marred by repeated “murmurings” and defections, such as the revolts of KORAH, DATHAN, and ABIRAM (Num. 16-17). Even Moses, when producing water for the thirsty people, failed to credit God with the glory (20:10-11) and was therefore denied entrance into the Promised Land (20:12).

When the Hebrews resumed their advance on Canaan, the nation of EDOM (a people descended from Israel's twin brother ESAU) refused to allow kindred Israel to pass through their territories (Num. 20:21). The result was that the Israelites were compelled to double back to Ezion Geber on the Red Sea and go completely around the land of Edom, marching northward up the KING'S HIGHWAY along the eastern border of Edom and MOAB (21:4, 22). Opposite the midpoint of the DEAD SEA, Israel reached the territory of the Canaanite kingdom of SIHON of HESHBON. Although Sihon refused to allow Israel further passage, it was actually God who had hardened the king's heart (Deut. 2:30), whose very attack provided the occasion for his total overthrow and for Israel's occupation of the land of GILEAD (Num. 21:24). Similar aggression by OG, king of BASHAN, resulted in Israel's acquisition of N TRANSJORDAN as well (21:35). Eventually, Israel was able to set up camp on the Plains of MOAB, across the JORDAN from JERICHO (Deut. 1:3-5).

During the last month of Moses' life, God's great servant conducted a "numbering" or census of the people, which indicated a figure similar to what was recorded at the time of the exodus forty years before (Num. 26:51; cf. 1:46). Moses then granted the request of the tribes of REUBEN, GAD, and half of MANASSEH to settle in the conquered lands of Transjordan (ch. 32); and he provided for the division of W Canaan among the remaining tribes (chs. 33-34). At this time BALAAM, who had been employed by the Moabites to curse Israel, uttered his famous blessings. The seer climaxed his oracles by predicting the future messianic king, whose coming constituted the purpose of Israel: "I see him, but not now; I behold him, but not near. A star will come out of Jacob; a scepter will rise out of Israel. He will crush the foreheads of Moab, the skulls of all the sons of Sheth" (24:17). Moses then anointed Joshua as his successor (27:23), spoke the final addresses that constitute most of the book of DEUTERONOMY, and ascended Mount PISGAH to view the Promised Land. There Moses died and was buried by God's own hand (Deut. 34:5-6). He had been the founder of the Hebrews as a nation. "Since then, no prophet has risen in Israel like Moses, whom the LORD knew face to face" (34:10).

II. The conquest. At Joshua's accession, the land of Canaan lay providentially prepared for conquest by the Hebrews (assuming the so-called "early date" for the exodus). Comprising nominally a part of the Egyptian empire, Canaan suffered the neglect of Amenhotep III (c. 1412-1376 B.C.), called "the magnificent," whose rule was one of luxury, military inactivity, and decay. Political organization within Palestine was that of many small city-states, impoverished by a century of Egyptian misrule and deficient in cooperative defense. Canaanite standards of living, however, were still superior to those of the invading Hebrews, a fact that was later to lend "cultural" appeal to their debased religion.

As the Israelites were ready to cross into W Canaan, the JORDAN River was in its annual flood stage (Josh. 3:15). But Joshua anticipated a miracle of divine intervention (3:13), and the Lord did indeed open a gateway into Canaan. For “the water from upstream stopped flowing. It piled up in a heap a great distance away, at a town called Adam,” some 15 mi. (24 km.) N of Jericho (3:16). Israel marched across the dry riverbed, led by the ark of God’s testament (3:13).

Joshua’s war of conquest developed in three major campaigns: in central, southern, and northern Canaan. His first objective was the city of Jericho, to his immediate W in the Jordan Valley. “At the sound of the trumpet, when the people gave a loud shout” outside Jericho’s walls, the Lord caused the walls to collapse (Josh. 6:20), and Joshua proceeded to “devote” the city to God (6:21). Joshua then ascended westward into Canaan’s central ridge and, after an initial setback because of sin in the camp (7:20-21), seized the post of AI. It seems to have served as an outer defense of the major city of BETHEL (8:17), which surrendered without further resistance (12:16; cf. Jdg. 1:22). Joshua was thus able to assemble Israel at SHECHEM to reaffirm the Mosaic law (Josh. 8:33; according to Deut. 27:11-26), having subdued all of central Canaan.

To the S, GIBEON next submitted and, by trickery, its inhabitants saved themselves from the destruction that God had decreed (Deut. 7:2; Josh. 9:15). Their action, however, provoked an alliance against them of five kings of the southern AMORITES, who retaliated by laying siege to Gibeon (Josh. 10:5). Joshua was informed and advanced by forced march to the relief of his clients (10:9); they surprised the enemy and with divine aid routed them westward down the AIJALON Valley. Israel then proceeded to ravage the whole of southern Palestine (10:28-42).

The northern Canaanites finally awoke to their danger and formed an offensive alliance under the leadership of JABIN king of HAZOR (Josh. 11:5). Joshua, however, attacked unexpectedly at the Waters of MEROM, in Upper GALILEE, and completely routed the allied forces (11:7-8). Only Hazor was actually destroyed (11:13), but this triumph meant that within six years of the fall of Jericho (cf. 14:10) virtually all Canaan had come to lie at Joshua’s feet (11:16). “So the LORD gave Israel all the land he had sworn to give their forefathers...every [promise] was fulfilled” (21:43, 45). The Canaanites had not yet lost their potential for resistance; and indeed, what the Lord had sworn to Israel had been a gradual occupation of the land (Exod. 23:28-30; Deut. 7:22). Much still remained to be possessed (Josh. 13:1), but at this point Joshua was compelled by advancing age to divide the land among the twelve Hebrew tribes (Josh. 13-22). He then charged his people with faithfulness to the Lord (24:15) and died.

III. Judges. Moses had ordered the “devotion” (extermination) of the Canaanites (Deut. 7:2), both because of their longstanding immoralities (9:5; cf. Gen. 9:22, 25; 15:16) and because of their debasing religious influence on God’s people (Deut. 7:4; 12:31). See DEVOTED THING. In the years immediately following Joshua’s death, Judah accordingly accomplished an initial capture of JERUSALEM (Jdg. 1:8; though the city was not held, 1:21); Ephraim and western Manasseh killed the men of Bethel (1:25) because the city had begun to reassert itself. But then came failure: Israel ceased to eradicate the Canaanites, no more cities were taken (1:27-34), and the tribe of DAN actually suffered eviction themselves (1:34). Israel’s tolerance of evil had to be rectified by national chastening (2:3).

The next three and one-half centuries were used of God to impress on his people three major lessons: (1) The Lord’s WRATH because of sin. When Israel yielded to temptation, God “sold them to their enemies all around, whom they were no longer able to resist” (Jdg. 2:14). (2) God’s MERCY when people repented. The Lord would then raise “up a judge for them, he was with the judge and saved them out of the hands of their enemies” (2:18). (3) Israel’s depravity. “When the judge died, the people returned to ways even more corrupt than those of their fathers” (2:19). The period of the fourteen judges or leaders (twelve mentioned in the book of Judges, plus ELI and SAMUEL in 1 Samuel) demonstrates a repeated cycle of human sin, of servitude or supplication, and then of salvation.

The chief external forces that God employed for the execution of his providential dealings were the rival empires of the HITTITES N of Palestine and of the Egyptians to the S. Neither of these powers was conscious of the way God was using them; but still, the years in which either succeeded in maintaining Palestinian law and order proved to be just the period that God had chosen for granting “rest” to Israel. Suppiluliuma, for example, who took the throne of the Hittite New Kingdom in about 1385 B.C., fomented dissension among the Palestinian states that owed nominal allegiance to Egypt’s Amenhotep III and Amenhotep IV; with this international intrigue coincides Israel’s first oppression, by CUSHAN RISHATHAIM, an invader from Hittite-controlled MESOPOTAMIA (Jdg. 3:8). The underlying cause, however, lay in Israel’s sin against the moral requirements of God’s Sinaitic covenant. (Compare the sordid events of Micah and the Danites and of the Benjamite outrage, Jdg. 17-21.) When they “cried out to the LORD, he raised up for them a deliverer, Othniel son of Kenaz, Caleb’s younger brother” (Jdg. 3:9). The forty years of peace that then followed probably correspond to the time of undisputed Hittite sway over Palestine, until some years after the death of Suppiluliuma c. 1345.

Founded in the 1320s B.C., however, the 19th dynasty of Egypt began to reassert its territorial claims. Behind this international confusion lay the fact that “once again the Israelites did evil in the eyes of the LORD, and because they did this evil the LORD gave Eglon king of Moab power over Israel,” for eighteen years (Jdg. 3:12, 14). Again the Israelites cried out to the Lord, and he gave them a deliverer—EHUD, a left-handed man, the son of Gera the Benjamite (3:15)—and granted them eighty years of peace. This may have been the time of the treaty of 1315 between Seti I of Egypt and Mursil II of Heth, who preserved order by dividing the Near East into separate spheres of influence. The treaty was then renewed in 1279, after a futile war of aggression by Rameses II, and was strictly enforced until the death of the last great Hittite king, c. 1250.

Against the oppressive Canaanite JABIN II of HAZOR (Jdg. 4:2-3), God raised up the fourth of the judges, the woman DEBORAH. Her military commander, BARAK, proceeded to muster the north-central tribes to the Valley of ESDRAELON for war with Jabin’s officer, SISERA. Then “the stars fought, from their courses they fought against Sisera” (5:20; cf. v. 21): a divinely sent cloudburst immobilized the powerful Canaanite chariotry, and Sisera himself was murdered in flight by a Kenite woman. The forty-year peace that followed Deborah’s victory may have coincided with the strong rule of RAMSES III at the turn of the century, the last great pharaoh of the 19th dynasty.

A view of Mt. Ebal, looking N from Mt. Gerizim. Joshua gathered the Israelites in this valley to allot their tribal inheritances in the Promised Land.

Next came the nomadic Midianites and Amalekites out of the eastern desert to plunder sinful Israel (Jdg. 6:2-6). In about 1175 B.C., however, the Lord answered the repentant prayers of his people and raised up GIDEON with his chosen band of 300. “A sword for the LORD and for Gideon” cleared Israel of the nomadic raiders (7:19-25; 8:10-12), as witnessed by the peaceful picture of Ruth 2-4 some twenty-five years later. The turmoil that resulted from the attempt of Gideon's son ABIMELECH to make himself king over Israel (Jdg. 9) was rectified by the sixth and seventh judges, TOLA and JAIR (who must have overlapped, for no separate deliverance is ascribed to the latter, 10:1-5). But with their deaths in 1110 and the apostasy that subsequently arose, God delivered up his land to two simultaneous oppressions: that of the Ammonites in the east, and that of the Philistines in the west (10:7). After eighteen years, eastern Israel was freed by JEPHTHAH, the eighth judge (ch. 11), who was succeeded by three minor judges. Western Israel, however, remained subject to the rising power of the Philistines for a full forty years (13:1), until the advent of Samuel in 1070. This period must therefore embrace the activity of Eli, until about 1090 (1 Sam. 4:18), as well as the spectacular but politically ineffective exploits of SAMSON, the twelfth and last judge of the book of Judges, to about 1075 (Jdg. 13-16; see 15:20).

The PHILISTINES, by reason of their superior discipline and equipment (cf. Jdg. 3:31; 1 Sam. 13:22; 17:5-6), were able to mount three oppressions, commencing respectively in 1110, 1055, and 1010 B.C., and thereby to threaten the very existence of Israel. Their opening oppression climaxed in the first battle of EBENEZER (1 Sam. 4) and resulted in the deaths of Eli and his sons, in the capture of the ARK OF THE COVENANT, and in the destruction of the Lord's house at SHILOH (see Jer. 7:14). God in his grace, however, raised up the prophet Samuel, who ended the oppression by a God-given victory at the second battle of Ebenezer in about 1070 B.C. (1 Sam. 7). But later, as Samuel turned over many of his powers as judge to his corrupt sons (8:1-3), the Philistines returned with barbaric cruelty (cf. 31:8-10; Jdg. 16:25), seeking to crush disorganized Israel.

IV. The united kingdom. The monarchy was precipitated by the demand of the people themselves. Despite God's directive that they be holy and separate (Lev. 20:26), they still wished to be like "all the other nations" (1 Sam. 8:5), with a human king to fight their battles (8:20), rather than having God acting through a theocratic judge (8:7). They conveniently forgot that it was faithlessness that brought them under attack in the first place. Still, their rebellion served to accomplish God's purpose (see Ps. 76:10); for he had long before decreed a kingdom in Israel over which Jesus the Messiah would someday reign (Gen. 49:10; Num. 24:17). The Lord accordingly authorized Samuel to anoint a king (1 Sam. 8:22) and directed him to SAUL, from the tribe of BENJAMIN (ch. 9).

Saul's accession proceeded in three steps. He was first privately anointed by Samuel (1 Sam. 10:1) and filled with God's Spirit (10:10), then publicly selected at MIZPAH (10:24), and at last popularly confirmed at GILGAL, after having delivered the town of JABESH GILEAD from Ammonite attack (Jdg. 11). The primary concern of his forty-year reign (1050-1010 B.C., cf. Acts 13:21) was the Philistines. These oppressors had already occupied much of his territory, and open war was provoked when one of their garrisons was destroyed by Saul's son JONATHAN (1 Sam. 13:3). In the ensuing battle at MICMASH, Jonathan's personal bravery (14:14), plus the Philistines' own superstitious reaction to a heaven-sent earthquake (14:15, 20), brought about their total defeat. Saul thus terminated the second oppression but, by his failure to submit to Samuel (13:8-9), suffered the rejection of his dynasty from the throne of Israel (13:14).

From his capital in GIBEAH of Benjamin, Saul "fought valiantly" and pushed back the enemies of Israel on every hand (1 Sam. 14:47-48). In about 1025 B.C., however, having been ordered to destroy Israel's implacable enemies, the AMALEKITES (15:1-3; cf. Exod. 17:14), Saul disobeyed and spared both the king and the best of the spoils, under pretext of making offerings to God (1 Sam. 15:15). Samuel stated that "to obey is better than sacrifice" (15:22) and declared Saul's personal deposition from the kingship (15:23, 28). Samuel then privately anointed DAVID, a son of JESSE of Judah, as king over Israel (16:13). David was about fifteen at the time (cf. 2 Sam. 5:4); but by God's providence, he gained rapid promotion at court, first as a minstrel (1 Sam. 16:21-23) and then by his victory over the Philistine champion GOLIATH (ch. 17). Even Saul's growing jealousy, which removed David from court to the dangers of battle, augmented the latter's popularity (18:27-30). Saul's overt hostility finally drove David and his followers into exile, first as outlaws in Judah (20-26) and then as vassals to the Philistine king of GATH (27-30). But while Saul was diverting his resources in the futile pursuit of David, the Philistines prepared for a third, all-out attack on Israel in 1010. David barely escaped engaging in war against his own people (29:4; cf. v. 8); and Saul, routed at Mount GILBOA, committed suicide rather than suffering capture (31:4). Israel's sinful demand for a king had brought about their own punishment.

Having learned of the death of Saul, David moved to HEBRON and was there proclaimed king over his own tribe of Judah (2 Sam. 2:4). But despite David's diplomacy, the supporters of Saul set up his son ISH-BOSHETH over the northern and eastern tribes (2:8-9). Civil war followed, but David increasingly gained the upper hand (3:1). Finally, after the death of Ish-Bosheth, the tribal representatives assembled to Hebron and there anointed David as king over all Israel (5:3; 1003 B.C.). The Philistines now realized that their future depended on prompt action. David, however, after an initial flight to his former outlaw retreat (5:17), rallied his devoted forces (cf. 23:13-17) and, by two brilliant victories in the vicinity of Jerusalem (5:9-25), he not only terminated the last Philistine oppression but eventually incorporated Gath into his own territory and subdued the remaining Philistine states (1 Chr. 18:1).

The time was ripe for the rise of a Hebrew empire. The Hittites had succumbed to barbarian invasion; the 21st dynasty of Egypt stagnated under the alternating rule of priests and merchants (1100 B.C. on); and ASSYRIA, after having weakened others, was itself restrained by inactive kings. With Philistia broken, Israel remained free from foreign threat for 150 years. David's first strategic move was to capture Jerusalem from the Canaanites. Militarily, Mount ZION constituted a splendid fortress (2 Sam. 5:6, 9); politically, the city afforded David a neutral capital between the recently hostile areas of Judah and northern Israel; and religiously, Zion's possession of the ark of God's testament (6:17) centered the people's spiritual hopes within its walls (Ps. 87). From about 1002 to 995 David extended his power on every side, from the EUPHRATES River on the N (2 Sam. 8:3) to the Red Sea on the S (8:14).

David sought to construct a "house," or TEMPLE, in Jerusalem that would be fitting for the Lord. This plan was denied him because of his excessive bloodshed (1 Chr. 22:8; cf. 2 Sam. 8:2); but God's prophet did inform him, "The LORD himself will establish a house for you" (2 Sam. 7:11). He explained, "When your days are over and you rest with your fathers, I will raise up your offspring to succeed you, who will come from your own body;...he is the one who will build a house for my Name." God's promise, moreover, extended beyond SOLOMON and climaxed in that One in whom Israel's ultimate purpose would be fulfilled: "And I will establish the throne of his kingdom forever. I will be his [the Messiah's] father, and he will be my son" (7:13-14; Heb. 1:5). The eternal Christ would indeed suffer a "testator's" death (Ps. 22:16-18), but would rise in power to give everlasting life to his own (16:10-11; 22:22, 26). In the Lord's promises to him (89:3; 132:12) David experienced fundamental clarifications of God's former redemptive revelation on Mount Sinai. He exclaimed in his psalms and other inspired writings: "Is not my house right with God? / Has he not made with me an everlasting covenant, / arranged and secured in every part? / Will he not bring to fruition my salvation / and grant me my every desire?" (2 Sam. 23:5).

In his later life David became involved in sins of adultery and murder (2 Sam. 11) and of failure to control his sons (ch. 13-14), and for this he received corresponding punishments (chs. 15-16; cf. 12:10-12). The revolt of ABSALOM served also to intensify the antagonism between the northern and southern tribes (19:41-43). But at his death in 970 B.C. David was able to commit to his son Solomon an empire that marked the peak of Israel's power.

Solomon, after a bloody accession (1 Ki. 2:25, 34, 36), reigned in peace, culture, and luxury, experiencing only one military campaign in forty years (2 Chr. 8:3). He was further able to consummate an alliance with the last pharaoh of the 21st dynasty (1 Ki. 3:1). King Solomon is most famous, however, for his unexcelled wisdom (4:31), which was achieved by humility before God (3:7-12) and through which he composed the inspired Proverbs, Ecclesiastes, and Song of Songs, plus numerous other works (Ps. 72; 127; cf. 1 Ki. 4:32). His greatest undertaking was the building of the Jerusalem temple, erected from 966 to 959 B.C. (1 Ki. 6) out of materials lavishly provided by David (1 Chr. 22). Like the tabernacle before it, the temple symbolized the abiding presence of God with his people (1 Ki. 8:11).

But Solomon also engaged in a number of luxurious building projects of his own (1 Ki. 7:1-12), so that despite his great commercial revenues (9:26-28; 10:14-15) indebtedness forced him to surrender territory (9:11-12) and to engage in excessive taxation and labor conscription. Unrest grew throughout the empire; and, while the tribute continued during his lifetime (4:21), surrounding subject countries, such as EDOM and DAMASCUS, became increasingly independent (11:14, 23). More serious was Solomon's spiritual failure, induced by wanton polygamy (11:1-8). "The LORD became angry with Solomon because his heart had turned away from the LORD....So the LORD said to Solomon 'Since this is your attitude and you have not kept my covenant,...I will most certainly tear the kingdom away from you and give it to one of your subordinates....Yet I will not tear the whole kingdom from [your son], but will give him one tribe for the sake of David my servant and for the sake of Jerusalem, which I have chosen'" (11:9-12).

V. The divided kingdom. Early in 930 B.C. Solomon died, and his son REHOBAM went to SHECHEM to be confirmed as king. The people, however, were led by JEROBOAM of Ephraim to demand relief from Solomon's tyranny (1 Ki. 12:4), and when Rehoboam spurned their pleas, the ten northern tribes seceded to form an independent kingdom of Israel (or Ephraim). Underlying causes for the rupture include the geographical isolation of the tribes (cf. the phrase "to your tents," 12:16) and their longstanding social tensions (2 Sam. 2:7-9; 19:43). But the basic reason lay in God's decision to punish Israel for Solomon's apostasy (1 Ki. 11:31; 12:15, 24). Furthermore, while the northern tribes possessed the advantages of size, fertility of land, and foreign-trade contacts, these very features diminished their devotion to the Lord and his word.

Ephraim's spiritual laxness became immediately apparent when Jeroboam introduced two golden calves, with sanctuaries at DAN and BETHEL to rival Jerusalem (1 Ki. 12:28; see CALF WORSHIP). He did attempt to associate these images with the historic God of the exodus; but they were still idols, "other gods" (14:9), and not mere pedestals for the Lord's invisible presence. Each succeeding king of Israel likewise "walked in all the ways of Jeroboam,...and in his sin, which he had caused Israel to commit" (see, e.g., 15:26; 16:19, 26). The division served ultimately to separate the sinful Hebrews from the two faithful tribes of Judah and Benjamin: "For not all who are descended from Israel [Jacob] are Israel" (Rom. 9:6).

The relations between Ephraim and Judah passed through seven stages. (1) Hostility marked their course for the first two generations. Initially, both kingdoms suffered from raids by SHISHAK, the energetic founder of Egypt's 22nd dynasty (2 Chr. 12:1-9). Later, Jeroboam advanced against Rehoboam's son ABIJAH (913-910 B.C.); but God granted a great victory to outnumbered Judah (ch. 13), "because they relied on the LORD, the God of their fathers" (13:18). Pious ASA (910-869) ended Egyptian threats by routing the hosts of ZERAH the Cushite (Pharaoh Osorkon I?) at the turn of the century (14:9-15) and then led Judah in a revival of faith in God's covenant (15:12). But when faced by Ephraimite garrisons at RAMAH, only 6 mi. (10 km.) from Jerusalem, the king panicked and hired BEN-HADAD of Damascus to divert the energies of Israel (16:1-4). God's prophet condemned Asa because he "relied on the king of Aram and not on the LORD [his] God" (16:7); and the precedent of ARAMEAN intervention had serious consequences. King OMRI (885-874) founded SAMARIA as the new capital of Ephraim; but Ben-Hadad laid repeated siege to the city, and Omri's son AHAB was saved only by the grace of God (1 Ki. 20).

(2) Asa's son JEHOASHAPHAT made peace with Ahab (1 Ki. 22:44). The allies, together with Ben-Hadad, did manage to halt the westward advance of SHALMANESER III of Assyria at the bloody battle of Qarqar on the O^RONTES (853 B.C.). But Jehoshaphat had given his son in marriage to ATHALIAH, the Baal-worshipping daughter of Ahab and his Phoenician queen JEZEBEL, the persecutor of ELIJAH (19:2); and such compromise could never be honored by God (2 Chr. 19:2). Jehoshaphat was almost killed at the side of Ahab at RAMOTH GILEAD (1 Ki. 22:32-35). Their joint commercial projects met with disaster (2 Chr. 20:35-37). Moab succeeded in revolting from Ephraim (2 Ki. 1:1), and Edom from Judah (8:22); and when JEHU executed God's sentence against the house of Ahab in Israel (841), he killed Judah's young king with them (9:27). Athaliah then slaughtered her princely grandchildren and seized the throne in Jerusalem (11:1).

(3) The years between 841 and 790 B.C. saw no major dealings between Israel and Judah because of Aramean domination over both kingdoms (see 2 Ki. 8:12). Thus, even though Athaliah was killed in Jerusalem, the boy-king Joash (JEHOASH) suffered humiliating submission to HAZAEL of Damascus (12:17-18). Jehu fared even worse, rendering tribute to Shalmaneser in 841 and then, after Assyria's departure, forfeiting his entire Transjordanian territory to Hazael. Only an Assyrian victory over Damascus shortly before 800 brought relief to Israel (13:5).

(4) By 790 B.C. AMAZIAH of Judah had recovered sufficiently to reconquer Edom (2 Ki. 14:7), but his success deceived him. He dared to challenge Jehoash of Israel (14:10), and Jerusalem was rendered totally subservient to Ephraim until the death of Jehoash in 782.

(5) Under the strong monarchs Jeroboam II in Israel and Uzziah in Judah the two kingdoms lived for thirty years in mutual respect and peace. It was their "Indian summer": Egypt slumbered on under the 23rd dynasty; Aram (SYRIA) was broken by Assyria; and Assyria herself, now without aggressive leadership, could be swayed even by the contemporary Hebrew prophet JONAH (2 Ki. 14:25). But beneath the outward prosperity lay moral corruption. AMOS proclaimed impending judgment on "the day of the LORD" (Amos 5:18). HOSEA, too, warned of deportation to Assyria (Hos. 10:6); but with the abolishment of God's old covenant with Israel, he anticipated a future, newer covenant in which people would "acknowledge the LORD" in truth, under "David [the Messiah] their king" (2:20; 3:5).

(6) In 752 B.C. Jeroboam II's son was murdered, and Uzziah (Azariah) of Judah assumed the leadership of the western states against the rising power of Assyria. The general Pul, that is, TIGLATH-PILESER III, was able in 743 to chronicle his defeat of "Azariah the Yaudaeen"; and while Judah apparently escaped with little damage, Damascus and Israel, being farther N, were laid under heavy tribute (2 Ki. 15:19).

(7) The Arameans and Ephraimites then united in reprisals against Ahaz, Judah's new but weak and faithless ruler (2 Ki. 16:5; Isa. 7:1-2). Isaiah admonished him to trust in God and in IMMANUEL, the virgin-born Messiah (Isa. 7:3-14); but in 734 B.C. Ahaz submitted to Assyria for deliverance (2 Ki. 16:7). Edom and Philistia continued to plunder Judah (2 Chr. 28:17-18) and may thus provide the background to OBADIAH (see Obad. 10) and JOEL (Joel 3:4, 19); but Ephraim's northern tribes were taken captive by Tiglath-Pileser in 733 (2 Ki. 15:29), and Damascus was destroyed (16:9). Shortly after that the energetic 25th (Cushite) dynasty rose to power in Egypt, and its pharaoh So (Shabaka?) incited Israel to a final revolt (17:4). Samaria fell to the Assyrians in 722. SARGON II (722-705) proceeded to deport 27,290 Ephraimites (17:6) and replaced them with foreign colonists, who produced the half-breed SAMARITANS (17:24-33). "They...did not trust in the LORD their God. They rejected his decrees and the covenant....So the LORD removed them from his presence. Only the tribe of Judah was left" (17:14-15, 18).

HEZEKIAH (725-696 B.C.) meanwhile seized the opportunity to purify the Jerusalem temple (2 Chr. 29) and to destroy the corrupt HIGH PLACES, whether outrightly pagan or claiming the name of the Lord. His reform included even Israel, which was not helpless under Assyrian siege (31:1); and he invited Ephraimites and Judeans alike to the greatest Passover since Solomon (ch. 30). The name "Israel" came thus to be applied to God's faithful remnant, regardless of their previous citizenship (30:6; cf. Ezra 9:1; 10:5). Hezekiah was warned by both Isaiah (Isa. 30:1-7; 31:1-3) and Micah (Mic. 1:9) to take no part in Shabaka's disastrous battle against Sargon in 720; and he managed to withdraw from the equally unsuccessful revolt of Ashdod in 711, which was sponsored by Egypt and Babylon (Isa. 20 and 39; cf. 36:1). But with the accession of Sennacherib in 705, Hezekiah attempted to throw off the Assyrian yoke.

Egypt, however, proved again to be a "splintered reed" (2 Ki. 18:21); Shabaka was defeated at Eltekeh near Ekron in 701 B.C., and Sennacherib claims to have taken over two hundred thousand Jews captive (cf. Isa. 43:5, 14) and to have "shut up Hezekiah like a caged bird in Jerusalem." Hezekiah resubmitted (2 Ki. 18:14-16), but the false Sennacherib made further demands (18:17). God then rose to the defense of his chastened people (Isa. 37:6, 21-35), and, when a relief army arrived under Shabaka's brother TIRHAKA, it found the Assyrians dead, for they had been killed by the angel of the Lord (2 Ki. 19:9, 35; cf. the Egyptian legend of a plague of mice in the camp of Sennacherib [Herodotus, Hist. 2.141]). The event ranks with the crossing of the Red Sea as one of the greatest examples of God's deliverance. Isaiah thus had a sound basis for comforting Israel (Isa. 40:1-2) and directing their hope to that day when God would fulfill his redemptive purpose among them (53:6).

MANASSEH's reign (696-641 B.C.) was the longest and worst in Judah's history. He gave up Hezekiah's dearly bought freedom by resubmitting to Assyria. He also rebuilt the high places, served Baal with human sacrifice, and mimicked Assyrian star worship (2 Ki. 21:2-9). Through imprisonment (after the Babylonian revolts of 652-648?), he experienced personal conversion (2 Chr. 33:11-16); but it was too late to reform the people as a whole (33:17; cf. 2 Ki. 21:11, 15; 23:26). God, however, was yet to raise up JOSIAH (639-608), the greatest of Judah's reformers. While still in his teens (627), he responded to prophetic teaching such as Zephaniah's (Zeph. 1:14-17) and began actively to eliminate idolatry (2 Chr. 34:3-7). At this point the barbaric SCYTHIANS erupted over the ANE, and the terror they inspired seems to have turned men's hearts to God. The Scythians were finally driven back by the newly formed 26th dynasty in Egypt, but their devastations did serve to release Judah from foreign control for a full twenty years.

Josiah used these last precious decades to establish the covenantal faith once and for all among the pious. His reforms climaxed in 621 with the discovery of "the Book of the Law of the LORD that had been given through Moses" (2 Chr. 24:14), perhaps the chief sanctuary scroll of the Pentateuch (Deut. 31:25-26) that had been misplaced under Manasseh (cf. 2 Chr. 35:3). Josiah and his people reconsecrated themselves "to obey the words of the covenant written in this book" (34:31). He removed the high places (2 Ki. 23:8-9), including even Jeroboam's original altar at Bethel (23:15), and kept the greatest Passover since the days of the judges (2 Chr. 35). "Neither before nor after Josiah was there a king like him who turned to the LORD as he did—with all his heart and with all his soul and with all his strength, in accordance with all the Law of Moses" (2 Ki. 23:25).

In 612 B.C. NINEVEH fell to the Medes and Babylonians, just as NAHUM had prophesied (Nah. 3:18-19). The Medes then withdrew, but Egypt and Babylon arose to claim the spoils. Josiah intervened to oppose the advance of Pharaoh NECO II and was killed at MEGIDDO in 608 (2 Chr. 35:20-24). Neco, however, was decisively defeated by the Babylonians at CARCHEMISH in 605; and NEBUCHADNEZZAR appropriated the former Assyrian territories (2 Ki. 24:7). Josiah's son JEHOIAKIM (23:34) was threatened with deportation to BABYLON (cf. 2 Chr. 36:6 and 2 Ki. 24:1-6), but only a few of the nobility, such as Daniel (Dan. 1:3), were actually taken captive at this time. The date 605 marks the commencement of Judah's predicted seventy years of captivity (Jer. 25:11-12). But while the prophet Habakkuk was admonishing his people to "live by...faith" (Hab. 2:4), Jehoiakim reverted to the sins of his fathers (2 Ki. 23:37). He also rebelled against Babylon (24:1), but he died in 598, and it was his son, with 10,000 of the leaders of Judah, who suffered the second deportation when Jerusalem surrendered on March 16, 597 (24:10-16).

Finally, Jehoiakim's brother ZEDEKIAH yielded to the inducements of Pharaoh HOPHRA of the 26th dynasty and defied Nebuchadnezzar (cf. Jer. 37:11). The Babylonians advanced, Hophra withdrew, and Jerusalem fell in 586. The city and temple were burned (2 Ki. 25:9), the walls were dismantled (25:10), and most of the people were carried into EXILE in Babylon (25:11). A small, fourth deportation in 582 removed even some of the poor that were left (25:12; Jer. 52:30). Israel had "mocked God's messengers, despised his words and scoffed at his prophets until the wrath of the LORD was aroused against his people and there was no remedy" (2 Chr. 36:16). But though the external kingdom of Israel ceased to exist, it did so because it had accomplished its divine purpose. A remnant, albeit small, had been nurtured to the point of profiting from the fiery trial of Babylon so as to be ready for that ultimate day: "'The time is coming,' declares the LORD, 'when I will make a new covenant with the house of Israel....I will put my law in their minds and write it on their hearts. I will be their God, and they will be my people. For I will forgive their wickedness and will remember their sins no more'" (Jer. 31:31-34; Heb. 8:6-13; 10:15-22).

Issachar. is'uh-kahr' (Heb. yíśśāškār H3779 [Qere yíśśākār], possibly "a man of [or there is] hire/reward"). (1) The ninth son of JACOB and the fifth of LEAH (Gen. 30:17-18; 35:23). Almost nothing is known of his personal history beyond his share in the common actions of the sons of Jacob. He had four sons, who went with him into EGYPT (46:13; Exod. 1:3). There he died and was buried.

Issachar.

The tribe that descended from Issachar consisted of five great tribal families (Num. 26:23-24). At SINAI they numbered 54,400 men of war over twenty years of age (1:29); at the end of the wanderings, the number had grown to 64,300

(26:25). The territory allotted to Issachar in Canaan lay S of ZEBULUN and NAPHTALI, and N of MANASSEH. On the E it was bounded by the JORDAN. Whether it ever reached the MEDITERRANEAN is uncertain (Deut. 33:18-19); it probably remained an inland tribe. Its lot included the very fertile plain of ESDRAELON, but this area for the most part remained in the possession of the Canaanites. TOLA, one of the judges, was from Issachar (Jdg. 10:10) as were two kings, BAASHA and his son ELAH (1 Ki. 15:27; 16:6). DEBORAH and BARAK belonged to this tribe as well, and in Deborah's song it is mentioned as having taken part in the battle against SISERA (Jdg. 5:15). The battle took place on the plain of Issachar, and the victory secured free passage between the Israelites in the hill country of Ephraim and those in Galilee. In the time of DAVID, the tribe of Issachar numbered 87,000 (1 Chr. 7:5). In SOLOMON's arrangement of administrative districts, Issachar's territory formed an independent province (1 Ki. 4:17). According to the vision of Ezek. 48:25, the territory of Issachar lies between that of SIMEON and of Zebulun; these three tribes have the three gates on the S side of the new Jerusalem named after them (48:33). The tribe of Issachar is also mentioned in Rev. 7:7, where it is said that 12,000 were sealed.

(2) Seventh son of OBED-EDOM, included in the list of divisions of the Korahite doorkeepers in the reign of DAVID (1 Chr. 26:5).

issaron. See WEIGHTS AND MEASURES (sect. III).

Isshiah. i-shi'uh (Heb. yīššiyyā H3807, short form of ISHIJAH). TNIV Ishiah. (1) Son of Izrahiah and descendant of ISSACHAR; a military chief (1 Chr. 7:3 [KJV, "Ishiah"]).

(2) One of several Korahite warriors who joined DAVID at ZIKLAG (1 Chr. 12:6 [KJV, "Jesiah"]; cf. vv. 1-2). These soldiers may have been LEVITES from the family of KORAH, but some argue that the reference is to a different Korah or even to a locality in the tribe of BENJAMIN.

(3) Son of Uzziel and descendant of LEVI (1 Chr. 23:20 [KJV, "Jesiah"]; 24:25).

(4) Son of Rehabiah and descendant of Levi (1 Chr. 24:21).

Statue of Septimius Severus (emperor A.D. 193-211) in military dress. Cornelius, a member of the Italian Regiment stationed in Judea, would have worn a similar uniform.

Italian Regiment. Also Italian Band, Italian Cohort (Gk. speira Italikē). A unit of the Roman army to which CORNELIUS, who was a CENTURION, belonged (Acts 10:1). It is not clear whether such a cohort was indeed stationed in CAESAREA around A.D. 40; some have thought that Cornelius (perhaps retired?) happened to be in this city at the time even though the unit was on duty elsewhere. See also AUGUSTAN COHORT.

Italy. it'uh-lee (Italia G2712). The geographical term for the country of which ROME was the capital. Originally it applied only to the extreme S of the peninsula, the region now called Calabria; but gradually the application of the name was extended, until in the first century of our era it began to be used in the current sense. It is referred to in three NT passages: (1) According to Acts 18:2 AQUILA and PRISCILLA had just come from Italy because Emperor CLAUDIUS had commanded that all Jews leave Rome. (2) Italy is mentioned in Acts 27:1, 6, as PAUL's destination when he had appealed to CAESAR. (3) In Heb. 13:24 Christians from Italy send their greetings along with those of the author of the letter.

itch. See DISEASES.

Ithai. ith'í (Heb. ʾîṭay H416, variant ʾittay H915, possibly “[God is] with me”; see ITHIEL). Son of Ribai, a Benjamite from GIBEAH; he was numbered among DAVID's mighty warriors (2 Sam. 23:29 [most versions, ITTAI]; 1 Chr. 11:31).

Ithamar. ith'uh-mahr (Heb. ʾîṭāmār H418, derivation uncertain). Youngest son of AARON and ELISHEBA (Exod. 6:23; Num. 3:2; 1 Chr. 6:3; 24:1). Together with his three brothers (ELEAZAR, NADAB, and ABIHU) and Aaron, Ithamar was consecrated to the priesthood (Exod. 28:1). His two elder brothers, Nadab and Abihu, were slain for offering strange fire (Lev. 10; cf. Num. 3:4; 26:61; 1 Chr. 24:2). During the wilderness wanderings he was leader over all the LEVITES (Exod. 38:21), and more specifically over the Gershonites (Num. 4:28) and the Merarites (4:33; 7:8). He founded a priestly family, to which ELI and his descendants belonged (1 Chr. 24:4-6). According to Ezra 8:2, the family of Ithamar continued after the captivity.

Ithiel. ith'ee-uhl (Heb. ʾîṭî ʾēl H417, “God is with me”). (1) Son of Jeshaiiah, descendant of BENJAMIN, and ancestor of Sallu; the latter was one of the provincial leaders who settled in JERUSALEM after the EXILE (Neh. 11:7).

(2) An otherwise unknown man to whom the words of AGUR were addressed (Prov. 30:1). Many argue, however, that instead of “to Ithiel, to Ithiel and Ucal,” the text should be rendered, for example, “I am weary, O God; I am weary, O God, and I languish” (cf. NIV mg.). Other changes have been proposed (cf. NRSV), but none has received wide support. See also UCAL.

Ithlah. ith'luh (Heb. yitlâ H3849, derivation uncertain). KJV Jethlah. A town within the territory allotted to the tribe of DAN (Josh. 19:42). It was apparently near AIJALON, but its precise location is unknown. The Danites were unable to take possession of this territory (v. 47).

Ithmah. ith'muh (Heb. yitmâ H3850, perhaps “fatherless”). A Moabite, numbered among DAVID’s mighty warriors known as the “Thirty” (1 Chr. 11:46).

Ithnan. ith'nan (Heb. yitnān H3854, derivation uncertain). A town in the NEGEV allotted to the tribe of JUDAH (Josh. 15:23). It was near the boundary of EDOM (v. 21), but its location is unknown.

Ithra. ith'ruh (Heb. yitrā H3859, “abundance”). Father of AMASA, who led ABSALOM’s rebel army; Ithra was married to ABIGAIL, David’s sister or half-sister. In 2 Sam. 17:25 MT (cf. KJV, RSV), he is called “Ithra the Israelite,” but in 1 Chr. 2:17, where the variant form JETHER occurs (cf. also 1 Ki. 2:5, 32), he is described as “the Ishmaelite.” Perhaps he was an ISHMAELITE by race who had joined the nation of Israel. In the former passage, some emend “Ithra” to “Jether” (cf. NIV), or “Israelite” to “Ishmaelite” (cf. NRSV), or both.

Ithran. ith'ran (Heb. yitrān H3864, prob. “abundance”). (1) Son of DISHON and descendant of SEIR the HORITE (Gen. 36:26; 1 Chr. 1:41).

(2) Son of ZOPHAH and descendant of ASHER (1 Chr. 7:37); apparently also called Jether (v. 38).

Ithream. ith'ree-uhm (Heb. yitrē'ām H3865, possibly “the Kinsman [i.e., ancestral god] excels”). The sixth and last of the sons of DAVID who were born in HEBRON; his mother was Eglah (2 Sam. 3:5; 1 Chr. 3:3).

Ithrite. ith'rit (Heb. yitrî H3863, gentilic of yeter H3858 [JETHER] or yitrô H3861 [JETHRO]). A Judahite clan descended from CALEB through HUR and SHOBAI; the Ithrites made up one of several families associated with KIRIATH JEARIM (1 Chr. 2:53). Two of DAVID’s mighty warriors, Ira and Gareb, are described as Ithrites (2 Sam. 23:38; 1 Chr. 11:40); however, some argue that the Hebrew here should read yattîrî, that is, a native of the city of JATTIR.

Ittah-kazin. See ETH KAZIN.

Ittai. it'i (Heb. ittay H915, variant îtay H416, possibly “[God is] with me”). (1) Son of Ribai, a Benjamite from GIBEAH; he was numbered among DAVID’s mighty warriors (2 Sam. 23:29 [NIV, “Ithai”]; called I^{THAI} in 1 Chr. 11:31).

(2) A Gittite (i.e., from GATH) who joined himself to David and commanded six hundred men and families. When ABSALOM rebelled against David, Ittai fled with the king and refused to return to JERUSALEM. David made him commander of a third part of his army, with JOAB and ABISHAI; he participated in the battle in the forest of Ephraim when Absalom was killed (2 Sam. 15:18-22; 18:2, 5, 12).

Iturea. it’yoor-ee’uh (Gk. hē Itouraia chōra, “the Iturean country,” from Itouraios G2714). Also Ituraea. This name is found only once in Scripture, in the description of Philip’s territory: “of Iturea and Traconitis” (Lk. 3:1; see HEROD). It was a small principality in the northern section of Palestine that included the Lebanon and Antilebanon mountain ranges and the Lake country around Huleh with its watershed. The capital was at Chalcis. It is usually thought that the Itureans were descended from JETUR son of ISHMAEL (Gen. 25:15; this view goes back to the LXX of 1 Chr. 5:19). In any case, they constituted an Arab tribe that can be traced back only to the second or third century B.C. The Itureans were seminomads and famous archers, a lawless and predatory people. It is not known when they moved from the desert to the mountains in the north. In 105 B.C. Aristobulus I (see MACCABEE) conquered and annexed the kingdom to JUDEA. In 66 Pompey defeated its king, Ptolemaeus, who purchased immunity with a large sum of money. Later AUGUSTUS gave it to Herod the Great, and after his death it passed to his son Philip.

Ivory backrest, possibly from a couch, discovered in Nimrud (8th cent. B.C.); it depicts warriors and the fruit of the lotus tree.

ivory. This hard substance, which forms the tusks of elephants, was brought from INDIA to PALESTINE by both ship and caravan. SOLOMON's throne was made of ivory (1 Ki. 10:18), and he imported large quantities of it. AMOS denounced Israel for its luxuries, among them the use of ivory (Amos 3:15; 6:4). Palaces were inlaid and decorated with ivory (1 Ki. 22:39; Ps. 45:8)

Ivvah. iv'uh (Heb. ʿiwwâ H6394). KJV Ivah. One of several ARAMEAN city-states vanquished by SENNACHERIB (2 Ki. 18:34; 19:13; Isa. 37:13). Because Ivvah is listed along with HAMATH and ARPAD (also SEPHARVAIM and HENA), it is thought to have been located in N SYRIA, but the location is unknown. It is probably the same as AVVAH (2 Ki. 17:24, 31). Some scholars, noticing that Hena and Ivvah are not mentioned in similar lists (2 Ki. 17:24; Isa. 36:19), and suspecting that they are not true geographical names, have suggested that they are pagan deities, or that the text is corrupt, or that the words should be rendered differently.

Iyar. ee'yahr. Also Iyyar. The second month of the Hebrew CALENDAR, corresponding to April-May. This term, equivalent to Babylonian Aiaru, does not occur in the Bible, which uses rather the Canaanite name, ZIV.

Iye Abarim. i'yuh-ab'uh-rim (Heb. ʿiyyê hā ʿăbārîm H6516, “ruins of the regions beyond”). Also called IYIM. A stopping place of the Israelites in their wilderness wanderings, near the Valley of ZERED (Num. 21:11-12; 33:44-45). It was either in MOAB (33:44; NIV, “on the border of Moab”) or in its vicinity (21:11), but the precise location is unknown. Possibly the place was associated with the ABARIM mountain range.

Iyim. i'yim (Heb. ʿiyyîm H6517, “ruins, stone heaps”). KJV and TNIV Iim. A shortened form of IYE-ABARIM (Num. 33:45). This place is not to be confused with IIM (Josh. 15:29), even though the form is identical in Hebrew.

Izhar, Izeharite. See IZHAR.

Izhar. iz'hahr (Heb. yîṣhār H3659, “[God] shines”; gentilic yîṣhārî H3660, “Izharite”). KJV also Izehar, Izeharite. (1) Son of KOHATH, grandson of LEVI, father of KORAH (and two other sons), uncle of MOSES, and eponymous ancestor of the Izrahite clan (Exod. 6:18, 21; Num. 3:19, 27; 16:1; 1 Chr. 6:2, 18, 38; 23:12, 18). Several of his descendants were prominent LEVITES (1 Chr. 23:18 [cf. v. 33]; 24:22; 26:23, 29).

(2) Son of Asshur (by his wife Helah) and descendant of JUDAH (1 Chr. 4:7; cf. v. 5). So the NRSV, following the KETIB; the NIV and NJPS follow the QERE in reading ZOAR, while the KJV's "Jezoar" is a hybrid of the two forms.

Izliah. iz-li'uh (Heb. yizlî'â H3468, "long-living" or "Yahweh delivers"). KJV Jezliah. Son of ELPAAL and descendant of BENJAMIN (1 Chr. 8:18); he is listed among the heads of families who lived in JERUSALEM (cf. v. 28).

Izrahiah. iz'ruh-hi'uh (Heb. yizrahî'â H3474, "Yahweh goes forth [or shines]"). Son of Uzzi and great-grandson of ISSACHAR; a military chief (1 Chr. 7:3).

Izrahite. iz'ruh-hit (Heb. yizrahî H3473). Although this term in Hebrew does not have the usual gentilic form (i.e., with the ending -î), it apparently refers to someone from Izrah, a place otherwise unknown. The term is applied to a certain SHAMHUTH, who was the commander of the fifth monthly division under DAVID (1 Chr. 27:8). Some emend the text to read "Zerahite" (i.e., a descendant of ZERAH of Judah; cf. v. 11). The problem is further complicated by the likelihood that "Shamhuth the Izrahite" is the same as "Shammah the Harodite" (2 Sam. 23:25), also called "Shammoth the Harorite" (1 Chr. 11:27). Clearly scribal activity has created confusion, and we are no longer able to identify the original form(s) of the name.

Izri. iz'ri (Heb. yîrî H3673, possibly "[Yahweh] has formed"). A Levitical musician who, with his sons and relatives, received the fourth lot (1 Chr. 25:11); the name is probably a variant of ZERI (v. 3).

Izziah. i-zi'uh (Heb. yizziyyâ H3466, "Yahweh sprinkles"). One of the descendants of Parosh who agreed to put away their foreign wives (Ezra 10:25; KJV, "Jeziah").

J

J (Jahwist). yah´wist. An abbreviation for Yahwist (German Jahwist); it is used (along with D, E, and P) to designate one of the supposed sources of the PENTATEUCH, according to the Documentary Hypothesis.

Jaakan. jay´uh-kan (Heb. ya ʿăqān [not in NIV]). KJV Jakan. Son of EZER and grandson of SEIR the HORITE; he probably became the progenitor of a clan in EDOM (1 Chr. 1:42 NRSV, following MT). On the basis of some Hebrew MSS and the parallel passage (Gen. 36:37), many scholars emend ya ʿăqān to wa ʿăqān (“and Akan”; cf. NIV). See also BEEROTH-BENE-JAAKAN and BENE JAAKAN.

Jaakanite. jay-a´kuh-nit. See BEEROTH-BENE-JAAKAN.

Jaakobah. jay-uh-koh´buh (Heb. ya ʿăqōbâ H3621, “[God] protects”). A clan leader in the tribe of SIMEON (1 Chr. 4:36). He is listed among those whose families increased greatly during the days of King HEZEKIAH and who dispossessed the Hamites and Meunites near GEDOR (vv. 38-41).

Jaala. jay´uh-luh (Heb. ya ʿălā ˁ H3606, variant ya ʿălāh H3608, “mountain goat”). Also Jaalah. A servant of SOLOMON whose descendants returned from the EXILE (Ezra 2:56; Neh. 7:58).

Jaalah. See JAALA.

Jaalam. See JALAM.

Jaanai. See JANAI.

Jaar. jay'uhr (Heb. ya ʿar H3625, “forest”). The name of a place that, along with EPHRATHAH, was associated with the ARK OF THE COVENANT (Ps. 132:6; KJV, “the wood”). Jaar is generally regarded as a (poetic) short form of KIRIATH JEARIM (meaning “town of forests”), where the ark remained twenty years before DAVID brought it to JERUSALEM. Some believe that the name was applied to a wooded area in the environs of Kiriath Jearim.

Jaare-Oregim. jay'uh-ree-or'uh-gim (Heb. ya ʿārê ʾōrēgîm H3629, “forests of weavers” [but scribal error suspected]). Father of Elhanan; the latter is described as the killer of GOLIATH the Gittite (2 Sam. 21:19). Jaare-Oregim is apparently called JAIR in the parallel passage (1 Chr. 20:5). For possible solutions to the discrepancies between these two verses, see ELHANAN.

Jareshiah. jay'uh-ree-shi'uh (Heb. ya ʿārešyâ H3631, “Yahweh plants”). KJV Jaresiah. Son of Jeroham and descendant of BENJAMIN; he is listed among the heads of families who lived in JERUSALEM (1 Chr. 8:27).

Jaasau. See JAASU.

Jaasiel. jay-ay'see-uhl (Heb. ya ʿāšî ʾēl H3634, possibly “God makes”). KJV Jasiel. (1) Son of ABNER (SAUL's cousin); he was made an officer over the tribe of BENJAMIN during the reign of DAVID (1 Chr. 27:21).

(2) A MEZOBAITE, mentioned last among David's mighty warriors (1 Chr. 11:47). Some scholars emend “Mezobaite” to “from Zobah.” It has also been suggested, but without good reason, that this Jaasiel is the same as #1 above.

Jaasu. jay'uh-soo (Heb. ya ʿāšû H3632 [Qere ya ʿāšāy], possibly “[God] treats well”). KJV Jaasau. One of the descendants of Bani who agreed to put away their foreign wives (Ezra 10:37).

Jaazaniah. jay-az'uh-ni'uh (Heb. ya ʾāzanyāhû H3280 [with spelling variations], “Yahweh listens”). (1) A military commander identified as “the son of the Maacathite”; he was among the officers who went to MIZPAH to join GEDALIAH, the governor appointed by the Babylonians after the fall of Jerusalem (2 Ki. 25:23; Jer. 40:8 [KJV, NRSV, “Jezaniah”). It is usually thought that Jaazaniah belonged to the family that descended from MAACAH, CALEB's concubine

(1 Chr. 2:48), but there are other possibilities. Some speculate that this is the Jaazaniah whose name is inscribed on a seal discovered in Mizpah.

(2) Son of Jeremiah (not the prophet), a leader of the RECAPITES, whose loyalty to their ancestral precepts the prophet JEREMIAH used as a lesson to his own countrymen (Jer. 35:3).

(3) Son of Shaphan and, apparently, a prominent elder in Jerusalem at the time of the EXILE; he is the only one mentioned by name among the seventy elders of Israel whom EZEKIEL, in a vision, saw offering incense to idols (Ezek. 8:11).

(4) Son of Azzur; he and Pelatiah son of Benaiah were leaders of the people in Jerusalem at the time of the exile, and Ezekiel was commanded to prophesy against their sin (Ezek. 11:1).

Jaazer. See JAZER.

Jaaziah. jay´uh-zí´uh (Heb. ya ʿāziyyāhû H3596, “Yahweh nourishes”). Son of MERARI and grandson of LEVI; he is not mentioned in most of the genealogies (e.g., Exod. 6:19), but only in a list of Levitical families that served during the time of DAVID (1 Chr. 24:26-27). The Hebrew text is difficult, however, and some regard it as a later gloss.

Jaaziel. jay-ay´zee-uhl (Heb. ya ʿāzî ʾēl H3595, “God nourishes”). One of the LEVITES who played the lyre when the ARK OF THE COVENANT was brought to JERUSALEM (1 Chr. 15:18; called AZIEL in v. 20; some also identify him with the first JEIEL listed in 16:5).

Jabal. jay´buhl (Heb. yābāl H3299, possibly “[God] leads” or “wanderer”). First son of LAMECH by ADAH; he was “the father of those who live in tents and raise livestock,” meaning probably that he originated the profession of herding animals, which often required the nomadic lifestyle of constant travel in search of pasture (Gen. 4:20).

The Jabbok River valley looking W.

Jabbok. jab'uhk (Heb. yabbōq H3309, prob. “overflowing”). A river in TRANSJORDAN (Nahr ez-Zerka, “river of blue”), about 60 mi. (96 km.) in length and, next to the YARMUK River, having the greatest drainage area in that region. The Jabbok is a perennial stream, and its average fall is c. 80 ft. (24 m.) per mile, cutting a deep valley or gorge through the E JORDAN Valley escarpment. The source lies in the vicinity of modern Amman (ancient RABBAH of AMMON), from whence it swings eastward and northward, forming a large loop before wending westward to the Jordan Valley. The lower gorge is under sea level to a point 7 mi. (11 km.) E of the rift, at an elevation of more than 2,000 ft. (610 m.) below the GILEAD Plateau to the N and the Amman Plateau to the S. Colorful oleanders line most of its banks in the hill country. After emerging into the Jordan Valley near Tell Deir ʿAlla (prob. biblical SUCCOTH), it meanders across the Ghor before joining the Jordan River near ed-Damiyeh (biblical ADAM). The loop N of Amman formed the W boundary of the Ammonites at the time of the conquest (Num. 21:24), and the contained area was settled by the tribe of GAD. The western part of the river formed a physical and political boundary between the two parts of Gilead (Deut. 3:12, 16; Josh. 12:2-6), and also divided the kingdoms of SIHON and OG. The specific ford referred to in Gen. 32:22 has not been identified.

Jabesh. jay'bish (Heb. yābēš H3314, “dry”). Father of King SHALLUM of Israel, who murdered King ZECHARIAH and usurped the throne (2 Ki. 15:10, 13-14). However, since the name Jabesh (yābēš H3315) is also a short form of JABESH GILEAD, the expression “son of Jabesh” may mean “a native of Jabesh [Gilead].”

Jabesh Gilead. jayˈbish-gilˈee-uhd (Heb. yābēš gil ʿād H3316, “dry place of Gilead”; also referred to simply as yābēš H3315). An important city in N TRANSJORDAN (see GILEAD). It lay a night’s journey across the JORDAN from BETH SHAN (1 Sam. 31:11-12) and was located in the area given to the half-tribe of MANASSEH (Num. 32:33). When the citizens refused to attend the sacred assembly at MIZPAH, an army was sent to destroy them (Jdg. 21:8-15). The city was not destroyed and grew again in power and wealth. During SAUL’s reign over Israel, NAHASH king of AMMON besieged the city. When appealed to for a treaty, Nahash proposed to grant peace only if every able-bodied man had his right eye put out. Granted a seven-day truce, the city sought Saul’s help. Saul killed a pair of oxen and sent the pieces throughout his land, indicating what would happen to those who refused to help in his battle for Jabesh. His army defeated Nahash; the city was saved and the nation reunited (1 Sam. 11:1-15). One of the purposes behind this military aid was to secure wives for Benjamites, since Israel had sworn never to allow Benjamites to marry their daughters (Jdg. 21:1). Later, when Saul’s forces had been routed by the PHILISTINES and he and his sons had been killed, men of Jabesh Gilead rescued their bodies, cremated them, and buried the remains in Jabesh (1 Sam. 31:1-13). After becoming king, DAVID sent thanks for the act (2 Sam. 2:4-6) and had the remains of Saul and JONATHAN exhumed and interred in the tomb of Kish in the land of Benjamin (21:12-14). It is probable that the stream Wadi Yabis received its name from the city. Most scholars identify Jabesh Gilead with Tell el-Maqlub, c. 7 mi. (11 km.) E of the Jordan.

Jabez (person). jayˈbiz (Heb. ya ʿbēš H3584, derivation uncertain). A man in the line of JUDAH noted for his honorable character (1 Chr. 4:9-10). In this passage, the genealogy is interrupted with the following information: “Jabez was more honorable than his brothers. His mother had named him Jabez [ya ʿbēš], saying, ‘I gave birth to him in pain [bē ʿōšeb].’ Jabez cried out to the God of Israel, ‘Oh, that you would bless me and enlarge my territory! Let your hand be with me, and keep me from harm so that I will be free from pain.’ And God granted his request.” (The wordplay on his name requires a transposition of the consonants b and š; the meaning “pain” must be regarded as a popular etymology.) This abrupt introduction of Jabez, who had not previously been mentioned, is puzzling. Some speculate that he may have been a son (or brother) of KOZ (v. 8). A few scholars have further speculated that Jabez was the founder of the town by the same name. See JABEZ (PLACE).

Jabez (place). jayˈbiz (Heb. ya ʿbēš H3583, derivation uncertain). A city in JUDAH, perhaps near BETHLEHEM, occupied by clans of scribes that were descendants of CALEB through HUR and SALMA (1 Chr. 2:55).

Jabin. jay'bin (Heb. yābîn H3296, possibly “perceptive”). (1) King of HAZOR and head of a coalition of Canaanite kings who sought to withstand the Israelites (Josh. 11:1-12). The confederacy of Canaanite princes produced an army “as numerous as the sand on the seashore” (v. 4). JOSHUA’s advance, however, took them by surprise and enabled the Israelites to defeat them. Hazor was then destroyed, and Jabin was put to death along with the other princes of the confederation (vv. 10-12).

(2) A Canaanite king who reigned in Hazor; probably a descendant of #1 above (Jdg. 4:2; some suggest that Jabin was a dynastic title). The IDOLATRY of the Israelites led to their being oppressed by him for twenty years. His armament was extensive, being described as 900 chariots of iron (v. 3). The commander of his forces was SISERA, who seemed to be more prominent in the incident than Jabin the king. The oppression of the Canaanites was overthrown by DEBORAH’s plan. BARAK effected the strategy that resulted in eventual victory (vv. 23-24), which was celebrated in song (Jdg. 5; cf. Ps. 83:9).

Jabneel, Jabneh. jab'nee-uhl, jab'neh (Heb. yabnē ʾēl H3305, “God builds”; short form yabnēh H3306 [2 Chr. 26:6]; Gk. Iamneia [1 Macc. 4:15 et al.]). (1) A town on the S boundary of the tribal territory of NAPHTALI (Josh. 19:33). It is identified with Tell en-Naʿam, 3.5 mi. (5.5 km.) W of the S tip of the Sea of Galilee; the modern village of Yavneel is situated nearby (the Talmudic Jabneel is identified with Kh. Yamma).

(2) A town on the W boundary of the tribal territory of JUDAH, between JOPPA and GAZA, near the coast (Josh. 15:11). It was an important station on the VIA MARIS, and was later also known as Jamnia. The modern town of Yavne (Yebna), c. 13 mi (20 km.) S of Joppa, is located on the site. The only biblical event associated with this city took place in the eighth century B.C., when King UZZIAH, campaigning against the PHILISTINES, “broke down the walls of Gath, Jabneh and Ashdod” (2 Chr. 26:6), thus gaining an access to the sea at the mouth of the Yarkon River. After the OT period, Jamnia was an important SELEUCID military base (1 Macc. 4:15; cf. 10:69; 15:40), and Judas MACCABE razed its port with fire (2 Macc. 12:8-9, 40). In 147 B.C., the Battle of Jamnia was a signal victory for the Jews (1 Macc. 10:69-87). Jamnia is best known as the site of a gathering that supposedly made formal decisions about the canon c. A.D. 90 (see CANONICITY). Some modern scholars speculated that it was at this meeting that the OT canon was officially closed, the Hebrew text standardized, and the breach between Judaism and Christianity formalized. This hypothesis was widely accepted, but rabbinic gatherings of this sort should not be compared with the Christian ecumenical councils that reached decisions binding on the church as a whole. Moreover, there is no evidence that questions about the canon were a major concern when the rabbis met.

Jabneh. See JABNEEL.

Jacan. jayˈkuhn (Heb. ya k̄ān H3602, meaning uncertain). KJV Jachan; TNIV Jakan. Son of Abihail; he was one of seven relatives from the tribe of GAD who occupied the region E of GILEAD (1 Chr. 5:13; cf. v. 10, 14).

Jachan. See JACAN.

Jachin. See JAKIN.

jacinth. See MINERALS.

jackal. See ANIMALS.

Jackal Well. Also Jackal's Well (RSV). A well or spring in JERUSALEM, apparently between the VALLEY GATE and the DUNG GATE (Neh. 2:13 NIV). The rendering "Jackal," however, assumes that the Hebrew tannîn H9490, which means "serpent" or "sea monster," should be read as tannîm (pl. of tan H9478, "jackal"). Others take the word in its usual sense (thus KJV, "dragon well"; NRSV, "Dragon's Spring"). It is common to identify the Jackal (or Dragon) Well with EN ROGEL, a spring about 800 ft. (240 m.) S of the SE ridge of JERUSALEM (thus just below the junction of the HINNOM and KIDRON Valleys). It has also been argued that the reference is to the GIHON SPRING, which follows a serpentine course. Other proposals have been made. See also ZOHELETH, STONE OF.

Jacob. jayˈkuhb (Heb. ya ʿăqōb H3620; possibly "[God] protects," but by popular etymology, "he takes by the heel, supplants, deceives"; (Iakōb G2609, Iakōbos G2610 [see JAMES])). (1) Son of ISAAC and REBEKAH, younger twin brother of ESAU, husband of LEAH and RACHEL. He later was called ISRAEL (Gen. 32:28; 49:2) and thus, through his twelve sons, became the eponymous ancestor of the Israelites. In answer to Isaac's prayer on behalf of his barren wife, Rebekah conceived twins (25:21). An unusual prenatal incident caused her to consult the Lord, who revealed to her that her children would become the founders of two great nations (25:23). An ominous rivalry, begun in the womb, became visible during the birth of the children. Esau came first; Jacob followed at once, holding Esau by the heel, giving Jacob the name "tripper" or "supplanter" (25:25-26). Nothing is revealed about the childhood of the boys. Because of the ancient law of primogeniture (see FIRSTBORN), Isaac naturally favored the older son; but, no doubt because of the revelation from God, Rebekah was partial to Jacob (25:28). Jacob's cunning was revealed in the way he induced Esau to sell his BIRTHRIGHT (25:27-34).

Isaac became old and blind. Sensing that his end was near, he desired to impart the paternal blessing. Esau was still the favorite son, so Isaac asked him to prepare a favorite dish, saying that after eating it he would pronounce the blessing (Gen. 27:1-4). Rebekah overheard the request and took advantage of Isaac's blindness to further her plan to make Jacob first in every way. Jacob, as ambitious as his mother, joined in the plot. A dramatic scene followed (27:6-41). Jacob was dressed in his brother's robe, his mother having skillfully applied goat skins to make his hands and neck hairy like his brother's. Rebekah made a savory dish that Jacob presented to his father. He deliberately lied: (1) "I am Esau your firstborn," and, in reply to Isaac's question about how he had found the game so quickly, (2) "The Lord your God gave me success." Deceived by the odor of Esau's garments and pleased with the food, Isaac gave the firstborn's blessing to Jacob. Esau, on learning of his brother's treachery, wept and begged for another blessing, which was granted. Rebekah, knowing of Esau's vow to kill Jacob, induced Isaac to send Jacob to HARAN to choose a wife from the family of LABAN, Rebekah's brother (27:42—28:5).

On the way to Haran, Jacob camped at LUZ, where he had a vision of a ladder with angels ascending and descending. In his dream he had a promise from the Lord both to inherit the land about him and to have a numerous progeny (Gen. 28:10-15). He recognized that God had been with him, and so he named the place BETHEL, "House of God" (28:16-19), and made a vow to tithe all his further possessions (28:20-22). He met RACHEL at a well in Haran, watered her flock, revealed himself to her, and was soon at home with Laban (29:1-14). His contract to serve seven years for Rachel ended after fourteen years of indentured servitude (29:15-30).

The conflict between Jacob and Esau had its counterpart in the conflict between Rachel and her older sister LEAH, who won favor from God and bore four children: REUBEN, SIMEON, LEVI, and JUDAH (Gen. 29:31-35). Rachel was unable to conceive, and her desire for a son led her to give her maid, BILHAH, to Jacob as a CONCUBINE; Bilhah bore two sons, DAN and NAPHTALI (30:1-8). Leah in turn gave to Jacob her maid, ZILPAH, who bore GAD and ASHER (30:9-13). Later, Leah herself also bore ISSACHAR, ZEBULUN, and finally DINAH (30:17-21). Then God opened Rachel's womb and she bore a son, JOSEPH (30:22-24).

Jacob grew eager to return to his own land. After outwitting Laban in stock-breeding, he made his departure. Rachel, probably to insure her share in Laban's estate, stole the TERAPHIM or family gods (Gen. 31:19). Laban, learning of Jacob's flight, pursued and overtook him at Mount GILEAD, where they settled their differences by a covenant, sealed on a memorial heap called MIZPAH (31:25-55). At MAHANAIM Jacob met God, then sent messengers to Esau in EDOM. The messengers soon returned to report that Esau was near with a formidable force. Jacob went to the Lord in prayer and received assurance that all would be well. That night he wrestled with the angel of the Lord and secured a new name, Israel, or "Prince of God" (32:24-32). The meeting with Esau was emotion-packed (33:1-17).

Jacob then went to SHECHEM and bought land on which he erected an altar named EL ELOHE ISRAEL, "God is the God of Israel" (Gen. 33:18-20). His daughter Dinah was raped at this place, and the men of the city were deceived into thinking that by submitting to CIRCUMCISION they would secure the marriage between Shechem and Dinah (34:1-24). While they were incapacitated by the operation, however, Simeon and Levi killed them and pillaged the city (34:25-31). Jacob fled to Bethel, and later, on the way to EPHRATH, his twelfth son, BENJAMIN, was born; but Rachel died in giving him birth (35:1-20). Jacob continued to live in Canaan, where JOSEPH incurred the ill will of his brothers, was sold to Egyptians, and became servant of Pharaoh's chief ruler (37:1—47:31). Jacob's final act was to call his twelve sons about him, prophesy regarding the future of each one's offspring, and bestow his parting blessing. When he died, he was embalmed, taken by Joseph and a troop of Egyptian soldiers to Canaan, and buried in the Cave of MACHPELAH (49:1—50:13).

(2) Son of Matthan and father of JOSEPH, Mary's husband, listed in Matthew's GENEALOGY OF JESUS CHRIST (Matt. 1:15-16; see also HELI).

Jacob's well.

Jacob's well. Modern Bir Ya'akub is generally recognized to be the well of JACOB mentioned in Jn. 4:6. The plot of ground mentioned in this passage (v. 5) had been purchased by Jacob (Gen. 33:19). The area was later wrested by force from the AMORITES (48:22). The well is near the base of Mount GERIZIM, whose bluffs are referred to by the phrase "this mountain" (Jn. 4:20-21). A narrow opening 4 ft. (1.2 m.) long led from the floor of the vault into the well, which was dug through limestone. According to the Samaritan woman's comment, the well was deep (4:11). Today it is c. 75 ft. (23 m.) deep, but it has probably been filled with much debris over the years since it was dug. There are hardly any sites that have less doubt as to their authenticity than the site of Jacob's well. All traditions agree on this as being the scene described in Jn. 4, and the biblical details fit perfectly. Through the centuries, churches have been built over the well, as various medieval pilgrims have recorded. Today the well is in a cave, or crypt, under the floor of a Greek Orthodox church that has never been finished above the exterior walls. Jacob's well is known for its soft, or light, water that is supplied in two ways: through underground sources that make it a true well and by percolated surface water, which makes it a cistern. This detail may have prompted Jesus' remark about living water (v. 14).

Jada. jay'duh (Heb. yādā ◌ H3360, possibly "[God] has known [i.e., cared]" or "skillful, shrewd"). Son of Onam, grandson of JERAHMEEL, and descendant of JUDAH (1 Chr. 2:28, 32).

Jadah. jay'duh (Heb. yo dâ H3586 [MT ya râ], short form of yêhō addâ H3389, possibly "Yahweh has adorned"). KJV Jarah. Son of Ahaz and descendant of King SAUL through JONATHAN (1 Chr. 9:42 NIV, following some Heb. MSS and LXX; MT, “Jarrah”); called JEHOADDAH in the parallel passage (8:36).

Jadau. See JADDAI.

Jaddai. jad’i (Heb. yadday H3350 [Qere yaddô], derivation uncertain). KJV Jadau. One of the descendants of Nebo who agreed to put away their foreign wives (Ezra 10:43).

Jaddua. jad’yoo-uh (Heb. yaddûa ^c H3348, “known [by Yahweh]”). (1) One of the Israelite leaders who sealed the covenant with NEHEMIAH after the return from the Babylonian captivity (Neh. 10:21). The covenant signified the willingness of the people to abide by the Law of God.

(2) Son of Jonathan (or Johanan) and descendant of JESHUA the high priest (Neh. 12:11, 22).

Jadon. jay’don (Heb. yādôn H3347, possibly “[Yahweh] rules” or “frail one”). A man from Me-ronoth (see MERONOTHITE) who, along with MELATIAH of GIBEON, helped in rebuilding the walls of JERUSALEM (Neh. 3:7). These two individuals are further described as “men from Gibeon and Mizpah,” suggesting that Meronoth and MIZPAH are somehow connected or even that they are two names for the same town.

Jael. jay’uhl (Heb. yā ^c ēl H3605, “mountain goat”). The wife of HEBER the KENITE and slayer of SISERA, a Canaanite commander (Jdg. 4:17-22; 5:6, 24). The Canaanite King JABIN of HAZOR had oppressed Israel for twenty years. The Canaanites had a formidable force of 900 chariots. Under the inspiration of DEBORAH, BARAK formed a large force of Israelites at Mount TABOR to fight the Canaanite army, led by SISERA their general, along the River KISHON. The Israelite assault, probably aided by a storm (5:20-21), routed the Canaanites. Sisera ran away on foot and came to the tent of Jael, who extended him hospitality. She covered him with a rug, and in response to his request for water gave him milk. Then, as Sisera slept, Jael murdered him by hammering a tent peg through his temple into the ground. Jael’s act is celebrated in the ancient Song of Deborah (ch. 5).

Jagur. jay'guhr (Heb. yāgûr H3327, possibly “stone heap”). A town in the NEGEV, the extreme S of the tribal territory of JUDAH, near the border of EDM (Josh. 15:21). Its precise location is unknown.

Jah. jah (Heb. yāh H3363, short form of yhwh). This name, an abbreviation of Yahweh (JEHOVAH), is used in the KJV only once (Ps. 68:4), but the corresponding Hebrew form occurs over forty times (Exod. 15:2; 17:16; Isa. 12:2; 26:4; 38:11; the rest of the occurrences are in Psalms). In all these other passages it is translated “the LORD.”

Jahath. jay'hath (Heb. yahat H3511, perhaps “[God] snatches up”). (1) Son of Reiah and descendant of JUDAH; Jahath's sons, Ahumai and Lahad, and possibly also other relatives, are identified as “the clans of the Zorathites” (1 Chr. 4:2). See ZORAH.

(2) Son of Libni, grandson of GERSHON, and great-grandson of LEVI (1 Chr. 6:20 [NIV, “Jehath,” apparently a misprint]). He is also described as the son (descendant?) of Gershon and as the father of Shimei in a list of ASAPH's ancestors (v. 43), but this may be the result of a scribal error. See SHIMEI #1.

(3) Son of Shimei and descendant of Gershon (1 Chr. 23:10-11).

(4) Son of Shelemoth and descendant of Levi (1 Chr. 24:22).

(5) Descendant of Levi through MERARI and an overseer of the workmen who repaired the temple in the reign of King JOSIAH (2 Chr. 34:12).

Jahaz, Jahzah. jay'haz, jah'zuh (Heb. yahas H3403, variant yahâ H3404, derivation unknown). KJV also Jahaza (Josh. 13:18) and Jahazah (21:36). A city in TRANSJORDAN where SIHON, an AMORITE king, was defeated in a great battle by the Israelites when he refused to allow them to pass through his territory (Num. 21:23; Deut. 2:32; Jdg. 11:20). MOSES assigned the city to the tribe of REUBEN (Josh. 13:18), and it was one of the cities given to the LEVITES descended from MERARI (21:36; 1 Chr. 6:78 [“Jahzah”]). According to the MOABITE STONE, the king of Israel lived in Jahaz while at war with him, but he was driven out, and MESHACH took the city and added it to Moabite territory (see also ATAROTH). The Bible also refers to Jahaz as a city of MOAB (Isa. 15:4; Jer. 48:21 [“Jahzah”], 34). Its precise location is uncertain, although some tentatively identify it with Khirbet el-Medeiyineh, c. 11 mi. (17 km.) SE of MEDEBA.

Jahaziah. See JAHZEIAH.

Jahaziel. juh-hay'zee-uhl (Heb. yahāzî ʾēl H3487, “God sees”). (1) One of the ambidextrous Benjamite warriors who joined DAVID while he was in exile from SAUL at the PHILISTINE city of ZIKLAG (1 Chr. 12:4; cf. v. 2).

(2) One of two priests appointed to blow trumpets before the ARK OF THE COVENANT when David brought it to JERUSALEM (1 Chr. 16:6).

(3) Son of Hebron and descendant of LEVI in the line of KOHATH; contemporary of David (1 Chr. 23:19; 24:23).

(4) Son of Zechariah and descendant of Levi through ASAPH; moved by the Spirit, he encouraged King JEHOSHAPHAT of Judah and his army to fight against the Moabite, Ammonite, and Edomite invaders (2 Chr. 20:14-17).

(5) Descendant of Zattu and father of Shecaniah; the latter was among the family heads that returned to Jerusalem after the EXILE (Ezra 8:5, following some LXX MSS). However, the MT does not include the name Zattu and leaves the connection between Shecaniah and Jahaziel unclear (cf. KJV).

Jahdai. jah'di (Heb. yohdāy H3367, prob. “Yahweh leads”). Apparently a descendant of JUDAH, included in the genealogy of CALEB (1 Chr. 2:47). The genealogical connection is unclear, although probably the reference is to a man descended from Caleb. In the light of the context (cf. vv. 46, 48), some believe however that Jahdai was one of Caleb's CONCUBINES, possibly Ephah.

Jahdiel. jah'dee-uhl (Heb. yahdî ʾēl H3484, “God rejoices” or “may God give joy”). A clan chief of the half-tribe of MANASSEH; he and others are described as “brave warriors, famous men, and heads of their families” (1 Chr. 5:24).

Jahdo. jah'doh (Heb. yahdô H3482, possibly “[God] rejoices”). Son of Buz, descendant of GAD, and ancestor of Abihail; the sons of Abihail and other Gadites occupied the region E of GILEAD (1 Chr. 5:14; cf. v. 10).

Jahleel. jah'lee-uhl (Heb. yahlē ʾēl H3499, “wait for God” or “God shows himself friendly”; gentilic yahlē ʾēlî H3500, “Jahleelite”). Son of ZEBULUN and eponymous ancestor of the Jahleelite clan (Gen. 46:14; Num. 26:26).

Jahmai. jah'mi (Heb. yaḥmay H3503, “[God] protects”). Son (or descendant) of TOLA and grandson (or more distant descendant) of ISSACHAR; he is described as the head of his family, which probably means he was a military officer (1 Chr. 7:2).

Jahweh. See JEHOVAH.

Jahzah. See JAHAZ.

Jahzeel. jah'zee-uhl (Heb. yaḥṣē ʾēl H3505, variant yaḥṣî ʾēl H3507, “God apportions” or “God favors”; gentilic yaḥṣē ʾēlî H3506, “Jahzeelite”). Firstborn son of NAPHTALI, grandson of JACOB, and eponymous ancestor of the Jahzeelite clan (Gen. 46:24 [NIV, “Jahziel”]; Num. 26:48; called “Jahziel” in 1 Chr. 7:13).

Jahzeiah. jah-zee'yah (Heb. yaḥzēyâ H3488, “Yahweh sees”). KJV Jahaziah. Son of Tikvah. When EZRA told the Israelites that those who had married foreign women should divorce their wives, Jahzeiah was one of four men who opposed him (Ezra 10:15). The Hebrew text, however, can be understood to mean that these four men supported Ezra (cf. NJPS). According to some scholars, the Hebrew expression here (lit., “stood upon this”) does indicate opposition (cf. 2 Chr. 20:23 et al.), but what Jahzeiah and the others resisted was the delay proposed by the assembly (Ezra 10:12-14); in other words, the four men favored Ezra's decision and argued for swift punishment.

Jahzerah. jah'zuh-ruh (Heb. yaḥzērâ H3492, possibly “prudent” or “cunning”). Descendant of IMMER and grandfather (or ancestor) of a certain Maasai, who was one of the priests to resettle in JERUSALEM after the EXILE (1 Chr. 9:12); probably the same as AHZAI (Neh. 11:13).

Jahziel. See JAHZEEL.

Jair. jay'uhr (Heb. yâ ʾîr H3281, “[God] gives light”; yâ ʾîr H3600 [only 1 Chr. 20:5; Ketib yâ ʾîr], “[God] stirs”). (1) Descendant (lit., “son”) of MANASSEH who at the time of the conquest of Canaan occupied sixty villages on the border of GILEAD and BASHAN (see also ARGOB); these settlements came to be known as HAVVOTH JAIR (Num. 32:41; Deut. 3:14; Josh. 13:30; 1 Ki. 4:13). According to 1 Chr. 2:21-

23, Jair's father was SEGUB, who descended from JUDAH through HEZRON, but whose mother is described as the daughter of Manasseh's son, MAKIR; thus Jair was apparently regarded as a Manassite through his mother's side.

(2) A Gileadite who judged or led Israel for twenty-two years (Jdg. 10:3-5). He is said to have had thirty sons, each of whom rode a donkey and ruled one of the towns of Havvoth Jair. The connection between this man and #1 above is unclear. It is possible that Jair of Gilead inherited the towns that had been previously under Jair of Segub.

(3) Son of Shimei, descendant of BENJAMIN, and father of MORDECAI, who was the cousin and guardian of ESTHER (Esth. 2:5).

(4) Father of Elhanan, who killed the brother of GOLIATH (1 Chr. 20:5; on the apparent discrepancies between this verse and 2 Sam. 21:19, see ELHANAN).

Jairite. jay'uh-rit (Heb. yā ʾirî H3285, "of Jair"). A gentilic referring apparently to someone who descended from JAIR #1. It is used to identify IRA, a priest (or royal adviser) of DAVID (2 Sam. 20:26).

Jairus. jay-i'ruhs (Gk. Iairos G2608, prob. from Heb. yā ʾîr H3281 [see JAIR]). The name of a SYNAGOGUE official whose dead daughter Jesus raised to life (Mk. 5:22; Lk. 8:41). The incident, which took place near Lake Galilee, is recorded in all three Synoptic Gospels (Mk. 5:21-24, 35-43; Lk. 8:40-42, 49-56; Matt. 9:18-19, 23-26), but the man's name is not given by Matthew. Jairus came to Jesus and implored him to heal his daughter (Mk. 5:22-23), who was twelve years old (cf. v. 42). As they walked toward his house, some men arrived and reported that Jairus's daughter had died, but Jesus said to him, "Don't be afraid; just believe" (v. 36). When they reached the house, Jesus took the girl by the hand and said, "Talitha kum" (ARAMAIC for "Little girl, get up"), and at once she got up and began to walk around (vv. 39-42; see TALITHA CUM).

Jakan. See JAAKAN; JACAN.

Jakeh. jay'kuh (Heb. yāqeh H3681, possibly "prudent" or "[God] preserves"). Father of AGUR, who was the author of sayings recorded in the book of PROVERBS (Prov. 30:1).

Jakim. jay´kim (Heb. yāqîm H3691, “[God] establishes [or takes a stand]”). (1) Son of Shimei and Benjamite family head who lived in Jerusalem in DAVID’s day (1 Chr. 8:19; cf. v. 28).

(2) A priest chosen during the time of David to head the twelfth of the twenty-four courses of priests who took turns serving in the sanctuary (1 Chr. 24:12).

Jakin (person). jay´kin (Heb. yākîn H3520, “[God] establishes”; gentilic yākînî H3522, “Jakinite”). Also Jachin. (1) Son of SIMEON and eponymous ancestor of the Jakinite clan (Gen. 46:10; Exod. 6:15; Num. 26:12; apparently called JARIB in 1 Chr. 4:24).

(2) A leader of the LEVITES, appointed by lot as the head of the twenty-first course of priests during DAVID’s time (1 Chr. 24:17).

(3) One of the priests who lived in JERUSALEM after the EXILE (1 Chr. 9:10; Neh. 11:10). It is possible, however, that the name may here be used as a family name denoting the priests in the twenty-first course, or the division of which Jakin was the head.

Jakin and Boaz. jay´kin, boh´az (Heb. yākîn H3521, “[God] establishes”; bō´az H1245, possibly “in him is strength”). Also Jachin and Boaz. The name of two bronze pillars SOLOMON placed in front of the TEMPLE; the one he placed on the N side was named Boaz, and the one on the S, Jakin (1 Ki. 7:21; 2 Chr. 3:17). Both pillars were beautifully adorned with capitals of lily-work, and their primary purpose appears to have been decorative and symbolic. As gateposts visible to the people (most of whom were not allowed inside), they probably indicated the entrance of the God of Israel into his earthly dwelling.

Jalam. jay´luhm (Heb. ya´lām H3609, derivation uncertain). KJV Jaalam. Son of ESAU by OHOLI-BAMAH; an Edomite chief (Gen. 36:5, 14, 18; 1 Chr. 1:35).

Jalon. jay´lon (Heb. yālôn H3534, derivation uncertain). Son of Ezrah and descendant of JUDAH (1 Chr. 4:17).

Jambres. See JANNES AND JAMBRES.

James. jaymz (Gk. Iakōbos G2610, hellenized form of Iakōb G2609 [see JACOB]; English James derives from Jacomus, an alteration of Latin Jacobus). This name in the NT most frequently refers to James son of ZEBEDEE, one of the original twelve disciples and brother of the apostle John; his early martyrdom (c. A.D. 41) is recorded in Acts 12:1-2. Another James, the brother of Jesus, was not a believer until after the resurrection, but during the 40s he became the leader of the church in JERUSALEM (cf. Acts 15:13-21); he was probably the author of the epistle of James. A third individual named James son of ALPHEUS, was one of the twelve disciples. A certain “James the younger” (Mk. 15:40; KJV, “the less”) is sometimes identified with the son of Zebedee and more often with the son of Alphaeus, but he may be a fourth person with the same name. Finally, the father of the disciple JUDAS (not Iscariot) was named James.

(1) James son of Zebedee. He was a Galilean fisherman whose circumstances we can suppose to have been comfortable (Mk. 1:20; cf. 15:41; Lk. 8:3) and who was called to be one of the twelve disciples at the same time as his brother, JOHN THE APOSTLE (Matt. 4:21; Mk. 1:19-20). It is reasonable to assume that he was older than John, both because he is nearly always mentioned first and because John is sometimes identified as “the brother of James” (Matt. 10:2; 17:1; Mk. 3:17; 5:37). James, John, and Simon (PETER), who were part of a fishing partnership that included ANDREW, Simon’s brother (Lk. 5:10), came to comprise also a trio that attained in some sense a place of primacy among the disciples. They are often found at the center of important events, such as the raising of JAIRUS’s daughter (Mk. 5:37; Lk. 8:51), the TRANSFIGURATION (Matt. 17:1; Mk. 9:2; Lk. 9:28), and Jesus’ agony in the Garden of Gethsemane (Matt. 26:37; Mk. 14:33). It was James and John, moreover, who had earlier accompanied Jesus to the home of Simon and Andrew (Mk. 1:29).

James and John were given by Jesus the name BOANERGES or “Sons of Thunder” (Mk. 3:17), when they were rebuked by the Lord for impetuosity and for having totally misconceived the purpose of his coming. This may have been the result of a suggestion made by them that they should pray for the destruction of a Samaritan village, whose inhabitants had repulsed Jesus’ messengers (Lk. 9:54; cf. Mk. 9:38; Lk. 9:49-50). Their presumption and ill-considered thinking were obvious also when James, after asking with his brother for a place of honor in the kingdom, was told that they would drink the cup their Master was to drink (Mk. 10:35-45; cf. Matt. 20:20-28). The wife of Zebedee was SALOME (Matt. 27:56; cf. Mk. 15:40), who appears to have been a sister of the MARY MOTHER OF JESUS (cf. Jn. 19:25). If this was so, James and John were cousins of Jesus and thus may have felt themselves in a privileged position.

Old photo of men repairing their fishing nets on the shore of the Sea of Galilee. James son of Zebedee worked as a fisherman on these same shores.

The two sons of Zebedee are recorded as having been among those present when the risen Christ appeared to the disciples (Jn. 21), though it is curious to note that James's name is nowhere mentioned in the fourth gospel. We know nothing about James's career after the crucifixion until he was "put to death with the sword" by Herod AGRIPPA I about A.D. 44 (Acts 12:2). James thus became the first of the Twelve whose martyrdom was referred to in the NT. An account attributed to Clement of Alexandria says that when James went on trial for his life, his steadfast testimony led to the conversion of his accuser, who was carried off with him to execution. A much less reliable tradition declares that he preached the gospel in Spain, of which country he is the patron saint.

(2) James, the brother of Jesus. The only two references to him in the Gospels mention him with his brothers Joses, Simon, and Judas (Matt. 13:55; Mk. 6:3). This James may have been, after Jesus, the oldest of the brothers. Some scholars have raised the question whether these were indeed full brothers of Jesus by Mary (a connection that creates difficulty for those who hold the view that Mary remained a virgin), but there seems no good reason to challenge the fact from Scripture. Like the other brothers, James apparently did not accept Jesus' authority during Jesus' earthly life (Jn. 7:5). There is no specific mention of his conversion; he may have been included in the group to which Jesus appeared after the resurrection (1 Cor. 15:7). He became head of the Jewish Christian church at Jerusalem (Acts 12:17; 21:18; Gal. 2:9). Although Jesus had always taught the relative subordination of family ties (Matt. 12:48-50; Mk. 3:33-35; Lk. 8:21), it is hard to believe that James's authority was not somehow strengthened because of his relationship to the Master.

Although this James was not one of the Twelve, some believe that he was regarded as an apostle (cf. Gal. 1:19, but this passage can be interpreted differently). It has been suggested he was a replacement for the martyred son of Zebedee; others infer his apostleship by widening the scope of that term to embrace both the Twelve and “all the apostles” (see the two separate categories cited in 1 Cor. 15:5, 7). Tradition states that James was appointed the first bishop of Jerusalem by the Lord himself and the apostles. What is certain is that he presided over the first Council of Jerusalem, called to consider the terms of admission of Gentiles into the Christian church, and he may have formulated the decree that met with the approval of all his colleagues and was circulated to the churches of ANTIOCH, SYRIA, and CILICIA (Acts 15:19-29).

James evidently regarded his own special ministry as being to the Jews, and his was a mediating role in the controversy that arose in the young church around the place of the LAW for those who had become Christians from both Gentile and Jewish origins. That he continued to have strong Jewish Christian sympathies is apparent from the request made to PAUL when the latter visited Jerusalem for the last time (Acts 21:18-26). This was also the last mention in Acts of James’s career. His name occurs again in the NT as the traditional author of the letter of James, where he describes himself as “a servant of God and of the Lord Jesus Christ” (Jas. 1:1; see JAMES, LETTER OF).

According to Hegesippus (c. A.D. 180), James’s faithful adherence to the Jewish law and his austere lifestyle led to the designation “the just.” It seems clear that he suffered martyrdom; JOSEPHUS places his death in the year 61 when there was a Jewish uprising after the death of FESTUS the procurator and before his successor had been appointed. Jerome refers to a passage in the Gospel of the Hebrews (the fragments of which appear in various patristic writings) that recounts the appearance of the risen Christ to James. In contrast to 1 Cor. 15:7, this apocryphal work claims that this was the first appearance of the Lord after the resurrection. The same writing is alleged to have noted James’s vow to eat no bread from the time of the Last Supper until he had seen the risen Lord. This raises questions, not least about the assumption that James was present at the Last Supper.

(3) James son of Alphaeus. Another of the apostles (Matt. 10:3; Mk. 3:18; Lk. 6:15; Acts 1:13). Nothing is known for certain about him. Since Levi or MATTHEW is also described as “the son of Alphaeus” (Mk. 2:14), he and James may have been brothers. Some scholars identify him with #4 below.

(4) James “the younger.” He was the son of a certain MARY (Matt. 27:56; Mk. 15:40; Lk. 24:10) who might have been the wife (or the daughter) of CLOPAS. Assuming that she was Clopas’s wife, some go on to conclude from a superficial word resemblance that Clopas and Alphaeus are two forms of the same name. This in turn has led on to a suggested identification of James son of Mary with #3 above. The description “the younger” seems to have been given to distinguish him from the son of Zebedee. The word could also signify that he was smaller than his namesake (the Greek word can cover both interpretations). About this James we know nothing more.

(5) James father of Judas. This Judas (not Judas Iscariot, Jn. 14:22) is called T_{HADDAEUS} in Matthew and Mark. The elliptical text in two passages (“Judas of James”—Lk. 6:16; Acts 1:13) has been interpreted in two ways: Judas was the brother (KJV) or, more likely, the son of James.

Overview of JAMES

Author: James, the half-brother of Jesus.

Historical setting: The letter must have been written prior to A.D. 62, the year of James’s martyrdom (some date it as early as A.D. 44, making it the first NT book to be written). It was probably addressed to Jewish Christians who lived in the DISPERSION (unless Jas. 1:1 is to be taken figuratively); they were undergoing trials as well as experiencing spiritual failures.

Purpose: To stress the need for “wisdom from above” (Jas. 3:17) and for works of obedience that demonstrate the genuineness of saving FAITH.

Contents: Wisdom amid trials and temptations (Jas. 1:1-18); being doers of the word and not merely hearers (1:19—2:26); dangers of the tongue, quarrels, and slander (3:1—4:12); depending on God and enduring with patience and prayer (4:13—5:20).

James, Letter of. The first of the CATHOLIC EPISTLES of the NT. This letter is among the last to have become firmly established in the NT canon (see CANONICITY). While traces of it seem to be found in the writings of the APOSTOLIC FATHERS (A.D. 90-155), the oldest author to mention it by name is Origen (early 3rd cent.), who considers it canonical, although he is aware that its canonicity is not universally acknowledged. Eusebius (early 4th cent.) lists it among the disputed books but says it is read in most churches. In the East the church accepted it from a very early period, but in the West it was not received into the canon until the end of the fourth century.

The author of the letter refers to himself as “James, a servant of God and of the Lord Jesus Christ” (Jas. 1:1). The NT mentions five who bore the name of JAMES. Tradition attributes the authorship of the letter to James the brother of the Lord, who was probably favored with a special appearance of the risen Christ (1 Cor. 15:7) and who from a very early date occupied a leading position in the church at JERUSALEM (Acts 12:17; Gal. 1:19). PAUL names him first among the three “pillars” (Gal. 2:9). In Acts 15 he is described as the leader and chief spokesman of the Apostolic Council. All that is known of him shows that he was highly esteemed not only by Christians but also by unbelieving Jews. According to JOSEPHUS, he was put to death by the high priest in the interregnum between the death of FESTUS and the arrival of his successor Albinus in A.D. 62.

All the characteristics of the letter support the traditional attribution of it to James the brother of the Lord. The author speaks with the authority of one who knew he did not need to justify or defend his position. There is no more Jewish book in the NT than this letter; and this is to be expected from a man whom both tradition and the rest of the NT show was distinguished by his Jewish commitments. The whole of the letter, moreover, bears a striking resemblance to the SERMON ON THE MOUNT, both in the loftiness of its morality and in the simple grandeur of its expression.

Babylonian design of a horse with a bit and bridle. James compares the power of the tongue to the power of the bit placed into the mouth of a horse to guide it (Jas. 3:3).

The letter is addressed to “the twelve tribes scattered among the nations.” This ambiguous expression may be interpreted in a number of ways: (1) The Jews of the Diaspora (DISPERSION) in general, who were living throughout the Mediterranean world outside Palestine. This meaning is impossible, for the writer is addressing Christians (Jas. 1:18, 25; 2:1, 12; 5:7-9). (2) The Jewish Christians of the Diaspora. (3) The Christian church as the new people of God living far from their heavenly homeland. Early Christians regarded themselves as the true Israel (Gal. 6:16), the true circumcision (Phil. 3:3), and the seed of Abraham (Rom. 4:16; Gal. 3:29), so it would not be surprising if they also thought of themselves as “the twelve tribes.” There is no doubt, however, that the letter is intended for Jewish Christians, although its message is applicable to all believers. Those to whom the author writes worship in synagogues (Jas. 2:2), and some have claimed that the faults he attacks were characteristic of Jews: misuse of the tongue (3:2-12; 4:2, 11), unkind judgments of one’s neighbors (3:14; 4:11), the making of rash oaths (5:12), undue regard for wealth (2:1-13), etc. On the other hand, there is no mention of specifically pagan vices—e.g., idolatry, drunkenness, and impurity—against which Paul so often warns Gentile Christians. The object of the author was to rebuke and correct the error and sins into which his readers had fallen and to encourage them in the heavy trials through which they were going.

The scholars who consider this letter the work of James the brother of the Lord do not agree on the date when it was written. Two views are held, one that it was composed shortly before the death of James, in the early A.D. 60s; the other, that it appeared in the middle 40s, before the Apostolic Council. In favor of the early date are the striking simplicity of church organization and discipline, the fact that Christians still met in the synagogue (Jas. 2:2), and the general Judaic tone. All this is thought to suggest a time before Gentiles were admitted into the church in any large numbers. Scholars who prefer the later date say that the letter gives evidence of a considerable lapse of time in the history of the church, at least enough to allow for a decline in the spiritual fervor that characterized the church in early apostolic times. The readers are obviously not recent converts. The author has a position of long-established authority. The references to persecutions, moreover, fit a later date better than an early one.

The informal character of the letter makes a logical analysis difficult. It is not a formal treatise, but a loosely related series of exhortations, warnings, and instructions, all dealing with the moral and religious life. The author rules authoritatively on questions of church life and discipline that have been brought to his attention.

After the address (Jas. 1:1), James first admonishes his readers on having a right attitude toward tribulations and temptations (1:2-18) and exhorts them to be doers and not merely hearers of the Word of God (1:19-25). He forbids them to slight the poor and favor the rich (2:1-13) and shows them the insufficiency of faith without works (2:14-26). He then warns them against the misuse of the tongue (3:1-12) and sets forth the nature of true and false wisdom (3:13-18).

He rebukes them for their greed and lust (4:1-12) and for making foolhardy plans for the future in business (4:13-17). The letter closes with a warning to the godless rich (5:1-6), an exhortation to patience in suffering (5:7-12), a reminder of the power of prayer in every need (5:13-18), and a declaration of the joy of Christian service (5:19-20).

The section on FAITH and WORKS (2:14-26) is not a polemic against Paul's doctrine of JUSTIFICATION by faith, but a rebuke of the prevalent Jewish notion that saving faith is mere intellectual assent to a set of doctrinal propositions. James points out that saving faith manifests itself in works, and that if the works are not there, the genuineness of the faith may be questioned. Paul and James are in perfect harmony in their views of the relationship of faith and works to salvation.

Jamin. jay'min (Heb. yāmîn H3546, "valued, fortunate"; gentilic yāmînî H3547, "Jaminite"). (1) Son of SIMEON, grandson of JACOB, and eponymous ancestor of the Jaminite clan (Gen. 46:10; Exod. 6:15; Num. 26:12; 1 Chr. 4:24).

(2) Son of RAM, grandson of JERAHMEEL, and descendant of JUDAH (1 Chr. 2:27).

(3) A LEVITE who helped EZRA instruct the people in the law (Neh. 8:7).

Jamlech. jam'lik (Heb. yamlēk H3552, "[God] grants dominion"). A clan leader in the tribe of SIMEON (1 Chr. 4:34). He is listed among those whose families increased greatly during the days of King HEZEKIAH and who dispossessed the Hamites and Meunites near GEDOR (vv. 38-41).

Jamnia. See JABNEEL #2.

Janai. jay'ni (Heb. yaʿnay H3614, "[God] answers"). KJV Jaanai. A leader in the tribe of GAD in BASHAN, listed as third in importance (1 Chr. 5:12; some take the next name, "Shaphat," as a common noun, thus, "and Janai a judge in Bashan" [see SHAPHAT #4]).

Janim. jay'nim (Heb. yānîm H3565, derivation uncertain). KJV Janum. A town allotted to the tribe of JUDAH in the hill district of HEBRON (Josh. 15:53); the location is unknown, although one proposed identification is modern Beni Naṣim, c. 4 mi. (6 km.) E of Hebron.

Janna. See J_{ANNAI}.

Jannai. jan'í (Gk. Iannai G2613). KJV Janna. Son of a certain Joseph, included in Luke's GENEALOGY OF JESUS CHRIST (Lk. 3:24).

Jannes and Jambres. jan'iz, jam'briz (Gk. Iannēs G2614 and Iambrēs G2612). The traditional names of Egyptian sorcerers who opposed MOSES before PHARAOH (2 Tim. 3:8, evidently a reference back to unnamed magicians mentioned in Exod. 7:11-12, 22). Jannes and Jambres is also the title of a pseudepigraphic work, and these names (or Jannes and Mambres) are found frequently not only in Jewish tradition, but also in pagan and early Christian literature.

Janoah. juh-noh'uh (Heb. yānôah H3562, “resting place”). (1) A town on the E border of the tribal territory of EPHRAIM (Josh. 16:6-7; KJV, “Janohah”); it is generally identified with Khirbet Yanun (c. 6.5 mi./10.5 km. SE of SHECHEM) or with the nearby town of Yanun.

(2) One of five cities in N Israel captured by TIGLATH-PILESER, king of Assyria (2 Ki. 15:29). Among several proposals, the most likely identifications are two places, both of which are now known as Yanuh. One of them is c. 6 mi. (10 km.) E of TYRE; the other, much farther S, is c. 11 mi. (18 km.) NE of ACCO.

Janum. See J_{ANIM}.

Japheth. jay'fith (Heb. yepet H3651, possibly “spacious” or “[God] enlarges”). Son of NOAH. In most of the passages referring to him (Gen. 5:32; 6:10; 7:13; 9:18; 10:1; 1 Chr. 1:4), Japheth is listed as the third of Noah's sons. However, one passage (Gen. 9:24; cf. v. 22) seems to indicate that HAM was the youngest. An additional statement (Gen. 10:21) has also been construed to support the idea that Japheth was the second son rather than the third. Japheth and his wife were saved in the ark (7:7). Japheth aided his brother SHEM in covering the naked body of their drunken father (9:20-23). The blessing pronounced upon Japheth by Noah (9:27) carried with it the idea that his descendants would be greatly multiplied (enlarged) in the future. The Table of Nations recorded in ch. 10 indicates that Japheth became the ancestor of a wide-ranging family of peoples, whose homes lay to the N of PALESTINE and then W. In fact, fourteen nations of Japhethites are listed in that chapter. The area of their occupation ranged all the way from the smelting plants of TARSHISH (prob. in Spain) on the W to the Caspian Sea on the E. This included what is now the steppes of S Russia, much of ASIA MINOR, the islands of the MEDITERRANEAN, and the coasts of S Europe. Japheth is said to be the father of Gomer, Magog, Madai, Javan, Tubal, Meshech, and Tiras (Gen. 10:2; 1 Chr. 1:4). These appear to be the progenitors of the Indo-European (Caucasian) family of nations.

Japhia (person). juh-fi'uh (Heb. yāpî'a H3644, possibly “high, tall” or “[God] shines forth”). (1) A king of LACHISH who formed a league with four other AMORITE kings to punish GIBEON for submitting to the Israelites (Josh. 10:3-5). JOSHUA defeated them in battle at BETH HORON, killed the five kings, and cast their bodies into a cave (10:6-27).

(2) One of the sons of DAVID born at JERUSALEM (2 Sam. 5:15; 1 Chr. 3:7; 14:6). All that is known of him is that his mother was a wife, not a CONCUBINE, of David.

Japhia (place). juh-fi'uh (Heb. yāpî'a H3643, possibly “high, tall” or “[God] shines forth”). A town on the S border of the tribal territory of ZEBULUN (Josh. 19:13). It is usually identified with modern Yafa, c. 1.5 mi. (2.5 km.) SW of NAZARETH, but without archaeological support.

Japhlet. jaf'lit (Heb. yaplēṯ H3646, “[God] delivers”). Son of Heber and descendant of ASHER (1 Chr. 7:32-33). See also JAPHLETITE.

Japhleti. See JAPHLETITE.

Japhletite. jaf'luh-tit (Heb. yaplēṯ H3647, gentilic of yaplēṯ H3646). KJV Japhleti. A clan or larger people group whose territory, near BETH HORON, served to mark the S border of the tribe of EPHRAIM (Josh. 16:3). It is possible that they were descendants of JAPHLET, an Asherite, but nothing is known about them.

Japho. See JOPPA.

jar. See PITCHER.

Jarah. See J_{ADAH}.

Jareb. jair'ib (Heb. yārēb H3714, derivation disputed). According to the KJV, Jareb is the name of an Assyrian king (Hos. 5:13; 10:6). There is however no evidence, linguistically or historically, of an Assyrian king by that name. Most scholars believe that the Hebrew text parallels the common Assyrian phrase, šarru rabū, “the great king” (cf. NIV and other modern versions).

Jared. jair'id (Heb. yered H3719, derivation disputed; Gk. Iaret G2616). Son of Mahalalel and father of E_{NOCH} (Gen. 5:15-20; 1 Chr. 1:2 [KJV, “Jered”]); his name is included in Luke's GENEALOGY OF JESUS CHRIST (Lk. 3:37).

Jaresiah. See J_{AARESHIAH}.

Jarha. jahr'huh (Heb. yarḥā H3739, meaning unknown). An Egyptian servant belonging to S_{HESHAN} (1 Chr. 2:34-35). Jarha married Sheshan's daughter (prob. A_{HLAI}, v. 31) and thus was included in the genealogy of J_{ERAHMEEL}. Some speculate that by this action Sheshan, who had no sons, made Jarha his heir (cf. E_{LIEZER}, Gen. 15:2-3).

Jarib. jair'ib (Heb. yārīb H3743, “[Yahweh] contends [for me]”). (1) Son of S_{IMEON} (1 Chr. 4:24; apparently called J_{AKIN} in Gen. 46:10; Exod. 6:15; Num. 26:12).

(2) One of a group of leaders sent by E_{ZRA} to I_{DDO} to get attendants for the house of God (Ezra 8:16).

(3) A descendant of J_{ESHUA} son of Jozadak, listed among the priests in Ezra's time who agreed to put away their foreign wives (Ezra 10:18).

Jarmuth. jahr'muhth (Heb. yarmût H3754, “swelling [of the ground], height”). (1) A city in the S_{HEPHELAH} whose king, P_{IRAM}, entered into a conspiracy with four other A_{MORITE} kings against the G_{IBEONITES} to revenge their submission to Joshua (Josh. 10:3-5). J_{OSHUA} defeated the five kings at G_{IBEON} and slew them at M_{AKKEDAH} (vv. 9-26; cf. 12:11). After the conquest of Canaan, Jarmuth was assigned to the tribe of J_{UDAH} (15:35). Some Jews returned there after the Babylonian exile (Neh. 11:29). Jarmuth is tentatively identified with modern Khirbet el-Yarmuk (Tell Yarmut), c. 17 mi. (27 km.) WSW of JERUSALEM, even though there is no archaeological confirmation.

(2) A city within the tribal territory of ISSACHAR allotted to the LEVITE clans descended from GERSHON (Josh. 21:29). In other lists Jarmuth is apparently called REMETH (19:21) and RAMOTH (1 Chr. 6:73). The site is tentatively identified with Kaukab el-Hawa (Hellenistic Agrippina, c. 6 mi. /10 km. NNE of BETH SHAN); on this imposing location above the JORDAN Valley, the Crusaders built the Belvoir castle.

The Beth Horon ridge looking W into the Valley of Aijalon. Joshua chased the fleeing Amorite forces down this ridge, scoring a great victory for Israel (Josh. 10). The events of this memorable day, when “the sun stood still,” were also summarized in the Book of Jashar.

Jaroah. juh-roh’uh (Heb. yārôah H3726, “soft” or “pitied”). Son of Gilead, descendant of GAD, and ancestor of Abihail; the sons of Abihail and other Gadites occupied the region E of GILEAD (1 Chr. 5:14; cf. v. 10).

Jashar, Book of. jay’suhr (Heb. yāšār H3839, “upright”). KJV Jasher. An ancient writing, no longer extant, mentioned twice in the OT (Josh. 10:13; 2 Sam. 1:18). On the basis of the material preserved in these passages, it has been inferred that the book was poetical in nature and that it contained songs of a national character. The references to the book imply that it was well known and respected, and consequently it may have been the source for other material found in the OT (perhaps, e.g., the songs of MIRIAM and DEBORAH in Exod. 15:21 and Jdg. 5). The origin of this document is a matter of speculation, but many scholars believe that it was the result of a gradual compilation begun in the early period of Israel’s history.

Jashen. jay´shuhn (Heb. yāšēn H3826, possibly “sleepy”). The father of two or more unnamed warriors included among DAVID’s Thirty (2 Sam. 23:32). It is widely thought, however, that the unusual MT reading here (“the sons of Jashen,” without naming them) has suffered textual corruption. The parallel passage reads, “the sons of Hashem the Gizonite” (1 Chr. 11:34). Many scholars argue that the original reading was “Jashen the Gizonite.” See GIZONITE; HASHEM.

Jasher. See JASHAR, BOOK OF.

Jashobeam. juh-shoh´bee-uhm (Heb. yāšāb ʿām H3790, “the people [or the father’s relative] has returned”). (1) A Hacmonite (lit., “son of HACMONI”) and chief of DAVID’s officers who killed 300 men in one battle (1 Chr. 17:11). The parallel passage (2 Sam. 23:8), which has very likely suffered textual corruption, speaks of “Josheb-Basshebeth, a Tahkemonite,” chief of the Three, who slew 800 men in one battle. The Hebrew words for 300 and 800 begin with the same letter, making a copyist’s error possible. Many scholars, following the SEPTUAGINT, think that the original name was Ish-Baal (ISH-BOSHETH arising when the Heb. word for “shame” was substituted for the hated name BAAL) and that both Jashobeam and Josheb-Basshebeth are later scribal corruptions.

(3) Son of Zabdiel, descendant of PEREZ, and a commander in charge of the division for the first month during the reign of David (1 Chr. 27:2-3). Because most of the other commanders listed in this chapter are also mentioned in ch. 11, many believe this Jashobeam is the same as #1 above; if so, it is unclear why one passage describes him as “son of Hacmoni” and the other as “son of Zabdiel” (possibly the former designation refers to the larger clan or is used as some kind of title).

(2) One of several Korahite warriors who joined David at ZIKLAG (1 Chr. 12:6; cf. vv. 1-2). Since apparently he was a LEVITE from the family of KORAH, he probably should not be identified with #1 above. Some argue, however, that the reference is to a different Korah or even to a locality in the tribe of BENJAMIN.

Jashub. jay´shuhb (Heb. yāšûb H3793, possibly “[God] returns”; gentilic yāšûbî H3795, “Jashubite”). (1) Son of ISSACHAR and eponymous ancestor of the Jashubite clan (Num. 26:24; 1 Chr. 7:1). In another passage (Gen. 46:13) the MT has yôb, and this reading is followed by the KJV (“Job”), the RSV (“Iob”), and other versions; on the basis of some Greek MSS, the Samaritan Pentateuch, and the biblical parallels, the NIV and NRSV read “Jashub” here as well.

(2) One of the descendants of Bani who agreed to put away their foreign wives (Ezra 10:29).

Jashubi Lehem. juh-shoo´buh-lee´hem (Heb. yāšubî lehem H3788). An otherwise unknown place ruled by descendants of JUDAH (1 Chr. 4:22 NIV; the KJV interprets it as the name of a person). The Hebrew text is difficult, however, and the NRSV, with a minor emendation, translates, “who married into Moab but returned to Lehem.” But a place by the name of Lehem is also unknown, so other emendations have been proposed.

Jasiel. See JAASIEL.

Jason. jay´suhn (Gk. Iasōn G2619, “healing”) (1) Son of Simon II and brother of the high priest ONIAS III; by bribery he secured the high priestly office for himself, and through his influence Greek customs became popularized (2 Macc. 4:7-26). He gave large gifts for the sacred games at TYRE honoring Hercules (4:16-20). His tenure was only three years (174-171 B.C.), for he was supplanted by MENELAUS, who offered ANTIOCHUS IV Epiphanes a greater bribe. Jason fled to the AMMONITES, but a false rumor of Antiochus’s death in Egypt brought him back to JERUSALEM with a large following to overthrow Menelaus. Antiochus returned to wreak vengeance on the Jews; and Jason again fled to Ammon, then to Egypt, and later to Sparta, where he died (5:1-10).

A Jewish Christian of THESSALONICA who was probably host to the missionaries PAUL and SILAS. He and others were summoned to court on a charge of being hospitable to seditionists, but freedom was obtained by giving security for good conduct (Acts 17:5-9). See also #3, below.

(2) One of two or three “relatives” of Paul (the others being SOSIPATER and possibly LUCIUS) who sent greetings to the Christians in Rome (Rom. 16:21). According to many scholars, however, the Greek term syngenēs G5150 here means “kinsman” (cf. RSV) and should be understood in the sense of “fellow-Jew” (cf. 9:3). In either case, this Jason is possibly the same as #1 above. Some have speculated that he became a travel companion of Paul and thus was with him in CORINTH when the letter to the ROMANS was written.

jasper. See MINERALS.

Jathniel. jath´nee-uhl (Heb. yatnî ʾēl H3853, derivation uncertain). Fourth son of Meshelemiah and descendant of KORAH; like his father, he and his brothers were Levitical gatekeepers in the time of DAVID (1 Chr. 26:2).

Jattir. jat´uhr (Heb. yattîr H3848, possibly “extraordinary”). A town in the hill country within the tribal territory of JUDAH (Josh. 15:48); it was allotted to the LEVITES (21:14; 1 Chr. 6:57). DAVID sent spoil from ZIKLAG to it after his victory over the AMALEKITES (1 Sam. 30:27). It is identified with modern Khirbet ʿAttir, c. 13 mi. (21 km.) SW of HEBRON.

Javan. jay´vuhn (Heb. yāwān H3430, from Gk. Iōnes). Son of JAPHETH, grandson of NOAH, and father of ELISHAH, TARSHISH, KITTIM, and RODANIM (Gen. 10:2, 4; 1 Chr. 1:5, 7). The name corresponds etymologically to Ionia. As such it is used in the prophets to denote the descendants of Javan in Ionia proper (W coast of ASIA MINOR) but also in GREECE and MACEDONIA; thus the NIV renders the name “Greece” or “Greeks” in these books. In Isa. 66:19 Javan, in conjunction with TARSHISH, LUD, PUT, and TUBAL, is spoken of as one of the far-off nations to whom messengers will be dispatched to tell of Yahweh’s glory and the restoration of Jerusalem; the nations mentioned seem to represent the far western edge of the known world in the OT. In Ezek. 27:13 Javan is included as one of the contributors to the wealth of TYRE; it is grouped with TUBAL and MESHECH as traders of slaves and bronze (cf. Joel 3:6; Zech. 9:13). The book of Daniel identifies Javan with ALEXANDER THE GREAT’s Greco-Macedonian empire (Dan. 8:21; 10:20; 11:2). Javan occurs also in the Hebrew text of Ezek. 27:19 (cf. above on v. 13), but the context seems to demand a location in ARABIA rather than in the W (the SEPTUAGINT has “wine,” thought by some to represent the original Hebrew text).

javelin. See ARMS, ARMOR.

jaw. This English term is commonly the rendering of Hebrew lēḥ H4305, used often of animals (e.g., the “jowls” of a bull or sheep, Deut. 18:3; a donkey’s “jawbone,” Jdg. 15:15-17), but also with reference to the “face” or “cheek” of people (e.g., 1 Ki. 22:24; Job 16:10). Several occurrences are figurative uses (e.g., Isa. 30:28; Ezek. 29:4). See also CHEEK.

Jazer. jay'zühr (Heb. ya ʿzêr H3597, “[God] helps”). KJV also Jaazer. An AMORITE city in GILEAD. There are a dozen biblical references to it, usually as a “city” (e.g., Josh. 21:39), but once as a “land” (Num. 32:1) and once as a “territory” (Josh. 13:25). Jazer was taken by MOSES (Num. 21:32), then settled and fortified by the tribe of GAD. It bordered Ammonite territory (21:24) and was one of the four towns of Gad given to the LEVITES (Josh. 21:39). Some of DAVID’S most able men came from Jazer (1 Chr. 26:31), and his census takers reached it (2 Sam. 24:5). Following the death of AHAB, it was captured by the Moabites (cf. Isa. 16:9; Jer. 48:32). The identification of Jazer has been much disputed. The most likely proposals are Khirbet es-Sar (c. 6 mi./10 km. W of modern Amman) and Khirbet Jazzir (c. 7 mi./11 km. WNW of es-Sar, at the head of Wadi Shuʿeib).

Jaziz. jay'ziz (Heb. yāzîz H3467, meaning uncertain). A HAGRITE who was in charge of King DAVID’S flocks (1 Chr. 27:31; NRSV, v. 31).

jealousy. This English term is used in Bible versions to render several words, primarily Hebrew qîn ʾâ H7863 (Num. 5:14 et al.) and Greek zēlos G2419 (Acts 5:17 et al.). In each case it seems to indicate an ardor or zeal for something believed to belong properly to one. The term may refer both to a favorable or appropriate variety of this ardor, and to an improper form of it. When jealousy reflects concern for God’s honor and glory, it is proper and good. Thus, God himself is several times described as jealous for his honor, his holy name. He desires fervently that his due status and honor be preserved, that the WORSHIP that belongs to him should be given to him. The analogy frequently used is a husband’s concern for the love of his wife. This is an expression of the HOLINESS of God, which cannot endure any unfaithfulness. Just as a husband is not indulgent of adultery on the part of his wife, so no infidelity is permitted by God. It was this exclusiveness of concern that underlay the strong emphasis upon monotheistic worship among the Jews. Because Yahweh is the only true God, he alone is deserving of human worship and devotion (cf. Exod. 32; Jn. 14:6; et al.).

Another meaning or application of the word and concept of jealousy is negative in its effect and is strongly condemned by God. It is excessive concern for one’s own self, and what one fancies or desires. It may also involve resentment of the good fortune of another. It is an inordinate self-centeredness or possessiveness (Gen. 37:34; 1 Sam. 18:6-9; Lk. 15:25-30). Jealousy that involves an improper inward feeling toward another person is SIN in itself, because Jesus said that thoughts and attitudes constitute sin, even without overt acts (Matt. 5:21-31). In addition, jealousy is often the motive for sinful actions. The antidote to jealousy is perfect LOVE. Because love is not self-seeking (1 Cor. 13:5), it does not go beyond its rightful claims. This love, the Scripture teaches, is of divine origin and consequently must come from above.

jealousy, water of. See BITTER WATER.

Jearim. jee´uh-rim (Heb. yē ʿārîm H3630, “woods”). The name of a mountain or mountain ridge on the N border of the tribe of JUDAH (Josh. 15:10). The text identifies or associates Mount Jearim with KESALON, which was apparently the name of a border town. See also SEIR.

Jeaterai. See JEATHERAI.

Jeatherai. jee-ath´uh-ri (Heb. yē ʾātray H3290). KJV Jeaterai. Son of Zerah and descendant of LEVI through GERSHON (1 Chr. 6:21).

Jeberechiah. See JEBEREKIAH.

Jeberekiah. ji-ber´uh-ki´uh (Heb. yēberekyāhû H3310, “Yahweh blesses”). Also Jeberechiah. Father of a certain Zechariah who was called upon by ISAIAH as a witness of his prophecy against DAMASCUS and SAMARIA (Isa. 8:2).

Jebus. jee´buhs (Heb. yēbûs H3293). The name by which JERUSALEM was known while occupied by the JEBUSITES (Josh. 15:63; Jdg. 19:10; 1 Chr. 11:4). Small in area compared with the size of Jerusalem in SOLOMON’s time, Jebus was taken from the Jebusites by DAVID and made the capital of ISRAEL (2 Sam. 5:1-9). Its citadel was the stronghold of ZION (1 Chr. 11:5).

Jebusite. jeb´yoo-sit (Heb. yēbûsî H3294). KJV also Jebusi. The Jebusites were a Canaanite tribe descended from CANAAN and dwelling in the land before the Israelite conquest (Gen. 10:15-16; Exod. 3:8, 17; Deut. 7:1; 20:17; Josh. 3:10; 10:1-5; Jdg. 1:8). Their king, ADONI-ZEDEK, was one of the five who conspired against GIBEON and was killed by JOSHUA. The Jebusites lived many years at the site of JERUSALEM (JEBUS) and were not dislodged until DAVID sent JOAB and his men into the city (2 Sam. 5:6-7). David then bought the threshing floor of ARAUNAH (or Ornan) the Jebusite as a site for the temple (24:18-25). This large flat rock where the altar of burnt offering stood is now said to be visible in the Dome of the Rock (Mount MORIAH) at Jerusalem.

The ancient city of Jebus was located on the V-shaped ridge descending S into the valley in front of what is now known as the temple mount. (View to the NE up the Kidron Valley, with the Mt. of Olives in the background.)

Jecoliah. jek´uh-li´uh (Heb. yēkālyāhû H3525, yēkālyâ H3524, “Yahweh is [or proves himself] able, powerful”). TNIV Jekoliah. Mother of King Azariah (UZZIAH) of Judah (2 Ki. 15:2 [KJV, “Jecholiah”]; 2 Chr. 26:3 [ASV, “Jechiliah”]).

Jeconiah. jek´uh-ni´uh (Heb. yēkānyāhû H3527 [only Jer. 24:1], yēkānyâ H3526, “Yahweh supports” or “may Yahweh establish”; Gk. Iechonias G2651).

Also Jechoniah; KJV NT Jechonias. Alternate name of JEHOIACHIN, king of Judah (1 Chr. 3:16-17; Esth. 2:6; Jer. 24:1; 27:20; 28:4; 29:2; Matt. 1:11-12).

Jedaiah. ji-day'yuh (Heb. yēdāyâ H3355 [only #1 and #5 below], "Yahweh has favored"; yēda'yâ H3361, "Yahweh has known"). (1) Son of Shimri and descendant of SIMEON (1 Chr. 4:37); included in the genealogy of Ziza, a clan leader.

(2) Chief of the second division of priests as appointed by DAVID (1 Chr. 24:7). Possibly the ancestor of the 973 priests (of the family of JESHUA) who returned from the EXILE (Ezra 2:36; Neh. 7:39).

(3) One of the priests who returned from the exile (1 Chr. 9:10; Neh. 11:10; 12:6); Uzzi became head of Jedaiah's priestly family (12:19). There may be a connection between this Jedaiah and #2 above.

(4) Evidently another (but less important) priest of the same name, since he is included in two of the same lists as #3 above (Neh. 12:7, 21).

(5) Son of Harumaph; he made repairs on the wall of JERUSALEM opposite his house (Neh. 3:10).

(6) One of a group of Jewish exiles who brought gold and silver from BABYLON to help those who had returned under ZERUBBABEL; from these gifts a crown was to be made for Joshua (JESHUA) the high priest (Zech. 6:10).

Jediael. ji-di'ay-uhl (Heb. yēdî'ā'ēl H3356, "known of God"). (1) Son (or descendant) of BENJAMIN (1 Chr. 7:6, 10-11).

(2) Son of Shimri; he and his brother Joha the Tizite were among DAVID's mighty warriors (1 Chr. 11:45).

(3) A military leader from the tribe of MANASSEH who defected from SAUL and joined David at ZIKLAG (1 Chr. 12:20); some have suggested that he may be the same as #2 above.

(4) Son of Meshelemiah and descendant of KORAH; like his father, he and his brothers were Levitical gatekeepers in the time of DAVID (1 Chr. 26:2).

Jedidah. ji-di'duh (Heb. yēdîdâ H3352, "beloved [of God or Yahweh]"). Daughter of Adaiah and mother of JOSIAH, king of Judah (2 Ki. 22:1).

Jedidiah. jed'uh-di'uh (Heb. yēdîdyāh H3354, "beloved of Yahweh"). The name God gave, through the prophet NATHAN, to SOLOMON when he was born, because “the LORD loved him” (2 Sam. 12:25; lit., “for the sake of the LORD”). The giving of this second name—which appears to be related to that of DAVID and does not occur elsewhere in the Bible—has caused considerable debate. One proposal is that Jedidiah was his initial name and that Solomon was a throne name David gave to him in anticipation of the child’s future rule in Jerusalem; others argue that Jedidiah was the throne name.

Jeduthun. ji-dyoo´thuhn (Heb. yēdūtûn H3349, possibly derived from yādāh H3344, “to praise, thank”). (1) A Levitical musician in the time of DAVID who, with HEMAN, was “responsible for the sounding of the trumpets and cymbals and for the playing of the other instruments for sacred song” (1 Chr. 16:41-42; he is also called a royal seer, 2 Chr. 35:15). His sons, along with the sons of Heman and ASAPH, were set aside “for the ministry of prophesying, accompanied by harps, lyres and cymbals” (1 Chr. 25:1-6). He is usually thought to be the same as Ethan, which may have been an earlier name of his (6:44); see ETHAN #4. The name appears repeatedly in connection with TEMPLE music at important occasions (2 Chr. 5:12; 29:14; 35:15). The family continued to officiate after the EXILE (Neh. 11:17). The phrase “for Jeduthun” (NRSV, “according to Jeduthun”) is found in the titles of Ps. 39; 62; 77. What the connection may be with David’s musician is unclear; some believe it refers to an instrument or to a tune.

(2) Father of OBED-EDOM, who was a gatekeeper (1 Chr. 16:38). It is often taken for granted that he is the same as #1 above, but some argue that insofar as the Obed-Edom mentioned here was descended from KORAH (26:1, 4) and not from MERARI, this Jeduthun must be different.

Jeezer. See IEZER.

Jegar Sahadutha. jee´guhr-say-huh-doo´thuh (Heb. yēgar śāhādûtā › H3337, “heap of witness”). The Aramaic name that LABAN gave to a heap of stones set up as the sign of a covenant between him and JACOB; the latter called it by the equivalent Hebrew name, GALEED (Gen. 31:47). This passage provides the oldest evidence of the ARAMAIC LANGUAGE found in the Bible, and it is part of the evidence that ABRAHAM spoke Aramaic before adopting a Canaanite dialect (which eventually developed into the HEBREW LANGUAGE).

Jehaleleel, Jehalelel. See JEHALLELEL.

Jehallelel. ji-hal'uh-luhl (Heb. yēhallel ʾēl H3401, possibly “God shines forth” or “may God praise [the child]”). (1) A descendant of JUDAH (1 Chr. 4:16; KJV, “Jehaleleel”). His genealogical connection is unclear, but he may have been the eponymous ancestor of a clan related to CALEB son of Jephunneh (cf. v. 15).

(2) A descendant of LEVI through MERARI, and father of Azariah; the latter was one of the LEVITES assigned to consecrate the TEMPLE in the days of HEZEKIAH (2 Chr. 29:12; KJV, “Jehalelel”).

Jehath. See JAHATH #2.

Jehdeiah. ji-dee'yah (Heb. yēḏēyāhû H3485, “Yahweh rejoices”). (1) Son or descendant of Shubael; he was a LEVITE who served in the time of King DAVID (1 Chr. 24:20).

(2) A MERONOTHITE who was in charge of David's donkeys (1 Chr. 27:30).

Jehezekel. See JEHEZKEL.

Jehezkel. ji-hez'kel (Heb. yēḥezqē ʾl H3489, “God strengthens”). KJV Jehezekel. A priest who lived in the time of DAVID; he was head of the twentieth division (1 Chr. 24:16). The Hebrew form of this name is identical to that of Ezekiel.

Jehiah. ji-hi'uh (Heb. yēḥiyyâ H3496, “Yahweh lives”). A LEVITE who, with OBED-EDOM, was appointed as a doorkeeper for the ARK OF THE COVENANT when DAVID had it brought to JERUSALEM (1 Chr. 15:24). He may be the same as JEIEL (v. 18).

Jehiel. ji-hi'uhl (Heb. yēḥî ʾēl H3493, “God lives”; also yēḥî ʾēlî H3494 [gentilic in form]). (1) A LE-VITE in the time of DAVID appointed among others to play the lyre (NRSV, harp) as a part of the ministrations before the ARK OF THE COVENANT (1 Chr. 15:18, 20; 16:5).

(2) Firstborn son of LADAN and descendant of LEVI through GERSHON; he was placed in charge of the TEMPLE treasury in the time of David (1 Chr. 23:8; 29:8; 26:21-22 [“Jehieli”; the Heb. text here is difficult]).

(3) Son of Hacmoni; he was an important official who took care of David's sons (1 Chr. 27:32).

(4) Son of JEHOSHAPHAT, king of Judah (1 Chr. 21:2). He and his brothers received a very generous inheritance (v. 3). Jehoshaphat's firstborn, JEHORAM, killed all his brothers when he became king (v. 4).

(5) Descendant of HEMAN the musician; he and his brother Shimei were among the Levites assigned to consecrate the temple in the days of HEZEKIAH (2 Chr. 29:14; NRSV, "Jehuel"). He is probably the same Jehiel included in the list of supervisors of the temple storerooms (31:13).

(6) One of three temple administrators during the reign of JOSIAH (2 Chr. 35:8); he is mentioned with Hilkiah and Zechariah as providing numerous offerings for the celebration of the Passover.

(7) Descendant of Joab and father of Obadiah; the latter was head of a large family who returned to Jerusalem from Babylon with EZRA (Ezra 8:9).

(8) Descendant of Elam and father of Shecaniah; the latter led a public confession concerning mixed marriages forbidden by the law (Ezra 10:2). This Jehiel is possibly the same one listed among the descendants of Elam who agreed to put away their foreign wives (10:26). If so, Shecaniah may have been the child of a mixed marriage, and thus he apparently supported the sending away of his own mother.

(9) One of the priestly descendants of Harim who agreed to put away their foreign wives (Ezra 10:21).

Jehieli. See JEHIEL #2.

Jehizkiah. jee'hiz-ki'uh (Heb. yēhizqiyyāhû H3491, "Yahweh strengthens [me]"). Son of Shallum; he was one of the princes of EPHRAIM who supported ODED the prophet in warning the Israelites not to take captives from JUDAH (2 Chr. 28:12).

Jehoadah. See JEHOADDAH.

Jehoaddah. ji-hoh'uh-duh (Heb. yēhō'addâ H3389, possibly "Yahweh has adorned [me]"). KJV Jehoadah. Son of Ahaz and descendant of King SAUL through JONATHAN (1 Chr. 8:36; called Jarah or JADAH in the parallel passage, 9:42).

Jehoaddan. See JEHOADDIN.

Jehoaddin. ji-hoh'uh-din (Heb. yēhō ʿaddîn H3390, variant yēhō ʿaddān H3391, “Yahweh is delight”). KJV Jehoaddan. The mother of AMAZIAH, king of Judah; she is identified as being a native of Jerusalem (2 Ki. 14:2; 2 Chr. 25:1).

Jehoahaz. ji-hoh'uh-haz (Heb. yēhō ʿāḥāz H3370, “Yahweh has taken hold [for protection]” or “whom Yahweh sustains,” short form yō ʿāḥāz H3407). (1) Son of JEHU and king of ISRAEL (2 Ki. 10:35; 13:1-9; in 14:1, the NRSV has “Joahaz”). Jehoahaz became king in 814/3 B.C. (the twenty-third year of Joash of Judah) and reigned for seventeen years. His son Joash (JEHOASH) of Israel succeeded in the thirty-seventh year of Joash of Judah (13:10), and some therefore emend “seventeen” to “fifteen” in 13:1 or “thirty-seventh” to “thirty-ninth” in 13:10; others assume a shift in the reckoning system or suggest a three-year coregency of Jehu and Jehoahaz. When Jehoahaz ascended the throne, SYRIA (ARAM) controlled virtually the whole country, having penetrated down the coastal road, taken GATH, and extracted heavy tribute from Judah. Although Jehoahaz had no idea of abandoning the apostate cult of BETHEL (“the sins of Jeroboam”) or removing the ASHERAH from SAMARIA (13:6, cf. 21:3), he did in desperation invoke the name of the Lord, and his prayer was answered in God’s compassion for his people (13:4-5).

(2) Son of JOSIAH and king of JUDAH (2 Ki. 23:30-34; 2 Chr. 36:1-4). Also known as SHALLUM (prob. his personal name as opposed to his throne name, 1 Chr. 3:15; Jer. 22:11), Jehoahaz succeeded Josiah in the summer of 609 B.C., but he was deposed by Pharaoh NECO three months later. According to the biblical narrative, it was “the people of the land” (prob. country folk) who made him king, and this information suggests that Jehoahaz was not the natural successor (subsequently, his older brother Eliakim, renamed JEHOIAKIM, was placed on the throne by the Egyptians, 2 Ki. 23:36). If the people felt they had established their right to control the succession, the harsh realities of great power politics soon destroyed this hope. Returning that fall from his campaign in ASSYRIA, and aiming to secure his passage for the future, Neco installed Eliakim/Jehoiakim as his vassal and deported Jehoahaz to Egypt.

(3) Son of JEHORAM and king of Judah. See AHAZIAH #2.

(4) Father of JOAH; the latter was one of three officials who were sent to repair the temple in the time of Josiah (2 Chr. 34:8; rendered “Joahaz” in English versions).

Jehoash, Joash. ji-hoh'ash, joh'ash (Heb. yēhō ʿāš H3371, short form yō ʿāš H3409, prob. “Yahweh has granted”). The short Hebrew form of this name is used for all eight individuals listed below. The longer form, which occurs only in 2 Kings (seventeen times), is used sometimes for both the son of AHAZIAH, king of Judah, and the son of JEHOAHAZ, king of Israel (note esp. 2 Ki. 14:13), but the NIV, in the interests of clarity, uses it only when referring to the king of Israel.

(1) Father of GIDEON and descendant of MANASSEH through ABIEZER (Jdg. 6:11, 29-31; 7:14; 8:13, 29, 32). Joash lived in OPHRAH, where both he and Gideon were buried. The angel of the Lord appeared to Gideon by an oak tree that belonged to Joash. Later, when the men of the town wanted to kill Gideon for breaking down the altar of BAAL and the ASHERAH pole, his father came to his defense.

(2) Son of SHELA and grandson of JUDAH; he and one (or more) of his brothers are said to have “ruled in” (or “married into”) MOAB and JASHUBI LEHEM (1 Chr. 4:22). Some scholars believe that the words “and Jashubi Lehem” should be emended to either “but returned to Lehem” (so NRSV) or “and they resided in Bethlehem.”

(3) Son of BEKER and grandson of BENJAMIN (2 Chr. 7:8).

(4) Son of Shemaah of GIBEAH; he and his brother AHIEZER are listed among the warriors, kinsmen of SAUL, who joined with DAVID when the latter took refuge at ZIKLAG (1 Chr. 12:3; cf. v. 1).

(5) An official under David who was in charge of the supplies of olive oil (1 Chr. 27:28).

(6) Son of AHAB king of Israel; he and the governor of SAMARIA were charged with the custody of the prophet MICAIAH (1 Ki. 22:26; 2 Chr. 18:25); it is however likely that the phrase “the king’s son” refers to a minor royal official with police duties.

(7) Son of AHAZIAH and ninth king of JUDAH (2 Ki. 11:1—12:21; 2 Chr. 22:10—24:27). As an infant, Joash was saved from the massacre of the royal family, which ATHALIAH perpetrated on the death of her son Ahaziah. He owed his life to the courage and devotion of his aunt JEHOSHEBA, the wife of the priest JEHOIADA, who conveyed him away, concealed him, and brought him up in their own home (2 Ki. 11:1-3). When Joash was seven years old, Jehoiada took him to the temple court and crowned him before a congregation of Levites, temple guards, and elders and people from the country towns. As he was acclaimed king, his grandmother Athaliah appeared in the court and was swiftly removed to her death. With due ceremony Jehoiada inaugurated a fresh covenant of kingship, acknowledging the Lord’s dominion; and the temple of BAAL was destroyed by the crowd (11:4-20). The reign of Joash probably lasted forty years from 835 to 796 B.C. (some put the death of Joash in the year 800). The reign was not very distinguished, and it ended miserably; for after Jehoiada’s death, Joash was persuaded to allow the revival of pagan worship, which led to much opposition from the prophets. In the end, he was responsible for the martyrdom of ZECHARIAH son of Jehoiada; and at the end of the year, after a disastrous raid by HAZAEL of ARAM in which Joash was badly wounded and lost many of his leading men, he was assassinated by two of his servants (2 Ki. 12:20-21; 2 Chr. 24:17-27).

(8) Son of JEHOAHAZ and twelfth (thirteenth, if TIBNI is counted) king of ISRAEL (2 Ki. 13:10-25; 14:8-16; 2 Chr. 25:17-24). To distinguish him from Joash son of Ahaziah, king of Judah, this king of Israel is often referred to by his alternate name, Jehoash (cf. NIV); that practice will be followed in this article. Jehoash was the third king in the line of JEHU; he reigned sixteen years, from the thirty-seventh of Joash of Judah to the fifteenth of AMAZIAH (2 Ki. 13:10; 14:23). The dates are probably 798 to 782 B.C. Jehoash inflicted three defeats on BEN-HADAD III that marked the beginning of Israel's political revival. The story is preserved of how this event was prophesied by ELISHA as he lay dying (13:14-25). In 2 Ki. 14:8-14 is recorded the defeat of Amaziah by Jehoash at BETH SHEMESH, after which Jehoash destroyed part of the wall of Jerusalem, looted the temple, and took hostages. Nothing is said about Jehoash subsequent to this event.

Jehohanan. jee'hoh-hay'nuhn (Heb. yēhōḥānān H3380, "Yahweh is gracious"). (1) Sixth son of Meshelemiah and descendant of KORAH; like his father, he and his brothers were Levitical gatekeepers in the time of DAVID (1 Chr. 26:3).

(2) A commander of units of one thousand in the army of JUDAH during the reign of JEHOASHAPHAT (2 Chr. 17:15).

(3) Father of Ishmael; the latter was one of the commanders of units of one hundred upon whom JEHOIADA relied in his planning to move against ATHALIAH (2 Chr. 23:1).

(4) Father of Azariah; the latter was a leader in the tribe of EPHRAIM during the reign of PEKAH king of Israel (2 Chr. 28:12; KJV and NRSV, "Johanan").

(5) Son of Eliashib; he provided a room for EZRA's mourning (Ezra 10:6; KJV, "Johanan"). The identification of this Jehohanan is disputed because of disagreements regarding the date of Ezra's mission (cf. JOHANAN in Neh. 12:22-23).

(6) One of the descendants of Bebai who agreed to put away their foreign wives (Ezra 10:28).

(7) Son of TOBIAH, who was an opponent of NEHEMIAH; Jehohanan married the daughter of Meshullam son of Berekiah (Neh. 6:18; KJV, "Johanan").

(8) Head of the priestly family of Amariah during the time of JOIAKIM the high priest (Neh. 12:13).

(9) One of the singers who participated in the purification and dedication of the wall of Jerusalem (Neh. 12:42).

Jehoiachin. ji-hoi´uh-kin (Heb. yêhōyākîn H3382, short form yôyākîn H3422 [only Ezek. 1:2], “Yahweh establishes [or protects]”). Son of JEHOIAKIM and last king of JUDAH before the EXILE (597 B.C.). Also known as JECONIAH and CONIAH, he reigned in JERUSALEM three months and ten days (2 Chr. 36:9). Jehoiachin was born to Jehoiakim and his wife NEHUSHTA during the reign of the godly JOSIAH, his grandfather. According to 2 Ki. 24:8, he was eighteen when he came to the throne, but 2 Chr. 36:9 (see NIV mg.) gives his age as eight. Probably an early scribe made a mistake of ten years in copying one of these two books. The evidence favors eighteen, for 2 Ki. 24:15 speaks of his wives, and he would hardly have been married at eight years of age. Jehoiakim displayed his contempt for the Word of God by cutting up and burning the prophecies of JEREMIAH (Jer. 36:23, 32), thereby adding to the curses that the Lord pronounced on Jerusalem.

The Babylonian Chronicle recounts historical events during the years 605-595 B.C., including Nebuchadnezzar's capture of Jerusalem while Jehoiachin was king.

In Ezek. 19:5-9, Jehoiachin is characterized as “a strong lion. He learned to tear the prey and he devoured men.” The prophet announced that the “strong lion” would be taken to BABYLON, and this prediction was literally fulfilled later. Although Jeremiah was prophesying with mighty power all through the youth of Jehoiachin, the influences of the palace were stronger than those of the prophet. Jehoiakim had been rapacious, violent, and oppressive. He had “the burial of a donkey—dragged away and thrown outside the gates of Jerusalem” (Jer. 22:18-19). In these sad conditions and under the threatening shadow of Nebuchadnezzar, Jehoiachin became king; and in his three months of power “he did evil in the eyes of the LORD, just as his father had done” (2 Ki. 24:9). “In the spring King Nebuchadnezzar sent for him and brought him to Babylon” (2 Chr. 36:10), where he remained a captive the rest of his life, though apparently not under extremely hard conditions. NEBUCHADNEZZAR died in 561 B.C., and his son EVIL-MERODACH, who succeeded almost immediately, took Jehoiachin from prison and “spoke kindly to him and gave him a seat of honor higher than those of the other kings who were with him in Babylon. So Jehoiachin put aside his prison clothes,” and after thirty-seven years of captivity was given a daily allowance of food the rest of his life (2 Ki. 25:27-30).

Jehoiada. ji-hoi’uh-duh (Heb. yēhōyādā ^c H3381, “Yahweh has known [i.e., has been concerned]”). (1) Father of BENAIAH, who was a commander of DAVID’s bodyguard (2 Sam. 8:18; 20:23; 23:20-22; 1 Ki. 1:8; et al.); once he is referred to as a priest (1 Chr. 27:5). See also #2 below.

(2) An Aaronite leader who joined David at HEBRON (1 Chr. 12:27). He is probably the same as #1 above.

(3) Son of a certain Benaiah and successor of AHITHOPHEL as David’s counselor (1 Chr. 27:34). It has been suggested that “Jehoiada son of Benaiah” here should be emended to “Benaiah son of Jehoiada” and that therefore this Jehoiada is the same as #1 above.

(4) A very influential high priest in Jerusalem who organized the coup that ousted ATHALIAH and set Joash (JEHOASH) on the throne; he was for many years the young king’s trusted adviser (2 Ki. 11-12; 2 Chr. 23-24). Jehoiada already had adult children when Athaliah massacred the royal family (2 Chr. 23:11), but his wife JEHOSEBA, daughter of King JEHORAM, must have been relatively young. Some six years after Jehosheba had rescued her infant nephew Joash from the massacre, Jehoiada ventured all when he appealed to popular loyalty to the House of David. First he secured the support of the mercenaries (CARITES), who were assigned as temple and palace guards (2 Ki. 11:4-8). The Chronicler adds that he enlisted the chiefs of the towns where the Levites resided; this tallies with references to “the people of the land” (vv. 14, 20). Upon the king’s coronation, their rejoicing drew the attention of Athaliah; but Jehoiada was ready, and her death ended all opposition. Jehoiada followed up the coronation with a covenant of religious restoration in which “the people” took part (vv. 16-17; not the country folk as such, but the congregation, as representing all Judah). Jehoiada continued to guide Joash, though age doubtless weakened his administrative ability (2 Chr. 24:4-7). He was honored with a royal burial; but the nobility soon rebelled against his strict religious tradition (vv. 17-18).

(5) A priest during the time of JEREMIAH; Shemaiah the Nehelamite replaced him as chief officer of the temple with a certain Zephaniah so that the latter might arrest Jeremiah (Jer. 29:26). Some have argued, without good reason, that this Jehoiada is the same as #4 above.

(6) KJV alternate form of JOIADA (Neh. 3:6).

(7) NRSV alternate form of JOIADA (Neh. 13:28).

Seal of Gemaryahu son of Shaphan (c. 600 B.C.), possibly a scribe who functioned in the court of King Jehoiakim. (The top image is an enlarged reproduction.)

Jehoiakim. ji-hoi´uh-kim (Heb. yēhōyāqīm H3383, “Yahweh raises up”). Throne name of ELIAKIM, son of JOSIAH, appointed king of JUDAH by Pharaoh NECO. In 607 B.C., Neco marched northward, intending to fight the king of ASSYRIA at the EUPHRATES River. Josiah imprudently intercepted him and was mortally wounded at MEGIDDO near Mount CARMEL. The people of Judah passed by Eliakim and made his youngest brother Shallum, that is, JEHOAHAZ, king after Josiah (1 Chr. 3:15; 2 Chr. 36:1). Jehoahaz reigned for three months in Jerusalem, when Neco in displeasure “put him in chains at Riblah” in the N of SYRIA, then sent him to Egypt, where he died (2 Ki. 23:33-34). The king of Egypt next took Eliakim, elder half-brother of Jehoahaz, changed his name to Jehoiakim, put the land under heavy tribute, and made Jehoiakim king over Jerusalem, where he reigned from 607 to 597. Jehoiakim was an oppressive and thoroughly godless king (2 Ki. 23:36—24:6; 2 Chr. 36:4-8; cf. Jer. 22-36).

The prophecies of Jer. 22:1-23 were uttered (if all at one time) soon after the death of Josiah and the taking away of Jehoahaz (22:10-12). They describe the wrongdoing and oppression by Jehoiakim (22:13-23). The prophet wrote about the dooms of Judah and the other nations at the direction of the Lord. When the princes heard these words, they let Jeremiah and his clerk BARUCH hide themselves; then when the king heard the words of the book, he cut out the passages that displeased him and burned them, with the result that the book of Jeremiah was rewritten and enlarged (ch. 36). Jehoiakim died in disgrace and had “the burial of a donkey” (22:19).

Jehoiarib. ji-hoi´uh-rib (Heb. yēhōyārīb H3384, “Yahweh contends [for me]”). (1) A priest who received the first lot of the twenty-four divisions in DAVID’s time (1 Chr. 24:7). He was possibly the ancestor of #2 below.

(2) One of six priests (prob. family heads) who resettled in JERUSALEM after the EXILE (1 Chr. 9:10). He is usually identified with a JOIARIB mentioned three times in Nehemiah’s lists (Neh. 11:10; 12:6, 19).

Jehonadab. See JONADAB.

Jehonathan. ji-hon´uh-thuh (Heb. yēhônātān H3387, “Yahweh has given [a child]”). (1) Son of Uzziah; an official in the time of DAVID who was in charge of storehouses (1 Chr. 27:25 KJV; modern versions render the name JONATHAN).

(2) One of six LEVITES whom King JEHOSHAPHAT sent to teach the law in the cities of JUDAH (2 Chr. 17:8). Appointed to the same mission were a number of princes and priests.

(3) The head of the priestly family of Shemaiah in the days when JOIAKIM son of Jeshua was high priest (Neh. 12:18).

Jehoram. ji-hoh´ruhm (Heb. yēhōrām H3393, short form yôrām H3456, “Yahweh is exalted”). (1) One of six Levites whom King JEHOSHAPHAT sent to teach the law in the cities of JUDAH (2 Chr. 17:8). Appointed to the same mission were a number of princes and priests.

(2) Son of A^{HAB} and ninth king of the northern kingdom of ISRAEL; mainly called Joram (2 Ki. 1:17; 3:1-13; 8:16; 9:15-24; 2 Chr. 22:5-7). The NIV consistently uses Joram to distinguish him from the son of Jehoshaphat (see #3 below), and that practice will be followed in this article. A number of stories in connection with the marvelous deeds of E^{LIJAH} and E^{LISHA} refer to “the king” of Israel without mentioning his name, and it is uncertain just how many of those in which “the king” figures in some way are related to King Joram of Israel. Elijah must have survived at least until the sixth year of his reign (cf. 2 Chr. 21:12), and the many exploits of Elisha detailed in 2 Ki. 3-9 likely took place during Joram’s reign (c. 852-841 B.C.). Throughout his reign the two Jewish kingdoms were allied. Upon his accession, almost at once he was joined by Judah (under Jehoshaphat) and E^{DOM} (tributary to Judah) in a war against the Moabites in an effort to recover the submission of M^{OAB} under its King M^{ESHA}. The combined expedition came to near disaster from want of water near the frontier of Edom and Moab. It was Jehoshaphat’s truly pious reliance on genuine prophecy that saved them all, for Elisha was brought forward from the ranks, and through his function as prophet a life-saving miracle brought both water and military victory (3:4-27). This alliance ended with the destruction of the house of Ahab by Joram’s successor, J^{EHU}. After that, enmity between the two Hebrew kingdoms was renewed.

Though a venal and weak man, Joram was not without some good, for he at least diminished B^{AAL} worship early in his reign (2 Ki. 3:2). On occasion he gave heed to Elisha’s wise and frequently friendly advice (6:20-23; 3:13). Yet when the A^{RAM}EAN raids diminished he seems to have begun to resent Elisha’s advice and admonition (6:23) and quickly relapsed to worse idolatry. Divine judgment in the form of siege and famine were not slow to follow (6:24-25). It was at this juncture that Joram (for he is surely “the king” here), in despair, sought to kill Elisha (6:31-32). Joram was the last king of the line of O^{MRI}. His mother J^{EZEBEL} and he both were killed by the rampaging J^{EHU}, who also exterminated all members of the family and all officials of the Baal cult (chs. 9-10).

(3) Son of J^{EHOSHAPHAT} and fifth king of the southern kingdom of Judah; sometimes called Joram (c. 848-841 B.C., but previously regent, 853-848). Scripture portions relating to this man are chiefly an entire chapter in Chronicles (2 Chr. 21), but only four verses in Kings (2 Ki. 8:16-19). The latter passage gives an important picture of the relations familial and diplomatic between the two Jehorams: “In the fifth year of Joram son of Ahab king of Israel, when Jehoshaphat was king of Judah, Jehoram son of Jehoshaphat began his reign as king of Judah. He was thirty-two years old when he became king, and he reigned in Jerusalem eight years. He walked in the ways of the kings of Israel, as the house of Ahab had done, for he married a daughter of Ahab. He did evil in the eyes of the LORD.” Except for a few months when his son AHAZIAH reigned after him, Jehoram’s reign corresponds with the last eight years of the reign of the northern Joram. His life and reign make up one of the saddest and most to be regretted pages of the history of the Davidic dynasty.

Jehoram’s personal and domestic life were tragically wrong. His wife, ATHALIAH, brought with her the corruption of the Baalism (fertility cult religion) of her mother’s Phoenician ancestors. As a result, Jehoram “walked in the ways of the kings of Israel, as the house of Ahab had done, for he married a daughter of Ahab” (2 Chr. 21:6). Soon after ascending the throne, Jehoram assassinated his six brothers and other “princes of Israel” (21:4). The direct line of the reigning family was in consequence reduced during his reign to one male descendant (AHAZIAH, 21:16-17). Everything recorded of this man indicates complete religious and moral APOSTASY, even worse than that of the Baal-worshipping heathen of his time. Chastening followed. There was first a revolt of Edom, which since David’s time had been under tributary kings with only brief interruptions (2 Ki. 8:20; cf. 2 Sam. 8:14; 1 Ki. 11:14-16). Then a southwestern area with a center at LIBNAH also successfully revolted (2 Ki. 8:22). Further chastening came through successful inroads by rampaging Philistines and Arabs (2 Chr. 21:16-17). Not for generations was there significant recovery of this lost ground. The climax of these judgments to Jehoram himself was the particularly horrible manner in which he died (21:15, “disease of your bowels, until your bowels come out”) after living to see God’s judgment on all his sons save one, loss of his harem and all his goods.

Jehoshabeath. See JEHOSEBA.

Jehoshaphat. ji-hosh’uh-fat (Heb. yēhôšāpāṭ H3398, “Yahweh has judged”; Gk. Iōsaphat G2734). (1) Son of Ahilud and recorder in the time of DAVID and SOLOMON (2 Sam. 8:16; 20:24; 1 Ki. 4:3).

(2) One of the priests appointed to blow the trumpet when David transferred the ARK OF THE COVENANT to Jerusalem (1 Chr. 15:24 KJV; modern versions render the name JOSHAPHAT).

(3) Son of Paruah; he was one of twelve district governors of SOLOMON commissioned to supply provisions for the royal household (1 Ki. 4:17).

(4) Father of King JEHU of Samaria (2 Ki. 9:2, 14).

(5) Son of ASA and fourth king of the southern kingdom of JUDAH (1 Ki. 22; 2 Chr. 17-20; included in Matthew’s GENEALOGY OF JESUS CHRIST, Matt. 1:8 [KJV, “Josaphat”]). Jehoshaphat reigned for twenty-five years, including five years of rule with his father. He began to reign about 873 B.C. His mother was Azubah, the daughter of Shilhi. Jehoshaphat was the second of the five kings of Judah who were outstanding for godliness, the later ones being Joash (JEHOASH), HEZEKIAH, and JOSIAH. He took away the HIGH PLACES and ASHERAH poles from Judah (2 Chr. 17:6), though he apparently was not able to keep the people from using certain high places in worshiping the Lord (1 Ki. 22:43). One of the first men to sense the importance of religious education for the people, he sent out in the third year of his reign princes and PRIESTS and LEVITES to teach the people the LAW of the Lord. They went throughout the cities of Judah in doing this work (2 Chr. 17:7-9). Because of Jehoshaphat's godliness, "the fear of the LORD" fell on the surrounding nations, and even the Philistines and the Arabs brought him tribute. With all this godliness, he seems, however, to have been lacking in spiritual discernment, for he made the great and almost fatal mistake of associating with the wicked King Ahab of the northern kingdom; so much so that his son JEHORAM married ATHALIAH, who was as wicked as her mother JEZEBEL.

Ahab made a great show of hospitality to Jehoshaphat during a visit to SAMARIA and then asked him if he would be his ally in a campaign to recover RAMOTH GILEAD. Jehoshaphat suggested that they first determine the will of God. Ahab agreed and asked his prophets for their advice, and they all prophesied good success for the venture. Jehoshaphat was not satisfied and asked if there were not a real prophet of the Lord present. They sent for MICAIAH, a man of God, whom Ahab hated. He told them the truth, that God had put a spirit of delusion in the minds of all the prophets, so that Ahab might be doomed. Ahab partly believed this and arranged a trick, pretending to give Jehoshaphat the glory, but Ahab was killed. Jehoshaphat died at the age of sixty, about the year 849 B.C. His son Jehoram succeeded to the throne.

Looking N through the Kidron Valley, thought by many to be the same as the Valley of Jehoshaphat.

Jehoshaphat, Valley of. A valley adjacent to the city of JERUSALEM and regarded as the place of the judging of the nations (Joel 3:2, 12); it is also referred to as the “valley of decision” (3:14; cf. Zech. 14:1-5). Early tradition usually identified it as the Valley of the KIDRON (the portion just E of the city), although an alternate view was the Valley of HINNOM. Some believe that JOEL was speaking of an ideal spot only; there is no clear evidence that any valley ever actually bore this name.

Jehosheba. ji-hosh´uh-buh (Heb. yēhōšēba ^c H3394, variant yēhōšab ^cat H3395, “Yahweh is abundance”). The daughter of King JEHORAM (Joram) of Judah (2 Ki. 11:2) and wife of JEHOIADA, the high priest (2 Chr. 22:11; KJV, NRSV, “Jehoshabeath”). When her brother AHAZIAH and most of the rest of the royal family were about to be murdered, she took Ahaziah’s son Joash (JEHOASH), who was kept hidden for six years, until he could be made king.

Jehoshua, Jehoshuah. See JOSHUA.

Jehovah. ji-hoh´vuh. Traditional English rendering of the Tetragrammaton or divine name, Yahweh (Heb. yhwh H3378; Exod. 6:3 et al., KJV). Because Jewish tradition does not allow the pronunciation of this name, in public reading it is regularly substituted with Adonay, “my Lord” (ʾădōnāy from ʾădôn H123). To indicate such a reading, Hebrew copies of the Bible preserve the consonants of Yahweh, but insert the vowels of Adonay (thus, yēhōwâ, the first vowel being a short sound pronounced ē, roughly equivalent to ă); according to some, the inserted vowels come from Aram. šēmā ^ṣ, “the Name” (partly on the grounds that in some MSS the Tetragrammaton is pointed simply yēhwâ, that is, without the o vowel). This practice in the writing of the divine name misled translators (not only in English) to create the hybrid form Jehovah, which never existed in Hebrew. Most versions render the name with small caps as “the LORD.”

According to Exod. 6:2-3, the name YHWH had not been used prior to MOSES as a meaningful understanding of the divine nature. When the PATRIARCHS used the name, it was simply as a label and had not yet become a revelation of the nature of God. This is, in fact, an accurate statement of what we find in Genesis. For example, in Gen. 17:1 Yahweh appeared to Abram (ABRAHAM), but the revelation vouchsafed was not “I am Yahweh” but “I am El Shaddai.” We must return to Exod. 3:13-15 for the moment when the theological significance of Yahweh was opened to Moses. We notice the following: (1) The name is evidently related to the Hebrew verb “to be”; and it must be pointed out that while this verb can mean “to exist,” its characteristic force is “to be actually present,” “to be a present reality.” (2) The form Yahweh, as a part of the verb “to be,” could be translated either “I am actively present” or “I make to be actively present.” Thus “I am who I am” means either “I am actively present as and when I choose” or “I bring to pass whatever I choose.”

In context Moses is made alert to the active presence of Yahweh in the coming events (the Passover REDEMPTION and the EXODUS) or to the fact that as sovereign God he is bringing these events to pass by his own determination, volition, and power. Thus, in his very nature (as summed up in his name), the Lord identifies himself with redemption, the blood of the lamb, and the choosing out of his people for himself. It is important to note, though, that Moses is not left simply to watch unfolding events and make the best interpretation of them that he can. Exodus 3-4 and 6:1-8 show that Yahweh is a God who speaks before he is a God who acts. Moses is made wise before the events, so that when they happen, they are a confirmation of the word that has preceded them, thus making the REVELATION of God doubly certain. Yahweh is thus, fundamentally, the Covenant-Redeemer, the God who brought his people out of Egypt (20:2).

Jehovah-jireh. ji-hoh´vuh-ji´ruh (Heb. yhwh yir ʾēh, the latter word being impf. of rā ʾāh H8011, “to see, consider, be concerned about”). The name ABRAHAM gave the place on Mount MORIAH where God substituted a ram for his son ISAAC (Gen. 22:14 KJV; NIV, “The LORD Will Provide”). Evidently, by the time of the Mosaic record, the statement had become a current proverb.

Jehovah-nissi. ji-hoh´vuh-nis´i (Heb. yhwh nissî, “Yahweh is my banner”). The name given the altar erected by MOSES to commemorate the defeat of the AMALEKITES in the wilderness at REPHIDIM at the hands of Israel under the leadership of JOSHUA (Exod. 17:15 KJV; NIV, “The LORD is my Banner”). The name revealed Israel’s assurance that God was the One who gave them the victory and that he was the One around whom they in the future were to rally as a standard.

Jehovah-shalom. ji-hoh´vuh-shah´lohm (Heb. yhwh šālôm, “Yahweh is peace”). The name GIDEON gave the altar he constructed in OPHRAH to commemorate the visit of the ANGEL of the Lord, who assured Gideon that he would not die as a result of seeing an angel, and commissioned him to liberate Israel from the Midianites (Jdg. 6:23-24 KJV; NIV, “The LORD is Peace”).

Jehovah-shammah. ji-hoh´vuh-sham´uh (Heb. ywhw šāmmâ, “Yahweh is there”). The name to be given the restored and beautified JERUSALEM of the MESSIAH’s kingdom (Ezek. 48:35 KJV mg.). The Lord had departed from his temple and city (ch. 11); he is to return to Jerusalem (ch. 43) and remain in favor and glory among his redeemed people forever. God’s name is inseparably linked with his chosen city, the place of his abode. Compare the parallel in Rev. 21.

Jehovah-tsidkenu. ji-hoh´vuh-tsid-ken´oo (Heb. ywhw ṣidqqnû, “Yahweh is our righteousness”). This name is employed, by JEREMIAH alone, in a twofold way. It is the designation of the future Davidic king, who will rule over restored Israel (Jer. 23:6 KJV mg.). RIGHTEOUSNESS is a divine attribute of the MESSIAH in providing salvation; the implication appears to be that his righteousness becomes ours (cf. the notion of imputed righteousness, 1 Cor. 1:30; 2 Cor. 5:21). In the second reference (Jer. 33:16 KJV mg.), the prophet is pointing to the capital of the king, which partakes of the nature of the righteous monarch.

Jehozabad. ji-hoh´zuh-bad (Heb. yêhôzābād H3379, “Yahweh has granted”). (1) Son of Shomer; he was an official who, with JOZABAD (NRSV, “Jozacar,” following many Heb. MSS) son of Shimeath, murdered King Joash (JEHOASH) of Judah at BETH MILLO (2 Ki. 12:21). The parallel passage identifies the officials as “Zabad, son of Shimeath an Ammonite woman, and Jehozabad, son of Shimrith a Moabite woman” (2 Chr. 24:26). Some consider Shimrith a variant form of Shomer (cf. NIV mg.); others speculate that Shomer was Shimrith’s father.

(2) Son of OBED-EDOM, included in the list of divisions of the Korahite doorkeepers in the reign of DAVID (1 Chr. 26:4).

(3) A commander of units of one thousand in the army of Judah during the reign of JEHOSHAPHAT (2 Chr. 17:18).

Jehozadak. ji-hoh´zuh-dak (Heb. yêhôšādāq H3392, short form yôšādāq H3449 “Yahweh has been righteous”). Son of Seraiah and descendant of AARON through ELEAZAR; apparently the last high priest prior to the destruction of the temple, he was among those deported to BABYLON by NEBUCHADNEZZAR (1 Chr. 6:14-15). He is known primarily for being the father of Joshua (JESHUA) the high priest (Hag. 1:1, 12, 14; 2:2, 4; Zech. 6:11; KJV, “Josedeck”). In Ezra-Nehemiah the name is shortened to Jozadak (Ezra 3:2, 8; 5:2; 10:18; Neh. 12:26);

Jehu. jee'hyoo, jay'hoo (Heb. yēhû › H3369, "Yahweh is he" [i.e., he is the true God]). (1) Son of Obed and descendant of JERAHMEEL, included in the genealogy of JUDAH (1 Chr. 2:38).

(2) Son of Joshibiah, listed among clan leaders in the tribe of SIMEON whose families increased greatly during the days of King HEZEKIAH and who dispossessed the Hamites and Meunites near GEDOR (1 Chr. 4:36; cf. vv. 38-41).

(3) A man from ANATHOTH, listed among the warriors, kinsmen of SAUL, who joined with DAVID when the latter took refuge at ZIKLAG (1 Chr. 12:3).

(4) Son of HANANI; he was a prophet who warned King BAASHA (c. 909-886 B.C.) that he would be judged for following the heretical cult instituted by JEROBOAM (1 Ki. 16:1-4, 7). Much later (c. 853), Jehu had to rebuke King JEHOSHAPHAT for allying himself with AHAB in an attempt to recover RAMOTH GILEAD from the ARAMEANS (2 Chr. 19:2, where he is called "the seer"). Jehu wrote annals on the reign of Jehoshaphat that were incorporated in "the book of the kings of Israel" (1 Chr. 20:34).

The famous Black Obelisk of Shalmaneser III (859-824 B.C.). This register shows King Jehu prostrate as he brings tribute to the Assyrian king.

(5) Tenth king of ISRAEL and founder of its fourth dynasty. Son of Jehoshaphat, but more often called "son of Nimshi," perhaps because Nimshi, his grandfather, was better known than Jehoshaphat. Jehu appears first as a soldier in the service of King AHAB (2 Ki. 9:25). Ahab and JEZEBEL were rejected for their crimes. God commanded ELIJAH to anoint Jehu king over Israel, a command that ELISHA fulfilled. He sent a young prophet to RAMOTH GILEAD, where Jehu was with his army, to carry out the command. Jehu was commissioned to conquer the house of Ahab. When Jehu told his fellow officers that he had been so anointed, they proclaimed him king. Jehu sealed the city so that the news should not precede him, then he crossed the JORDAN and drove impetuously as was his custom (9:20) to JEZREEL, where King Joram (JEHORAM) of Israel had gone after being wounded in battle with HAZAEL of SYRIA. Jehu denounced Joram, killed him, and had his body thrown into the field of NABOTH (9:24-26); then he caused AHAZIAH king of JUDAH to be killed, and his servants carried him up to JERUSALEM for burial. He also killed Jezebel and would have had her buried, but the dogs had eaten her. He executed God's judgments on the house of Ahab and thoroughly exterminated the worship of BAAL, killing all its devotees who gathered together in response to Jehu's pretended interest in worshiping Baal with them; but he did not depart from the sins of JEROBOAM. Jehu reigned in SAMARIA twenty-eight years (c. 841-814 B.C.). Because of his zeal for the Lord in the matter of Ahab's house, God allowed him to set up a dynasty that lasted just over one hundred years (Jehu, Jehoahaz, Joram, and Jeroboam II).

Jehubbah. See HUBBAH.

Jehucal. ji-hyoo´kuhl (Heb. yēhûkal H3385, short form yûkal H3426, "Yahweh has been powerful"). TNIV Jehukal. Son of Shelemiah; he and a priest were sent by King ZEDEKIAH to JEREMIAH to ask the prophet to pray for him and the people (Jer. 37:3). He was also one of four officials who told the king to kill Jeremiah for predicting the fall of JERUSALEM (38:1; KJV and other versions, "Jucal").

Jehud. jee´huhd (Heb. yēhûd H3372; in Heb. inscriptions and in Aram., this form corresponds to yēhûdâ H3373; see JUDAH). One of the towns originally allotted to the tribe of DAN (Josh. 19:45; the Danites were unable to occupy the territory, v. 47). Mentioned between BAALATH and BENE BERAK (19:45), Jehud is identified with modern el-Yahudiyeh, 8.5 mi. (13.5 km.) ESE of JOPPAH.

Jehudi. ji-hyoo´di (Heb. yēhûdî H3375, "of Judah," "Jewish"). Son of Nethaniah; an officer, probably a scribe, of King JEHOIAKIM who was sent to BARUCH so that the latter might read the prophecies of JEREMIAH to the princes of Judah, and who himself afterward read them to the king (Jer. 36:14, 21, 23). His great-grandfather's name is given as CUSHI. The tracing of Jehudi's lineage to the third generation suggests the importance of his family and thus the significance of his task.

Jehudijah. jee´huh-di´juh. KJV rendering of yēhudiyyâ (fem. of yēhûdî H3374, "Judean, Judahite") with reference to a wife of MERED (1 Chr. 4:18). Modern versions more accurately translate “his Judean wife” (cf. KJV mg., “the Jewess”); the word is probably used to distinguish the woman from BITHIAH, an Egyptian also mentioned in this verse.

Jehuel. See J_{EHIEL} #5.

Jehukal. ji-hyoo´kuhl. TNIV form of J_{EHUCAL}.

Jehush. See J_{EUSH} #3.

Jeiel. ji-i´uhl (Heb. yē ʾî ʾēl H3599, variant yē ʾû ʾēl H3590, possibly “God is strong”). (1) A clan chief from the tribe of REUBEN (1 Chr. 5:7). His genealogical connection as well as the period in which he lived are unclear.

(2) Descendant of BENJAMIN, “father” (i.e., founder or leader) of GIBEON, and ancestor of King SAUL (1 Chr. 9:35; the name is missing in 8:29 MT, but NIV and NRSV insert it on the basis of some Gk. MSS). Many identify Jeiel with ABIEL.

(3) A LEVITE in the time of DAVID appointed among others to play the lyre (NRSV, harp) as a part of the ministrations before the ARK OF THE COVENANT (1 Chr. 15:18, 21; 16:5; the latter passage mentions Jeiel twice, but the first occurrence should probably be emended to JAAZIEL).

(4) Son of Hotham the Aroerite (see AROER); he and his brother Shama are included among DAVID’s mighty warriors (1 Chr. 11:44).

(5) Son of Mattaniah, descendant of LEVI through ASAPH, and ancestor of a certain JAHAZIEL who prophesied in aid of King JEHOSEPHAT just before the famous victory of BERACAH (2 Chr. 20:14).

(6) An official who held the office of secretary under King UZZIAH (2 Chr. 26:11).

(7) A Levite, descendant of ELIZAPHAN, who served during the reign of HEZEKIAH (2 Chr. 29:13; NRSV has JEUEL).

(8) A leader of the Levites in the reign of JOSIAH who gave liberally toward the sacrifices (2 Chr. 35:9).

(9) One of the descendants of Nebo who agreed to put away their foreign wives (Ezra 10:43).

(10) One of the descendants of Adonikam who returned with EZRA from BABYLON (Ezra 8:13 KJV [most other versions have “Jeuel,” following the Bomberg ed.]).

Jekabzeel. See KABZEEL.

Jekameam. jek´uh-mee´uhm (Heb. yēqam ʿām H3694, possibly “the Kinsman [i.e., ancestral god] establishes”). Son of HEBRON, grandson of KOHATH, and great-grandson of LEVI (1 Chr. 23:19; 24:23).

Jekamiah. jek´uh-mi´uh (Heb. yēqamyâ H3693, “Yahweh establishes”). (1) Son of Shallum and descendant of JUDAH through JERAHMEEL (1 Chr. 2:41).

(2) Son of JEHOIACHIN, last king of Judah (1 Chr. 3:18; KJV “Jecamiah”); he was apparently born after the royal family was led away into EXILE in Babylon.

Jekoliah. jek´uh-li´uh. TNIV form of JECOLIAH.

Jekuthiel. ji-kyoo´thee-uhl (Heb. yēqûti ʾēl H3688, “God nourishes”). Son of MERED by his Judean wife; included in the genealogy of JUDAH (1 Chr. 4:18).

Jemima. See JEMIMAH.

Jemimah. je-mi´muh (Heb. yēmîmâ H3544, possibly “dove”). KJV Jemima. The first daughter of JOB born to him after his fortunes were restored (Job 42:14).

Jemuel. jem´yoo-uhl (Heb. yēmû ʾēl H3543, derivation uncertain). First son of SIMEON and grandson of JACOB (Gen. 46:10; Exod. 6:15); called NEMUEL in the parallel passages (Num. 26:12; 1 Chr. 4:24).

Jephthae. jef´thee. KJV NT form of JEPHTHAH (Heb. 11:32).

Jephthah. jef´thuh (Heb. yiptāḥ H3653, “[God] opens [the womb?]” or “[God] frees”; Gk. Iephthae G2650). KJV NT Jephthae. A Gileadite warrior who as a judge delivered ISRAEL from the Ammonites (see AMMON), sacrificed his daughter to fulfill his vow to God, and defeated the Ephraimites (Jdg. 11:1—12:7). He was the son of a certain Gilead and of a woman who was a prostitute. Because of his illegitimacy, his brothers born in wedlock drove him from the paternal home and refused him any share in the inheritance. Their action was confirmed by the elders of the territory of GILEAD. He fled to the land of TOB, probably a region in the HAURAN. There he made a name for himself by his prowess and gathered about him a band of men without employment. He must not be thought of as just a captain of a band of freebooters, for he was a God-fearing man, with a high sense of justice and of the sacredness of vows made to God.

Looking W up the Jabbok River in the land of Gilead. When the Ammonites oppressed the Israelites living in Gilead, they requested the help of Jephthah.

At the time of Jephthah's expulsion by his brothers, ISRAEL had been for many years under bondage to the Ammonites. In the course of time, when these oppressors of Israel were planning some new form of humiliation, the elders of Gilead offered to anyone who was willing to accept the office of captain the headship over all the inhabitants of Gilead. When no one volunteered, the elders in desperation went to Jephthah and urged him to become a captain of Israel's army. He accepted, and he and the elders made vows before the Lord to keep all promises. On assuming the headship of Gilead, Jephthah's first effort was to secure the cooperation of the tribe of EPHRAIM, one of the most influential of the tribes during the period of the judges; but they refused to help. He then sent messengers to the king of the Ammonites, asking for the grounds of his hostile action and requesting that he desist; but the king refused to listen to reason. Endued with the Spirit of the Lord, Jephthah prepared for war. Before going out to battle, he made a vow that if he was victorious he would offer to God as a burnt offering whatever first came to him out of his house. He defeated his enemies with a very great slaughter and recovered twenty cities from them. The Ephraimites then came to him with the complaint that he had slighted them in the preparation for the Ammonite campaign, but he answered their false accusation and defeated them in battle. Forty-two thousand Ephraimites were killed. Jephthah judged Israel for six years. Samuel cited him as one proof of God's faithfulness in raising up deliverers for Israel in time of need (1 Sam. 12:11). He is listed among the heroes of faith in Heb. 11 (v. 32).

The great point of interest in his history is his vow (Jdg. 11:29-40) and the way it was fulfilled. On his return home after the victory over the Ammonites, his own daughter was the first to meet him from his house. A man of the highest integrity, he knew that he could not go back on his vow to the Lord; and his daughter agreed with him. She asked only that she and her companions be allowed to go for two months to the mountains to bewail her virginity. When she returned to her father, he "did to her as he had vowed. And she was a virgin" (11:39). According to some, the meaning of the statement is that Jephthah redeemed his daughter with money and gave her up to the service of the Lord as a perpetual virgin (cf. Lev. 27:1-8; 1 Sam. 1:11). On the basis of the entire context, however, most scholars believe that Jephthah contemplated human sacrifice from the beginning. If so, the incident may be part of the revelation that the book of Judges sets out to make of the fearful deterioration of the days and the need for the perfect king.

Jephunneh. ji-fuhn'uh (Heb. yēpunneh H3648, possibly “[God] turns [i.e., becomes reconciled]”). (1) A Kenizzite (see KENAZ), descendant of JUDAH; always referred to as the father of CALEB (Num. 13:6; 32:12; et al.).

(2) Son of JETHER (1 Chr. 7:38), listed among the “heads of families, choice men, brave warriors and outstanding leaders” of the tribe of ASHER (v. 40).

Jerah. jühr'uh (Heb. yeraḥ H3733, “month,” possibly a reference to the S Arabian moon god). Son of JOKTAN, grandson of EBER, and descendant of SHEM (Gen. 10:26; 1 Chr. 1:20).

Jerahmeel. ji-rah'mee-uhl (Heb. yēraḥmē ʾēl H3737, “God has compassion”; gentilic yēraḥmē ʾēlī H3738, “Jerahmeelite”; see JEREMIEL). (1) Firstborn son of HEZRON, grandson of PEREZ, and great-grandson of JUDAH (1 Chr. 2:9). His brothers were RAM and CALEB, although the identity of the latter is disputed. Jerahmeel had two wives and six sons (2:25-26), and his many descendants are given prominence in this genealogy (2:27-41), suggesting that his clan played a significant role in the history of the tribe of Judah.

(2) Son of Kish (not the father of King SAUL) and descendant of LEVI through MERARI; he was among the first LEVITES to serve in the permanent sanctuary established under DAVID (1 Chr. 24:29). He apparently married a daughter of Kish's brother ELEAZAR, who had no sons (cf. 23:21-22).

(3) A royal official (the apparent meaning of the designation “a son of the king”) who, with two others, was deputized by King JEHOIAKIM to arrest JEREMIAH and his assistant, BARUCH; the effort ended in failure because “the LORD had hidden them” (Jer. 36:26; the KJV understands the Heb. word for “the king” as a proper name and translates “the son of Hammelech”; cf. also 38:6 and see HAMMELECH). The same individual is apparently referred to in a seventh-century seal that bears the inscription, “Belonging to Jerahmeel, the king's son.”

Jerash. See GERASENE.

Jered. jühr'id (Heb. yered H3719, derivation disputed). (1) Son of MERED (by the latter's Judahite wife), “father” (i.e., founder) of GEDOR, and descendant of JUDAH, although his precise genealogical connection is unclear (1 Chr. 4:18). Apparently, the town of Gedor was founded by both Jered and PENUEL (v. 4).

(2) KJV alternate form of JARED (1 Chr. 1:2).

Jeremai. jer'uh-mi (Heb. yērēmay H3757; possibly short form of JEREMIAH or JEREMOTH). One of the descendants of Hashum who agreed to put away their foreign wives (Ezra 10:33).

The cracked wall of a cistern. God said through Jeremiah, “My people have committed two sins: They have forsaken me, the spring of living water, and have dug their own cisterns, broken cisterns that cannot hold water” (Jer. 2:13).

Jeremiah. jer'uh-mi'uh (Heb. yirmēyāhû H3759, short form yirmēyâ H3758, derivation uncertain, possibly “Yahweh loosens [the womb?]” or “Yahweh raises up”; Gk. Ieremias G2635). KJV NT Jeremias (Matt. 16:14) and Jeremy (2:17; 27:9). (1) Son of Hilkiah; a prophet in the southern kingdom (JUDAH) during the last forty years of its existence (627-586 B.C.). He lived through the period of the disintegration of the kingdom, witnessed the destruction of JERUSALEM and the TEMPLE, and spent the remaining years of his life in EGYPT. See JEREMIAH, BOOK OF.

(2) One of the ambidextrous Benjamite warriors who joined DAVID while he was in exile from SAUL at the PHILISTINE city of ZIKLAG (1 Chr. 12:4; cf. v. 2).

(3-4) Two Gadite warriors who joined David at Ziklag (1 Chr. 10;13); these Gadites are described as “brave warriors, ready for battle and able to handle the shield and spear. Their faces were the faces of lions, and they were as swift as gazelles in the mountains” (12:8).

(5) A clan chief of the half-tribe of MANASSEH; he and others are described as “brave warriors, famous men, and heads of their families” (1 Chr. 5:24). Because of their unfaithfulness, however, they and their families were taken captive by the Assyrians (vv. 25-26).

(6) Father of Hamutal, who was the mother of Kings JEJOAHAZ and ZEDEKIAH (2 Ki. 23:31; 24:18; Jer. 52:1) and thus the wife of King JOSIAH. This Jeremiah is identified as being from LIBNAH.

(7) Son of Habazziniah and father of Jaazaniah; the latter was a leader of the RECABITES, whose loyalty to their ancestral precepts the prophet Jeremiah used as a lesson to his own countrymen (Jer. 35:3).

(8) A priest who returned from the EXILE (Neh. 12:1, 12). He is probably the same who signed the covenant with NEHEMIAH (10:2), while the Jeremiah who took part in one of the choirs at the dedication of the wall may be a different individual (12:34).

Jeremiah, Book of. The second book among the Major Prophets.

I. The life of Jeremiah. JEREMIAH was one of the greatest Hebrew prophets. He was born into a priestly family of ANATHOTH, a Benjamite town 2.5 mi. (4 km.) NE of JERUSALEM. His father's name was Hilkiah (Jer. 1:1), not to be confused with the high priest HILKIAH mentioned in 2 Ki. 22-23. Because of the autobiographical nature of Jeremiah's book, it is possible to understand his life, character, and times better than those of any other Hebrew prophet.

Overview of JEREMIAH

Author: The priest-prophet Jeremiah son of Hilkiah.

Historical setting: Although Jeremiah was apparently called to be a prophet in the thirteenth year of JOSIAH's reign (c. 626 B.C., Jer. 1:2), in the wake of a great revival, most of his prophecies came subsequently, during the period of decline that led to the destruction of JERUSALEM (586). The book as a whole may have been put together by Jeremiah himself near the end of his life while an exile in EGYPT (c. 580), though many argue that there is evidence of later editing and additions.

Purpose: To warn of judgment against JUDAH because of IDOLATRY, to urge REPENTANCE upon the people, and to assure them of future restoration.

Contents: Jeremiah's call (Jer. 1); denunciation of Judah's sins (chs. 2-25); reactions to the prophecies (chs. 26-29); future restoration (chs. 30-33); prediction, fulfillment, and aftermath of the fall of Jerusalem (chs. 34-45); oracles against foreign nations (chs. 46-51); summary of the fall of Jerusalem and its aftermath (ch. 52).

Jeremiah was called to prophesy in the thirteenth year of King JOSIAH (c. 626 B.C.), five years after the great revival of religion described in 2 Ki. 23. This was a time of decision, a time filled with both hope and foreboding. Looking back, we can know it as the last religious awakening in a series that only slowed down the IDOLATRY and APOSTASY of the Hebrews. Their apostasy finally plunged the nation into destruction. It was the time of the revival of the Babylonian empire. After the fall of the city of NINEVEH in 612, the Assyrian Empire disintegrated; and BABYLON for a little while again ruled the world under her vigorous leader NEBUCHADNEZZAR, who sought to subdue the whole FERTILE CRESCENT to himself. Nebuchadnezzar's design on EGYPT inevitably included control of PALESTINE, and Jeremiah's lifetime saw the fall of the Hebrew commonwealth to Babylon. This fall was preceded by a generation of unrest and decline in Judah. Many solutions to her troubles were proposed, and at court pro-Egyptian and pro-Babylonian parties vied for favor with the policy makers. A knowledge of this situation of deepening crisis is necessary if we are to understand Jeremiah and his book. Jeremiah's ministry continued through the reigns of five successive Judean kings, and Jeremiah saw the final destruction of Jerusalem in 586. The prophet died in Egypt, probably a few years after Jerusalem was destroyed.

Jeremiah's call is described in Jer. 1. The young priest pleads his youth (1:6), but God assures him that he will be given strength for his task. At this time the theme of destruction from the N (i.e., from Babylon) is already introduced (1:13-15). The prediction that Judah would inevitably fall because of its apostasy earned for the prophet the undying hostility of most of his contemporaries (even his fellow townsmen, 11:21) and led to his being charged with treason (38:1-6) and to frequent imprisonments. Jeremiah's faithfulness to his call under the most difficult circumstances makes him a prime example of devotion to God at greatest personal sacrifice.

Undoubtedly Jeremiah supported Josiah's reform (Jer. 11:1-8; 17:19-27), but as time went on he realized its inadequacy to stave off national disaster (3:10). After Josiah's unhappy death (609 B.C.) Jeremiah mourned Judah's last good king (2 Chr. 35:25), and life became more difficult for him. JEHOAHAZ, son of Josiah, reigned only three months before he was deported to Egypt. Jeremiah said that he would not return (Jer. 22:10-12). JEHOIAKIM, the brother of Jehoahaz, succeeded him and reigned eleven years. A strong ruler and a very wicked man, he tried to do away with the prophet and, failing that, to silence him. In Jehoiakim's fourth year Jeremiah dictated the first edition of his prophecies to BARUCH, but the king promptly destroyed the scroll (ch. 36). During this reign Jeremiah preached the great temple discourse (chs. 7-10) that led to a plot to kill him; he was saved only by the intervention of friendly nobles who were a remnant of Josiah's administration (ch. 26). The battle of CARCHEMISH (46:1-12) occurred at this time; in this battle Egypt was crushed (605) by the Babylonian crown prince Nebuchadnezzar, who soon afterward became king of Babylon. Egypt's star quickly set, and Babylon entered her brief period of greatness. Judah was brought into the Babylonian orbit when Jerusalem fell to Nebuchadnezzar in 605 and a few Hebrews (DANIEL among them) were deported to Babylon. Jehoiakim later rebelled against Babylon. Jeremiah opposed the strong-willed Jehoiakim all his reign and predicted a violent death for him (22:13-19). It has been supposed that he fell in a palace coup.

JEHOIACHIN, son of Jehoiakim, succeeded him to the throne. Jeremiah called this king Coniah and Jeconiah (Jer. 24:1; 27:20; 29:2). After he had reigned only three months, the Babylonians attacked Jerusalem and carried Jehoiachin off to Babylon (597 B.C.), as Jeremiah had predicted (22:24-30), together with many artisans and other important Jews. In Jehoiachin's place Nebuchadnezzar appointed ZEDEKIAH, who maintained a precarious position on the throne for eleven years. Although a weak character, he protected Jeremiah and asked his advice, which he was never able to carry out. Jeremiah advised submission to Babylon, but, goaded by the nobles, Zedekiah rebelled and made an alliance with Egypt. Finally the Babylonians came again, determined to stamp out the rebellious Judean state. A long siege resulted, in which Jeremiah suffered greatly. He was accused of treason and thrown into a vile prison from which the king transferred him to the more pleasant court of the guard (Jer. 37:11-21). Now that the judgment had come, the prophet spoke of a hopeful future for the nation (chs. 32-33). As the siege wore on, he was cast into a slimy cistern, where he would have perished had not EBED-MELECH, a courtier, rescued him (38:6-13). He was taken again to the court of the guard until the city fell (38:28).

After a siege of a year and a half, Jerusalem was destroyed. Zedekiah was blinded and carried in chains to Babylon. For the events in Judah after the destruction of Jerusalem we are dependent almost exclusively on Jer. 40-45. The captors treated Jeremiah with kindness, giving him the choice of going to Babylon or remaining in Judah. He chose to stay behind with some of the common people who had been left in Judah when most of the Jews were deported. GEDALIAH was made puppet governor over this little group. After civil unrest, in which Gedaliah was assassinated, the Jews fled to Egypt, forcing Jeremiah to accompany them. Jeremiah died in Egypt at an old age.

II. The man and his message. Jeremiah was called to be a prophet at a most unhappy time. With the failure of Josiah's revival, the final decline of the nation was under way. When God called Jeremiah, he intimated to him that his message would be one of condemnation rather than salvation (Jer. 1:10, 18-19). Yet he was also given a message of hope (30:1-3, 18-22; 31:1-14, 23-40). Throughout his long ministry of more than forty years his preaching reflected this theme of judgment. God had risen early and sent his servants the prophets, but Israel would not hear (7:25; 44:4). Now the fate predicted for an apostate nation in Deut. 28-30 was inevitable. Babylon would capture Judah, and it would be better for the people to surrender and so to save their lives.

This message, coming to people whose desperate nationalism was all they had to cling to, was completely rejected, and the bearer was rejected with his message. Jeremiah was regarded as a meddler and a traitor; and leaders, nobles, and kings tried to put him to death. Although he needed the love, sympathy, and encouragement of a wife, he was not permitted to marry; and in this prohibition he became a sign that normal life was soon to cease for Jerusalem (Jer. 16:1-4). Because his book is full of autobiographical sections—Jeremiah’s “Confessions”—Jeremiah’s personality can be understood more clearly than that of any other prophet. These outpourings of the human spirit are some of the most poignant and pathetic statements of the tension of a man under divine imperative to be found anywhere in Scripture (the most important passages are 10:23-24; 11:18—12:6; 15:10-21; 17:9-11, 14-18; 18:18-23; 20:7-18). They show us a Jeremiah who was retiring, sensitive, and afraid of people’s “faces,” a man we would consider singularly unfit for the work that was given him to do. That he tenaciously clung to his assigned task through the succeeding years of rejection and persecution is both a tribute to the mettle of the man and to the grace of God, without which his personality would surely have gone to pieces.

Jeremiah’s penetrating understanding of the religious condition of his people is seen in his emphasis on the inner spiritual character of true religion. The external theocratic state will go, as will the temple and its ritual. Even Josiah’s reform appears to have been a thing of the outward appearance—almost engineered by the king, an upsurge of nationalism more than a religious revival (Jer. 3:10). The old COVENANT had failed; a new and better one will take its place and then God’s LAW will be written on men’s hearts (31:31-34). God will give his renewed people a heart to know him (24:7). In this doctrine of the “new heart” Jeremiah unfolds the depth of human sin and predicts the intervention of divine grace (Heb. 8:1—9:28).

III. The composition of the book. Jeremiah is a book of prophetic oracles or sermons, together with much autobiographical and historical material that gives the background of these oracles. Many modern scholars believe that the book contains substantial parts by later writers whose point of view differed markedly from the prophet’s. Believing that the critics have failed to prove their case for later editors, this article takes the traditional position that the oracles are essentially Jeremiah’s and that the narratives, if they were not dictated by the prophet (they are usually in the third person), were probably composed by Baruch.

Even though we may accept the fact that the book originated with Jeremiah, it is impossible to say how or when these materials were assembled in their present form. Plainly the book has gone through a number of editions, each succeeding one containing additional material. The account of the production of the first and second editions is told in Jer. 36. Baruch, the secretary of the prophet, wrote down certain judgment oracles of the prophet (we do not know the exact contents) at his dictation. This scroll was contemptuously burned by King Jehoiakim; the prophet, therefore, dictated again to Baruch “all the words of the scroll that Jehoiakim king of Judah had burned in the fire. And many similar words were added to them” (36:32); in other words, a new and enlarged edition was produced. Obviously this edition was not the same as our present book, which carries the history on for at least twenty more years. The account is of great interest in that it gives the only detailed OT description of the writing of a prophetic book. That Jeremiah should dictate to a secretary was normal for the times. Writing was a specialized skill, often restricted to a professional class. The document was probably written on a blank papyrus scroll imported from Egypt.

It has long been noted that the book of Jeremiah in the Greek translation of the OT called the SEPTUAGINT (produced in Egypt probably in the second century B.C.) is about one-eighth shorter than the Hebrew book, from which our English translations have been made. Further, the Septuagint omits many of the repetitions that are contained in the Hebrew copy and rearranges the material somewhat. Some scholars believe that the Greek Jeremiah was made from a different edition of the Hebrew text from the one on which our present text is based. It is not yet possible to arrive at any certain conclusion about the relationship of the Septuagint to the Hebrew text, nor to know how either version came to its present condition.

The material contained in Jeremiah’s book is not arranged in chronological order. The outline given below indicates what seems to have been the purpose of the present arrangement: to set forth a group of oracles spoken against the Jewish nation; then to record selected events in the prophet’s ministry; next to give certain discourses of Jeremiah against foreign nations; and finally to include an account of the fall of Jerusalem. The record of Jerusalem’s fall had been given in Jer. 39; the somewhat different account at the end of the book (ch. 52) is practically identical to 2 Ki. 24-25 and may have been added from that source to give a climactic conclusion to Jeremiah’s oracles.

IV. Outline

A. Jeremiah’s oracles against the theocracy, Jer. 1:1—25:38.

1. The prophet's call, 1:1-19.
 2. Reproofs and admonitions, mostly from the time of Josiah, 2:1—20:18.
 3. Later prophecies, 21:1—25:38.
- B. Events in the life of Jeremiah, 26:1—45:5.
1. The temple sermon and Jeremiah's arrest, 26:1-24.
 2. The yoke of Babylon, 27:1—29:32.
 3. The book of consolation, 30:1—33:26.
 4. Some of Jeremiah's experiences before Jerusalem fell, 34:1—36:32.
 5. Jeremiah during the siege and destruction of Jerusalem, 37:1—39:18.
 6. The last years of Jeremiah, 40:1—45:5.
- C. Jeremiah's oracles against foreign nations, 46:1—51:64.
1. Against Egypt, 46:1-28.
 2. Against the Philistines, 47:1-7.
 3. Against Moab, 48:1-47.
 4. Against the Ammonites, 49:1-6.
 5. Against Edom, 49:7-22.
 6. Against Damascus, 49:23-27.
 7. Against Kedar and Hazor, 49:28-33.
 8. Against Elam, 49:34-39.
 9. Against Babylon, 50:1—51:64.
- D. Appendix: The fall of Jerusalem and related events, 52:1-34.

V. Chronological order of the book. Although the book is not at all in chronological order, it is possible to date many of its sections because they contain chronological notations. For example, the material in Jer. 1 took place in the thirteenth year of Josiah, and chs. 2-6 later in his reign; possibly much of chs. 7-20 (except material specifically listed below) can also be dated to this period. Several passages belong early in the reign of Jehoiakim (ch. 26 and prob. 7:1—8:3; 22:1-23), while others specifically in his fourth year (chs. 25; 36; 45; 46:1-12), and one chapter later than the fourth year (ch. 35). To the reign of Jehoiachin may be dated 22:24-30 and possibly ch. 14.

Many passages belong in the reign of Zedekiah: in the beginning (ch. 24; 49:34-39); in the fourth year (chs. 27-28; 51:59-64); in unnoted years (chs. 21 and 29); during the early part of the siege (ch. 34); during the interruption of the siege (ch. 37); and during the resumption of the siege (chs. 32; 33; 38; 39:15-18). Finally, some prophecies were given in Judah after the fall of Jerusalem (39:1-4; 40:1—43:7), and others in Egypt after Jeremiah was taken there (43:8—44:30).

VI. Jeremiah and the Lachish Letters. The city of LACHISH, in the Judean foothills, was one of a series of fortresses for the defense of Jerusalem against attack from the MEDITERRANEAN Plain. It was one of the last cities to fall to the Babylonians prior to the final taking and destruction of Jerusalem (Jer. 34:7). Interesting light has been shed on these last hectic days of Judah's history by a discovery in the ruins of ancient Lachish. When the city was excavated (in 1932-38), twenty-one letters written on broken pieces of pottery were found in a guard room of the outer gate. They were written in the ancient Hebrew script with carbon iron ink at the time of Jeremiah, when Lachish was undergoing its final siege.

Many of these letters were written by a certain Hoshai, who was a military officer at some outpost near Lachish, to Yaash, the commander of Lachish. Their language is very much like that of the book of Jeremiah. Hoshai is constantly defending himself to his superior. Could it be that he was under suspicion of being ready to go over to the Babylonians? Once he describes one of the princes in words almost like those that the princes used against Jeremiah (Jer. 38:4). There is mention of "the prophet" whose message is "Beware." Is this a reference to Jeremiah? We cannot be sure. According to the book of Jeremiah, there were many prophets in that troubled time. Another letter mentions the inability of Hoshai to see the smoke signals of AZEKAH, although those of La-chish were still visible. Perhaps Azekah had already fallen (34:7). Although the specific meaning of many of the references of these letters eludes us, they do throw a vivid light on the disturbed and fearful days just prior to the fall of the Judean kingdom, the days of Jeremiah.

Jeremias. See JEREMIAH.

Jeremoth. jer'uh-moth (Heb. yērēmôt H3756, variant yērîmôt H3748, possibly "stout" or "exalted"). (1) Son of BEKER and grandson of BENJAMIN (1 Chr. 7:8; KJV, "Jerimoth").

(2) Son of BERIAH (or of ELPAAL; cf. NRSV), and descendant of Benjamin, listed among the heads of families living in JERUSALEM (1 Chr. 8:14; cf. v. 28). He is usually identified with JEROHAM (v. 27).

(3) Son (or descendant) of Mushi; he was one of the descendants of LEVI through MERARI appointed by DAVID to work in the temple (1 Chr. 23:23 KJV, NRSV; the NIV has “Jerimoth” on the basis of 24:30).

(4) Son of HEMAN, David’s seer (1 Chr. 25:4, 22; in the former verse he is called “Jerimoth,” and on that basis the NIV has “Jerimoth” in v. 22 as well). He and his thirteen brothers were set apart “for the ministry of prophesying, accompanied by harps, lyres and cymbal” (v. 1). When lots were cast to determine the duties of the Levitical singers, he, along with his sons and relatives, received the fifteenth lot (v. 22).

(5) One of the descendants of Elam who agreed to put away their foreign wives (Ezra 10:26).

(6) One of the descendants of Zattu who agreed to put away their foreign wives (Ezra 10:27).

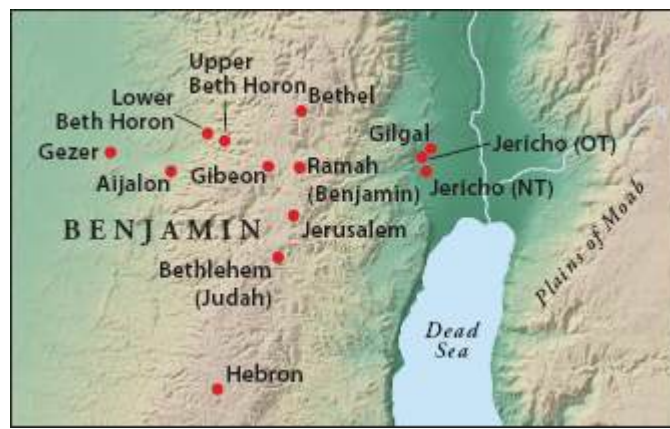

(7) One of the descendants of Bani who agreed to put away their foreign wives (Ezra 10:29 [KJV, “Ramothe,” following the Qere]).

Jeremy. See JEREMIAH.

Jeriah. ji-ri’uh (Heb. yēriyyāhû H3746, short form yēriyyâ H3745 “Yahweh sees [me]”). Firstborn son (or most important descendant) of Hebron; he was one of the descendants of LEVI through KOHATH appointed by DAVID to work in the temple (1 Chr. 23:19; 24:23). He is also described as chief of the Hebronites; his 2,700 relatives were heads of families whom David put in charge of the tribes E of the JORDAN (26:31-32; KJV and other versions, “Jerijah”). See HEBRON (PERSON) #1.

Jeribai. jer’uh-bi (Heb. yērîbay H3744, “[Yahweh] contends [for me]”). Son of Elnaam; he and his brother Joshaviah are included in the Chronicler’s list of DAVID’s mighty warriors (1 Chr. 11:46), which adds sixteen names (vv. 41b-47) beyond the military elite known as the Thirty (vv. 10-41 = 2 Sam. 23:8-39).

Jericho. jer’uh-koh (Heb. yērîḥô H3735 [with variant spellings], possibly “[city of] the moon [god]”; Gk. Ierichō G2637).

Jericho.

I. The site. Jericho, also called the City of Palms (Deut. 34:3), is located 5 mi. (8 km.) W of the JORDAN and 7 mi. (11 km.) N of the DEAD SEA, some 800 ft. (245 m.) below sea level. Its climate is tropical, with great heat during the summer. In the winter it becomes a resort for people fleeing the colder weather of the Palestinian hill country. In ancient times date palm trees flourished here; and balsam, from which medicine was extracted, was the source of great income. Today there are many banana groves here. The presence of springs of water makes the locality a green oasis in the middle of the dry Jordan rift area.

There are two sites associated with biblical Jericho. The OT city was situated on a mound now called Tell es-Sultan, on the NW outskirts of the modern town. NT or Herodian Jericho is located on a higher elevation one mile W of the modern city in the ruins on both banks of the Wadi Qelt; this site is known as Tulul Abu el-*-*Alayiq. Jericho is probably the oldest city in the world. Its strategic site by a ford of the Jordan controlled the ancient trade routes from the E. After crossing the river these branched out, one going toward BETHEL and SHECHEM in the N, another westward to JERUSALEM, and a third to HEBRON in the S. Thus Jericho controlled the access to the hill country of Palestine from TRANSJORDAN.

II. Jericho in the Bible. Jericho first enters the biblical record when it is captured by JOSHUA and the invading Hebrews as the opening wedge of their campaign to take CANAAN (Josh. 6). The city's location made its capture the key to the invasion of the central hill country. It was regarded as a formidable obstacle by the Hebrews. After the two spies had searched it (ch. 2), Joshua led the Hebrew forces against the city, marching around it daily for six days. On the seventh day they circled it seven times, then shouted and blew their trumpets, and "the wall collapsed; so every man charged straight in, and they took the city" (6:20). The city was devoted to God, totally destroyed and burned except for metal objects found in it (6:17-19). Only RAHAB and her family, who had cared for the spies, was saved (6:22-23, 25). Joshua placed a curse on the place, that it might not be rebuilt (6:26). The site seems to have remained a ruin for centuries. Jericho next became prominent when it was rebuilt by HIEL the Bethelite in the days of AHAB (c. 850 B.C.; 1 Ki. 16:34). Evidently it again became an important place during the divided kingdom era. It is mentioned in connection with ELISHA's ministry (2 Ki. 2:4-5, 19; see also 25:5; 2 Chr. 28:15; Ezra 2:34; Neh. 3:2; 7:36; Jer. 39:5).

Looking SE across the site of OT Jericho.

In the time of Christ, Jericho was an important place yielding a large revenue to the royal family. Here was HEROD the Great's winter palace, containing a sunken garden, two large pools, a large Roman bath, two courtyards, a reception hall, and buildings with six private mikvehs (baptistries) dating to the second century B.C. Since the road from the fords of the Jordan to Jerusalem passed through Jericho, it became a stopping place for Galilean pilgrims to Jerusalem, who came S through PEREA to avoid defilement by contact with SAMARITANS. Thus Jesus passed through it on a number of occasions. Nearby are the supposed sites of his baptism (in the Jordan) and his temptation (the hill Quarantania, W of the city). Near the city Jesus healed BARTIMAEUS (Mk. 10:46-52) and one or two other blind men (Matt. 20:29-34). The conversion of ZACCHAEUS occurred here (Lk. 19:1-10), one of the most graphic of the gospel narratives. In the parable of the Good Samaritan (10:29-37) the traveler was attacked as he was going down from Jerusalem to Jericho, a winding road, often passing between crags, going through the desolate Judean wilderness, which was frequently a hiding place of criminals.

III. The archaeology of Jericho. The earliest evidence of settlement on Tell es-Sultan is dated (by radiocarbon tests) to the seventh and sixth millennia B.C., when a prepottery Neolithic town was built there. A surprisingly strong city wall, mud-brick and stone houses, plastered floors with reed mats, and clay figurines of animals and the mother goddess show that the civilization was not crude. Of special interest from this period are several human skulls with the features modeled in clay and with shells for eyes, used possibly for cultic purposes. This is one of the oldest cities known—having existed some 5,000 years before ABRAHAM!

Of greatest interest to the Bible student is the archaeological evidence bearing on the overthrow of the city in the days of Joshua. About this Late-Bronze-Age city there has been dispute ever since John Garstang's early excavations (1930-36); and Kathleen Kenyon's reports in the 1950s, which scholars had hoped would solve the mystery, only accentuated the problem. Garstang believed that he had found ample evidence of Joshua's destruction of the Late-Bronze-Age city, which he labeled "city D" and dated to the fifteenth century B.C. He found that this city had been surrounded by a double wall that encircled the summit of the mound, the inner wall 12 ft. (almost 4 m.) thick, and the outer, 6 ft. (2 m.). These walls had been violently destroyed and had toppled down the slopes of the mound. Layers of ash and charcoal testified to the burning of the city by its captors, and great amounts of charred grain and other foodstuffs suggested the total destruction of which the Bible speaks. Not all of Garstang's fellow archaeologists accepted his reconstructions, and the world of scholarship awaited Kenyon's findings.

After seven seasons at Jericho, Kenyon reported that virtually nothing remains of the Jericho of the period of Joshua (1500-1200 B.C.). The mound has suffered such denudation that almost all remains later than the third millennium B.C. have disappeared. According to Kenyon, the two walls that Garstang connected with his "city D" should be dated about the third millennium, hundreds of years before the EXODUS; only a bit of pottery and possibly one building remain from the Late Bronze Age. If there was once evidence of a great city of Jericho destroyed by Joshua, she believes that it has long since been eaten away by the elements. Much of the evidence on this subject that was written about prior to 1952—often written with the best intentions to "prove" the truth of the Bible—must now be reconsidered. A number of scholars now believe that the Jericho of Joshua's day was little more than a fort.

It is unlikely that the problem of Jericho will ever be solved by further archaeological work. The many successive years of digging have left the tell in a mixed-up condition, and it may be that other cities mentioned in the conquest narrative in Joshua (e.g., HAZOR) will now more readily yield their answers. In the meantime, the thoughtful Christian will not forget the mutability of scientific theories.

Jeriel. jīhr'ī-uhl (Heb. yērî'ēl H3741, "God sees [me]"). Son of TOLA and grandson of ISSACHAR, described as head of family (1 Chr. 7:2).

Jerijah. See JERIAH.

Jerimoth. jer'i-moth (Heb. yērîmôt H3748, variant yērēmôt H3756, possibly “stout” or “exalted”). (1) Son of BELA and grandson of BENJAMIN (1 Chr. 7:7).

(2) One of the ambidextrous Benjamite warriors who joined DAVID while he was in exile from SAUL at the PHILISTINE city of ZIKLAG (1 Chr. 12:5; cf. v. 2).

(3) Son (or descendant) of Mushi; he was one of the descendants of LEVI through MERARI appointed by DAVID to work in the temple (1 Chr. 23:23 [KJV, NRSV, “Jeremoth”]; 24:30).

(4) Son of HEMAN, David’s seer (1 Chr. 25:4). He and his thirteen brothers were set apart “for the ministry of prophesying, accompanied by harps, lyres and cymbal” (v. 1). When lots were cast to determine the duties of the Levitical singers, he, along with his sons and relatives, received the fifteenth lot (v. 22 [KJV and other versions, “Jeremoth”]).

(5) Son of Azriel; an officer over the tribe of NAPHTALI during the reign of David (1 Chr. 27:19 [RSV, “Jeremoth”]).

(6) Son of David and father of MAHALATH; the latter married REHOBOAM (2 Chr. 11:18). The name of Jerimoth does not appear in any of the lists of David’s sons, and some scholars argue that the text is not reliable.

(7) A Levite included in the list of supervisors of the temple storerooms during the reign of HEZEKIAH (2 Chr. 31:13).

Jerioth. jer'ee-oth (Heb. yērî'ôt H3750, possibly “fearful” or “tents”). Wife of CALEB son of Hezron (1 Chr. 2:18). The MT is difficult, however, and can be interpreted in different ways: (a) Jerioth may be another name for Caleb’s wife AZUBAH; (b) Azubah had been previously the wife of a man called Jerioth; (c) Jerioth was the daughter of Caleb and Azubah. Other suggestions have been made.

Jeroboam. jer'uh-boh'uhm (Heb. yārāb 'ām H3716, “the people are great” or “my kinsman [= deity?] is great”). The name of two kings of the northern kingdom of ISRAEL.

(1) Jeroboam I. Son of Nebat, from the tribe of EPHRAIM, and of Zeruah, a widow (1 Ki. 11:26-40). Jeroboam founded the kingdom of Israel when the nation was split following the death of SOLOMON. His father was an official under Solomon and came from the village of ZEREDAH. As a young man Jeroboam showed such ability that Solomon put him in charge of the fortifications and public works at JERUSALEM and made him overseer of the levy from the house of Joseph (11:28). However, he used his position to stir up dissatisfaction against the government. This was not difficult to do, as the people were already filled with bitterness because of the enforced labor and burdensome taxation imposed on them by Solomon.

One day, as he was walking outside Jerusalem, Jeroboam was met by the prophet AHIJAH of SHILOH. Ahijah tore a new mantle into twelve pieces and gave ten of them to Jeroboam, informing him that because of the idolatrous nature of Solomon's reign the kingdom would be torn apart. Two of the tribes would remain with DAVID's dynasty, while Jeroboam would become the head of the other ten. He also told him that if as king he walked in the fear of the Lord and kept his commandments, the kingdom would be his and that of his descendants for many years. When news of these happenings reached Solomon, he tried to kill Jeroboam; but the latter escaped to EGYPT, where he was kindly received by SHISHAK (who had succeeded the PHARAOH whose daughter Solomon had married). As soon as Solomon died, Jeroboam returned from Egypt. When the people met at SHECHEM to proclaim Solomon's son REHOBAM king, they invited Jeroboam to come and take the lead in presenting their grievances. As spokesman of the people, he urged that their burdens be alleviated, but the protest was contemptuously rejected; therefore the ten tribes revolted from the house of David and made Jeroboam their king (1 Ki. 12:1-16). In this way Ahijah's prophecy that the ten tribes would form a separate kingdom with Jeroboam as king was fulfilled (12:15).

Although Jeroboam had been divinely set apart for his task, and although he had been raised to the throne with the full approval of the people, he failed to rise to the greatness of his opportunities. The prophet had told him the conditions of success as a ruler, but it was not long before he began to depart from the counsels of the Lord. Afraid that if his people went annually to Jerusalem to worship it would not be long before they would be won back to the house of David, he decided to establish centers of worship at the two extremities of his kingdom—DAN in the N and BETHEL in the S (1 Ki. 12:26-30). This was at variance with the LAW of MOSES, according to which there was to be but one altar of burnt offering and one place of meeting God. His disobedience became much greater when, in defiance of the commandment forbidding the worship of God by means of images, he set up a golden calf in each of the new sanctuaries and quoted to the people the words of AARON, "Here are your gods, O Israel, who brought you up out of Egypt" (12:28; cf. Exod. 32:4).

These radical decisions brought about other necessary changes. Since legitimate priests refused to serve at the new altars, Jeroboam had to find others to take their place “from all sorts of people” (1 Ki. 12:31). Furthermore, he “built shrines on high places” (12:31) and ordained that the Feast of Tabernacles, which had been held in the seventh month, should now be observed in the eighth month. He even sometimes took it on himself to minister in the priests’ office (12:33). The mass of people conformed to the new religious ways. This was the sin that Jeroboam “caused Israel to commit, so that they provoked the LORD...to anger by their worthless idols” (16:26). He sacrificed the higher interests of religion to politics. To establish his throne firmly, he led the people into the immoralities of heathenism, which led eventually to the destruction of the nation. The successive kings, with one partial exception (J^{EHU}), supported this idolatrous worship until Israel fell.

Although Jeroboam made Israel sin by introducing idolatrous religious customs, God gave him a solemn warning to give heed to his evil ways through an unnamed prophet who came to Bethel from Judah (1 Ki. 13:1-6). One day—apparently the very day the altar was consecrated—as Jeroboam stood ministering at the altar, the man of God suddenly appeared before the king and foretold that the time would come when a member of the Davidic dynasty would desecrate that altar by burning men’s bones on it, a prophecy that was fulfilled in the time of J^{OSIAH} (cf. 2 Ki. 23:15-16). When the king heard these words, he pointed to the prophet and cried out, “Seize him!” The hand that was extended instantly withered and became useless, and the altar was split in two so that the ashes spilled to the ground. The king then asked the prophet to pray that his hand might be restored. The prophet prayed, and the hand was restored. He refused the king’s invitation to go home with him to dine, saying that it was against the will of God, and then left for home. In spite of this terrible warning from God, Jeroboam continued in his evil way, so that God decided to cut off and destroy his house.

At a later date, exactly when is not clear, Jeroboam's oldest son fell seriously ill. The distraught father thought of Ahijah, now old and blind, and sent his queen to him in disguise to find out whether the child would live. The prophet saw through her disguise and told her not only that the child would die, but that the house of Jeroboam would be utterly destroyed by someone whom the Lord would raise up to be king of Israel (1 Ki. 14:1-18).

There was desultory warfare between Jeroboam and Rehoboam (1 Ki. 15:6), and a great battle was fought between Jeroboam and Rehoboam's successor, ABIJAH. The army of Israel was thoroughly routed and was defeated with great slaughter, and Bethel, only a few miles from Jerusalem, was captured by Abijah (2 Chr. 13). Jeroboam reigned for twenty-two years and was succeeded to the throne by his son NADAB (2 Ki. 14:20).

For the people of Israel, the reign of Jeroboam was a supreme political and religious calamity. The warfare between the two kingdoms inevitably brought weakness to both, leaving them open to outside attack. The introduction of the golden calves led to the "baalization" of the religion of the Lord. In about 200 years the moral and religious corruption of the people had gone so far that there was no more hope for them, and God brought in a heathen power to lead them into captivity.

(2) Jeroboam II. Son and successor of JEHOASH king of ISRAEL; fourth ruler of the dynasty of JEHU. Jeroboam II became king in SAMARIA c. 790 B.C. and reigned forty-one years. He followed the example of Jeroboam I in keeping up the idolatrous worship of the golden calves (2 Ki. 14:23). In spite of this, his reign outwardly flourished. He ruled at the same time as AMAZIAH (14:23) and UZZIAH (15:1), kings of JUDAH. He continued and brought to a successful conclusion the wars that his father had undertaken against SYRIA. He took their chief cities, DAMASCUS and HAMATH, which had once been subject to DAVID, and restored to Israel territory E of the JORDAN from LEBANON to the DEAD SEA (14:25; Amos 6:14). MOAB and AMMON were reconquered (Amos 1:13; 2:1-3).

All these successful wars brought much tribute to Jeroboam and his nobles. The wealthy had both winter and summer homes; some lived in houses of ivory, others in houses of hewn stone. The prophet AMOS, contemporary with Jeroboam in the king's later years, gives us a graphic description of a banqueting scene in which the perfumed guests lay on silken cushions, eating the flesh of lambs and stall-fed calves, drinking wine from bowls, and enjoying the music of harps (Amos 6:4-6). But side by side with this luxury there was much poverty in the land. Twice the prophet says that the needy were sold for a pair of shoes (2:6; 8:6). No one was grieved for the afflictions of the poor or was distressed for the corruption that prevailed in the land. Drunkenness, licentiousness, and oppression went unchecked by the religious hierarchy.

Not that the land was devoid of religion. Worship went on not only at DAN and BETHEL, but also at subsidiary temples and altars at GILGAL and BEERSHEBA (Amos 4:4; 5:5; 8:14), places with long religious associations. Amos complained that ritual was substituted for righteousness (5:21-22), that devotees prostrated themselves before altars clothed in garments taken in cruel pledge, and that they drank sacrificial wine bought with the money of those who were condemned (2:8).

During the reign of Jeroboam not only Amos, but also the prophets HOSEA, JOEL, and JONAH ministered. In 2 Ki. 14:25 we are told that Jonah son of Amittai predicted the large extension of the territory of Israel by Jeroboam. This is the same prophet whose mission to NINEVEH forms the subject of the book of Jonah (Jon. 1:1). Amos says that he was commanded by God to go to Bethel to testify against the whole proceedings there. He was to foretell the destruction of the sanctuaries of Israel and of the house of Jeroboam (Amos 7:9). When Amaziah, the high priest of Bethel, heard this denunciation, he sent a messenger to Jeroboam with a report of a “conspiracy,” claiming that Amos had declared, “Jeroboam will die by the sword” (7:10-11). There are some who regard this as a prophecy that was not fulfilled, as there is no evidence that the king died other than a natural death, for he was buried with his ancestors in state (2 Ki. 14:29). The probability, however, is that the high priest, in order to inflame Jeroboam against the prophet, gave his words an unwarranted twist.

Jeroboam was succeeded on his death by his son ZECHARIAH (2 Ki. 14:29), a weak king with whom the dynasty ended.

Jeroham. ji-roh´ham (Heb. yērōḥām H3736, derivation debated). (1) Son (or descendant) of Elihu, father of ELKANAH, and grandfather of SAMUEL (1 Sam. 1:1). In the Levitical genealogies of KORAH, his immediate ancestor is given as Eliab or Eliel (1 Chr. 6:27, 34). He may have been a nonpracticing LEVITE domiciled in the tribe of EPHRAIM.

(2) A descendant of BENJAMIN whose sons are listed among the heads of families living in JERUSALEM (1 Chr. 8:27; cf. v. 28). He is usually identified with JEREMOTH (v. 14).

(3) Descendant of Benjamin and father of Ibeniah; the latter was an early settler in Jerusalem following the EXILE (1 Chr. 9:8; cf. vv. 2-3).

(4) Son (or descendant) of Passhur and father of Adaiah; the latter is included in a list of priests who were heads of families and who are described as “able men, responsible for ministering in the house of God” in postexilic Jerusalem (1 Chr. 9:12-13; in Neh. 11:12 his immediate ancestor listed is Pelaliah, with Passhur given as a more distant ancestor).

(5) A Benjamite living in GEDOR whose two sons, JOELAH and ZEBADIAH, were among the ambidextrous warriors who joined DAVID at ZIKLAG (1 Chr. 12:7).

(6) Father of AZAREL; the latter was an officer over the tribe of DAN during David’s reign (1 Chr. 27:22).

(7) Father of AZARIAH; the latter was a military commander who assisted the high priest JEHOIADA in the successful overthrow of the apostate queen ATHALIAH (2 Chr. 23:1).

Jerub-Baal. ji’ruhb-bay’uhl (Heb. yērubba ʿal H3715, prob. “Baal contends [for me]”). Also Jerubbaal. The name given to GIDEON when he destroyed his father’s BAAL altar at OPHRAH. The text says, “So that day they called Gideon ‘Jerub-Baal,’ saying, ‘Let Baal contend with him,’ because he broke down Baal’s altar” (Jdg. 6:32; the name is also used in 7:1; 8:29, 35; ch. 9; and 1 Sam. 12:11). Some suggest that prior to this incident Jerub-Baal had been his name, reflecting the syncretism which then prevailed among the Israelites, but that his act of iconoclasm gave it a new significance. The Hebrew word ba ʿal H1251 means “lord, owner,” and in the early history of Israel was sometimes applied to the true God. Later, when the term came to be regarded as disgraceful, the name Jerub-Baal was altered to Jerub-Besheth (from bōšet H1425, “shame,” 2 Sam. 11:21); cf. ISH-BOSHETH and MEPHIBOSHETH.

Jerub-Besheth. ji-rub’uh-sheth (Heb. yērubbešet H3717, deformation of yērubba ʿal H3715). Also Jerubbesheth. See JERUB-BAAL.

Jeruel. ji-roo’uhl (Heb. yērû ʾēl H3725, “foundation of God”). An area in the Judean wilderness where King JEHOSHAPHAT defeated a Transjordanian coalition (2 Chr. 20:16). The exact location is not known, but it was apparently between the Pass of ZIZ (just N or NW of EN GEDI, cf. v. 2) and the Desert of TEKOA (cf. v. 20).

Jerusalem. ji-roo’suh-luhm (Heb. yērûšālaïm H3731 [also yērûšālayim], prob. “foundation of peace”; Aram. yērûšlem H10332; Gk. Ierousalēm G2647 [variant Hierosolyma], gentilic Hierosolymitēs G2643). The most important city on earth in the history of God’s REVELATION and REDEMPTION. It was the royal city, the capital of the only kingdom God has established on earth. Here the TEMPLE was erected, and here, during the kingdom age, sacrifices were legitimately offered. This was the city of the prophets, as well as the kings of DAVID's line. Here occurred the death, resurrection, and ascension of Jesus CHRIST, David's greatest Son. The HOLY SPIRIT descended at PENTECOST on an assembled group in this city, giving birth to the Christian CHURCH; and here the first great church council was held. Rightly did the chronicler refer to Jerusalem as "the city the LORD had chosen out of all the tribes of Israel in which to put his Name" (1 Ki. 14:21). Even the first-century Roman historian Pliny referred to Jerusalem as "by far the most famous city of the ancient Orient." This city has been the preeminent objective of the pilgrimages of devout men and women for over 2,000 years, and it was in an attempt to recover the Church of the Holy Sepulchre in Jerusalem that the Crusades were organized. No site in all Scripture receives such constant and exalted praise as Jerusalem. Concerning no place in the world have such promises been made of ultimate glory and permanent peace.

I. Names of the city. While the word Jerusalem is Semitic, it apparently was not a name given to the city for the first time by the HEBREW PEOPLE. Far back in the time of the AMARNA Letters (1400 B.C.), it was called Urusalim, that is, a city of Salim, generally taken to mean "city of peace." In the records of Sennacherib it is called Ursalimu. The Romans, at the time of HADRIAN, A.D. 135, changed the name to Aelia Capitolina. For some centuries now the Arabs have called the city El-Kuds el-Sharif, which means "the Sanctuary." Some argue that SALEM is to be taken as the name of a Canaanitic deity (thus "foundation/city of the god Shalem"), but the evidence is not persuasive. Salem was probably the earlier name for the city, the name given it in the memorable interview of ABRAHAM with MELCHIZEDEK, the king of Salem (Gen. 14:18; Ps. 76:2). Because the very name of the city means "peace," we are told that in this place God himself will give PEACE (Hag. 2:9). The children of God are exhorted to pray for the peace of Jerusalem (Ps. 122:6). ISAIAH, at the end of his great series of prophecies, returns to the theme, "For this is what the Lord says: 'I will extend peace to her like a river'" (Isa. 66:12).

The name Jerusalem itself occurs about six hundred times in the OT, though it is not found in Job, Hosea, Jonah, Nahum, Habakkuk, and Haggai. In the NT, it is mentioned almost eighty times, but rather infrequently after the close of the book of Acts. The name most often used for this city, apart from Jerusalem itself, is ZION, which occurs over one hundred times in the OT, beginning as early as 2 Ki. 19:21 and found most often in the book of PSALMS and the prophecy of Isaiah (Isa. 1:8; 4:4-5; 62:11). Zion appears in the NT in some interesting passages: twice on the lips of our Lord (Matt. 21:5; Jn. 12:15), twice in Romans (9:33; 11:36), and in 1 Pet. 2:6 and Rev. 14:1. Jerusalem is often called “the city of David” (2 Sam. 5:7, 9; 6:10-16; Neh. 3:15; 12:37; Isa. 22:9). This title is later applied to BETHLEHEM (Lk. 2:4, 11).

The greatest group of titles for Jerusalem are those that identify it as the city of God. It is called this in the Psalms, as well as in the NT (Ps. 46:4; 48:1, 8; 87:3; Heb. 12:22; Rev. 3:12). It is also called the city of the Lord (Isa. 60:14), the mountain of the Lord (2:3; 30:29), the mountain of the Lord Almighty (Zech. 8:3), Zion of the Holy One of Israel (Isa. 60:14). The Lord himself refers to it, and to no other place, as “my city” (45:13), or more often, “my holy mountain” (11:9; 56:7; 57:13; 65:11, 25; 66:20). Because it is the city of God, where he has put his Name, it is often referred to as the Holy City (48:2; 52:1; Neh. 11:1-18), a title used twice by Matthew (4:5; 27:53), once of a future event by John (Rev. 11:2), and used also in referring to our eternal heavenly home at the close of the Scriptures (21:2; 22:19). Generally, the phrase “the holy mountain” refers to this city (e.g., Ps. 48:1; Isa. 11:9; 27:13; Dan. 11:45). Once it is given the beautiful name of HEPHZIBAH, meaning “My delight is in her” (Isa. 62:4). Isaiah in one passage calls the city ARIEL, the meaning of which is disputed (29:1, 2, 7), a word that in itself probably means “Lion of God.” At the beginning of his prophecy Isaiah gives two titles to the city in most radical contrast. He designates it, because of its wickedness, as SODOM and GOMORRAH (1:10); but in the same passage he promises that the day will come when it will be accurately called “the City of Righteousness” (1:26).

II. The site. Unlike most cities that have witnessed great historical events over many centuries, Jerusalem has always remained on the same site. It is situated 34 mi. (55 km.) E of the MEDITERRANEAN and only 17 mi. (27 km.) W of the JORDAN River, at an elevation of c. 2,550 ft. (780 m.) above sea level. Geologically speaking, the city rests on three hills. The SE hill was the original city of the JEBUSITES, the city that David seized, later to be called Zion; it occupied only about 8-10 acres (3-4 hectares), and its shape was similar to that of a human footprint about 1,250 ft. (380 m.) long and 400 ft. (120 m.) wide. The area of the fortress city of MEGIDDO in contrast was 30 acres (12 hectares). The N hill was the one on which SOLOMON built the great temple and his own palace (see OPHEL). On the E and SE of these two hills was a deep valley known as the KIDRON. To the S and SW of the city was another deep valley called the HINNOM. Down through the middle of the city, running N-S, was a third depression—now built over and discernible only by careful investigation of the contours of the rock level—called the Tyropoeon Valley. These valleys today give no idea of their original depth, for debris has filled them up in some places to a depth of 50-60 ft. (15-18 m.).

Old Testament Jerusalem.

The city never occupied what could be called a large area. Even in the time of HEROD the Great, the area within the walls was not more than 1 mi. (c. 1.5 km.) in length, nor more than 0.6 mi. (1 km.) in width. The city was off the beaten path of the great caravan routes and was not, as most larger world capitals, on a navigable river or on a large body of water. Its site, therefore, had an exclusiveness about it. On the other hand, being 20 mi. (32 km.) N of HEBRON and 30 mi. (48 km.) S of SAMARIA, it was centrally located to serve as the capital of the Hebrew kingdom. Many travelers have testified to the fact that Jerusalem “from whatever direction it is approached, can be seen only when one has arrived in its immediate vicinity: a peculiarity which always brought a moment of pleasant surprise to travelers of bygone days” (J. Simons).

III. Walls and gates. The matter of Israel’s gates and walls is complicated and has given rise to a great many technical disagreements; it can be discussed here only in a general way. Because of the deep valleys on the E, S, and W of the city, it was only the N side that could be easily penetrated by an invading army. The walls on the E and W were built on the ridges of these valleys. There was probably in early days a wall extending far below the present southern wall structure. The first northern wall extended from what is called the Jaffa Gate to the middle of the great temple area. The second northern wall began at the Jaffa Gate, extended northward and then curved to the E to the Tower of ANTONIA, just beyond the northern end of the temple area. The modern wall extends N and then E from the northern end of the western wall to the northern end of the present eastern wall. There was a third northern wall of which we have become aware only during the days of modern excavation.

Several ancient gates (including some that go back to biblical times) are still identifiable today. Beginning at the SE end of the early wall is the DUNG GATE; moving northward one comes to the FOUNTAIN GATE; and then, nearly in the middle of the wall of the old temple area, the famous now-closed Golden Gate. Above this is Stephen's Gate. Turning W on the northern modern wall, one comes to Herod's Gate, then the much-used Damascus Gate, and then toward the end of this northern wall, the New Gate. Turning left again at the western wall, one comes to the last of the gates now in use, the Jaffa Gate, from where the road proceeds to the Mediterranean. The present wall, though much of it is, no doubt, on the site of earlier walls, was built by Soliman II about A.D. 1540, extending for 2.5 mi. (4 km.), with an average height of 38 ft. (12 m.).

IV. History. The early history of Jerusalem is wrapped in obscurity. The first reference to Jerusalem in secular annals is in the famous AMARNA Letters of the fourteenth century, in which is found some interesting correspondence from the governor of this city, Abd-Khiba, addressed to the PHARAOH of Egypt, complaining that his city is being threatened and that the Egyptians are not giving him the support he needs and expected. There is, however, a reference to the Jebusites, who are the ones who inhabited the city of JEBUS, that is, Jerusalem, as early as the great ethnological passage in Gen. 10:15-19. Actually, the first reference to Jerusalem as such is found in the account of Abraham's interview with Melchizedek, king of Salem (14:17-24). Here is the first occurrence of the word priest in the Bible, and because Melchizedek was the "priest of God Most High" we are compelled to believe that even before the nation Israel was founded, and perhaps eight hundred years before this site was taken by David, there was a witness to the true God at this place. While there is some difference of view on this point, many believe, and tradition is unanimous here, that the place where Abraham offered up ISAAC at Mount MORIAH (22:2; 2 Chr. 3:1) is the exact site on which, centuries later, the temple of Solomon was built. JOSEPHUS himself affirms that Jerusalem was in existence during the days of Abraham (Ant. 1.10.2; 7.11.3).

The actual name Jerusalem occurs for the first time in Josh. 10:5, where the king of the city confederated with four other kings in a futile attempt to defeat JOSHUA. In the same book it is frankly confessed that the Israelites were unable to drive out the Jebusites from the city (15:8, 63; 18:28). At the beginning of the book of Judges it is stated, however, that the Israelites in an hour of victory overwhelmed a large opposing force including Adoni-Bezek and "brought him to Jerusalem," where he died (Jdg. 1:7). This seems to imply that for a brief space the Israelites held part of this city but were not able to keep it (1:21).

Nothing is known of the history of Jerusalem either from biblical or nonbiblical writings from the time of Joshua's death until the capture of this city by David (2 Sam. 5:6-10; probably 998 B.C.). No doubt the fortress that David took is that which later came to be called Zion, located on the SE hill, and outside of the present walls of the city. Kraeling estimates that the population of this city during David's time did not exceed 1,230 inhabitants. Later David purchased "the threshing floor of Araunah the Jebusite" (24:18; 1 Chr. 21:18-28) where the great temple of Solomon was later erected. After finishing the temple, Solomon built a magnificent palace to the N of it.

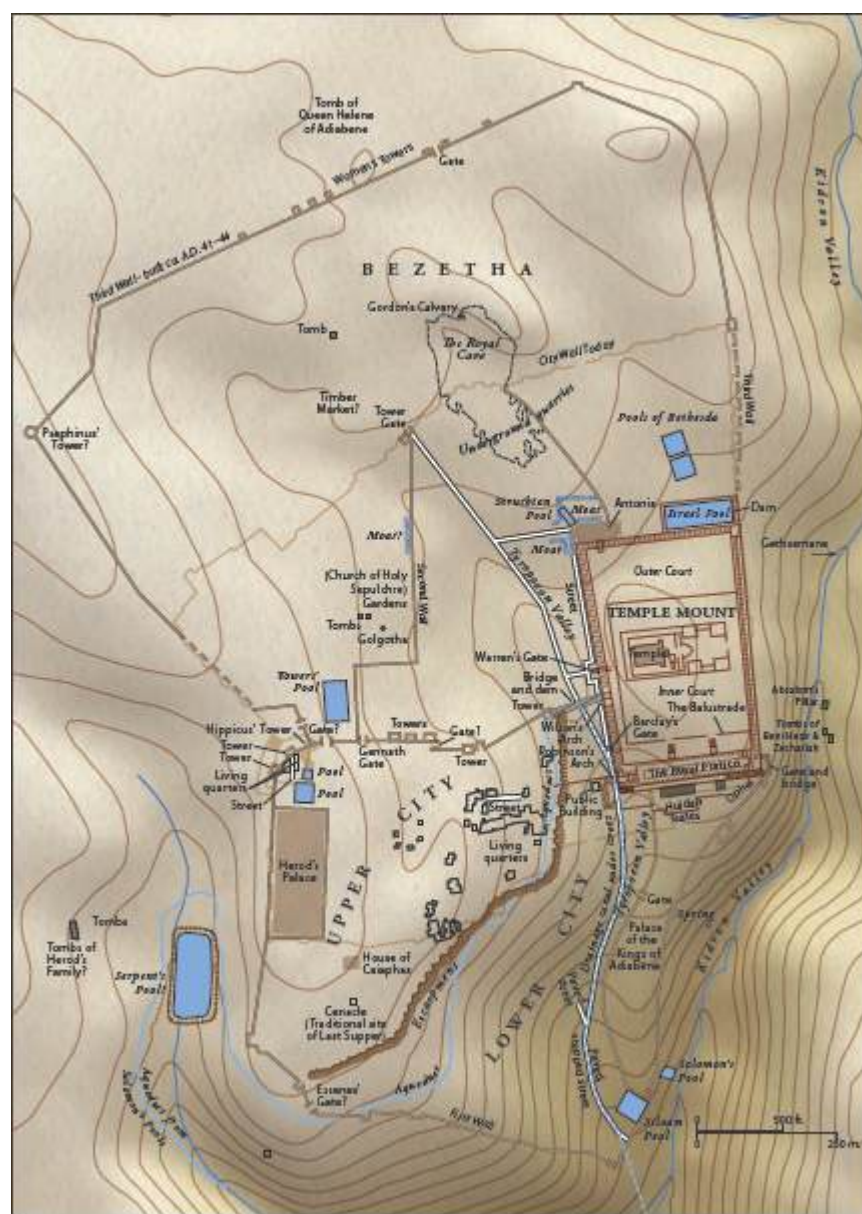

With the death of Solomon, the glory of Israel and so also the glory of Jerusalem began to dim. In the fifth year of REHOBOAM, 917 B.C., SHISHAK king of Egypt came up to Jerusalem and, without any struggle, "carried off the treasures of the temple of the LORD and the treasures of the royal palace. He took everything, including all the gold shields Solomon had made" (1 Ki. 14:26; 2 Chr. 12:9). This is the first of eight different plunderings of the Jerusalem temple, occurring within a little more than three hundred years. Not only must its wealth have been fabulously great, but also doubtless in times of national prosperity the more religiously inclined citizens of Judah would bestow new treasures on the temple. Only a short time later ASA (911-871) bribed BEN-HADAD king of ARAM (SYRIA) by taking "all the silver and gold that was left in the treasuries of the LORD's temple and of his own palace" and sending them to him (1 Ki. 15:18). Twice, then, within a few years after Solomon's death, Judah's kings prevented an invasion of the city only by bribing her enemies with the treasures of the Lord's house.

Again during the reign of JEHOAM (850-843 B.C.), in an episode about which we know very little, the Arabians and Philistines "carried off all the goods found in the king's palace, together with his sons and wives" (2 Chr. 21:16-17). For the fourth time within a century and a half after the death of Solomon, the temple treasures were used for bribing a threatening enemy, by Joash (JEHOASH, 837-800), who "took all the sacred objects dedicated by his fathers...and the gifts he himself had dedicated and all the gold found in the treasuries of the temple of the LORD and of the royal palace, and he sent them to Hazael king of Aram, who then withdrew from Jerusalem" (2 Ki. 12:18). Thus far it had been foreign kings that were bribed with these treasures, but the fifth occasion involved Jehoash, king of Israel (801-786). Coming up to Jerusalem, he broke down the western wall for a length of c. 600 ft. (185 m.), and then "took all the gold and silver and all the articles found in the temple of the LORD and in the treasuries of the royal palace. He also took hostages and returned to Samaria" (2 Ki. 14:13-14; 2 Chr. 25:23).

One attack on the city of Jerusalem failed in the reign of AHAZ (733-714 B.C.), when REZIN king of Syria and REMALIAH king of Israel were repulsed in their attempt to seize the temple (2 Ki. 16:5). However, while Ahaz was still king, a mighty king of ASSYRIA, TIGLATH-PILESER III (745-737) came up to Jerusalem. "Ahaz took some of the things from the temple of the LORD and from the royal palace and from the princes and presented them to the king of Assyria, but that did not help him" (2 Chr. 28:20-21).

In 701 B.C. occurred an event to which the OT gives more space, with greater detail, than even to the destruction of Jerusalem by NEBUCHADNEZZAR. SENNACHERIB of Assyria (704-681) threatened the city, casting one insult after another in the face of King HEZEKIAH (715-687), reminding him that he, Sennacherib, had already captured practically every city of Judah, and how could the king think Jerusalem would escape? But by divine intervention, with God's assurance that the king would this time be kept from invasion, Sennacherib's army suffered a mysterious destruction, and he returned to Assyria without fulfilling his threat (2 Ki. 18-19; 2 Chr. 32; Isa. 36).

New Testament Jerusalem.

Another century passed during which we know very little of Jerusalem's history. In 605 B.C. Nebuchadnezzar king of BABYLON forced Judah's king JEHOIAKIM into submission. After three years, the king of Judah foolishly revolted, and this brought Nebuchadnezzar back to the city in 597, leading eventually to its final destruction. It is estimated that some 60,000 citizens were carried away to Babylon at this time, and the remaining treasures of the temple were also removed, to be restored again in the days of EZRA (2 Ki. 24:1—25:21; 2 Chr. 36:1-21; Jer. 52). As Jeremiah vividly reminds us, "The kings of the earth did not believe, nor did any of the world's people, that enemies and foes could enter the gates of Jerusalem" (Lam. 4:12).

Although the postexilic books of Ezra and Nehemiah are filled with details regarding Jerusalem, we mention only the two main events they record. Under ZERUBBABEL, the rebuilding of the temple by permission of DARIUS I was begun in 538 B.C., though due to many forms of opposition it was not finished until 516. Some sixty years later NEHEMIAH, cupbearer of the king of Persia, ARTAXERXES I, successfully undertook the rebuilding of the walls of the city (Neh. 1-6), followed by a great revival under the leadership of EZRA (Neh. 8-9). The condition of the city, however, even under these great leaders, was not one marked by prosperity; somehow it had lost its attractiveness for the Jews, necessitating a vigorous effort to bring people from outlying areas into the city to live (11:1). For the next hundred years, we again know very little of Jerusalem's history.

On the death of ALEXANDER THE GREAT in 323 B.C., the rulers of Egypt were known as Ptolemies, and those of Syria as the SELEUCIDS. In 320 Jerusalem came under the rule of PTOLEMY I Soter. A century later the city passed from the Ptolemies to the Seleucids. In 198 the powerful ANTIOCHUS III (the Great) took Jerusalem. He was welcomed by the Jews, who were rewarded when the Syrian king presented treasures to the temple. Any hope, however, that this would be the beginning of happier days for them was soon seen to be dashed. For in the next generation (169-168) there appeared the very type of Antichrist himself, Antiochus IV (Epiphanes), who desecrated the temple by sacrificing a pig on the altar; prohibited Jewish sacrifices, circumcision, and the observance of the Sabbath; and issued a decree that any Jew found possessing a copy of the Holy Scriptures should be killed; and great was the slaughter. See MACCABEE.

The events that followed next must be referred to only briefly. In 165 B.C. Jerusalem was delivered from its bitter yoke by Judas Maccabee on the twenty-fifth of the month of Kislev (November–December). Ever since, this time of deliverance has been celebrated by the Jews as Hanukkah, or the Feast of Lights (see DEDICATION, FEAST OF). Two years later, Antiochus V (Eupator) overthrew the walls and the temple, but soon after that the city again came into the hands of the Jewish authorities, and so it remained for almost a century.

The Romans now appeared on the scene. The city was besieged in 65 B.C. by a Roman general who, however, was ordered to desist, leaving the city open for the conquest by Pompey in 64, who destroyed Jerusalem's walls. The temple was again pillaged in 55 by Crassus. Fifteen years later the area was occupied by the PARTHIANS. The hour had struck for the rise of that cruel but gifted ruler whose name will be prominent as the NT narrative opens, HEROD the Great, made king of the Jews by AUGUSTUS in 40. He fought for the possession of the territory that had been given to him, but was not able to take Jerusalem until 37, after a siege of three months. Herod, like many other Romans, had a passion for erecting vast buildings, and out of this was born the determination to build what came to be known as Herod's temple, probably the most significant structure ever to stand on that holy site. He began its erection in 20 B.C. Herod died in 4 B.C., and not until A.D. 62 was the temple finished. In our Lord's day it presented a spectacle before which even the disciples seemed to stand in amazement (Matt. 24:1).

Entire books have been written on the single subject of Jesus and the city of Jerusalem. Here we can only summarize the relevant data. One is safe in saying that of the four gospel writers, it is LUKE who, though a GENTILE, seems to have had the greatest interest in this city. The opening events of our Lord's life occurring here are exclusively in the third gospel, and many of the concluding events are recorded only here as well. We begin with the ANNUNCIATION to ZECHARIAH, a priest in the temple (Lk. 1:5-22). When Jesus was a baby, he was taken up to Jerusalem for what is called his presentation (2:22-38). He then visited the city at the age of twelve (2:41-52). The principal episodes down to the last year of our Lord's life are given exclusively by JOHN THE APOSTLE. If we place Jesus' death in A.D. 30, then the first cleansing of the temple occurred in April of the year 27 (Jn. 2:13-25); in April in the year 28 the man at the Pool of BETHESDA was healed (5:1-47); in October of 29, Jesus went up to Jerusalem at the time of the Feast of Tabernacles (7:2); in December of 29, he was in Jerusalem for the Feast of Dedication (Lk. 10:22). Of course, the final week of Jesus' life was spent in and near the city of Jerusalem (Matt. 26:1—27:66; Mk. 11:1—15:47; Lk. 19:29—23:56; Jn. 12:12—19:42). Of the five appearances of Jesus on Easter Sunday, four are found only in Luke's gospel (Lk. 24). The sixth appearance in Jerusalem a week later is recorded only by John (Jn. 20:26-29). Jesus appeared in Jerusalem to all the disciples (Lk. 24:49; Acts 1:1-8), and from the Mount of OLIVES nearby he ascended (Lk. 24:50-53).

Our Lord made four principal statements about the city, all of them with a note of sadness. First, in stating that he must go up to Jerusalem, he declared, "Surely no prophet can die outside Jerusalem!" (Lk. 13:33). On Tuesday of Holy Week he cried out, "O Jerusalem, Jerusalem, you who kill the prophets and stone those sent to you, how often I have longed to gather your children together, as a hen gathers her chicks under her wings, but you were not willing" (Matt. 23:37). We are told by Luke that as Jesus wept over the city, he said sadly, "If you, even you, had only known on this day what would bring you peace—but now it is hidden from your eyes" (Lk. 19:42). Finally, he declared that the buildings of that city and its very walls would be thrown down, adding, "Jerusalem will be trampled on by the Gentiles until the times of the Gentiles are fulfilled" (Matt. 24:2; Mk. 13:2; Lk. 21:24).

The book of Acts opens with a group of the followers of Jesus meeting together in an upper room in Jerusalem, probably the place where the Lord's Supper was held, waiting for the fulfillment of the promise of Christ that they would be given power from on high. The church was born in Jerusalem on the Day of PENTECOST (Acts 2). The early persecutions occurred in that city toward these initial believers, and the SANHEDRIN that condemned Christ was now confronted with the phenomenon of a growing company of faithful followers of the crucified and risen Lord. In this city the first great crisis of the church was successfully faced in the first council, deciding forever the fact that salvation is wholly by grace, apart from works (ch. 15). Years later in this same city, the apostle PAUL was arrested, mobbed in the temple, and falsely accused (chs. 21-22).

Jerusalem in the time of Nehemiah.

The destruction of the city after a siege of 143 days by Roman armies under the leadership of TITUS, though predicted in the Gospels, is not actually recorded anywhere in the NT. Before this dreadful event concluded, an estimated 600,000 Jews were killed and thousands more were led away into captivity. One futile and tragic attempt of the Jews to win freedom from the Romans was concentrated in the rebellion of A.D. 132, led by the false messiah BAR KOKHBA. This rebellion was overwhelmingly crushed, and what was left of the city was leveled to the ground, even the foundations being plowed up. Two years later the Romans began rebuilding the city, now to be called Aelia Capitolina. All Jews were strictly excluded from this new city for two centuries, until the reign of Constantine. In the early part of the fourth century, due to the fervent devotion of Helena, the mother of the emperor, the great Church of the Holy Sepulchre called Anastasis (the Greek word for resurrection) was built. From then on, Jerusalem became increasingly the object of pilgrimages and of rich gifts. Jerome says, "It would be a long task to try to enumerate chronologically from the day of the ascension of our Lord until our own time, the bishops, martyrs, and doctors of the Church who came to Jerusalem, believing themselves to be deficient in religion, in science, and to possess only an imperfect standard of virtue until they had worshiped Christ on the very spot where the Gospel first shone from the gibbet."

For Jerusalem's subsequent history, only the barest outline can be given here. In A.D. 614 a Persian general under King Chosroes II seized the city and slaughtered 60,000 Christians, taking 35,000 more into slavery. In 628 Heraclius made peace with the son of the invader Chosroes, entering Jerusalem in triumph through the Golden Gate. In 637 the city capitulated to Omar the Galiph, who entered its precincts without bloodshed. In 688 the first Dome of the Rock was erected. Muhammad, more or less acquainted with both the OT and NT, felt it was necessary to be in some way identified with this city, holy to both Jews and Christians; and Islam soon interpreted a passage in the Koran as implying that Muhammad was miraculously carried to Jerusalem and was divinely consecrated there, but there is no real evidence for this journey. In 969 Jerusalem fell under the power of the Shi'a caliph of Egypt. In 1009 the caliph Hakim, son of a Christian mother, began his devastating work in Jerusalem by ordering the destruction of the Church of the Holy Sepulchre. By 1014 some 30,000 churches in Palestine had been burned or pillaged. In 1077 a general of the Seljuk Turks drove out the Egyptians, slaughtering some 3,000 residing within the walls of the city.

A new era—pitiful, sad, and shameful—now dawned for Jerusalem. On June 7, 1099, the Christian army of the First Crusade camped before Jerusalem. The city was seized on July 14, and the awful slaughter pursued by these so-called Christian knights was something that the Muslim world has never forgotten or forgiven. For eighty years the city knew no other enemy at her gates. There then came on the stage of history the truly great Saladin who, after his overwhelming victory in his battle with the Crusaders at the Horns of Hattin, camped before the city on September 20, 1187. He entered it on October 2, enforcing strict orders that no violence or orgy of conquest should be engaged in by his soldiers such as the Christian Crusaders had participated in almost a century before. By this act of mercy he put the Christians to shame. But the city was not to know peace. In 1229, it was regained by Frederick II, through negotiations. In 1244 it fell before the Kharezmian Tartars. In 1247 it was seized again by the Egyptians. In 1260 it was recaptured by the Tartars. In 1517 it was taken by the Ottoman Turks, who held it for four centuries. On December 9, 1917, the British General Allenby entered the city on foot; on October 31, 1918, the armistice was signed, and 400 years of Turkish misrule came to an end.

On April 24, 1920, the mandate for Palestine and Transjordan was assigned to Great Britain, and for nearly thirty years she suffered one reverse after another in attempting to rule the country. On May 14, 1948, the British mandate terminated, and the National Council at Tel-Aviv proclaimed the State of Israel. There followed the bitter, often brutal war for Palestine, as a result of which nearly a million Arabs were driven from their homes. By the spring of 1949, Israel was recognized by forty-five governments. The struggle with the Arab bloc of nations has unhappily continued. One round of hostilities ended in 1967 with the end of Arab administration in the Old City, and the assumption of Israeli control over the whole city of Jerusalem.

Jerusalem, new. A name found twice in the Bible (Rev. 3:12; 21:2) where the new Jerusalem is described as coming down out of heaven from God. In Rev. 21:2 it is also called “the Holy City,” and in 21:10, “the Holy City, Jerusalem.” In the larger passage (21:10—22:5) the city is described in material terms, as though it were literal. It is in the form of a cube, 1,500 mi. (2,415 km.) square; its walls are of jasper; its streets, of gold; the foundations of the walls are precious stones; its twelve gates are of pearls. For light it needs neither moon nor sun. A pure river of water of life flows through it; and in the midst of it there is the tree of life, whose leaves are for the healing of the nations.

Views on the nature of the city, whether it is literal or symbolic, and on when it comes into existence are legion. Hardly any two expositors fully agree, but in general there are two main views. Some hold that the city is a symbol of the ideal CHURCH as conceived in the purpose of God and to be fully realized in his own time. The church, allegorically depicted by the city, is of course already in existence, but God’s ideal for it will not be reached until the new age has been ushered in by the Lord’s return. The great size of the city denotes that the church is capable of holding almost countless numbers. The fact that the city descends “out of heaven from God” means that it is the product of God’s supernatural workmanship in the historic process of redemption. In support of this view it is said that in Rev. 21:9-10, when John is told that he would be shown the bride, the Lamb’s wife, he is actually shown the new Jerusalem; and, moreover, as JERUSALEM and ZION often refer to the inhabitants and faithful worshipers of the Lord, so the new Jerusalem is symbolic of the church of God.

Those who consider the new Jerusalem a literal city usually regard it as the eternal dwelling place of God. Premillennialists see it as a special creation of God at the beginning of the MILLENNIUM, to be inhabited by the saints, first during the millennium and then, after the creation of the new heaven and new earth, throughout eternity. It would seem, however, that the city will not be in sight during the millennium but will be above the earthly Jerusalem. The saints in the city will have the privilege of seeing the face of God and of having his name on their foreheads. Some expositors hold that the new Jerusalem as a literal city does not appear above Jerusalem during the millennium and that the description in Revelation has reference to the eternal state.

Jerusha. ji-roo’shah (Heb. yērûšā H3729, variant yērûšâ H3730, “possession” or “inherited one”). Daughter of a certain Zadok, wife of King UZZIAH, and mother of King JOTHAM (2 Ki. 15:33; 2 Chr. 27:1 [KJV and other versions, “Jerushah”]).

Jerushah. See JERUSHA.

Jesaiah. See JESHAIAH (1 Chr. 3:21; Neh. 11:7).

Jesarelah. jes´uh-ree´luh (Heb. yēšar ʿēlâ H3777). KJV Jesharelah. See ASARELAH.

Jeshaiah. ji-shay´yuh (Heb. yēša ʿyâ H3832, short form of yēša ʿyāhû H3833, “Yahweh is salvation [or victorious]”; see ISAIAH). (1) Son of Hananiah, grandson of ZERUBBABEL, and descendant of DAVID (1 Chr. 3:21 [KJV, “Jesaiah”]).

(2) Son of JEDUTHUN; he and his brothers “prophesied, using the harp in thanking and praising the LORD” (1 Chr. 25:3). He was also the head of the eighth company of temple musicians appointed by lot under David (v. 15).

(3) Son of Rehabiah; his descendant SHELOMITH was a LEVITE who shared the supervision of David’s treasury (1 Chr. 26:25).

(4) Son of Athaliah and descendant of Elam; he was head of a family that returned with EZRA to Jerusalem (Ezra 8:7).

(5) Descendant of MERARI; he was head of a Levitical family that returned with EZRA to Jerusalem (Ezra 8:19).

(6) Descendant of BENJAMIN and ancestor of Sallu; the latter is mentioned in a list of Israelites living in Jerusalem after the EXILE (Neh. 11:7 [KJV, “Jesaiah”]).

Jeshanah. jesh´uh-nuh (Heb. yēšānâ H3827, “old [city]”). A town taken by ABIJAH king of Judah from JEROBOAM king of Israel (2 Chr. 13:19). It is mentioned with BETHEL and EPHRON, and was probably located on the border of Judah and Israel. The generally accepted identification is modern Burj el-Isaneh, some 5 mi. (8 km.) N of Bethel. (Some believe that SHEN in 1 Sam. 7:12 is a variant of Jeshanah; cf. NRSV.)

Jeshanah Gate. See OLD GATE.

Jesharelah. See JESARELAH.

Jeshebeab. ji-sheb´ee-ab (Heb. yešeb ʾāb H3784, possibly “[my] father lives” or “may [my] father stay alive”). A descendant of AARON whose family in the time of DAVID made up the fourteenth division of priests (1 Chr. 24:13).

Jesher. jesh´uhr (Heb. yēšer H3840, “uprightness”). Son of CALEB (apparently by AZUBAH); included in the genealogy of JUDAH (1 Chr. 2:18).

The wilderness area of Jeshimon.

Jeshimon. ji-shi´mon (Heb. yēšmôn H3810, “wasteland”). Name given to a desolate area in the Judean wilderness, apparently S of the Desert of ZIPH and N of the Desert of MAON. This region, described as facing the hill of HAKILAH (to the N), is mentioned to help locate DAVID’s whereabouts when he fled from SAUL and hid in the strongholds of HORESH (1 Sam. 23:19, 24; 26:1, 3). The name Jeshimon also occurs in the KJV with reference to the region of PISGAH in MOAB (Num. 21:20; 23:28), but in these passages the Hebrew word is probably used as a common noun (cf. NIV and NRSV, “the wasteland”).

Jeshishai. ji-shish´i (Heb. yēššay H3814, “aged”). Son of Jahdo, descendant of GAD, and ancestor of Abihail; the sons of Abihail and other Gadites occupied the region E of GILEAD (1 Chr. 5:14; cf. v. 10).

Jeshohaiah. jesh´uh-hay´yah (Heb. yēšôḥāyâ H3797, meaning uncertain). A clan leader in the tribe of SIMEON (1 Chr. 4:36). He is listed among those whose families increased greatly during the days of King HEZEKIAH and who dispossessed the Hamites and Meunites near GEDOR (vv. 38-41).

Jeshua (person). jesh'yoo-uh (Heb. yēšû a H3800, short form of yēhōšua a H3397, “Yahweh is salvation [or help]”; see JOSHUA, JESUS). (1) Son of JEHOZADAK and high priest at the time of the return from Babylon and the rebuilding of the TEMPLE (Ezra 3:2). In EZRA and NEHEMIAH he is mentioned because of his official position; the only personal statement is that one or more of his sons were among those who had married foreign wives (10:18). In HAGGAI and ZECHARIAH he is called Joshua. He and ZERUBBABEL were exhorted to further the work of rebuilding the temple (Hag. 1:14; 2:2, 4). He figures in the great prophecies regarding the “Branch” (Zech. 3; 6:11-13).

(2) A descendant of AARON whose family in the time of DAVID made up the ninth division of priests (1 Chr. 24:11 [some KJV editions, “Jeshuah”]). He was probably the ancestor of a large priestly family that returned to Jerusalem under Zerubbabel (Ezra 2:36; Neh. 7:39).

(3) A LEVITE who faithfully assisted KORE in distributing the contributions made to the temple (2 Chr. 31:15).

(4) Ancestor of a group (connected with the families of Pahath-Moab and Joab) that returned to Jerusalem under Zerubbabel (Ezra 2:6; Neh. 7:11).

(5) A Levite who, with others, “joined together in supervising those working on the house of God” (Ezra 3:9). He is probably the same Jeshua listed elsewhere among returnees (Ezra 2:40; Neh. 7:43) and named first among thirteen Levites who explained the law to the people in the days of Nehemiah (Neh. 11:26). There are several other passages that likely refer to him: he was a leader in worship (9:4-5; 12:8) and was among those who sealed the covenant (10:9, where he is identified as “son of Azaniah”; in 12:24 he is called “son of Kadmiel”). It is often thought that this Jeshua was also the father of EZER, ruler of MIZPAH, listed among those who helped to repair the wall (3:19), as well as the father of JOZABAD, a Levite who assisted in taking inventory of the silver, gold, and sacred articles (Ezra 8:33).

(6) Alternate name for JOSHUA son of Nun (Neh. 8:17 KJV and other versions).

Jeshua (place). jesh'yoo-uh (Heb. yēšû a H3801, possibly “prosperous [town]”). A town in the S of JUDAH, listed among the settlements occupied by those who returned from the EXILE (Neh. 11:26). Its location is uncertain, but some identify it with modern Tell Jeshua, about 9 mi. (15 km.) ENE of BEERSHEBA.

Jeshuah. See JESHUA #2.

Jeshurun. jesh'uh-ruhn (Heb. yēšurûn H3843, “upright”). A poetic designation for Israel as the ideal “righteous” nation. It occurs three times in Deuteronomy, both in negative and positive contexts (Deut. 32:15; 33:5, 26), and once in Isaiah: “Do not be afraid, O Jacob, my servant, / Jeshurun, whom I have chosen” (Isa. 44:2).

Jesiah. See ISSHIAH.

Jesimiel. ji-sim'ee-uhl (Heb. yēšîmi ʾēl H3774, “God sets down, establishes”). A clan leader in the tribe of SIMEON (1 Chr. 4:36). He is listed among those whose families increased greatly during the days of King HEZEKIAH and who dispossessed the Hamites and Meunites near GEDOR (vv. 38-41).

Jesse. jes'ee (Heb. yîšay H3805 [variant ʾîšay H414], possibly short form of ISSHIAH; Gk. Iessai G2649). Son of Obed, grandson of BOAZ and RUTH, father of King DAVID (Ruth 4:17, 22; 1 Chr. 2:12); included in the GENEALOGY OF JESUS CHRIST (Matt. 1:5-6; Lk. 3:32). One of Jesse's ancestors was NAHSHON (Ruth 4:20), chief of the tribe of JUDAH in the days of MOSES. From such lineage and from the fact that when SAUL pursued David he entrusted his parents to the care of the king of MOAB (1 Sam. 22:3-4), we can assume that Jesse was the chief man of his village. He had eight sons, of whom the youngest was David (17:12-14), and two daughters, the latter being by a different wife from David's mother (1 Chr. 2:16; cf. 2 Sam. 17:25). Jesse lived at BETHLEHEM and probably had land outside the town wall, as Boaz did. When SAMUEL went to Jesse to anoint a king from among his sons, neither of them at first discerned God's choice. Jesse had not even thought it worthwhile to call his youngest son to the feast (1 Sam. 16:11). He is almost always mentioned in connection with his son David. After Saul had quarreled with David, he usually called David “the son of Jesse” (20:31; 22:7; 25:10), undoubtedly in derision. We are not told when Jesse died. The contrast between his small beginnings and future glory is brought out in Isa. 11:1, 10; and Mic. 5:2.

Jesui, Jesuite. See ISHVI.

Jesus. jee'zuhs (Gk. Iēsous G2652, from Heb. yēšûʿa H3800, short form of yēhōšuaʿ H3397, “Yahweh is salvation [or help]”; see also JOSHUA). (1) Jesus the Messiah. See CHRIST.

(2) Son of Sirach (named after his grandfather) and author of Ecclesiasticus. See APOCRYPHA.

(3) Son of Eliezer, included in Luke's GENEALOGY OF JESUS CHRIST (Lk. 3:29 NJB and other versions; KJV, “Jose”; most versions, “Joshua”).

(4) Possibly the personal name of BARABBAS (Matt. 27:16-17, variant reading).

(5) A Jewish fellow worker of PAUL (Col. 4:11). See JUSTUS #3.

(6) KJV NT form of JOSHUA (Acts 7:45; Heb. 4:8).

Jesus Justus. See JUSTUS.

Jether. jee'thuhr (Heb. yeter H3858, “abundance”). (1) Eldest son of GIDEON. Because of his youth, he was afraid to slay the prisoners ZEBAH AND ZALMUNNA, kings of MIDIAN, and so Gideon killed them himself (Jdg. 8:20-21).

(2) Father of AMASA, an Israelite commander who was killed by JOAB (1 Ki. 2:5, 32). Jether is identified as an Ishmaelite in 1 Chr. 2:17, but he is called “Ithra the Israelite” in 2 Sam. 17:25 MT. See ITHRA.

(3) Son of Jada, great-grandson of JERAHMEEL, and descendant of JUDAH; he is said to have died without children (1 Chr. 2:32; cf. vv. 27-28).

(4) Son of Ezrah and descendant of Judah (1 Chr. 4:17). His precise place in the genealogy is unclear, and the verse contains some textual problems.

(5) Descendant of ASHER (1 Chr. 7:38); apparently the same as ITHRAN son of Zophah (v. 37).

Jetheth. jee'theth (Heb. yētēt H3867, derivation uncertain). Descendant of ESAU, listed among the clan chiefs of EDM (Gen. 36:40; 1 Chr. 1:51). The name was probably applied to a territory as well.

Jethlah. See ITHLAH.

Jethro. jeth'roh (Heb. yitrô H3861, “abundance”). Priest of MIDIAN and father-in-law of MOSES (Exod. 3:1; 4:18; 18:1-12, 27). Jethro is called REUEL in two places (Exod. 2:18; Num. 10:29). In addition, Moses' father-in-law appears to be called HOBAB in Jdg. 4:11 (NRSV), but Hobab was the son of Jethro/Reuel (Num. 10:29), and it is possible that the Hebrew term ḥōtēn H3162 in the Judges passage should be rendered not "father-in-law" but "brother-in-law" (so NIV). When Moses fled from Egypt to Midian, he was welcomed into the household of Jethro because of his kindness to the priest's seven daughters, whom he helped water their flocks. Moses married ZIPPORAH, one of the daughters, and kept his father-in-law's flocks for about forty years (Exod. 3:1-2). After the Lord commanded Moses to return to Egypt to deliver the enslaved Israelites, Jethro gave him permission to depart. Moses took with him his wife Zipporah and their two sons (4:18-20), but later he sent the three back to stay with Jethro temporarily.

After the deliverance from Egypt, before the Israelites reached SINAI, Jethro came to see Moses, bringing back to him his daughter and her two sons (Exod. 18:1-7). We are told that "Jethro was delighted to hear about all the good things the LORD had done for Israel," and that he offered a burnt offering to the Lord. When he saw how occupied Moses was in deciding disputes among his people, he suggested the appointment of judges of various grades to help him decide cases of minor importance. Moses acted on his advice. Jethro then returned to his own country. It is altogether possible that Jethro knew and worshiped God as Yahweh before visiting Moses' camp. When one remembers that the Midianites were descendants of ABRAHAM by KETURAH (Gen. 25:2, 4; 1 Chr. 1:32-33), it is not unlikely that at least some of the Midianite tribes, such as the KENITES (Jdg. 1:16; 4:11), may have continued to worship God as Yahweh until the time of Moses.

Jetur. jee'tuhr (Heb. yēṭûr H3515, derivation uncertain). Son of ISHMAEL and eponymous ancestor of an ISHMAELITE tribe (Gen. 25:15; 1 Chr. 1:31). The two and a half Israelite tribes in TRANSJORDAN warred with the tribe of Jetur (1 Chr. 5:19). It is possible that the inhabitants of ITUREA in NT times were descended from it.

Jeuel. ji-yoo'uhl (Heb. yē'û'ēl H3590, possibly "God is strong"). (1) Head of the Zerahite clan and one of the descendants of JUDAH listed among those who settled in JERUSALEM after the EXILE (1 Chr. 9:6).

(2) A LEVITE, descendant of ELIZAPHAN, who served during the reign of HEZEKIAH (2 Chr. 29:13 NRSV; the NIV has "Jeiel," following the Qere variant and the LXX).

(3) Descendant of Adonikam and a family head who returned with EZRA from BABYLON (Ezra 8:13; KJV, "Jeiel").

Jeush. jee'ush (Heb. yē ʿûš H3593, "[God] helps"). (1) Son of ESAU by OHOLIBAMAH; an Edomite chief (Gen. 36:5, 14, 18; 1 Chr. 1:35).

(2) Son of Bilhan and descendant of BENJAMIN (1 Chr. 7:10); he was a head of family in the clan of JEDIAEL (v. 11).

(3) Son of Eshek and descendant of King SAUL (1 Chr. 8:39; KJV, "Jehush").

(4) Son of Shimei and descendant of LEVI through GERSHON (1 Chr. 23:10); because Jeush and his brother Beriah had few sons, their two families were reckoned as one (v. 11).

(5) Son of King REHOBAM by Mahalath (2 Chr. 11:19).

Jeuz. jee'uhz (Heb. yē ʿûš H3591, possibly "he counsels"). Son of SHAHARAIM and descendant of BENJAMIN; a family head (1 Chr. 8:10). Jeuz was one of seven children that were born to Shaharaim in MOAB by his wife HODESH after he had divorced Hushim and Baara (vv. 8-9).

Jew. joo (Heb. yēhûdî H3374, "of Judah, Judahite, Judean"; Aram. yēhûdāy H10316; Gk. Ioudaios G2681 [the English form comes from Old French giu, an alteration of Lat. Iūdaeus]). This name does not occur before the period of JEREMIAH in OT literature. Originally it denoted one belonging to the tribe of JUDAH or to the two tribes of the southern kingdom (2 Ki. 16:6; 25:25). Later its meaning was extended, and it was applied to any Hebrew who returned from the EXILE and settled in JUDEA. As these exiles were the main historical representatives of ancient ISRAEL, the term Jew came finally to comprehend all of the Hebrew race throughout the world (Esth. 2:5; Matt. 2:2). As early as the days of HEZEKIAH the language of Judah was called Jewish (NIV, "Hebrew"). In the OT the adjective applies only to the Jews' language or speech (2 Ki. 18:26, 28; Neh. 13:24; Isa. 36:11, 13). In the Gospels, Jews (always plural, except for Jn. 4:9; 18:35) is the usual term for Israelites, though in some cases it may refer specifically to someone from Judea; and in the NT, Jews (Israelites) and GENTILES are sometimes contrasted (Mk. 7:3; Jn. 2:6; Act 10:28). PAUL warns against Jewish myths (Tit. 1:14) and speaks of the Jews' religion, that is, JUDAISM (Gal. 1:13-14).

jewel, jewelry. There are many allusions to jewelry in Scripture. Among the articles of jewelry in OT times were diadems, bracelets, necklaces, anklets, rings for the fingers, gold nets for the hair, pendants, gems for head attire, amulets and pendants with magical meanings, jeweled perfume and ointment boxes, and crescents for camels. Many were acquired as booty in war. Many were personal gifts, especially at betrothals. At the court of every king there were special quarters for goldsmiths, and silversmiths were a familiar sight in the silver markets of large cities. Jewelry was used not only for personal adornment and utility, but also for religious festivals. Custom required the use of rich, festal garments and a gorgeous display of jewelry when one approached the deity. When the worship was over, these items were taken off. What became of all these jewels? Many were buried in the ground for safekeeping in time of war and were never recovered; others were carried away as booty by conquerors. A surprisingly large number have been unearthed.

Among the oldest jewels discovered in Bible lands are those found in 1927 by the archaeologist Sir Leonard Woolley in the Sumerian city of U_R, the heathen city that ABRAHAM left for the Promised Land. In his excavations he found a hoard of jeweled wealth in the royal tombs in which Queen Shubad, her husband, and her faithful court had been buried about 2500 B.C. Buried with the queen were sixty-eight court ladies, who in full regalia had walked alive into the tomb and had sat in orderly rows to die, thus showing their loyalty to her. In the royal tombs were found the queen's personal ornaments, including her diadem, a cape of polished gold and precious stones, rings, seals, earrings, amulets, and pins of gold. With the court ladies were found hair ribbons made of fine beaten gold. Ancient Sumerian artisans were capable of producing filigree work with gold at least equal in delicacy to the best done by goldsmiths today.

When the servant of Abraham went to MESOPOTAMIA to find a bride for ISAAC, he gave REBEKAH an earring and two bracelets made of gold after she had watered his camels. At her betrothal to Isaac he gave her jewels of silver and of gold, and to others in the family he also gave precious things (Gen. 24:22, 30, 53).

When the Israelites left EGYPT with MOSES, they “asked the Egyptians for articles of silver and gold” (Exod. 12:35). Not much later, while Moses was on Mount SINAI receiving the LAW, they took the golden earrings worn by men and women and gave them to AARON to make a golden calf (32:2-4). As evidence of their repentance, they were commanded by Moses to strip themselves of their ornaments (33:4-6). For the building of the first TABERNACLE, the people contributed, at Moses’ request, bracelets, earrings, rings, tablets, and jewels of gold (35:22).

Exodus 39 gives a description of the official garments of the Jewish high priest, worn when discharging his peculiar duties. They were gorgeous in their jeweled splendor. The robe of the EPHOD, a long, blue sleeveless garment, was adorned with a fringe of alternate pomegranates and bells of gold. Over the robe the ephod was worn, a shorter, richly embroidered vestment intended for the front and back of the body. It was made of two parts clasped together at the shoulders by onyx stones. Over the ephod there was a BREASTPIECE, described as square, made of gold thread and finely twisted linen, set with four rows of precious stones, three in a row, each inscribed with the name of a tribe of Israel. In the first row was a ruby, a topaz, and a beryl; in the second, an emerald, a sapphire, and a turquoise; in the third, a jacinth, an agate, and an amethyst; and in the fourth, a chrysolite, an onyx, and a jasper (but see NIV footnote on Exod. 39:13). Each stone was set in a gold mounting. Golden chains and rings fastened the breastpiece to the ephod of the priest at his shoulders and to the blue lacers of the woven bands. The sacred diadem was made of pure gold, on which was engraved the phrase, “Holy to the LORD” (39:30).

In the period of the judges, GIDEON, after turning down the offer of kingship, requested that every man cast into a spread garment all the gold earrings, crescents, necklaces, and camel chains captured from the Midianites. With these he made an ephod, which later became a snare to Israel when the people came to regard it idolatrously (Jdg. 8:24-27).

Until about 1000 B.C. gold and silver were not common in Palestine, and even iron was so scarce that jewelry was made of it for kings. See MINERALS. ARCHAEOLOGY has uncovered comparatively little indigenous Palestinian art. Fragments of jewelry that have been found in excavated palaces of kings is the work of imported artists. Such finds have been made at MEGIDDO, a fortress-city guarding the Plain of ESDRAELON that was destroyed in the period of the judges.

DAVID accumulated a large mass of jewels, mostly won in conquests against Syrians, Moabites, Ammonites, Amalekites, and Philistines. All these he dedicated to the Lord (2 Sam. 8:7-8) and passed on to SOLOMON for the building of the TEMPLE in JERUSALEM. When his nobles saw what he was donating, they brought for the same purpose gold, silver, brass, and iron; and the common people added what they could (1 Chr. 28). We are told that the Queen of SHEBA brought to Solomon gold and precious stones. The throne of Solomon was overlaid with gold; the steps leading to it were of gold; his footstool was of gold; his drinking cups were all of gold; and “all the household articles in the Palace of the Forest of Lebanon were pure gold” (2 Chr. 9:20). In the succeeding reigns of the kings of Judah and Israel both monarchs and people gave increasing regard to accumulations of jewelry. Repeatedly OT prophets warned the Israelites that apostasy would be punished with the loss of their gems (Ezek. 23:26).

Not a great deal is said about jewelry in the NT, and what is said is mostly condemnatory. Jesus twice mentioned jewels, in the parable of the pearl merchant (Matt. 13:45-46) and in the saying about casting pearls before swine (7:6). PAUL exhorts Christian women not to rely for adornment on “braided hair or gold or pearls or expensive clothes” (1 Tim. 2:9). JAMES warns his readers not to give preference to a man who comes into their assembly with a gold ring and fine apparel, as though he were better than a poor man (Jas. 2:2). In the book of Revelation the destruction of BABYLON is described in terms of merchants who can no longer sell “cargoes of gold, silver, precious stones, and pearls” (Rev. 18:12). The new Jerusalem is described in Rev. 21 as having a wall made of jasper, and the foundations of the walls decorated “with every kind of precious stone” (21:19)—jasper, sapphire, chalcedony, emerald, sardonyx, carnelian, chrysolite, beryl, topaz, chrysoprased, jacinth, and amethyst—a list recalling the list of precious stones in the breastpiece of the high priest.

Jezaniah. jez’uh-ni’uh (Heb. yēzanyâ H3470, “Yahweh listens”). (1) Variant of JAAZANIAH (Jer. 40:8).

(2) Son of HOSHAIAH; he was an army officer who, with JOHANAN son of Kareah and the survivors from an attack at MIZPAH, asked JEREMIAH to pray for them (Jer. 42:1). Some scholars, on the basis of 43:2 and the SEPTUAGINT, emend the text to “Azariah” (cf. NRSV).

Jezebel. jez’uh-bel (Heb. îzebel H374, possibly from Phoen. zy + zbl, “where is the prince [i.e., Baal]?”; Gk. Iezabel G2630). Daughter of ETHBAAL king of SIDON (in PHOENICIA), wife of AHAB king of ISRAEL, and mother of ATHALIAH queen of Judah (1 Ki. 16:31; 18:4, 13; 19:1-2; 21:5-25; 2 Ki. 9:7-37; Rev. 2:20). Jezebel had been brought up a zealous worshiper of BAAL, and as the wife of Ahab she not only continued her ancestral religion but tried to impose it on the people of Israel. To please her, Ahab built a temple and an altar to Baal in SAMARIA (1 Ki.

16:32). Four hundred fifty prophets of Baal ate at her table (18:19). She killed all the prophets of the Lord on whom she could lay her hands (18:4-13). When she was told of the slaughter of the prophets of Baal by ELIJAH, she threatened Elijah's life, and he was obliged to flee.

Some time later Jezebel secured NABOTH's vineyard for Ahab by having its owner unjustly executed (1 Ki. 21). When Elijah heard of this crime, he told Ahab that God's vengeance would fall on him and that dogs would eat Jezebel's body by the wall of Jezreel. The prophecy was fulfilled when, eleven years after the death of Ahab, JEHU executed pitiless vengeance on the royal household. Jezebel "painted her eyes and arranged her hair," looked out an open window, and taunted Jehu for being his master's murderer. Jehu asked those who were on his side to throw her down, and this was unhesitatingly done by some eunuchs. Jehu drove over her body with his chariot, and her blood spattered the horses and the wall. Later he gave directions that she be buried, but it was found that dogs had left nothing of her but the skull, the feet, and the hands (2 Ki. 9:7, 30-37).

Even after her death, Jezebel, through her offspring ATHALIAH (who was married to JEHORAM, the leading scion of the house of DAVID), came near to bringing the Davidic dynasty to extinction (see 2 Ki. 8:25-27; 11:1-3; 2 Chr. 21:5-7; 22:10—23:21). Jezebel's name became symbolic of APOSTASY and is used in the book of Revelation with reference to a false prophetess (prob. representing a larger group) in THYATIRA: "By her teaching she misleads my servants into sexual immorality and the eating of food sacrificed to idols. I have given her time to repent of her immorality, but she is unwilling. So I will cast her on a bed of suffering, and I will make those who commit adultery with her suffer intensely, unless they repent of her ways" (Rev. 2:20-22).

Jezer. jee'zuhr (Heb. yēṣer H3672, possibly "[Yahweh] has formed"; gentilic yī ṣrî H3673, "Jezerite"). Son of NAPHTALI, grandson of JACOB, and eponymous ancestor of the Jezerite clan (Gen. 46:24; Num. 26:49; 1 Chr. 7:13).

Jeziah. See IZZIAH.

Jeziel. jee'zee-uhl (Heb. yēzî'ēl H3465, possibly "sprinkled by God"). Son of Azmaveth; he and his brother Pelet are listed among the warriors, kinsmen of SAUL, who joined with DAVID when the latter took refuge at ZIKLAG (1 Chr. 12:3).

Jezliah. See IZLIAH.

Jezoar. See IZHAR #2.

Jezrahiah. jez´ruh-hi´uh (Heb. yizrahyâ H3474, “Yahweh goes forth [or shines]”). Director of the choirs who took part in the dedication of the walls of JERUSALEM (Neh. 12:42).

Jezreel (person). jez´ree-uhl (Heb. yizrē ʿe l H3475, “God sows”). (1) Son of Etam and descendant of JUDAH (1 Chr. 4:3, NIV and other versions, following LXX). The MT is unintelligible; see discussion under ETAM.

(2) A symbolic name of one of the sons of HOSEA. God commanded the prophet to give his first child this name and then promptly interpreted the significance of it. “Call him Jezreel, because I will soon punish the house of Jehu for the massacre at Jezreel, and I will put an end to the kingdom of Israel. In that day I will break Israel’s bow in the Valley of Jezreel” (Hos. 1:4-5). Besides the allusion to JEHU’s slaughter of the house of AHAB (an act that went far beyond God’s intention, 2 Ki. 10:11), there is a play on words between Jezreel (Heb. yizrē ʿe l) and ISRAEL (yīsrā ʿēl). The reference to Jezreel in Hos. 1:11 and 2:22 has a significance opposite to that in 1:5. The place of thorough disruption and scattering will become the place that God makes fertile (as implied by the meaning of the name). See JEZREEL (PLACE).

Jezreel (place). jez´ree-uhl (Heb. yizrē ʿe l H3476, “God sows”). (1) A town in the hill country of the tribe of JUDAH (Josh. 15:56). Jezreel is listed as part of a group of towns 4-10 mi. (6-16 km.) S and SE of HEBRON, but its precise location is unknown. AHINOAM, one of DAVID’s wives, may have been from this town (1 Sam. 25:43; 27:3; 30:5; 2 Sam. 2:2; 3:2); some think she came from Jezreel of Issachar (see below, #2).

(2) A city on the border of the tribal territory of ISSACHAR (Josh. 19:18), not far from Mount GILBOA. The Israelites made their camp near it before the battle of Gilboa (1 Sam. 29:1), its people remaining faithful to the house of SAUL. ABNER set ISH-BOSHETH over it among other places (2 Sam. 2:9). AHAB built a palace there (1 Ki. 21:2), and his son Joram (JEHORAM) also lived there (2 Ki. 8:29). NABOTH was a Jezreelite, and he was stoned outside the city for refusing to give up his vineyard to Ahab (1 Ki. 21). JEHU ordered that the heads of Ahab’s seventy sons be placed in heaps at the gate of Jezreel (2 Ki. 10:1-11). Jezebel met her death by being thrown from a window of the palace in this city, and it was there that her body was eaten by dogs (9:30-35). The site of Jezreel is generally identified with the modern village of Zerin on the NW spur of Gilboa, approximately halfway between MEGIDDO and BETH SHAN.

Joab. joh´ab (Heb. yô ʾāb H3405, “Yahweh is [my] father”). (1) Son of ZERUIAH (King DAVID’s sister), brother of valiant warriors ABISHAI and ASAH^{el}, and commander-in-chief under David (his father’s name is unknown). Joab first appears in public life in the narrative of David’s war with ISH-BOSHETH for the throne left vacant by SAUL’s death. He was David’s captain of the army, while Abner led the forces of Ish-Bosheth. When the two armies met, a tournament took place between twelve men from each side, followed by a general engagement in which, after Joab’s men were routed, Asahel was killed in his pursuit of Abner (2 Sam. 2:12-32). When Abner transferred his allegiance to David, Joab treacherously killed him, with the connivance of Abishai, thus avenging the killing of Asahel at the battle of GIBEON, though Abner had done so in self-defense. David declared himself innocent of this murder, and after composing a lament for Abner, commanded that there be a period of public mourning for the dead man (3:31). David pronounced a curse on Joab and his descendants, but he did not bring him to justice, perhaps because he was politically too weak to do so.

Joab was made the commander of all David’s armies as a reward for being the first to enter the fortress on Mount ZION when that stronghold was assaulted. In the war against the Ammonites, which was declared when David’s ambassadors to the king had been maltreated, Joab achieved a great victory, utterly routing the enemy (2 Sam. 10:1-14; 1 Chr. 19:1-15). After this war had been resumed, he called for David to storm the town of RABBAH, which he himself had successfully besieged, in order that David might get credit for the victory (2 Sam. 11:1; 12:26-29). It was during this war that David arranged for Joab to put U^{riah} in the forefront of the battle so that he might be killed and David be free to marry BATHSHEBA (11:6-27).

On a later occasion, Joab attempted to have David’s son ABSALOM restored to royal favor after a three-year banishment. He arranged for a “wise woman” of TEKOA to bring to David an imaginary complaint about a son of hers who had killed his brother, and whose life was now sought, a story that paralleled David’s own experience with Absalom. David saw in the story a rebuke of his own treatment of Absalom and gave his son permission to return to Jerusalem, though he was to remain in his own house and was not allowed to see his father (2 Sam. 14:1-24). Joab resisted Absalom's attempts to get him to intercede with his father for a complete restoration, until his barley field was set on fire by the prince (14:28-33). Joab then got David to receive his son back into the royal home.

When Absalom rebelled, he made AMASA, another nephew of David, general instead of Joab (2 Sam. 17:24-25). Joab remained loyal to David, and when the king fled, pursued by Absalom, he led one of the three divisions of the royal forces and defeated the rebels. Informed that Absalom was caught in a tree by his hair, he first scolded his informer for not having killed him and then himself killed the prince by thrusting three darts through his heart. When David gave vent to extravagant grief at the death of his rebel son, Joab sternly rebuked him (19:1-8).

After David returned to Jerusalem, he replaced Joab as captain of his forces with Amasa. Shortly after this, SHEBA, a Benjamite, led a revolt against David; and when Amasa took more time than was thought necessary to prepare to quell it, David asked Abishai to take the field. Joab seems to have gone with him. The two met Amasa at Gibeon, and there Joab, on pretense of kissing his rival, killed him. He then assumed command of Amasa's men, besieged Sheba in ABEL BETH MAACAH, and arranged with a woman of the city to deliver to him the head of Sheba. Thus ended the revolt (2 Sam. 20:1-22).

Joab was opposed to David's suggestion of a census but eventually carried it out, though he intentionally did the work imperfectly (2 Sam. 24:1-9; 1 Chr. 21:1-6). He supported ADONIJAH in his claim to the throne, but deserted him on hearing that SOLOMON had been proclaimed king (1 Ki. 1:7, 28-49). David on his deathbed made known that Joab should be brought to justice for the murders of Abner and of Amasa (2:5). At the order of Solomon, Joab was killed as he clung to the horns of the altar in the court of the tabernacle. His executioner was BENAIHAH, chief of the bodyguard, who became his successor as head of the army. He was buried in his own house in the wilderness (2:5-6, 28-34).

(2) Son of Seraiah, nephew of OTHNIEL, descendant of JUDAH through the line of KENAZ, and father (founder) of GE HARASHIM, a town inhabited by craftsmen (1 Chr. 4:14).

(3) Ancestor of a group (connected with the families of Pahath-Moab and Jeshua) that returned to Jerusalem under ZERUBBABEL (Ezra 2:6; Neh. 7:11); apparently, some of his descendants returned later with EZRA (Ezra 8:9).

(4) For the phrase "the house of Joab" in 1 Chr. 2:54 KJV, see ATROTH BETH JOAB.

Joah. joh´uh (Heb. yô ʾāḥ H3406, “Yahweh is [my] brother”). (1) Son of a certain Asaph; he was “recorder” (possibly the royal spokesperson) under HEZEKIAH, and member of a delegation sent by the king to deal with the Assyrian envoys during the siege of JERUSALEM (2 Ki. 18:18, 26; Isa. 36:3, 11, 22).

(2) Son of Zimnah and descendant of LEVI through the line of GERSHON (1 Chr. 6:21; 2 Chr. 29:12).

(3) Third son of OBED-EDOM, included in the list of divisions of the Korahite doorkeepers in the reign of DAVID (1 Chr. 26:4).

(4) Son of a certain Joahaz (see JEHOAHAZ #4); he was recorder (cf. #1 above) under JOSIAH, and part of a group sent to repair the temple (2 Chr. 34:8).

Joahaz. joh´uh-haz. Alternate form of JEHOAHAZ (2 Chr. 34:8; cf. also the MT at 2 Ki. 14:1 [here followed by NRSV and other versions]; 2 Chr. 36:2, 4).

Joanan. joh-ay´nuhn (Gk. Iōanan G2720, from Heb. yôḥānān H3419, “Yahweh has been gracious” [cf. JOHANAN, JOHN]). KJV Joanna. Son of Rhesa and grandson of ZERUBBABEL, included in Luke’s GENEALOGY OF JESUS CHRIST (Lk. 3:27).

Joanna. joh-an´uh (Gk. Iōanna G2721, probably from Heb. yôḥannâ, “Yahweh has been gracious” [cf. HANNAH]). The wife of CUZA, who managed the household of HEROD Antipas; she was one of several women who had been healed by Jesus and who helped to support him and his disciples in their travels (Lk. 8:3). She was probably among those who witnessed the crucifixion and then returned to the city to prepare spices and ointment for the anointing of the body (23:55-56); and she is specifically mentioned as one of the women who returned to the tomb, found it empty, and brought the news to the apostles (24:10).

Job, Book of. johb (Heb. ʾiyyôb H373, traditionally related to ʾōyēb H367, “enemy” [perhaps with passive meaning, “object of ill-will, persecuted”], but more probably the same name as Akk. Ay-yabum, “where is [my] father?”).

One of the poetic books of the Bible, named after its main character. (On the reading “Job” in Gen. 46:13, see J_{ASHUB}.)

This book has a definite kinship with ANE W_{ISDOM} Literature. OT Wisdom books (esp. P_{ROVERBS} and E_{CCLESIASTES}) applied foundational Mosaic revelation to the problems of human existence and conduct as they were being formulated in the philosophical circles of the world of that day. A figure like Job, standing outside the Abrahamic and Mosaic covenants, was an ideal vehicle for biblical wisdom doctrine, concerned as it was with the common ways and demands of God rather than with his peculiarly theocratic government of Israel.

Even an approximate date for the anonymous author is uncertain. The events he narrates belong to the early patriarchal period, as is evident from features like Job’s longevity, revelation by theophany (God visibly manifesting himself), the nomadic status of the Chaldeans, and early social and economic practices. But the question is, When was the tradition of Job transformed by the inspired author into the canonical book of Job?

Overview of JOB

Author: Anonymous. Possibly written by an otherwise unknown sage during the period of development of Wisdom Literature (i.e., the reign of S_{OLOMON} or some time after).

Historical setting: The story takes place in U_Z, an uncertain desert region E of P_{ALESTINE}; the time appears to be roughly contemporary to that of the Hebrew P_{ATRIARCHS}, that is, early in the second millennium B.C.

Purpose: To examine the value of conventional wisdom in dealing with the question, Why do the righteous suffer?

Contents: S_{ATAN} tests Job, leading to an initial lament (Job 1-3); Job’s friends debate the matter in three cycles of speeches (chs. 4-14; 15-21; 22-31), followed by E_{LIHU}’s discourse (chs. 32-37); God pronounces his own verdict (chs. 38-41), resulting in Job’s repentance and restoration (ch. 42).

Modern discussions of authorship and date are perplexed by critical doubts concerning the unity of the book. Most widely suspected of being additions to an original poem are the prologue and epilogue, the wisdom hymn (Job 28), the discourse of Elihu (chs. 32-37), and at least parts of the Lord’s discourses

(chs. 38-41). The SEPTUAGINT text of Job is about one-fifth shorter than the Hebrew MT, but the omissions exhibit an editorial pattern of reduction. The argument for additions to the text, therefore, leans primarily on internal considerations—language, style, alleged inconsistencies of viewpoint. Conservative scholars, however, agree that the internal evidence points compellingly to the book's integrity, though they of course allow for corruption in the transmission of textual details.

Dates have been assigned by twentieth-century critics all the way from the Mosaic to the Maccabean ages. The early extreme is eliminated by the nature of the development of the OT canon (see CANONICITY); the late extreme, by the discovery among the DEAD SEA SCROLLS of fragments of a manuscript of Job in old Hebrew script. The majority of negative critics favor an exilic or postexilic date. Conservatives favor the preexilic era, especially the age of SOLOMON, because biblical Wisdom Literature flourished then. There are close affinities in sentiment and expression between Job and parts of PSALMS (see Ps. 88-89) and Proverbs that were produced at that time. The same evidence indicates an Israelite identity for the anonymous author, conceivably one of Solomon's wisdom coterie (see 1 Ki. 4:29-34). The theory that the author was an Edomite has found little support—that he was Egyptian, still less.

The book may be outlined as follows.

- I. Desolation: the trial of Job's wisdom (Job 1:1—2:10)
- II. Complaint: the way of wisdom lost (2:11—3:26)
- III. Judgment: the way of wisdom darkened and illuminated (4:1—41:34)
 - A. Human verdicts (4:1—37:24)
 - 1. First cycle of debate (4:1—14:22)
 - 2. Second cycle of debate (15:1—21:34)
 - 3. Third cycle of debate (22:1—31:40)
 - 4. Elihu's discourse (32:1—37:24)
 - B. The voice of God (38:1—41:34)
- IV. Confession: the way of wisdom regained (42:1-6)
- V. Restoration: the triumph of Job's wisdom (42:7-17)

Stylistic comparison of other ancient wisdom writings with Job reveals similarities, but also Job's uniqueness. The dialogue form of the book is paralleled to an extent in Egyptian and Babylonian wisdom poetry, and the various individual literary forms employed in Job (psalms of lament and thanksgiving, proverb, covenant oath, etc.) are not novelties. Nevertheless, as a masterly blend of a remarkably rich variety of forms, within a historical framework, with exquisite lyric and dramatic qualities, all devoted to didactic purpose, the book of Job creates its own literary species. Of particular significance is the bracketing of the poetic dialogue within the prose (or better, semipoetic) prologue and epilogue. This A-B-A structure is found elsewhere (e.g., Code of Hammurabi, The Eloquent Peasant) and thus supports the book's integrity.

Bedouin man with his animals. Job's wealth was measured by the livestock he owned.

Job proclaims the fundamental stipulation of the COVENANT, a call for perfect consecration to our covenant head, the Lord. This call is issued through a dramatization of a crisis in redemptive history. God challenges SATAN to behold in Job the triumph of divine grace. This faithful servant epitomizes the fulfillment of God's evangelical decree, which even at first took the form of an imprecatory challenge to the Tempter (Gen. 3:15). By proving under fierce temptation the genuineness of his devotion to God, Job vindicates the veracity of his God as the author of redemptive promise and proves his sovereignty in putting enmity between his people and Satan. Prostrated by total grief, he praises God. While hopelessly despondent and protesting passionately against what he interprets as an unjust divine sentence on him, Job still turns and cries to no one but God. And he repentantly commits himself anew to his Lord, although the voice from the whirlwind has offered neither explanation of the mystery of his past sufferings nor promise of future restoration from his desolation. By following the covenant way, Job shows himself ready by God's grace, and contrary to Satan's insinuations, to serve his Lord "for nothing."

The particular purpose of the book of Job as Wisdom Literature is to articulate and point the direction for a true apologetic for the faith. The doctrine of God as incomprehensible Creator and sovereign Lord is offered as the fundamental reality man must reckon with as a religious being serving God amid the historical tensions of life. It is also the presupposition with which a philosophical being bent on interpretative adventure must begin. This enterprise is illustrated by the debate of Job and his friends over the problem of theodicy (God's goodness versus evil). The folly of depending for answers on human observation and speculation is portrayed by the silencing of the trio who represent it. The book of Job identifies the way of the covenant with the way of wisdom (cf. Job 28:28) and so brings philosophy under the authority of divine revelation.

No comprehensive answer is given to the problem of suffering since theodicy is not the book's major theme; nevertheless, considerable light is given. Elihu traces the mystery to the principle of divine grace: sufferings are a sovereign gift, calling to repentance and life. Moreover, impressive assurance is given that God, as a just and omnipotent covenant Lord, will ultimately visit both the curses and blessings of the covenant on his subjects according to righteousness. Especially significant are the insights Job himself attains into the role God will play as his heavenly vindicator, redeeming his name from all slander and his life from the king of terrors. Job utters in raw faith what is later revealed in the doctrines of eschatological theophany: resurrection of the dead and the final judgment. This vision does not reveal the why of the particular sufferings of Job or any other believer, but it does present the servants of God with a framework for hope.

Jobab. johˈbab (Heb. yôbāb H3412 [H3411 for #1 below], derivation uncertain). (1) Son of JOKTAN and grandson of EBER, listed in the Table of Nations (Gen. 10:29; 1 Chr. 1:23). It may be the name of an ancient South Arabian tribe.

(2) Son of Zerah and second king of EDM; he came from BOZRAH (Gen. 36:33-34; 1 Chr. 1:44-45).

(3) King of MADON who joined the unsuccessful coalition formed by JABIN king of HAZOR against the Israelites (Josh. 11:1); the city of Madon is listed among those conquered by JOSHUA (12:19).

(4) Son of SHAHARAIM and descendant of BENJAMIN; a family head (1 Chr. 8:9). Jobab was one of seven children that were born to Shaharaim in MOAB by his wife HODESH after he had divorced Hushim and Baara (v. 8).

(5) Son of ELPAAL, grandson of Shaharaim (see above, #4), and descendant of Benjamin (1 Chr. 8:18); he is listed among the heads of families who lived in Jerusalem (cf. v. 28).

Jochebed. jok'uh-bed (Heb. yôkebed H3425, “Yahweh is weighty [or honorable, glorious]”). Descendant of LEVI, wife (and aunt) of AMRAM, and mother of AARON, MOSES, and MIRIAM (Exod. 6:20; Num. 26:59). If the expression “daughter of Levi” (Num. 26:59) is understood literally, then she was the sister of KOHATH (Amram’s father), and only a distant ancestor of Aaron, Moses, and Miriam.

jod. johd. See YOD.

Joda. joh'duh (Gk. Iōda G2726). Son of Joanan, included in Luke’s GENEALOGY OF JESUS CHRIST (Lk. 3:26). He is apparently not mentioned in the OT, although some have identified him with a postexilic descendant of SOLOMON named HODAVIAH (1 Chr. 3:24).

Joed. joh'ed (Heb. yô'ed H3444, “Yahweh is witness”). Son of Pedaiah, descendant of BENJAMIN, and grandfather of Sallu; the latter is listed among those who resettled in JERUSALEM under NEHEMIAH (Neh. 11:7; the name is not found in the parallel list, 1 Chr. 9:7).

Joel. joh'uhl (Heb. yô'el H3408, “Yahweh is God”; Gk. Iōēl G2727). (1) Joel the prophet. See JOEL, BOOK OF.

(2) Firstborn son of SAMUEL and father of the musician HEMAN (1 Sam. 8:2; 1 Chr. 6:28 [here the KJV, following the MT, has VASHNI], 33; 15:17). Joel and his brother ABIJAH served as judges in BEERSHEBA, but they were found guilty of misconduct in office (1 Sam. 8:3-5).

(3) Son of Azariah, descendant of LEVI through KOHATH, and ancestor of Samuel and the musician Heman (1 Chr. 6:36).

(4) A clan leader in the tribe of SIMEON (1 Chr. 4:35). He is listed among those whose families increased greatly during the days of King HEZEKIAH and who dispossessed the Hamites and Meunites near GEDOR (vv. 38-41).

(5) A clan chief of the tribe of REUBEN whose descendant Beerah was taken captive by TIGLATH-PILESER (1 Chr. 5:4). He may be the same Joel listed later as father of Shema and ancestor of Jeiel (vv. 7-8). His genealogical connection as well as the period in which he lived are unclear.

(6) A leader of the tribe of GAD in BASHAN, listed as first in importance (1 Chr. 5:12).

(7) Son of Izrahiah and descendant of ISSACHAR; a military chief (1 Chr. 7:3).

(8) One of DAVID's mighty warriors, identified as the brother of a certain Nathan (1 Chr. 11:38). This passage appears to have suffered textual corruption, for the parallel list has IGAL son of Nathan (2 Sam. 23:36).

(9) Head of a Levitical family descended from GERSHON, listed among those who helped to bring the ARK OF THE COVENANT to Jerusalem in the reign of David (1 Chr. 15:7, 11). He may be the same as #10 below.

(10) Son of Jehieli (see JEHIEL) and descendant of Gershon; he and his brother Zetham were temple treasurers (1 Chr. 26:22). The Hebrew text is difficult, and elsewhere Jehiel, Zetham, and Joel are identified as sons (descendants?) of Ladan (23:8). This Joel may be the same as #9 above.

(11) Son of Pedaiah and a chief officer over the half-tribe of MANASSEH during David's reign (1 Chr. 27:20).

(12) Son of Azariah and descendant of LEVI through KOHATH; listed among the Levites who purified the temple in the reform under HEZEKIAH (2 Chr. 29:12).

(13) One of the descendants of Nebo who agreed to put away their foreign wives (Ezra 10:43).

Overview of JOEL

Author: The prophet Joel son of Pethuel.

Historical setting: Disputed, with proposals ranging from the late ninth to the third century B.C.; many recent scholars prefer dates between 600 and 400 B.C.

Purpose: To warn the nation of JUDAH about the coming DAY OF THE LORD, and to lead the people to REPENTANCE so they can enjoy the future blessings.

Contents: The Lord's judgment on Judah (Joel 1:1—2:17); the Lord's pity on his people (2:18-32); the Lord's judgment on foreign nations and future blessings on his people (3:1-21).

(14) Son of Zicri and chief officer over the postexilic community in Jerusalem (Neh. 11:9). He held an office perhaps similar to that of mayor, and was assisted by JUDAH son of Hassenuah (the latter was either second in command [NRSV] or in charge of the "Second District" [NIV]). It is not clear whether these two men were Benjamites (v. 7) or Judahites (v. 4).

Joel, Book of. Second book of the Minor Prophets (in the LXX it takes fourth place). In the MT the book consists of four chapters, but the English versions (following the LXX and Vulg.) combine Joel 2-3 MT into one chapter; thus ch. 4 MT corresponds to ch. 3 in the English Bible.

The book of Joel is without the customary dating formula used by the prophets (Hos. 1:1; Amos 1:1), and nowhere indicates the date either of the ministry of the prophet Joel or of the writing of the book. Indirect references throughout the book have been claimed in support of dates that have differed from each other by as much as half a millennium. Scholars who follow the traditional viewpoint believe the book to be preexilic, written perhaps during the reign of the boy king Joash (JEHOASH, 837-800 B.C.), for the following reasons: (1) The enemies of Judah that are mentioned—the Philistines and Phoenicians (Joel 3:4), Egypt and Edom (3:19)—are those of the preexilic period (2 Ki. 8:20-22; 2 Chr. 21:16-17) rather than the Assyrians and Babylonians, who later troubled Judah. (2) Amos, a prophet during this time, seems to have been acquainted with Joel's prophecies (Joel 3:16; cf. Amos 1:2; 3:18; cf. 9:13). (3) The fact that the elders and priests are mentioned rather than the king would seem to point to the time of Joash's minority (2 Ki. 11:21). (4) The style of the book, quite different from that of the postexilic prophets, also argues for a preexilic date.

Many modern scholars believe the book to have been written much later, about 350 B.C. Others deny its unity and claim that the apocalyptic elements come from a time as late as 200. Thus it is claimed that Joel is the last OT prophetic book. Some arguments for the book's late date: (1) There is no reference to the northern kingdom, ISRAEL. (2) The mention of the Greeks (Joel 3:6) is believed by some to be a reference to the SELEUCID line that ruled Palestine in the second century; and even if this identification is tenuous, it is felt that the Hebrews would hardly have known about the Greek people before the exile. (3) References to the destruction of JERUSALEM are detected in 3:1-3, 17. (Certain other arguments depend on a radical reconstruction of Israel's history and hardly need to be considered here.)

The unity of the book may be taken for granted, since it is conceded by many radical critics today. The arguments for a late date are not strong. In such a short book there need be no reference to the northern kingdom, and it is quite possible that the Hebrews may have known the Greeks at a time well before the exile. It should be added that since the book makes no claim as to its date, this matter is not of primary importance. The occasion of the book was a devastating locust plague (a frequent event in the Near East). Those who have not experienced such a calamity can hardly appreciate its destruction. Descriptions of modern plagues similar to that which occasioned Joel's prophecy provide an excellent background for understanding the book. The prophet, after describing the plague and its resulting chaos, urges the nation to repent of its sins and then goes on to predict a worse visitation, the future Day of the Lord.

The book may be outlined as follows.

I. The locust plague and its removal (Joel 1:1—2:27).

- A. The plague of locusts (1:1-20).
- B. The people urged to repent (2:1-17).
- C. God pities and promises relief (2:18-27).

II. The future day of the Lord (2:28—3:21).

- A. The Spirit of God to be poured out (2:28-32).
- B. The judgment of the nations (3:1-17).

C. Blessing on Israel following judgment (3:18-21).

The book opens with a description of the locust plague in terms of a human army. The locusts are like soldiers (Joel 2:7) and horses and chariots (2:4-5). Once the figures of speech are understood to be such, the description is extremely vivid and entirely in keeping with OT figurative language. The locusts are called a “northern army” (2:20). Although locust plagues in PALESTINE do not ordinarily come from the N, invasions of these insects from that direction are not unknown, one having occurred as recently as A.D. 1915. This calamity presages “the day of the LORD” (1:15; 2:1). The locust invasion provided Joel with a catalyst for his message that a greater day of judgment, known as the DAY OF THE LORD, would come if God’s people did not repent. The phrase is a designation given to any intervention of God in history for the purpose of judgment (Isa. 2:12—3:5). It also designates the eschatological intervention of God when the ultimate punishment of evil will occur (Joel 2:10-11). Joel’s message is that the present locust plague is a harbinger of greater woe if the people do not repent.

In the second chapter Joel continues to describe the plague and to urge repentance. The verbs in Joel 2:1-11 should be translated in the present tense (cf. NIV and other modern versions), for an event taking place in the prophet’s own time is being described. Evidently the people responded to Joel’s message, for a section full of comfort and promise of the renewal of the land follows (2:18-27).

The second major theme of Joel’s prophecy is introduced in Joel 2:28: After the present trouble will come the future day of the Lord, a time of great trouble for the nations when Israel will be vindicated and the messianic age of peace brought in. This frequent theme of OT prophecy is here presented with emphasis on the outpouring of the Spirit of God that will begin it (2:28-29). Then terrifying portents will appear (2:30-31), and Judah and Jerusalem will be delivered and the nations judged (3:1-21).

Looking E across the Arabah into Edom. Joel prophesied that Edom would become “a desert waste because of the violence done to the people of Judah” (Joel 3:19).

Joel’s greatest contribution to Christian thought is his teaching about the outpouring of the HOLY SPIRIT “on all people” (Joel 2:28). This prophecy is quoted by PETER in his sermon on the day of PENTECOST (Acts 2:14-21). The Holy Spirit came on people in OT times to enable them to serve God acceptably (Jdg. 6:34; 1 Sam. 16:13), and certainly he was in the world and dwelling in the saints then as now, though they had very little consciousness of this fact. But in a special way the new age was to be one of the Spirit (Isa. 32:15; Zech. 12:10; Jn. 7:39). All of God’s people would now be priests and prophets, for the ideal stated when the law was given but never achieved would now become a reality (Exod. 19:5-6; 1 Pet. 2:9-10).

Joelah. joh-ee’luh (Heb. yô ʿē-lâ H3443, perhaps “may [God] avail, help”). Son of Jeroham from GEDOR; he and his brother Zebadiah were among the ambidextrous warriors who joined DAVID at ZIKLAG (1 Chr. 12:7).

Joezer. joh-ee’zuhr (Heb. yô ʿezer H3445, “Yahweh is help”). One of several Korahite warriors who joined DAVID at ZIKLAG (1 Chr. 12:6; cf. vv. 1-2). These soldiers may have been LEVITES from the family of KORAH, but some argue that the reference is to a different Korah or even to a locality in the tribe of BENJAMIN.

Jogbehah. jogˈbuh-hah (Heb. yogbēhâ H3322, “height”). A city in GILEAD fortified by the tribe of GAD near its eastern border (Num. 32:35). GIDEON made a circuit around Jogbehah in order to attack the Midianites from the rear (Jdg. 8:11). The town is usually identified with el-Jubeihat (about 7 mi./11 km. NW of RABBAH, modern Amman), where an Ammonite military tower has been found.

Jogli. jogˈli (Heb. yoglî H3332, possibly “Yahweh reveals”). Father of Bukki; the latter was a leader from the tribe of DAN chosen to help in the distribution of Canaan W of the Jordan among the Israelites (Num. 34:22).

Joha. johˈhuh (Heb. yôḥāˁ H3418, short form of JEHOHANAN, “Yahweh is gracious”). (1) Son of Beriah and descendant of BENJAMIN, listed among the heads of families living in postexilic JERUSALEM (1 Chr. 8:16; cf. v. 28). His father and uncle, however, are described as “heads of families of those living in Aijalon” and as having driven out the inhabitants of GATH (v. 13).

(2) Son of Shimri; described as “the TIZITE,” he and his brother Jediahel are listed among DAVID’s mighty warriors (1 Chr. 11:45).

Ancient Mizpah should probably be identified with this hill (Tell en-Nasbeh). Johanan son of Kareah came to Mizpah and warned Gedaliah of an assassination attempt being plotted against him (Jer. 40:13-16).

Johanan. joh-hayˈnuhn (Heb. yôḥānān H3419, short form of JEHOHANAN, “Yahweh is gracious”). (1) Son of Kareah; he was one of the captains of Jewish forces in the open country during the conquest of JUDAH by NEBUCHADNEZZAR (2 Ki.

25:23). After the appointment of GEDALIAH as governor of the land, Johanan came with other captains to Gedaliah at MIZPAH (Jer. 40:8, 13). He warned Gedaliah of ISHMAEL's plan to assassinate him and asked permission to slay Ishmael, but the request was denied (40:14-16). After Gedaliah's murder, Johanan led the forces against Ishmael, overtook him at the great pool of GIBEON, and rescued everyone whom Ishmael had taken away by force (41:11-14). Ishmael and eight men escaped, but the rest of the people were brought back to GERUTH KIMHAM, a place near BETHLEHEM, from where they intended to go to EGYPT because they feared a Babylonian reprisal (41:15-18). Against the advice of JEREMIAH, he and other Jewish leaders led the remnant down into Egypt, taking the prophet with them (42:1—43:7).

(2) Firstborn son of King JOSIAH (1 Chr. 3:15). Nothing else is known about him. Because he did not succeed his father on the throne, some speculate that he died at an early age.

(3) Son of Elioenai and postexilic descendant of DAVID through SOLOMON (1 Chr. 3:24).

(4) Son of Azariah, included in a genealogy of high priests (1 Chr. 6:9-10). See AZARIAH #7.

(5) One of David's ambidextrous warriors from the tribe of BENJAMIN who joined him at ZIKLAG (1 Chr. 12:4; cf. vv. 1-2).

(6) A warrior from the tribe of GAD who joined David in the wilderness; listed eighth in rank among the officers (1 Chr. 12:12).

(7) Son of Hakkatan; he was family head of the descendants of Azgad who returned to Jerusalem with EZRA (Ezra 8:12). According to some, the Hebrew words translated "Johanan son of Hakkatan" should instead be rendered "Johanan the younger."

(8) "Son" (i.e., grandson) of ELIASHIB the high priest, and high priest himself during the reign of DARIUS II (Neh. 12:22-23; cf. vv. 10-11, where "Jonathan" perhaps should be read as "Johanan"). The identification of this high priest has a bearing on the dispute regarding the date of Ezra's mission, for some argue that he is the same individual mentioned in some extrabiblical sources.

(9) Alternate KJV form of JEHOHANAN (2 Chr. 28:12; Neh. 6:18).

John. jon (Gk. Iōannēs G2722, from Heb. yôḥānān H3419, short form of JEHOHANAN, "Yahweh is gracious"). (1) JOHN THE APOSTLE. See separate article.

(2) JOHN THE BAPTIST. See separate article.

(3) John Mark. See MARK, JOHN.

(4) Father of ANDREW and PETER (Jn. 1:42; 21:15-17; the KJV has “Jona” and “Jonas” respectively, following the TR); also called JONAS (Matt. 16:17, where the Gk. text reads Bariōna G980, from Aram. bar yônâ, “son of Jonas”). Most scholars believe, on the basis of the earliest MSS, that the original text of the fourth gospel had “John,” and that later scribes, influenced by the Matthean text, changed it to “Jonas.” Some speculate that these were alternate forms of his name; others posit divergent traditions in the early church.

(5) A relative of the high priests ANNAS and CAIAPHAS who participated in the cross-examination of the apostles Peter and John following the healing of the lame beggar at the temple (Acts 4:6). He is otherwise unknown.

John, Gospel of. The “fourth gospel,” as it is often called, probably influenced Christian thought during the first centuries of the church more decisively than any other book of the NT.

I. Authorship, date, place. Never was there a book written that made higher claim for its “hero.” To the Jesus of history its author gives the most exalted titles. In fact, in the very opening verse he calls him God. This becomes even more remarkable when we note that the author describes himself as one who belongs to the same race, stock, and family as Jesus, in fact as an eyewitness of the scenes that he so vividly portrays. No one knew Jesus better than he did. John walked with Jesus from day to day. He reclined on his bosom. He stood by his cross. He entered his tomb (Jn. 13:25; 19:26; 20:8). Yet he does not shrink from proclaiming that this Jesus of history, whom he knew so well, was and is himself God.

Overview of GOSPEL OF JOHN

Author: Anonymous, but traditionally attributed to JOHN THE APOSTLE, son of Zebedee.

Historical setting: Covers the life of CHRIST from his baptism to his resurrection. According to early Christian writers, the book was written c. A.D. 90 from EPHESUS.

Purpose: To evoke FAITH in Jesus as the Christ (Jn. 20:30-31); possibly also to supplement the other Gospels by providing information not found in them and by presenting a different, more theological, perspective.

Contents: After a prologue and introduction (Jn. 1), the author shows how Jesus revealed his glory to the world, only to be rejected (chs. 2-12); he then devotes the second half of the book to the last hours of Jesus' life, his death, and his resurrection (chs. 13-21).

Tradition holds the apostle John to be this author (see JOHN THE APOSTLE) and that the gospel was written sometime toward the close of the first century A.D. in ASIA MINOR. This tradition can be traced back from Eusebius (the church historian) at the beginning of the fourth century to Theophilus, who flourished about 170-180. The major witnesses, besides Eusebius, are Origen, Clement of Alexandria, Tertullian, Irenaeus, the writer of the Muratorian Canon, and Theophilus. Irenaeus, one of the earliest of these witnesses, was a disciple of Polycarp, who, in turn, had been a disciple of the apostle John. The inference seems to be legitimate that this tradition can be traced back to the disciple whom Jesus loved. Moreover, because of his wide travels, the witness of Irenaeus may be called a representative testimony, the firm conviction of the early church this Greek church father knew so well. In fact, the early writers (mentioned above) show us that in the last quarter of the second century the fourth gospel was known and read throughout Christendom—in Africa, Asia Minor, Italy, Gaul, Syria—and that it was ascribed to the well-known apostle John.

Among even earlier witnesses, Justin Martyr (Apology 1.61) quotes from Jn. 3:3-5. He uses a number of expressions from this gospel (see also his Dialogue with Trypho 105). His doctrine of the LOGOS presupposes acquaintance with the fourth gospel, which his pupil Tatian included in his Diatessaron (a harmony of the Gospels). Ignatius, who went to his martyrdom about the year A.D. 110, alludes to John's gospel again and again. Very significant also is the testimonial at the end of the gospel (Jn. 21:24), possibly to be traced to the elders of EPHESUS. The traditional belief regarding the authorship and date of the fourth gospel has received strong confirmation in the discovery of a very early papyrus fragment of the Gospel of John that seems to have originated in the Christian community of Middle Egypt. On the basis of solid evidence it has been established that this papyrus scrap belonged to a codex that circulated in that general region in the first part of the second century. This scrap contains part of 18:31-33 and (on the back side) part of 18:37-38. Now if this gospel was already circulating in Middle Egypt in the early part of the second century, it must have been composed even earlier. This means, therefore, that the traditional view with respect to the date and composition of the fourth gospel has at length been confirmed by archaeological evidence.

Internal evidence, moreover, is in line with tradition. The author was evidently a Jew, as his style (showing acquaintance with the OT) and intimate knowledge of Jewish religious beliefs and customs indicate (Jn. 2:13, 17, 23; 4:9, 25; 5:1; 6:4, 15; 7:2, 27, 37-38, 42; 10:22-23, 34-35; 11:38, 44, 49; 12:40). He was probably a Palestinian Jew, for he has a detailed knowledge of Palestinian topography (1:28; 2:1, 12; 3:23; 4:11, 20; 11:1, 54; 12:21), particularly of Jerusalem and its immediate vicinity (5:2; 9:7; 11:18; 18:1; 19:17) and of the temple (2:14, 20; 8:2, 20; 10:22-23; 18:1, 20). Having been an eyewitness, he remembered the time and place where the events occurred (1:29, 35, 39; 2:1; 3:24; 4:6, 40, 52-53; 6:22; 7:14; 11:6; 12:1; 13:1-2; 19:14, 31; 20:1, 19, 26). He knew that Jesus was weary when he sat down by the well (4:6), remembered the very words spoken by the neighbors of the man born blind (9:8-10), saw the blood and water issuing from Jesus' pierced side (19:33-35), knew the servant of the high priest by name (18:10), and was acquainted with the high priest (18:15). So intimate and full is his knowledge of the actions, words, and feelings of the other disciples that he must have been one of the Twelve (1:35-42; 2:17, 22; 4:27; 6:19; 11:16; 13:22-28; 18:15-16; 20:2; 21:20-23).

By a process of logical elimination it can easily be shown that the author was the apostle John and could not have been any one of the other twelve disciples, for though he does not mention himself by name but calls himself "the disciple whom Jesus loved," he distinguishes himself from others whom he does mention by name (Simon Peter, Jn. 1:40, 41-42, 44; Andrew, 1:40, 44; 6:8; 12:22; Philip, 1:43-46; Nathanael, 1:45-49; 21:2; Thomas, 11:16; 14:5; 20:24-29; 21:2; Judas (not Iscariot), 14:22; and Judas the Traitor, 6:71; 12:4; 13:2, 26, 29; 18:2-3, 5). Matthew's name can be eliminated for it is associated with another gospel. So also the names of obscure disciples like James the Less and Simon the Zealot can be eliminated. This leaves only the sons of Zebedee: James and John. But James died an early death (Acts 12), while this gospel's author survived even Peter (who survived James). It is clearly evident from Jn. 21:19-24 that John, "the disciple whom Jesus loved," was still alive and bearing witness when the fourth gospel first appeared (note present tense in 21:24), though Peter had already gained the martyr's crown (21:19). The reasonable conclusion would surely seem to be that the apostle John wrote the fourth gospel.

II. Purpose. The author states his purpose as follows: "Jesus did many other miraculous signs in the presence of his disciples, which are not recorded in this book. But these are written that you may believe that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God, and that by believing you may have life in his name" (Jn. 20:30-31). The faith of believers was being undermined by the errors of men like Cerinthus, who taught that Jesus was not really God and that Christ had not actually come in the flesh (i.e., had not adopted human nature). The apostle, seeing this danger and being guided by the HOLY SPIRIT, wrote this gospel in so that the church might abide in the true faith.

Thus, Irenaeus definitely states that John sought by the proclamation of the gospel to remove the error that Cerinthus was trying to spread (Against Heresies 3.11.1). According to Cerinthus, at baptism the Christ in the form of a dove had descended on Jesus, but this same Christ had left him again on the eve of his (Jesus') suffering. Hence, it was not really Christ who suffered and died and rose again but Jesus (ibid., 1.26.1; 3.3.4). Over against this, John defended the thesis that Jesus Christ is one, and that this one divine and human Person came not only by water (baptism) but also by blood (suffering and death). For proof see Jn. 19:34-37; cf. 1 Jn. 5:6. From the very beginning, therefore, Jesus is himself God. He adopted human nature into personal union with his divine nature and will keep it ("the Word became flesh," Jn. 1:1, 14). However, combating the error of Cerinthus was not John's main aim in writing this book. It was subsidiary to the aim already quoted from 20:30-31.

John alone records the healing of an invalid by the pool of Bethesda and the subsequent words of Jesus regarding belief and witness (Jn. 5). This model of 1st-cent. Jerusalem (looking SW) shows the twin pools that are probably referred to in this passage.

The readers for whom this gospel was primarily intended (though in the final analysis it was composed for the church of the entire NT period, cf. Jn. 17:20-21) were living in Ephesus and surrounding areas. They were GENTILE Christians mostly. This explains why the evangelist adds explanatory notes to some of his references to Jewish customs and conditions (2:6; 4:9; 7:2; 10:22; 18:28; 19:31, 41-42). It also explains the circumstantial manner in which he locates places that were situated in Palestine (4:5; 5:2; 6:1; 11:1, 18; 12:21).

III. Characteristics. In harmony with John's aim, as described above, this Gospel has the following characteristics: (1) It is emphatically the spiritual Gospel, whose aim is to show who Jesus is (and this with a definitely practical purpose, Jn. 20:31). Hence, much of what is found in Matthew, Mark, and Luke (the Synoptics) is here omitted. On the other hand, much material is added, the type of material that brings into clear focus the glory of the Lord, his messianic office and deity. (See 2:11; 3:16; 4:25-26, 29, 42; 5:17-18; 6:40; 7:37-38; 8:36, 46, 51; 9:38; 10:30; 11:40; 13:3; 14:6; 17:3, 5; 20:28.) The miracles here recorded also emphasize this same thought.

(2) In close connection with the above paragraph is the fact that here it is not the kingdom (as in the other gospels) but the King himself on whom the emphasis falls. This also accounts for the seven “I Ams” (Jn. 6:35; 8:12; 10:9, 11; 11:25; 14:6; 15:50).

(3) This gospel, far more than the others, records Christ’s work in JUDEA.

(4) It is far more definite than are the others in indicating the time and place of the events that are related.

(5) It abounds in nonparabolic teaching.

(6) It dwells at great length on the events and discourses that belong to a period of less than twenty-four hours (chs. 13-19).

(7) It records with special emphasis the promise of the coming and work of the Holy Spirit (14:16-17, 26; 15:26; 16:13-14).

(8) Its style, especially in the prologue, is rhythmic. The manner in which the clauses are coordinated so that often a truth is stated first positively, then negatively or vice versa (1:3; 14:6; 15:5-6; 14:18; 15:16), and the careful balancing of sentences so that antithesis is followed by synthesis, pithy clauses by longer sentences—all make this gospel a very beautiful book.

IV. Contents. The arrangement of John’s gospel is superb. First, we see the Word in his preincarnate glory, so that his condescending love in the salvation of sinners may be deeply appreciated. In his earthly ministry he reveals himself to ever-widening circles (to a few disciples; to his mother and friends at Cana; to Jerusalem; to Judea, Samaria, and Galilee), but he is rejected both in Jerusalem and in Galilee (Jn. 1-6; especially 5:18; 6:66). Nevertheless, he makes his tender appeal to sinners, that they may accept him (chs. 7-10; esp. 7:37-38; 8:12, 31-36; 10:7, 18, 27-28). Meanwhile opposition grows into bitter resistance (7:20, 49; 8:6, 40, 48-59, 9:22; 10:20, 31, 39).

Next, by two mighty deeds—the raising of LAZARUS and the triumphal entry into Jerusalem—Jesus manifests himself as the MESSIAH (Jn. 11-12). But though the Greeks seek him (12:20-36), the Jews repulse him (12:37-50). By way of contrast this rejection causes the anointing at BETHANY to stand out in all its beauty (12:1-8). So he turns—and this is indeed a turning point in the narrative—to the inner circle and tenderly instructs the Twelve in the upper room, first mainly by means of example (washing the feet of his disciples, ch. 13), and then mainly by means of his word (of comfort, ch. 14; of admonition, ch. 15; and of prediction, ch. 16). He commits himself, them, and all later generations of believers to his Father’s care (ch. 17). In his very death (chs. 18-19) he overcomes the world and brings to completion the glorious work of redemption (19:30; cf. 12:30-31; 16:33). By means of his resurrection and loving manifestations (to Mary Magdalene, the eleven, the ten, the seven, particularly Peter and John), he proves his majestic claims and reveals himself as the proper object of abiding trust (chs. 20-21, especially 20:30-31).

V. Outline

A. Jesus' public ministry (Jn. 1-12)

1. Revealing himself to ever-widening circles, rejected (chs. 1-6)
2. Making his tender appeal to sinners, bitterly resisted (chs. 7-10)
3. Manifesting himself as the Messiah by two mighty deeds, repulsed (chs. 11-12)

B. Jesus' private ministry (chs. 13-21)

1. Issuing and illustrating his new commandment (ch. 13)
2. Tenderly instructing his disciples and committing them to the Father's care (chs. 14-17)
3. Dying as a substitute for his people (chs. 18-19)
4. Triumphant gloriously (chs. 20-21)

John, Letters of. Three anonymous books from among the CATHOLIC EPISTLES in the NT that traditionally have been ascribed to JOHN THE APOSTLE.

I. The First Letter of John. Although the author does not identify himself, the early church attributed both this letter and the fourth gospel to the apostle John (see JOHN, GOSPEL OF). This attribution is supported by internal evidence of both books. The writer of the letter speaks with authority, as an apostle would (1 Jn. 1:2; 2:1; 4:6, 14). He claims to have firsthand knowledge of the facts that underlie the GOSPEL message (1:1-3; 4:14). The tone and teaching of the letter are such as we would expect from the aged apostle, writing to his disciples a last message regarding the truths he had taught throughout his life. When the gospel and the letter are compared, the conclusion is well-nigh irresistible that the two books are by the same person. There are striking resemblances in style, language, and thought. Among these resemblances are characteristic words used in a peculiar sense (e.g., life, light, darkness, and world), characteristic expressions (e.g., eternal life, a new commandment, and abide in Christ), and identical phrases (e.g., walks in darkness and that your joy may be full). The few divergencies are easily explainable on the basis of differences of purpose and of subject.

We cannot be sure whether the letter was written before or after the gospel. Tradition says that the gospel was written late in the life of John, toward the end of the first century. Evidence of a similar date for the letter is that Christianity had been so long in existence that the author can speak of its precepts as an “old commandment” (1 Jn. 2:7); moreover, the writing shows signs that an early form of G^{NOSTICISM} was already in existence.

The purpose of the author is to warn the readers against false teachers who are trying to mislead them, and to exhort them to hold fast to the Christian faith they have received, fulfilling conscientiously the duties, especially brotherly love, that flow from it. Although he does not exactly describe the false doctrine he attacks, there is no doubt that he has in mind the heresy of Gnosticism, with its view that the person of Christ was only spiritual, not physical, and that Christians are free from moral law by virtue of grace. The false teachers are called ANTICHRISTS (1 Jn. 2:18, 22; 4:3). They claim a knowledge of God that is superior to that of ordinary Christians, but, John says, their claims are false (2:4). They deny that Jesus is the Christ (2:22), the Son of God (4:15; 5:5), and that Jesus Christ has come in the flesh (4:2). They also impugn the fundamental moral teachings of the church by their dualistic interpretation of existence, for, according to Gnosticism, sin is not moral opposition of the human personality to God, but the evil physical principle inherent in all matter.

Overview of 1 JOHN

Author: Anonymous, but traditionally attributed to JOHN THE APOSTLE, son of Zebedee.

Historical setting: Probably written toward the end of the first century, at a time when an incipient form of G^{NOSTICISM} was influencing the Christian communities of ASIA MINOR.

Purpose: To counteract false teaching concerning CHRIST and the Christian life.

Contents: Fellowship with God (1 Jn. 1:1—2:2); obeying Jesus’ commandments and loving one another (2:3—3:24); acknowledging that Jesus is the Christ who has come in the flesh (ch. 4); victory and assurance (ch. 5).

Overview of 2-3 JOHN

Author: “The elder,” traditionally understood to be JOHN THE APOSTLE, son of Zebedee.

Historical setting: Probably written toward the end of the first century, and addressed respectively to an unnamed woman (2 John) and to a Christian leader named GAIUS (3 John).

Purpose: To warn against falsehood and to encourage hospitality to the true ministers of the gospel.

Contents: Walking in the truth and avoiding false teachers (2 John). Commendation of Gaius, warning about Diotrephes, and encouragement to do what is good (3 John).

Although 1 John does not have the usual characteristics of the ancient Greco-Roman letters—salutation, final greetings, messages to individuals, etc.—there is no doubt that it is a genuine letter. Most likely it is a pastoral or circular letter addressed to the churches in the province of ASIA, where the church was in danger of the errors that are warned against.

The plan of the letter is difficult to follow and has been differently understood. Some fail to recognize any regular plan at all. Thoughts that are repeated again and again throughout 1 John are the necessity of doing righteousness as an evidence of divine sonship, the necessity of love for the brethren by those who claim to love God, and believing that Jesus is the Christ come in the flesh.

II. The Second Letter of John. The letters we call 2 and 3 John are similar in words, style, ideas, and character to 1 John, and must have been written by the same author, who refers to himself simply as “the elder” (2 Jn. 1; 3 Jn. 1). Both are very brief, containing just the number of words that could conveniently be written on one sheet of papyrus. Although written to different people and for different purposes, there are striking resemblances of wording in them. The opening address is almost identical, and in both letters the writer expresses joy in the spiritual progress of those to whom he writes, and does so in almost the same words. The conclusion of the letters is the same in both thought and words.

Second John is addressed to “the chosen lady and her children” (2 Jn. 1). Many suppose that the reference is to a church and its spiritual children, while others hold that a particular individual named Kyria (Gk. for “lady”) is meant.

The introductory greeting is followed by an exhortation to hold fast to the commandments they had received, especially brotherly love, a warning against false teachers who deny that Christ is come in the flesh, and a prohibition against receiving them. The author concludes with a promise to visit them soon.

Roman forum and theater at Ephesus (view to the NE). Tradition says that the apostle John wrote his epistles from this city.

III. The Third Letter of John. This epistle is addressed to GAIUS, “my dear friend” (3 Jn. 1), who is eulogized for walking in the truth and being hospitable to evangelists sent, apparently by John, to the church of which Gaius is a member. The author then censures another member of the church, the talkative, overbearing DIOTREPHES, who for some unexplained reason, probably jealousy, not only refused to receive the itinerant preachers but did all he could to get the whole church to follow his course, even to the length of threatening excommunication for those who took a different view of their duty. The author adds that he had written a letter to the church also, but apparently he has little hope that it will overcome the headstrong opposition of Diotrephes. He threatens a speedy visit to the church, when he will call Diotrephes to account for his bad conduct. There is in this letter no suggestion of heretical tendency in the church.

John Mark. See MARK, JOHN.

John the apostle. The sources for the life of John are relatively meager. All that exists is what is found in the NT and what has been preserved by tradition. One can, therefore, give no more than a fragmentary account of his life. He was the son of ZEBEDEE and brother of JAMES the apostle, who was put to death by Herod AGRIPPA I about A.D. 44 (Matt. 4:21; Acts 12:1-2). It may be reasonably inferred that his mother was SALOME (cf. Matt. 27:56 with Mk. 15:40) and that she was the sister of MARY, MOTHER OF JESUS. Jesus and John would then have been cousins. The family lived in GALILEE, probably at BETHSAIDA. The father and the two sons were fishermen on the Sea of Galilee (Mk. 1:19-20). There are reasons for thinking that the family was not poor. They had hired servants and thus belonged to the employer class. Salome was one of the women who ministered to Jesus of her own funds (Mk. 15:40; Lk. 8:3) and was also one of the women who bought spices and came to anoint the body of Jesus (Mk. 16:1). In addition, there is good reason to believe that John is referring to himself when he speaks of the disciple who knew the high priest (Jn. 18:15); if so, the family probably had connections not usually available to the poor.

John is first introduced as a disciple of JOHN THE BAPTIST (Jn. 1:35). He had therefore heeded the Baptist's call to REPENTANCE and baptism in preparation for the coming of the MESSIAH. How long he had been a follower of the Baptist is not known. In his gospel he tells how he first met Jesus and became his disciple (1:35-39). One day as he stood with ANDREW and John the Baptist, he heard his master say, as Jesus walked by, "Look, the Lamb of God!" The two disciples of John immediately followed Jesus, and when they were asked what they wanted, they said they wanted to know where Jesus was staying. He invited them to come and see. Their stay changed their lives and was so memorable that many years later, when John recorded the account in his gospel, he still remembered that it was about four o'clock in the afternoon. The next day he and some others accompanied Jesus to Galilee to attend a wedding feast at CANA (2:1-11). From Cana they went to CAPERNAUM and then down to JERUSALEM, where Jesus cleansed the temple and had an interview with NICODEMUS (2:13—3:21).

John was with Jesus during his seven-month sojourn in the country of JUDEA, calling the people to repentance and baptism. Since Jesus himself did not baptize, he undoubtedly helped in the administration of the baptismal rite (Jn. 4:2). When Jesus heard of the Baptist's arrest, he decided to return to Galilee. A probable factor in his decision to leave Judea was his realization that the Jewish religious leaders were worried over the fact that he was acquiring an even larger following than the Baptist. On the way N, as they passed through SAMARIA, the incident with the Samaritan woman occurred, so fully described in ch. 4. For a time after Jesus returned to Galilee his disciples seem to have returned to their normal occupations, but one day Jesus appeared by the Sea of Galilee and called Peter and Andrew, James and John from their fishing to be with him constantly so that they might be trained to become fishers of men (Matt. 4:18-22; Mk. 1:16-20; Lk. 5:1-11). This was the second stage of discipleship in John's preparation for his life work. Some time later, he was chosen to the apostolate (Matt. 10:2-4; Mk. 3:13-19; Lk. 6:12-19). The list of the Twelve given in Mark's gospel states that Jesus gave James and John the surname BOANERGES, that is, Sons of Thunder, evidently because of the impetuosity of their temperament.

During the course of the Lord's ministry the experiences of John were common to all the apostles. There are, however, a few scenes in which he takes an important part. The Gospels as a whole make clear that he was one of the most prominent of the apostles, and his own work shows clear that he was greatly loved by Jesus. He was one of the three apostles who were closest to Jesus, the other two being Peter and James, John's brother. With the other two in the inner circle of the apostles, he was admitted to witness the raising of JAIRUS's daughter (Mk. 5:37; Lk. 8:51); the same three were chosen by Jesus to be present at the TRANSFIGURATION (Matt. 17:1; Mk. 9:2; Lk. 9:28); and they were nearest to Jesus during his agony in GETHSEMANE (Matt. 26:37; Mk. 14:33). It was John who told Jesus that they had seen someone casting out devils in his name and that they had forbidden him because he was not of their company (Mk. 9:38; Lk. 9:49).

The two brothers, James and John, gave evidence of their impetuosity when a Samaritan village refused to allow them to pass through on their way to Jerusalem; they said to Jesus, "Lord, do you want us to call fire down from heaven to destroy them?" (Lk. 9:54). They also showed tactlessness and presumptuous ambition when they went to Jesus with their mother and requested that in the coming kingdom they be given places of honor above the others (Mk. 10:35). On Tuesday of Passion Week, John was among those who asked Jesus on the Mount of OLIVES when his prediction about the destruction of the temple would be fulfilled (13:3). He and Peter were sent by Jesus to make preparations for the Passover (Lk. 22:8), and at the Passover feast John lay close to the breast of Jesus and asked who his betrayer would be (Jn. 13:25).

When Jesus was arrested, John fled, as did the other apostles (Matt. 26:56), but before long he recovered enough courage to be present at the trial of Jesus. Through his acquaintance with the high priest, he was able to have Peter come in too (Jn. 18:16). He stood near the cross on which Jesus was nailed and there received Jesus' commission to look after his mother (19:26). On the morning of the RESURRECTION, when he and Peter were told by Mary Magdalene about the empty grave, they went together to see for themselves (20:2-3). In the account of the appearance of the risen Lord in Galilee the sons of Zebedee received special mention, and it is John who first recognized Jesus (21:1-7). In the scene that follows, the impression is corrected that John should not die before the Lord's return. At the end of the chapter the truthfulness of the gospel record is confirmed (21:20-24).

In the rest of the NT there are only a few scattered references to John. After Jesus' ASCENSION he remained in Jerusalem with the other apostles, praying and waiting for the coming of the HOLY SPIRIT. In Acts he appears with Peter in two important scenes. Soon after PENTECOST they healed a man who had been lame from his birth, and while explaining the miracle to the astonished crowd gathered around them, they were arrested. The next day they were brought before the SANHEDRIN. After being warned not to preach about Jesus any more, they were released (Acts 4:1-22). Later, after the gospel had been preached by PHILIP to the people of Samaria, Peter and John were sent there by the apostles; and they prayed and laid hands on the new converts that they might receive the Holy Spirit (8:14-15). John's name is once mentioned in Paul's letters—in Gal. 2:9, where Paul says that on his second visit to Jerusalem after his conversion he met and consulted with James (undoubtedly the Lord's brother), Peter, and John, who were pillars of the church and who gave him the right hand of fellowship. The only other mention of John in the NT is in Rev. 1:1, 4, 9, where the authorship of the book is ascribed to him.

Five books of the NT are traditionally attributed to him—the fourth gospel, three letters, and Revelation. The only one in which his name actually appears is the last. According to tradition, he spent his last years in EPHESUS. Very likely the seven churches of ASIA enjoyed his ministry. The book of Revelation was written on the island of PATMOS, where he was exiled “because of the word of God and the testimony of Jesus” (Rev. 1:9). Tradition says that he wrote the Gospel of John in Asia at the request of Christian friends and that he agreed to do so only after the church had fasted and prayed about the matter for three days. He apparently died in Ephesus about the end of the century.

It is evident from all we know of John that he was one of the greatest of the apostles. He is described as the disciple whom Jesus loved, no doubt because of his understanding of and love for his Lord. The defects of character with which he began his career as an apostle—an undue vehemence, intolerance, and selfish ambition—were in the course of time brought under control, until he became especially known for his gentleness and kindly love.

John the Baptist. The immediate forerunner of Jesus CHRIST, sent by God to prepare the way for the coming of the MESSIAH. John was of priestly descent on the side of both his parents. His father ZECHARIAH was a priest of the course of ABLIAH, while his mother ELIZABETH belonged to the family of AARON. They are described as being “upright in the sight of God, observing all the Lord’s commandments and regulations blamelessly” (Lk. 1:6). John was born in the hill country of JUDEA, about six months before the birth of Jesus. His parents were then old. His birth had been foretold by an angel to Zechariah while he was serving in the temple. The angel told him that his prayer for a child would be answered and that his wife would give birth to a son who was to be named John and who was to prepare the way for the coming of the Messiah. About his childhood and youth we know only that he lived as a NAZIRITE in the desert and that he was filled with the HOLY SPIRIT even from birth (1:15). It is thought by some that he was a member of a Jewish sect of monks called the ESSENES, but there is no clear evidence this was so.

His first public appearance is carefully dated by LUKE (Lk. 3:1-2), according to the way time was then reckoned. This was probably somewhere about A.D. 26, though some scholars argue for the year 29. His early ministry took place in the wilderness of Judea and in the JORDAN Valley. The main theme of his preaching was the near approach of the messianic age and the need for adequate spiritual preparation to be ready for it. His mission was to prepare the people for the advent of the Messiah so that when he made his appearance, they would recognize and accept him. His message did not harmonize with what many of his hearers expected, for while they looked for deliverance from and judgment on the foreign oppressor, John said that the Messiah would separate the good from the bad and would cast into the fire any tree that did not bring forth good fruit. Many of the Jews, especially the PHARISEES, seemed to think that they would enter the kingdom of God simply because they were physically descended from ABRAHAM; but John declared in no uncertain terms that this was not so at all. He called on them to repent sincerely of their sins and to be baptized. The BAPTISM by water that he administered signified a break with and cleansing from sin. His baptism was not something utterly new to the Jews; it had its roots in practices already familiar to them: in the various washings required by the Levitical law (Lev. 11-15), in the messianic cleansing foretold by the prophets (Jer. 33:8; Ezek. 36:25-26; Zech. 13:1), and in the proselyte baptism of the Jewish church. His baptism, however, differed essentially from these in that while the Levitical washings brought restoration to a former condition, his baptism prepared for a new condition.

While the multitudes of common people flocked to the Jordan, Jesus also came to be baptized. Although Jesus and John were cousins, it appears that John did not know that Jesus was the Messiah until he saw the Holy Spirit descend on him at his baptism (Jn. 1:32-34). When Jesus came to him for baptism, he saw that Jesus had no sin of which to repent, and John would have refused to baptize him, had Jesus not insisted, saying that it was necessary for him to fulfill all righteousness. Shortly after, John said to two of his disciples as they saw Jesus pass by, "Look, the Lamb of God, who takes away the sin of the world!" (1:29), and they left him to follow Jesus. He recognized the subordinate and temporary character of his own mission. Not all of his disciples left him to follow Jesus; and when some of them came to John with the complaint that all men were coming to Jesus, he said to them, "He must become greater; I must become less" (3:30), saying also that he was not the Messiah but only the forerunner of the Messiah. Little is known about John's training of his disciples beyond the fact that it included forms of prayer (Lk. 11:1) and frequent fastings (Matt. 9:14), but he must also have taught them much concerning the Messiah and his work. Their loyalty to him is shown in their concern about Jesus' overshadowing popularity, their refusal to abandon him in his imprisonment, the reverent care they gave his body after his death, and the fact that twenty years later there were disciples of his, including APOLLOS, the learned Alexandrian Jew, in faraway EPHESUS (Acts 18:24-25; 19:1-7).

The exact time of John's imprisonment or the length of time he was in prison is not known. It is clear, however, that Jesus began his ministry in Galilee after John was arrested and that John had been in prison approximately seven months when he sent two of his disciples to Jesus to inquire whether he really was the Messiah. This inquiry seems strange in view of his previous signal testimonies and is probably to be explained either in the interest of his disciples, who needed assurance that Jesus was really the Messiah; or in some misgivings of his own because the messianic kingdom was not being ushered in as suddenly and as cataclysmically as he had expected; or perhaps because he thought he was being forgotten while others were being helped. When the two disciples returned to John, Jesus expressed the frankest appreciation of John, declaring him to be more than a prophet, and that he was indeed God's messenger sent to prepare the way for him (Matt. 11:10-19). The Gospels tell that John met his death through the vindictiveness of HERODIAS, whom John had denounced for her sin of living in adultery with HEROD Antipas (Mk. 6:18-28).

Joiada. joi'uh-duh (Heb. yôyādā ^c H3421, short form of Jehoiada, "Yahweh has known"). (1) Son of Paseah; he and Meshullam repaired the Jeshanah Gate (see OLD GATE) under NEHEMIAH (Neh. 3:6; KJV, "Jehoiada"). They are said to have "laid its beams and put its doors and bolts and bars in place."

(2) Son of ELIASHIB and descendant of JESHUA the high PRIEST (Neh. 12:10-11, 22). A son of his married the daughter of SANBALLAT the Horonite (13:28; NRSV, "Jehoiada").

Joiakim. joi'uh-kim (Heb. yôyāqîm H3423, short form of Jehoiakim, "Yahweh raises up"). Son of JESHUA and father of ELIASHIB; all three held the office of high PRIEST after the EXILE (Neh. 12:10, 12, 26).

Joiarib. joi'uh-rib (Heb. yôyārîb H3424, short form of Jehoiarib, "Yahweh contends [for me]"). (1) One of two "men of learning" who, with others, were sent by EZRA to search for LEVITES (Ezra 8:16). See comments under ELNATHAN #3.

(2) Son of Zechariah and ancestor of Maaseiah; the latter was a prominent member of the tribe of JUDAH who lived in JERUSALEM after the EXILE (Neh. 11:5).

(3) A man included among the "leaders of the priests and their associates in the days of Jeshua" (Neh. 12:6; cf. v. 7). He may be the same individual who is apparently described as the father of JEDAIAH (11:10 NRSV; the text may have suffered textual corruption, and the NIV dissociates the names of Jedaiah and Joiarib). Later, in the days of the high priest Joiakim, the head of Joiarib's family was Mattenai (12:19; cf. v. 12). This Joiarib is probably the same as Jehoiarib (1 Chr. 9:10).

Jokdeam. jok'dee-uhm (Heb. yoqdē ^c ām H3680, derivation uncertain). A town in the hill country of the tribe of JUDAH (Josh. 15:56); it is usually identified with JORKEAM (1 Chr. 2:44). The precise location of Jokdeam is unknown, but it is listed with towns that lie approximately 4-10 mi. (6-16 km.) S and SE of HEBRON, so a few scholars have tentatively identified it with modern Khirbet er-Raq^ʿah, just N of JUTTAH.

Jokim. joh´kim (Heb. yôqîm H3451, short form of JEHOIAKIM, “Yahweh raises up”). Son of SHELA and grandson of JUDAH; he and one (or more) of his brothers are said to have “ruled in” (or “married into”) MOAB and JASHUBI LEHEM (1 Chr. 4:22). Some scholars believe that the words “and Jashubi Lehem” should be emended to either “but returned to Lehem” (so NRSV) or “and they resided in Bethlehem.”

Jokmeam. jok´mee-uhm (Heb. yoqmē ʿām H3695, perhaps “the Kinsman [i.e., ancestral god] takes a stand”). (1) A LEVITICAL CITY within the tribal territory of EPHRAIM, allotted to the clan of KOHATH (1 Chr. 6:68; called KIBZAIM in the parallel list, Josh. 21:22); it is mentioned between GEZER and BETH HORON, which were in SW Ephraim, but its precise location is unknown.

(2) A town that marked the border of SOLOMON’s fifth administrative district (1 Ki. 4:12; KJV, “Jokneam”); because it is listed after BETH SHAN and ABEL MEHOLAH, this town was probably in the JORDAN Valley, in E Ephraim, and it should possibly be identified with modern Tell es-Samadi (some 12 mi./19 km. ESE of SHECHEM) or nearby Tell el-Mazar.

Jokneam. jok´nee-uhm (Heb. yoqnē ʿām H3696, derivation uncertain). (1) A town in the tribal territory of ZEBULUN that served to mark its SW boundary (Josh. 19:11); it was assigned to the descendants of MERARI as a LEVITICAL CITY (21:34; 1 Chr. 6:77). The king of this royal Canaanite city, said to be located in CARMEL, is included in the list of kings defeated by JOSHUA on the W of the JORDAN (Josh. 12:22). Jokneam is identified with Tell Qeimun, a mound located at the NW end of the plain of ESDRAELON, 7 mi. (11 km.) NW of MEGIDDO. The town was one of the fortresses that guarded the routes across Carmel.

(2) KJV form of JOKMEAM in 1 Ki. 4:12.

Jokshan. jok´shan (Heb. yoqšān H3705, derivation uncertain). Son of ABRAHAM and KETURAH, and father of SHEBA and DEDAN (Gen. 25:2-3; 1 Chr. 1:32). Abraham sent the sons of Keturah to the E (Gen. 25:6), where they became the ancestors of Arabian tribes.

Joktan. jok'tan (Heb. yoqtān H3690, possibly from a root meaning “vigilant”). Son of EBER and descendant of SHEM, included in the Table of Nations (Gen. 10:25-29; 1 Chr. 1:19-23). His thirteen children are said to have lived from MESHA to SEPHAR (Gen. 10:30), probably referring to locations in SW ARABIA.

Joktheel. jok'thee-uhl (Heb. yoqtē ʾēl H3706, possibly “God nourishes”). (1) A town within the tribal territory of JUDAH (Josh. 15:38). Included in the S SHEPHELAH district, it was presumably near MIZPEH and LACHISH, but its precise location is unknown.

(2) Name given to the Edomite city of SELA by AMAZIAH, king of Judah, after he captured it (2 Ki. 14:7).

Jona. joh'nuh. According to the KJV, the father of Simon PETER (Jn. 1:42). See JOHN #4.

Jonadab, Jehonadab. joh'nuh-dab, ji-hoh'nuh-dab (Heb. yônādāb H3432, short form of yēhônādāb H3386, “Yahweh is willing [or noble or generous]”). (1) Son of SHIMEAH (or SHAMMAH) and nephew of King DAVID (2 Sam. 13:3-5, 32-35). Scripture calls him “a very shrewd man,” and he used his craftiness to promote the incestuous lust of AMNON. Upon the murder of Amnon by ABSALOM, Jonadab reassured David that his other sons had not been killed. Some scholars identify Jonadab with Shimeah's son JONATHAN, who is credited with killing a giant (2 Sam. 21:21; 1 Chr. 20:7); others believe Jonadab and Jonathan were brothers.

(2) Son (or descendant) of Recab; he encouraged JEHU in the abolition of BAAL worship in SAMARIA (1 Ki. 10:15, 23 [“Jehonadab”]) and was the founder of a nomadic community (Jer. 35:6-19). See RECABITE.

Jonah. joh'nuh (Heb. yônāh H3434, “dove”; Gk. Iōnas G2731). (1) Son of Amittai; Israelite prophet. See JONAH, BOOK OF.

(2) Father of Simon PETER (Matt. 16:17). See JOHN #4.

Jonah, Book of. Fifth book of the Minor Prophets, attributed to Jonah son of Amittai, an eighth century prophet of Israel. This little book of four chapters has been the subject of intense disagreement concerning its historicity and interpretation. The debate is occasioned primarily by the narrative's supernatural elements: the great fish, the repentance of NINEVEH, and the gourd and worm.

Overview of JONAH

Author: Anonymous, but probably composed by the main character of the book, prophet Jonah son of Amittai.

Historical setting: The events described take place during the height of the Assyrian empire, and elsewhere (2 Ki. 14:25) Jonah is identified as active in the reign of JEROBOAM II (c. 750 B.C.). The book was probably written soon after the events, but critical scholars believe it was composed by someone else in the fifth century B.C. or even later.

Purpose: To point out the stubbornness and excessive nationalism of the Israelites and to stress God's compassion for those outside Israel.

Contents: Jonah flees from God's call (Jon. 1), prays in the belly of the fish (ch. 2), preaches in NINEVEH (ch. 3), and sulks before God (ch. 4).

According to 2 Ki. 14:25, Jonah son of Amittai came from the town of GATH HEPHER in the tribe of ZEBULUN, and he predicted the restoration of the land of Israel to its ancient boundaries through the efforts of JEROBOAM II. The exact words of this prediction are not given, nor are we told the specific time when the prophecy was uttered; but we may be certain that it was pronounced sometime before the conquests of Jeroboam, either about the start of his reign or toward the close of the preceding reign. Jeroboam ruled for a period of forty years (c. 790-750 B.C., but the exact dates are debated). When he ascended the throne, he found the kingdom weak because ever since the time of JEHU, his great-grandfather, the people had been forced to pay continual tribute to ASSYRIA. He became the most powerful of all the monarchs who ever sat on the throne of SAMARIA, capturing HAMATH and DAMASCUS and restoring to Israel all the territory it used to have from Hamath to the DEAD SEA. The prophet HOSEA also prophesied in the time of Jeroboam, but it must have been only toward the very close of his reign, as his prophetic activity extended to the time of HEZEKIAH, sixty years later.

The identity of this prophet with the main character of the book of Jonah cannot reasonably be doubted. Jonah 1:1 reads, “The word of the Lord came to Jonah son of Amittai.” It is extremely unlikely that there were two prophets with the same name. While the author of the book of Jonah does not identify himself, the likelihood is that the prophet himself wrote it (see discussion below). In all probability the book was written not long after the events took place, in the latter part of Jeroboam’s reign. The spirit and teaching of the book of Jonah rank with the highest of the OT prophetic books. Not as much can be said for the prophet himself, who ranks low in the catalog of OT prophets. He was a proud, self-centered egotist: willful, pouting, jealous, bloodthirsty; a lover of Israel, but without proper respect for God or love for his enemies.

The book differs from the other Minor Prophets in that while they for the most part contain prophetic discourses, with a minimum of narrative material, Jonah is mainly occupied with a narrative, and the prophetic message in it is almost incidental. The chapter divisions mark the four natural sections of the book: Jonah’s disobedience (Jon. 1); Jonah’s prayer (ch. 2); Jonah’s preaching to the Ninevites (ch. 3); Jonah’s complaints (ch. 4). The book begins with Jonah’s call to preach at NINEVEH because of its great wickedness. Instead of obeying, he took a ship in the opposite direction, to TARSHISH, probably in SW Spain. In the sequel of the account he frankly gives his reason for refusing to obey God’s command, “That is why I was so quick to flee to Tarshish. I knew that you are a gracious and compassionate God, slow to anger and abounding in love, a God who relents from sending calamity” (4:2). His disobedience thus arose from a fear that the Ninevites would heed his message and repent, and that God would forgive the city that had for many years grievously oppressed his own land. He was evidently a narrow-minded patriot who feared that Assyria would someday destroy his own people; and he did not want to do anything that might contribute to that event.

During a violent storm at sea, the heathen sailors prayed to their own gods who, they thought, must be offended with some person on board. They cast lots to discover the culprit, and when the lot fell on Jonah, he confessed that he was fleeing from the Lord and volunteered to be thrown overboard for their sakes. This was done, the storm subsided, and the sailors offered a sacrifice to God. The Lord prepared a great fish to swallow Jonah. Surprised to find himself alive in the body of the fish, the prophet gave thanks to God and expressed the confident hope that he would ultimately be delivered. After three days and three nights the fish vomited him onto the dry land.

Commanded a second time to go to Nineveh, Jonah obeyed and delivered his message, “Forty more days and Nineveh will be overturned” (Jon. 3:4). The effect of his message was undoubtedly greatly heightened by the account of his deliverance, which had either preceded him or been told by himself. The people of Nineveh repented in sackcloth and ashes, and God spared the city. When Jonah learned that Nineveh was to be spared, he broke out into loud and bitter complaint, not because he felt discredited as a prophet on account of the failure of his prediction, but because he was sure that the sparing of Nineveh sealed the doom of his own country. By the withering of a vine, the Lord taught the prophet that if a mean and perishable plant could come to have such value to him, how much greater should be the estimate put on the lives of thousands of children and cattle in the great city of Nineveh. These meant more to God than Jonah’s vine could ever mean to Jonah.

The purpose of the book is primarily to teach that God’s gracious purposes are not limited to Israel but extend to the GENTILE world. The author wishes to enlarge the sympathies of Israel, so that as God’s missionaries they will lead the Gentiles to repentance and to God. The ready response of the Ninevites shows that the heathen are capable of genuine repentance. The book of Jonah may be regarded as a great work on foreign missions. It anticipates the catholicity of the gospel program of Jesus, and is the OT counterpart of Jn. 3:16, “For God so loved the world.”

The book is anonymous, and its authorship is in dispute. The traditional view is that the prophet Jonah is the author, and his book is a record of his own experiences. A more recent view is that the book was written long after Jonah’s time by some anonymous author and that it is a work of fiction (an allegory or a parable) with a moral lesson. The arguments advanced against Jonah’s own authorship—e.g., that the author writes in the third person, or that the book contains late ARAMAIC features—are hardly conclusive. With regard to its historicity, proper weight must be given to the fact that from the earliest period and up to modern times, the book has been regarded as a simple and straightforward narrative. Moreover, it is apparent that Jesus agreed with his contemporaries on this matter, for on more than one occasion he treated the narrative as history and taught it as such (Matt. 12:38-41; 16:4; Lk. 11:29-32).

Jonam. joh´nuhm (Gk. Iōnam G2729). KJV Jonan. Son of Elikaim, included in Luke’s GENEALOGY OF JESUS CHRIST (Lk. 3:30).

Jonan. See JONAM.

Jonas. joh´nuhs. (1) KJV NT form of JONAH.

(2) According to the KJV, the father of Simon PETER (Jn. 21:15-17). See JOHN #4.

Jonathan. jon´uh-thuhn (Heb. yônātān H3440, short form of yēhônātān H3387, “Yahweh has given [a child]”; the longer form is almost twice as common, but is almost always rendered “Jonathan” in English Bibles; see also JEHONATHAN). A very common name among the Israelites in all periods.

(1) Firstborn son of King SAUL and heir apparent to the throne of Israel (1 Sam. 14:49). Jonathan comes on the scene soon after his father was crowned king. He gained an important victory over the Ammonites, who had been harassing the Israelites. Saul’s army numbered 3,000 men (13:2), a third of whom he placed under the command of Jonathan at GIBEAH, while the rest he retained at his headquarters at MICMASH. In the valley midway between the two camps, at a place called GEBa, the PHILISTINES established an outpost and forced Saul to evacuate and fall back on Gibeah and GILGAL with a greatly reduced army, now numbering only 600 men (13:15), the rest having fled in fear to hide in caves or having been pressed into the enemy’s service. In spite of this, Jonathan, assisted only by his armor-bearer, surprised the Philistine outpost at Geba and killed twenty men (14:1-14). The resulting panic spread to the main camp, and when Saul came to attack, he found the Philistines confusedly attacking one another, and soon the whole Philistine army was in headlong flight. In this rout, the only weapons the Israelites had were farming implements (13:22), Saul and Jonathan alone being armed with swords and spears. The victory would have been even more complete had not Saul superstitiously ordered the people to refrain from eating until the day was over (14:24). Unaware of this prohibition, Jonathan, in his hot pursuit of the enemy, refreshed himself by eating wild honey. Saul would have had him put to death, but the people intervened. They recognized that, with the help of God, his energetic action had brought them a mighty victory.

But great as Jonathan's military qualities were, he is best remembered as the friend of DAVID. He exemplified all that is noblest in friendship—warmth of affection, unselfishness, helpfulness, and loyalty. His love for David began the day the two first met after the killing of GOLIATH (1 Sam. 18:1-4), and it remained steadfast despite Saul's suggestion that David would someday be king in their stead (20:31). When Jonathan first realized his father's animosity toward David, he interceded for his friend (19:1-7); and later, more than once, he risked his life for him. Once Saul, angered by what he regarded as unfilial conduct, threw a javelin at him, as he had done several times at David. The last meeting of the two friends took place in the desert of ZIPH, where Jonathan "helped his friend find strength in God" (23:16). He would not take part in the proceedings of his father against David, who was forced to live in hiding and from whom he was separated for many years. His disinterestedness and willingness to surrender all claims to the throne for the sake of his friend gives evidence of a character that is unsurpassed. While always holding to his own opinion of David, Jonathan conformed as much as he could to his father's views and wishes, and presents a noble example of filial piety. There was one temporary estrangement between Saul and Jonathan, provoked when Saul impugned the honor of Jonathan's mother (20:30).

Jonathan died with his father and brothers on Mount GILBOA in battle against the Philistines (1 Sam. 31:2). Their bodies were hung on the walls of BETH SHAN, but under cover of night the men of JABESH GILEAD, out of gratitude for what Saul had done for them at the beginning of his career (11:1-11), removed them and gave them honorable burial.

(2) Son of GERSHOM and grandson of MOSES (Jdg. 18:30; the MT inserts the letter n into the name mōšeh, "Moses," and vocalizes it mēnaššeh, "Manasseh," clearly an attempt to distance the descendants of Moses from idolatry). He is apparently to be identified with the LEVITE from BETHLEHEM of Judah who traveled to the hill country of Ephraim and was installed by MICAH as his household priest (17:7-9). Jonathan was discovered by five spies from the tribe of DAN who recognized him and made use of his divinatory ability (18:2-6). Later, when some of the Danites migrated to the N, they stopped again at the house of Micah, stole the cultic equipment accumulated by him, and talked the willing Jonathan into becoming priest for the entire tribe of Dan (18:14-20). A sanctuary was established at the city of Dan, a site formerly called Laish. There Jonathan and his descendants served as priests until the fall of Israel to the Assyrians in the eighth century B.C. (18:29-31). Perhaps the intention of the author is to indicate how far removed this worship was from the established religion of the ancestor Moses.

(3) Son of ABIATHAR the priest (2 Sam. 15:27). With AHIMAAZ the son of ZADOK, he acted as a courier for DAVID during the revolt by ABSALOM. The young men waited at EN ROGEL (17:17) for word brought by a maidservant concerning events in Jerusalem, and this word they carried to David at the fords of the Jordan. Later, when ADONIJAH proclaimed himself successor to his father David, Jonathan carried word to the celebrants at En Rogel that King David had ordered SOLOMON anointed king at GIHON (1 Ki. 1:42-45).

(4) Son of Shimei (2 Sam. 21:21 NRSV; Shimea in 1 Chr. 20:7), David's brother. This Jonathan killed a giant from GATH who had six fingers on each hand and six toes on each foot. Some identify him with JONADAB son of Shimeah, but it is more likely that they were brothers. This Jonathan should not be confused with the son of Shammah (#5, below), since this latter was not a Bethlehemite, but perhaps he may be equated with the "uncle" of David (#8).

(5) Son of Shammah the HARARITE, included among the Thirty, David's elite force (2 Sam. 23:33 [the MT lacks the words "son of"]; identified as son of Shagee in 1 Chr. 11:34).

(6) Son of Jada and descendant of JERAHMEEL, included in the genealogy of JUDAH (1 Chr. 2:32-33).

(7) Son of Uzziah and overseer of the provincial storehouses (treasuries) in the country, towns, villages, and watchtowers during the reign of David (1 Chr. 27:25).

(8) Uncle of David, described as "a counselor, a man of insight and a scribe" (1 Chr. 27:32). According to the RSV and other translations, both he and Jehiel son of Hacmoni were in charge of the king's sons, but it is likely that the Hebrew attributes that responsibility only to Jehiel. Because the word for "uncle" can be used less specifically of kinship on the father's side, some have proposed that here it means "brother's son" and that therefore this Jonathan should be identified with #4 above, the son Shimei.

(9) Father of Ebed; the latter was head of the family of Adin and returned to JERUSALEM from the EXILE with fifty of his clan and EZRA the scribe (Ezra 8:6; 1 Esd. 8:32).

(10) Son of Asahel; he and "Jahzeiah son of Tikvah, supported by Meshullam and Shabbethai the Levite," apparently challenged Ezra's instruction that those who had married foreign women should divorce them (Ezra 10:15). The Hebrew text, however, can be understood differently. See comments under JAHZEIAH.

(11) Son of Joiada, descendant of JESHUA, and father of JADDUA, all of them postexilic high priests (Neh. 12:11). Some believe that the text should read “Johanan” rather than “Jonathan” (cf. v. 22). See JOHANAN #8.

(12) Head of the priestly family of Malluch (KJV, “Melicu”; NRSV, “Malluchi”) during the high priesthood of Joiakim (Neh. 12:14).

(13) Son of Shemaiah, descendant of ASAPH, and father of Zechariah; the latter was one of the Levitical musicians who took part in the procession celebrating the rebuilding of the wall (Neh. 12:35).

(14) A secretary during the reign of King ZEDEKIAH of Judah; Jonathan’s house was used as a prison in which JEREMIAH was confined for a time (Jer. 37:15, 20; 38:26).

(15) Son of Kareah; he and his brother JOHANAN were among those who joined GEDALIAH at MIZPAH (Jer. 40:8). The NRSV, following the SEPTUAGINT (as well as the parallel passage, 2 Ki. 25:23), omits the name of Jonathan.

(16) Son of MATTATHIAS and Maccabean leader. Surnamed Apphus (1 Macc. 2:5), Jonathan succeeded his brother Judas as head of the Judeans in 160 B.C. (9:28-31), became high PRIEST in 152 (10:18-21), and was killed in 143 (12:48). According to one interpretation, Jonathan is the “Wicked Priest” mentioned in the DEAD SEA SCROLLS. See MACCABEE.

Jonathan, Targum. See TEXT AND VERSIONS (OT).

Jonath-elem-rechokim. joh´nuth-ee´luhm-ri-koh´kim (Heb. yônat ʾēlem rēḥōqîm). KJV transliteration of a Hebrew phrase that probably refers to a musical tune (Ps. 56 title; NIV, “To the tune of ‘A Dove on Distant Oaks’”).

Joppa. jop´uh (Heb. yāpô H3639, yāpô ʾ [Ezra 3:7], “beautiful [city]”; Gk. Ioppē G2673). KJV also Japho (Josh. 19:46). A coastal city c. 35 mi. (56 km.) NW of JERUSALEM; it served as the seaport for the Israelite capital. Joppa was the only natural harbor on the MEDITERRANEAN between EGYPT and ACCO (NT Ptolemais). A rocky cape projected into the sea and, because of its elevation above the sea, it made an ideal military and commercial site. Reefs formed a rough semicircle off the shore but boats could enter from the N. Nearby were sandy beaches where shallow craft could come ashore. Two good springs supplied the city with water. The land around the city was very fertile. The site today is known as Jaffa and is a suburb of Tel Aviv.

Joppa was allotted to DAN, but there is no evidence that the Israelites ever possessed it in preexilic times. Timber from the forests of LEBANON was floated from TYRE to Joppa for the building of the TEMPLE of SOLOMON (2 Chr. 2:16), and again when the temple was being rebuilt, after the return from the Babylonian captivity (Ezra 3:7). It was then under Phoenician control. Jonah boarded a ship from Joppa when he fled from the presence of the Lord (Jon. 1:3). In Maccabean times the city was garrisoned by the SELEUCIDS, but when some 200 Jews were treacherously drowned, after being induced to go aboard ships, Judas MACCABEE in revenge set fire to the docks and the boats in the harbor and killed the fugitives. In NT times PETER raised DORCAS to life there (Acts 9:36-42), and on the roof of SIMON the tanner's house he received the famous vision that taught him the gospel was intended for Jew and GENTILE alike (9:43—11:18).

Jorah. jor'uh (Heb. yôrâ H3454, “[born during] autumn rains”). Ancestor of a family of 112 members that returned from EXILE with ZERUBBABEL (Ezra 2:18; called HARIPH in Neh. 7:24).

Jorai. jor'i (Heb. yôray H3455, perhaps “[whom] Yahweh teaches”). Son of Abihail; he was one of seven relatives from the tribe of GAD who occupied the region E of GILEAD (1 Chr. 5:13; cf. vv. 10, 14).

Joram. jor'uhm (Heb. yôrām H3456, short form of JEHORAM, “Yahweh is exalted”). (1) Son of TOU (Toi) king of HAMATH; he was sent by his father with presents to DAVID “to greet him and congratulate him on his victory in battle over Hadadezer, who had been at war with Tou” (2 Sam. 8:10). The name here is thought by some to be a corruption of HADORAM (found in the parallel passage, 1 Chr. 18:10), but Joram may be its Israelite equivalent (that is, using an abbreviated form of Yahweh rather than the pagan name HADAD).

(2) Son of AHAB and ninth king of the northern kingdom of ISRAEL (2 Ki. 1:17 et al.). See JEHORAM #2.

(3) Son of JEHOSHAPHAT and fifth king of the southern kingdom of JUDAH (2 Ki. 8:16-19; 2 Chr. 21). See JEHORAM #3.

(4) Son of Jeshaiiah; his descendant Shelomith was a LEVITE who shared the supervision of DAVID's treasury (1 Chr. 26:25).

Jordan River. jor'duhn (Heb. yardēn H3720, derivation uncertain; Gk. Iordanēs G2674). The major river of PALESTINE, which begins at Mount HERMON in the N, flows through the Sea of GALILEE and ends at the DEAD SEA in the S. The most popular etymology for the name is from the Hebrew verb yārad H3718 (“to go down”), thus, “The Descender,” but other suggestions have been made. Four rivers in SYRIA are recognized as the source of what later becomes the Jordan River proper. They are (1) the Bareith; (2) the Hasbany; (3) the Leddan; and (4) the best-known of them (though the shortest, 5.5 mi./9 km. long), the Banias, on which once stood the city of CAESAREA PHILIPPI or Paneas, site of a famous grotto of the Greek god Pan. These rivers join and pour into Lake Huleh, though in modern times this lake has been drained by Israeli settlers for farm land. The Jordan then descends for 10 mi. (16 km.) to the Sea of Galilee, a beautiful body of water.

The Upper Jordan River, N of the Sea of Galilee. (View to the N, with the river cutting through Rosh Pina.)

From the place where the Jordan makes its exit from the Sea of Galilee to the place where it enters the Dead Sea is, in a straight line, a length of c. 70 mi. (110 km.). But the river itself, because of its serpentine path, is 200 mi. (320 km.) long. The surface of the Dead Sea is c. 1,290 ft. (393 m.) below sea level. The Jordan River proper varies from 90 to 100 ft. (27-30 m.) in width, and from 3 to 10 ft. (1-3 m.) in depth, but the gorge that it has cut out varies in width from 4 mi. (6 km.) at the N to 14 mi. (23 km.) near JERICO. Because it has twenty-seven rapids between the Sea of Galilee and the Dead Sea, the Jordan carries no traffic; and because of the swampy condition of part of this valley, the terrific heat in many places, and the presence of many wild animals, especially during Israel's history, no large city was ever built directly on the banks of the Jordan.

The natural life found in the Jordan Valley has been carefully studied, some of it proving to be unique. Of the thirty species of fish found in this river, sixteen are said to be found nowhere else; of the forty-five species of birds observed in this tortuous valley, twenty-three are peculiar to this area. About 162 species of plants and trees have been identified, of which 135 are African. They include the castor oil plant, the tamarisk, willows, poplars, and, near Jericho, the oleander. Two important rivers flow into the Jordan on the E side or TRANSJORDAN (no river emptying into the Jordan on the W or Cisjordan is referred to in the OT). The first, 4 mi. (6 km.) S of the Sea of Galilee, is the YARMUK, not mentioned in the Bible. The great modern Rutenberg electric power plant is located here. Then, about midway between the Sea of Galilee and the Dead Sea, is the JABBOK, famous as the place where JACOB wrestled with the angel (Gen. 32:22), later designated as a boundary (Num. 21:24; Josh. 12:2). At the confluence of this river with the Jordan was the site known as ADAM, where the waters of the great river were held back at the time of Israel's crossing (Josh. 3:16).

By far the most significant single event relating to the Jordan River in the entire history of Israel is the crossing on the part of the Israelites after the death of MOSES (Josh. 3), a crossing anticipated by him (Deut. 3:20, 25, 27). While the Jordan is usually thought of as a boundary, the tribe of MANASSEH occupied a huge territory on both sides of the river. Nevertheless, Israel was told that until this river was crossed and the territory on the western side possessed, they would not be occupying the land flowing with milk and honey (Num. 35:10; Deut. 3:20; 11:31; 31:13; Josh. 1:2). The Promised Land more generally refers to the territory on the W side of the Jordan than to all of the land occupied by Israel. The account of the crossing of the Jordan is given in detail in the third and fourth chapters of Joshua.

The Jordan is important in only one particular way in the NT. It was here that JOHN THE BAPTIST carried on his ministry (Matt. 3:6; Mk. 1:5; Jn. 1:28; 3:26), and thus in this river Jesus himself was baptized (Matt. 3:13; Mk. 1:9; Lk. 4:1). No other event occurs in the NT directly relating to the Jordan River. (References to the Lord's ministry on the other side of the Jordan—in Matt. 19:1 and Mk. 10:1—only imply that the Lord crossed the river.) In the statement relating to the closing days of Jesus' ministry, when escaping from those who wanted to make him king, he "went back across the Jordan to the place where John had been baptizing in the early days" (Jn. 10:40). When the early church began its great missionary work, apart from the interview of PHILIP with the ETHIOPIAN EUNUCH near GAZA, all the ministry of the apostles and early disciples, according to the NT, proceeded neither S into Egypt nor E toward Babylon, but N into Syria and Asia Minor, and then W to Greece, to Italy, and probably Spain. Little of historic importance has actually happened at the Jordan River since the baptism of Jesus. In fact, the Jordan Valley, from the Sea of Galilee to near Jericho, was practically unexplored until the nineteenth century.

The theme of the Jordan River is frequently found in the ritual of the church and in its hymnology and poetry. Comparing death for the Christian with the crossing of the Jordan by the Israelites cannot be regarded as a very accurate interpretation of Israel's history at this point. Israel did not enter into a time of peace when she crossed the Jordan but into a series of wars, many oppressions and defeats, followed by victories for a time, and ultimately ending in disaster and expulsion from the land.

Jorim. jor'im (Gk. Iōrim G2733). Son of Matthat, included in Luke's GENEALOGY OF JESUS CHRIST (Lk. 3:29).

Jorkeam. jor'kee-uhm (Heb. yorqo'ām H3767, derivation uncertain). KJV Jorkoam. Son of Raham, included in the genealogy of CALEB (1 Chr. 2:44). It is likely, however, that "Jorkeam" is a place name and that the text should be rendered, "Raham the founder of Jorkeam"; the town referred to may be the same as JOKDEAM (Josh. 15:56).

Joseph. joh'sif (Heb. yôšēp H3441, "may [God] add"; Gk. Iōsēph G2737). (1) Son of JACOB and RACHEL. Joseph was the eleventh of Jacob's twelve sons, but the firstborn of Rachel, who said when he was born, "May the LORD add to me another son," and therefore called his name Joseph (Gen. 30:24; the Heb. verb for "add" is yāsap H3578). Joseph's sons were MANASSEH and EPHRAIM, who became the ancestors of two important northern Israelite tribes. The account of Joseph's birth is told in Gen. 30:22-24, and the account of the rest of his life is found in chs. 37-50. He was born in PADDAN ARAM when his father was ninety years old; he was his father's favorite because he was Rachel's child and the son of his old age. The father's favoritism was shown in his getting for Joseph a special coat, which was probably a token of rank indicating that it was his intention to make Joseph the head of the tribe. This favoritism naturally aroused the envy of Joseph's older brothers. Their ill will was increased when he somewhat imprudently told them two dreams he had that were suggestive of his future greatness and their subservience to him.

When Joseph was seventeen years old, his father sent him to see how his brothers were doing at SHECHEM, where they were feeding their flocks; finding out that they had gone on to DOTHAN, Joseph followed them there. When they saw him coming, they planned to kill him, and thus make impossible the fulfillment of his dreams. REUBEN, however, persuaded them not to kill him but to throw him alive into a pit, intending to rescue him later and restore him to his father. When Reuben was absent for a short time, the brothers saw a caravan of ISHMAELITES making their way to EGYPT and decided that instead of allowing Joseph to die in the well, they would sell him to these merchants. They sold Joseph and then took his coat of many colors, smeared it with the blood of a goat they had killed, and took it to Jacob with the story that they had found the coat and assumed that their brother was dead, torn to pieces by some wild beast. The aged father, grief-stricken and disconsolate, mourned the loss of his son for many days.

In the meantime, Joseph was taken to Egypt by the Ishmaelites and sold in the slave market to an officer of PHARAOH, an Egyptian named POTIPHAR. The young slave proved himself to be so intelligent and trustworthy that his master soon entrusted to him all the affairs of his household, which prospered under Joseph's administration. But on the false accusations of Potiphar's wife, whose improper advances Joseph had rejected, he was cast into prison, where he remained for years. God was with him, however, and the providence that had previously saved his life now brought him to the favorable attention of the pharaoh. The prison keeper, finding he could put implicit confidence in Joseph, committed to his charge the other prisoners. Among these were two of the pharaoh's officers, his chief butler and chief baker, who had been imprisoned for offending the king. Joseph interpreted for them two dreams they had had; and three days later, on the king's birthday, as Joseph had foretold, the chief baker was hanged and the chief butler restored to his office (Gen. 40:5-23).

After two years, during which Joseph's circumstances remained unchanged—the chief butler had forgotten his promise to mention him to the king—Pharaoh had two dreams that no one could interpret. They had to do with fat and lean cows and full and withered heads of grain. The chief butler now remembered Joseph and told the king of Joseph's skill in interpreting dreams. Joseph was sent for, and he revealed the meaning of the dreams: seven years of plenty would be followed by seven years of famine. He then suggested that preparation be made for the years of famine by storing up the surplus produce during the seven years of plenty against the years of famine. Pharaoh immediately made Joseph head of the royal granaries and invested him with the authority necessary to carry out his proposals. As the head of the department of state, Joseph became one of the officials next in rank to the pharaoh (Gen. 41:39-44), and as a further mark of royal favor, he was given an Egyptian name and was married to the daughter of the priest of the great national temple of On. Joseph was now thirty years old. During the seven years of plenty he amassed corn in the granaries of every city, and his wife bore him two sons, Manasseh and Ephraim.

The famine that Joseph predicted affected not only the local area, and other countries came to Egypt to buy corn. Joseph's brothers came also. They did not recognize him, but he knew them; and when they prostrated themselves before him, he saw the fulfillment of the dreams that had aroused their intense jealousy years before. The climax of the episode is reached when Joseph, after testing their character in various ways, made himself known to them, told them that he bore no ill will for the wrong they had done him, and persuaded them and their father to settle in Egypt. The pharaohs reigning in Egypt during that era were probably members of the Hyksos dynasty and were Semites, like Joseph; and the present pharaoh consequently cordially welcomed Jacob and his family to Egypt.

This canal, known as the River of Joseph, is said to have been dug during the time of Joseph to provide irrigation to agricultural fields during the Egyptian drought he predicted. (View to the NW.)

In the years that followed, Joseph brought about a permanent change in the Egyptian system of land tenure because of the famine and the consequent poverty of the people, so that almost all the land became the property of the pharaoh, and the previous owners became his tenants. Jacob lived with Joseph in Egypt seventeen years. Before he died, he adopted Joseph's two sons, putting them on the same level as his own sons in the division of the inheritance. Joseph lived to the age of 110. Shortly before he died he expressed his confidence that God would some day bring the children of Israel back to Canaan, and solemnly directed that his bones be buried there. His wishes were carried out, and his bones were buried finally in Shechem, in the plot of ground bought there by Jacob (Josh. 24:32). Joseph presents a noble ideal of character, remarkable for his gentleness, faithfulness to duty, magnanimity, and forgiving spirit, so that he is often regarded as an OT type of CHRIST.

(2) Descendant of ISSACHAR and father of Igal; the latter was one of the twelve spies sent by MOSES to Canaan (Num. 13:7).

(3) One of the sons of ASAPH who assisted their father in the prophetic ministry of MUSIC; he was the head of the first company of temple musicians appointed by lot under DAVID (1 Chr. 25:2, 9).

(4) One of the descendants of Binnui who agreed to put away their foreign wives (Ezra 10:42).

(5) Head of the priestly family of Shecaniah (MT, Shebaniah) during the high priesthood of JOIAKIM (Neh. 12:14).

(6) Son of MATTATHIAS (leader of the Maccabean Revolt); he was appointed by his brother Judas MACCABEE to command a military division (2 Macc. 8:22; 10:19). The name "Joseph" here is probably a variant of "John" (1 Macc. 2:2), but some have argued that it refers to a different person, perhaps a half-brother of Judas.

(7-8) The name of two individuals included in Luke's GENEALOGY OF JESUS CHRIST: the son of Mattathias (not the leader of the Maccabean Revolt) and the son of Jonam (Lk. 3:25, 30).

(9) Son of Jacob and husband of MARY, MOTHER OF JESUS (Matt. 1:16; according to Lk. 3:23, he was the son [grandson?] of HELI; see GENEALOGY OF JESUS CHRIST). The Gospels of Matthew and Luke assert that Jesus was born to Mary at a time when she was betrothed to Joseph, before their marriage was consummated (Matt. 1:18; Lk. 1:27, 35). Joseph was a carpenter (Matt. 13:55) and was known as "a righteous man" (1:19). When he learned that Mary was bearing a child, he was understandably disturbed. After he was told by an angel that she was to become the mother of Israel's MESSIAH through the instrumentality of the Holy Spirit, he proceeded with his plans, which brought him and Mary to BETHLEHEM, where the child Jesus was born. The last reference to Joseph is in connection with the Passover journey when Jesus was twelve years old (Lk. 2:41-48). Later references mention Mary and the BROTHERS OF JESUS (Mk. 3:31; 6:3), but not Joseph. Jesus asked John to treat Mary as his own mother (Jn. 19:26-27), implying that she had need of someone to care for her. References to the brothers of Jesus imply that Mary and Joseph had other children after the VIRGIN BIRTH of Jesus. Some scholars have assumed that these "brothers" were sons of Joseph by a previous marriage, or cousins of Jesus. The natural meaning of the words, however, implies that Mary and Joseph came together subsequent to the birth of Jesus (Matt. 1:25), and that they had children who grew up with Jesus and were known in the community as his "brothers."

(10) Son of Mary and thus probably a half-brother of Jesus; listed with other brothers, James, Simon, and Judas (Matt. 13:55; instead of "Joseph," some MSS have "Joses" and others have "John"). A parallel list includes James, Joses, Judas, and Simon (Mk. 6:3 NRSV); here the NIV understands JOSES as an alternate form of Joseph. See BROTHERS OF THE LORD; JAMES #2.

(11) Son of a certain Mary, possibly the wife of CLOPAS (Matt. 27:56 NRSV; NIV reads "Joses," the reading found in a majority of MSS, though probably not original). This Joseph is no doubt to be identified with Joses, the brother of James the younger (Mk. 15:40). See JAMES #3.

(12) A rich man from the town of ARIMATHEA who became a disciple of Jesus. After the crucifixion, he asked PILATE for the body of Jesus; the request being granted, he wrapped the body "in a linen cloth, and placed it in his own new tomb that he had cut out of the rock" (Matt. 27:57-60). Both Mark and Luke add the information that Joseph was a member of the Council, a term that probably refers to the SANHEDRIN, and that he "was waiting for the kingdom of God” (Mk. 15:43-46; Lk. 23:50-53). Luke also states that Joseph was “a good and upright man, who had not consented to their decision and action.” John points out that Joseph was a secret disciple of Jesus “because he feared the Jews,” and that NICODEMUS helped him bury the body (Jn. 19:38-40).

(13) A disciple of Jesus who also bore the surnames BARSABBAS and JUSTUS; he was one of the two men nominated to succeed JUDAS ISCARIOT in the apostolic band (Acts 1:23).

(14) An early Christian leader better known as BARNABAS (Acts 4:36).

Josephus, Flavius. joh-see’fuhs, flay’vee-uhs. First-century Jewish writer; our main source of information for Jewish history during the inter-testamental and NT periods. Josephus was born in JERUSALEM, A.D. 37 or 38. His father Matthias was a priest, and his mother a descendant of the royal house of the Hasmoneans. When he grew up he joined the PHARISEES, a group that he likened to the STOICS among the Greeks. In the year 64, at age twenty-six, he went to ROME and secured the release of certain priests who were being held there on rather nebulous charges. Upon his return he found the people smarting under the high-handed administration of the procurator Florus and ready for revolt. From this he attempted to dissuade them, having seen at firsthand something of Roman power. Because of his attitude, he was sent to GALILEE to keep the peace there. Afraid that his pacification efforts would bring him under suspicion of favoring Rome, he finally pretended to concur with the views of the war party, going so far as to get them paid as mercenaries, but at the same time trying to persuade them to act on the defensive: not to attack the Romans, but let them make the first move. Thus he played a kind of double game, waiting to see the direction in which events would develop, accused by some of pro-Roman sentiment, by others of aiming at tyranny. At this juncture the Roman general VESPASIAN arrived on the scene (A.D. 67), and Josephus was captured. Later, Vespasian’s son TITUS used him as a mediator. After the capture of Jerusalem, Josephus went to Rome and was shown favor there. He died at about the beginning of the second century.

Three major works have come from the pen of Josephus. (a) The Jewish War, written between 75 and 79, in seven books. This account of the struggle between the Jews and Romans was written under Roman auspices, Titus having urged Josephus to undertake the work. The work is in the main a trustworthy account, for Josephus had firsthand materials: his own experience and the commentaries of Vespasian and Titus, the commanders involved in the struggle. (b) The Antiquities of the Jews, written in 93 or 94. This is a long work of twenty books, beginning with creation and extending to the outbreak of the war with the Romans. The first part of the work, to the end of the exile, follows closely the biblical narrative; the second part, dealing with the postexilic period, is compiled from miscellaneous sources. To the Antiquities is appended a biographical sketch (Life) written by Josephus as a defense against the accusations of a rival historian named Justus. (c) Against Apion, a defense of the Jewish religion.

Joses. joh'siz (Gk. Iōsēs G2736, hellenized form of Iōsēph G2737; see JOSEPH).

(1) Son of MARY, MOTHER OF JESUS, and thus apparently a half-brother of Jesus (Mk. 6:3 NRSV); the NIV, on the basis of the parallel passage (Matt. 13:55), renders the name as “Joseph” (a reading attested in some MSS). See JOSEPH #10.

(2) Brother of James the younger, whose mother Mary stood by the cross of Jesus and watched his burial (Matt. 27:56 [NRSV, “Joseph,” following the earliest MSS]; Mk. 15:40, 47). See JAMES 3.

(3) The original name of BARNABAS (Acts 4:36 KJV, following the TR; most modern versions read “Joseph”).

Joshah. joh'shuh (Heb. yôšâ H3459, derivation uncertain). A clan leader in the tribe of SIMEON (1 Chr. 4:34). He is listed among those whose families increased greatly during the days of King HEZEKIAH and who dispossessed the Hamites and Meunites near GEDOR (vv. 38-41).

Joshaphat. josh'uh-fat (Heb. yôšāpāṭ H3461, short form of JEHOSEPHAT, “Yahweh has judged”). (1) A Mithnite who was one of DAVID's mighty warriors (1 Chr. 11:43; this list adds sixteen names beyond the military elite known as the Thirty, listed in vv. 10-41 = 2 Sam. 23:8-39). The description “Mithnite” may point to his hometown, perhaps in TRANSJORDAN.

(2) One of the priests appointed to blow the trumpet when David transferred the ARK OF THE COVENANT to JERUSALEM (1 Chr. 15:24).

Joshaviah. josh'uh-vi'uh (Heb. yôšāwyâ H3460, possibly alternate form of JOSHIBIAH, “Yahweh makes [me] dwell”). Son of Elnaam; he and his brother Jeribai are included in the Chronicler's list of DAVID's mighty warriors (1 Chr. 11:46).

Joshbekashah. josh'bi-kay'shuh (Heb. yošbēqāšâ H3792, possibly “sitting in prayer [or in misfortune]”). Son of HEMAN, DAVID's seer (1 Chr. 25:4). He and his thirteen brothers were set apart “for the ministry of prophesying, accompanied by harps, lyres and cymbal” (v. 1). When lots were cast to determine the duties of the Levitical singers, he, along with his sons and relatives, received the seventeenth lot (v. 26).

Josheb-Basshebeth. joh´shib-buh-shee´bith (Heb. yōšēb baššebet H3783, “one sitting in the seat”). A Tahkemonite listed as chief of DAVID’s three main officers (2 Sam. 23:8). See JASHOBEAM.

Joshibiah. josh´uh-bi´uh (Heb. yôšibyâ H3458, “Yahweh makes [me] dwell”). KJV Josibiah. Son of Seraiah and father of Jehu; the latter is listed among the clan leaders in the tribe of SIMEON whose families increased greatly during the days of King HEZEKIAH and who dispossessed the Hamites and Meunites near GEDOR (1 Chr. 4:35; cf. vv. 38-41).

Joshua. josh´yoo-uh (Heb. yēhōšua ^c H3397, short form in postexilic writings yēšû ^a H3800 [see JESHUA], “Yahweh is salvation [or help]”; Gk. Iēsous G2652 [see JESUS]). (1) Son of Nun and commander of the Israelites during the conquest of CANAAN. Although his name appears first as Joshua (Exod. 17:9-14), one reads subsequently (Num. 13:16; cf. v. 8 and Deut. 32:44 MT) that MOSES changed his name from HOSHEA (KJV, “Oshea”), meaning “Save,” to Joshua (more accurately transliterated as Jehoshua), “Yahweh is salvation,” making the name theophorous. Two months after the EXODUS, he was appointed Moses’ commander and successfully repulsed an AMALEKITE attack (Exod. 17:9). Joshua attended Moses on SINAI (Exod. 24:13; 32:17) and guarded both his tent (33:11) and position (Num. 11:28). Later he represented the tribe of EPHRAIM in spying out Canaan. Joshua opposed the majority report, insisting that Israel, if faithful to God, could conquer Canaan. He almost suffered stoning for his trust in God (14:7-10). Because he “followed the LORD wholeheartedly” (32:12), however, he not only escaped destruction (14:38) but also received assurance, unique to himself and CALEB (13:30; 14:24), of entering the Promised Land (14:30; 26:65).

About forty years later, E of the JORDAN River, God designated Joshua as Moses’ successor (Num. 27:18). Moses charged him to be faithful (Num. 27:23; Deut. 31:23), committed the “song of admonition” and other writings to him (Exod. 17:14; Deut. 32:44), counseled him on procedures (Num. 32:28; 34:17), and encouraged both new leader and people (Deut. 3:21; 31:3, 7). God himself warned Joshua of coming APOSTASY (31:14) but promised that Joshua would be successful in the conquest of the Promised Land (1:38; 3:28; 31:23).

After Moses' death, Joshua, as the oldest man in Israel, must have been in his nineties (Caleb was eighty-five, Josh. 13:1; 14:7-11). Yet God assured him of victory, as he relied on the inspired Book of the Law (1:6-9). From this point onward, Joshua's history is that of Israel's occupation of Canaan. His personal actions, however, include making preparations (1:10-18), sending spies against JERICHO (2:1, 23-24), and then ordering Israel's advance across Jordan (3:1). His faith in crossing the Jordan inaugurated a life of undiminishing esteem, similar even to that of Moses (3:7; 4:14). West of Jordan, Joshua superintended Israel's rituals (5:2) and the construction of monuments for building the faith of children yet to come (4:4-7). The appearance of "the commander of the army of the LORD" (5:13-15) served as a dramatic sentence on Jericho but also as a visible confirmation of Joshua's divine call, similar to the appearance of the angel of the Lord to Moses at the BURNING BUSH (Exod. 3:2-6). Joshua then executed the God-directed siege (Josh. 6:2-6). He "devoted" (destroyed) Jericho (6:17), pronounced a curse on its rebuilding (6:26; 1 Ki. 16:34), and achieved widespread recognition (Josh. 6:27).

When the disobedience of ACHAN brought defeat at Ai, Joshua's prayer, his zeal for God's glory, and his enforcement of divine judgment (Josh. 7:6-9, 19, 25) compare favorably with his subsequent faithfulness to God's orders and exemplary execution of Ai's king (8:2, 29; cf. 10:24-27, 40-41). With central Palestine subdued, Joshua personally wrote Moses' law on stone at Mount EBAL and then proclaimed this law to the whole Israelite assembly (8:30-35). Though guilty of rashness with the GIBEONITES, he later condemned these pagans to bondage (9:15, 22-23, 26-27). The energy he displayed in forced marches and sudden attacks frustrated Canaanite counteroffensives in both S and N (10:9; 11:7). Basically it was the Lord who gave Israel her victories, especially evident in causing the sun to "stand still" during the battle at Beth Horon (10:12-14). In six years (14:10) Joshua took the whole land; "he left nothing undone of all that the LORD commanded Moses" (11:15, 23).

Yet Moses had anticipated a gradual occupation (Exod. 23:28-30). God had left in Canaan many nations, subdued but still powerful, to test his people (Josh. 13:2-6; Jdg. 2:21—3:4); so Joshua could not achieve Israel's final "rest" (Heb. 4:8). Thus, because of his advanced age, he divided Canaan among the tribes (Josh. 13:6-7; 14:1; 19:51). At GILGAL he confirmed Moses' Transjordanian settlement of the two and one-half tribes and assigned territory to JUDAH, including Caleb's portion at HEBRON (14:13; 15:13), and to EPHRAIM and MANASSEH (cf. 17:4), encouraging them to more effective conquest even while refusing to show them partiality (17:14-18). Later, at SHILOH, he exhorted the seven hesitant tribes, dispatched a commission on apportionment, and thus allotted the remaining lands (18:3, 8-10), including cities of refuge and Levitical assignments (20-21). He himself requested and built TIMNATH SERAH in Ephraim (19:49-51).

As death approached, Joshua first summoned Israel's leaders, urging them to faithfulness in conquest (Josh. 23), and then assembled the tribal heads to SHECHEM, charging them, "Choose for yourselves this day whom you will serve" (24:15). Having renewed their COVENANT with the Lord, he inserted it in the Book of the Law (24:25-26) and died at the age of 110 (24:29-30; Jdg. 2:8-9). Throughout his days, and even afterward, his influence caused Israel to maintain faithfulness to her Lord (Josh. 24:31; Jdg. 1:1; 2:7).

(2) The owner of a field in the town of BETH SHEMESH (1 Sam. 6:14, 18). When the PHILISTINES returned the ARK OF THE COVENANT to the Israelites, the two cows pulling the cart "went straight up toward Beth Shemesh" and stopped near a large rock in Joshua's field (v. 12).

(3) A city governor in the days of King JOSIAH (2 Ki. 23:8). As part of the religious reform during his reign, Josiah "desecrated the high places, from Geba to Beersheba, where the priests had burned incense. He broke down the shrines at the gates—at the Gate of Joshua, the city governor, which is to the left of the city gate." It is usually assumed that the city in question is JERUSALEM, but an alternate view sees here a reference to BEERSHEBA.

(4) Son of Jehozadak and high PRIEST at the time of the return from BABYLON and the rebuilding of the TEMPLE (Hag. 1:1 et al.). See JESHUA #1.

(5) Son of Eliezer, included in Luke's GENEALOGY OF JESUS CHRIST (Lk. 3:29; KJV, "Jose").

Joshua, Book of. Standing sixth in Scripture, this book describes how MOSES' successor, JOSHUA, after whom the book is named, conquered Canaan (Josh. 1:1; 24:31). But while Joshua is the first of "the historical books" in the English Bible, it introduces "the prophets" in the original Hebrew canon of Law, Prophets, and Writings (see CANONICITY). These prophetic books include the "former prophets"—Joshua, Judges, Samuel, and Kings—since biblical prophets, as God's spokesmen (Exod. 7:1-2), enforced their messages using the past as well as the future. Joshua exemplifies historical "prophetic" preaching, in respect of authorship as well as of content.

Overview of JOSHUA

Author: Unknown.

Historical setting: Covers the period from the commissioning of Joshua to his death (either c. 1400-1380 or c. 1250-1230 B.C., depending on the date of the EXODUS). Some believe that the book was written by an eyewitness (perhaps AARON's grandson PHINEHAS, Josh. 24:33) within a generation after the events it relates; others date its composition centuries later.

Purpose: To provide a historical-theological account of the conquest of CANAAN and the distribution of the land among the Israelite tribes; to show the fulfillment of God's promises and to encourage faithfulness to the COVENANT.

Contents: Preparing to conquer the land (Josh. 1-5); the fall of JERICHO and AI (chs. 6-8); victory in the southern and northern territories (chs. 9-12); allotment of the land (chs. 13-22); covenant renewal and death of Joshua (chs. 23-24).

Joshua's prophetic author is not named; but his statements about the death of Joshua and his colleagues (Josh. 24:29-31), plus his allusions to OTHNIEL, the migration of the Danites (15:17; 19:47), and the name HORMAH (12:14; 15:30; 19:4) indicate that the writer lived after the rise of Israel's judges, c. 1380 B.C. (Jdg. 1:12-13, 17). At the same time, his designation of JERUSALEM as JEBUSITE (Josh. 15:8, 63; 18:16, 28) and his writing before its choice as the site of God's TEMPLE (9:27), indicate that he wrote before the time of DAVID, c. 1000 (1 Chr. 11:4-6; 22:1). His references, moreover, to SIDON rather than to TYRE as PHOENICIA's leading city (Josh. 11:8; 13:4-6; 19:28) suggest a date prior to 1200. Indeed, the writer must have been an eyewitness of the events he describes. He speaks, for example, of the Lord's blocking Jordan "until we had crossed over" (5:1); he identifies Israel's previous generation by saying, "they would not see the land that he had solemnly promised their fathers to give us" (5:6); he says of the prostitute RAHAB, "she lives among the Israelites to this day" (6:25); and after outlining their boundaries he addresses the tribe of JUDAH directly, "This is [your] southern boundary" (15:4). Note also his detailed narratives (2:3-22; 7:16-26) and repeated use of preconquest place-names (15:9, 49, 54). Since the writer follows Moses' Deuteronomic style and seemingly had access to Joshua himself (cf. 5:13-15), a proposed author has been PHINEHAS, the son and successor of high priest ELEAZAR son of AARON (cf. Num. 25:7-13; 31:6-8; Josh. 22:13-20; Jdg. 20:28). In any case, someone of his standing may have composed the book of Joshua about 1375 B.C.

Most modern critics, however, attribute Joshua to four mutually contradictory source documents, brought together over a millennium after the time of Phinehas—sources such as have been alleged for the Mosaic writings (see PENTATEUCH), thus making Genesis-Joshua into a “Hexateuch.” In particular, the “E” and “D” records of conquest under Joshua are rejected in favor of the earlier “J” records, purportedly teaching a gradual occupation of Palestine by independent tribes (cf. Jdg. 1). But while Joshua does fulfill God’s former promises (Gen. 13:14-17; 15:13-20), Scripture knows nothing of a Hexateuch. The Pentateuchal books of Moses are unique (Josh. 1:7-8; 2 Chr. 34:14; cf. Christ’s own testimony, Lk. 24:44), while Joshua forms a sequel to the law (Josh. 24:26).

Excavation Area A of OT Jericho (looking N from the southern base of the tell). Defensive walls like these, built before the time of Joshua, may have continued to function until the time of his attack against this city.

The prophetic character of Joshua, moreover, affects the content in the book’s two divisions: conquest (Josh. 1-12) and settlement (chs. 13-24). The conquest embraces Israel’s entrance into Canaan: Joshua’s inauguration, the Jericho spies, crossing Jordan, and ceremonies (1:1—5:12); the conquest of the center—Jericho, Ai, and the assembly at Mount Ebal (5:13—8:35); of the south—Gibeon and the Jerusalem confederacy (chs. 9-10); and of the north—the Hazor confederacy, plus a summary (chs. 11-12). But since all of this took “a long time” (11:18; prob. 1406-1400 B.C., 14:10), the biblical content limits itself to representative instances of rewarded faithfulness. Joshua was commanded to be strong and no one would be able to stand against him (1:5-6; cf. 11:23). Israel’s settlement embraces Joshua’s territorial apportionments at Gilgal (chs. 13-17) and Shiloh (chs. 18-19), including CITIES OF REFUGE, LEVITICAL CITIES, and Transjordan (chs. 20-22). The account demonstrates how God “gave Israel all the land he had sworn to give their forefathers” (21:43). Joshua’s two farewell addresses follow, giving Israel that choice that every prophecy elicits: “We will serve the LORD our God and obey him” (24:24).

Joshua, Gate of. See JOSHUA #3.

Josiah. joh-si'uh (Heb. yō ʾšiyyāhû H3288, derivation uncertain, possibly “Yahweh heals”; Gk. Iōsias G2739). (1) Son of a certain Zephaniah; the prophet ZECHARIAH was told to go to Josiah's house and crown the high priest Joshua (JESHUA, Zech. 6:10).

(2) Son of AMON and king of JUDAH (2 Ki. 22-23; 2 Chr. 34-35). Josiah's reign on the Davidic throne for thirty-one years was the last surge of political independence and religious revival before the disintegration of the southern kingdom that ended with the destruction of JERUSALEM in 586 B.C. When palace officials murdered King Amon in 640 B.C. (2 Ki. 21:23), the eight-year-old Josiah was crowned king of Judah. While the boy-king grew to manhood, the imposing international influence of ASSYRIA declined rapidly. Insurrections and rebellions in the E and the death of ASHURBANIPAL (c. 633) provided an opportunity for a rising tide of nationalism in Judah. By 612 the coalition of MEDIA under Cyaxares and BABYLON under Nabopolassar converged on NINEVEH to destroy Assyria's famous capital. Within three years the Babylonians had routed the last of the great Assyrian army. These decades gave Josiah the political advantage not only to assert Judah's independence but also to extend its influence into the northern tribes—perhaps even kindling fond hopes of claiming the boundaries as established by DAVID and SOLOMON.

Looking SW across the Jezreel Valley toward Megiddo, near which King Josiah died in a battle with Pharaoh Neco (2 Chr. 35:20-23).

Josiah's religious leadership ranks him with JEHOSEPHAT and HEZEKIAH (Josiah's great-grandfather) as an outstanding righteous ruler. Gross IDOLATRY—BAAL altars, ASHERAH poles, star and planetary worship, child sacrifice to MOLECH in the Valley of Ben H^{INNOM}, astrology, occultism, altars for worshipping the host of heaven in the temple court, and the shedding of innocent blood—all these permeated the land of Judah during the reign of Josiah's grandfather M^{ANASSEH} (686-642 B.C.), whose personal penitence and reform (2 Chr. 33:13) in all likelihood did not penetrate the kingdom of Judah sufficiently to reconstruct the religious pattern. Whatever reform had been accomplished by Manasseh after his release from captivity was countered by a reversion to idolatry under Amon. Josiah gradually reacted to these godless influences that permeated his kingdom (ch. 34). In the eighth year of his reign (c. 632) he began to seek after God and four years later initiated reforms. Images, altars, and all manner of idolatrous practices were destroyed not only in Jerusalem and Judah but in the tribal territories of Manasseh, Ephraim, Simeon, and as far N as Naphtali. At the same time offerings and contributions were collected throughout the nation for the restoration of the T^{EMPLE} in Jerusalem, which had been neglected for a long period.

In the course of renovating the temple (622 B.C.) the Book of the Law was recovered. The reformation movement was now stimulated anew by the reading of this "Book of the Law...given through Moses" (2 Chr. 34:15). Not only had the reading and observance of the law been neglected in preceding decades, but it is possible that Manasseh even destroyed existing copies that were in circulation throughout the land of Judah. H^{ULDAH} the prophetess warned the people of impending judgment awaiting them for their neglect of the law (34:23-28). Stirred by these developments Josiah led his nation in the observance of the Passover in a manner unprecedented in Judah's history.

With the king himself leading the reformation movement, changes in personnel occurred. Priests serving by royal appointment of former kings and dedicated to idol worship were removed from office. Josiah, however, made temple revenues available for their support (2 Ki. 23:8-9). The religious climate established by Josiah must have provided favorable conditions for J^{EREMIAH} during the first eighteen years of his ministry (627-609 B.C.), even though no references are made to the association of these great leaders in the historical records (2 Ki. 22-23 and 2 Chr. 34-35).

In 609 B.C. Josiah's leadership was abruptly ended. In an effort to interfere with Pharaoh N^{ECO}'s plans to aid the Assyrians, Josiah was fatally wounded at M^{EGIDDO} (2 Chr. 35:20-24). National and religious hopes vanished with the funeral of this thirty-nine-year-old king so that all Judah had reason to join Jeremiah in lamenting for Josiah (35:25).

Josibiah. See J^{OSHIBIAH}.

Josiphiah. jos-i-fi'uh (Heb. yôsiyâ H3442, “may Yahweh add”). Descendant of BANI (so LXX; MT omits name) and father of Shelomith; the latter, head of a family of 160 men, is listed among those who returned to Palestine with EZRA (Ezra 8:10).

jot. jot. KJV transliteration of Greek iōta G2740 (Matt. 5:18; NIV, “smallest letter”). See DOT; IOTA; YOD.

Jotbah. jot'buḥ (Heb. yoḇbâ H3513, “pleasant”). Hometown of MESHULLEMETH, wife of King MANASSEH (2 Ki. 21:19). Jotbah is usually thought to be the same as modern Khirbet Jefat (Shifat), some 9 mi. (15 km.) NNW of NAZARETH, but this identification has not been confirmed by archaeological finds.

Jotbath. See JOTBATHAH.

Jotbathah. jot'buḥ-thuh (Heb. yoḇbātâ H3514, “pleasant”). A stopping place of the Israelites in their forty years of wilderness wanderings (Num. 33:33-34). They found it to be “a land with streams of water” (Deut. 10:7; KJV, “Jotbath”). Some scholars identify it with modern Ṭabeh, c. 6.5 mi. (10.5 km.) SW of ELATH.

Jotham. joh'thuhm (Heb. yôtām H3462, “Yahweh is perfect” or “may Yahweh complete”). (1) Youngest son of GIDEON (Jerub-Baal). Jotham escaped the massacre of his family by the citizens of SHECHEM, who had been incited by his half-brother ABIMELECH (Jdg. 9:5). Upon hearing that Abimelech had been proclaimed king, Jotham went up to the top of Mount GERIZIM and spoke his famous fable of the trees, depicting Abimelech as a worthless bramble incapable of offering the men of Shechem security or profit. He then predicted their mutual destruction and fled to BEER (vv. 6-21). Three years later (v. 22), when Abimelech besieged THEBEZ, the curse was fulfilled (vv. 50-57).

(2) Son of JAHDAI and, apparently, a descendant of JUDAH somehow related to CALEB (1 Chr. 2:47).

(3) Son of UZZIAH (Azariah) and king of the southern kingdom of JUDAH (2 Ki. 15:32-38; 2 Chr. 26:21—27:9). Uzziah had been for the most part a good and powerful king, but his successes turned his head and he intruded into the priest's office (2 Chr. 26:16). As a result, he was struck with leprosy, and Jotham acted as coregent (c. 750 B.C.). Jotham became sole ruler upon Uzziah's death (c. 740), apparently about the time ISAIAH began his great ministry (Isa. 6:1); he was probably influenced by that godly prophet. He had victory over the AMMONITES, who were forced to pay him heavy tribute; he was a great builder, fortifying several places in Judah and building the UPPER GATE of the TEMPLE.

joy. In the OT, joy is commonly a group expression, often associated with dancing (Ps. 96:11) or the blessings of prosperity (Isa. 60:15). God's PRAISE is shouted or sung even in more formal public WORSHIP (Ezra 3:10-11; Ps. 100:1-2). Linked with this concept also are musical instruments, clapping, leaping, or foot-stamping. Feasting or offering sacrifice (Deut. 12:12; Isa. 56:7), celebration of harvest or victory (1 Sam. 18:6; Joel 1:16), enjoying prosperity or personal triumph (Ps. 31:7; Isa. 61:3-4) are all occasions of joy.

In the NT, the word is often found in connection with SALVATION (1 Pet. 1:6), but also with eating, drinking, and feasting (Lk. 12:19; Acts 7:41). Most often found in the NT, however, are the meanings "to boast, take pride, or rejoice in." Thus, PAUL contrasts the human inclination to boast in oneself (Rom. 3:27) with his right to boast in Christ and his cross (Gal. 6:14; Phil. 3:3). The NT applies joy to suffering as well as to salvation. When reviled or persecuted or lied about, the Christian is to "rejoice and be glad," knowing that this is traditionally part of the believer's portion (Matt. 5:11-12). Joy comes from the HOLY SPIRIT (Gal. 5:22).

Jozabad. joh'zuh-bad (Heb. yôzābād H3416, short form of JEHOZABAD, "Yahweh has granted"). (1) Son of SHIMEATH; an official who, with JEHOZABAD son of SHOMER, murdered King Joash (JEHOASH) of Judah at BETH MILLO (2 Ki. 12:21; NRSV has JOZACAR, following many Heb. MSS). The parallel passage identifies him as "Zabad, son of Shimeath an Ammonite woman" (2 Chr. 24:26).

(2) A man from GEDERAH who joined DAVID at ZIKLAG (1 Chr. 12:4); he was among the ambidextrous warriors from the tribe of BENJAMIN who were kinsmen of SAUL (v. 2).

(3-4) Two warriors from the tribe of MANASSEH who joined David at Ziklag; they are described as "leaders of units of a thousand" (1 Chr. 12:20). Some believe that there was only one Manassite warrior named Jozabad and that the second name is a scribal mistake of dittography.

(5) A LEVITE included in the list of supervisors of the TEMPLE storerooms during the reign of HEZEKIAH (2 Chr. 31:13).

(6) A leader of the Levites in the reign of JOSIAH who gave liberally toward the sacrifices (2 Chr. 35:9).

(7) Son of Jeshua; he was a Levite who served in JERUSALEM at the time of EZRA's return (Ezra 8:33). This is probably the same man mentioned as agreeing to put away a foreign wife (10:23), as helping the people to understand the law (Neh. 8:7), and as one who had charge over the outside work of the house of God (11:16).

(8) One of the descendants of PASSHUR who agreed to put away their foreign wives (Ezra 10:22).

Jozacar. joh'zuh-kahr (Heb. yôzākār [not in NIV], "Yahweh has remembered"). KJV Jozachar. According to many Hebrew MSS, Jozacar was the son of Shimeath; he and JEHOZABAD son of Shomer murdered King Joash (JEHOASH) of Judah (2 Ki. 12:21 [cf. KJV, NRSV]; called "Zabad" in 2 Chr. 24:26). The NIV, following other Hebrew MSS (including Codex Leningradensis, the basis of BHS), has JOZABAD.

Jozachar. See JOZACHAR.

Jozadak. See JEHOZADAK.

Jubal. joo'buhl (Heb. yûbal H3415, meaning uncertain). Son of LAMECH and ADAH; described as "the father of all who play the harp and flute," apparently indicating that he invented musical instruments (Gen. 4:21).

The beginning of the Jubilee Year was marked by the sounding of the shofar.

Jubilee. KJV Jubile. According to Lev. 25, every fiftieth year in Israel was to be announced as a Jubilee Year. Three essential features characterized this year. First, liberty was proclaimed to all Israelites who were in bondage to any of their countrymen. The law provided that the price of slaves was to vary according to the proximity of the Jubilee Year. Second, there was to be a return of ancestral possessions to those who had been compelled to sell them because of poverty. This, of course, excluded the possibility of selling a piece of land permanently. This law applied to lands and houses outside of the walled cities and also to the houses owned by LEVITES, whether in walled cities or not. As in the case of the price of slaves, the law made provision that the price of real property was to vary according to the proximity of the Jubilee Year. The third feature was that it was to be a year of rest for the land. The land was to remain fallow, even though it had been so in the previous sabbatical year. The people were to live simply, on what the fields had produced in the sixth year and whatever grew spontaneously.

Jubilees, Book of. A pseudepigraphic work (see PSEUDEPIGRAPHA), claiming to be a revelation given to MOSES on Mount SINAI, and consisting of an interpretative expansion of the biblical narrative from Gen. 1 to Exod. 12. The book divides the history of the world into JUBILEE periods of forty-nine years each (cf. Lev. 25). The work presents a strict view of the LAW.

Judah. joo´duh (Heb. yēhûdâ H3373, “[God/Yahweh] be praised” [by popular etymology, but possibly actual derivation]; gentilic yēhûdî H3374 [see JEW]; Gk. Ioudas G2683). KJV NT Juda, Judas. (1) Fourth son of JACOB; his mother was LEAH (Gen. 29:35). Few details of his life are known. He saved JOSEPH’s life by persuading his brothers to sell him to the Midianites at DOTHAN (37:26-28). His disgraceful actions recorded in Gen. 38 left a stain on his memory. He gradually appears to have achieved leadership among his brothers (43:3; 46:28; 49:8-12). Through his son PEREZ, Judah became an ancestor of DAVID (Ruth 4:18-22) and of Jesus CHRIST (Matt. 1:3-16). The blessing of dying Jacob to Judah (Gen. 49:9-10) is usually understood as being a messianic prophecy: his descendants would be victorious over his enemies, and the scepter would not depart from the tribe of Judah until the coming of a promised one (for a discussion of this prophecy see SHILOH).

Indeed, Judah's progeny became a very important Hebrew tribe. In the wilderness the Judahites camped to the E of the TABERNACLE, next to the tribe of ISSACHAR (Num. 2:3-5). CALEB, a hero among the Hebrew spies and captors of Canaan, was a member of this tribe (13:6; 34:19). Judah was one of the tribes that stood on Mount GERIZIM to bless the people at the ceremony of COVENANT renewal at SHECHEM (Deut. 27:12). After JOSHUA's death, this tribe seems to have been first in occupying its allotted territory in the southern hill country of Canaan, even to occupying temporarily the city of JERUSALEM (Jdg. 1:1-20). The territory of the tribe of Judah extended from the extreme S point of the DEAD SEA westward to the MEDITERRANEAN. On the N, the boundary began at the northern end of the Dead Sea and continued westward in a crooked line, running S of JERICOH and Jerusalem (the Valley of HINNOM, which was the southern boundary of this city, was also the Judeans' northern boundary); it continued to the Mediterranean through BETH SHEMESH and TIMNAH. The Dead Sea was the eastern boundary (Josh. 15).

Judah possessed one of the largest tribal territories. From E to W it measured some 45 mi. (72 km.). The N-S dimension of the part fit for intensive habitation was about 50 mi. (80 km.); if the NEGEV area, suited only for scattered dwelling, was included, the length was about 100 mi. (160 km.). Judah's territory consisted of three N-S belts of land: (1) the Judean hill country (Josh. 15:48), the eastern slopes of which were the wilderness of Judah; (2) the lowlands of the SHEPHELAH (15:33), that is, the low, rolling land where the hill country meets the plain; and (3) the plain near the Mediterranean Sea. The southern part, near and south of BEERSHEBA, was called the Negev. Much of the tribe's land was hilly and rocky, but apart from the wilderness of Judah and the Negev, it was well suited for pasture and for the cultivation of grapes and olives (Gen. 49:11-12). In ancient times the hills were terraced.

During the period of the rule of the judges, Judah tended to be separated from the rest of the Hebrew tribes, which were to the N, by the pagan people who lived between them (GIBEONITES, Josh. 9; JEBUSITES, Jdg. 19:10-13), and also by rough and wild land, with deep E-W valleys. The Simeonites, who lived in S Judean cities, tended to become assimilated into Judah and thus to lose their tribal identity. OTHNIEL, the judge who delivered the people from the domination of Mesopotamia, was from Judah (Jdg. 3:8-11). The PHILISTINE threat must have been especially troublesome to this tribe, for the Philistine plain, as it came to be called, was actually Judah's coastal plain land. The account of RUTH and BOAZ, which centers in BETHLEHEM, occurred during the time of the judges and first brought the country town of Bethlehem into prominence in Hebrew history. SAUL, whose reign brought the period of the judges to an end, ruled from Judah; and it was the Judeans who first anointed their fellow tribesman, DAVID, king at HEBRON (2 Sam. 2:1-4). Jesus CHRIST, as Son of David, descended from Judah (Matt. 1:2-3; Lk. 3:33; Heb. 7:14). In the book of Revelation he is called "the Lion of the tribe of Judah, the Root of David" (Rev. 5:5). See also JUDAH, KINGDOM OF.

(2) Ancestor of a family of LEVITES who returned from the EXILE (Ezra 3:9 KJV; see HODAVIAH #3).

(3) One of the Levites who agreed to put away their foreign wives (Ezra 10:23).

(4) Son of Hassenuah; a postexilic leader who had charge "over the Second District" of Jerusalem (Neh. 11:9; according to NRSV, he was "second in charge" after Joel son of Zicri).

(5) A Levite who returned from the exile and served as worship leader (Neh. 12:8).

(6) A leader who took part in the procession at the dedication of the wall (Neh. 12:34).

(7) A priest who played a musical instrument at the dedication of the wall (Neh. 12:36).

(8) Son of a certain Joseph, included in Luke's GENEALOGY OF JESUS CHRIST (Lk. 3:30).

Judah, kingdom of. One of the two kingdoms of the Hebrews into which ISRAEL was divided after the death of SOLOMON.

The kingdom of Judah.

I. The united kingdom. SAUL, from the tribe of BENJAMIN, was Israel's first king (1 Sam. 8—2 Sam. 1). His reign was not a success, and when he died (about 1000 B.C.), a period of civil war broke out among the Hebrew tribes. Out of this chaos emerged DAVID (2 Sam. 1—1 Ki. 2), a member of the tribe of JUDAH, who founded the dynasty that ruled in JERUSALEM until the destruction of the capital city by the Babylonians (586 B.C.). David and his son Solomon (1 Ki. 2-11) succeeded in unifying the Hebrew tribes and imposing their rule on the whole nation. During their reigns the Hebrews achieved national greatness and their own empire. When Solomon died, all of this came to an end; the greater part of the nation seceded from the Judean rule to form the northern kingdom of Israel. The Davidic dynasty continued to rule at Jerusalem over a small remnant of the nation, the kingdom of Judah.

II. Background of the divided kingdom. It must not be thought that the mere ineptitude of Solomon's son REHOBOAM (1 Ki. 12) caused the split of the Hebrew kingdom. Ever since their settlement in Canaan after the EXODUS from Egypt, the Israelite tribes had manifested a fierce independence from each other and a great reluctance to give up tribal sovereignty to a national head. On several occasions during the period of the judges (Jdg. 8:1-3; 12:1-6; 20:1-48), strife and even open war broke out among the tribes. It appears that the troubled period between the death of Saul and David's move of the capital to Jerusalem (2 Sam. 2-4) produced a divided kingdom, with Judah (the southern center of power) adhering to David, and Israel (the JOSEPH tribes in central Palestine, and the northern tier of tribes) keeping aloof from David, seeking to establish Saul's son ISH-BOSHETH as their king. Evidently they felt that accepting David's claims meant giving up too much local autonomy to the central government.

After his capture of Jerusalem and the submission of all the tribes to him, David managed to keep the nation together by firm rule combined with a wise handling of explosive personalities. In the weakness of his old age, however, the centripetal forces again asserted themselves (2 Sam. 20). Solomon clamped on the nation a firm rule, assessing heavy taxes and forced labor. We infer that Judah was exempt from his most objectionable requirements, a condition hardly likely to please the ever-restless Israelite tribes. When Solomon died, there already existed an Israelite government in exile, headed by JEROBOAM son of Nebat (1 Ki. 11:26-40). He returned to Palestine to confront Solomon's son Rehoboam with an ultimatum—"Lighten the harsh labor and the heavy yoke... and we will serve you" (12:1-11). Rehoboam, stubborn and inept, tried to assert force instead of making concessions, and Jeroboam split the kingdom by organizing a secession government in Israel, which ultimately (under OMRI) was centered in the city of SAMARIA.

III. Resources and organization of the kingdom of Judah. Rehoboam continued to reign over a small southern region, mainly equal to the territory of Judah. Most of Benjamite territory appears to have gone with the northern rebels (1 Ki. 12:20), but Jerusalem, in the extreme S of Benjamin, remained as capital of Judah because of the presence of Rehoboam's army there. Thus the boundary between Judah and Israel must have run a few miles N of Jerusalem. All of S Palestine (much of it desert) was held by Rehoboam. Even so, his territory was not more than half the size of the northern kingdom; his arable land, less than one-fourth as much as Israel's. Judah claimed suzerainty over EDOM and asserted it when they were able. Judah's population (estimated at 300,000) was probably about half that of Israel's. The northern kingdom had the best farm land and was favored with more rainfall than the south.

In spite of her small size Judah enjoyed certain advantages over Israel. She had control of Jerusalem, with its ancient heritage of the TEMPLE and its divinely ordained worship, together with the Davidic dynasty and the buildings and traditions of the strong Solomonic empire. Her location in the southern hill country removed her somewhat from the ever-increasing tempo of struggle for control of the road to Egypt by the Assyrians, a struggle that ended eventually in Israel's destruction. She tended to be a city-state (no other Judean city could begin to compete with Jerusalem) with a homogeneous population and strong centralization of authority, thus avoiding the weakness of decentralization that characterized the northern kingdom. The continuing Davidic dynasty (Israel had nine dynasties during the reigns of nineteen kings) and a Levitic priesthood (attached to the Jerusalem temple) were sources of continuing strength.

IV. The history of the kingdom of Judah. It is difficult to isolate Judah's history. In the biblical sources (the books of Kings and Chronicles) the accounts of Israel and Judah are intertwined, with Israel predominating. One gets the impression that Israel's history was dynamic and in several respects attractive, while Judah's existence (except for certain great periods) was conservative—essentially a “holding operation.” Judah's history from the death of Solomon to the fall of Jerusalem to the Babylonians may be divided into three periods:

A. Judah from the death of Solomon to the mid-eighth century, 922-742 B.C. During this period of nearly two centuries Judah and Israel lived side by side. For the first two generations the successive Judean kings fought against Israel, seeking to compel her to reunite with the south. Beginning with JEHOASHAPHAT, however, they saw the impossibility of success in this attempt, for Israel was, if anything, more powerful than Judah. Jehoshaphat began a tradition of friendly cooperation with Israel, which, with few exceptions, characterized the Judean kings until the fall of Samaria left the southern kingdom to carry on alone.

With the split of the kingdom, the Hebrew empire raised by David and Solomon collapsed. Judah was now a second-rate power—a city-state in the hills. As if to prove its degradation, SHISHAK, a soldier turned king of EGYPT, invaded Palestine, seeking to revive the Egyptian empire. According to the Bible he badly looted Jerusalem (1 Ki. 14:25-26); Shishak's own historical inscriptions at Karnak indicate that he sacked most of Palestine. Rehoboam's pathetic copper shields, a cheap imitation of the looted gold ones (14:27-28), symbolize the condition of post-Solomonic Judah—the grandeur had departed.

Rehoboam and his son ABIJAH seem to have carried on Solomon's syncretistic tendencies; pagan rites flourished. ASA and JEHOSHAPHAT instituted reforms aimed at purifying the worship of the Lord from pagan influence. Jehoshaphat is known for the marriage of his son JEHORAM to ATHALIAH, daughter of AHAB and JEZEBEL of Israel, thus sealing his new policy of friendliness toward the northern kingdom. This policy seems to have brought great prosperity to Judah, but also the threat that the BAAL worship sponsored by Ahab in Israel might spread to the south. Jehoram's son, Ahaziah, ruled for only one year. After his death he was briefly succeeded by Athaliah, the queen mother. She sought to stamp out all the Judean royal house and to make Baalism the worship of Judah. A palace-temple coup resulted in her death (837 B.C.), the restoration of the Davidic line in the person of Joash (JEHOASH), the boy king, and the revival of the worship of Yahweh sponsored by JEHOIADA the high priest.

The next two kings, AMAZIAH and UZZIAH, reigned during a great burst of political and economic prosperity, just before the coming of the Assyrian invasions and Israel's captivity. Judah and Israel briefly occupied much of the land they had under Solomon's reign. Increased trade brought home great wealth. Luxury (especially in Israel) was unprecedented. It was to the spiritually careless people of this time, at ease in Zion, that the great eighth-century prophets—Amos, Hosea, Jonah, Isaiah, and Micah—came.

B. Judah during the period of the Assyrian ascendancy, 742-687 B.C. In the third quarter of the eighth century an event occurred that was to influence all of succeeding history. ASSYRIA, with its capital at NINEVEH, moved westward in its effort to capture the civilized world. Ultimately Israel, located as she was on the road to Egypt, was destroyed by the Assyrians (722), and Judah was severely damaged.

King AHAZ first brought Judah into the Assyrian orbit when he called on the new empire to relieve him from the attack of the coalition formed by Israel and the ARAMEANS (SYRIA, 2 Ki. 16:7). Judah was saved, DAMASCUS destroyed, and part of Israel overrun by the Assyrians (733-732 B.C.), but at a serious cost. There naturally followed spiritual subordination of Assyria, and Ahaz introduced its pagan religious practices into Jerusalem. This problem of imported paganism was to plague Judah until its fall. Late in Ahaz's reign the city of Samaria was destroyed and Israel's national existence brought to an end. King HEZEKIAH, the pious son of Ahaz, sensing a weakening of Assyrian power, sought to throw off both the political and religious yoke of Assyria. Under him, Judah managed to survive the attacks of SENNACHERIB, although at fearful cost. Hezekiah reformed the national religion, purifying it of paganism. His treaty with the rising power of BABYLON, a threat to Assyrian domination of Mesopotamia, although condemned by ISAIAH, was another facet of his struggle to keep Judah free. The prophets Isaiah and MICAH continued their ministry into this period. Certainly much of Hezekiah's success in religious reform was due to Isaiah's support.

C. The last century of the kingdom of Judah, 687-587 B.C.

During Judah's last century of national existence Palestine was the scene of intermittent warfare; empires clashed, fell, and rose around her until finally Judah fell. MANASSEH, son of Hezekiah, through a long reign chose to submit again to Assyrian political and religious control. His grandson, JOSIAH, was the last good Hebrew king, and the last one whose reign saw anything like normal times in the Judean kingdom. Josiah's famous revival (621 B.C.), the most thoroughgoing in Judah's history, was aided by the rediscovery of the Book of the Law (probably DEUTERONOMY) in the temple (2 Ki. 22). Josiah made a great effort to rid Judah of all paganism and to centralize all the worship of the Lord at the Jerusalem temple. This meant rebellion against Assyria, which Josiah was able to carry out; in fact, it was during his reign that the Assyrian empire disintegrated. Josiah tragically lost his life trying to oppose the forces of Pharaoh NECO, who were crossing Palestine on their way to Syria to fight in the battles that marked the death throes of Assyria, with NINEVEH falling in the year 612. During Josiah's reign the young JEREMIAH began his prophetic career, which extended into the period of the captivity. A sad man with a depressing message, Jeremiah predicted the fall of the nation because of her sins. Evidently Josiah's revival had done little to stop the downward trend.

Egypt still tried to play a part in the political struggle, and her nearness to Palestine made her also a power to be reckoned with in Judah. Placed between great world powers, relying alternately on each but seldom (according to the prophets) on her God, Judah played a fateful, increasingly unsteady role. Unsettled, fearful times followed Josiah's death. King JEHOIAKIM, a puppet of Egypt, was unworthy to follow his father Josiah. Jeremiah steadily opposed his easy trust that the temple would bring security. The Babylonians raided Jerusalem during his reign (605 B.C.). Finally the proud, wicked king was killed in a coup, and his son JEHOIACHIN replaced him. After three months the Babylonians under NEBUCHADNEZZAR captured Jerusalem (597) and took captive to BABYLON many important persons, including the king. This was the beginning of the end. Babylon, having replaced Nineveh as the center of world power, would dominate Judah until she destroyed her.

ZEDEKIAH, another son of Josiah, was made regent in the place of captive Jehoiachin. He rebelled against Babylon, made a league with Egypt, and so incurred the wrath of the Babylonians that they decided to destroy Jerusalem. After a bitter siege of a year and a half the city fell to Nebuchadnezzar and was destroyed, Zedekiah was blinded and carried to Babylon, and the great bulk of the population taken there with him (586 B.C.). Archaeologists have found that the cities of Judah were completely destroyed at this time. Thus ended the glorious kingdom of David and Solomon. Observers would have said that the Hebrew nation was annihilated, and indeed, the other nations conquered by the Assyrians and Babylonians did cease to exist. But the prophets proclaimed a better hope for the chosen people. “A remnant will return” Isaiah had said (Isa. 10:21), and in time this purged remnant returned and became the basis on which a new Israel would be built.

Judaism. The Greek word Ioudaismos G2682 occurs in only one biblical passage (Gal. 1:13-14; KJV, “the Jews’ religion”; cf. also 2:14). Although the term Judaism can be used broadly of the Hebrew culture as a whole, it often refers to the religion of the Jews subsequent to the OT period. As such, Judaism is typically contrasted to the OT, but one cannot forget that the postbiblical developments were firmly rooted in the religious attitudes and practices of the Hebrew Scriptures. Judaizer. The Greek verb ioudaizō G2678, used only once in the NT (Gal. 2:14, but found already in the LXX of Esth. 8:17), has an intransitive meaning, “live as a Jew, become a Jew, adopt the traditions of Judaism.” PAUL, however, uses it in combination with the verb “to compel,” and that has led to the modern use of Judaize in the transitive sense “to force/coerce Gentiles to become Jews.” In biblical scholarship, therefore, the noun Judaizers is most frequently applied to early Christian Jews who opposed Paul’s message of freedom from the _{LAW} and insisted that _{GENTILE} Christians should become circumcised and follow the Mosaic regulations (cf. Acts 15:1-2; Gal. 2:3-5). See GALATIANS, LETTER TO THE.

Judas. joo´duhs (Gk. Ioudas G2683, from Heb. yēhûdâ H3373, “praise”). Greek form of Hebrew JUDAH, which originally was the name of one of the sons of JACOB. After the EXILE, it became one of the names most frequently used by the Jews, and it is not surprising that in the APOCRYPHA and NT it designates a considerable number of different men.

(1) Son of MATTATHIAS and leader of the Maccabean Revolt (1 Macc. 2:4 et al.; other men by the same name are mentioned in 11:17 and 16:2 et al.). See MACCABEE.

(2) Judas the Galilean, described by GAMALIEL as a man who “appeared in the days of the census and led a band of people in revolt. He too was killed, and all his followers were scattered” (Acts 5:37). The enrollment or assessment for tax purposes here in view was that under QUIRINIUS during his governorship of SYRIA in A.D. 6-7. JOSEPHUS too in a number of places (e.g., Ant. 18.1.6) calls this Judas a Galilean, but elsewhere, evidently referring to his place of birth, calls him a Gaulanite from the city of Gamala (18.1.1). Josephus regards Judas of Galilee as a founder of a fourth sect or school of philosophy among the Jews (18.1.6; War 2.8.1). Those in this party agreed with the position of the PHARISEES in all matters, he reports, except that they acknowledged God alone to be their governor and lord and were passionately devoted to liberty. With the support of a Pharisee named Saddok, Judas vigorously opposed the enrollment under Quirinius and engendered strife, violence, and bloodshed (Ant. 18.1.1). From Judas’s incendiary activity and teaching, the ZEALOTS and the Sicarii would seem to have sprung.

(3) Judas son of MARY, MOTHER OF JESUS, and thus probably a half-brother of the Lord; he is listed with other brothers, James, Joseph (Joses), and Simon (Matt. 13:55; Mk. 6:3). He is to be distinguished from the apostle Judas, one of the Twelve (see below, #4), because the BROTHERS OF THE LORD did not believe in him during his ministry (Jn. 7:5). The author of the epistle of Jude was in all probability this Judas (see JUDE, LETTER OF). He does not designate himself as one of the apostles, and seems to distinguish himself from them (Jude 17-18 and cf. v. 3). He identifies himself as “Jude [Gk. Judas], a servant of Jesus Christ and a brother of James” (v. 1), no doubt meaning James the Lord’s brother (see JAMES #2).

(4) Judas son of James, included among the twelve apostles (Lk. 6:16; Acts 1:13). The KJV interprets the ambiguous Greek to mean “Judas the brother of James,” but it appears that when Luke means “brother” rather than “son,” he makes the designation explicit (Lk. 3:1; 6:14; Acts 12:2). In the other lists of the Twelve, THADDAEUS occurs instead of Judas of James (Matt. 10:3; Mk. 3:18); the same apostle may well have been called by both these names, but not all scholars adopt this solution. In Jn. 14:22 he is sharply distinguished from Judas Iscariot and is reported to have asked a question of Jesus: “Then Judas (not Judas Iscariot) said, ‘But, Lord, why do you intend to show yourself to us and not to the world?’” In the Syriac tradition, this Judas is identified with THOMAS.

(5) JUDAS ISCARIOT (see separate article).

(6) Judas of Damascus. After the Lord had appeared to Saul (PAUL) on the road to DAMASCUS, Saul was led into the city and stayed in the house of a man named Judas, presumably a believer himself (Acts 9:11). The Lord directed ANANIAS to go to the street called STRAIGHT and inquire for Saul in Judas’s house.

(7) Judas surnamed BARSABBAS. At the Council of Jerusalem, the apostles and the elders selected out of their company Judas Barsabbas and SILAS, “two men who were leaders among the brothers,” to go to ANTIOCH of Syria with Paul and BAR-NABAS (Acts 15:22) to confirm by word of mouth the contents of the letter containing the decree of the council (15:27). The epistle from the council was delivered to the church in Antioch, and Judas and Silas, “who themselves were prophets, said much to encourage and strengthen the brothers” (15:32). Possibly this Judas was a brother of the Joseph called Barsabbas, surnamed JUSTUS, who was chosen with MATTHIAS as a candidate for the place from which Judas Iscariot fell away (1:25).

Judas Iscariot. joo’duhs is-kair’ee-uht (Gk. Ioudas Iskariōtēs G2683 + G2697). One of the Twelve, known primarily as the disciple who betrayed Jesus to the authorities. He and his father Simon were both surnamed “Iscariot” (Jn. 6:71), a word of uncertain meaning but thought to be a hellenized form of Hebrew יִשְׁ קֶרְיָיֹת, “man of KERIOTH,” thus serving to indicate his origin. Nothing is known of his early life. He may have joined the disciples of Jesus from pure motives and probably showed evidence of business acumen and so was appointed treasurer for the disciples (Jn. 12:6; 13:29), but perhaps after his hopes for a high place in an earthly kingdom of Jesus were dashed (cf. 6:66), he became a thief. His indignation when Jesus was anointed at BETHANY was hypocritical. His pretended zeal for the poor was really covetousness, and is so interpreted by John (12:6), though the disciples of Jesus apparently trusted him to the end (13:21-30). Jesus, however, was not deceived (cf. 6:64) but knew from the beginning who would betray him. It was only at the Last Supper that Jesus revealed that one of them “was later to betray him” (6:71). Then SATAN entered into Judas, and when Jesus dismissed him, he went out to do the dastardly deed that he had already planned (Mk. 14:10). He sold the Lord for thirty pieces of silver, betrayed him with a kiss, then in remorse threw down the money before the chief priests and elders (Matt. 27:3-10) and went out and committed suicide. Matthew says he hanged himself (Matt. 27:5), and Luke adds that “he fell headlong, his body burst open” (Acts 1:18). He is always mentioned last among the apostles.

Jude. See JUDAS #2; JUDE, LETTER OF.

Jude, Letter of. The last among the CATHOLIC EPISTLES. It was regarded by Origen (d. c. A.D. 253) as “of but few verses yet full of mighty words of heavenly wisdom.” The opening verse describes the author as “Jude, a servant of Jesus Christ and a brother of James.” This is probably the same person as JUDAS, brother of James and Jesus (Matt. 13:55; Mk. 6:3; see BROTHERS OF THE LORD). Nothing more is known about him or about his place of writing, nor is precise dating of the letter possible. The strong resemblance between this letter and 2 Pet. 2 has been used by some for dating purposes, but others think that this feature merely reflects dependence on a common tradition. We do know that the problems it discusses were common during the last quarter of the first century, when heresy was increasing. Concerning the purpose of the letter there is no doubt: the writer is directing to his readers an urgent appeal “to contend for the faith that was once for all entrusted to the saints” (Jude 3). The very basis of Christianity was in jeopardy.

Jude goes on to deal with the new heresy threatening the churches from within. What it was, and who its supporters were, is not clear; but we are told something about their appalling lifestyle and its baneful influence on the church. Jude reminds Christians of the inevitability of opposition, of the need for compassion toward sinners, and of the ineffable attributes of God. As he denounces those who would undermine the true faith, his voice seems to rise in righteous anger: this was a time for holy intolerance. There is no place in the church for those who divide the people of God (Jude 4-16). The Christian ranks had been infiltrated by “certain men” who held that those who became Christians were no longer under law and could behave as they wished (cf. Rom. 6:1-2; 1 Jn. 3:6). Gnostic heretics held that morals and religion were different things, but this teaching misunderstood the true nature of Christian liberty and degraded it to the level of pagan license (2 Pet. 2:2). Using the most striking images (rainless clouds, blighted trees, wandering stars), Jude warns against those who pretend to piety but are rotten at heart and leave the trace of the mire behind them. Jude reminds his readers of God’s punishment in the OT (Gen. 6:1-4; 19:24; Num. 14:29, 37) against people, angels, and cities that should have known better, and he leaves them in no doubt that God still punishes sin.

Overview of JUDE

Author: Jude, brother of James (prob. referring to the half-brother of Jesus).

Historical setting: The date, place of writing, and destination are unknown, but the addressees (possibly Jewish Christians of the DISPERSION) were being challenged by heretical and immoral people. Some scholars speculate that the letter was written in the early 60s; others prefer a date near the end of the century.

Purpose: To urge the readers “to contend for the faith” (Jude 1), opposing false doctrine and immorality.

Contents: After the introduction (Jude 1-4), the bulk of this brief letter consists of a denunciation of the false teachers (vv. 5-19), followed by positive exhortations and a doxology (vv. 20-25).

Jude 17-25 exhorts to continued perseverance. There is a reminder that the apostles had foretold the coming of the “scoffers” (cf. 2 Pet. 3:3) who love worldly things and sow dissension among believers. Watchful, prayerful, expectant Christians had, however, nothing to fear from such renegades. Jude obviously knew too well the tensions and temptations, the awfulness of sin. He knew that some cases called for stern rebuke, others needed compassion and a right concern. The letter ends with a firm ascription of glory to the One to whom alone it belongs and who will bring his whole family at last, cleansed and complete, into his own presence forever.

Judea. joo-dee’uh (Gk. Ioudaia G2677, from Heb. yēhûdâ H3373, “Judah”). Also Judaea. Name used for the southern part of PALESTINE, especially after the end of the kingdom of Judah (see JUDAH, KINGDOM OF; occasionally, however, the gentilic JUDEAN is used in the sense of “Judahite,” that is, a member of the tribe of JUDAH even during the earlier periods). The corresponding Greek term occurs often (but not as often as the form Iouda) in the SEPTUAGINT with reference to Judah. Since most of the exiles who returned from the Babylonian exile belonged to the tribe of Judah and settled in the environs of JERUSALEM, they came to be called Judeans or JEWS, and their land Judea.

Judea.

Under the Persian empire, Judea was a district administered by a governor who was usually a Jew (Hag. 1:14; 2:2). Under Rome, with the banishment of HEROD's son Archelaus, the province of Judea became annexed to the Roman province of SYRIA; but its governors were appointed by the Roman emperor. Their immediate superior was the proconsul of Syria, who ruled from ANTIOCH (Lk. 3:1). The official residence of the governors of Judea was CAESAREA. Geographically, Judea was about 55 mi. (90 km.) N to S and the same distance E to W, extending from the MEDITERRANEAN to the DEAD SEA, with its northern boundary just N of JOPPA and its southern boundary a few miles S of GAZA and the southern portion of the Dead Sea. Its exact boundary was, however, never fixed.

Judges, Book of. The seventh book of the OT. In the Hebrew Bible, Judges is included among the Former Prophets. The book takes its name from the title of those who ruled Israel during the period from JOSHUA to SAMUEL. Although “judge” is a literal translation of Hebrew šōpēṭ (ptc. of the verb šāpaṭ H9149, “to decide, pass judgment, be in authority”), the term in this context really means “leader” or “ruler.” The principal function of the Hebrew “judges” during this period was that of military deliverers.

Overview of JUDGES

Author: Unknown.

Historical setting: Covers the period from the death of JOSHUA (c. 1380 or 1230 B.C., depending on the date of the EXODUS) to the generation that preceded the monarchy (c. 1050 B.C.). The book itself may have been composed soon after the end of that period (a Jewish tradition attributed it to SAMUEL), but many scholars date it several centuries later.

Purpose: To provide a historical-theological account of the chaotic times following the Israelite occupation of CANAAN, and thus to show the nation's need for the centralized rule of a king.

Contents: After a prologue (Jdg. 1:1—2:5) and a summary of the cycles of sin and deliverance (2:5—3:6), the book describes the work of twelve “judges” or leaders, with emphasis on DEBORAH, GIDEON, JEPHTHAH, and SAMSON (3:7—16:31), followed by an account of two shocking stories of religious and moral degeneration (chs. 17-21).

The book makes no clear claim to authorship or date of composition. Much of it appears to be very old. The JEBUSITES are referred to as still dwelling in JERUSALEM (Jdg. 1:21). DAVID's capture of Jerusalem about 1000 B.C. (2 Sam. 5:6-10) brought this situation to an end. The Canaanites still lived in GEZER (Jdg. 1:29), a city that first came under Hebrew control at the time of SOLOMON (1 Ki. 9:16). On the other hand, there are also references that cannot be understood except as written at a time well after that of the judges. The thematic statement, “In those days Israel had no king; everyone did as he saw fit” (Jdg. 17:6; 18:1; 19:1; 21:25), could not have been written before the reign of SAUL; indeed, it would be unlikely until a time well after the institution of the monarchy, when the earlier chaotic days tended to be forgotten. The reference to the worship at DAN “until the time of the captivity of the land” (18:30) seems to be a reference to the conquest of GALILEE by TIGLATH-PILESER III in 733 B.C. It would seem, then, that the book contains very old material, which may well have been edited at a later date. It may be noted that recent critical scholarship, while holding to a later date for the final editing of the book, acknowledges the general historicity of the narrative and uses it as the major source for our understanding of the period of the judges.

It is difficult to date with precision the historical period covered by the book of Judges. It appears to have ended about a generation before Saul became king; thus we may place the end of the book at about 1020 B.C. The year of the death of Joshua, with which the book opens, depends on the date of the EXODUS from Egypt, about which there is much dispute. Accordingly, some scholars date the beginning of the period of the judges at c. 1380-60; others, at c. 1230-10; still others, later. At first sight it may seem that the book itself gives the answer, for it states the duration of the judgeships of the various judges. A close examination of the text, however, reveals that most of the judges were local, not national in their influence, and it appears likely that their periods overlapped. Further, the frequency of the number forty for the length of their office (Jdg. 3:11; 5:31; 8:28; 13:1; 1 Sam. 4:18) suggests that this figure is a round number for a generation and not to be taken exactly.

The purposes of the book of Judges are (1) to bridge in some manner the historical gap between the death of Joshua and the inauguration of the monarchy; (2) to show the moral and political degradation of a people who neglected their religious heritage and compromised their faith with the surrounding paganism; (3) to show the need of the people for the unity and leadership by a strong central government in the person of a king. The contents may be discussed under three headings, as follows.

I. Introduction (Jdg. 1:1—2:10). This section gives a description of the state of the conquest of Canaan when Joshua died. It is a record of incomplete success. The less desirable hill country had been taken, but the fertile plains and the cities were still largely in Canaanite hands. This description does not contradict the record of the conquest (found in the book of Joshua), which only claims that the Hebrew armies had “blitzkrieged” the whole land, while plainly stating that not all had been possessed (Josh. 13:1-6). It was one thing for the Hebrew armies to sweep through the land; it was quite another for the individuals and tribes of the Hebrews to dispossess the Canaanites from the land and settle there. They failed to dispossess them, and this failure meant that the Hebrews lived as neighbors with pagan Canaanites; thus, the way was prepared for the syncretism (combining worship of the Lord with worship of idols) that so characterized the Hebrews during this period. This culture and religion were often largely Canaanite and pagan. This is the reason for the moral and spiritual degradation of the Hebrew people during the period of the judges.

II. Main body of the book (Jdg. 2:11—16:31). Here occur the accounts of the judges, the cycles of failure, oppression, and relief by a judge. The cycle is set forth in the abstract in 2:11—3:6, and the accounts of the judges follow. As already noted, these “judges” were not principally civil magistrates. Rather, they were military deliverers, who led the people of Israel to freedom against their enemies. Their names are as follows:

1. OTHNIEL (3:7-11).
2. EHUD (3:12-30): Central Palestine and Transjordan.
3. SHAMGAR (3:31): Philistine plain.

4. DEBORAH and BARAK (chs. 4-5): Central Palestine and Galilee.
5. GIDEON (chs. 6-8): Central Palestine and Transjordan.
6. ABIMELECH (ch. 9): Central Palestine. Abimelech is considered by many as merely an outlaw and not a judge.
7. TOLA (10:1-2): Central Palestine.
8. JAIR (10:3-5): Transjordan.
9. JEPHTHAH (10:6—12:7): Transjordan.
10. IBZAN (12:8-10): Southern Palestine.
11. ELON (12:11-12): Northern Palestine.
12. ABDON (12:13-15): Central Palestine.
13. SAMSON (chs. 13-16): Philistine plain.

For detailed discussion of these leaders, see separate articles on each of them as well as the article JUDGES, THE.

III. Appendix (Jdg. 17-21). The events recorded here seem to have occurred, not after the judges mentioned in the main part of the book, but during their judgeships. They are relegated to the appendix probably because they are narratives in their own right and if inserted in the main body would have marred the symmetry of the judge cycles there. These narratives describe life during this turbulent near-pagan period and give a frank and unvarnished description of the brutality and paganism that Israel was contaminated with because of her close association with her pagan Canaanite neighbors.

The LEVITE or Jdg. 17-18 was a priest who could follow his religious practice anywhere. He was hired as a family chaplain and soothsayer, and his presence was certain to bring “good luck” (17:13). He evidently functioned with idols (18:20) and was quite willing to change situations if the change involved a better salary (18:19-20). All of this is in direct contrast to the divine command concerning the priesthood in the Mosaic law.

The migration of the Danites (Jdg. 18) was necessitated by their failure to capture the territory assigned to them (Josh. 19:40-48; Jdg. 1:34-36). They then traveled to a northern valley, remote and defenseless, captured it, and settled there. Thus originated the northern DAN, known in the expression, “from Dan to Beersheba” (e.g., 1 Sam. 3:20; 2 Sam. 3:10; 1 Ki. 4:25).

The narrative of the Levite’s concubine (Jdg. 19) casts a livid light on the brutality of the times and introduces the war of the tribes against the Benjamites (chs. 20-21). This is not the only intertribal war of the period (8:1-3; 12:1-6). In fact, it is clear that the loyalty of the Hebrews at this time was a merely tribal one, as is the case with the bedouin until today. There was no real Hebrew nation; Israel was at best a very loose confederation of tribes around a central sanctuary, the TABERNACLE at SHILOH (18:31).

The cruelty and paganism of the narratives of Judges are often a stumbling block to readers. It should not be imagined that the writer is approving of everything he records. Rather, the book should be viewed as a history of the tragic judgment of God on a people who failed to keep their heritage of true religious faith by assimilating far too much of their surrounding culture. The history of the judges has been called “the struggle between faith and culture.” In this struggle, faith lost. And, of course, culture suffered also.

All this should not close our eyes to the beauty of the book of Judges as literature. Many of the narratives would rank high in any collection of the short stories of the world. Even in the most brutal passages there is an austere dignity. Sin is never reveled in; it is always held up to the gaze of horror. In the pungent discourse by JOTHAM (Jdg. 9:7-15), Judges has preserved almost the only fable in ancient Hebrew literature. The song of Deborah, much studied by recent scholars, has a sonorous quality and vivid narrative power. The narratives of the book are amazingly brief. The Hebrew literary artist was at his best when he used only a few sentences to describe action- and emotion-packed events.

judges, the. Two distinct functions need to be discussed under this heading.

I. The civil magistrate. In patriarchal times Hebrew life was organized around the family and the clan. Heads of families (“patriarchs”) and elders of the tribes were the judges (Gen. 38:24), and their authority was based on custom. After the EXODUS from Egypt, MOSES (on the advice of JETHRO, Exod. 18:13-26), organized the nation into groups of thousands, hundreds, fifties, and tens, within each tribe. Over each unit a qualified person was placed as judge, and only the most important cases were brought before Moses (Deut. 1:12-18; 21:2). After entering CANAAN, a similar plan of local government was followed (Deut. 16:18-20; 17:2-13; 19:15-20; Josh. 8:33; 23:2; 24:1; 1 Sam. 8:1). During the period of the judges the office assumed a very different character; this will be treated below.

When the monarchy was instituted, the king himself tried important cases (2 Sam. 15:2; 1 Ki. 3:9, 28; 7:7; Prov. 20:8). DAVID assigned LEVITES to the judicial office and appointed 6,000 men as officers and judges (1 Chr. 23:4; 26:29). According to 2 Chr. 19:5-8, JEHOSEPHAT enlarged the judicial system of Judah with a kind of supreme court at Jerusalem, made up of Levites, priests, and heads of fathers' houses. The prophets often complained bitterly that justice was corrupted by bribery and false witness (Isa. 1:23; 5:23; 10:1; Amos 5:12; 6:12; Mic. 3:11; 7:3). Kings were often unjust (1 Ki. 22:26; 2 Ki. 21:16; Jer. 36:26). The case of AHAB's seizure of NABOTH's vineyard (1 Ki. 21:1-13) shows how far a king could go in getting his own way, in flagrant contradiction of law and custom, at least in the northern kingdom of Israel.

In OT times the judges' activities were not limited to what today would be considered judicial functions. Our present division of powers among the legislative, executive, and judicial branches is a modern innovation. The word judge is often parallel to king (Ps. 2:10; 148:11; Isa. 33:22; 40:23; Amos 2:3). In several Semitic languages the term used in the Hebrew Bible for judge (šōpēṭ) is used for rulers of various kinds. This breadth of meaning attached to the term judge in ancient times leads to its extended use in the book of Judges.

II. The leaders during the period of the judges. From the time of the death of JOSHUA to the reign of SAUL, Israel's first king, the principal leaders of the people were called judges. These men and their times are described in the book of Judges and in 1 Sam. 1-7. They were charismatic leaders; that is, they were raised up to be Israel's "saviors" by a special endowment of the Spirit of God. It is clear that they were judges only in the broadest sense of that term. In reality, they were principally military deliverers, raised up to save the people of Israel from oppressing foreign powers. Much general information about the period of the judges, together with a complete list of their names and the regions in which they ruled, is given in the article, JUDGES, BOOK OF.

The discussion here will be restricted to a consideration of the careers and times of the most important of the judges. The times were most distressing. The period was cruel, barbarous, and bloody. The tribes, scattered in the hill country of Canaan, were divided into many separate enclaves. Even the TABERNACLE at SHILOH, which should have provided a religious unity, seems to have been generally neglected in favor of the local high places. Only an unusual crisis, such as the crime that brought on the Benjamite war (Jdg. 19:1-30; 20:1), could lead the tribes to united action. It appears that JUDAH in the S was unusually isolated from the other tribes.

The first judge mentioned in detail is EHUD son of Gera (Jdg. 3:12-30). A Benjamite, he is said to have been lefthanded, a serious defect in those superstitious times. Few if any of the judges are pictured as ideal individuals. The occasion of God's raising up Ehud was the oppression by EGLON king of MOAB, who with the AMMONITES and AMALEKITES (all Transjordanian herdsmen or nomads), occupied the region of JERICHO ("the City of Palms," 3:13). After eighteen years of oppression, Ehud led a revolt by killing Eglon when he presented the tribute. The gory details of the deed fit well this violent period. With Ephraimite help Eglon took the fords of the JORDAN and killed the Moabites as they sought to flee homeward. An eighty-year period of peace followed.

In the second detailed deliverance narrative (Jdg. 4-5), the scene shifts from the lower Jordan Valley to the Valley of JEZREEL and the GALILEE hill country in N Palestine. The oppressor is JABIN, who reigned in HAZOR and whose 900 chariots of iron must have struck terror into the Hebrew tribes, for they had no such machines of war (1 Sam. 13:19-22). The modern excavation of Hazor by Israeli scholars has underscored the importance of this Canaanite stronghold, probably the largest city in ancient Palestine. The deliverers were DEBORAH, "a prophetess" (Jdg. 4:4), surely the actual leader of the uprising, and BARAK son of Abinoam, a fearful man (4:8) who led the Hebrew army at Deborah's urging. The tribes of the Galilee hill country united for this battle, which was fought in the Valley of Jezreel by the Brook KISHON. Evidently a cloudburst upstream caused the Kishon to overflow onto the plains through which it flows, thus immobilizing the chariots on which the Canaanites depended (4:15; 5:20-22). When the army of Jabin was defeated, his general SISERA fled, only to be killed ignominiously by the woman JAEL (4:17-22). Deborah's warlike song of praise (ch. 5) is believed to be one of the oldest poems of the Bible and is noted for its rough, primitive vigor. A forty-year rest followed this deliverance.

Courtyard of a reconstructed Philistine house at the harbor city of Tel Qasile. The Philistine presence threatened the Israelites throughout the period of the judges.

The third great judge was GIDEON (Jdg. 6-8), the location of whose village of OPHRAH, in the tribal territory of MANASSEH, is a matter of uncertainty. It was located somewhere W of the Jordan, probably in the region between BETH SHAN and TABOR. The oppressing Midianites, desert bedouin from the TRANSJORDAN region, had crossed the Jordan and were raiding in Palestine proper. Gideon is commonly remembered for his doubt and reluctance to take action (6:15, 17, 36-40; 7:10), but it should be noted that once he assumed command he proved a steady and effective soldier (6:25-27; 7:15-24). His ruse, carried out by a mere 300 companions, frightened the disorganized bedouin from the Valley of Jezreel into full retreat across the Jordan. Gideon promptly called the Ephraimites to take the Jordan fords and thereby they destroyed the Midianites. Gideon appears to have established some form of regular rule over at least the region of the Jezreel Valley during his lifetime. His importance can be gauged by his rather large domestic establishment (8:30). Adhering to the ancient ideal of charismatic leadership, he rejected the idea of setting up a dynasty (8:22-23). His rule is said to have lasted forty years.

The account of Gideon's son ABIMELECH and his violent rule over the SHECHEM area in the central hill country is told in Jdg. 9. Abimelech is not called a judge, and he appears more as a brigand or political-military adventurer than as a deliverer of Israel from an oppressing enemy. He died as he lived—his skull was cracked by a millstone, and he was finally killed by his armorbearer. Probably his career is described solely to give a feeling of the violent, unsettled state of things during the times of the judges. If that is its purpose, it can be said to have succeeded.

JEPHTHAH, a Transjordanian chieftain, appears next (Jdg. 11-12) as the deliverer of GILEAD and Manasseh (N Transjordan) from the oppression of the Ammonites—a pastoral people who pressured Manasseh from the S. He is chiefly remembered for his thoughtless vow (11:30-31). While authorities differ as to what was involved in it, it is not unlikely that the vow involved offering his daughter as a sacrifice to God in the event of victory over the Ammonites (11:34-39). If it be objected that such an act was completely out of keeping with Hebrew religious practice, it may be answered that this narrative only emphasized the extent of the religious degradation of the Hebrews during this turbulent period.

The last of the great judges was SAMSON (Jdg. 13-16), with whom the scene shifts to a different part of Palestine—the PHILISTINE plain. It is likely that Samson lived late in the judges period, at the time when a large invasion of the Palestinian seacoast was occurring. The invaders (SEA PEOPLES) from the Aegean area, had been repulsed in their attempt to enter Egypt (by Ramses III) and had subsequently settled in what became known as the Philistine plain. Samson lived in the SHEPHELAH area that bordered that plain. He was dedicated to a life of NAZIRITE obedience before his birth. His life was the tragedy of one whose great potential was vitiated through a lack of self-discipline. Hardly a very religious person, Samson was known for his great strength, becoming the Hebrews' champion against the Philistines. His failure to discipline his sensuous nature led him into three liaisons with Philistine women. Doubtless each was an instrument of the Philistine lords in their effort to subdue Samson. We do not read that Samson ever led a Hebrew army against the Philistines. Rather, he made single-handed exploits in Philistine territory, several of which are described (Jdg. 14:19; 15:4-5, 8, 15; 16:3). The account of Samson's being subdued at the hand of DELILAH is well known. Killing in his death more Philistines than he killed in his life (16:30), he became at the last a tragic figure. He had judged Israel twenty years.

ELI (1 Sam. 1-4) and SAMUEL (2:12) are also called judges. Although they did do some of the work of the judges described above, it would seem better to regard them as PRIEST and PROPHET respectively—transitional figures preparing the way for the monarchy.

judgment. A word found many times in Scripture, with various meanings. Sometimes it refers to the pronouncing of a formal opinion or decision by human beings, but more often it indicates either a calamity regarded as sent by God for PUNISHMENT or a sentence of God as the Judge of all. Among the more important judgments of God prior to the EXODUS are those on ADAM, EVE, and the serpent after the FALL (Gen. 3), on humanity generally at the FLOOD (6:5), on SODOM and GOMORRAH (18:20), and on BABEL (11:1-9). God brings judgment to his creatures when they rebel against his will.

In the OT, the relationship between the Lord and ISRAEL is thought of under the form of a COVENANT. Of his own will, the Lord brought first NOAH (Gen. 6:17) and then ABRAHAM and his children (15:18; 17:1-27) into a close relationship with himself. He bound himself to them by covenant and looked in return for their responsive devotion. Similarly, with Israel in the time of MOSES, grace reached out to redeem and restore (Exod. 6:4) and looked for responsive, loving obedience (ch. 20). Within the covenant, the Lord pledged blessing on obedience and judgment on disobedience (e.g., Deut. 27:1-26; 28:1-68; cf. Lev. 26:3-13). The history of Israel, beginning with the exodus, is the record of a succession of judgments on the enemies of God's people and on his covenant nation when they flouted his will. The DAY OF THE LORD becomes a day of punishment for all the unjust, even for those who boast of belonging to the people of the covenant (Isa. 2:12; Hos. 5:8; Amos 5:18). The purpose of the judgment of God's people is not their total destruction but their purification. A remnant will survive, and this will be the nucleus of the new Israel (Amos 5:15). In the later prophets there are expressions of a hope of an ultimate victory of the divine Judge, of a final or last judgment. Here God's judgment is not thought of so much in terms of his intervention in history but of a last judgment of all human beings at the end of time. Perhaps the clearest expression of this is found in Dan. 12:1-3, where the dead are described as being raised, some for everlasting life, others for shame and everlasting contempt.

In the NT the idea of judgment appears in both human and divine contexts. Jesus warns against uncharitable judgments (Matt. 7:1). PAUL says that the spiritual man cannot be judged by unbelievers (1 Cor. 2:15), and in Rom. 14 and 1 Cor. 8-10 he warns against judging those who are "weak" in the faith. Judgment is one of the aspects of the coming of the KINGDOM OF GOD. God's judgment, says JOHN THE BAPTIST, will fall on those who do not make ready the way of the Lord (Lk. 3:9). Jesus declares that someday he will come as Judge (Matt. 25:31-46).

In the NT, as in the OT, judgment is an aspect of the deliverance of believers (Lk. 18:1-8; 2 Thess. 1:5-10; Rev. 6:10). God is long-suffering in meting out judgment so that people may be able to come to REPENTANCE (Lk. 13:6-9; Rom. 2:4; 2 Pet. 3:9). The notion of judgment, when God will overthrow every resistance, both among evil spiritual powers (1 Cor. 6:2-3) and also among people (Matt. 25:31-46), will affect all individuals, because all are responsible to God according to the grace that has been granted them (Matt. 11:20-24; Lk. 12:17-21; Rom. 2:12-16). This present world will be shaken and destroyed (Matt. 24:29, 35), and a new world will replace the present one (2 Pet. 3:13; Rev. 21:2). God will entrust the administration of this final judgment to his Son at his appearance in glory (Matt. 3:11-12; Jn. 5:22; Rom. 2:16). See also ESCHATOLOGY.

In Corinth, Paul was brought before a platform known as the bēma (“tribunal, judgment seat,” Acts 18:12) to be tried by the proconsul, Gallio. The temple prostitutes were located on the Acrocorinth seen in the background. (View to the S.)

judgment seat. The Greek word bēma G1037 (aside from Acts 7:5, where it means “step” or “length”) usually refers to a “tribunal,” “judicial bench,” “judgment seat,” or “throne,” traditionally erected in public, and from which JUDGMENT and other official business was conducted. Herod AGRIPPA I thus addressed the people of TYRE and SIDON (Acts 12:21). Jesus was brought before PILATE’s judgment seat (Matt. 27:19; Jn. 19:13; NIV, “judge’s seat”). Jews at CORINTH accused PAUL before the tribunal of the Proconsul GALLIO, who drove them out but ignored the beating of SOSTHENES there (Acts 18:12, 16-17). Later Paul was brought before the judgment seat of FESTUS at CAESAREA (25:6, 10, 17). Ironically the roles will one day be reversed, and Jesus who was unjustly judged by men will sit in righteous judgment over them. “For we must all appear before the judgment seat of Christ, that each one may receive what is due him for the things done while in the body, whether good or bad” (2 Cor. 5:10; cf. Rom. 14:10). This includes even those who are reconciled. While they have the righteousness of Christ, their work will be tested (2 Cor. 5:18-21; cf. 1 Cor. 3:13-15). See ESCHATOLOGY.

Judith. joo’dith (Heb. yēhûdî H3377, fem. of yēhûdî H3374, “of Judah, Judean, Jewish”). Daughter of Beerli the HITTITE and one of the wives of ESAU (Gen. 26:34).

jug. See POTTERY.

Julia. joo´lee-uh (Gk. Ioulia G2684, from Lat. Iulia, fem. of Iulius). A Christian woman greeted by PAUL (Rom. 16:15). Because she appears to be linked with PHILOLOGUS, some have speculated that the two may have been related, possibly as husband and wife. Julia was a common Roman name, especially among freed slaves.

Julius. joo´lee-uhs (Gk. Ioulios G2685, from Lat. Iulius). A Roman CENTURION of the Imperial Regiment (see AUGUSTAN COHORT) stationed at CAESAREA; he was charged with the custody of PAUL for his trip to ROME and his hearing by the emperor (Acts 27:1). Although Julius did not listen to Paul’s advice at one point (v. 11), the narrative suggests that there was a significant measure of mutual respect between them (cf. vv. 3, 31-32, 42-43).

Julius Caesar. See CAESAR.

Junia. See JUNIAS.

Junias. joo´nee-uhs (Gk. Iounias G2687, perhaps short form of Lat. Iunianus; because the form is elsewhere unattested, many understand it as the common fem. name Iounia, thus KJV, “Junia”). A Christian at Rome whom Paul greets in Rom. 16:7. Both Junias and ANDRONICUS are described as “my relatives” (KJV, “my kinsmen”) and as episēmoi en tois apostolois; the latter phrase probably means “outstanding among the apostles,” though some argue it should be rendered “well known to the apostles” (so ESV). There is debate also on whether the name should be understood as masculine or feminine; if the reference is to a woman, she was probably the wife of Andronicus.

Jushab-Hesed. joo´shab-hee´sid (Heb. yûšab ḥesed H3457, “mercy will be returned”). Son of ZERUBBABEL and descendant of DAVID through SOLOMON (1 Chr.

3:20), possibly born in Palestine (see HASHUBAH).

justification. In Christian theology this term may be defined as that judicial act of God by which, on the basis of the meritorious work of CHRIST, imputed to the sinner and received through FAITH, God declares the sinner absolved from SIN, released from its penalty, and restored as righteous. Expressed simply, it is being placed by God in a right relationship with himself (see RIGHTEOUSNESS). The doctrine is found in PAUL's letters, chiefly GALATIANS and ROMANS.

I. The nature of justification. As a reversal of God's attitude toward the sinner because of the sinner's new relation in Christ, justification is (1) a declarative act by which the sinner is declared to be free from guilt and the consequences of sin (Rom. 4:6-8; 5:18-19; 8:33-34; 2 Cor. 5:19-21); (2) a judicial act in which the idea of judgment and salvation are combined to represent Christ fulfilling the LAW on behalf of the sinner (Matt. 10:41; Rom. 3:26; 8:3; 2 Cor. 5:21; Gal. 3:13; 1 Tim. 1:9; 1 Pet. 3:18); (3) a remissive act in which God actually remits sin in complete forgiveness (Rom. 4:5; 6:7); and (4) a restorative act by which the forgiven sinner is restored to favor through the imputation of Christ's righteousness (Rom. 5:11; 1 Cor. 1:30; Gal. 3:6).

The major emphasis in justification is that it is an act of God. Nevertheless, it necessarily leads in the life of the believer to a "walking in the Spirit," "bringing forth the fruit of the Spirit," and "serving righteousness," for the God who justifies also gives new birth and a call to wholehearted commitment. Saving faith leads to faithfulness to God in life, as Paul clearly shows in Galatians and Romans. See SANCTIFICATION.

II. The essentials of justification. Four basic essentials in the act of justification are taught by Scripture.

A. Remission of punishment, in which the justified believer is declared to be free of the demands of the law since they have been satisfied in Christ (Rom. 4:5) and is no longer exposed to the penalty of the law (6:7). It is more than a pardon from sin; it is a declaration by God that the sinner, though guilty, has had the fact of guilt remitted in Christ.

B. Restoration to favor, in which the justified believer is declared to be personally righteous in Christ, and therefore accepted as being in Christ's righteousness. Mere acquittal or remission would leave the sinner in the position of a discharged criminal. Justification goes further in that it implies that God's treatment of the sinner is as if that one had never sinned. The sinner is now regarded as being personally righteous in Christ (Gal. 3:6). In this restoration there is not only acquittal, but also approval; not only pardon, but also promotion. Remission from sin is never separated from restoration to favor.

C. Imputed righteousness of God, which is granted the justified believer through Christ's presence. SALVATION in Christ imparts the quality and character of Christ's righteousness to the believer (Rom. 3:25-26). Christ is made the Justifier through whom a new life is inaugurated in the believer (1 Cor. 1:30). Paul uses the word righteousness to mean both the righteousness that acquits the sinner and the life-force that breaks the bondage of sin. Salvation can never be separated from the participational act of the believer in Christ, in which that one is now regarded judicially as having righteousness because the actual effect of righteousness has indeed come by faith (Rom. 3:22; Phil. 3:9).

D. New legal standing before God, in which, instead of being under the condemnation of sin, the justified believer stands before God in Christ. There has been an absolute interchange of position: Christ takes the place of the sinner, the place of curse (Gal. 3:15), being made sin (2 Cor. 5:21) and being judged for sin; the believer now stands in Christ's righteousness (Rom. 3:25) and is viewed as a son (Gal. 4:5).

III. The grounds of justification. The ground on which justification rests is the redeeming work of Christ's death. The inherent righteousness of Christ is the sole basis on which God can justify the sinner (Rom. 3:24; 5:19; 8:1; 10:4; 1 Cor. 1:8; 6:11; 2 Cor. 5:1; Phil. 3:9). It is this righteousness that, in being imputed to the justified believer, is the ground of justification. It declares the believer to have the same standing before God in personal holiness as Christ himself (Tit. 3:7).

The instrumental cause of justification is faith, as the response of the soul to God's redeeming grace (Rom. 3:28). Faith is the condition of justification not in that it is considered meritorious, but only as the condition by which the meritorious work of Christ is accepted by the sinner. The final ground of justification is the completed, finished, sufficient work of Christ atoning for the sinner in his redeeming work on the cross.

Justus. juhs'tuhs (Gk. Ioustos G2688, from Lat. Iustus, "just, righteous"). (1) Surname of Joseph BARSABBAS, one of the two men put forward to take the place of JUDAS ISCARIOT in the apostolic band (Acts 1:23). According to an early tradition, he survived a heathen plot by drinking deadly poison without injury.

(2) Titius Justus, described as "a worshiper of God" at CORINTH who, after the closing of the Jewish SYNAGOGUE, opened his home next door so that PAUL might continue preaching (Acts 18:7). The form of his name varies in the MSS, some of which have “Titus” (cf. KJV) instead of “Titius.”

(3) “Jesus, who is called Justus,” Paul’s appreciated Jewish coworker who sent greetings to the church in COLOSSE (Col. 4:11). The apostle describes him and two others—ARISTARCHUS and Mark (see MARK, JOHN)—as “the only Jews among my fellow workers for the kingdom of God, and they have proved a comfort to me.”

Juttah. jut´uh (Heb. yûṭṭâ H3420, possibly “level place” or “settlement”). A town in the hill country of the tribe of JUDAH (Josh. 15:55), later allotted to the LEVITES (21:16; the name is omitted in the MT of 1 Chr. 6:59, but see NIV and note). It is identified with modern Yaṭṭa, c. 5.5 mi. (9 km.) SSW of HEBRON.

kab. See WEIGHTS AND MEASURES.

Kabbon. kab´uhn. TNIV form of CABBON.

Kabul. kay´buhl. TNIV form of CABUL.

Kabzeel. kab´zee-uhl (Heb. qabṣē ʾēl H7696, “God has gathered”; alternate form yēqabṣē ʾēl H3677, “God will gather”). A town in the NEGEV, the extreme S of the tribal territory of JUDAH, near the border of EDM (Josh. 15:21). Kabzeel was the native town of BENAIAH son of Jehoiada, a valiant warrior who was in charge of DAVID’s bodyguard (2 Sam. 23:20; 1 Chr. 11:22). Also called Jekabzeel, it was reinhabited by the Judeans after the EXILE (Neh. 11:25). Its precise location is unknown.

Kadesh Barnea. kay´dish-bahr´nee-uh (Heb. qādēš H7729, “holy [city],” and qādēš barnēa H7732, perhaps “sanctuary [at the place] of contention”). A site in the N of SINAI, often referred to simply as Kadesh (but not to be confused with KADESH ON THE ORONTES). The name Kadesh Barnea has been applied to an oasis area made up by four springs approximately 50 mi. (80 km.) SW of BEERSHEBA and about the same distance E of the MEDITERRANEAN coast. Since the name ʿAin Qedeis preserves the original name of Kadesh, some scholars focused on this site, but it was only a small spring, sufficient possibly for the TABERNACLE and its staff, but no more. Kadesh Barnea is now generally identified with ʿAin el-Qudeirat, the largest of the springs between Suez and Beersheba. The ruins of a Judean fortress have been discovered at that site.

Kadesh Barnea.

The first biblical reference to Kadesh is Gen. 14:7, where it is equated with EN MISHPAT, one of the cities singled out in connection with the invasion by the four eastern kings. When HAGAR fled from SARAH (16:7), she was met by the angel of the Lord at BEER LAHAI ROI, which was located between Kadesh and BERED (16:14). Later ABRAHAM went from MAMRE toward the NEGEV and lived between Kadesh and SHUR (20:1). The primary relationship of the Israelites to Kadesh centers in the period of time that they spent there after the EXODUS (cf. Deut. 1:46; 2:14; Num. 33:37-38). From Horeb (SINAI), via SEIR, it was an eleven-day journey to Kadesh (Deut. 1:2). Kadesh is described as being in the Desert of PARAN (Num. 13:26); it is also said to be in the Desert of ZIN (33:36; cf. 20:1); and Ps. 29:8 mentions the Desert of Kadesh. These references illustrate the overlapping of geographic territories whose precise limits are difficult to determine and indicate the character of Kadesh as a border location.

When the Israelites reached this place, Moses sent the twelve spies to scout S CANAAN (Num. 13:1, 17, 26; 32:8; Deut. 1:19-25; Josh. 14:6-7). Encouraged by the Lord to invade the land at that time, the people rebelled (Deut. 9:23) and were sentenced to the delay in possessing the land (Num. 14:34). At Kadesh, MIRIAM died and was buried (20:1). It was in this area also that the waters of MERIBAH (“quarreling”) were located (Num. 20:2-13, 24; 27:14; Deut. 32:51). Kadesh was also on the W border of EDOM and it was from Kadesh that MOSES sent emissaries to the king of Edom to request permission for Israel to pass through Edomite territory (Num. 20:14-16, 22; cf. Jdg. 11:16-17). The conquest of the southern section of Palestine by JOSHUA refers to an area from Kadesh to GAZA (Josh. 10:41). Kadesh also is named as marking the S border of Judah (15:3) and therefore the southern boundary of the land possessed by the Israelites (Num. 34:4; Ezek. 47:19; 48:28).

Relief of the military campaign of Ramses II against the Hittites at Kadesh on the Orontes in c. 1288 B.C.

Kadesh on the Orontes. Also Kedesh and Qadesh. A town on the ORONTES River in SYRIA, just S of the Lake of Humus (Homs). The familiar battle between RAMSES II and the HITTITES took place here in 1288 B.C. It is the modern Tell Nebi Mend, about 45 mi. (72 km.) S of HAMATH and 75 mi. (120 km.) N of DAMASCUS. Some believe that the term “Desert of Kadesh” (Ps. 29:8) is a reference to this area. See also Tahtim Hodshi.

Kadmiel. kad´mee-uhl (Heb. qadmî ʾēl H7718, possibly “God is the ancient one” or “God is in front [i.e., God leads]”). The head of a Levitical family that returned from the EXILE with ZERUBBABEL (Ezra 2:40; 3:9; Neh. 7:43; 12:8, 24). He is presumably the same Kadmiel who supervised the workmen that rebuilt the temple (Ezra 3:9), sealed the covenant of NEHEMIAH (Neh. 10:9), and assisted in leading worship (9:4-5; 12:24).

Kadmonite. kad´muh-nit (Heb. qadmōnî H7720, “easterner”). A people group whose land was promised to ABRAHAM’s descendants (Gen. 15:19). They are mentioned with other groups who lived somewhere within the region stretching between “the river of Egypt” on the S (see EGYPT, RIVER OF) and the EUPHRATES on the N (v. 18), thus people of the “land of the east” (25:6 NIV; the Heb. word for “east” here is qedem H7710). Some believe that the Syrian desert E of Byblos (GEBAL) is more specifically the region of the Kadmonites. Others suggest that the list in Gen. 15:19 moves from S to N; if so, the Kadmonites, along with the KENITES and KENIZZITES, were Canaanites that lived in the S of Palestine and were later absorbed into the tribe of JUDAH.

Kain. kayn (Heb. qayin H7805, possibly “[place of] metal workers”). A city of the hill country in conquered territory assigned to the tribe of JUDAH (Josh. 15:57; KJV, “Cain”). It is tentatively identified with en-Nabi Yaqin (Khirbet Bani Dar), 3.5 mi. (5.5 km.) SE of HEBRON. However, since the SEPTUAGINT omits the name and reduces the summarized number of cities from ten to nine, some scholars have proposed to read “Zanoah of Kain,” that is, “of the Kenites” (the latter having been added by scribes to distinguish this ZANOAH from the one mentioned in v. 34). The same Hebrew word refers to the KENITES in two other passages (Num. 24:22 [cf. v. 21]; Jdg. 4:11).

Kaiwan. ki’wuhn. Also Chiun, Kiyyun. Both this name and SAKKUTH (Amos 5:26 NRSV, NIV mg.), possibly referring to one or more pagan deities associated with stars, involve a revocalization of the MT (which has kiyyûn H3962, apparently “pedestal,” and sikkût, perhaps a form of sukkâ H6109, “tent, tabernacle” [cf. NIV, “shrine”]). The basis for the reading Kaiwan is Akkadian kayamānu, “the steady one,” a term applied to Saturn. The SEPTUAGINT renders the Hebrew term with Greek Raiphan G4818 (cf. the quotation in Acts 7:43 and see REPHAN), which perhaps refers to an Egyptian god also associated with Saturn. The rendering Kaiwan remains uncertain, however.

Kalkol. kal’kol. TNIV form of CALCOL.

Kallai. kal’i (Heb. qallāy H7834, derivation uncertain). Head of the priestly family of Sallu during the days of the high priest JOIAKIM (Neh. 12:20).

Kalneh, Kalno. kal’neh, kal’noh. TNIV forms of CALNEH, CALNO.

Kamon. kay’muhn (Heb. qāmôn H7852, derivation uncertain). KJV Camon. The town where JAIR, one of the “minor judges,” was buried (Jdg. 10:3-5). Kamon was probably in GILEAD, but its location is uncertain; one possibility is modern Qamm, about 11.5 mi. (18.5 km.) SE of the Sea of Galilee.

Kanah. kay´nuh (Heb. qānāh H7867, “reed”). (1) A brook or ravine mentioned in the delineation of the territories of EPHRAIM and MANASSEH (Josh. 16:8; 17:9). It is generally identified with the Wadi Qana, which runs to the W, joining other wadis and then the Yarkon River before flowing into the MEDITERRANEAN Sea, just N of JOPPA.

(2) A town marking the boundary of the tribal territory of ASHER toward the N (Josh. 19:28). The village of Qanah still lives on and is about 7.5 mi. (12 km.) SE of TYRE.

Kandake. kan´duh-kee. TNIV form of CANDACE.

Kanneh. kan´uh. TNIV form of CANNEH.

kaph. kaf (from kap H4090, “palm [of hand], hand”). The eleventh letter of the Hebrew alphabet (כ) with a numerical value of twenty. It is named for the shape of the letter, which in its original form resembled a three-fingered hand. Later it developed an elongated diagonal stroke, and in this form was borrowed into the Greek alphabet as kappa, from which the k in the Roman (and English) alphabet was derived.

Kareah. kuh-ree´uh (Heb. qārēah H7945, “bald head”). Father of Johanan and Jonathan, who were among those who joined GEDALIAH at MIZPAH (2 Ki. 25:23 [KJV, “Careah”]; Jer. 40:8, 13, et al.). See JOHANAN #1.

Karka. kahr´kuh (Heb. qarqa ¢ H7978, “floor, ground”). KJV Karkaa. A settlement that served to mark the SW border of the tribe of JUDAH (Josh. 15:3; the name is missing in the parallel, Num. 34:4). It is listed between ADDAR and AZMON, and possibly should be identified with modern ¢Ain el-Qeseimeh, c. 50 mi. (80 km.) SW of BEERSHEBA, not far from KADESH BARNEA.

Karkas. kahr´kuhs. TNIV form of CARCAS.

Karkor. kahr´kor (Heb. qarqōr H7980, possibly “fountain”). A site in TRANSJORDAN where GIDEON defeated ZEBAH AND ZALMUNNA, kings of MIDIAN (Jdg. 8:10).

Karkor was apparently not far from JOGBEHAH (v. 11), but its precise location is uncertain.

Karmi, Karmite. kahr'mi, kahr'mit. TNIV forms of CARMi, CARMITE.

Karnaim. kahr-nay'im (Heb. qarnayim H7969, "[two] horns"). Also Carnaim. A city in N TRANSJORDAN that was captured by the Israelites (Amos 6:13; KJV, "horns"). It is identified with modern Sheikh Sa'd, c. 23 mi. (37 km.) E of the Sea of Galilee. Karnaim eventually replaced nearby ASHTAROTH (see also ASHTEROTH KARNAIM) as the center of the region and became the capital of the Persian fifth satrapy (see SATRAP). The city had a temple dedicated to ATARGATIS that was the scene of a great and bloody slaughter by the Jews under Judas MACCABEE in 165 B.C. (1 Macc. 5:26, 44-45).

Karshena. kahr-shee'nuh. TNIV form of CARSHENA.

Kartah. kahr'tuh (Heb. qartâ H7985, "city"). A Levitical town within the tribal territory of ZEBULUN, allotted to the descendants of MERARI (Josh. 21:34). The location of Kartah is unknown, and the name is missing in the parallel passage (1 Chr. 6:62 MT, but see LXX, followed by NIV); many scholars think it is an inadvertent scribal repetition of "Kartan" (Josh. 21:32).

Kartan. kahr'tan (Heb. qartân H7986, possibly "city"). A Levitical town within the tribal territory of NAPHTALI, allotted to the descendants of GERSHON (Josh. 21:32). The parallel passage has KIRIATHAIM (1 Chr. 6:76), probably an alternate form. Some identify Kartan/Kiriathaim with modern Khirbet el-Qureiyeh in Upper GALILEE, some 12 mi. (19 km.) SE of TYRE; others believe it may be the same as RAKKATH, on the W shore of the Sea of Galilee.

Kasiphia. kuh-sif'ee-uh. TNIV form of CASIPHIA.

Kasluhim, Kasluhites. kas'luh-him, kas'luh-hits. TNIV form of CASLUHIM, CASLUHITES.

Kattah. See KATTATH.

Kattath. kat´ath (Heb. qattāt H7793, meaning unknown). A town allotted to the tribe of ZEBULUN (Josh. 19:15; NASB, “Kattah,” apparently by mistake). It is mentioned next to NAHALAL, leading many scholars to think that Kattath is the same as KITRON (Jdg. 1:30), though the difference in form is difficult to explain. The town was probably in the N part of the JEZREEL Valley (see ESDRAELON), but the precise location is unknown.

katydid. See ANIMALS (under grasshopper).

Kebar. kee´bahr (Heb. kēbār H3894, perhaps “large, great”). A watercourse in BABYLON; NEBUCHADNEZZAR settled a colony of Jewish exiles on its banks, and EZEKIEL saw his earlier visions as he ministered here (Ezek. 1:1, 3; 3:15, 23; 10:15, 20, 22; 43:3). Most scholars identify the “Kebar River” with the Babylonian nāru kabari, referring to a “great canal” that branched off from the EUPHRATES above BABYLON, flowed some 60 mi. (100 km.) SE, through Nippur, and finally emptied back into the Euphrates near ERECH. Today, after centuries of neglect, this artificial watercourse is dry.

Kedar. kee´duhr (Heb. qēdār H7723, perhaps “mighty”). Son of ISHMAEL and grandson of ABRAHAM (Gen. 25:13; 1 Chr. 1:29). The OT contains no further information about him, but the name occurs ten other times as a designation of an Arabian tribe that must have been well known to the Israelites. It is used figuratively to describe the situation of one dwelling among barbarous strangers (Ps. 120:5). In Isa. 42:11 and 60:7 it indicates the future wide extension of God’s kingdom. and in Jer. 2:10 it is used to point to the distant E, in parallel with KITTIM for the distant W. Isaiah also refers to the many skillful archers and mighty warriors of Kedar (Isa. 21:17). The great multitude of its flocks, camels, and tents is mentioned elsewhere (Isa. 60:7; Jer. 49:28-29; Ezek. 27:21; cf. Cant. 1:5). Isaiah predicts that God will soon remove the glory of Kedar and destroy its powerful forces (Isa. 21:16), and Jeremiah predicts a later destruction, this time at the hands of NEBUCHADNEZZAR (Jer. 49:28-29). All these comparisons show how well known distant Kedar must have been to the Israelites in the years between 1000 and 500 B.C. The account of ASHURBANIPAL’s ninth campaign includes the record of an expedition against the people of Kedar (Qedar), which was evidently a powerful factor in N ARABIA. After the blows inflicted by Ashurbanipal and Nebuchadnezzar, the tribe probably dwindled rapidly and in the course of a few centuries disappeared or was assimilated into other Arabian tribes. In constructing a genealogy of Muhammad, the Islamic hagiographers traced his descent from Abraham and Ishmael through Kedar.

Kedemah. ked´uh-muh (Heb. qēdmāh H7715, possibly “easterner”). Son of ISHMAEL and ancestor of a tribe in N ARABIA (Gen. 25:15; 1 Chr. 1:31). In contrast to the other tribes that descended from Ishmael, Kedemah is not attested in extrabiblical literature. See also NODAB.

Kedemoth. ked´uh-moth (Heb. qēdēmôt H7717, “eastern [place]”). A city, probably on the upper course of the ARNON River, from which MOSES sent messengers to SIHON, king of the AMORITES, requesting a passage through his country (Deut. 2:26; Josh. 13:18). Kedemoth was assigned to the tribe of REUBEN and became one of the LEVITICAL CITIES allotted to the descendants of MERAR (Josh. 21:37; 1 Chr. 6:79). Its location is uncertain.

Kedesh. kee´dish (Heb. qedeš H7730, “holy place”). (1) The most prominent city in Scripture that bore this name was conquered by JOSHUA from a Canaanite king (Josh. 12:22; however, some scholars believe this text refers to #3 below); it later became one of the “fortified cities” in the tribal territory of NAPHTALI (19:37). Described as “Kedesh in Galilee in the hill country of Naphtali,” it is listed as one of the three CITIES OF REFUGE set aside W of the JORDAN (20:7). It was also one of the LEVITICAL CITIES allotted to the descendants of GERSHON (21:32; 1 Chr. 6:76). Kedesh is listed among the cities that TIGLATH-PILESER conquered, deporting its inhabitant to ASSYRIA in the reign of PEKAH (2 Ki. 15:29). Generally identified with modern Tell Qades (c. 17 mi./27 km. NNW of the Sea of Galilee), Kedesh had a strategic location, being in a fertile plain that overlooks the Jordan Valley.

(2) BARAK is said to have come from “Kedesh in Naphtali” (Jdg. 4:6), and it was to this city that he called the representatives of ZEBULUN and Naphtali to plan the gathering of troops at Mount TABOR (vv. 9-10). We are also told that HEBER the Kenite lived near it, by a great tree in ZAAANANNIM (v. 11). Some scholars have argued that this Kedesh is the same as #1 above, but the text suggests strongly that Barak’s hometown must have been relatively close to Mount Tabor and Zaanannim, not in Upper Galilee. A possible identification is modern Khirbet Qedish, just W of the S tip of the Sea of Galilee. Other scholars point to Jdg. 5:19, which places the battle “at Taanach by the waters of Megiddo,” and argue that the Kedesh in question should be identified with #3 below.

(3) A Levitical city within the tribal territory of ISSACHAR, allotted to the Gershonites (1 Chr. 6:72; contrast Kedesh of Naphtali, v. 76). In the parallel list (Josh. 21:28), the place occupied by Kedesh is taken by the name KISHION. Because the reference to Kedesh in Josh. 12:22 seems to point to a city in the vicinity of TAANACH, MEGIDDO, and JOKNEAM (i.e., in or near the plain of ESDRAELON), some have argued that this Kedesh is the one in Issachar, not Kedesh in Upper Galilee (see #1 above), and that it should be identified with Tell Abu Qudeis, a small mound between Taanach and Megiddo. Others argue that this site is too far W to have been included in the territory of Issachar. It has also been suggested that Kedesh in Issachar was Barak’s hometown (Jdg. 4:6) and/or the place where Heber the Kenite lived (4:11; see #2 above).

(4) A town in the NEGEV, the extreme S of the tribal territory of JUDAH, near the border of EDOM (Josh. 15:23). Since there is no other mention of such a place in the Scripture, it may be a city otherwise unknown or, as some have suggested, another name for KADESH BARNEA.

Kedorlaomer. ked’or-lay’oh-muhr (Heb. kēdorlā ʿōmer H3906, prob. from Elamite kutir [Akk. kudur] and Lagamaru, “servant of [the goddess] Lagamar”). Also Chedorlaomer. King of ELAM and leader of a coalition with AMRAPHEL of SHINAR (Babylonia), ARIOCH of ELLASAR, and TIDAL king of GOIIM, which sacked SODOM and GOMORRAH when these cities revolted after a submission of twelve years. On their return near DAMASCUS, ABRAHAM and his band of retainers defeated them in a surprise night attack (Gen. 14:1-7). The view that this text represents an authentic historical document is in no way belittled by present uncertainty in the identification of Kedorlaomer or his associates. The commonest view is that which identifies Kedorlaomer with Kutir-nahhunti I of Elam (c. 1625 B.C.), but this requires an unsupported equation of nahhundi with laʿomar, which is unlikely in view of the divine name given above. A more complex view, based on the so-called “Kedorlaomer” tablets in the British Museum (7th cent. B.C.), identifies him with a king of Elam named there KU.KU.KU.MAL.

keeper. This term is used over forty times in the KJV (but fewer than ten times in the NIV) to render various terms (e.g., Gen. 4:9; 1 Sam. 17:20 [NIV, “shepherd”]; Ps. 121:5 [NIV, “watches”]; Acts 5:23 [NIV, “guards”]). The expression “keeper of the wardrobe” refers to a civil servant who was apparently in charge not only of the king’s personal clothing, but also of robes used by others in the royal court (2 Ki. 10:22; 22:14; 2 Chr. 34:22).

Kehelathah. kee´huh-lay´thuh (Heb. qēhēlātâ H7739, “assembly”). A stopping place of the Israelites between Rissah and Mount Shepher on their wilderness journey (Num. 33:22-23). The site is unknown.

Keilah. kee-i´luh (Heb. qē`îlâ H7881, derivation uncertain). (1) A town in the SHEPHELAH allotted to the tribe of JUDAH (Josh. 15:44). It is identified with modern Khirbet Qila, c. 17 mi. (27 km.) SW of JERUSALEM and 8 mi. (13 km.) NW of HEBRON. DAVID led a daring expedition to Keilah to deliver it from attacks by the PHILISTINES who were robbing the threshing floors. Hearing of it, SAUL sent troops there to capture him and his men. David was forced to retreat again into the wilderness of ZIPH, when it became apparent after consulting the EPHOD that the men of Keilah might turn him over to Saul (1 Sam. 23:1-13). The town was inhabited by Jews returning from the EXILE and was included in the roster of those who participated in rebuilding the walls of JERUSALEM under NEHEMIAH (Neh. 3:17-18).

(2) A GARMITE included in the genealogy of Judah (1 Chr. 4:19). The passage as a whole (vv. 16-20) lists a number of persons whose connection with the descendants of Judah is not given. Keilah probably gave his name to the town (above, #1). See also ESHEMOA; HODIAH.

Kelaiah. ki-lay´yuh (Heb. qēlāyâ H7835, meaning uncertain). A LEVITE who agreed to put away his foreign wife and who was also known as KELITA (Ezra 10:23).

Kelal. kee´lal (Heb. kēlāl H4006, possibly “completeness, perfection”). One of the descendants of PAHATH-MOAB who agreed to put away their foreign wives (Ezra 10:30).

Kelita. ki-li´tuh (Heb. qēlîṭâ H7836, possibly “midget” or “cripple”). Also called KELAIAH (Kelita may be a nickname). A LEVITE who agreed to put away his foreign wife (Ezra 10:23). He is probably the same Levite listed among those who instructed the people (Neh. 8:7) and who signed the covenant of NEHEMIAH (10:10).

Kelub. kee´luhb (Heb. kēlûb H3991, apparently from a word meaning “basket”). (1) A man identified as brother of Shuhah and father of Mehir (1 Chr. 4:11). These persons and others are referred to as “the men of Recah” (v.

12). They were apparently descendants of JUDAH, but their precise genealogical connection is not given.

(2) Father of Ezri; the latter was an official of DAVID charged with supervising “the field workers who farmed the land” (1 Chr. 27:26).

Kelubai. See CALEB #2.

Keluhi. kel’yoo-hi (Heb. kēluhî H3988, meaning uncertain). KJV Chelluh; NRSV Cheluhi. One of the descendants of BANI who agreed to put away their foreign wives (Ezra 10:35).

Kemuel. kem’yoo-uhl (Heb. qēmû ʾēl H7851, possibly “God has arisen”). (1) Son of NAHOR, nephew of ABRAHAM, and father of ARAM (Gen. 22:21).

(2) Son of Shiphtan; he was a leader from the tribe of EPHRAIM, chosen to assist in the distribution of the land (Num. 34:24).

(3) Father of Hashabiah; the latter was an officer over the tribe of LEVI in the days of King DAVID (1 Chr. 27:17).

Kenaanah. ki-nay’uh-nuh (Heb. kēna ʿānâ H4049 [in form, fem. of kēna ʿan H4046; see CANAAN]). Also Chenaanah. (1) Son of Bilhan and descendant of BENJAMIN (1 Chr. 7:10); he and his brothers were warriors and heads of families (v. 11).

(2) Father of ZEDEKIAH; the latter was a false prophet who predicted victory for AHAB at the battle of RAMOTH GILEAD (1 Ki. 22:11, 24; 2 Chr. 18:10, 23).

Kenan. kee’nuhn (Heb. qênān H7809, apparently derived from CAIN; Gk. Kainam G2783). Son of ENOSH and grandson of SETH (Gen. 5:9-14 [KJV, “Cainan”]; 1 Chr. 1:2); included in Luke’s GENEALOGY OF JESUS CHRIST (Lk. 3:37 [KJV and NRSV, “Cainan”]; in v. 36, the same Gk. form is rendered CAINAN by the NIV).

Kenani. ki-nay’ni (Heb. kēnānî H4039, short form of KENANIAH, “Yahweh has strengthened”). Also Chenani. One of the LEVITES who led the people in confession and worship after EZRA read from the Book of the Law (Neh. 9:4).

Kenaniah. ken'uh-ni'uh (Heb. kēnanyāhû H4041 and kēnanyâ H4040, “Yahweh has strengthened [or is firm]”). Also Chenaniah. (1) The head LEVITE who was “in charge of the singing” when the ARK OF THE COVENANT was transported to JERUSALEM (1 Chr. 15:22, 27). The Hebrew term for “singing” here (maśśā ᵐ H5362) literally means “lifting,” and some argue that Kenaniah supervised the proper handling of the ark of the covenant. Still others suggest that the word used here means “pronouncement, oracle” (maśśā ᵐ H5363) and that Kenaniah was a leader of prophecy (cf. JB, “versed in divine oracles,” v. 22).

(2) A Levite descended from IZHAR; in the time of DAVID, Kenaniah and his sons were “assigned duties away from the temple, as officials and judges over Israel” (1 Chr. 26:29; cf. Neh. 11:16).

Kenath. kee'nath (Heb. qēnāt H7875, derivation unknown). A city in BASHAN, taken from the AMORITES by a Manassite leader called NOBAH, who gave it his own name (Num. 32:42; cf. Jdg. 8:11). It was later lost to the people of GESHUR and to the ARAMEANS (1 Chr. 2:23; the KJV rendering is incorrect). Kenath is usually identified with modern Qanawat in Syria (about 57 mi./92 km. E of the Sea of Galilee), where there are many impressive ruins from Greco-Roman times.

Kenaz, Kenizzite. kee'naz, ken'uh-zit (Heb. qēnaz H7869, meaning uncertain; gentilic qēnizzî H7870, “Kenizzite” [KJV also “Kenezite”]). (1) Son of Eliphaz and grandson of ESAU; an Edomite chief (Gen. 36:11, 15, 42; 1 Chr. 1:36, 53).

(2) Younger brother of CALEB (son of Jephunneh the Kenizzite); father of Othniel and Seraiah (Josh. 15:17; Jdg. 1:13; 3:9, 11; 1 Chr. 4:13). For the view that Othniel was Caleb’s younger brother and that therefore Kenaz was Caleb’s father, see comments under OTHNIEL.

(3) Son of Elah and grandson of Caleb (1 Chr. 4:15).

(4) Clan or family name. The Kenizzites are one of the S Palestinian tribes (listed between KENITES and KADMONITES) whose land God promised to ABRAHAM’s descendants (Gen. 15:19). Unless predictive prophecy is involved here, these Kenizzites must be a different family from that connected with Kenaz son of Eliphaz (#1 above). Caleb is said to be the son of Jephunneh the Kenizzite (Num. 32:12; Josh. 14:6, 14), but the exact meaning of the clan name here is not clear. On the one hand, the Kenizzites are described as an alien people (Gen. 15:19), and Caleb apparently is promised a portion of the land because of faithfulness rather than birthright (Josh. 14:6-14). On the other hand, the genealogy of 1 Chr. 2 (see vv. 9, 18) speaks of Caleb son of HEZRON (the latter being a grandson of JUDAH). Many scholars believe that Caleb belonged to the Edomite clan known as the Kenizzites (which along with other non-Israelite groups living in S PALESTINE was absorbed into the tribe of Judah) and that the Chronicles genealogy is an attempt to give the descendants of Caleb legal status in postexilic Judaism. It is possible that the apparent discrepancy may be accounted for by duplicate names.

Kenezite. See KENAZ.

Kenite. ken'it (Heb. qênî H7808, gentilic of qayin H7803, “metal worker”; see CAIN). Clan or tribal name of seminomadic peoples of S PALESTINE and SINAI; the probable etymology of their name may indicate that they were known as metal workers. It is clear that references to the Kenites are not to a tightly knit group living in a narrowly defined area. The name rather applies to a number of loosely related groups possessing common skills or perhaps claiming a common ancestor. The land of the Kenites is promised to ABRAHAM’S descendants (Gen. 15:19). This would be the territory of a certain Kenite clan, probably S of HEBRON. Similarly, it is a particular group of Kenites that is condemned in BAALAM’S oracle (Num. 24:21-22), while another group is praised for having been kind to the Hebrews in the wilderness (1 Sam. 15:6). The exact cause for Baalam’s condemnation is not given, but in the context it appears that these Kenites had allied themselves with the AMALEKITES against MOSES.

Moses’ father-in-law is identified as a Kenite in Jdg. 1:16 (also 4:11 KJV and other versions), but his exact identity is a complex question. He seems to carry three personal names: JETHRO, REUEL, and HOBAB. And in Exodus and Numbers he is called a Midianite (Exod. 2:16-21; 18:1; Num. 10:29). One proposed solution is that Jethro belonged to a Kenite of the Reuel clan who was living in MIDIAN (well-known for its rich copper lodes) when Moses first met him. Later, during the EXODUS, Moses' son-in-law (ḥātān H3163 rather than ḥōtēn H3162) named Hobab, also of the Reuel clan, was asked to act as guide for the Israelites (alternately, ḥōtēn may mean "brother-in-law"; cf. NIV at Jdg. 4:11). Whether this reconstruction of the relationship of the names is correct or not, it does appear that Kenite was the actual tribal affiliation, while the name Midianite refers to location only.

According to Jdg. 1:16, the descendants of Moses' Kenite father-in-law allied themselves with the Israelites and settled with them in the NEGEV near ARAD (at the S edge of the Judean wilderness). The nomadic character of the Kenites is clearly seen in the detail that one family (not a whole tribe), that of HEBER, had migrated northward to GALILEE (4:11). During the early monarchy a significant concentration of Kenites was located in the southern Judean territory. This is clear from 1 Sam. 15:6 and also from DAVID's relations with them. While David was a PHILISTINE vassal, he attacked the enemies of Judah in the S while telling his superiors that he was attacking Judah, the Jerahmeelites, and the Kenites (27:10). Not only was he not attacking Judah and her friends, he was sending them gifts from his spoils (30:29). In 1 Chr. 2:55 the families of scribes living at JABEZ are said to be Kenites; the same text indicates some connection between them and the RECABITES.

Kenizzite. See KENAZ.

kenosis. ki-noh'sis. The Greek noun kenōsis ("emptying, depletion") does not appear in the NT, but the cognate verb kenōō G3033 (with the reflexive pronoun) occurs in Phil. 2:7, which is often translated literalistically, "[Christ] emptied himself," but which is better rendered, "made himself nothing" (cf. NIV). The term kenosis was used in Christian theology from very early times, usually as a synonym for the INCARNATION. It refers to a view that emphasizes CHRIST's humiliation or condescension. Support for the doctrine rests primarily on Phil. 2:6-8, with parallels having to do with his humiliation (2 Cor. 8:9) and exaltation (Jn. 17:5; see EXALTATION OF CHRIST). The theological issue is profoundly difficult, for it takes one into the nature of the TRINITY: when divine powers are allowed in the man Christ Jesus, what, if anything, has happened to the person of God himself? Problems of interpretation are further aggravated by the fact that the other uses of the verb (Rom. 4:14; 1 Cor. 1:17; 9:15; 2 Cor. 9:3) are uniformly figurative in their context and will not bear the weight of literal usage that the Kenoticists demand of the same word in Phil. 2:7.

Solutions to the problem have moved across the spectrum of five possible interpretations. (1) In the incarnation, Christ gave up all divine attributes and thus was deprived of all cosmic functions and divine consciousness. (2) A distinction is made between essential and relative attributes in God, so that Christ in his incarnation gave up not his essential attributes but only his relative attributes. (3) In his obedience to his Father, Christ gave up no powers of the Deity but gave up their independent exercise. (4) His humanity was such that he did not exercise his divine powers at all. (5) The divine nature united itself with his humanity only gradually, and his full deity was consummated finally at the resurrection; the incarnation was process rather than act. The best interpretation of Phil. 2:6-8 focuses on the phrase, “being on an equality with God,” and states that Christ did not give up his divine nature but rather divested himself of the position or prerogatives of Deity by taking on the form of a servant.

Kephar Ammoni. kee´fuhr-am´oh-ni (Heb. kēpar hā ʿammōnî H4112, “village of the Ammonites”). KJV Chephar-haammonai; NRSV Chephar-ammoni. A town allotted to the tribe of BENJAMIN (Josh. 18:24). The name suggests that it was inhabited by (or perhaps captured from) the AMMONITES. The site is unknown, but like some of the other towns in the list (e.g., BETHEL, OPHRAH), it may have been N of Benjamin’s boundary, within the territory of EPHRAIM.

Kephirah. ki-fi´ruh (Heb. kēpîrâ H4098, “[open] village”). Also Chephirah. A city of the GIBEONITES included in the treaty they obtained from Israel by stealth (Josh. 9:17). The town was later included in the tribal territory of BENJAMIN (18:26). Inhabitants of Kephirah were among those who returned from the EXILE with ZERUBBABEL (Ezra 2:25; Neh. 7:29). The site is modern Khirbet el-Kefireh, about 8.5 mi. (13.5 km.) WNW of JERUSALEM (on the road to Jaffa) and just N of KIRIATH JEARIM.

Kerak. kuhr´ahk (Arab. name derived from Aram. kērak, “fortified place”). (1) The modern name of a Transjordanian site probably to be identified with the Moabite city of KIR HARESET.

(2) Khirbet Kerak (not mentioned in the Bible) is a large and important archaeological site on the SW shore of the Sea of Galilee, just N of the present mouth of the JORDAN River. It was strategically located at the crossroads of two important caravan routes. The site covers over 54 acres, and archaeological work has revealed occupations during Late Chalcolithic through Middle Bronze II periods, with a gap until Hellenistic times. The famous Khirbet Kerak pottery ware was first identified at this site, although it evidently originated in N Anatolia and the Caucasus region. Its sudden appearance speaks of conquest from that direction.

Keran. kee´ruhn (Heb. kērān H4154). Also Cheran. Son of D^{ISHON} and grandson of S^{EIR} the H^{ORITE} (Gen. 36:26; 1 Chr. 1:41).

kerchief. This term is used by the KJV in a passage dealing with D^{IVINATION}, which required the head to be covered (Ezek. 13:18, 21; NIV and other versions, “veils”). It is not known what these “kerchiefs” looked like or how they were used, but apparently they were coverings that varied in length with the height of the wearer and were worn by those who consulted the seers.

Keren-Happuch. ker´uhn-hap´uhk (Heb. qeren happûk H7968, “horn of antimony,” i.e., “container of [black] eye-paint”). The youngest of J^{OB}’s daughters, born to him after his restoration from affliction (Job 42:14). The name alludes to her beauty (cf. v. 15).

Kerethite. ker´uh-thit (Heb. kērētî H4165, possibly “Cretan”). Also Cherethite (in Ezek. 25:16, KJV has the superfluous pl., “Cherethims”). The Kerethites were a people group that apparently came from the Aegean area; D^{AVID} chose his personal guard from the Kerethites and the P^{ELETHITES} (1 Sam. 30:14; 2 Sam. 8:18; 15:18; 20:7, 23 [Qere, C^{ARITES}]; 1 Ki. 1:38, 44; 1 Chr. 18:17; Ezek. 25:16; Zeph. 2:5 [cf. also v. 6 NIV]). Although some have understood the words as common nouns (“executioners” and “runners”), it is virtually certain that the words refer to people groups. The Kerethites are generally said to have been Cretans on the basis of the similarity of the two names (the name C^{RETE} for this M^{EDITERRANEAN} island is already attested in Homeric times) and the connection between the Kerethites and the P^{HILISTINES} (Aegeans who invaded Palestine); but this identification is not certain. They seem to have been especially active in times of crisis for David, remaining loyal to him in all three revolts against the king. Their leader was B^{ENAIAH} son of Jehoiada (2 Sam. 8:18), who is also called the leader of David’s bodyguard (23:23). It is probable that the Kerethites and Pelethites were this bodyguard.

Kerioth. ker´ee-oth (Heb. qēriyyôt H7954, pl. of qiryâ H7953, “town, city”). (1) A city in MOAB declared to be under God’s judgment (Jer. 48:24, 41 [NRSV, “towns”]; Amos 2:2). Kerioth is probably to be identified el-Qereiyat, about 8 mi. (13 km.) E of the DEAD SEA and 7 mi. (11 km.) NW of DIBON.

(2) According to the KJV, a city in the extreme S of the territory of JUDAH (Josh. 15:25). See KERIOTH HEZRON.

Kerioth Hezron. ker´ee-oth-hez´ruhn (Heb. qēriyyôt heṣrôn H7955, “towns of HEZRON”). A town in the NEGEV, the extreme S of the tribal territory of JUDAH, near the border of EDOM; it was also known as HAZOR, a common name (Josh. 15:25; KJV, “Kerioth and Hezron”). Its location is uncertain, but it has been tentatively identified with modern Khirbet el-Qaryatein, about 13 mi. (21 km.) SSE of HEBRON and 4 mi. (6 km.) S of MAON.

Kerith. kibr´ith (Heb. kērîṭ H4134, possibly “ditch” or “cutting”). Also Cherith. A brook or valley E of the JORDAN where ELIJAH fled after he had announced the coming drought to King AHAB of Israel (1 Ki. 17:3, 5). The expression “before Jordan” (KJV) is not clear as to which side of that river was meant. Since Elijah’s home was in GILEAD, the E side seems more likely, although there is a tradition that it is the Wadi Qelt near JERICHO on the W side. Any number of WADIS with their numerous caves could be the Kerith; one possibility is Wadi Yabis (Naḥal Yavesh) in Gilead, which empties into the Jordan about 22 mi. (35 km.) S of the Sea of Galilee.

Keros. kibr´os (Heb. qêrōs H7820, perhaps “crooked”). Ancestor of a family of temple servants (NETHINIM) who returned from the EXILE with ZERUBBABEL (Ezra 2:44; Neh. 7:47).

Kerub. kibr´uhb (Heb. kērûb H4132). Also Cherub. One of five Babylonian places from which certain Jewish exiles returned who were unable to prove their Israelite ancestry (Ezra 2:59; Neh. 7:61). If Kerub here is a place name, its location is unknown; some, however, think the name refers to a person on the basis of the parallel in the APOCRYPHA (1 Esd. 5:36 NRSV, following a generally accepted conjectural emendation).

kerygma. ki-rig´muh (Gk. kērygma G3060, “proclamation”). This term is used in biblical scholarship to refer to the apostolic preaching of the GOSPEL, especially its original proclamation (e.g., the sermons in the book of Acts). It is often contrasted with the didachē G1439, its “teaching” aspects. See DOCTRINE.

Kesalon. kes’uh-luhn (Heb. kēsālôn H4076, possibly “[on the] flank, loin”). Also Chesalon. A town on the N boundary of the tribe of JUDAH (Josh. 15:10). Located between Mount SEIR and BETH SHEMESH, Kesalon is given in the text as another name for the “northern slope of Mount Jearim.” The modern site is a ruin known as Kesla, about 11 mi. (18 km.) W of JERUSALEM, at an elevation of more than 1,900 ft. (580 m.). Although the region as a whole is characterized by oak forests (JEARIM means “woods”), Kesla itself is a summit on bare rock.

Kesed. kee’sid (Heb. keśed H4168, apparently related to kaśdîm H4169, “Chaldeans, Babylonians”). Also Chesed. Son of NAHOR by his wife MILCAH; nephew of ABRAHAM (Gen. 22:22). The passage as a whole seems to indicate the origins of various tribes, and possibly Kesed is presented as the ancestor of the Babylonians.

Kesil. kee’sil (Heb. kēsîl H4069, “flank, side”). Also Chesil. A town in the NEGEV, the extreme S of the tribal territory of JUDAH, near the border of EDM (Josh. 15:30). In the parallel passages the name Kesil seems to be replaced by BETHUL (Josh. 19:4) and BETHUEL (1 Chr. 4:30).

Kesulloth. ki-suhl’oth (Heb. kēsûlôt H4063, possibly “[on the] loins”). Also Chesulloth. A town allotted to the tribe of ISSACHAR (Josh. 19:18). It is probably the same as KISLOTH TABOR, a town mentioned in the description of the SE border of ZEBULUN (v. 12). It has been identified with Iksal, in the foothills just SE of NAZARETH and W of Mount TABOR.

Ketib. kuh-teev’ (Heb. kētîb, “written,” pass. ptc. of Aram. kētab H10374, “to write”). Also Kethib, Ketiv. The written, consonantal form of the Masoretic text of the Hebrew Bible. This term is used primarily in contrast to QERE, the latter indicating “what is to be read,” that is, an alternate form or a textual variant preferred by the Masoretes. See TEXT AND VERSIONS (OT).

kettle. This English term is used by various Bible versions in one OT passage, referring to a deep cooking pot in which a sacrifice might be boiled (1 Sam.

2:14; the NRSV uses it also in Mic. 3:3 [NIV, “pan”]). In the NT, it occurs as the rendering of Greek chalkion G5908, “[copper] cauldron” (Mk. 7:4; KJV, “brassen vessel”).

Ketubim, Ketuvim. ki-too´bim, kuh-too-veem´ (kētûbîm, “written things,” from kātab H4180, “to write”). Also Kethubim. The “Writings” (also known as the HAGIOGRAPHIA, “Sacred Writings”), a term applied to the third division of the OT Hebrew canon, and consisting of the poetic books (Psalms, Job, Proverbs, Song of Solomon, Ecclesiastes, Lamentations) as well as Ruth, Esther, Daniel, Ezra, Nehemiah, and Chronicles. See CANONICITY.

Keturah. ki-tyoo´ruh (Heb. qēṭûrâ H7778, “one covered in incense [i.e., perfumed]”). Wife of ABRAHAM (Gen. 25:1, 4; 1 Chr. 1:32-33; in the latter passage, she is referred to as a CONCUBINE). Although her name appears in the Genesis record only after the death of SARAH, it is possible that she bore sons to Abraham while Sarah was still living. To Keturah and Abraham were born six sons (Gen. 25:1-4); seven grandsons are also listed. Through these descendants a number of tribes in N ARABIA trace their lineage back to Abraham and Keturah.

Keys dated to the 1st or 2nd cent. A.D.

key. An instrument, usually of wood but sometimes of metal, for moving the bolt of a lock. In the ANE keys had nails or wooden pegs to fit corresponding holes in the bolt holding the door fast (Jdg. 3:25). Figuratively, the term is a symbol of authority, carried on the shoulder (Isa. 22:20-22). In the NT it is symbolic of the authority given to PETER (Matt. 16:19), but which Jesus still retains (Rev. 1:18; 3:7); the key that keeps destructive forces (9:1) and SATAN (20:1) in the bottomless pit.

Keziah. ki-zi'uh (Heb. qēî'āh H7905, “cassia”). KJV Kezia. The second daughter born to JOB after his fortunes were restored (Job 42:14). The name, possibly referring to the sweet smell of cinnamon, alludes to her charm (cf. v. 15).

Kezib. kee'zib (Heb. kēzîb H3945, “deceit”). Also Chezib. A town in the SHEPHELAH, near ADULLAM, where Shelah son of JUDAH was born (Gen. 38:5). Kezib is usually identified with ACZIB (#2) and COZEBÄ.

Keziz. See EMEK KEZIZ.

khirbet. kihr'bet. An Arabic term meaning “ruin” and often used in geographical names, such as Khirbet KERAK and Khirbet QUMRAN. The corresponding term in Hebrew is ḥorbat (construct of ḥorbâ H2999).

Kibroth Hattaavah. kib'roth-huh-tay'uh-vuh (Heb. qibrôt hatta ṭāwâ H7701, “graves of craving”). One of the stops of the Israelites in the wilderness (Num. 11:34-35; 33:16-17; Deut. 9:22). It was probably 10-20 mi. (15-30 km.) NE of Mount SINAI (the next stop was HAZEROTH), but the exact location is unknown. Here the people, craving the foods they had left behind in Egypt, complained about the MANNA (11:4-6) and gorged themselves on the quails God sent. As they ate, God smote the people with a severe plague (11:33), so that large numbers of Israelites died and were buried there—thus the name given to the place.

Kibzaim. kib-zay'im (Heb. qibṣayim H7698, possibly “[twin] heaps”). A Levitical city within the tribal territory of EPHRAIM, allotted to the clan of KOHATH (Josh. 21:22). See JOKMEAM #1.

kidney. This organ, being surrounded by pure fat, was adapted to burning in sacrifice, when the whole animal was not burned (Exod. 29:13, 22; Lev. 3:4, 10, 15; 4:9; 7:4; 8:16, 25; 9:10, 19). Slaughter in a war that was a judgment of God was a sacrifice in which the kidneys figured (Isa. 34:6). The “finest kernels of wheat” were called literally, “fat of kidneys of wheat” (Deut. 32:14 KJV). Possibly in part from their almost inaccessible location in the body, the kidneys often were thought to have many of the functions that we now know are performed by the brain, including thinking and emotional reactions. Kidneys were regarded as the seat of the emotions. This notion is possibly reflected in conventional language in the Bible, as when in the Hebrew text the kidney is linked with the HEART. For example, Ps. 7:9 says literally that God “tests kidneys [KJV, reins] and hearts” (NIV, “searches minds and hearts”; see also Ps. 26:2 and Rev. 2:23, and cf. Ps. 16:7).

Kidon. ki'duhn (Heb. kîdôn H3961, “javelin” or “[short] sword”). Also Chidon. The owner of a threshing floor (or possibly the name of the place itself) where UZZAH died because he touched the ARK OF THE COVENANT while it was being transported toward JERUSALEM (1 Chr. 13:9). The place is called NACON in the parallel passage (2 Sam. 6:6). Because of God’s judgment here, DAVID named the field PEREZ UZZAH (“outbreak [of wrath] against Uzzah”). The location of the threshing floor is unknown, but if the procession took a direct route from KIRIATH JEARIM, the site must have been W of Jerusalem.

Kidron. kid'ruhn (Heb. qidrôn H7724, “turbid [stream]”; Gk. Kedrôn G3022). KJV NT Cedron. A valley E of JERUSALEM c. 3 mi. (5 km.) in length, lying between the walls of the city and the MOUNT OF OLIVES. Here the GIHON Spring was located, whose water was brought by an aqueduct into the pools of SILLOAM within the walls. South of the city the Kidron joins the Valley of HINNOM near the pool of EN ROGEL, and the united valley, Wadi en-Nar, runs down to the DEAD SEA. Through this valley a winter torrent runs, the Brook Kidron, but the stream bed is dry much of the year. DAVID’s crossing of the Kidron (2 Sam. 15:23) in his escape from his rebellious son ABSALOM marked the decisive abandonment of his throne. When SOLOMON spared SHIMEI, he warned him that to cross the Kidron would bring him death (1 Ki. 2:37). ASA burned idols at the brook (1 Ki. 15:13; 2 Chr.

15:16), as did JOSIAH (2 Ki. 23:4, 6, 12) and HEZEKIAH (2 Chr. 29:16; 30:14). It is called “the stream” (32:4) that Hezekiah stopped, to deny the attacking Assyrians a water supply. NEHEMIAH went up it by night to view the state of the walls of Jerusalem (Neh. 2:15). JEREMIAH mentions it in prophesying the permanent rebuilding of Jerusalem (Jer. 31:38-40). After the Last Supper, Jesus and his disciples crossed it on their way out of the city to reach the Garden of GETHSEMANE on the slopes of the Mount of Olives (Jn. 18:1). He must often have looked across this valley as he “was sitting on the Mount of Olives” (e.g., Matt. 24:3; Mk. 13:3), and he must have crossed it on his triumphal entry into the city of Jerusalem (Matt. 2:1-11; Mk. 11:1-10; Lk. 19:28-44; Jn. 12:12-19).

Kileab. kil’ee-ab (Heb. kil ʾāb H3976, derivation uncertain). Also Chileab. DAVID’S second son born at HEBRON, his first by ABIGAIL (2 Sam. 3:3). Many believe the Hebrew text here is corrupt and emend the name to DANIEL, as in the parallel passage (1 Chr. 3:1).

Kilion. kil’ee-uhn (Heb. kilyôn H4002, possibly “frailty” or “destruction”). Also Chilion. Son of ELIMELECH and NAOMI (Ruth 1:2, 5; 4:9). When the family moved to MOAB, Kilion married a woman named ORPAH, and his brother MAHLON married RUTH. Both Kilion and his brother died some years later while they were still in Moab.

Kilmad. kil’mad (Heb. kilmad H4008, derivation unknown). One of several places that were trading partners with TYRE (Ezek. 27:23). Nothing else is known about Kilmad, but since it is mentioned after ASSHUR, it was probably in N MESOPOTAMIA.

kiln (oven). This term is used by some versions (e.g., NRSV) to render Hebrew kibšān H3901 in two passages (Exod. 9:8-10; 19:18; the only other occurrence of the Hebrew term is in Gen. 19:28). See FURNACE; OVEN.

Kimham. kim’ham (Heb. kimhām H4016, possibly “pale face”). Also Chimham. Apparently a son of BARZILLAI the Gileadite (2 Sam. 19:37-38, 40). While DAVID was in exile at MAHANAIM, Barzillai had provided him with food. After ABSALOM’S rebellion had been quelled, David invited Barzillai to be his guest at Jerusalem. Barzillai declined but sent Kimham instead. Apparently David granted Kimham a royal pension (1 Ki. 2:7). See also GERUTH KIMHAM.

kin. See KINSMAN.

Kinah. ki'nuh (Heb. qînāh H7807, possibly “lament”). A town in the NEGEV, the extreme S of the tribal territory of JUDAH, near the border of EDM (Josh. 15:22). Its location is unknown, but because Wadi el-Qeni may preserve the name, some have identified Kinah with nearby Khirbet Ṭaiyib (c. 3 mi./5 km. NNE of ARAD [Tell ʿArad]) and others with Khirbet Ghazzeḥ (on a spur of the wadi, c. 4 mi./6 km. SE of Arad).

kindness. The state or quality of being kind: generosity, humaneness, tenderness. The word can also refer to a particular instance of kind behavior: a token of friendliness, good will, affection. In the OT, it occurs primarily as the rendering of Hebrew ḥesed H2876, which conveys various senses, such as “loyalty,” “mercy,” “grace,” and “love” (Gen. 19:19 and frequently). In the NT, it translates Greek chrēstotēs G5983, “goodness, uprightness, generosity” (Rom. 2:4; 11:22; et al.) and other expressions. Kindness is both an attribute of God (Tit. 3:4) and a characteristic of true LOVE (1 Cor. 13:4). God’s kindness is great (Joel 2:13; Jon. 4:2) and everlasting (Isa. 54:8, 10). God is kind to the ignorant and wayward (Heb. 5:2), to the ungrateful and evil (Lk. 6:35). Believers are exhorted to possess this trait (Col. 3:12; 2 Pet. 1:7). God’s people should be kind to fellow-believers (Deut. 22:1; Zech. 7:9, 10; Rom. 15:5; Eph. 4:32; 1 Pet. 3:8; 4:8), neighbors (Rom. 15:2), foreigners (Lev. 19:34), widows (1 Tim. 5:9, 10), orphans (Zech. 7:10), the needy (Matt. 5:7; 1 Jn. 3:17-18), the weak (Acts 20:35; Rom. 15:1), the sorrowing (12:15), the weary (Gal. 6:2), the fallen (6:1), even enemies (Lk. 6:34-35). At the final judgment, Christ will reward those who have been kind to his people (Matt. 25:34-36). See also GOOD; GRACE; MERCY.

kine. KJV plural form of “cow.” See ANIMALS (under cattle).

king. A male ruler, usually hereditary, of a city, tribe, or nation. The Hebrew word for “king,” melek H4889, appears over two thousand times in the OT. The SEPTUAGINT translates this term with the Greek equivalent, basileus G995, which occurs some fifty times in the NT. Kings often had priestly functions in the maintenance of the religion of the group, though most of these were separated from the kingly office in the Hebrew monarchy: the king was expected to further religion but not to act as its priest. In the ANE kings came to be regarded as divine beings. This was true of EGYPT from the beginning. The idea was taken over by the Greek empire of ALEXANDER THE GREAT and his successors, later by the Romans, after their empire came to include most of the East.

The earliest king mentioned in the Bible is NIMROD (Gen. 10:8-12), whose Mesopotamian kingdom was extensive. From this region the kings who warred with kings of CANAAN came and were driven off by ABRAHAM (ch. 14). God promised Abraham (17:6) and JACOB (35:11) that kings would be among their descendants. There were city-kings such as ABIMELECH (20:2), called king of the PHILISTINES (26:1, 8), and kings in EDOM (36:31; 1 Chr. 1:43) before Israel had kings. Kings of Egypt, the PHARAOHS, figure in the Egyptian period of Israelite history (Gen. 39 to Exod. 14; Deut. 7:8; 11:3); they also appear later when Egyptian influence was strong in JUDAH. Israel contacted many kings in their wanderings (Num. 20:14—33:40; Deut. 1:4—4:47; 7:24; 29:7; 31:4) and in Canaan (Josh. 2:2—24:12; Jdg. 1:7—11:25; 1 Sam. 14:47; 15:8, 20, 32; 21:10, 12; 22:4). These varied in power from headmen of towns to rulers of large areas.

It is said several times that in the time of the judges there was no king in Israel (Jdg. 17:6; 18:1; 19:1; 21:25); everyone did what was right in his own eyes. MOSES had foreseen that the people would demand a king as a strong human ruler (Deut. 17:14-15; 28:36), not content with a theocracy, the direct rule of God as king over them (33:5). HANNAH looked forward to a time when there would be a king of Israel who was appointed and anointed by God (1 Sam. 2:10). Toward the end of SAMUEL's judgeship, however, Israel was unwilling to wait for a messianic king and demanded one "such as all the other nations have" (1 Sam. 8:5, 22; 19:19, 24; 12:1-25; cf. Hos. 13:10). Samuel duly warned the people what to expect of a king, then selected SAUL, whose choice they ratified. The reigns of Israelite kings are recorded as follows: SAUL (1 Sam. 12-31; 1 Chr. 10); DAVID (2 Sam. 1 to 1 Ki. 1; 1 Chr. 11-29); SOLOMON (1 Ki. 1-11; 1 Chr. 28-2 Chr. 9); later kings of Israel and Judah (1 Ki. 12 to 2 Ki. 25; 2 Chr. 10-36). The books of Ezra, Nehemiah, and Esther deal with kings of PERSIA.

The prophets refer to kings of Judah and other nations. JOB reflects that in death all are equal with kings (Job 3:14); that God debases kings (12:18); ELIPHAZ observes that trouble and anguish overwhelm a man like a king prepared for attack (15:24); BILDAD says that the wicked are “marched off to the king of terrors” (18:14); Job remembers that in prosperity he was like a king (29:25); ELIHU thinks of the fear inspired by a king (34:18) and says that God sets LEVIATHAN as a “king over all that are proud” (41:34). Psalm 2 contrasts the messianic king (2:6) with kings of the earth (2:2, 10). Some references in the book of Psalms are to human kings (Ps. 20:9; 21:1, 7; 33:16; 63:11; 68:12, 14, 29; 72:10-11; 76:12; 89:27; 102:15; 105:14, 20, 30; 110:5; 119:46; 135:10-11; 136:17-20; 138:4; 144:10; 148:11; 149:8), some to God as king (Ps. 5:2; 10:16; 18:50; 145:1; 149:2). Psalm 24 acclaims the Lord as king of glory. Psalm 45 may have been a marriage song for King Solomon, but its language well suits a messianic interpretation.

Proverbs contains maxims for a king's conduct (e.g., Prov. 31:1-9). Ecclesiastes and the Song of Songs view a king's life from the inside. Isaiah develops the concept of a messianic king (Isa. 32:1; 33:17) identified with the Lord (33:22; 42:21; 43:15; 44:6). Jeremiah refers to God as king (Jer. 8:19; 10:7, 10; 46:18; 48:15; 51:57) and to the messianic king (23:5). Ezekiel refers to the Davidic king of restored Israel whom the context shows to be messianic (Ezek. 37:22, 24). The messianic king enters Jerusalem riding on a colt (Zech. 9:9), and God is king (14:9, 16-17; Mal. 1:14). NEBUCHADNEZZAR praises the king of heaven (Dan. 4:37).

The Gospels speak of kings in general (Matt. 10:18; 11:8; 17:25; 18:23; 22:2, 7, 11, 13; Mk. 13:9; Lk. 10:24; 14:31; 21:12; 22:25) and in particular: Herod the Great (Matt. 2:1, 3, 9; Lk. 1:5); Herod Antipas (Matt. 14:9; Mk. 6:14, 22-27); David (Matt. 1:6); the messianic king of the Jews (Matt. 2:2; 21:5; 25:34, 40; 27:11, 29, 37, 42; Mk. 15:2, 9, 12, 18, 26, 32; Lk. 19:38; 23:2-3, 37-38; Jn. 1:49; 6:15; 12:13, 15; 18:37, 39; 19:3-21); and God (Matt. 5:35). References in Acts are to earthly kings, except Acts 17:7, which refers to Jesus. A few references in the Epistles are to earthly kings; one is to God (1 Tim. 1:17; cf. 6:15). In Revelation, besides earthly kings, reigning and prophesied, Jesus Christ is introduced as prince (ruler) of the kings of the earth (1:5), who made us kings (1:6; 5:10 KJV; cf. 1 Pet. 2:9). The king of the apocalyptic locusts (Rev. 9:11) is the angel of the bottomless pit. God is king (15:3) and the Lamb is king of kings (17:14).

A king sits on a throne, holds a scepter (Ps. 45:6), wears a crown (2 Ki. 11:12), lives in a palace (1 Chr. 29:1), and rides in a royal chariot (1 Sam. 8:11). From a few military and civil officers for city-kings and for Saul, the royal bureaucracy rapidly expanded (1 Sam. 8:10-18) to the dimensions of David's (2 Sam. 23:8-39; 1 Chr. 11:10, 47) and Solomon's (1 Ki. 9:22; 4:1-28; 2 Chr. 8:9-10) establishments. Yet Solomon judged comparatively trivial cases (1 Ki. 3:16-28); Ahab shared the personal oversight of his cattle (1 Ki. 18:5-6). The Persian monarchy was a vast empire (Esth. 1:1). Kings frequently met death by assassination. Among God's chosen people a rightful king was designated by God and anointed by his representative (1 Sam. 9:15-16; 16:1-13) with the approval of the people. He ruled by virtue of a COVENANT between God and his people, to which the king was a party (2 Sam. 7). This covenant was extended and renewed as the basis of the NT KINGDOM OF GOD or of heaven, of which Jesus is sovereign until at the RESURRECTION he delivers the kingdom to his Father (1 Cor. 15:24-28).

kingdom of God (of heaven). In contemporary English, the word kingdom most commonly refers to the realm or territorial unit over which a monarch reigns, including the people that are under the monarch's rule. Earlier, however, the word could also mean "kingship"—that is, the reign or rule itself—and this is the predominant sense of Greek basileia G993 in the expression "the kingdom of God."

In some passages there is indeed reference to the realm in which God's reign is experienced. It is a realm introduced after the ministry of JOHN THE BAPTIST; people enter it with fierce determination (Lk. 16:16). John himself did not stand within this new realm but only on its threshold; but so great are the blessings of God's kingdom that the least in it is greater than John (Matt. 11:11). Jesus offered the kingdom to ISRAEL, for they were its proper heirs (8:12); but the religious leaders, followed by most of the people, not only refused to enter its blessings but tried to prevent others from entering (23:13). Nevertheless, many tax collectors and prostitutes did enter the kingdom (21:31; see also Col. 1:13). In all of these verses, the kingdom is a present realm where people may enjoy the blessings of God's rule. Elsewhere the kingdom is a future realm inaugurated by the return of Christ. The righteous will inherit this kingdom (Matt. 25:34) and will shine like the sun in God's kingdom (13:43). Entrance into this future kingdom is synonymous with entering the eternal life of the age to come (Matt. 19:16, 23-30; Mk. 10:30). See ESCHATOLOGY. Moreover, the kingdom of God is sometimes identified with the people within that realm, namely, those who submit to his rule and share his reign. Thus in Rev. 1:6 and 5:10, the redeemed are called "a kingdom" (cf. Exod. 19:6).

Fundamentally, however, the kingdom of God is his sovereign activity as King in saving sinners and overcoming evil. The “abstract” meaning of the Greek word basileia can be seen, for example, in Rev. 17:17, which states that the ten kings of the earth (cf. v. 12) “give their kingdom unto the beast” (KJV); the NIV translates more clearly and appropriately, “give the beast their power to rule.” Many passages that speak of the kingdom of God clearly have this sense in view. Only those who “receive the kingdom of God,” that is, accept God’s rule here and now, enter into the realm of its blessings in the future (Mk. 10:15). When we seek God’s kingdom and righteousness, we seek God’s rule in our lives (Matt. 6:33).

God’s kingdom is, of course, not merely an abstract rule, but rather a dynamic force manifested in Christ to destroy his (spiritual) enemies and to bring to men and women the blessings of God’s reign. Christ must reign as King until he has destroyed all enemies, the last of which is death, and he will then deliver the kingdom to God (1 Cor. 15:24-26). Jesus claimed that his ability to cast out demons was evidence that the kingdom of God had come among people (Matt. 12:28). Furthermore, he said that no one could enter a strong man’s house (SATAN’s realm) and take away his goods (deliver demon-possessed men and women) “unless he first ties up the strong man” (12:29). By this metaphor of binding, Jesus asserts that the kingdom of God has come among human beings to break Satan’s power and deliver men and women from satanic bondage.

Thus, the kingdom of God—his redemptive rule—has come into history in the person of Christ to break the power of death and Satan; it will come in power and glory with the return of Christ to complete the destruction of these enemies. Because of this present victory of God’s rule, we may enter the realm of its blessings in the present, yet look forward to greater blessings when Christ comes again.

In the modern history of biblical interpretation, several differing views of the kingdom of God have been proposed. (1) Classical Liberalism, as formulated especially by Adolf von Harnack at the beginning of the twentieth century, viewed the kingdom as the essence of ideal religion and altogether a present subjective and spiritual reality, having to do with the individual soul and its relation to God. (2) Albert Schweitzer held to an interpretation known as consistent (thoroughgoing) eschatology; in his view, the kingdom of God was not a present spiritual reality. On the contrary, Jesus taught, according to Schweitzer, that (a) the kingdom was altogether a future eschatological reality that would come by a miraculous divine inbreaking to terminate human history and establish the kingdom; (b) this apocalyptic kingdom was to come immediately, so Jesus’ mission was to announce the imminent end of the world and to prepare people for the impending day of judgment. (3) C. H. Dodd has reinterpreted eschatological terminology so that it no longer refers to the “last things” at the end of the age but to the “ultimate” realities experienced in Christ. The kingdom of God is then the eternal that has broken into time in Christ. This view has come to be known as realized eschatology. (4) Inaugurated eschatology is a mediating view between Schweitzer and Dodd. The kingdom of God is indeed being realized in the present, but there must also be an eschatological consummation. Many scholars follow Schweitzer in holding that Jesus expected an immediate end of the world but modify Schweitzer’s view by recognizing that in some sense the kingdom was also present in the person of Jesus. They hold that Jesus was right in the basic structure but wrong in the time of the coming of the kingdom.

Most schools of interpretation—liberal and conservative—believe that God’s present reign through Christ in this world has implications for the poor—both the spiritually and the materially poor. This recognition has been a cause of the rise of Liberation Theology (in various forms), which is often the expression of the belief that if God is truly king he must be concerned about the deprived and despised peoples of the world (see Lk. 4:18-19).

The importance of the gospel of the kingdom of God for evangelism and social and political service is recognized in conservative circles. There is, however, a debate as to the meaning of the millennium and its relation to the kingdom of God. (1) Classical premillennialism teaches that the kingdom of God has to do primarily with REDEMPTION. The kingdom was offered to Israel; but when it was rejected, its blessings were given to “a people who will produce its fruit” (Matt. 21:43), that is, the CHURCH (which is “a holy nation,” 1 Pet. 2:9). The kingdom now works in the world through the church, bringing to all who will receive it the blessings of God’s rule. The return of Christ is necessary for the final defeat of the enemies of God’s kingdom and will involve two stages: (a) the millennium, or 1,000 year period (Rev. 20:1-6), when the glory of Christ’s reign will be manifested in history and human society, and (b) the age to come with its new heavens and new earth (2 Pet. 3:12-13; Rev. 21:1). Israel, which is still a “holy people” (Rom. 11:16), is yet to be saved and brought into the blessings of the kingdom, but that will occur in terms of NT redemption rather than the OT economy. This view accepts the basic premise that the OT prophecies are to be interpreted in terms of the NT teaching.

(2) Dispensational premillennialism looks to the OT for its definition of the kingdom. The kingdom of God is theocratic, not soteriological. It is the earthly Davidic (millennial) kingdom destined primarily for Israel. It does not have to do chiefly with the church nor with the redemptive blessings brought into the world by Christ; rather, it concerns the earthly national blessings promised to Israel. This view believes that God has two plans that must be kept separate—an earthly national plan for Israel (theocratic) and a spiritual redemptive plan for the church (soteriological). The kingdom has to do with the former, not with the latter. Recently, however, many scholars who identify themselves as dispensationalists have modified these views in a more moderate direction.

(3) Amillennialism views the thousand-year reign of Rev. 20 as a reference to the church age, that is, an extended period during which Satan's power over the nations is restrained so that the gospel reaches the whole world. According to this view, the kingdom is God's redemptive rule in Christ working in the world through the church. It will come to its consummation with the second coming of Christ to inaugurate the age to come. Most amillennialists deny that Israel as a nation has any future but rather focus on the church as the new Israel, which has experienced the fulfillment of the OT prophecies in spiritual terms.

(4) Postmillennialism sees the millennium as a future period when revealed truth will be diffused throughout the world and accepted by the vast majority; however, it will be established through means presently operative, so that its beginning is imperceptible. Thus the kingdom is the reign of God in Christ through the church, destined to conquer all the world and to establish God's reign in all human society through the triumphant preaching of the gospel. Only after this Golden Age will Christ return for the final judgment and the resurrection of the dead to inaugurate the age to come.

kingdom of heaven. This expression occurs only in the Gospel of Matthew, which uses it more than thirty times (Matt. 3:2 et al.), in contrast to KINGDOM OF GOD, which occurs only five times in this book. Some have thought that the two phrases should be distinguished in meaning, but Matthew often uses "kingdom of heaven" in the same contexts where Mark or Luke have "kingdom of God" (e.g., Matt. 5:3 = Lk. 6:20), and so most scholars regard them as synonymous. Many believe that Matthew's use reflects the Jewish custom of avoiding the name "God" by replacing it with some other term, such as "heaven."

Kings, Books of. These books cover almost 400 years of Israelite kings, from SOLOMON in the tenth century B.C. to JEHOIACHIN in the sixth. They thus provide a sequel to the books of SAMUEL, which cover the reigns of SAUL and DAVID. The title derives from the Hebrew Bible (mēlākîm), where they are the last two books in the section known as the Former Prophets (Joshua, Judges, 1-2 Samuel, 1-2 Kings). Originally, the narrative formed only one book. The division between 1 and 2 Kings first appears in the SEPTUAGINT (where 1-2 Samuel and 1-2 Kings are entitled 1-4 Kingdoms or Reigns). Though regarded as “historical books” in the English Bible, the books of Samuel and Kings possess an essentially prophetic character, employing the events of past history as a vehicle for contemporary preaching (cf. Dan. 9:6). Thus, even as ISAIAH scanned the future to motivate his people’s obedience (Isa. 1:19-20), so the anonymous author of Kings drove home lessons, born of previous disasters, “because they had not obeyed the LORD their God” (2 Ki. 18:12).

This proto-Aeolic limestone capital, discovered in Jerusalem (Area G), may date to the time of King Solomon.

The date of composition is not specified; but the author refers repeatedly to conditions that continued to exist in his day (e.g., the presence of the ARK OF THE COVENANT within the TEMPLE, 1 Ki. 8:8; cf. 9:21; 12:19), indicating that he wrote prior to the destruction of JUDAH in 586 B.C. (2 Ki. 8:22; 16:6; 17:41 are less definite). Even had he drawn on earlier sources (see below), an exilic writer would hardly have penned such words. References to the EXILE (1 Ki. 9:7-9; 2 Ki. 20:17-18; 21:14; 22:19-20) fail to invalidate this conclusion, for these are in fact threatening predictions. First Kings 4:24 indeed speaks of the western FERTILE CRESCENT as “west of the River,” but this phrase had become stereotyped during Assyrian times and does not require Babylonian composition. Numerous stylistic parallels exist between the sermonic portions of 2 Ki. 17 and 21 and the writings of JEREMIAH. The whole book, moreover, breathes the spirit of JOSIAH’s reform of 621 B.C. Thus, the prophet Jeremiah may well have composed 1 and 2 Kings, in his youthful enthusiasm for the Josianic reformation (Jer. 11:8; cf. Isaiah’s similar authorship of a biography of UZZIAH, 2 Chr. 26:22).

Yet the climactic eulogy of Josiah speaks of the fact that the kings before or after him did not turn to the Lord in like manner (2 Ki. 23:25), and the passage goes on to assume the exile (v. 26, as does 24:3-4). Moreover, 2 Kings: 25:6-7 describes the captivity, and 25:27-30, though without awareness of the return in 538 B.C., speaks of events in BABYLON from 561 down to the death of Jehoiachin (Jer. 52:34). It would appear, therefore, that the final two and a half chapters of 2 Kings (from 23:25b on) plus the total years of Josiah’s reign in 22:1 must have been added, in Babylon, over half a century after the earlier writing. Talmudic tradition attributes the entire work to Jeremiah (b. Baba Bathra 15a); but Jeremiah seems to have died in EGYPT, shortly after 586 (Jer. 42-44). It has been suggested that Jeremiah in old age might have been taken to Babylon by NEBUCHADNEZZAR, after his campaign against Egypt in 586. A more plausible approach, however, would be to suggest that a later Babylonian prophet, such as EZEKIEL, supplemented Jeremiah’s work.

In compiling the books of Kings, the writer(s) utilized written sources: “The book of the annals of Solomon” (1 Ki. 11:41) and “the book of the annals of the kings of Israel” (14:19; 15:31) and “Judah” (14:29; 15:7). These chronicles (not to be confused with the canonical books of CHRONICLES, written in postexilic days) were probably based on court annals, but their contents went beyond what would have appeared in the official records (2 Ki. 15:15; 21:17). According to 2 Chr. 32:32, the events of Hezekiah’s reign were recorded in both “the vision of the prophet Isaiah” and “the book of the kings of Judah and Israel” (cf. Isa. 36—38:8; 38:21—39:8; with 2 Ki. 18:13, 17—20:19). Other unidentified sources seemingly provided the detailed biographies of ELIJAH and ELISHA (1 Ki. 17:1—2 Ki. 8:15), plus other prophetic narratives.

Overview of 1-2 KINGS

Author: Unknown.

Historical setting: Covers the period from the death of DAVID (c. 970 B.C.) to the fall of JERUSALEM (586 B.C.). The work was probably completed during the period of Babylonian EXILE, around the middle of the sixth century B.C.

Purpose: To provide a historical-theological account of the reign of SOLOMON, the division of the kingdom, and the decline of both ISRAEL and JUDAH; to show that the exile was a righteous divine judgment; and to bring the nation back to REPENTANCE.

Contents: The transition from David to Solomon (1 Ki. 1:1—2:12); consolidation of Solomon's rule and evidence of his wisdom (1 Ki. 2:13—4:34); the building of the TEMPLE (1 Ki. 5:1—9:25); international involvements and decline of Solomon's reign (1 Ki. 9:26—11:43); division of the kingdom—REHOBAM and JEROBOAM (1 Ki. 12-14); various kings of Judah and Israel, with emphasis on King AHAB and the prophet ELIJAH (1 Ki. 15:1—2 Ki. 1:18); decline and fall of Israel, with emphasis on the prophet ELISHA, and with attention to the kings of Judah (2 Ki. 2:1—17:41); from HEZEKIAH of Judah to the exile (2 Ki. 18:1—25:30).

Recognition of this “two-stage” composition, however, in no way supports the current negative criticism of Kings, divided throughout into conflicting strata similar to those of “JEDP” in the PENTATEUCH. The preexilic stratum, such views allege, was produced by the same prophetic group that “discovered” DEUTERONOMY in 621 B.C. and is said to be characterized by a tolerance of pre-Solomonic high places (1 Ki. 3:4), by faith in the unconquerability of Judah (2 Ki. 8:19), and by antagonism against northern Israel (17:21-23). The exilic stratum is then said to manifest opposite attitudes (1 Ki. 3:3; 9:6-9; 12:24). But Solomon actually conducted legitimate worship at no high place or shrine outside of JERUSALEM (1 Ki. 3:15), other than at GIBEON, where rested the Mosaic TABERNACLE (1 Chr. 16:39; 21:29); the northern kingdom obviously possessed both commendable and evil features; and the preservation of Judah never appears as more than temporary (2 Ki. 20:19; 22:20).

The teachings of the books of Kings are, however, undeniably “deuteronomistic.” But since Deuteronomy-like phrases appear as often in the quoted words of David as they do in the author’s own comments, an unprejudiced explanation must be sought, not in theories of wholesale Josianic forgeries, but rather in the fact of the Mosaic authenticity of Deuteronomy, on which the lives and words of Judah’s pious monarchs (cf. Josh. 1:7-8) were consciously patterned. For Kings constitutes more than bare history (cf. its relative neglect of the politically significant reigns of OMRI and JEROBOAM II). A key to its theological aims appears in David’s opening admonition: “... observe what the Lord your God requires...as written in the Law of Moses, so that you may prosper in all you do” (1 Ki. 2:3; cf. 3:14; 2 Sam. 7:14). Divine retribution is then traced through the history of Solomon (1 Ki. 1-11); the divided kingdoms (treated synchronously in 1 Ki. 12—2 Ki. 17); and through the history of surviving Judah (2 Ki. 18-25). Accordingly, punishment is meted out to sinful Israel (17:7-23) and Judah (23:26-27; 24:1-4), but rewards are also given the righteous in both the northern (1 Ki. 21:29) and southern (2 Ki. 22:19-20) kingdoms. Hope is even extended into the exile (25:27-30). Some may disparage the validity of this doctrine but, while admitting that many human acts do not find immediate retribution, particularly now when God deals less directly with his people, evangelical Christianity yet proclaims as fundamental to the gospel of redemption the holy theology of Kings, that “a man reaps what he sows” (Gal. 6:7).

king’s dale. See KING’S VALLEY.

king’s garden. When the Babylonians laid siege to JERUSALEM and broke through the city wall, King ZEDEKIAH and his army fled, leaving “the city at night by way of the king’s garden, through the gate between the two walls” (Jer. 39:4; cf. 52:7 and 2 Ki. 25:4). This garden may have been watered by the overflow from the Pool of SILOAM, near which it was located (Neh. 3:15).

King’s Gate. The name of a gate on the eastern side of the TEMPLE where a certain Shallum, chief of a group of postexilic gatekeepers, was stationed (1 Chr. 9:17-18; prob. the whole group was stationed there). See SHALLUM #8. Nothing else is known about this gate.

The King's Highway.

A modern road in the Kingdom of Jordan follows the same route taken by the king's highway through Wadi Wala. (View to the S.)

king's highway. (Often capitalized.) An important road running N – S from DAMASCUS to the Gulf of AQABAH, E of the DEAD SEA and the JORDAN Valley. MOSES requested permission to use this route for passing through the territory of EDMON (Num. 20:17) and of the AMORITE king SIHON (21:22; cf. Deut. 2:27), promising to keep strictly to the highway. It was one of the essential caravan routes in international commerce. It ran through BASHAN (cf. Num. 21:33), GILEAD, AMMON, MOAB, and Edom, and connected with roads across the NEGEV leading into Egypt.

This route of travel is known to have existed well before 2000 B.C., for a number of Bronze Age fortresses have been discovered along its line. The invasion of KEDORLAOMER and his allies apparently followed it (Gen. 14:5-6); control of this road probably lay behind the invasion.

King's Pool. A reservoir in JERUSALEM located near the FOUNTAIN GATE (Neh. 2:14). It is thought to be an alternate designation for the Pool of SILOAM, built by King HEZEKIAH.

King's Valley. KJV “king's dale.” A broad valley in which the king of SODOM met ABRAHAM (Gen. 14:17). Identical with the Valley of SHAVEH, it was evidently near SALEM, the city of which MELCHIZEDEK was king. Here too ABSALOM set up a pillar or monument (2 Sam. 18:18). The location is uncertain, but it may have been S of JERUSALEM, at the juncture of the HINNON and KIDRON Valleys.

Kinnereth. kin'uh-reth (Heb. kinneret H4055, perhaps “lyre”; sometimes in the pl. forms kinārôt H4054 and kinrôt H4054). Also Chinnereth. (1) A fortified town within the tribal territory of NAPHTALI (Josh. 19:35), identified with modern Khirbet el-Oreimeh, on the NW shore of the Sea of GALILEE. When BEN-HADAD invaded Israel, “all Kinnereth” was one of the places he conquered (1 Ki. 15:20; KJV, “Cinneroth”; NRSV, “Chinneroth”). The small plain in that area is referred to as GENNESARET in the NT (Matt. 14:34; Mk. 6:53).

(2) The Sea of Kinnereth is an old name applied to the Sea of Galilee (Num. 34:11; Josh. 12:3 [KJV, NRSV, “Chinneroth”]; 13:27). In two passages (Deut. 3:17; Josh 11:2 [KJV, NRSV, “Chinneroth”]), the name Kinnereth may be an abbreviation for Sea of Kinnereth; otherwise, it refers to the town that gave the lake its name (see above, #1) or to the general area. Some have speculated that the name (if it is related to kinnôr H4036, “lyre, harp”) may be derived from the shape of the lake itself or from the likelihood that shepherds played lyres in that area. See also GALILEE, SEA OF.

kinsman. This English term is used sometimes in the KJV and other Bible versions in the general sense of “relative” (e.g., Lk. 14:12) or “compatriot” (e.g., Rom. 16:7). However, when it translates Hebrew gō ʾēl, it has the more specific sense of a close relative who has a right and responsibility to redeem or avenge. In such a context, the NIV uses the rendering “kinsman-redeemer,” while the TNIV has “family guardian” (e.g., Ruth 3:9). See AVENGER.

Kios. ki'os (Gk. Chios G5944). Also Chios, Khios. A large island in the Aegean Sea, about 30 mi. (50 km.) long N to S and varying in width from 8 to 10 mi. (13-16 km.). It is separated from the coast of ASIA MINOR by a narrow channel. The island is generally rocky and unproductive, but its wines and gum mastic have been a source of trade in ancient and modern times. Kios was the reputed home of the poet Homer and had a distinguished literary and artistic tradition. The ship on which PAUL sailed from TROAS to PATARA passed through the channel between Kios and the mainland before turning SE toward SAMOS (Acts 20:15).

Kir. kihr' (Heb. qîr H7817, “wall”). (1) The place to which TIGLAT-PILESER, king of ASSYRIA, carried the captives of DAMASCUS (2 Ki. 16:9). AMOS had prophesied that this would happen (Amos 1:5). Apparently Kir (or Qir) had been the place of origin of the ARAMEANS in their ancient history, and their departure from Kir is compared in Scripture to God’s bringing the Israelites from Egypt and the PHILISTINES from CAPHTOR (Crete; Amos 9:7). Kir is also mentioned, together with ELAM, in connection with the Valley of Vision in Isa. 22:6 (though some have doubted that this is the same place). The location of Kir is not known; it was probably in the area of the TIGRIS River in S Babylonia.

(2) A Moabite city mentioned in parallel with AR (Isa. 15:1). Often referred to as Kir of MOAB, this city is probably the same as KIR HARESETH.

Kir-haraseth. See KIR HARESETH.

Kir Hareseth. kihr-hair'uh-seth (Heb. qîr ḥārešet H7819 and qîr-ḥereś H7818, “wall of pottery”). Also Kir-haraseth. An important city in MOAB, apparently its capital at the time of King MESHA. When Mesha rebelled against King Joram of ISRAEL (see JEHOAM #2), JEHOASHAPHAT king of JUDAH and the king of EDOM joined Israel in attacking the Moabites and destroying their towns (2 Ki. 3). “Only Kir Hareseth was left with its stones in place, but men armed with slings surrounded it and attacked it as well” (v. 25). Years later ISAIAH, in his oracles against Moab, prophesied that Kir (prob. a reference to Kir Hareseth) would again be ruined (Isa. 15:1; 16:7, 11 [KJV, “Kir-haresh”; NRSV, “Kir-heres”]). Kir Hareseth is to be identified with el-Kerak, some 10 mi. (16 km.) E of the S part of the DEAD SEA. From ancient times it was a place of great importance in that area, easily defensible, being on a high place, with the sides of the mountain sloping steeply all around it. Located on the famous KING'S HIGHWAY from SYRIA to EGYPT, Kir Hareseth dominated the ancient caravan routes.

Kir-haresh, Kir-heres. See KIR HARESETH.

Kiriath. kihr´ee-ath (Heb. qiryat H7956, “city”). KJV Kirjath. A town within the tribal territory of BENJAMIN (Josh. 18:28). See KIRIATH JEARIM.

Kiriathaim. kihr´ee-uh-thay´im (Heb. qiryātayim H7964, “[twin] cities”). KJV also Kirjathaim. (1) A city built by the tribe of REUBEN in their territory (Num. 32:37; Josh. 13:19). Later it fell into the hands of MOAB, who rebuilt it (as recorded in the MOABITE STONE), and was condemned to judgment by God (Jer. 48:1, 23; Ezek. 25:9). It is possibly to be identified with Qaryat el-Mekhaiyet, about 9 mi. (14 km.) E of the DEAD SEA and the same distance N of the ARNON River.

(2) A town within the tribal territory of NAPHTALI, assigned to the LEVITES descended from GERSHON (1 Chr. 6:76). See KARTAN.

Kiriath Arba. kihr´ee-ath-ahr´buh (Heb. qiryat ʿarba H7957 and qiryat hā ʿarba H7959, “city of Arba” or “fourfold city”). KJV also Kirjath-arba. Ancient name of HEBRON, used again after the EXILE. It first appears in the patriarchal narratives as the place where ABRAHAM and ISAAC stayed and where SARAH died (Gen. 23:2; 35:27). It also occurs several times in Joshua, as well as in Jdg. 1:10 and Neh. 11:25. In several passages the name is associated with a certain ARBA, said to be the ancestor of the ANAKITES (Josh. 14:15; 15:13; 21:11).

Kiriatharim. See KIRIATH JEARIM.

Kiriath Baal. kihr´ee-ath-bay´uhl (Heb. qiryat-baʿal H7958, “city of the lord”). KJV Kirjath-baal. Older name of KIRIATH JEARIM (Josh. 15:50; 18:14).

Kiriath Huzoth. kihr´ee-ath-hyoo´zoth (Heb. qiryat ḥuṣôṭ H7960, “city of streets” or “city of open spaces”). KJV Kirjath-huzoth. A Moabite city where BALAK and BALAAM went on their way to BAMOTH BAAL (Num. 22:39). Its location is unknown, but it was probably not far from DIBON #2.

Kiriath Jearim. kihr´ee-ath-jee´uh-rim (Heb. qiryat yē-ārîm H7961 [qiryat ārîm in Ezra 2:25, prob. by scribal mistake; cf. Neh. 7:29], “city of forests”). KJV Kirjath-jearim (in Ezra 2:25, Kirjatharim; NRSV, Kiriatharim). A city of the GIBEONITES that was later on the border between the tribes of JUDAH and BENJAMIN, to which it was later assigned. It was evidently the site of a pre-Israelite shrine to BAAL, as indicated by its alternate names in the Bible: KIRIATH BAAL (Josh. 15:60; 18:14), BAALAH (Josh. 15:9), and BAAL OF JUDAH (2 Sam. 6:2; cf. 1 Chr. 13:6). The Danites, seeking a new home, encamped W of it in Judah at MAHANEH DAN (Jdg. 18:12). When the ARK OF THE COVENANT was returned by the PHILISTINES, the people of BETH SHEMESH brought it to Kiriath Jearim (1 Sam. 6:21; 7:1-2); it remained here twenty years until DAVID brought it up to JERUSALEM (1 Chr. 13:5-6; 2 Chr. 1:4). People from Kiriath Jearim were among the returning exiles (Neh. 7:29; Ezra 2:25). The town is generally identified with modern Abu Ghosh, 8.5 mi. (13.5 km.) WNW of Jerusalem, though the more precise site of the biblical period is Deir el-ʿAzar, an imposing tell or mound upon which stands the Church of the Ark of the Covenant.

Kiriath Sannah. kihr´ee-ath-san´uh (Heb. qiryat-sannâ H7962, “city of Sannah” [?]). Alternate name of Debir (Josh. 15:49). Possibly a textual corruption for qiryat-sōpēr (“city of the scribe[s]”). See DEBIR (PLACE) #1; KIRIATH SEPHER.

Kiriath Sepher. kihr´ee-ath-see´fuhr (Heb. qiryat-sēper H7963, “city of book[s]”). Earlier name of Debir (Josh. 15:15-16; Jdg. 1:11-12). See DEBIR (PLACE) #1; KIRIATH SANNAH.

Kirjath. kihr´jath. KJV form of KIRIATH. See also KIRIATHAIM, KIRIATH ARBA, etc.

Kish. kish (Heb. qîš H7821, possibly “gift”). (1) Son (or grandson) of ABIEL, descendant of BENJAMIN, and father of SAUL, who was the first king of ISRAEL. In 1 Sam. 9:1, Kish is identified as the son of Abiel, but in 1 Chr. 8:33 and 9:39, Kish is listed as the son of NER. The Hebrew of 1 Sam. 14:50-51, however, can be understood to mean that both Ner and Kish were sons of Abiel (cf. NIV). In that case, Ner would be the uncle of Saul (cf. v. 50 NIV), and Saul and ABNER would be cousins. This view necessitates either the altering of the text of 1 Chr. 8:33 and 9:39 or understanding Ner in those verses as a different individual, namely, a more remote ancestor of Kish. At any rate, Kish was a wealthy man (1 Sam. 9:1). One day his donkeys went astray, and Saul was sent to find them (9:3); it was through this incident that Saul met SAMUEL and was anointed by him the first king of Israel (10:1). Kish was buried in Zela in the land of Benjamin (2 Sam. 21:14). He is mentioned once in the NT (Acts 13:21).

(2) Son of JEIEL of GIBEON and descendant of Benjamin (1 Chr. 8:30; 9:36). Many believe that Jeiel is to be identified with ABIEL; if so, this Kish is the same as #1 above.

(3) Son of Mahli and descendant of LEVI through MERARI (1 Chr. 23:21-22). His sons married his brother's daughters. One of his sons was named Jerahmeel (24:29).

(4) Son of Abdi and descendant of LEVI through MERARI; he lived in the days of King HEZEKIAH and, as one of the priests, was chosen to cleanse the house of the Lord (2 Chr. 29:12).

(5) Ancestor of MORDECAI, the cousin of ESTHER, and descendant of Benjamin (Esth. 2:5). He was among those exiled from Jerusalem by NEBUCHADNEZZAR (v. 6).

Kishi. kish'î (Heb. qîšî H7823, perhaps "gift"). Son of Abdi, descendant of LEVI through MERARI, and father of the musician ETHAN (1 Chr. 6:44; called KUSHAIAH in 15:17).

Kishion. kish'ee-uhn (Heb. qîšyôn H8002, meaning uncertain). A town within the tribal territory of ISSACHAR (Josh. 19:20), assigned to the LEVITES descended from GERSHON (21:28; KJV, "Kishon"). Proposed identifications include Tell el-Muqarqash, about 4 mi. (6 km.) SE of Mount TABOR, and el-Khirba (Khirbet Qasyun, Tel Qishyon), near the S slope of the same mountain. See also KEDESH #3.

Kishon River. ki'shon (Heb. qîšôn H7822, meaning unknown). A WADI that drains the ESDRAELON Valley E to NW; it is mentioned in connection with DEBORAH (Jdg. 4:7, 13; 5:21; Ps. 83:9) and ELIJAH (1 Ki. 18:40). (Note also that the KJV uses "Kishon" once as an alternate form of KISHION [Josh. 21:28].) The stream flows from sources on Mount TABOR and Mount GILBOA westward through Esdraelon and enters the Bay of Acre (ACCO) N of Mount CARMEL. In winter it becomes a raging torrent, which subsides into pools that are soon drained off for irrigation, except that the last few miles are fed from the slopes of Mount Carmel and by tributaries from the north. It is treacherous to cross except at fords carefully chosen. Along the banks of the River Kishon, DEBORAH the prophetess and BARAK led Israel to victory over the Canaanite hosts of JABIN, under their commander SISERA (Jdg. 4-5). The heavily armed soldiers and chariots that were not cut down by the pursuing Israelites were swept away by the raging Kishon (Jdg. 5:21; Ps. 83:9 [KJV, “Kison”]). After his contest with the priests of BAAL on Mount Carmel, ELIJAH had the priests brought down to the brook Kishon and killed there (1 Ki. 18:40). The stream is now known as the Nahr el-Muqatta^c.

Kislev. kis’lev (Heb. kislēw H4075, from Akk. kislimu [kisliwu]). Also Chislev; KJV Chisleu. The ninth month (before the winter solstice) in the Hebrew CALENDAR, corresponding to November-December (Neh. 1:1; Zech. 7:1).

Kislon. kis’lon (Heb. kislôn H4077, possibly “sluggish”). Father of ELDAD; the latter was a Benjamite leader appointed to divide the land of Canaan among the tribes (Num. 34:21).

Kisloth Tabor. kis’loth-tay’buhr (Heb. kislôt tābôr H4079, meaning uncertain). Also Chisloth-tabor. A town mentioned in the description of the SE border of the tribe of ZEBULUN (Josh. 19:12); probably the same as KESULLOTH in ISSACHAR (v. 18).

kiss. The Hebrew verb meaning “to kiss” is nāšaq H5975 (Gen. 27:26 and frequently; the cognate noun nēšîqâ H5965 occurs only twice, Prov. 27:6; Cant. 1:2). In the OT, the kiss was a common greeting among male relatives (Gen. 29:13; 33:4; 45:15; Exod. 4:27; 18:7; 2 Sam. 14:33), male and female relatives (Gen. 29:11; 31:28), in farewell (Gen. 31:55; Ruth 1:9, 14), and before death (Gen. 50:1). The kiss had a more formal character in connection with a blessing (Gen. 27:26-27; 48:10) or the anointing of a king (1 Sam. 10:1). Friends kissed (1 Sam. 20:41; 2 Sam. 19:39). The act might be a pretense (2 Sam. 15:5; 20:9; Prov. 27:6). Kissing was an act of worship toward heathen gods (1 Ki. 19:18, 20; Job 31:27; Hos. 13:2). The psalmist states that righteousness and peace will “kiss” each other, that is, will unite to bless restored Israel (Ps. 85:10). Kisses may be a lure to illicit love (Prov. 7:13). The kiss in Ps. 2:12 is one of homage to the king’s son. The kiss was generally given on the cheek, forehead, or beard, though a kiss on the lips is sometimes indicated (Prov. 24:26) and is probable (in Cant. 1:2; 8:1).

In the NT, the Greek verb phileō G5797, which usually means “to love, have special affection for,” can also mean “to kiss” (Matt. 26:48 = Mk. 14:44 = Lk. 22:47), but the latter sense is normally conveyed by the compound kataphileō G2968 (Matt. 26:49 et al.); the cognate noun philēma G5799 only means “kiss” (Lk. 7:45a et al.). Once Jesus’ host did not give him this customary greeting, but a sinful woman kissed his feet (Lk. 7:38, 45). The father kissed the returning prodigal (15:20). JUDAS ISCARIOT kissed Jesus as a sign to the temple police (Matt. 26:48-49; Mk. 14:44-45; Lk. 22:47-48). The Ephesian elders kissed PAUL in farewell (Acts 20:37). The kiss was adopted as a formal greeting among believers, called the holy kiss (Rom. 16:16; 1 Cor. 16:20; 2 Cor. 13:12; 1 Thess. 5:26) or kiss of love (1 Pet. 5:14).

kitchen. This English term is used by modern Bible versions to render the Hebrew phrase bêt hambaššêlîm, lit., “house[s] of the ones who boil” (Ezek. 46:24). It refers to four subcourts at the corners of the outer court of EZEKIEL’S ideal TEMPLE where the common people could have their sacrifices boiled at the hearths provided for the purpose. The priests protected themselves from defilement through contact with unconsecrated persons by cooking their offerings in their own kitchens (vv. 19-20).

kite. See BIRDS.

Kithlish. See KITLISH.

Kitlish. kit’lish (Heb. kitlîš H4186, derivation unknown). Also Chitlish, Chithlish, Kithlish. A town in the SHEPHELAH within the tribal territory of JUDAH (Josh. 15:40). Kitlish was in the same district as LACHISH (v. 39), but the precise site is unknown.

Kitron. kit’ron (Heb. qîrôn H7790, possibly “smoke, incense”). A Canaanite town within the tribal territory of ZEBULUN from which the Israelites could not drive out the inhabitants (Jdg. 1:30). Some believe Kitron is the same as KATTATH, but the location is unknown.

Kittim. kit’im (Heb. kittiyyîm H4183, gentilic of kt [a place name attested in Phoenician]). KJV also Chittim. (1) Third son of JAVAN, grandson of JAPHETH, brother of ELISHAH (associated with AEGEAN peoples), TARSHISH (Spain or N Africa?), and RODANIM (Rhodes?) (Gen. 10:4; 1 Chr. 1:7). Many interpret the name as referring to a people group descended from Javan (cf. TNIV, “the Kittites,” and see below, ##2-4).

(2) The island CYPRUS. See separate article.

(3) On occasion the name Kittim, like Javan, is extended to include the W in general, but especially the seafaring western areas. Jeremiah, speaking of the whole world (Jer. 2:10), uses the isles of Kittim to symbolize the far W and KEDAR the far E. BAALAM, forecasting the coming dominance of the W over the ANE (Num. 24:24), tells that the ships of Kittim will afflict Asshur (Mesopotamia) and Eber (the Levant). Daniel apparently uses “ships of Kittim” (Dan. 11:30; NIV, “Ships of the western coastlands”) to represent the Romans, who thwarted ANTIOCHUS IV (Epiphanes) in Egypt in 169 B.C.

(4) The occurrence of numerous references to the Kittim in the DEAD SEA SCROLLS has created considerable scholarly controversy over the correct interpretation. Most scholars have divided over an identification with the Greeks or with the Romans. Perhaps Kittim meant for the Dead Sea Community simply “Westerners” (as #3 above) and could be applied to any particular western people as need arose.

Kittites. kit’tits. TNIV alternate form of KITTIM (Gen. 10:4; 1 Chr. 1:7).

kneading trough. A dish or bowl in which dough was prepared to be made into BREAD (Deut. 28:5, 17). The plague of frogs infested them in Egypt (Exod. 8:3). The Israelites bound their kneading troughs, dough and all, in the bundles of clothing on their backs, when they escaped from Egypt (12:34).

knee, kneel. The ANE custom for public PRAYER was to stand, and so kneeling was confined to acts of obedience and obeisance. The official presentation of children on the father’s knee was a sign legitimizing the child’s legal claim in Israel (Gen. 30:3; 50:23; Job 3:12). The Hebrew term for “knee” is berek H1386 (Gen. 30:3 and often), and the cognate verb bārak H1384 means “to kneel” (only Gen. 24:11; 2 Chr. 6:13; Ps. 95:6). In the NT, the common Greek term gony G1205 (Heb. 12:12 et al.) is used without exception as the noun, and the verb gonypeteō G1206 means specifically, “to kneel down before someone” (Matt. 17:14; 27:29; Mk. 1:40; 10:17). The verbal idea is often conveyed also by the use of the noun in combination with other verbs (Lk. 5:8 et al.). Bowing down became the traditional posture of prayer in the Christian church. It also appears as the posture of dying in the case of STEPHEN's martyrdom (Acts 7:20). PAUL and his converts prayed and said farewell on their knees (20:36), and kneeling is mentioned in Paul's epistles. The apostle uses the conception of kneeling in the figurative sense of submission to the Almighty (Eph. 3:14), where it is his own confession that is foremost, and in the magnificent prophecy of Christ's ultimate triumph when all knees shall bow before the MESSIAH (Phil. 2:10).

knife. A small single-edged or double-edged cutting instrument of stone or metal. In form the knife generally resembled the dagger or short stabbing sword, but was smaller and usually without ornamentation. The usual Hebrew word for “knife” is ma'ākelet H4408 (Gen. 22:6 et al.), but the word for “sword” (ḥereb H2995) is rendered “knife” in Josh. 5:2-3 (cf. also KJV 1 Ki. 18:28; Ezek. 5:1-2). The knife generally had a straight blade 6-10 in. (15-25 cm.) long, although knives with curved blades were known. The handles were made of one piece with the blade, or a wooden handle was fastened to the blade by a tang or by rivets. Knives were used for various purposes. JOSHUA was commanded to use flint knives to circumcise the Israelites (Josh. 5:2-3; cf. Exod. 4:25). The use of flint knives when they were no longer in common domestic use implies an ancient ritual in which their use was still appropriate. Knives or small swords were used by the frenzied priests of BAAL for self-mutilation (1 Ki. 18:28). Animals were killed and skinned with food-cutters. ABRAHAM took one along to sacrifice ISAAC (Gen. 22:6), and the Levite used one to dismember his concubine (Jdg. 19:29). The “scribe’s knife” of Jer. 36:23 (NRSV, “penknife”) was used for trimming and splitting the reed employed in writing.

knop. A small ornamental knob. This word is used by the KJV in Exod. 25:31-36 and 37:17-22, referring to the decorations (knobby fruits or flower buds) of the golden CANDLESTICK or lampstand in the TABERNACLE. Elsewhere it describes the decorations carved on the cedar lining of the walls of Solomon's TEMPLE (1 Ki. 6:18) and around the molten sea (7:24).

knowledge. The sum of what has been perceived or learned, that is, truth or information acquired through experience and education. The Bible frequently commends knowledge and WISDOM (1 Sam. 2:3; Ps. 14:4; 119:66; Prov. 8:10; Isa. 53:11; Jn. 8:32; 1 Cor. 13:12; Col. 1:9; 1 Jn. 5:20). Nowhere does Scripture modify the high value it places on knowledge by deprecating "mere" human reason. Reason and knowledge are integral parts of the IMAGE OF GOD in which human beings were created. Although the Hebrew and Greek verbs for knowing usually bear the most ordinary meaning (e.g., "I don't know who has done this," Gen. 21:26), they can also be used in other senses, some of which are sources of confusion in theology and philosophy. When Ps. 1:6 says that "the Lord knows the way of the righteous, but the way of the wicked will perish" (RSV), it is not reflecting on divine OMNISCIENCE. In the ordinary sense, God knows the way of the wicked as well as he knows everything else. Here the word is used in the sense of approval (cf. NIV, "watches over"). Similarly, when Amos 3:2 says, "You only have I known of all the families of the earth" (RSV), the prophet is not denying that God knew the Egyptians and Canaanites. This verse is no denial of omniscience; here the verb means "to choose, elect" (cf. NIV). See also GNOSTICISM.

knowledge, tree of. See TREE OF KNOWLEDGE.

Koa. koh'uh (Heb. qôa ◦ H7760). An otherwise unknown place (or people) that, along with the Babylonians and others, is named as being among the enemies of JERUSALEM (Ezek. 23:23). Some scholars suggest that the name may refer to the Quti (Gutians), who lived E of the TIGRIS River. If so, the form Koa may be a deliberate distortion.

Kohath. koh'hath (Heb. qêhât H7740 [also qo'hât], meaning unknown; gentilic qêhâtî H7741 [also qo'hâtî], "Kohathite"). Second son of LEVI (Gen. 46:11; Exod. 6:16); he is said to have lived 133 years (6:18). He was the father of AMRAM, IZHER, HEBRON, and UZZIEL (Exod. 6:18; Num. 3:19, 27; 1 Chr. 6:2), who became Kohathite branches of the Levitical families (Num. 3:27). See LEVITE. He was the grandfather, through Amram and his wife JOCHEBED (sister of Kohath), of AARON, MOSES, and MIRIAM (Exod. 6:20; Num. 26:59; 1 Chr. 6:3). The Kohathites were, therefore, the most prominent of the Levitical families. In the wilderness they camped S of the TABERNACLE. Numbering 8,600, on duty they cared for the ark, table, lampstand, altars, and vessels of the sanctuary. These they carried on foot, no wagons being assigned them (Num. 7:8-9). JOSHUA allotted them twenty-three LEVITICAL CITIES (Josh. 21:4-5). Under the monarchy they were prominent (1 Chr. 23:13-20; 24:20-25), especially HEMAN in the service of song (6:33 et al.). They took part in the religious service the day before JEHOSHAPHAT's victory over his allied enemies (2 Chr. 20:19); and they assisted in HEZEKIAH's cleansing of the TEMPLE (29:12-19).

Koheleth. koh-hel'ith. See ECCLESIASTES.

Kolaiah. koh-lay'yuh (Heb. qôlāyâ H7755, possibly "Yahweh has spoken"). (1) Son of Maaseiah, descendant of BENJAMIN, and ancestor of Sallu; the latter was among those who settled in JERUSALEM after the EXILE (Neh. 11:7).

(2) Father of a false prophet named AHAB (Jer. 29:21).

kor. Also cor. See WEIGHTS AND MEASURES.

Korah. kor'uh (Heb. qôrah H7946, "bald [head]"; gentilic qorhî H7948, "Korahite" [KJV also "Korhite" and "Korathite"]; Gk. Kore G3169). (1) Son of ESAU by OHOLIBAMAH (Gen. 36:5, 14, 18; 1 Chr. 1:35).

(2) Son of ELIPHAZ and grandson of ESAU (Gen. 36:16). The parallel passages (Gen. 36:11; 1 Chr. 1:35) omit the name.

(3) Son of IZHAR, grandson of KOHATH, and great-grandson of LEVI (Exod. 6:21, 24). Korah, with 250 leaders of the congregation, rose up against MOSES and AARON, charging them with exalting themselves above the assembly of the Lord (Num. 16:1-3). At the same time, DATHAN and ABIRAM of the tribe of REUBEN rebelled against Moses' leadership, charging him with failure to bring them into the promised land and making himself a prince over the people (vv. 1, 12-14). Moses charged Korah and the LEVITES with seeking the priesthood as well as the ministry of service before the Lord (vv. 8-10). Therefore, he challenged the rebels to meet with him at the Tent of Meeting, each man taking a censer and offering incense before the Lord, that the Lord might show who was holy (vv. 4-9, 16-19). However, Dathan and Abiram refused to meet with Moses (vv. 12-14). Judgment fell against those who rebelled. The earth opened and swallowed up Korah, Dathan, Abiram, and their families, and fire from heaven consumed the 250 leaders offering their incense (vv. 23-35). In the brief account of Num. 26:9-11, it is pointed out that the line of Korah did not come to an end. The Korahites were doorkeepers and musicians in the TABERNACLE and TEMPLE (Exod. 6:24; 1 Chr. 6:22), and they are mentioned in several other passages (1 Chr. 9:19, 31, 12:6; 26:1; 2 Chr. 20:19). A dozen psalms are given the superscription as "of the Sons of Korah" (Ps. 42-49; 84-85; 87-88). It is probable that these psalms originated among this guild of singers and were perhaps sung by them in the worship of the temple.

(4) Son of HEBRON, grandson of CALEB, and descendant of JUDAH (1 Chr. 2:43). Some argue that Korah here is the name of a town.

(5) Five of the men from the tribe of BENJAMIN who joined DAVID at ZIGLAG were called Korahites (1 Chr. 12:6). While it is possible that these were Levites descended from #3 above, some scholars believe that they descended from a different (and otherwise unknown) Korah or that the reference is to a locality in the tribe of Benjamin.

Korathite. See KORAH.

Korazin. kor-ay'zin (Gk. Chorazin G5960). Also Chorazin. A town situated near the Sea of Galilee, denounced by Jesus, and mentioned in the Bible in only one context (Matt. 11:21 = Lk. 10:13). Little is known of Korazin. The site is probably that of Khirbet Kerazeh, on the basalt hills just N of CAPERNAUM, and evidence from the ruins indicates that it was inhabited as early as the later Stone Age. The TALMUD (b. Menahot 85a) mentions the town under the name Kerazim as being famous for its quality of wheat. A synagogue built of the black volcanic rock of the area forms part of the ruins.

Korban. See CORBAN.

Kore. kor´ee (Heb. qōrē ᵐ H7927, “one who calls out, partridge”). (1) Son of Ebiasaph (see ABIASAPH) and descendant of LEVI through KORAH (1 Chr. 9:19; 26:1 [here called son of Asaph]). Two of Kore’s sons or descendants, SHALLUM and MESHELEMLIAH (perhaps also OBED-EDOM, 26:4), were among the gatekeepers of the sanctuary.

(2) Son of Imnah; a LEVITE in the time of HEZEKIAH, he was keeper of the EAST GATE and “in charge of the freewill offerings given to God, distributing the contributions made to the LORD and also the consecrated gifts” (2 Chr. 31:14).

Korhite. See KORAH.

koum. See TALITHA CUM(I).

Koz. koz (Heb. qôš H7766, “thorn”). Also Coz. A man listed among the descendants of JUDAH (1 Chr. 4:8). His place in the genealogy is unclear, but the NIV links this verse with the previous one, making Koz a son of ASHHUR by Helah (see vv. 5, 7).

Kozbi. koz´bi. TNIV form of COZBI.

Kozeba. koh-zee´buh. TNIV form of COZEBA.

Kub. kuhb. See CUB.

Kue. kyoo´ee (Heb. qēwēh H7750, meaning unknown). Also Keveh. A HITTITE kingdom occupying SE ASIA MINOR, corresponding to E CILICIA. Kue is mentioned in various extrabiblical documents. An important trade route crossed this coastal plain, from the Syrian Gates in the Amanus Mountains to the Cilician Gates in the Taurus Range. Iron evidently was imported into SYRIA and BABYLON through Cilicia, but there is no evidence of its actually being mined there. The country was famous in ancient times as a source of the finest horses, many of which were imported by SOLOMON (1 Ki. 10:28; 2 Chr. 1:16; KJV says “linen yarn,” following a Jewish interpretation).

kum. See TALITHA CUM(I).

Kun. koon. TNIV form of C_{UN}.

Kushaiah. koo-shay'yuh (Heb. qûšyāhû H7773, derivation uncertain).
Descendant of LEVI through MERARI, and father of the musician E_{THAN} (1 Chr.
15:17); also called K_{ISHI} (6:44).

Kuthah. kooth'uh. TNIV form of C_{UTHAH}.

L. The symbol used to designate material peculiar to the Gospel of Luke; for some scholars, the symbol represents an independent literary source used by LUKE. See GOSPELS; LUKE, GOSPEL OF.

Laadah. lay´uh-dah (Heb. la ʿdâ H4355, possibly “plump neck”). Son of SHELAH and grandson of JUDAH (1 Chr. 4:21). He is described as the father of MARESHAH (possibly meaning the founder of the town by that name) and of “the clans of the linen workers at Beth Ashbea.”

Laadan. See LADAN.

Laban (person). lay´buhn (Heb. lābān H4238, “white” or “Moon God”). Son of BETHUEL, nephew of ABRAHAM, and brother of REBEKAH (Gen. 24:29; cf. v. 15). The family is described as ARAMEANS from PADDAN ARAM (25:20). Laban lived in HARAN on a tributary of the EUPHRATES River in MESOPOTAMIA. He belonged to that branch of the family of TERAH (Abraham’s father) that came from Abraham’s brother NAHOR and his niece MILCAH (22:22-24), and is first mentioned as Rebekah’s brother when she is introduced (24:29). In ancient Semitic custom, the brother was the guardian of the sister, and thus Laban takes a prominent place in the account of Rebekah’s leaving for Canaan to be Isaac’s bride. His grasping nature is hinted at in Gen. 24:30-31, where his invitation to Abraham’s servant follows immediately after his appraisal of the servant’s expensively equipped party.

Laban’s later history is interwoven with JACOB’S. When Jacob fled from the anger of his brother ESAU, he settled in his uncle Laban’s house in Haran and stayed there twenty years. The relationship between Laban and his nephew is an interesting one. Both appear to be resourceful, often grasping men, each eager to best the other in every transaction. Even in the circumstances surrounding the marriage of Jacob to Laban’s daughters RACHEL and LEAH (Gen. 29), this competition is evident. After Jacob had served fourteen years for his brides, there followed six more years in Haran during which, according to Jacob’s testimony, Laban changed his wages ten times (31:41). The famous contract involving the speckled and spotted sheep (30:31-43) was evidently one of the ten.

At the end of the twenty years, Jacob quietly stole away from Laban, taking his now-large family with him to Canaan (Gen. 31). Pursuing him, Laban overtook him in GILEAD. Following mutual protestations and incriminations, uncle and nephew parted, after erecting a “witness heap”—a kind of dividing line—between them. Laban is here called “the Aramean” (31:24), and he gives the heap an ARAMAIC name (JEGAR SAHADUTHA), while Jacob calls it by its Hebrew equivalent GALEED (31:47-48), both meaning “witness heap.” These Aramaic references are interesting guides in the quest for better understanding of the origins of the PATRIARCHS. In an old confession the Hebrews were taught to say, “My father was a wandering Aramean” (Deut. 26:5). It seems likely that the patriarchal ancestors of the Hebrews sprang from a mixed Semitic stock in NE Mesopotamia, among which the Aramean was a prominent strain.

Laban (place). layˈbuhn (Heb. lābān H4239, “white” or “Moon God”). A city in the area of encampment of ISRAEL, across the JORDAN in the ARABAH (Deut. 1:1). In this area, MOSES spoke to Israel the words contained in DEUTERONOMY, just before his death. It is perhaps the same as LIBNAH, but the location is unknown.

labor. The noun is today confined to the abstract use—the act of laboring (Gen. 31:42; Rom. 16:6). Formerly it expressed also the fruit of labor, as in Exod. 23:16, “When thou hast gathered in thy labours out of the field,” or Jn. 4:38, “Ye are entered into their labours” (both KJV). The word is used also of labor in childbirth (Gen. 35:16 KJV).

In Bible times there was no class of people known as “labor” in contrast with “management.” All but a favored few labored, and hard work was looked on as the common lot of man and a result of the curse (Gen. 3:17-19), a bitter servitude. Slavery was commonly practiced in the Bible world; the conscription of freemen for labor on government building projects was practiced by SOLOMON (1 Ki. 5:13-17) and ASA (15:22).

Although most workers in the simple culture of OT times were what we today would call “unskilled,” there were certain skilled occupations. The potter (Jer. 18) has left behind him unnumbered examples of his skill. Some technology in the working of metals was known. Remains of smelting furnaces have been found. Stone masons, scribes (Ezek. 9:2; Jer. 36:2, 4), dyers, weavers, and workers in precious stones and ivory carried on their work. But in general life was simple, work arduous, hours long, and wages small. “Then man goes out to his work, to his labor until evening” (Ps. 104:23). “So I hated life, because the work that is done under the sun was grievous to me” (Eccl. 2:17). By NT times things had changed, and the more complex civilization of the Roman world, with its skilled and more diversified occupations and better standards of living, had come to Palestine. See also OCCUPATIONS AND PROFESSIONS.

Lachish. lay´kish (Heb. lākîš H4337, meaning unknown). A town within the tribal territory of JUDAH in the foothills of the SHEPHELAH, midway between JERUSALEM and GAZA, some 30 mi. (50 km.) SW of Jerusalem. Lachish had been a Canaanite royal city and later became a Judean border fortress that occupied a strategic valley, the southernmost of the five that transect the Palestinian foothills and connect Judah’s central ridge and the coastal highway leading into EGYPT. First equated with Tell el-Hesi, Lachish has now been identified by written evidence (see below) with Tell ed-Duweir, a 22-acre mound excavated by J. K. Starkey from 1932 until his death by violence in 1938.

Even before 3000 B.C. Lachish was inhabited by chalcolithic cave dwellers, but in about 2700 an Early-Bronze city was constructed on the virgin rock. Following a gap occasioned by invaders of calciform culture (c. 2300), Middle-Bronze La-chish arose, exhibiting cultural and political ties with Middle-Kingdom Egypt (2000-1780). This was succeeded by a Hyksos-type community, which provided Lachish with its first observable fortifications, including the characteristic dry moat, or fosse. An inscribed dagger, dated about 1650, furnishes one of the earliest examples of that acrophonic writing from which all modern alphabets derive, two centuries older than the Sinaitic or the five subsequent Lachish inscriptions. After the expulsion of the Hyksos from Egypt and their defeat in Palestine (c. 1578-1573), a Late-Bronze Canaanite citadel gave at least nominal allegiance to New-Empire Egypt.

Lachish.

Aerial view of Lachish looking E.

The king of Lachish, JAPHIA, joined with ADONI-ZEDEK of Jerusalem in a confederacy against JOSHUA (Josh. 10:3), only to be defeated and executed (10:23-26; 12:11). In Joshua's subsequent sweep through the SW, Israel captured Lachish (reinforced by GEZER) and annihilated its inhabitants, in accordance with MOSES' ban (Deut. 7:2; Josh. 10:31-33). Scripture contains no record, however, of its destruction (cf. Josh. 11:13); and though assigned to Judah (15:39), Lachish must have suffered rapid Canaanite reoccupation, for a Late-Bronze temple constructed in the former fosse exhibits little interruption in its use. A generation later, the AMARNA Letters criticize Lachish for furnishing supplies to the invaders and for overthrowing the Egyptian prefect Zimridi (Letters 287-288). Lachish was burned in about 1230. Some interpreters have tried to associate this conflagration with Joshua's campaign, but the excavators themselves attribute the fall of Lachish to the contemporaneous raids of Pharaoh Merneptah or to attacks by immigrating PHILISTINES.

Lachish was fortified BY Rehoboam shortly after the division of the Hebrew kingdom in 930 B.C. (2 Chr. 11:9); and it was there that King AMAZIAH was murdered in 767 (25:27). The prophet MICAH condemned Lachish's chariots as "the beginning of sin to the Daughter of Zion," perhaps because the city was used as a staging point for the extravagant importation of Egyptian horses (Mic. 1:13; cf. Deut. 17:16; 1 Ki. 10:28-29). In any event, Lachish was successfully besieged by SENNACHERIB in 701 (2 Chr. 32:9); HEZEKIAH sent a message of submission there (2 Ki. 18:14); and from it Sennacherib's troops marched against Jerusalem (18:17; 19:8).

Starkey's excavations demonstrate successive destructions of Lachish in 597 and 587, corresponding to NEBUCHADNEZZAR's second and third attacks against Judah. From the final ashes twenty-one inscribed ostraca were recovered. Consisting primarily of communications from an outpost commander named Hoshai to his superior, Joash, at Lachish, they constitute our first truly personal, Palestinian documents. Letter IV mentions signal fires (cf. Jer. 6:1) and establishes Jeremiah's assertion that Lachish and Azekah were the last cities, before Jerusalem, to fall to Nebuchadnezzar (34:7), and Letter VI speaks of a warning prophet (like Jeremiah himself) and of critics that "weakened the hands" of anti-Babylonian resistance (38:4). Finally, in NEHEMIAH's day, a resettled Lachish (Neh. 11:30) achieved the construction of a palace and Persian sun temple that are among the finest of the period.

Ladan. lay'duhn (Heb. la ʿdān H4356, possibly "plump neck, double chin"). KJV Laadan. (1) Son of Tahan, descendant of EPHRAIM, and ancestor of JOSHUA (1 Chr. 7:26).

(2) Descendant of LEVI through GERSHON and ancestor of several Levitical families in charge of the temple treasuries (1 Chr. 23:7-9; 26:21). Because he is paired with SHIMEI (23:7), Ladan is usually identified with LIBNI son of Gershon (6:17), but some argue that both Ladan and the Shimei of 23:7 are more distant descendants of Gershon.

ladder. See STAIRS, STAIRWAY.

Lael. lay'uhl (Heb. lā ʿēl H4210, "belonging to God"). Father of ELIASAPH; during the wilderness period, the latter was a leader of the LEVITES descended from GERSHON (Num. 3:24).

Lagash. lay'gash. An important city-state in SUMER during the first half of the third millennium B.C. Lagash is identified with modern Tell al-Hiba in S Iraq, but it included the urban centers of Girsu and Nina-Sirara (modern Tello and Zurghul). Large temple complexes have been excavated. The Lagash Kinglist (early second millennium), purportedly a record of the city's ancient rulers, includes a flood narrative.

Lahad. lay'had (Heb. lāhad H4262, possibly "slow, lazy"). Son of Jahath, descendant of JUDAH, and ancestor of a Zorathite clan (1 Chr. 4:2; see ZORAH).

Lahmam. See LAHMAS.

Lahmas. lah´mahs (Heb. lahmās H4314 [many MSS lahmām], meaning uncertain). Also Lahmam. A town of JUDAH in the SHEPHELAH district of LACHISH (Josh. 15:40). The location is unknown, although some have suggested modern Khirbet el-Lahm, about 3 mi. (5 km.) E of Lachish.

Lahmi. lah´mi (Heb. lahmî H4313, in form a gentilic from the word meaning “bread”). A PHILISTINE who is described as the brother of GOLIATH the Gittite and who was killed by Elhanan son of Jair (1 Chr. 20:5). The parallel passage (2 Sam. 21:19) reads differently. See comments under ELHANAN #1.

Laish (city). lay´ish (Heb. layiš H4332, “lion”). (1) A Canaanite town in N PALESTINE captured by the Danites and renamed by them DAN (Jdg. 18:7, 14, 27, 29); earlier called LESHEM (in Josh. 19:47).

(2) KJV form of LAISHAH (Isa. 10:30).

Laish (person). lay´ish (Heb. layiš H4331, “lion”). Father of PALTIEL, to whom SAUL gave MICHAL, DAVID’s wife (1 Sam. 25:44; 2 Sam. 3:15).

Laishah. lay´i-shah (Heb. layšâ H4333, “lion”). KJV Laish. A village probably in BENJAMIN, named with GALLIM and ANATHOTH as lying along the usual invasion route of armies coming from the N (Isa. 10:30). The location is unknown, but it must have been a relatively short distance NNE of JERUSALEM.

lake. The Greek word for “lake,” limnē G3349, is used only by Luke with reference to the Lake of GENNESARET—that is, the Sea of Galilee—and by the book of Revelation with reference to the LAKE OF FIRE (Lk. 5:1-2; 8:22-23, 33; Rev. 19:20; 20:10, 14-15; 21:8). To prevent misunderstanding, the NIV also employs “lake” frequently to render Greek thalassa G2498, “sea,” whenever this term (in imitation of the corresponding Heb. and Aram. terms) is used by itself with reference to the Sea of Galilee (Matt. 4:18 et al.). See also GALILEE, SEA OF. There are not many lakes in SYRIA and PALESTINE. Among the most important are the following: the DEAD SEA; the Waters of MEROM (Josh. 11:5, 7); Yammuneh (in the LEBANON, W of BAALBEK); and some small lakes E of DAMASCUS into which the rivers of Damascus flow and are evaporated.

lake of fire. This phrase occurs several times in the book of Revelation (Rev. 19:20; 20:10, 14-15; cf. 21:8). All the enemies of God—the beast and the false prophet (19:20), the devil (20:10), death and HADES (20:14), all whose names are not found written in the BOOK OF LIFE (20:15), the cowardly, the faithless, the murderers, etc. (21:8)—are to be consigned at the end of this age (in the case of the beast and the false prophet), or after the 1,000 years, to the lake of fire. This is said to be the second death (20:14)—the first being presumably physical death—and consists in eternal exclusion from the new heaven and the new earth, and the new Jerusalem (21:2). See GEHENNA; HELL.

Lake of Gennesaret. See GALILEE, SEA OF.

Lakkum. lak'uhm (Heb. laqqûm H4373, derivation uncertain). KJV Lakum. A town on the SE border of the tribal territory of NAPHTALI, named between JABNEEL and the JORDAN River (Josh. 19:33). Its precise location is uncertain, but some scholars identify it with modern Khirbet el-Mansurah, just SW of the S tip of the Sea of Galilee, at the head of Wadi Fejjas.

lamb. The principal words in Hebrew for “lamb,” that is, the young of sheep, are kešeb H4166 (Gen. 30:33 et al.) and šeh H8445 (Gen. 22:7-8 et al.). The common term in Greek is amnos G303, but arnion G768 is used almost thirty times Revelation (Rev. 5:6-13 et al.; elsewhere only in John 21:15). See ANIMALS. The lamb was the principal animal of SACRIFICE among the Jews, being the offering each morning and each evening in the Mosaic system (Exod. 29:38-42), and especially on the SABBATH. Also the lamb was sacrificed on special days of religious significance. To the Jews the lamb represented innocence and gentleness. The prophets portrayed the tender compassion of God for his people under the figure of the shepherd and the lamb (Isa. 40:11), and the lamb was an important symbol of the ultimate intention of God for his people (11:6). The psalmist carried the imagery of the shepherd and the lamb to its most beautiful expression in Ps. 23. Likewise the lamb was the climax of prophetic symbolism of the suffering of God's people, the servant nation, which the NT found to be a prefiguring of Jesus (Isa. 53:7; Acts 8:32). See LAMB OF GOD.

Lamb of God. Jesus was called the Lamb of God by JOHN THE BAPTIST (Jn. 1:29, 36). Some have regarded that pronouncement to be a thematic statement of the contents of the fourth gospel, Jesus being presented throughout the document as the lamb of SACRIFICE to take away the sins of the world. Much speculation has centered on the OT reference believed to have been in the mind of John when he thus spoke of Jesus. The Mosaic lamb of the Passover has been suggested frequently because Jesus is thus identified by PAUL (1 Cor. 5:7). Naturally many have found the suffering lamb (Isa. 53) to have been foremost in his mind. Still others have sought to avoid any particular reference and have considered the lamb simply as the principal animal of sacrifice in the worship of God.

Two things about this designation as applied to Jesus were most notable: he was declared to be the lamb of God and his sacrifice was for the world. All other lambs in the sacrificial system had been offered by human beings under the commandment of God; but just as God had substituted his own provision of a lamb instead of ISAAC who was under ABRAHAM'S hand, so God in Jesus provided his own Lamb. All other sacrifices of a lamb had been limited to the nation or to the individual; but the sacrifice of Jesus was worldwide, embracing all humanity in its scope. He was to take away the sins of the world. The lamb was a worthy symbol of Jesus, who in innocence patiently endured suffering as a substitute (Acts 8:32; 1 Pet. 1:19).

Of special interest is the use of the term lamb in Revelation, where it occurs twenty-eight times in symbolic reference to Christ. The introductory reference in Rev. 5:1-14 is to the Lamb triumphant; the description clearly identifies him as the Christ. He stood as "one slain," as if his throat had been cut in sacrifice; yet he was alive forevermore. He had seven horns, which probably were symbolic of his great power. He had seven eyes that represented his ceaseless vigilance for the people of God; thus the eyes were reinterpreted as the seven spirits of God, the fullness of God's Spirit working in behalf of his people. His attributes were those of God—OMNIPOTENCE and OMNISCIENCE.

lame. See DISEASES.

Lamech. lay'mik (Heb. lemek H4347, possibly "strong man"; Gk. Lamech G3285). (1) Son of METHUSHAEL and descendant of CAIN; the first polygamist (Gen. 4:18-24). Lamech was married to ADAH and ZILLAH. By Adah he produced JABAL, the first tent dweller and herder, and JUBAL, who invented the harp and flute, indicative of leisure time. By Zillah he begat TUBAL-CAIN, the first artificer in metals, and a daughter, NAAMAH. Lamech's poem in Gen. 4:23-24 is an example of early Hebrew poetry, with perfect parallelism. Lamech, drunk with self-confidence and self-sufficiency, was not willing to wait for God's justice to operate. He did not trust in God, but rather his weapons became his gods—a phenomenon paralleled in Mesopotamian religion. In Lamech, Cain's trend toward obstinate estrangement from God reached its climax.

(2) Son of METHUSELAH, descendant of SETH, and father of NOAH (Gen. 5:25-31; 1 Chr. 1:3; Lk. 3:36). This Lamech, weary because of the toil spent on the unfruitful land, expected the birth of his son (Noah) to remove the curse of ADAM (Gen. 5:29; cf. 3:17-19). Since the number ten represented completion or conclusion, Lamech hoped that the tenth generation from Adam would bring fulfillment of the Edenic promise. He had lived 182 years when Noah was born, and died at the age of 777.

lamed. lah'mid (Heb. lāmed, traditionally “ox-goad”). Also lamedh. The twelfth letter of the Hebrew alphabet (ל), with a numerical value of thirty. It is possibly named for the shape of the letter, which in its older form resembled a pointed stick. Its pronunciation corresponds approximately to that of English l.

lamentation. See MOURNING.

Lamentations, Book of. The third book among the five MEGILLOTH (Scrolls) in the Hebrew Bible; found after JEREMIAH in English Bibles. Its title in Hebrew is taken from the first word in the book, ʾēkâ H377 (“How!”), and may express a deep sense of lament over the tragic reversal of events. In the SEPTUAGINT, the title is Thrēnoi, “funeral songs, dirges, laments,” reflecting the Hebrew term qînôt (pl. of qînāh H7806), which is also used as a title for the book in the rabbinic writings. This Hebrew word designates a formal composition of grief arising from tragic misfortune (2 Sam. 1:17-27; Amos 5:1). Because of its position in the Megilloth, the book of Lamentations is read in synagogue worship on the fast of the ninth of AB, during the evening and morning services. This particular occasion commemorates the destruction of JERUSALEM by Babylonian forces in 586 B.C., and again by the Roman armies under Titus in A.D. 70.

The book comprises five poems lamenting the desolation that had overtaken the Holy City in 586 B.C. The first four compositions consist of acrostics: each verse of Lam. 1 and 2 commences with a word whose initial consonant is successively one of the twenty-two letters of the Hebrew alphabet (a slight variation of the regular order occurs in 2:16-17; 3:47-48; and 4:16-17). The third chapter is peculiar in that a triple alphabetical arrangement is followed, so that all three lines in each stanza commence with the same letter. The fifth chapter is not an acrostic, although like the others it contains twenty-two stanzas, and is a prayer rather than an elegy. Alphabetical forms of this kind probably served as a useful stimulus to memory at a time when MSS were rare and costly.

Some writers have regarded the mechanical structure of most of the book as incompatible with the grief and sincere penitence of the writer. These two ideas need not be inconsistent, however, particularly if the book was composed with a view to consistent liturgical usage. Judging from the manner in which it has survived among the Jews we may well believe that this was the intention of the author. The elegiac meter that characterizes the poems was occasionally employed in the writings of the prophets (e.g., Jer. 9:19-20; Ezek. 19) and some psalms (e.g., Ps. 84; 119).

Overview of LAMENTATIONS

Author: Anonymous, though traditionally attributed to the prophet JEREMIAH.

Historical setting: Probably written during the Babylonian EXILE, thus sometime between the fall of JERUSALEM (586 B.C.) and the fall of BABYLON to the Persians (538 B.C.).

Purpose: To express deep sorrow over the end of the theocracy and the destruction of Jerusalem and the TEMPLE; to urge confession for sin and REPENTANCE.

Contents: The book consists of five poems: Zion's devastation (Lam. 1); the anger of the Lord (ch. 2); despair and consolation (ch. 3); horrors of the destruction (ch. 4); prayer for restoration (ch. 5).

Although in the Hebrew no name was attached to the book, the authorship was uniformly ascribed by ancient authorities to Jeremiah. The LXX added an introductory note stating that "Jeremiah lamented this lamentation over Jerusalem," but the traditional view of the authorship appears to be rooted in the elegy composed for the mourning period of the deceased JOSIAH (c. 609 B.C.). Many modern critics have envisaged several authors at work in the book, or else have assumed that BARUCH, Jeremiah's secretary, was responsible for the work in its final form. The reasons adduced include the fact that the physical circumstances of the prophet would make the work of composition rather difficult, that there are certain implicit contradictions between the prophecy of Jeremiah and the book of Lamentations, and that some literary expressions characteristic of Jeremiah are lacking in Lamentations. Thus the thought of Lam. 2:9 that God no longer reveals himself in his prophets is held to be inconsistent with the thought of Jeremiah. Similarly the reference in Lam. 4:17 to the possibility of EGYPT as a deliverer ill accords with the patriotism expressed by the prophet (Jer. 42:15-17; 43:12-13).

On the other hand, most of the poems appear intimately connected with the calamity of the EXILE. Lamentations 2 and 4 indicate that the author personally witnessed the tragedy of 586 B.C., while the remainder of the book may have been written in Babylonia in the early captivity. It seems improbable that the final chapter was written in Jerusalem after the return from exile, perhaps about 525 B.C., as has been suggested by some writers. The arguments for diversity of authorship do not seem particularly strong, though the possibility that the poems were recast in mnemonic form at a time subsequent to their original composition must not be overlooked. Until more decisive evidence is forthcoming, there seems little reason for questioning the substantial unity and traditional authorship of Lamentations.

The book bewails the siege and destruction of Jerusalem and sorrows over the sufferings of the inhabitants during this time. It makes poignant confession of sin on behalf of the people and their leaders, acknowledges complete submission to the divine will, and prays that God will once again favor and restore his people. The book may be outlined as follows:

- I. The fallen city admits its sin and the justice of divine judgment (Lam. 1-2).
- II. Lamentation; reassertion of divine mercy and judgment; prayer for divine intervention (chs. 3-4).
- III. Further confession and prayers for mercy (ch. 5).

lamp. An instrument used for artificial lighting. Lamps are often mentioned in Scripture, but no description of their form and structure is given. ARCHAEOLOGY has recovered many specimens in a great variety of forms, from the early simple, shallow, saucerlike bowl (with one side slightly pointed for the lighted wick) to the later closed bowl (with only a hole on top to pour in the oil, a spout for the wick, and a handle to carry it). Lamps for domestic use were generally of terra-cotta or of bronze.

Herodian oil lamps discovered at Masada.

The use of lamps is mentioned in connection with the golden lamps in the TABERNACLE and the ten golden lamps in the TEMPLE (Exod. 25:37; 1 Ki. 7:49; 2 Chr. 4:20; 13:11; Zech. 4:2). As shown from their usage, the “lamps” of GIDEON’s soldiers (Jdg. 7:16 KJV) were doubtless torches (so NIV). The common NT mention of lamps is in connection with their household usage (Matt. 5:15; Mk. 4:21; Lk. 8:16; 11:33; 15:8). Such lamps were generally placed on a LAMPSTAND, usually a niche built into the wall. It appears that the Hebrews were accustomed to burning lamps overnight in their chambers, perhaps because of a dread of darkness, more likely to keep away prowlers. The use of oil-fed lamps in a marriage procession is mentioned in Matt. 25:1. Since such lamps contained only a few spoonfuls of oil, a reserve supply would be a necessity. The lighted lamp is also mentioned metaphorically to symbolize (1) God’s word (Ps. 119:105), (2) God’s guidance (2 Sam. 22:29; Ps. 18:28), (3) salvation (Isa. 62:1 KJV), (4) the human spirit (Prov. 20:27), (5) outward prosperity (Prov. 13:9), (6) a son as successor (1 Ki. 11:36; 15:4).

lampstand. The Hebrew word mēnôrâ H4963, always rendered “candlestick” in KJV, occurs forty-three times in the OT, and is more accurately rendered “lampstand” in NIV, because the “lights” were not candles at all, but olive-oil lamps. In the TABERNACLE, as constructed in the wilderness, the lampstand (described in Exod. 25:31-40) with its seven branches holding seven lamps of gold stood at the left as the priest entered the Holy Place. In the TEMPLE that SOLOMON built, there were ten lampstands of gold (2 Chr. 4:7), but they were placed in front of the Most Holy Place (1 Ki. 7:49; 2 Chr. 4:7). The term mēnôrâ is rendered by the SEPTUAGINT with Greek lychnia G3393, which in turn is used in the NT both for the tabernacle lampstand (Heb. 9:2) and for the seven lampstands that represent the seven churches (Rev. 1:20 et al.).

landmark. An object used to mark the boundary of a field. Landmarks were often such movable objects as a stone or a post. Since a cunning and unscrupulous individual could take advantage of his neighbor by shifting the location of such boundary marks, thus robbing him of part of his means of support, such removal of landmarks was prohibited by the Mosaic law (Deut. 19:14; 27:17; NIV, “boundary stone”). Hebrew piety denounced the act (Prov. 22:28; 23:10), and it was considered equal to theft (Job 24:2).

lane. This English term is used by the KJV once (Lk. 14:21; NIV, “alleys”) to render a Greek noun that elsewhere is translated “street” (Matt. 6:2; Acts 9:11; 12:10).

languages. The first language spoken by the invading Israelite tribes in PALESTINE was HEBREW, a Semitic tongue related to Akkadian (the language of ASSYRIA and BABYLON), Arabic, Aramaic, and other important ANE languages. Hebrew was especially close to the language of PHOENICIA, to the CANAANITE dialects of the tribes they dispossessed, and to the speech of MOAB. Hebrew, over the first centuries of the occupation of Palestine, was both the literary and colloquial language. It remained the literary language permanently. In colloquial use it was replaced by ARAMAIC. The date of this change is difficult to determine with precision. ELIAKIM's request to SENNACHERIB's field commander (2 Ki.

18:26) to speak not “in Hebrew in the hearing of the people” but in Aramaic—which as a common eastern language of diplomacy the leaders understood—shows that Hebrew was still the Jewish vernacular in 713 B.C. Such was still the case as late as NEHEMIAH, two centuries later.

The next evidence is from the NT, where phrases quoted in the Palestinian vernacular (e.g., TALITHA CUM in Mk. 5:41) are undoubtedly Aramaic. Before Aramaic replaced Hebrew, it had, of course, infiltrated its vocabulary. The other colloquial dialect of NT times was GREEK, which also provided the literary language for the NT writings. It is the Koine or common dialect of Greek that is thus represented—a simplified form that descended from Attic and became an alternative language in most of the Mediterranean basin, and especially in the kingdoms of ALEXANDER THE GREAT’S successors. CHRIST spoke Aramaic, but undoubtedly understood Greek, and read the Scriptures in classical Hebrew. PAUL probably knew all three languages and used them with equal facility, with the likely addition of Latin.

lantern. This English term is used in Bible versions once to render Greek phanos G5749, which occurs only in Jn. 18:3. In that passage we are told that the soldiers and officials who went to arrest Jesus were carrying lanterns and torches (lampas G3286, usually translated “lamp”). In contrast to other versions, the NIV seems to regard phanos as meaning “torch” (which in fact was the earlier meaning of the term) and lampas as “lantern.” It is possible that either or both of these terms refer to some kind of torch, although Romans in the time of Christ did have lanterns of cylindrical shape with translucent sides.

Laodicea.

Laodicea. lay-od’i-see’uh (Gk. Laodikeia G3293; gentilic Laodikeus G3294, “Laodicean”). A wealthy city in ASIA MINOR founded by the SELEUCID ruler Antiochus II (261-246 B.C.), and head of the “circuit” of “the seven churches in the province of Asia” (Rev. 1:4). The church in this city evidently had a close connection with the Christian community in COLOSSE (Col. 2:1; 4:13-16). Laodicea lay on one of the great Asian trade routes, and this insured its commercial prosperity. The city was a leading banking center, and it was no doubt the rich banking firms that in A.D. 60 financed the reconstruction after the great earthquake that destroyed it. Laodicea refused the Senate’s earthquake relief. She was “rich and increased with goods” and had “need of nothing” (3:17 KJV). The Lycus Valley produced a glossy black wool, the source of black cloaks and carpets, for which the city was famous. Laodicea was also the home of a medical school and the manufacture of collyrium, a famous eye salve. The scornful imagery of the apocalyptic letter to Laodicea is obviously based on these activities. It also has reference to the emetic qualities of the soda-laden warm water from nearby Hierapolis, whose thermal springs ran into the Maeander. Laodicea’s water supply also came from Hierapolis, and its vulnerability, together with the city’s exposed position and its easy wealth, possibly caused the growth in the community of that spirit of compromise and worldly mindedness castigated in the Revelation.

Laodiceans, Epistle to the. In Col. 4:16 PAUL urges the COLOSSIANS to exchange letters with the Laodiceans. A letter written by the Laodiceans to Paul is ruled out by the context (“from” here denotes present locality, not origin). There are three views of its identity: (1) The spurious Epistle to the Laodiceans found among Paul’s letters in some Latin MSS from the sixth to the fifteenth centuries. Its twenty verses, being phrases strung together from Philippians and Galatians, are a forgery with no heretical motive. (2) A Pauline letter to the Laodiceans now lost. This is not improbable, though opponents hold it multiplies epistles unnecessarily. (3) Our EPHESIANS. This view is very probable if Ephesians is accepted as being encyclical, and it accounts for Marcion’s title of Ephesians as “the epistle to the Laodiceans.”

Lapidoth. See LAPPIDOTH.

lapis lazuli. See MINERALS.

Lappidoth. lap’i-doth (Heb. lappîdôt H4366, possibly “flames, lightning strikes”). KJV Lapidoth. Husband of DEBORAH, the prophetess and leader of Israel (Jdg. 4:4). Some have speculated that there may be a connection between Lappidoth and Deborah’s military associate, BARAK (v. 6; the latter’s name means “lightning”); in any case, the text clearly distinguishes between the two.

lapwing. See BIRDS.

lasciviousness. This English term, meaning “lust, overt sexual desire,” is used by the KJV to render Greek aselgeia G816 in a number of passages (e.g., 2 Cor. 12:21; NIV, “debauchery”; NRSV, “licentiousness”). The Greek noun occurs eight times in the NT (Mk. 7:22; Rom. 13:13; 2 Cor. 12:21; Gal. 5:19; Eph. 4:19; 1 Pet. 4:3; 2 Pet. 2:2, 7, 18; Jude 4), and the reference is always to sensuality, particularly that which outraged public decency. There could be no place for such behavior in the Christian life.

Lasea. luh-see´uh (Gk. Lasaia G3297). A city of CRETE near FAIR HAVENS, the bay that the ship on which PAUL was being taken to Italy had reached with difficulty (Acts 27:8). Quite possibly ruins about 5 mi. (8 km.) E of Fair Havens are those of Lasea. Not much is known about this city, which has received little notice in surviving literature.

lash. See SCOURGE.

Lasha. lay´shuh (Heb. leša ¢ H4388, meaning unknown). A place marking one of the boundary points of the land of the CANAANITES, mentioned after SODOM, GOMORRAH, ADMAH, and ZEBOIIM (Gen. 10:19). Its location is unknown, although a number of identifications have been suggested, among them LAISH (surely too far N) and Callirrhoe (or Kallirhoe, a ravine E of the DEAD SEA to which HEROD the Great went for his health during his last illness; see ZERETH SHAHAR).

Lasharon. luh-shair´uhn (Heb. laššārôn H4389, “belonging to Sharon [the plain]”). A Canaanite royal city whose king was defeated by JOSHUA (Josh. 12:18). On the basis of a SEPTUAGINT reading, many scholars believe that the word is not the name of a city, but part of a phrase, distinguishing APHEK of SHARON from other cities of the same name.

Latin. One of the Indo-European languages, Latin was the official medium of communication in the Roman empire (see ROME), and it was used in the provinces, such as JUDEA, in official acts and at the Roman courts. GREEK was the language of commerce; in PALESTINE itself, ARAMAIC was the language spoken in the rural districts and more remote towns, while in the cities both Aramaic and Greek were used. That is why the inscription on the CROSS of Christ was written in those three languages (Jn. 19:20). Hellenistic Greek borrowed many words from Latin and was otherwise influenced by this language, especially in the area of government. Many Latin names, such as PAUL (Paulus), are found in the NT.

lattice. A window covering made of crossed strips or bars of wood or metal and used as a screen. Latticework served a threefold purpose: (1) privacy, so that one might look out without being seen; (2) ventilation, so that a breeze might flow in and the sun's hot rays be kept out; and (3) decoration, so that a house or public building might be architecturally more attractive (Jdg. 5:28; 2 Ki. 1:2; Prov. 7:6 [KJV, "casement"]; Cant. 2:9).

laughter. Although sometimes associated with genuine JOY (Ps. 126:2; Eccl. 10:19; Lk. 6:21), laughter in the Bible more often denotes derision and mockery. Unbelievers laugh at Christ (Ps. 22:7; Matt. 9:24), at the righteous (Neh. 2:19; Job 12:4; Ps. 80:6), and at God's ordinances (2 Chr. 30:10); but their laughter will vanish (Prov. 1:26; Lk. 6:25; Jas. 4:9). God himself laughs at his enemies (Ps. 2:4; 37:13; 59:8). Believers sometimes laugh incredulously (Gen. 17:17; 18:12-15; 21:6), but they also are said to laugh in derision of the wicked (Job 22:19; Ps. 52:6; Isa. 37:22).

law. This English term most commonly means “a rule of conduct prescribed by a recognized authority”; in that sense it is roughly synonymous with such words as commandment, ordinance, precept, statute. In the Bible, the term very often refers specifically to the Mosaic law, that is, the COVENANT established by God through MOSES at SINAI. More generally, it can refer to the PENTATEUCH, the first five books of the OT. But in fact the primary Hebrew word for “law,” tôrâ H9368, has an even broader meaning, namely, “guidance, instruction, teaching,” whether human (Prov. 1:8b) or divine (Isa. 1:10; cf. TNIV and NRSV). This factor needs to be kept in mind when seeking to understand the notion of law in Scripture. The SEPTUAGINT’s choice of Greek nomos G3795 as the rendering of tôrâ is thought by some to have injected an extraneous legal element into the concept, but the NT use of this Greek term corresponds closely with OT teaching.

I. The moral law. It is plain from the Decalogue (Exod. 20:3-17; Deut. 5:7-21; see COMMANDMENTS, TEN) that morality is not to be derived from human standards and the verdict of society but from God and his declarations and one’s relationship of subordination to him. Right and wrong are not determined by the voice of society but by the voice of God. The Ten Commandments declare the broad principles of God’s moral law. We can find positive teaching as to the will of God for our lives in those commandments that are couched in the negative, and we can find admonition and prohibition in those framed as positive exhortations. The Decalogue constitutes the regulative core of REVELATION as to acceptable lines of human conduct. The first tablet of the law was considered to express our duty toward God (Exod. 20:3-11), and the second our duty toward other human beings (20:12-17). The NT seems to follow this division in summarizing the law, for Jesus said that it demands LOVE for God and love for one’s neighbor comparable to the love that one has for oneself (Matt. 22:35-40).

The NT, rather than setting aside the moral law, reiterates its commands, develops more fully the germinal truths contained in it, and focuses attention on the spirit of the law as over against merely the letter. So it is that PAUL affirms there is but one God (Eph. 4:6) and cautions against IDOLATRY both directly and indirectly (Rom. 1:21-23; 1 Cor. 10:14). While the NT suggests an attitude toward the SABBATH somewhat different from that of Jewish legalism (Mk. 2:23-28) and comes to recognize the time of observance as the first day of the week (Acts 20:7; 1 Cor. 16:2), it preserves the observance as of divine institution and enriches its significance by associating with it Christ’s RESURRECTION. So also, the NT emphasizes the law of love (Rom. 13:8-10; Gal. 5:14; Jas. 2:8) and selflessness and humility as representative of the mind of Christ (Phil. 2:3-8). Although the NT commandments are for the most part positive exhortations rather than warnings and prohibitions, the underlying principles are the same.

Scripture makes clear the function of the moral law. As the expression of the character and will of God, it sets forth the only standard of righteousness acceptable to him; but humans were without power to conform to that perfect standard. The law made them aware of their sinfulness (Rom. 7:7, 13), condemned them as unrighteous (7:9-11; Gal. 3:13; Jas. 2:9), and, having removed any hope of salvation through their own RIGHTEOUSNESS, brought them to the place where they would cast themselves on the grace of God and trust only in the righteousness and merit of the atoning Savior, Jesus Christ (Gal. 3:24).

Christians are free from the condemnation of the law (Rom. 8:2) since the righteousness of him who kept the law perfectly and who vicariously paid the penalty for the transgression of the law on the part of his people has been imputed to them. More than that, Christians are declared righteous by God (Rom. 4:5-6), renewed in righteousness and progressively sanctified as the HOLY SPIRIT applies the Word in their lives (2 Cor. 5:21; Gal. 5:16-26; 1 Thess. 5:23). The goal of the Christian is conformity to the moral image of God as manifested to them by the Incarnate Son (Eph. 4:13). So it is that Christians are under obligation to keep the moral law (cf. Matt. 5:19-48; Eph. 4:28; 5:3; 6:2; Col. 3:9; 1 Pet. 4:15), not as a condition of salvation, but that they may become more and more like their Father in heaven (Rom. 8:1-9; Eph. 4:13), and this because of love for the One who redeemed them (Rom. 13:8-10; 1 Jn. 5:2-3).

II. Social legislation. In the giving of the law at Sinai, Moses first communicated to the people the body of principles, the Ten Words, and then the applicatory precepts. Careful study of the individual statutes shows the specific commands to be rooted in the basic principles set out in the Decalogue. OT laws of judicial, civil, or political nature are to be found in the block of legislative material known as the Book of the Covenant (Exod. 20:23—23:33), in the so-called Holiness Code (Lev. 17-26), and throughout most of the book of DEUTERONOMY (esp. Deut. 21-25).

Since human beings are inherently sinful and lawless, social life must come under regulations. So it was that in the OT times both Jews and Gentiles found themselves subject to law. Nor was the civil legislation binding on Israel much different from that of the heathen nations. The Code of HAMMURABI has much in common with the laws promulgated under Moses, and other ancient statutes are found among non-Jews as well as in Israel. Basic principles of right and wrong are the same everywhere and for all people, reflecting the work of the Holy Spirit in the realm of common grace. The difference was that in the Israelite theocracy the laws regulating society were recognized as declared through God's prophets and with divine authority, whereas in other nations the authority behind the codes was the voice of tradition or the voice of the state.

A basic institution ordained of God, the FAMILY, was necessarily governed in its many relationships by various regulations that it might be preserved from corruption and dissolution. There were many prescriptions regarding MARRIAGE itself (Exod. 21-22; 34; Lev. 18; 21; Num. 5; 25; Deut. 7; 21-22; 24-25; 27). Within the family, children were to honor and obey their parents (Exod. 20:12; Deut. 5:16; 21:18-21; 27:16). And since the family circle might include servants, slaves, and strangers, there were laws pertaining to them also (Exod. 12; 21-22; Lev. 19; 22; 24-25; Num. 9; 15; 35; Deut. 1; 12; 14-16; 23-24; 27).

As might be expected, crimes against society were to be punished according to law. These might be of a moral nature, such as sexual violations or perversions (Exod. 20-22; Lev. 18-20; Num. 5; Deut. 5:22-25, 27). Again, they might be crimes against individuals, either their persons (Gen. 9; Exod. 20-23; Lev. 19; 24; Num. 35; Deut. 5; 19; 21-22; 24; 27) or their property (Exod. 20; 22; Lev. 6; 19; Deut. 5; 19; 23; 25; 27). Or the offenses might be against the state (Exod. 20; 23; Lev. 19; Deut. 5; 16; 19; 27). In addition to the laws already mentioned, other regulations governing property are to be found in Exod. 21-23; Lev. 6; 24-25; Num. 27; 36; and Deut. 21-22; 25.

OT legislation contained numerous stipulations about the operation of the state. Certain aspects of political organization were outlined (Exod. 22; Num. 1; 3-4; 26; 33; Deut. 17; 23). Specifications were made regarding the army (Num. 1-2; 10; 26; 31; Deut. 7; 11; 20-21; 23-24). Judicial prescriptions were set forth (Exod. 18; 20-21; 23; Lev. 5; 19; Num. 35; Deut. 1; 4-5; 16-17; 19; 25; 27), and provision was made for bringing to the people a knowledge of the law (Deut. 6; 11; 27; 31; Josh. 8).

Many Israelite laws were laws of kindness. Even the treatment of animals was subject to regulation (Exod. 23; 34; Lev. 22; 25; Deut. 22; 25). The general commandment of love, whether for friends or strangers, was invoked (Exod. 23; Lev. 19; Deut. 10). The poor, unfortunate, lowly, defenseless, and needy were to be treated humanely (Exod. 21-23; Lev. 19; 23; 25; Deut. 14-16; 21-27).

The prescriptions of the law were to the end that there might be peace and order, whether in the operations of the state or the family or in other spheres of human interrelations. The dignity of the individual was to be preserved. A high premium was set on selflessness and consideration of others. God's wisdom and grace were manifest in the legislation given the Israelites through his servant Moses.

III. Religious legislation. Embodied in the OT are many laws governing the WORSHIP of God. Some are very general in nature, having to do with purity of worship. Large numbers of the laws concern the sanctuary, its priesthood, and the rites and ceremonies connected with it and the covenant relationship between the Israelites and their God. Some consist of prescriptions pertaining to special occasions of the religious year.

Basic principles of worship are outlined in the first table of the Decalogue (Exod. 20:3-11). They are then worked out into detailed applicatory legislation. Because the Lord is the only true God, exalted and holy, other so-called gods are not to be worshiped (Exod. 22-23; 34; Deut. 5-6; 8; 11; 17; 30), apostasy is a sin (Deut. 4:25-31; 27; 31:16; cf. Lev. 19; 26), and such occult arts as witchcraft, sorcery, and divination are not to be practiced (Exod. 22; Lev. 18-20; Deut. 18). So also, blasphemy is not to be tolerated (Exod. 22; Lev. 18-19; 24), and God's Sabbath Day is to be kept inviolate (Exod. 23; 31; 34-35; Lev. 19; 26; Num. 15).

Since the Lord is the only true God, his people are to study and keep his law (Lev. 18-20; 25; Num. 15; Deut. 4-8; 10-11; 22; 26-27; 30), as well as to separate themselves from the heathen and their religious practices (Exod. 22-23; 34; Lev. 18-20; Deut. 6-7; 12; 14; 18). They are to be a holy nation (Exod. 19; 22; Lev. 19; 26; Deut. 7; 14; 18; 26; 28), and they are to give to God the allegiance, love, gratitude, and obedient service due him (Exod. 23; 34; Lev. 19; 25; Deut. 4-6; 8; 10-11; 13-14; 17; 30-31).

When Moses was on Mount Sinai, God delineated in detail the pattern for the sanctuary (Exod. 25-27), and the TABERNACLE was built in conformity to that pattern (Exod. 35-38). Later its essential features were reproduced in the TEMPLE built by SOLOMON (2 Chr. 3-4). The sanctuary was in a special sense God's dwelling place among his people and spoke silently of his fellowship with them (Exod. 25:8, 22). As the place where God drew nigh to the people and they to him, it was designed to remind them of him—his splendor, his magnificence, his glory, his transcendence, his holiness, his presence, his mercy and forgiveness, his requirements of Israel, and his covenant headship. Through its structure and the regulations as to who might enter each part, God's holiness was emphasized.

The brazen ALTAR was for SACRIFICE and therefore implied the necessity of worship and ATONEMENT. As one approached the holy God, the laver was mute evidence of the fact that cleansing from defilement must first take place. The altar of INCENSE pointed to the importance of adoration and praise (Ps. 141:2; Isa. 6:3-4). The table of showbread suggested the need for dedication, and the golden LAMPSTAND perhaps indicated that the worshiper should reflect in his life the light that comes from God and which is ever to be linked with him. These conclusions rest on the assumption that the sanctuary furnishings in the outer court and in the Holy Place were for the purpose of instructing OT worshipers how they should draw near to God in adoration.

On the other hand, the symbolism of the Most Holy Place may be thought of as speaking of God in his approach to people. Through the tablets of the law in the ARK OF THE COVENANT, through the ark's cover, and through the CHERUBIM symbolizing the presence of God, the Lord said to his people, "I, God, am a spiritual Being here in your midst. My law accuses and condemns. Who can keep it? But I have provided a covering, a propitiation, an atonement. Despite sin, it is still possible for you to look forward to dwelling in my immediate presence." The veil testified that the time had not come, but the typology was unmistakable. The worshiper might come only as far as the court. The ordinary priest could enter the Holy Place. Only the high priest might enter the Most Holy Place, and that but once a year. The symbolism was plain: it was not a light thing to seek acceptance in the presence of the holy God, but there was indeed a way of approach.

The OT worshiper learned that through the offering of sacrifice God dealt with sin and granted forgiveness (Lev. 4:20), that through the shedding of blood there was atonement of sin (16:15-16), that the animal of the ceremony was reckoned as a substitute for the worshiper (16:20-22), that the sacrifices were perhaps not the full and final answer to the sin problem (since they must continue to be offered), that sacrifice without obedience to God's revelation was of no value (Isa. 1:10-17), and that God's Suffering Servant was to be a guilt offering (53:10). The Mosaic legislation prescribes the kinds of sacrifices and the details governing them: the whole burnt offering (Exod. 20; Lev. 1; 6; Deut. 12:27), the sin offering (Lev. 4-6; 8-10; Num. 15), the guilt offering (Lev. 5-7; 19; Num. 5), and the peace offering (Lev. 3; 7; 19; 22). Also the law had much to say about other offerings and sacrificial dues (Exod. 10; 13; 18; 22-23; 29-30; 34; Lev. 2-3; 6; 14; 19; 22-23; 27; Num. 3; 5-6; 8; 15; 18-19; 28; 30-31; Deut. 12; 14-18; 23; 26).

Through the priesthood, people came to understand that the transcendent, holy God cannot be approached in a casual way by sinful people but only by a mediator representing both God and human beings, that the mediator must be emblematic of HOLINESS and perfection, and that God deals with sin through the representative acts of the mediator. As to the concept of the priesthood, the focus of attention was narrowed from the whole nation (Exod. 19:6) to the PRIESTS and LEVITES and finally to one man, the high priest, whose acts on behalf of the people brought reconciliation. Many passages contain laws pertaining to the priesthood (Exod. 28-30; 39-40; Lev. 2:5-8, 10, 16; 21-24; 27; Num. 3-6; 15; 18; 31). The law codes regulated ceremonial cleanliness not only for the priests but also in reference to food (Exod. 12; 22-23; 34; Lev. 3; 7; 11; 17; 19-20; 22; Deut. 12; 14-15) and purification (Lev. 5:11—15:22; Num. 6; 19; 31; Deut. 21; 24).

The rite of CIRCUMCISION symbolized the taking away of defilement that the individual might be rightly related to God and a partaker of the covenant of grace. The FEASTS and festivals had significance that was partly historical, partly merely symbolical, partly typical. The Passover was a reminder of physical deliverance from bondage in Egypt (Exod. 12:17; Deut. 16:1). Sacred history and prophecy often blend, and so the observance of the Passover might well have had this message: As God delivered, so he will deliver. The central sacrifice in this festival as in others pointed to a need for atonement just as did the daily and weekly sacrifices did, and the unleavened bread and the meat and drink offerings pointed to the importance of a holy, fruitful life before God. As a harvest festival, Pentecost signified rejoicing and the place of thanksgiving to God in the life of the covenant participant (Deut. 16:9-10), especially in the light of deliverance from Egypt (16:12). Except for the significance of the extra sacrifices, the Feast of Tabernacles (Exod. 23; Lev. 23; Num. 29; Deut. 16) may have been to the Jews little more than a reminder of God's love and care during the period of the nation's youth when the Jews wandered in the wilderness and were tested by deprivation that they might learn to trust in God and his provision. On the other hand, the Day of Atonement emphasized the need for the expiation of sin, the atoning nature of the blood sacrifice, and the idea of substitution in relation to atonement.

IV. NT teaching. The writers of the NT spell out the antitypes involved. As God's dwelling among his people was symbolized in the OT through the Garden of Eden, the tabernacle, and the temple, so the new covenant tells us that God as the Son "lived for a while among us" (Jn. 1:14), that he indwells the individual believer (1 Cor. 6:19) and the church (2 Cor. 6:16), and that the final and everlasting dwelling place of God will be heaven itself (Heb. 9:24; Rev. 21:3). In the new dispensation, that which was symbolized by the Passover celebration and circumcision came to be represented and defined more clearly in the LORD'S SUPPER and Christian BAPTISM. The types and shadows of the ceremonial law gave way to antitypes.

The cross replaced the brazen altar. There was no longer a sanctuary laver but a laver of regeneration, "a washing of rebirth" (Tit. 3:5). "The prayers of the saints" (Rev. 5:8) took the place of the altar of incense. Dedicated lives came to be offered (Rom. 12:1-2) rather than symbolic showbread, and good works produced by children of the light made unnecessary the golden lampstand. Instead of the mercy seat as a "propitiatory covering," Christ became the PROPITIATION for the sins of his people (Rom. 3:25; 1 Jn. 2:2; 4:10); and sinners redeemed and in fellowship with God became the prophetic fulfillment of the symbolic cherubim, which were basically human in form (Ezek. 1:5; 10:21) and always associated with the presence of the Lord (Gen. 3:24; Ps. 18:10; Ezek. 1; 10; 28). The Lord Jesus was seen to be God's Passover LAMB (1 Cor. 5:7), a perfect, all-sufficient sacrifice (Eph. 5:2; Heb. 7:27; 9:11-14). As the High Priest, Christ made RECONCILIATION (Heb. 2:17) and lives to make intercession for his people (7:25).

As a covenant child, our Lord was related to the ceremonial law as shown by his circumcision (Lk. 2:21) and his presence at the temple at the Passover feast (2:42). He instructed lepers to carry out the provisions of the law (17:14). He drove from the temple those who defiled it (Matt. 21:12-13). He and his disciples were accustomed to go to Jerusalem at feast time (Jn. 7:37; 13:1, 29). Christ spoke negatively regarding the traditions of the Jews but not of the ceremonial law as set forth in the OT. Yet he indicated that the time was coming when the ritual of the law would give place to spiritual worship (Jn. 4:24).

The apostolic view of the law, especially in relation to the doctrine of grace, has always caused much debate, and modern scholarship has intensified the disagreements. Some general observations may be made, however. In the transitional period after the cross, the resurrection, and the ascension, conditions in each case determined whether the stipulations of the law should be observed. PAUL might circumcise TIMOTHY (Acts 16:3) but not TITUS (Gal. 2:3-4). He could assure the CO-RINTHIANS that circumcision in the flesh was not essential for salvation (1 Cor. 2:2; 7:18-19); and, in writing to the GALATIANS, he could argue strongly against the contentions of the JUDAIZERS (Gal. 2:4-5; 5:1-12) in line with the decisions of the Jerusalem Council (Acts 15). The argument of the book of Hebrews is that the types and shadows of the ceremonial law have passed away with the coming of Christ, the perfect High Priest, who as the Lamb of God offered himself on GOLGOTHA that he might satisfy every demand of the law and purchase salvation for his people.

By means of the ceremonial law, God spoke in picture language of the salvation he was to effect through the life and death of the Incarnate Son. Therefore, it was necessarily imperfect and temporary. The social legislation governing Israel was designed for a particular culture at a given period of history, and so it, too, was only for a time; yet its principles are timeless and applicable to all generations. God's moral law is in force everywhere and at all times, for it is a reflection of his very being. It has never been abrogated, nor indeed can be.

lawgiver. The KJV uses this term in several passages where a more appropriate rendering is "staff, scepter" (Gen. 49:10; Num. 21:18; Ps. 60:7; 108:8) or "leader, ruler" (Deut. 33:21). The meaning "lawgiver" is possible in Isa. 33:22 (so NIV, but NRSV has "ruler," NJPS "prince") and certainly correct in Jas. 4:12; both of these passages reflect the view that God is the only absolute lawgiver. Insofar as God used MOSES to proclaim the divine law to the Israelites (Jn. 1:17; 7:19; cf. Gal. 3:19), this Hebrew leader may be regarded as a "lawgiver," but the term is not explicitly applied to him.

laying on of hands. A ceremony of ancient origin with different meanings, depending upon its occurrence in various contexts. In the OT this act symbolizes (1) the parental bestowal of inheritance rights (Gen. 48:14-20); (2) the gifts and rights of an office (Num. 27:18, 23; Deut. 34:9); and (3) substitution. The latter involves three categories: (a) substitution of an animal for one's guilt (Exod. 29:10, 15, 19; Lev. 1:4; 3:2, 8, 13; 4:4, 15, 24, 29, 33; 8:14, 18, 22; 16:21; cf. Gen. 22:9-13); (b) substitution of the LEVITES for the FIRSTBORN of the other tribes (Num. 8:10-19); and (c) substitution of one's innocence for another's guilt (Lev. 24:13-16; Deut. 13:9; 17:7).

In the NT the laying on of hands can indicate (1) the bestowal of blessings and benediction (Matt. 19:13, 15; cf. Lk. 24:50); (2) the restoration of health (Matt. 9:18; Acts 9:12, 17); (3) the reception of the HOLY SPIRIT in BAPTISM (Acts 8:17, 19; 19:6); and (4) the gifts and rights of an office (Acts 6:6; 13:3; 1 Tim. 4:14; 2 Tim. 1:6).

Lazarus. laz'uh-ruhs (Gk. Lazaros G3276, from Heb. la ʿzār, abbreviated form of ʾel ʿāzār H540, "God has helped"). (1) Brother of MARTHA and MARY, who lived in BETHANY. Lazarus, during Christ's absence, became sick and died; Christ, after some delay, returned and raised him from death (Jn. 11:1—12:19). The following factors enhance the importance of this miracle: (a) the number of days (four) between death and resurrection (11:39), (b) the number of witnesses involved (11:45; 12:17-18), (c) the evident health of Lazarus after the event (12:1, 2, 9), and (d) the significance of the event among the Jews (11:53; 12:10-11).

This miracle (a) illustrates Christ's sympathy (Jn. 11:5, 11, 34-35) and power (11:40-45), (b) manifests the purposiveness of his MIRACLES (11:4, 40; 20:31), (c) gives concrete backing to the truth of Lk. 16:30-31, (d) affords opportunity for eschatological teaching (Jn. 11:23-25), and (e) precipitates the crucifixion (11:45-53; 12:9-19).

The silence of the Synoptic Gospels regarding this event is explainable: (a) the miracle was outside their scope; (b) it was not the leading accusation brought against Christ (cf. Matt. 26:61-66); (c) it was indirectly confirmed by the "envy" they attribute to the Jews (27:18); and (d) it did not fit their purpose for writing as it did John's (Jn. 20:31).

(2) In a parable of Jesus, Lazarus was the name of a beggar who died and went to ABRAHAM'S BOSOM (Lk. 16:19-31). The passage illustrates these truths: (a) destiny is settled at death; (b) no purgatory awaits the righteous; and (c) sinners have sufficient warning now.

leaf. Although this term is sometimes used literally in the Bible (e.g., Gen. 3:7), it more often occurs in figurative contexts illustrating a variety of concepts: (1) a distressed and nervous spirit (Lev. 26:36; Job 13:25), (2) the spiritual productivity of the righteous (Ps. 1:3; Prov. 11:28; Jer. 17:8), (3) the spiritual unproductivity of the wicked (Isa. 1:30), (4) the completeness of God's judgment (Isa. 34:4; Jer. 8:13), (5) the frailty and evanescence of man (Isa. 64:6), (6) the blessings of messianic times (Ezek. 47:12), (7) the unfruitfulness of Israel (Ezek. 17:9 KJV; Matt. 21:19; Mk. 11:13), (8) the nearness of the eschatological judgment (Matt. 24:32; Mk. 13:28), (9) the glory of an earthly kingdom (Dan. 4:12, 14, 21), and (10) the glory and fruitfulness of the heavenly kingdom (Rev. 22:2).

Leah. lee'uh (Heb. lē'â H4207, possibly "wild cow" [but not in a pejorative sense; cf. RACHEL, "ewe"]). Eldest daughter of LABAN, granddaughter of BETHUEL, and first wife of JACOB (Gen. 29:16). Leah is described as "tender eyed" (29:17 KJV), which may mean that she did not have a positive appearance (cf. NIV, "weak"; but NRSV, "lovely"). Leah became the mother of REUBEN, SIMEON, LEVI, JUDAH, ISSACHAR, ZEBULUN, and DINAH (29:31-35; 30:17-21). Loyal to Jacob (31:14-16), she returned with him to CANAAN, where, at her death, she was buried in MACHPELAH (49:31). Two of her sons (Levi and Judah) became progenitors of prominent tribes in Israel, and through Judah, Jesus Christ came (49:10; Mic. 5:2; Matt. 2:6; Heb. 7:14; Rev. 5:5; cf. Ruth 4:11).

leather. The skin of certain animals after it has been specially treated. Those who performed this work as a trade were called tanners (Acts 10:32). Leather was an article of clothing (Lev. 13:48; Heb. 11:37). However, JOHN THE BAPTIST (Matt. 3:4) and his prototype, ELIJAH (2 Ki. 1:8), are the only ones specifically mentioned as wearing "a leather belt." Leather was used also for armor, shoes, containers, and writing material.

leaven. A general term for agents that produce fermentation and cause dough to rise. It usually refers to yeast (the term used consistently by the NIV), which is a specific fungus of the genus Saccharomyces. BREAD was made to rise by putting a piece of sour dough (from a previous batch of dough) in the flour, bringing on fermentation of the whole. Leavened bread was a regular part of the diet of ancient Israel (Hos. 7:4). Bread made in haste without allowing it to rise is the UNLEAVENED BREAD often mentioned in Scripture (Gen. 19:3; Exod. 12:15; Jdg. 6:19; 1 Sam. 28:24; et al.). The haste to depart from Egypt left no time for bread to rise, therefore the people carried with them dough and kneading troughs (Exod. 12:34, 39). In memorial of the EXODUS and its hurried flight (Exod. 12:11, 39; Deut. 16:3), Israel was commanded to cast out leaven from the house annually and to eat unleavened bread for seven days.

The significant thing about leaven is its power, which may become a symbol of either good or evil. Jesus, in the parable of the leaven (Matt. 13:33; Lk. 13:21), used the working of yeast to teach the pervasiveness of the KINGDOM OF GOD, which eventually transforms the world. The small bit of leaven—the Word—has power to accomplish this great result. On the other hand, some, insisting that leaven in Scripture is always a symbol of evil, attempt to make the parable a picture of the true teaching being mingled with corrupt and corrupting false doctrine, resulting in the final apostasy of the professing church. One's approach to this issue is ordinarily determined by a prior decision on the question of whether the NT outlook for the kingdom is optimistic or pessimistic.

Jesus did use leaven as a symbol of undesirable teaching when he warned against “the yeast of the Pharisees and Sadducees” (Matt. 16:6, 11-12; cf. Mk. 8:15; Lk. 12:1). PAUL also employed the term negatively as a symbol of the pervasiveness of evil (1 Cor. 5:6). Here malice and evil are the leaven that need to be replaced by sincerity and truth so that the true Passover may be celebrated (vv. 7-8; cf. also Gal. 5:9 RSV).

Lebana. See LEBANAH.

Lebanah. li-bay'nuh (Heb. lēbānāh H4245 [one Hebrew ed. has lēbānā ָ in Neh. 7:38], “white” or “full moon”). Ancestor of a family of temple servants (NETHINIM) who returned from BABYLON (Ezra 2:45; Neh. 7:48 [most versions, “Lebana”]).

Lebanon. leb'uh-nuhn (Heb. lēbānôn H4248, “white [mountain]”). The name of a mountainous region in PHOENICIA just inland from the coast (called simply “Mount Lebanon,” in Jdg. 3:3; NIV, “the Lebanon mountains”). Its area corresponds roughly to that of the modern state of Lebanon (but the latter includes also the strip of land on the coast as well as the Beqa^c Valley and the western slopes of the Antilebanon mountains). The snowclad range extends in a NE direction for 100 mi. (160 km.) from TYRE to ARVAD. Its name alludes to the whiteness either of the fossil-bearing limestone cliffs or the snowy crests of this mountain system. Rising precipitously from the MEDITERRANEAN (cf. Josh. 9:1), Lebanon proper averages c. 6,000 ft. (1,830 m.) above sea level (cf. the steep grades on the present Beirut-Damascus highway), with peaks rising to c. 10,200 ft. (3,110 m.); but the elevation then drops to 2,300 ft. (700 m.) for 10 mi. (16 km.) across the ORONTES River Valley. East of this “Valley of Lebanon” (Josh. 11:17; 12:7), however, rises the Antilebanon range, the southernmost promontory of which is Mount HERMON, whose peak at 9,383 ft. (2,860 m.) remains visible as far S as JERICHO. The melting snow of these watersheds (Cant. 4:15; Jer. 18:14) creates the Orontes, flowing northward; the ABANA, watering DAMASCUS to the east; the westward-flowing Leontes or Litany; and the JORDAN, meandering southward through PALESTINE to the DEAD SEA. Yet these same peaks desiccate the moisture-laden western winds, causing desert farther east.

Lebanon's southern slopes grade into the foothills of GALILEE, and the gorge of the Litany marks out a natural NW boundary for Israel (Deut. 11:24; 2 Ki. 19:23). Strictly speaking, Lebanon lies outside Palestine and, though included in God's promise, it was never totally occupied (Josh. 13:5; though cf. its eschatological possession, Ezek. 47:15-16). Its isolated crags, however, supported watchtowers (Cant. 7:4) and refuge points (Jer. 22:20, 23) and came to symbolize the exalted status of Judah's royal house (Jer. 22:6; Ezek. 17:3).

Ancient Lebanon was heavily forested with varieties of budding foliage (Ps. 72:16; Isa. 29:17; Nah. 1:4), including the Phoenician juniper, which resembles the cypress (1 Ki. 5:8; 2 Ki. 19:23), but above all the great cedars of Lebanon (1 Ki. 4:33). Biblical poetry praises the fragrance of their wood (Cant. 3:6-9; cf. 4:11 and Hos. 14:6 where Lebanon means trees, per Isa. 10:34; 40:16), their height as symbolic of dignity or pride (Cant. 5:15; Isa. 2:13), and their growth and resistance to decay (Ps. 92:12). The psalmist's inspired thought thus advances to the corresponding greatness of the Creator, who both plants the cedars (104:16) and shatters them by his voice (29:5). The Lebanons were famous also for choice wine (Hos. 14:7), for thorny plants, and for beasts such as the lion and leopard (2 Ki. 14:9; Isa. 40:16; Cant. 4:8). "The glory of Lebanon" climaxes Isaiah's prophetic descriptions (Isa. 35:2; 60:13).

Coastal Lebanon was early inhabited by Phoenicians (Josh. 13:5-6), skilled in the employment of its cedars for civil and marine construction (Ezek. 27:4-5), while its sparser inland population was Hivite (Josh. 11:3; Jdg. 3:3). Lebanon is cited in Jotham's fable against Shechem (Jdg. 9:15; cf. the reference to fire hazard), as well as in Jehoash's fable against Amaziah over three centuries later (2 Ki. 14:9; 2 Chr. 25:18). King Solomon contracted with Hiram of Tyre for the use of Lebanon's cedars in the Jerusalem Temple (1 Ki. 5:6-18; cf. Ezra 3:7, concerning the second temple also), 10,000 workers per month hewing the timbers and floating them in great rafts along the Mediterranean coast. Solomon likewise erected government buildings and palaces in his capital, including a hall and armory called "the Palace of the Forest of Lebanon" from its rows of cedar pillars and paneling (1 Ki. 7:2-7; 10:17, 21; Isa. 22:8). The king's Lebanese building projects (cf. 1 Ki. 10:27) led him to construction work in Lebanon itself, at least portions of which came within his widespread domains (1 Ki. 9:19; Cant. 4:8).

Subsequent advances by the pagan empires of antiquity furthered both the conquest and the ruthless exploitation of Lebanon's resources (Isa. 33:9). Egyptians, Assyrians, and Greeks left their successive inscriptions at the mouth of the Dog River (Nahr el-Kelb); and Ezekiel compares the destruction of Assyria's king with the felling of cedars of Lebanon (Ezek. 31:3, 15-16; cf. Zech. 11:1). Habakkuk bewails the violence done also by Babylon in cutting down these forest giants (Hab. 2:17; cf. Isa. 14:8). By the days of Justinian (A.D. 527-565) the once-extensive groves had suffered heavy depletion, and most of the remainder were destroyed early in the twentieth century to supply fuel for the Beirut-Damascus railway. Conservation projects, however, have in recent times attempted reforestation.

Lebaoth. li-bay'oth (Heb. lēbā'ôṭ H4219, “lionesses”). One of the “southernmost towns of the tribe of Judah in the Negev toward the boundary of Edom” (Josh. 15:32; cf. v. 21). The site is unknown. Lebaoth is thought to be the same as BETH LEBATH (19:6), apparently later known as BETH BIRI (1 Chr. 4:31).

Lebbaeus. li-bee'uhs (Gk. Lebbaios G3304 [not in NIV], corresponding to the Heb. or Aram. name libay, “heart”). According to the KJV (following the majority of Greek MSS and some ancient versional evidence), one of the twelve disciples was “Lebbaeus, whose surname was Thaddaeus” (Matt. 10:3; both in this passage and in Mk. 3:18, some MSS read Lebbaeus only instead of Thaddaeus). See THADDAEUS.

Leb Kamai. leb'kuh-mi' (Heb. lēb qāmāy H4214, “heart of my adversaries”). NRSV Leb-qamai. In an oracle against BABYLON, God announces that he will stir up a destroying spirit (or wind) against “the people of Leb Kamai” (Jer. 51:1; KJV, “them that dwell in the midst of them that rise up against me”). It is generally thought, however, that the term is a code name for CHALDEA. See also SHESHAK.

Lebo Hamath. lee'boh-hay'muhth (Heb. lēbō' ḥāmāt H4217, “entrance of Hamath”). A place on the S border of the territory controlled by HAMATH, regarded in the OT as the ideal N border of the Promised Land of Israel. However, it was only under DAVID and SOLOMON, and later under JEROBOAM II, that the territory of Israel extended so far (Num. 13:21; 34:8; Josh. 13:5; Jdg. 3:3; 1 Ki. 8:65; 2 Ki. 14:25; 1 Chr. 13:5; 2 Chr. 7:8; Amos 6:14). EZEKIEL prophesied that some day it would be the boundary of the ideally restored Israel (Ezek. 47:15-20). The KJV and other versions, taking the term as a general description, render it “the entrance of Hamath” or the like, but it is now generally thought to be the actual name of a particular region or city. The precise location of Lebo Hamath has been debated. It is now generally identified with modern Lebweh, a town about 45 mi. (72 km.) N of DAMASCUS.

Lebonah. li-boh'nah (Heb. lēbônāh H4228, “frankincense”). A town in the hill country of EPHRAIM, mentioned only once when the writer of Judges gives the location of SHILOH, which is said to be “east of the road that goes from Bethel to Shechem, and to the south of Lebonah” (Jdg. 21:19). Lebonah is probably to be identified with modern el-Lubban, about 3 mi. (5 km.) WNW of Shiloh and 10 mi. (16 km.) SSW of SHECHEM.

Lecah. lee´kuh (Heb. lēkā H4336, meaning unknown). TNIV Lekah. Son of Er and great-grandson of JUDAH (1 Chr. 4:21). Many believe, however, that Lecah is the name of an otherwise unknown town founded by Er (according to the view that “father” here and in some other genealogical passages means “founder” or “chief citizen”).

lectionary. A book of biblical lections (i.e., lessons, readings) used for worship services. The term is used especially of Greek MSS in which Scripture portions are written, not in the order in which they appear in the Bible, but according to the schedule set for the church calendar. They are of great value in NT textual studies. See TEXT AND VERSIONS (NT).

ledge. This English term is used to render several Hebrew words referring, for example, to a rim half way between the base and the top of the ALTAR in the TABERNACLE (Exod. 27:5; 38:4), or to two projections forming part of the altar described in Ezekiel’s vision of a future TEMPLE (Ezek. 43:14, 17, 20; 45:19).

leech. See ANIMALS.

leeks. See PLANTS.

lees. A term used by the KJV and other versions for the dregs that settle at the bottom of wine jars and wineskins. It renders Hebrew šēmārîm (pl. of šemer H9069), which occurs in four passages (Ps. 75:8 [here the KJV has “dregs”]; Isa. 25:6 [NIV, “aged wine”]; Jer. 48:11; Zeph. 1:12). WINE gained strength and flavor by being allowed to remain on the lees, and such wine was regarded as superior to the newly fermented product. The word is used in the OT only in a figurative sense.

left-handed. This description is used only regarding warriors from the tribe of BENJAMIN. They include EHUD, one of the judges (Jdg. 3:15); 700 soldiers who leg. Several Hebrew terms may be rendered “leg,” such as kerā H4157, found in OT passages dealing with sacrificial rituals and referring to the shank or splint-bone (Exod. 12:9; Lev. 1:9, 13; et al.). It is also used of the bending hind legs of locusts that were permitted for food (Lev. 11:21), and it formed the basis for an illustration of divine judgment (Amos 3:12). The narrow part of the THIGH was considered one of the choicest pieces of the sacrificial animal, and was reserved for the use of the priests. Animal bones from the upper portion of the right foreleg have been recovered from the debris of a Canaanite temple at LACHISH. These bones evidently comprised the remains of the priestly perquisites, suggesting that the rest of the sacrifice had been eaten by the worshipers outside the sanctuary or in some adjoining room. There was little to indicate that the bones had been burned, and presumably the meat had been cooked by boiling (cf. 1 Sam. 2:15). This evidence provides an authentic historical background for the ritual prescriptions (Lev. 7:32 et al.).

legion. The major unit in the Roman army, consisting of several thousand soldiers. In the NT the word, representing a vast number, is used only in the Gospels and with reference to angels and demons (Matt. 26:53; Mk. 5:9, 15; Lk. 8:30). A division of infantry at full strength consisted of about 6,000 Roman soldiers. Each division was divided into ten COHORTS, and each cohort was further divided into six centuries (see CENTURION). Each subdivision, as well as the large whole, had its own officers and its own standards.

Lehabim. See LEHABITES.

Lehabites. li-hay`bits (Heb. lēhābîm H4260). Also Lehabim. One of the people groups descended from MIZRAIM (Egypt), son of HAM (Gen. 10:13; 1 Chr. 1:11). Nothing is known about them, but many scholars suggest that the word is either a textual corruption or an alternate form of lûbîm, “Libyans.” See LIBYA.

Lehi. lee`hi (Heb. lēhî H4306, “cheek, jawbone,” possibly in the fig. sense of “border”). A site in JUDAH where SAMSON slew 1,000 PHILISTINES with the jawbone of a donkey (Jdg. 15:9, 14, 19; cf. v. 17, “Ramath Lehi”). There has been much debate regarding the identification of Lehi. One popular proposal is Khirbet eṣ-Ṣiyyaj, which lies some 4 mi. (6 km.) E of TIMNAH (cf. 14:1-2). The evidence for this and other identifications, however, is very ambiguous. It has also been suggested that Lehi is a general term denoting the entire borderline between Judah and Philistia.

Lekah. lee´kuh. TNIV form of LECAH.

Lemuel. lem´yoo-uhl (Heb. lēmû ʾēl H4345, “belonging to God”). The reputed author of Prov. 31, who repeats his mother’s teachings about good government, the dangers of sex and wine, and (if his sayings include vv. 9-29) the virtues of a noble wife. Rabbinic tradition equates Lemuel with SOLOMON, but modern scholars reject this view. Some translations, such as RSV and NJPS, understand the Hebrew term maśśā ʾ H5363 (“oracle,” v. 1) as a proper name, making Lemuel king of MASSA.

This small clay tablet is one of the famous Tell el-Amarna letters (c. 1350 B.C.). In it, Burna-Buriash II writes to Amenhotep III of Egypt, requesting more gold with the next exchange of presents.

letter. This English word is used in various senses to translate several different terms in both Testaments. For example, Hebrew ḥiggeret H1115 (2 Chr. 30:1, 6; Neh. 2:7-9; 6:5, 17, 19; Esth. 9:26, 29), meaning an official or commercial communication, refers to a tablet of a specific small size with a clay envelope upon which the sender and addressee were noted and on occasion some of the contents were indicated. In the NT, Greek gramma G1207 can refer to a written communication (e.g., Acts 28:21), but more common is the meaning “letter [of the alphabet], written character” (cf. 2 Cor. 3:6-7; Gal. 6:11). Paul uses it in the sense of “written code,” contrasted with pneuma G4460, “Spirit/spirit” (Rom. 2:27, 29; 7:6). Another Greek term is the familiar epistolē G2186, which occurs more than twenty times. See EPISTLE.

Letushim. See LETUSHITES.

Letushites. li-too´shits (Heb. lētûšîm H4322, possibly “sharpened ones”). Also Letushim. A people group descended from DEDAN, grandson of ABRAHAM and Keturah (Gen. 25:3). Neither this tribe nor the related Asshurites and Leummites have been identified, but they probably inhabited parts of N Arabia.

Leummim. lee-uh'mim. See Leummites.

Leummites. lee-uh'mits (Heb. lē ʾummîm H4212, possibly “hordes” or “tribesmen”). Also Leummim. A people group descended from Dedan, grandson of Abraham and Keturah (Gen. 25:3). See Letushites.

Levant. luh-vant'. A modern name applied to the countries that border the E end of the Mediterranean Sea: Turkey, Syria, Lebanon, Israel, and Egypt.

Levi. lee'vi (Heb. lēwî H4290, by popular etymology related to lāwāh H4277, “to join, attach” [Gen. 29:34], but actual derivation disputed; gentilic lēwî H4291, “Levite”). (1) Third son of Jacob and Leah, and ancestor of the tribe bearing his name (Gen. 29:34; 35:23; Exod. 1:2; 1 Chr. 2:1). When Shechem the Hivite assaulted Dinah, her brothers Levi and Simeon led in executing vengeance by killing all the males and pillaging the city of Shechem (Gen. 34:25-31; cf. Jacob's disapproval in 49:5-7). Levi's three sons, Gershon, Kohath, and Merari, were born before the Exodus from Egypt. The descendants of Levi are called Levites, but because they were especially chosen to assist the priests, this term took on the sense of a religious office, almost meaning “ministers.” Although Aaron was a descendant of Levi (through Kohath), he and his progeny were granted the office of the priesthood and thus were distinguished from the Levites. The tribe of Levi did not receive a share of the territory in Canaan, for the Lord himself was their inheritance (Num. 18:20). See Levitical Cities.

(2) Son of Melki, included in the Genealogy of Jesus Christ (Lk. 3:24).

(3) Son of Simeon, included in the Genealogy of Jesus Christ (Lk. 3:29).

(4) Son of Alphaeus; he was a Tax Collector (publican) who later became one of the twelve apostles (Mk. 2:14-17; Lk. 5:27-32). In the Gospel of Matthew he is always called Matthew instead of Levi (Matt. 9:9-13). The name does not appear in any of the formal lists as a variant of Matthew.

Leviathan. li-vi'uh-thuhn (Heb. liwyātān H4293, possibly “twisting one”). There can be no doubt that this name is basically the same as that found in Ugaritic documents for Lotan (Litan), the sea-monster killed by Baal and called “the crooked serpent” (cf. Isa. 27:1). All five occurrences of the term in the OT (Job 3:8; 41:1; Ps. 74:14; 104:26; Isa. 27:1) are in poetic passages and belong to “dead mythology,” that is, old mythic concepts employed without suggestion that they are still believed. Because Leviathan is merely poetic imagery, there is no absolute consistency in the OT use of the term. For example, the use in Isa. 27:1 is part of an eschatological section (chs. 24-27) where the term refers to the future forces of lawlessness in terms of past chaos. In Job 41:1 Leviathan seems to be the CROCODILE. See ANIMALS (under crocodile and Leviathan), and cf. the use of RAHAB (MONSTER), another mythological figure (26:12).

levirate marriage. A law of MOSES which states that if two brothers live together, and one of them dies without leaving a male heir, his brother shall marry his widow, and the first son of the union shall take the name of the brother who died (the term derives from Latin lēvir, “husband’s brother”). If the brother refuses to marry the widow, she shall bring him before the elders of the city, and in their presence remove a sandal from his foot and spit in his face. The purpose of the law obviously was to provide an heir for the dead brother (Deut. 25:5-10; cf. also Gen. 38:1-11; Ruth 4:1-12). This practice underlies the argument of the SADDUCEES in Matt. 22:23-33.

Levite. lee´vit (Heb. lēwî H4291). The name given to the descendants of LEVI son of JACOB. Because they were chosen to administer the religious life of the nation of ISRAEL, the name Levite took on a specialized sense roughly equivalent to “minister.”

I. Their origin. Levi was the third son of Jacob by LEAH (Gen. 29:34; 35:22-26). The Genesis record gives no intimation regarding the later greatness of the tribe bearing Levi’s name. Such silence bears indirect testimony to the fact that the Genesis account must have been written prior to the noble event that took place at Mount SINAI (Exod. 32:25-29) causing Levi’s descendants to receive special status in Israel. The Genesis record is thus free of any bias or hint of Levi’s future greatness as a tribe in Israel. Furthermore, if the Genesis account had been written after the event on Mount Sinai, as claimed by many, it is difficult to understand why the record of Levi’s notorious deed at SHECHEM (Gen. 34:25-31) was still retained, especially if, as also claimed by modern criticism, the early “history” was written, subjectively, to reflect the later greatness of Israel. Let us remember also that Genesis closes with a curse on Levi for his participation in the crime at Shechem (49:5-7). This curse, pronounced by the dying Jacob, would be utterly inconsistent with the view that Genesis, written by multiple writers late in Israel’s history, reflects the national prestige of later times.

II. Their appointment. Several discernible factors undoubtedly influenced the selection of Levi's descendants for their special place in Israel's religion. (1) The divine selection of MOSES and AARON, who were descendants of KOHATH, one of Levi's three sons (Exod. 2:1-10; 6:14-27; Num. 26:59), obviously conferred on the Levites an honor that was recognized by the other tribes. (2) However, an event of transcending importance at Mount Sinai (Exod. 32:25-29) gave to the Levites as a tribe their place of privilege and responsibility in God's plan. The event just referred to transmuted the curse of Jacob's prophecy (Gen. 49:5-7) into the blessing of Moses' prophecy (Deut. 33:8-11). (3) Moreover, this choice was undoubtedly confirmed by a very similar event when an individual Levite, PHINEHAS by name, stayed the plague that was about to decimate the Israelites (Num. 25:1-13). Thus the true record of history shows how the curse on Levi the ancestor became, by the wonders of God's providence, a blessing to his descendants.

Let us consider here some of the purposes served in the divine plan by the selection of the Levites for their special ministry in the worship of God's ancient people. (1) As just recounted, their selection and appointment were rewards for their faithfulness to the Lord in a time of moral declension (Exod. 32:25-29). (2) The doctrine of substitution was illustrated by the selection of this tribe, for, although God claimed the firstborn males of all the tribes on the basis of the death of the firstborn among the Egyptians (13:11-16), God graciously allowed the Levites to become substitutes for their fellow tribesmen (Num. 3:9, 11-13, 40-41, 45-51; 8:14-19). (3) The simplification of service would surely result from the selection of one tribe, for one such tribe closely knit by blood and by ancestral prestige would be more manageable than uncertain detachments from many tribes. (4) The law of the TITHE enhanced the selection of the Levites, for, in a sense, this tribe was a tithe of all the tribes; and it was to this tribe that the tithe was paid (Num. 18:20-21; Deut. 18:1-8; Neh. 10:37-39; Heb. 7:5, 9). (5) Israel's separation from the nations was further intensified by the selection of one tribe that was separated from all the other tribes and separated and purified to the Lord (Num. 8:5-22). (6) Life as a sojourner without an inheritance here is illustrated by the fact that the Levites had no INHERITANCE in Israel; the Lord alone was their inheritance (Num. 18:20-24; 26:62; Deut. 10:9; 12:12; 14:27). Nevertheless it is clear, in the light of Exod. 19:4-5, that humanly speaking the appointment of Levi as the priestly tribe to act on behalf of the whole people was an expedient arising from the fact that the people of God in their entirety could not yet attain to their privilege as priests of the Lord. This, however, has now been secured for us by CHRIST (cf. 1 Pet. 2:9).

III. Their organization. A threefold organization is discernible: (1) The top echelon was occupied by Aaron and his sons; these alone were priests in the restricted sense. The priests belonged to the family of Kohath. (2) The middle echelon included all the other Kohathites who were not of Aaron's family; to them were given certain privileges in carrying the most sacred parts of the TABERNACLE (Num. 3:27-32; 4:4-15; 7:9). (3) The bottom echelon comprised all members of the families of GERSHON and MERARI; to them lesser duties were prescribed (3:21-26, 33-37).

IV. Priests and Levites. The Mosaic legislation made a sharp distinction between the PRIESTS and nonpriests or ordinary Levites. (1) The priests must belong to Aaron's family; the Levites belonged to the larger family of Levi. A priest was a Levite (a descendant of Levi); but a Levite was not necessarily a priest. (2) Priests were consecrated (Exod. 29:1-37; Lev. 8); Levites were purified (Num. 8:5-22). (3) Levites were considered a gift to Aaron and his sons (3:5-13; 8:19; 18:1-7). (4) The fundamental difference consisted of this: only the priest had the right to minister at the altar and to enter the sanctuary (Exod. 28:1; 29:9; Num. 3:10, 38; 4:15, 19-20; 18:1-7; 25:10-13). The rebellion of KORAH, a Kohathite (Num. 16:1) against the uniqueness of Aaron's priesthood illustrated, in the way the rebellion was subdued, the heinous nature of attempting to enter the priesthood without the necessary prerequisites (ch. 16). The choice of Aaron was further confirmed by the budding of his staff (Num. 17:1-11; Heb. 9:4).

V. Post-Mosaic changes. NT TYPOLOGY (cf. Heb. 8-10) considers the Sinaitic legislation the standard form. The post-Sinaitic activity of the Levites may be succinctly summarized in the following way: (1) In the settlement in Canaan the Levites were necessarily relieved of some of their duties, since the tabernacle no longer needed transportation; also, it is doubtful if the Levites ever fully occupied all the forty-eight cities assigned to them and the priests. (2) In DAVID's time the neglect of the provision of Num. 7:1-9 brought death to a Levite (1 Chr. 13:7-10; 15:12-15); David introduced innovations in the age and service of the Levites (23:26), some of whom, particularly ASAPH, became musicians and probably wrote some of the Psalms (1 Chr. 6:39, 43; 15:16-22; 16:4-6; 25:1-9; Ps. 50; 73-83). (3) In the disruption of the united kingdom many Levites from the northern kingdom sought political and religious asylum in JUDAH (2 Chr. 11:13-16; 13:9-12; 15:9), but some Levites were evidently involved in the APOSTASY of the northern kingdom (Ezek. 44:10-15); the Levites during this period were still considered teachers (2 Chr. 17:8-9; 19:8; cf. Deut. 33:10). (4) The exilic period brings before us the symbolism of Ezekiel: only the true Levites, sons of ZADOK, ministered in the TEMPLE (Ezek. 43:19; 44:10-16; 48:11-12). (5) In the postexilic period Levites did not return from BABYLON in the same proportion as the priests (Ezra 2:36-42; Neh. 7:39-45), though later a special effort was required to get the Levites to return (Ezra 8:15-19); they were still considered to be teachers (8:16) and musicians (2:40-41; 3:10-11; Neh. 7:43-44). (6) Only a few references to the Levites are found in the NT (Lk. 10:32; Jn. 1:19; Acts 4:36; Heb. 7:11).

Two points merit a final word: first, Levi, through his ancestor ABRAHAM, paid tithes to MELCHIZEDEK (Gen. 14:17-20), thus proving the superiority of Melchizedek's (i.e., Christ's) priesthood to Aaron's (Heb. 7:4-10); second, since the Levitical priesthood could not bring perfection, it was required that another priest, from a different tribe and a different order, arise (Heb. 7:11-17; cf. Gen. 49:10; Ps. 110).

Levitical cities. Forty-eight cities were allotted to the LEVITES by MOSES and JOSHUA (Num. 35:1-8; Josh. 21; the parallel passage in 1 Chr. 6:54-81 [Heb. 6:39-66] has a smaller list with many differences, some reflecting spelling or textual variations, and others perhaps indicating new cities in later historical periods). The tribe of LEVI did not receive any part of the land of CANAAN as an INHERITANCE (Num. 18:20-24; 26:62; Deut. 10:9; 18:1-2; Josh. 18:7). As compensation, they received the TITHES of Israelites for their support (Num. 18:21), and cities were allotted to them out of the inheritance of the other tribes. Of these cities, the priests received thirteen, all of which were within the tribe of JUDAH (Josh. 21:4); and six were CITIES OF REFUGE, to which a person who had accidentally killed someone could go for protection (Num. 35:9-34; Deut. 4:41-43).

The Levitical cities were made up by taking four cities from each of the twelve tribes. The apparent purpose of thus dispersing the Levites throughout the land was to enable them, as the official representatives of the Hebrew faith, to instruct the people throughout the land in the law and in the worship of Yahweh. The Levites were not the sole possessors or occupiers of these cities. They were simply allowed to live in them and have fields for the pasture of their herds. These cities did not cease to belong to the tribes within which they were located. The Levites did not live only in Levitical cities. They appear to have been regarded, in some respects at least, as belonging to the tribe within which they resided, even if it did not happen to be a Levitical city (cf; Jdg. 17:7; 1 Sam. 1:1). The Levites are never regarded as a thirteenth tribe.

Leviticus, Book of. li-vit'i-kuhs. The third book of the Bible and traditionally one of the five books of MOSES (the PENTATEUCH or TORAH). Its Hebrew title is the first word, wayyiqra ך, “and he called.” The English title is derived from the VULGATE’s Leviticus (in turn derived from the SEPTUAGINT). Although the material of the book focuses on the duties of PRIESTS and nowhere refers to the special functions of the LEVITES, its title is not inappropriate, since the priests were chosen only from the tribe of LEVI. Leviticus is closely associated with Exodus and Numbers in historical continuity, but differs from them in that the purely historical element is subordinate to legal and ritual considerations.

Overview of LEVITICUS

Author: Anonymous, but comments elsewhere in the Bible seem to support the traditional view that MOSES is responsible for the PENTATEUCH as a whole.

Historical setting: The initial composition of the book must have taken place during the wilderness wanderings (either late in the fifteenth or early in the thirteenth cent. B.C.; those who reject Mosaic authorship usually date the book after the EXILE, while acknowledging that much of the material is several centuries earlier).

Purpose: To provide details of the laws that were to govern God’s people, with emphasis on sacrificial requirements and ritual cleanness; to impress upon the people the need for HOLINESS.

Contents: The laws of SACRIFICE (Lev. 1-7); the consecration of the priests (chs. 8-10); ceremonial purity (chs. 11-16); the ways of holiness (chs. 17-27).

Leviticus enshrines the laws by which the religious and civil organization of the primitive THEOCRACY in CANAAN was to be regulated. At SINAI the Israelites had been incorporated into a special relationship with God, had been given the COVENANT laws, and had been provided with a TABERNACLE for WORSHIP. Leviticus contains much that is technical in nature and meant for the direction of the priesthood in the conduct of worship and the regulating of social life. Thus it is distinct from DEUTERONOMY, which in effect provides a popular exposition of the LAW.

The composition of the book was universally ascribed by ancient tradition, both Jewish and Christian, to Moses the lawgiver of Israel, and it was only during the eighteenth century that literary criticism seriously challenged this view. The movement grew in the following century and reached its classic formulation under Julius Wellhausen in 1887. Using a background of Hegelian evolutionary philosophy, he reconstructed Israelite history, and on the basis of a documentary hypothesis for Pentateuchal origins he assigned Leviticus to a postexilic date along with other elements of the so-called Priestly Code. Later criticism held that Leviticus was compiled by temple priests between 500 and 450 B.C., using earlier legislation such as the Holiness Code (Lev. 17-26), which is regarded as dating from about 650. Most critical writers, however, concede that Leviticus contains much older material, such as the Azazel or scapegoat ritual in ch. 16 and traditional historical narratives including the punishment of AARON's sons (10:1-7) and the stoning of the blasphemer (24:10-14).

The literary criteria used in assigning a late date to the bulk of Leviticus have been criticized continuously since the time of Wellhausen, and the number of scholars who find them very difficult to sustain is increasing gradually. This arises in part from a wider knowledge of the media of communication in antiquity and also from historical and archaeological considerations. It is now known that if the techniques of compilation alleged by Wellhausen had actually been employed in the composition of Leviticus and the rest of the PENTATEUCH, it would have been unique in the literary annals of the ANE. Archaeological discoveries have shown that in actual fact the Hebrews used much the same literary methods as their neighbors, and that significant areas of biblical literature are closely related in language and style to other writings of that day.

Reconstruction of the altar of incense.

The first seven chapters of Leviticus give the detailed sacrificial procedures showing how the various kinds of burnt offerings, the meal offering, the sin and guilt offerings, and other sacrifices avail for the removal of sin and defilement under the covenant. A subsequent liturgical section (Lev. 8:1—10:20) describes the consecration of Aaron and the priesthood, followed by the designation of clean and unclean beasts and certain rules of hygiene (11:1—15:33). The ritual of the Day of Atonement is found in ch. 16, followed by a section (17:1—20:27) treating sacrificial blood, ethical laws, and penalties for transgressors. The theme of 21:1—24:23 is priestly holiness and the consecration of seasons, while the following chapter deals with the legislation surrounding the sabbatical and jubilee years. A concluding chapter outlines promises and threats (26:1-46), and an appendix (27:1-34) covers vows. Human SIN, substitutionary ATONEMENT, and divine HOLINESS are prominent throughout Leviticus.

levy. A TAX or TRIBUTE, often to be rendered in service. It is used by the KJV in reference to the 30,000 free Israelites conscripted by SOLOMON for four months' service a year in Lebanon (1 Ki. 5:13-14) and to the tribute labor imposed on the surviving Canaanites (9:21). The NIV uses this term for the tribute of gold and silver imposed by Pharaoh N_{ECO} on Judah (2 Ki. 23:33; 2 Chr. 36:3).

lewdness. Sexual licentiousness. The English term and equivalents such as “lewd conduct” are used a dozen times in Ezekiel (and occasionally elsewhere) to translate zimmāh H2365. In general contexts this Hebrew word means “scheme, [evil] intent” (e.g., Prov. 21:27), but it apparently can function as a semi-technical term for shameful behavior, especially of a sexual nature (Ezek. 23:21 et al.; cf. also Jdg. 20:6; Jer 13:27 [KJV]).

lex talionis. leks’tal-ee-oh’nis. Also ius talionis. This Latin phrase (meaning literally “the law of that [same] kind”) refers to a principle of retaliation whereby a person suffers the same harm that he or she has inflicted on someone else. The concept is expressed in the Bible as early as Gen. 9:6, “Whoever sheds the blood of man, by man shall his blood be shed,” but especially in Exod. 21:23-25, “But if there is serious injury, you are to take life for life, eye for eye, tooth for tooth, hand for hand, foot for foot, burn for burn, wound for wound, bruise for bruise” (cf. Matt. 5:38). The principle expresses not only the validity of legal retaliation but also, and perhaps primarily, the requirement of equity and proportionality in the administration of punishment. The lex talionis therefore does not justify personal VENGEANCE or excessive retaliation.

libation. Usually referred to as a “drink offering”; the pouring out of liquids, such as wine, water, oil, etc., but generally wine, as an offering to a deity. Libations were common among the heathen nations (Deut. 32:38). Drink offerings accompanied many OT SACRIFICES (Exod. 29:40-41; Lev. 23:13, 18, 37; Num. 15:4-10, 24; 28:7-10). In 2 Tim. 4:6 and Phil. 2:17, PAUL pictures his death as a drink offering.

liberalism. In a religious sense, this term (or better, Classical Liberalism, also known as Modernism) refers to a movement that arose in Protestant circles in the middle of the nineteenth century and was prominent through the first decades of the twentieth. It was characterized by an emphasis on free intellectual inquiry, suspicion (or rejection) of orthodox theology, and confidence in the natural goodness of human beings. The label liberalism is often used more broadly to describe any departure from historical Christian thought, especially with regard to the INSPIRATION and authority of the Bible. In a less careful sense, the term liberal is sometimes applied loosely to scholars who use the methods of “higher criticism” or who otherwise do not appear to follow traditional views.

libertine. A person who emphasizes liberty in moral questions and acts without ethical restraints; also, a freethinker who rejects religious authority. The term is used by the KJV with reference to freedmen who composed a synagogue in NT times (Acts 6:9). See FREEDMEN, SYNAGOGUE OF THE.

liberty. Freedom, the opposite of servitude or bondage, whether physical, moral, or spiritual. The term is used of SLAVES or captives being set free from physical servitude or imprisonment (Lev. 25:10; Jer. 34:8, 15-17; Acts 26:23; Heb. 13:23), or the granting of certain privileges while imprisoned (Acts 24:23; 27:3). In Ezek. 46:17 reference is made to “the year of freedom,” which is the Year of JUBILEE. The term has a legal and moral tone in 1 Cor. 7:39 in asserting the right of a widow to remarry. The special concern of Christianity is the spiritual liberty of believers in Christ. Found in union with Christ, it carries with it freedom from the ceremonial law (Gal. 5:1; cf. 2:4) and must be valued and guarded. The essence of Christian liberty lies not in external freedom but in deliverance from the bondage of sin and its consequent inner corruption (Jn. 8:34-36; Rom. 6:20-22).

Spiritual liberty is the result of the Spirit’s regenerating work, for his presence and work within produces liberty (2 Cor. 3:17), giving a sense of freedom through a filial relation with God (Rom. 8:15-16). Godly people in OT times knew a measure of this spiritual liberty (Ps. 119:45), but the GOSPEL reveals and offers it in its fullness. Using the picture of Isa. 61:1, CHRIST proclaimed this liberty to be the goal of his mission (Lk. 4:18). Intimately related to practical HOLINESS of life (Rom. 6:18-22), spiritual liberty never condones license. Believers are warned against abuse of this liberty in sinful indulgence (Gal. 5:13; 1 Pet. 2:16; 2 Pet. 2:19); and speech and conduct are to be judged by “the law of liberty” (Jas. 2:12), which has taken the place of the ancient LAW. In regard to things not expressly commanded or forbidden, Christian liberty must be granted, allowing for the exercise of individual judgment and Christian conscience before God (1 Cor. 10:29-31); but its use must be limited by considerations of love, expediency, and self-preservation, lest that liberty become a stumbling block to the weak (8:9). Romans 8:21 points to creation’s future “liberation” from decay and imperfection when God’s children are glorified.

Libnah. lib´nuh (Heb. libnâ H4243, possibly “white[ness]” or “poplar” or “storax tree”). (1) A stopping place of the Israelites between Rimmon Perez and Rissah on their wilderness journey (Num. 33:20-21; it is thought by some to be identical with LABAN, Deut. 1:1). The site is unknown.

(2) A Canaanite city located in the SHEPHELAH, conquered by the Israelites under JOSHUA (Josh. 10:29-32; 12:15). Libnah was one of the cities included in the territory allotted to the tribe of JUDAH (15:42) and later became one of the LEVITICAL CITIES (21:13; 1 Chr. 6:57). The town successfully revolted against Judah in the reign of JEHORAM, indicating the weakening hold of Judah on her outlying cities (2 Ki. 8:22; 2 Chr. 21:10). Later during the reign of HEZEKIAH, it was one of the fortified cities attacked by SENNACHERIB in his campaign against Judah (2 Ki. 19:8; Isa. 37:8). Libnah was the home of Hamutal, the mother of ZEDEKIAH (2 Ki. 23:31; 24:18; Jer. 52:1). The identification of ancient Libnah is debated, but a widely accepted suggestion is Tell Bornat, about 5 mi. (8 km.) NE of LACHISH.

Libni. lib´ni (Heb. libnî H4249, “white”; gentilic libnî H4250, “Libnite”). (1) Son of GERSHON, grandson of LEVI, and ancestor of the Libnite clan (Exod. 6:17; Num. 3:18, 21; 26:58; 1 Chr. 6:17, 20). Some believe that the name Libnite is derived from the town of LIBNAH. See also LADAN #2.

(2) Son of MAHLI, grandson of MERARI, and great-grandson of Levi (1 Chr. 6:29).

library. A collection of books purposely brought together by, and in the possession of, an individual or an institution. While BOOKS frequently are mentioned in the Bible, nowhere is there a reference to a library existing in Israel. SOLOMON, however, did complain, “Of making many books there is no end” (Eccl. 12:12), indicating that he was well acquainted with an existing body of literature. There is also a remarkable reference in the OT to a library in PERSIA. When the enemies of Israel complained to DARIUS about the Jews, they asked that a search be made in BABYLON concerning the decree of CYRUS permitting the building of the second TEMPLE (Ezra 5:17). Then “King Darius issued an order, and they searched in the archives [lit., the house of the books] stored in the treasury at Babylon” (6:1; see also 4:15). Moreover, ARCHAEOLOGY has uncovered extensive libraries of cuneiform tablets in MESOPOTAMIA and SYRIA, and there is much evidence of literary collections in ancient EGYPT and elsewhere. Libya. lib´ee-uh (Heb. lûb H4275, occurring only in the pl. lûbîm, “Libyans”; Gk. Libyē G3340). A country in N AFRICA, the immediate western neighbor of EGYPT. Greek writers often identified Libya with Cyrenaica (see CYRENE); sometimes the name was used more broadly of the whole N African coastal zone. Many believe that the LEHABITES listed in the Table of Nations (Gen. 10:13; 1 Chr. 1:11) are to be identified with the Libyans. In the OT, the “Lubim” appropriately feature in the forces of Pharaoh SHISHAK (himself of Libyan extraction) when he invaded PALESTINE (2 Chr. 12:3), and also in those of ZERAH defeated by ASA (cf. 2 Chr. 16:8). Along with PUT, the Lubim were reckoned as part of the strength of THEBES by Nahum (Nah. 3:9). Libya and CUSH are also subordinate to Egypt (Dan. 11:43), as happened so often in their history. The MT reading kûb (see CUB) in Ezek. 30:5 is often emended to lûb on the basis of the SEPTUAGINT and the Syriac (cf. NIV and NRSV, “Libya,” but see TNIV). In the NT, we read that visitors from “the parts of Libya near Cyrene” were present in JERUSALEM at PENTECOST (Acts 2:10).

licentiousness. Disregard of accepted moral rules and standards; lack of moral restraint, especially in sexual conduct. The term is used by the NRSV and other versions to render Greek aselgeia G816 (e.g., Rom. 13:13, where NIV has “debauchery”). See LASCIVIOUSNESS.

lie, lying. Since God is TRUTH and truthful, he cannot lie as humans do (Num. 23:19). When Israel was not in a harmonious relation to God and the people rejected his truth, they fell prey to a lie—a false view of life often including IDOLATRY. They are “the fruit of lies” (Hos. 10:13 KJV; NIV, “deception”), allowed a lie to become their refuge (Isa. 28:15), and been led astray by lies (Amos 2:4 KJV; NIV, “false gods”). But God will make an end of all liars (Ps. 5:6). In contrast to those who live a life of lies, the righteous remnant of Israel “do no wrong...speak no lies” (Zeph. 3:13). In the LAW of Moses there are laws against bearing false witness (Exod. 20:16) and perjury (Lev. 19:12), and there is the general command, “Do not lie” (19:11).

The NT also presents the picture of people of the world who “exchanged the truth of God for a lie” (Rom. 1:25). Within the churches there are those who make God a liar by claiming they are not sinners (1 Jn. 1:10) and those who preach a lie—that Jesus is not the CHRIST (1 Jn. 2:22; Rev. 2:2). The source of lies is the DEVIL (Jn. 8:44; Acts 5:3). Christians must not lie to one another (Eph. 4:25; Col. 3:9), for Christ is the truth and those who lie are not one with him. Therefore those who are redeemed by the LAMB are those with no lie on their lips (Rev. 14:5). Connected with the idea of a lie are those who live a lie or convey a lie—a false brother (2 Cor. 11:26), a false apostle (11:13), a false teacher (2 Pet. 2:1), a false witness (Matt. 26:60), a false prophet (7:15), and a false Christ (24:24).

lieutenant. This English term is used by the KJV to render a Hebrew word that refers to a SATRAP (Ezra 8:36; Esth. 3:12; 8:9; 9:3; in the Aram. sections of Daniel, the KJV has “prince,” Dan. 3:2-3, 27; 6:1-7).

life. A complex concept with varied shades of meaning, rendering several Hebrew and Greek terms. It may denote physical or natural life, whether animal (Gen. 1:20; 6:17; Rev. 8:9) or human (Lev. 17:14; Matt. 2:20; Lk. 12:22). It is the vital principle or breath of life, which God imparted to ADAM, making him a living soul (Gen. 2:7). This life is a precious gift, and the taking of life is prohibited (Gen. 9:5; Exod. 20:13; Lev. 24:17). It is propagated through physical generation and is subject to physical DEATH. The term may signify the period of one’s earthly existence, one’s lifetime (Gen. 23:1; 25:7; Lk. 16:25), or the relations, activities, and experiences that make up life (Exod. 1:14; Deut. 32:47; Job 10:1; Lk. 12:15). Occasionally it means one’s manner of life (1 Tim. 2:2; 1 Jn. 2:16) or the means for sustaining life (Deut. 24:6; 1 Jn. 3:17).

But the primary concern of the Scriptures is spiritual or eternal life for the human race. It is the gift of God, mediated through FAITH in Jesus CHRIST (Jn. 3:36; 5:24; Rom. 5:10; 6:23; 1 Jn. 5:12). It is not synonymous with endless existence, which is also true of the unsaved. It is qualitative, involving the impartation of a new nature (2 Pet. 1:3-4). It is communicated to the believer in this life, resulting in fellowship with God in Christ, and is not interrupted by physical death (1 Thess. 5:10). It will find its perfection and full reality of blessedness with God in the life to come (Rom. 2:7; 2 Cor. 5:4). As “the living God” (Deut. 5:26; Ps. 42:2; 1 Thess. 1:9; 1 Tim. 3:15), the eternal and self-existent One, God has absolute life in himself (Jn. 5:26) and is the source of all life (Ps. 36:9; Jn. 1:4; 17:3; 1 Jn. 1:1-2; 5:20).

life, book of. This figurative NT expression (Rev. 13:8; 17:8; 20:12; 21:27; cf. also Phil. 4:3; Rev. 3:5; 20:15) is based on OT references to God’s book in which were written the names of the righteous (Ps. 69:28; Exod. 32:32). This notion, in turn, is related to the ancient custom of keeping genealogies and national registers in Israel (Neh. 7:5, 64; 12:12; Ps. 87:6; Jer. 22:30; Ezek. 13:9). Just as these latter records were carefully inscribed and preserved, so God knows his people. The NT uses the phrase to stress the ASSURANCE of salvation. Anchored in eternity, that salvation is certain for all those whose names are written in “the book of life belonging to the Lamb that was slain from the creation of the world” (Rev. 13:8). They may rejoice because their names are written in heaven (Lk. 10:20). To be in the book of life is ground for the certainty of salvation. Not to be found in God’s book, or to be blotted out of it (Exod. 32:32-33; Ps. 69:28), or not to be found in the book of life (Rev. 17:8; 20:15) means separation from God and perdition.

life, tree of. See TREE OF LIFE.

light. The first recorded utterance of God in the Bible is “Let there be light” (Gen. 1:3), the first sign of divine operation in the world of chaos and DARKNESS. Dawn indicates the sure dispelling of darkness, the essence of all God’s gifts. God is the creator of both light and darkness (Isa. 45:6-7) and watches over their orderly succession (Ps. 104:20; Amos 4:13), yet light is superior (Eccl. 2:13). It is often very difficult to distinguish between natural and metaphorical uses of light in the Bible. Light is above all the source of life (11:7). The word is used in parallel with expressions for being alive (Job 3:20) or being born

(3:16) or for the pleasures of life (Ps. 97:11) or for good days for the righteous (112:4) or for an essential in man's happiness (36:9).

Light brings order to the world. Light and TRUTH are coupled biblically (Ps. 43:3; cf. Ps. 19; Prov. 6:23; Isa. 51:4). Truth and LAW give the light of knowledge (Ps. 19:8; 139:11-12). The recipients of light themselves become light, shining outwardly (Ps. 34:5; Eccl. 8:1) and inwardly (Prov. 20:27; Dan. 5:11). God is described as "the Father of the heavenly lights" (Jas. 1:17), he who dwells in light (Exod. 13:21; Ps. 104:2; 1 Tim. 6:16) and who imparts light as a divine gift. The OT concept of Scripture as a LAMP or a light is taken over in the NT (2 Pet. 1:19). Conversion is spoken of as illumination (Heb. 6:4; 10:32). Believers are "people of the light" (Lk. 16:8; 1 Thess. 5:5) and the "light of the world" (Matt. 5:14). Because the gift may be lost through inactivity (Jn. 5:35; 1 Thess. 5:5-6), the heavenly light must be used as armor or a weapon (Eph. 6:12; Rom. 13:12) in the fight against darkness. The light is permanently present in Christ (Jn. 1:7-9; Heb. 1:3) and in the GOSPEL (Acts 26:23; 2 Cor. 4:4). In the new age there will be no more night (Rev. 21:23). John stresses that "God is light" (1 Jn. 1:5), and he who hates his brother is in darkness (2:11).

lightning. A visible electric discharge between rain clouds or between a rain cloud and the earth, producing a thunderclap. In PALESTINE and SYRIA lightning is common during the heavy fall and spring rains. Lightning is generally accompanied by heavy rain, and at times by hail (Exod. 9:23-24). The Scriptures mention lightning as a manifestation of God's power, symbolizing his command of the forces of nature (Job 28:26; 38:35; Ps. 135:7; Zech. 10:1). Lightnings are his instruments in bringing about the destruction of his opponents (Ps. 18:14; 144:6; Zech. 9:14-15). Lightning is a symbol of speed (Ezek. 1:14; Nah. 2:4; Zech. 9:14) and of dazzling brightness (Dan. 10:6; Matt. 28:3). In Matt. 24:27 and Lk. 17:24 Jesus uses the figure of lightning to indicate the unmistakable certainty of the fact that he will come again. In Lk. 10:18 Jesus speaks of beholding Satan fallen as lightning, symbolic of a definite and terrific defeat.

figure. A precious stone. The term is used by the KJV to render a Hebrew word that probably refers to the jacinth (Exod. 28:19; 39:12). See MINERALS.

Likhi. lik´hi (Heb. liqḥî H4376, perhaps “[Yahweh] takes”). Son of S_{HEMIDA} and descendant of M_{ANASSEH} (1 Chr. 7:19). The precise genealogical connection is not specified in 1 Chronicles, but elsewhere (Num. 26:32) Shemida seems to be regarded as a son of G_{ILEAD}.

Lilith. lil´ith (Heb. lîlîṯ H4327, derivation uncertain). This name is used by the NRSV and some other versions as a transliteration of a Hebrew word that occurs only once in a passage describing the terrible desolation that will befall E_{DOM} (Isa. 34:14). The term is associated, probably by popular etymology, with Hebrew laylâ H4326, “night.” Because most (or perhaps all) of the other creatures mentioned in the context are real animals or birds thought to inhabit waste solitudes, this word has been rendered variously as “screech owl” (KJV), “night hag” (RSV), “night-jar” (NEB), “night creatures” (NIV). Its rendering as a proper name, “Lilith,” reflects a derivation from Akkadian lilitu, the name of a female demon or lesser deity about whom little is known. It must not be assumed that the prophet himself believed in the existence of Lilith. More likely, in a highly imaginative passage in which he describes the awful desolation of Edom, he simply mentions some creatures, real and unreal, which in the popular imagination are said to inhabit unpeopled solitudes.

lily-work. This term is used by several Bible versions with reference to the architectural ornamentation on the tops of the free-standing pillars, J_{AKIN} AND B_{OAZ}, at the vestibule of Solomon’s T_{EMPLE} (1 Ki. 7:19, 22 [NIV, “in the shape of lilies”]; note also the description of the molten sea, 2 Chr. 4:5). It is thought likely that this lily-work was modeled after the Egyptian lotus, which was the staple ornament not only in Egyptian art, but also was widely used, as archaeological remains show, in Assyria, Persia, and Palestine.

line. This English term, with its different senses, is used variously to render a number of Hebrew words, especially qāw H7742, referring to a “measuring line,” such as builders use (2 Ki. 21:13; Jer. 31:39; Ezek. 47:3; Zech. 1:16; sometimes used figuratively, as in Isa. 28:10, 17; 28:1; 34:11). The Greek word kanōn G2834, “[measuring] rod, ruler,” is rendered “line” by the KJV in a passage where PAUL refers to a person's sphere of work or "territory" marked out by God (2 Cor. 10:16).

linen. Thread or cloth, prepared from the fiber of flax (see PLANTS). The use of flax fiber for cloth and other purposes is very ancient, being traceable as far back as the Stone Age. Flax was cultivated in MESOPOTAMIA, ASSYRIA, and EGYPT, and linen was well known in the ancient biblical world. Ancient Egypt was noted for its fine linen and carried on a thriving export with neighboring nations. Flax was being cultivated in the tropical climate around JERICHO at the time of the conquest (Josh. 2:6). Having learned the art in Egypt (Exod. 35:25), Hebrew women practiced the spinning and weaving of flax (Prov. 31:13, 19). The clans of BETH ASHBEA attained eminence as workers in linen (1 Chr. 4:21).

Linen is the translation of several different Hebrew and Greek words. In some contexts these terms can be differentiated, but they often are used interchangeably. The term "fine linen" in the Bible refers to sheer, often almost translucent material of the expensive finely woven linen worn by royal and wealthy people or the priests of the temple. The biblical references show varied uses of linen. For clothing it was preferred to cotton material in warm climates because of the sensation of coolness given by linen garments. Its use is frequently mentioned in connection with the garments of the Aaronic priests (Exod. 28:42; Lev. 6:10; 1 Sam. 22:18), their tunics, undergarments, and headdresses being exclusively of linen, and the girdle largely of it (Exod. 28:39; 39:27-29). It was also preferred by others for dress in religious services; it was worn by the child Samuel (1 Sam. 2:18), by the Levitical singers in the temple (2 Chr. 5:12), and even by royal personages (2 Sam. 6:14; 1 Chr. 15:27).

ANGELS are described as dressed in linen (Ezek. 9:2; 10:2; Dan. 10:5; 12:6), as also the host of the redeemed returning with Christ from heaven (Rev. 19:14). In Rev. 19:8 linen is used figuratively of the moral purity of the saints. Linen was used also for garments of distinction (Gen. 41:41; Esth. 8:15). Apparently linen garments of a coarser material were worn by men (Jdg. 14:12-13) and women (Prov. 31:22). But the use of fine linen for ordinary purposes was apparently a sign of luxury and extravagance (Isa. 3:23; Ezek. 16:10; Lk. 16:19; Rev. 18:12, 16). Linen was used also for nets (Isa. 19:9), measuring lines (Ezek. 40:3), girdles (Jer. 13:1), and for fine hangings (Esth. 1:6). In NT times at least, linen was extensively used by the Jews for burial shrouds, as at the burial of Jesus (Matt. 27:59; Mk. 15:46; Lk. 23:53; Jn. 19:40; 20:5ff.). Egyptian mummies were wrapped exclusively in linen sheets of vast proportions. See also DRESS.

lintel. The head-piece of a DOOR, carrying the weight of the structure above it. The term is used by some Bible versions to render Hebrew mašqôp H5485 (Exod. 12:22-23). The Israelites were commanded to mark the top as well as the sides of the doorframe with the blood of the paschal lamb when the Passover was instituted.

Linus. li'nuhs (Grk. Linos G3352). A Christian who, along with others, was a friend of the apostle PAUL during his second Roman imprisonment and who sent greetings to TIMOTHY (2 Tim. 4:21). According to early church tradition, this Linus was given the office of the episcopate of the church in ROME by the apostles PETER and Paul, serving there as bishop for twelve years.

lion. See ANIMALS.

lip. The fold of flesh that surrounds the opening of the mouth. The diverse usage of the Hebrew and Greek terms for "lip" illustrates the manner in which a primary organ of the body was employed to describe a number of widely variant phenomena. By metonymy, for example, the Hebrew word šāpâ H8557 came to mean language or manner of speaking of individuals and nations alike (Gen. 11:1; Prov. 17:7), as well as the gossip of casual conversationalists (Prov. 17:4; Ezek. 36:3). The extension of the term by metaphorical usage naturally suggested the brink or shore of the sea or the bank of a river (Gen. 22:17; 41:3; Dan. 12:5; et al.). By further derivation the word was used to designate the border or edge of something, as with a garment or curtain (Exod. 26:4, 10; 28:26; et al.). The ancients also could assign emotional and ethical qualities to bodily organs, including the lips. The lips not merely spoke but rejoiced (Ps. 71:23), quivered fearfully (Hab. 3:16), preserved knowledge (Prov. 5:2), offered praise (Ps. 63:3); and besides being righteous (Prov. 16:13) they could be lying (Ps. 120:2), uncircumcised (Exod. 6:12, 30), perverse (Prov. 4:24), and so on. Literary parallelism with the tongue or mouth was common in poetry (Ps. 34:13; 51:15). In the NT the Greek word cheilos G5927 was used both literally and metaphorically in the same sense as in the OT, almost always in quotations from the SEPTUAGINT (Matt. 15:8; Mk. 7:6; Rom. 3:13; 2 Cor. 14:21; 1 Pet. 3:10; cf. also Heb. 11:12; 13:15).

literature. See BOOK; WRITING.

litter. This English term, in its meaning of an enclosed BED or COUCH used to carry a person, is used by some Bible versions to render the common Hebrew word mittâ H4753, “bed,” in Cant. 3:7 (NIV, “carriage”), and the rare term šāb H7369, “covered cart or wagon,” in Isa. 66:20 (NIV, “wagons”).

Little Apocalypse. A term applied sometimes to Isa. 24-27, but more frequently to Jesus’ eschatological discourse recorded in Mk. 13 and parallels. See ESCHATOLOGY.

liver. The heaviest of the viscera, both in weight and importance, mentioned over a dozen times in the OT. Usually the reference is to the bodily organ in connection with SACRIFICES (e.g., Exod. 29:13, 22; Lev. 3:4, 10, 15; 4:9; 7:4). Its use for purposes of DIVINATION was common among heathen nations (Ezek. 21:21), but the practice is not verified among the Jews. Being closely identified with the source and center of life, it is mentioned in depicting profound sorrow (Lam. 2:11 KJV), and piercing it was fatal (Prov. 7:22-23).

living creature. The usual translation of Hebrew nepeš ḥayyâ (H5883 plus the adjective ḥay H2645, thus “alive soul, alive being”) or simply the noun ḥayyâ H2651 (“animal”). In Genesis and Leviticus, it is a nontechnical expression referring to ANIMALS (Gen. 1:21 et al.; Lev. 11:10, 14). By using it technically, Ezekiel referred to the CHERUBIM (Ezek. 1:5, 13-15, 19-22). The four living creatures in his vision each had four faces (man, lion, ox, eagle). In the NT, the corresponding Greek term, zōon G2442 (“living being, animal”), refers simply to animals a few times (Heb. 13:11; 2 Pet. 2:12; Jude 10), but the special sense occurs only in Revelation, where it is applied to the four living creatures in the heavenly scene, always present in and around the throne of the Lamb (Rev. 4:6-9 et al.). Each had six wings (four in Ezekiel) and further differed from the OT description where the ox was replaced by an eagle, each creature having a single identity.

Lo-Ammi. loh-am´i (Heb. lō ʾammî H4204, “not my people”). A symbolical name given by the prophet HOSEA to his second son and third child by his wife GOMER (Hos. 1:9). His firstborn son was called Jezreel, which means “Yahweh sows,” an allusion to scattering or destruction (vv. 4-5); see JEZREEL (PERSON) #2. A previous daughter was given the name LO-RUHAMAḤ, meaning “not pitied/loved” (v. 6). The names given to the children were symbolic of the fact that Israel, because of its disobedience, had forfeited the compassion and protection of Yahweh. Nevertheless, the passage immediately promises a reversal of this judgment (1:10; 2:1 [Heb. 2:1, 3]).

Lod, Lydda. lod, lid´uh (Heb. lōd H4254; Gk. Lydda G3375 [LXX, Lod]). A town said to have been built, along with ONO, by a Benjamite named SHEMAḤ (1 Chr. 8:12); it is listed with Ono and HADID among the towns to which the Jews returned after the EXILE (Ezra 2:33; Neh. 7:37; 11:35). Lod is identified with modern el-Ludd, some 11 mi. (18 km.) SE of JOPPA. Its strategic position—on the two highways that led from EGYPT to BABYLON and from Joppa to JERUSALEM—made it a prize of war throughout the centuries. In the Hellenistic period it came to be known as Lydda. PETER cured a man with palsy there (Acts 9:32-35, the only NT reference to the town). After the destruction of Jerusalem in A.D. 70, it became a center of Christian activity in N Palestine. It had been a center of rabbinic studies for a period even before the Roman overthrow of the rebellion. The town became known as Diospolis by the third Christian century and was the center of a trade in purple dye. It was the site of the death of St. George, who was martyred there in 303.

Lo Debar. loh-dee'buhr (Heb. lô dēbār H4274 [with variant spellings], by popular etymology, “nothing”). A town or city-state in TRANSJORDAN that was the home of MAKIR son of Ammiel (2 Sam. 9:4-5; 17:27). JONATHAN's lame son, MEPHIBOSHETH, lived in Makir's house, and from that place DAVID summoned him to the palace (9:1-13). AMOS plays on the sound of the name Lo Debar (Amos 6:13). Some scholars think its original name was Lidbir (Lidebir), which may have been a town on the N boundary of the tribe of GAD in GILEAD (Josh. 19:26 NJPS; cf. NRSV mg.). See DEBIR (PLACE) #3. In any case, the location of Lo Debar is uncertain.

lodge. This English verb is used often by the KJV, mainly as the rendering of Hebrew lîn H4328, “remain [through the night]” (Gen. 24:23 et al.), and Greek aulizomai G887, “to lie in the courtyard, to pass the night” (Matt. 21:17 et al.). The term is found less frequently in modern versions, which prefer such expressions as “stay” and “spend the night.” As a noun, “lodge” occurs in the KJV as the rendering of mēlûnâ H4870 (Isa. 1:8; NIV, “hut”).

log. A Hebrew term used of the smallest liquid measure of capacity, about two-thirds of a pint. See WEIGHTS AND MEASURES.

logia. loh'jee-ah. This Greek term (pl. of logion G3359) is used in nonbiblical literature for the utterances of deities. Such usage is also found in the SEPTUAGINT (e.g., Ps. 12:6 [Heb. 12:7, LXX 11:7]) and occasionally in the NT (Acts 7:38; Rom. 3:2; cf. Heb. 5:13; 1 Pet. 4:11). In the church fathers the term begins to be used for the sayings of Jesus, and in the present day it is generally restricted to this usage. The existence and circulation of collections of Logia may be the source of possibly two AGRAPHA (sayings ascribed to Jesus in the NT, but not found in the Gospels)—Acts 20:35 and 1 Thess. 4:16-17. Luke may also have used such collections in his research in the preparation of his gospel (Lk. 1:1-3). In modern times, actual collections of sayings dating from the early church have been discovered. For example, a PAPYRUS fragment dated about the middle of the third century and designated POxy 1 (from ancient Oxyrhynchus on the NILE) contains seven sayings attributed to Jesus; it seems to be a part of a large collection of sayings. The phenomenal discovery of Gnostic papyri in 1945 near modern Nag Hammadi in Egypt included two documents entitled Gospel of Thomas and Gospel of Philip. These are collections of sayings of Jesus in Coptic. The Gospel of Thomas contains 114 sayings; in comparison with the canonical sayings, this book shows some of the heretical tendencies of the Gnostic community where it circulated (see G_{NOSTICISM}). The Gospel of Philip, a collection of 127 sayings purported to be revelations imparted by Jesus to a group (Hebrews) including Philip and dated about A.D. 400, is more heretical and esoteric than the Gospel of Thomas.

Logos. loh'gohs. A transliteration of the Greek term logos G3364, which has a wide range of meanings, including "word, statement, conversation, speech," as well as "thought, opinion, reason," etc. As a philosophical term, the concept goes back to the Ionian philosopher Heraclitus (c. 500 B.C.), to whom Logos meant the universal reason permeating the world and finding self-consciousness in the mind of the philosophers. The STOICS adopted the term for a dynamic principle of reason operating in the world and forming a medium of communion between God and human beings. The latter function becomes prominent in PHILO, with whom the Logos is at once the Stoics' active and intelligent world-principle, the thought in the divine mind, which was identical with the sum total of Plato's "Forms" or "Ideas," and a mediator between God and the matter of his creation. For Philo, as indeed for his predecessors, the Logos is neither personal nor impersonal. It was vaguely equated with God's utterance (Gen. 1:3; Ps. 33:9), his "word" in such passages as Ps. 107:20; 147:15, 18, and such expressions as "the angel of the covenant," and equated with "wisdom" in the personification of Prov. 8. It is possible that the Qumran community (see DEAD SEA SCROLLS) fused the same Hebrew and Hellenistic concepts into their doctrine of the spirit of truth, which, like the spirit of error, was a creature of God (the relevant passages in the Rule of the Community document do not admit of dogmatism).

In the NT the Logos appears in John's writings (Jn. 1:1-3, 14; 1 Jn. 1:1; Rev. 19:13), though allusions in Paul's writings and the epistle to the Hebrews might be added. Logos is imperfectly translated "Word," and it is not easy to comprehend the full context of the idea in its Judeo-Hellenistic context. There can be no doubt that John saw value in expressing Christian thought in the terminology of the day, a point appreciated by the early church fathers in their sometimes perilous development of the Logos doctrine. Significantly enough, John wrote his prologues at the end of the first century, when the first signs of Gnostic error were discernible (see G_{NOSTICISM}). In John's use of Logos we must certainly see that blending of Judaic and Hellenistic concepts that appeared in Philo's use of the term. From its Greek ancestry, etymological and philosophical, the Johannine Word would contain not only the notion of reason, but also the active expression of reason on a divine and perfect plane. Hence the conception of the visible universe as an expression of God's reason, that reason being the force and agency of creation, the Word who said: "Let there be..." But John becomes entirely original and creative when he boldly equates this reason with God himself, and simultaneously sees its INCARNATION in CHRIST. It seems likely that John, in this bold thought, brought to firmer expression in the terminology of Hellenistic thought a concept already expressed in 1 Cor. 8:6; Col. 1:15-17; and Heb. 1:2-3. In view of the Colossian heresy of angelic mediatorship the last context is significant.

loins. Used in the KJV to describe the part of the body between the ribs and the hip bones. It is the place where the girdle was worn (Exod. 12:11; 2 Ki. 1:8; Jer. 13:1; Matt. 3:4) and the sword was fastened (2 Sam. 20:8). Pain and terror were reflected in weakness and shaking of the loins (Ps. 38:7; 66:11; 69:23; Jer. 30:6). Girding the loins with sackcloth was a sign of mourning (1 Ki. 20:32; Isa. 32:11; Jer. 48:37). As the place of the reproductive organs the loins are euphemistically named for the generative function (Gen. 35:11; 1 Ki. 8:19; Acts 2:30; Heb. 7:5). Since garments were worn ungirded about the house, to gird up the loins signified preparation for vigorous action (Exod. 12:11; 1 Ki. 18:46; Job 38:3; Prov. 31:17; Lk. 12:35; 1 Pet. 1:13). To have the loins girded with truth signified strength in attachment to truth (Eph. 6:14; cf. Isa. 11:5).

Lois. loh'is (Gk. Lōis G3396). The grandmother of TIMOTHY; she was probably the mother of Timothy's mother, EUNICE (2 Tim. 1:5). The family lived at LYSTRA (Acts 16:1). Lois, a devout Jewish believer, likely was converted to Christianity during PAUL's first missionary journey (Acts 14). Paul speaks of the unpretending faith of Timothy, and adds that this faith first dwelt in his grandmother Lois and his mother Eunice.

longsuffering. The term preferred by KJV to account for the delay of the Lord in inflicting punishment or exercising his WRATH (modern versions prefer "slow to anger, forbearance, patience"). The idea is that God delays his exercise of WRATH to give time for repentance and amendment of life (Exod. 34:6; Num. 14:18; Ps. 86:15; Jer. 15:15; Rom. 2:4; 2 Pet. 3:9). In a similar manner, CHRIST is said to be longsuffering (1 Tim. 1:16; 2 Pet. 3:15). The KJV uses the term also to describe human beings. As so used, it refers to being patient especially when facing evil. It is one of the aspects of the fruit of the Spirit (Gal. 5:22), for the Lord's servants must be longsuffering (2 Tim. 2:24).

The relation between divine and human longsuffering is conveyed by the parable of the unforgiving servant told by Jesus in Matt. 18:21-35.

Turkish woman working at a wooden loom.

loom. An apparatus for weaving thread or yarn into cloth (Jdg. 16:14; Isa. 38:12). In Bible times three types of looms were in use. One was the horizontal loom, also called the ground loom, because it was laid out horizontally on the ground. The other two types of loom were upright and were operated from a sitting or a standing position. See WEAVING.

loop. The TABERNACLE was covered with two sets of five linen curtains, and along one side of each set fifty loops of blue thread were sewn. Fifty gold clasps were attached to one side of the other set of curtains, and thus the two halves of the curtain were joined. The outer covering was made of goatskin in the same way, also with clasps and loops (Exod. 26:4-5, 10-11; 36:11-12, 17).

lord. The English word lord (or capitalized, Lord) is used to translate various terms in the OT. As a title of men, it can designate governmental, religious, and military officials. The common Hebrew word ba'al H1251 (“owner, husband,” etc.) can be used in this sense (e.g., Isa. 16:8 NRSV; NIV, “rulers”), as can ʾādôn H123 (Gen. 42:20 et al.) and other nouns. When applied to deity, the title baʿal came to be identified directly with a specific Canaanite god (see BAAL). In contrast, ʾādôn is used of the true God (e.g., Josh. 3:11), esp. in the form ʾādōnāy H151 (lit., “my lords”; Gen. 15:2 et al.). Most English Bible versions use the form LORD (i.e., in small caps) to render God’s special covenant name, Yahweh. See JEHOVAH.

The Greek word kyrios G3261, which can also refer to human beings in positions of authority, is used by the SEPTUAGINT to render the Hebrew words applied to the true God. In the NT it occurs as a designation of the sovereign God in relationship to his CREATION (Matt. 1:20; 11:25; Lk. 4:18). But it is also the supreme title given to CHRIST. “Jesus is Lord” was perhaps the earliest creedal statement formulated and recited (prob. chiefly at BAPTISM, Acts 8:16; 19:5) by the early Christians. In its infancy, the CHURCH had worshiped Jesus as Lord, and its ARAMAIC prayer, MARANATHA, “Our Lord, come,” still stands in the text as witness to this fact (1 Cor. 16:22). Indeed, if Phil. 2:6-11 is a primitive Christian hymn, as some have claimed, then PAUL was the recipient of an earlier tradition about the Lordship of Jesus rather than the originator of a new title to describe his own understanding of him. This title stood also in the tradition Paul had received concerning the LORD’S SUPPER (1 Cor. 11:23). By referring to Jesus as Lord, the early church declared him as standing above the human level—an object of prayer (Acts 7:59, 60; 1 Cor. 12:8; 16:22) and trust (Acts 5:14; 9:42; 11:24; cf. also the fourth gospel), sharing with God in his sovereign rule (2:34), and ultimately sharing with God in his nature. For being conscious that the Greek OT regularly used kyrios to designate Yahweh, early Christians, even Jewish Christians, chose that term as the supreme title to convey their understanding of Jesus. By it, therefore, they intended to identify him with the God of the OT. This intent is seen most clearly in those NT passages where OT texts originally referring to Yahweh are now boldly quoted as referring to Jesus (Rom. 10:13; Heb. 1:10; 1 Pet. 2:3; 3:15).

Lord, day of the. See DAY OF THE LORD; LORD’S DAY.

Lord of hosts. The phrase “LORD of hosts” is used by the KJV and other Bible translations as a literal rendering of Hebrew yhwh ʿēbā ʾôṭ, which occurs well over 200 times in the OT as a designation of the true God (it is esp. frequent in Isaiah, Jeremiah, Zechariah, and Malachi). The first word in the phrase is the divine name Yahweh (see JEHOVAH). The second word is the plural form of the Hebrew noun ʿābā ʾ H7372, which means “army” but also is applied to the stars (e.g., 2 Ki. 17:16) and to the heavenly attendants (1 Ki. 22:19). See HOST OF HEAVEN.

In many instances (mostly in Isaiah) the SEPTUAGINT renders the phrase with a transliteration, kyrios sabaōth (used twice in the NT, Rom. 9:29 [a LXX quotation]; Jas. 5:4), but in over one hundred passages it renders the phrase, with minor variations, as kyrios pantokratōr, “Lord Almighty,” and this understanding has been followed by the NIV. The precise reference of the Hebrew phrase is debated. A military allusion is clear in some contexts, as when DAVID exclaimed that he was coming against GOLIATH “in the name of the LORD of hosts, the God of the armies of Israel” (1 Sam. 17:45 NRSV; cf. also Isa. 13:4; 31:4). But many other passages are more general in character. The initial use of the concept of the “hosts” is found in Gen. 2:1, where it refers back to the totality of created beings in the “heaven and the earth” (cf. also Isa. 45:12-13).

Lord’s Day. This expression (Gk. hē kyriakē hēmera) is found in the Bible only in Rev. 1:10, where John states, “On the Lord’s Day I was in the Spirit,” when he received a divine commission to write the book of Revelation. The adjective kyriakos G3258 (which also occurs in 1 Cor. 11:20 in the expression, “the Lord’s Supper”) can also be translated “belonging to the Lord” and so the expression denotes a day consecrated to CHRIST. Some would equate it with the OT prophetic DAY OF THE LORD, but clearly John is not speaking of that prophetic day. The form of his expression marks a distinction between the prophetic “day of the Lord” (1 Cor. 5:5; 2 Cor. 1:14; 1 Thess. 5:2) and the first day of the week, on which Christ arose. It was the RESURRECTION victory on that day that marked it as distinct and sacred to the Christian CHURCH. The gospel emphasis on “the first day of the week” as the day of resurrection stresses its distinctiveness. On that day the risen Christ repeatedly appeared to his disciples (Lk. 24:13-49; Jn. 20:1-25), and again a week later (Jn. 20:26). The Pentecostal outpouring apparently also came on that day. Acts 20:7 and 1 Cor. 16:1-2 show that the early church consecrated the day to WORSHIP and almsgiving (but not to earning).

Sunday (this name is of pagan origin) as the day of special worship is a Christian institution, and some believe that it must be sharply distinguished from the SABBATH. Others would argue that there are important continuities, as well as differences, between the two. Certainly the detailed OT regulations regarding the Sabbath were not necessarily transferred to the Lord’s Day as a “Christian Sabbath.” However, the fourth commandment was not expressed in terms of “legalistic ceremonialism”; rather, it was grounded in God’s own pattern of rest at CREATION (Exod. 20:8-11; Heb. 4:4) and in his work of REDEMPTION (Deut. 5:12-15). The NT clearly views the Jewish calendar as something that must not be imposed on GENTILES (Gal. 4:10; Col. 2:16-17), and PAUL states that observance of special days is a matter of Christian liberty (Rom. 14:5-6). But Christians continue to differ on whether the Decalogue's injunction of a weekly rest has been abrogated.

The Lord's Prayer written in Bariba, Cherokee, and Moore languages. From the Pater Noster Church in Jerusalem.

Lord's Prayer. The traditional name given to the prayer Jesus taught his disciples, as recorded in Matt. 6:9-13 and, more briefly, in Lk. 11:2-4. The fuller form, part of the SERMON ON THE MOUNT, is the one commonly used. As a pattern prayer it is unsurpassed for conciseness and fullness, delineating the proper approach and order in prayer. It directs the disciples, as members of God's family, reverently to pray to a personal heavenly Father. The petitions are divided into two parts, the first three relating to God's interests. They are arranged in a descending scale, from himself, through the manifestation of himself in his kingdom (the coming messianic kingdom), to the complete doing of his will by his subjects. Placing God's interest first, the disciples can pray for their own needs. The petitions, whether counted as three or four, are arranged in an ascending scale—from the supply of daily material needs to the ultimate deliverance from all evil. The doxology in Matthew, which constitutes an affirmation of faith, is lacking in the leading MSS and is generally regarded as a scribal addition derived from ancient liturgical usage.

Lord's Supper. This expression is found only once in the NT (Gk. kyriakon deipnon, 1 Cor. 11:20), where it refers not only to the special Christian rite of breaking the bread and drinking the cup, but also to the love feast that accompanied it (see AGAPE). Elsewhere PAUL uses the related phrase, "Lord's table" (1 Cor. 10:21), while the expression "breaking of bread," which occurs several times in Acts, probably also refers to the Lord's Supper. The institution of this ceremony is described in four passages (Matt. 26:26-29; Mk. 14:22-25; Lk. 22:15-20; 1 Cor. 11:23-25). On the night before the crucifixion, Jesus adopted the position of head of a household and ate the Passover meal with his disciples in a room within the city limits of JERUSALEM. It is interesting to note that he did not give new and special significance to the special parts of that meal (e.g., lamb and bitter herbs) but to the bread and wine, common to many meals. Distributing the bread he had broken for his disciples, he said, "I am myself this bread." Later in the meal, he said of the wine, "This is my blood of the covenant, which is poured out for many." Then at the end of the meal Jesus declared that he would not drink again of the fruit of the vine until he drank it anew in the KINGDOM OF GOD.

There are two important themes in the words of Jesus. First he was telling them that the cup of red wine represented his own blood, shed to inaugurate a new COVENANT between God and "the many" (see Isa. 52:15; 53:12). He was to offer himself to God as a sacrifice for sin so that a new relationship could be created by God between himself and the redeemed community of believers. Second, he was pointing toward the full realization and consummation of the kingdom of God at the end of the age, when the meal would be resumed in the "messianic banquet." Thus, it may be said that the Lord's Supper is eaten in remembrance of his atoning death by which comes redemption and in expectation of the arrival of the kingdom of God in its fullness.

Paul's teaching is found in 1 Cor. 10-11. He stressed the spiritual communion between Christ and his body (disciples) and within the body (see BODY OF CHRIST). Even as the Israelites were miraculously fed by MANNA and water in the wilderness, so in communion with Christ believers are spiritually nourished by heavenly food. Therefore, those who eat the body and drink the blood of Christ are not to participate in Jewish or pagan sacrifices (10:16-22), and they are to ensure that when they partake of the Lord's Supper, they partake worthily, being in genuine fellowship with fellow believers.

The actual services of the Lord's Supper began in the church after the coming of the HOLY SPIRIT on the Day of PENTECOST: Acts 2:42 refers to the table fellowship as "breaking of bread" (cf. Acts 20:7). These acts of WORSHIP and FELLOWSHIP are to be seen as the result of the fusion of various strands of experience enjoyed by the disciples with Jesus. They had fellowship with Jesus in eating (Matt. 14:13-21; 15:23-39—and note that according to Jn. 6:33-34, when he fed the 5,000 Jesus taught that he was the true heavenly food). These times of miraculous feeding and the Last Supper itself (within the Passover meal) belong to the time before the crucifixion; then the table fellowship with the risen Lord (Lk. 24:30-35; Jn. 21:13; Acts 10:41) in the "forty days" belongs to the postresurrection period. Thus, when the disciples came together on that Day of Pentecost and on subsequent occasions, their breaking of bread was the continuation of a rich tradition of fellowship already established by Jesus and into which they incorporated the actual Lord's Supper. At first the ceremony was a part of a larger meal (see 1 Cor. 11:17-22); but, being a special part, it could be separated. As the years went by, it was in fact separated and became the second half of the Sunday worship of the local church, the first part being the ministry of the Word, prayers, singing of psalms, and intercessions.

Nowhere in the NT is the Lord's Supper called a SACRIFICE. However, the believers are said to be offering spiritual sacrifices to God when God is worshiped, served, and obeyed (Rom. 12:1; Heb. 13:15-16; 1 Pet. 2:5). The Lord's Supper as a part of the worship and service offered to God is thus a sacrifice of praise and thanksgiving. Regrettably the EUCCHARIST (ministry of Word and Lord's Supper as one service) has often been referred to in sacrificial terms as though it were a sacrifice in a unique sense—an unbloody sacrifice. While the Lord's Supper is the memorial of a sacrifice, and is a sacrifice of praise offered to God, it is neither a repetition of the sacrifice of Christ made at Calvary nor a participation in the self-offering that Christ is perpetually making to the Father in heaven as the heavenly Priest. It is a proclamation of the Lord's death sacramentally until he returns to earth.

Lo-Ruhamah. lo'roo-hah'muh (Heb. lō ʾ ruḥāmâ H4205, “she has not received compassion” or “she has not been loved”). A symbolical name given by the prophet HOSEA to his daughter and second child by his wife GOMER (Hos. 1:6). See LO-AMMI.

Lot. lot (Heb. lōṭ H4288, derivation uncertain; Gk. Lōt G3397). Son of HARAN and nephew of Abram (ABRAHAM; Gen. 11:27). His life may be summarized under the following heads. (1) Departure and dependence. Born in UR of the Chaldees, Lot, whose father had died (11:28), migrated to the city of Haran with his grandfather, TERAH, and Abram and Sarai (11:31). After Terah's death (11:32), Lot followed Abraham in his journeys from MESOPOTAMIA to CANAAN, thence to EGYPT, and back again to Canaan (12:5, 10; 13:1). During this period there was unity and fellowship between uncle and nephew.

(2) Decision and destiny. Because of a conflict between their herdsmen, Abraham suggested that his nephew choose another place. Lot, apparently prompted by selfishness, chose the country in the environs of SODOM, a city that had already become notorious because of its wickedness (Gen. 13:5-13). This fatal choice determined his subsequent destiny. It was Abraham now who maintained the greater spiritual status (13:14-18).

(3) Devastation and deportation. Lot, then in Sodom, was taken captive when KEDORLAOMER and his confederates conquered the king of Sodom and his four allies (Gen. 14:1-12). Abraham, the separated and faithful servant, pursued the enemies and rescued his nephew (14:13-16).

(4) Depravity and degeneration. Angels then visited Lot in Sodom to hasten his departure from the imminent doom decreed on the wicked city. Although originally only a sojourner (Gen. 19:9), Lot acted like a citizen; he had imbibed the Canaanites' mores and standards. Look at his willingness to sacrifice his daughters' chastity (19:8), his utter ineffectiveness in dealing with his sons-in-law (19:14), his hesitation in leaving the doomed city (19:15-16), and his unwillingness to leave the comforts of a city (19:17-22). In spite of all these adverse things, Lot was, as the NT plainly declares, "a righteous man" (2 Pet. 2:7-8); and, furthermore, his righteous soul was daily vexed with the lawless deeds (2:8) of Sodom's inhabitants. By implication, it seems that the term "godly" is also applied to Lot (2:9).

Byzantine chapel built over the "cave of Lot," on the SE side of the Dead Sea (view to the SW). Lot associated himself with the cities of the plain traditionally located in this area.

(5) Dénouement and disgrace. Lot, because of fear, left ZOAR and lived in a cave with his two daughters (Gen. 19:30), his wife already having become, because of unbelief, "a pillar of salt" (19:17, 26; Lk. 17:29). In this cave one of the most unseemly scenes recorded in the Bible took place (Gen. 19:31-38). Made drunk by his daughters, Lot became the unwitting father of their sons, MOAB and BEN-AMMI, the progenitors of the Moabites and the Ammonites (Deut. 2:9, 19; Ps. 83:8). The almost buried faith of Lot reappeared in RUTH, a Moabitess, the great-grandmother of DAVID and thus a member of the messianic line (Ruth 1:16-18; 4:13-21).

Lotan. loh'tan (Heb. lôṭān H4289). First son of SEIR the HORITE; he was a clan chief of EDM (Gen. 36:20-22, 29; 1 Chr. 1:38-39).

lots. Objects used for DIVINATION or for making a choice. In the history of the Bible, the casting of lots was used to determine the will of God. The method is not clearly defined. Some scholars believe that the URIM AND THUMMIM (Exod. 28:30; Deut. 33:8; Ezra 2:63) were objects, possibly two small round pebbles signifying “yes” or “no,” that were placed in the EPHOD of the high priest. When the priest reached blindly into the ephod and took out one stone, the question was answered either affirmatively or negatively by the stone he found in his hand. There were, however, many instances recorded where lots were cast without the use of the Urim and Thummim.

Numerous passages in the OT indicate that the casting of lots was customarily employed for making important decisions (Lev. 16:7-10, 21-22; Josh. 7:14; 14:2; 1 Sam. 14:42; 1 Chr. 25:7-8; Neh. 10:34). The principle underlying this usage is stated in Prov. 16:33: “The lot is cast into the lap, / but its every decision is from the LORD.” (Regarding the Feast of Lots, see PURIM.) The same usage persisted in NT times. The soldiers at the foot of the cross cast lots for the clothing of Jesus (Matt. 27:35), thus fulfilling an OT prophecy (Ps. 22:18). Within the CHURCH, the successor of JUDAS ISCARIOT among the apostles was selected by lot (Acts 1:26). In the latter instance the choice was preceded by PRAYER. There is no explicit indication that this procedure was approved by God, and it never appears in the later activities of the church. The guidance of the HOLY SPIRIT seems to have been manifested in other ways.

love. Love is presented in Scripture as the very nature of God (1 Jn. 4:8, 16) and the greatest of the Christian virtues (1 Cor. 13:13). It receives definition in Scripture only by a listing of its attributes (13:4-7). It lies at the very heart of Christianity, being essential in our relationship to God and to others (Matt. 22:37-40; Mk. 12:28-31; Jn. 13:34-35). Jesus taught that on it hang all the Law and the Prophets (Matt. 22:40). It is the fulfillment of the LAW, for its sense of obligation and desire for the welfare of the one loved impels it to carry out the demands of the law (Rom. 13:8-10). Love found its supreme expression in the self-sacrifice on Calvary (1 Jn. 4:10).

The Bible makes the unique revelation that God in his very nature and essence is love (1 Jn. 4:8, 16), Christianity being the only religion thus to present the Supreme Being. God not only loves, he is love. In this supreme attribute all the other attributes are harmonized. His own Son, Jesus Christ, is the unique object of this eternal love (Isa. 42:1; Matt. 3:17; 17:5; Jn. 17:24). God loves the world as a whole (Jn. 3:16), as well as individuals in it (Gal. 2:20), in spite of the sinfulness and corruption of the human race (Rom. 5:8-10; Eph. 2:4-5). God's love for his creatures manifests itself not only in supplying all their needs (Acts 14:17) but supremely in the REDEMPTION wrought for sinners (Rom. 5:8; 1 Jn. 4:9-10). Believers in Christ are the objects of his special love (Jn. 16:27; 17:23), causing him to deal in chastisement with them (Heb. 12:6-11), but they are assured that nothing can separate them from his unfathomable love in Christ (Rom. 8:31-39).

All human love, whether Godward or manward, has its source in God. Love in its true reality and power is seen only in the light of Calvary (1 Jn. 4:7-10). It is created in believers by the HOLY SPIRIT (Rom. 5:5; Gal. 5:22), prompting them to love both God and other believers (2 Cor. 5:14-15; 1 Jn. 4:20-21). Love finds its expression in service to our neighbor (Matt. 22:37-39; Gal. 5:13) and is the chief test of Christian discipleship (Lk. 14:26; Jn. 13:35; 1 Jn. 3:14). Love is vitally related to FAITH; faith is basic (Jn. 6:29; Heb. 11:6), but a faith that does not manifest itself in love is dead and worthless (Gal. 5:6, 13; Jas. 2:17-26). Christians must love even their enemies (Matt. 5:43-48; Rom. 12:19-20; 1 Jn. 3:14). Our love "must be sincere" (Rom. 12:9) and should manifest itself "with actions and in truth" (1 Jn. 3:18). Love is the bond uniting all the Christian virtues (Col. 3:14).

lovingkindness. This term, rarely found in modern versions, is used by the KJV almost thirty times to render Hebrew hesed H2876, a theologically significant word that has a broad range of meaning. It signifies an attitude—either divine or human—born out of mutual relationship, for example, between relatives, friends, master/subject, host/guest. Primarily it is not a disposition but a helpful action; it corresponds to a relationship of trust. As exercised by a sovereign, it protects his dominion; it gives people security in their mutual dealings. The Hebrew term also denotes "kindness" or "help" received from a superior. The meaning fluctuates: "obligation," "loyalty," "love," "grace." Frequently it is associated with FORGIVENESS and is almost equal to MERCY (Exod. 20:6; 34:6, 7; Mic. 7:18). Many scholars believe that the principal connotation is "loyal love"—a love that is associated with the COVENANT (Deut. 7:12; 1 Sam. 20:8). When the term refers to God, it indicates in general the divine LOVE flowing out to sinners in unmerited kindness. On the divine side it comes to designate particularly his FAITHFULNESS and GRACE (Ps. 25:6; 36:7; 136:1-26).

Lucas. loo´kuhs. KJV alternate form of LUKE (Phlm. 24).

Lucifer. loo´si-fuhr. KJV rendering of Hebrew hêlêl H2122 (“shining one”), which occurs only once, in an oracle against the king of BABYLON (Isa. 14:12). The name comes from the Vulgate (Latin lucifer, “light-bringing”; cf. LXX, eōsphoros) and is applied to the MORNING STAR, that is, Venus. Some Latin church fathers, associating this passage with Lk. 10:18 (cf. also 2 Cor. 11:14), applied the name to SATAN, and this usage became common.

Lucius. loo´shuhs (Gk. Loukios G3372, Lat. Lucius, from lux, “light”). (1) A Roman CONSUL who, in response to an embassy sent to ROME by Simon MACCABEE, wrote a letter to PTOLEMY Euergetes of Egypt (1 Macc. 15:16-21) and other ANE rulers (15:22-23) supporting Simon in his struggles with the SELEUCIDS. His identification is problematic.

(2) A man from CYRENE, named third among the five “prophets and teachers” in the church at ANTIOCH OF SYRIA (Acts 13:1). This Lucius was apparently one of the Hellenistic Jewish Christians who had boldly preached to the Greeks in this city (11:20-21), where he remained to minister in the church.

(3) One of three “relatives” of PAUL (the others being JASON and SOSIPATER) who sent greetings to the Christians in Rome (Rom. 16:21). According to many scholars, however, the Greek term syngenēs G5150 here means “kinsman” (cf. RSV) and should be understood in the sense of “fellow-Jew” (cf. 9:3). It is possible, however, that this description applies only to Jason and Sosipater. The Lucius mentioned here is thought by some to be the same as #2 above, but that identification is not probable. Inscriptional evidence shows that Loukas (LUKE) was used as an alternative form for Lucius or Lucanus, and this fact has been used to support a proposed identification of the author of the third gospel and Acts with either of the above companions of Paul. Many believe that such identifications are ruled out by Col. 4:12-14, which indicates that Luke was a lucre. This English term is used by the KJV once in the OT in a passage where the term has a negative connotation (1 Sam. 8:3; NIV, “dishonest gain”; NRSV, “bribe”). In the KJV NT it is always qualified by “filthy” as the rendering of Greek aischrokerdēs G153 (“shameful gain”) or a cognate expression (1 Tim. 3:3 [TR], 8; Tit. 1:7; 1 Pet. 5:2). The term lucre can mean simply “profit,” but the rendering “filthy lucre,” which goes back to Tyndale’s translation, has given the word itself a bad name.

Lud. luhd (Heb. lûd H4276). Son of S_{HEM} and grandson of NOAH (Gen. 10:22; 1 Chr. 1:17). Earlier in the Table of Nations, however, the Ludites (KJV “Ludim”) are said to be descendants of M_{IZRAIM} or EGYPT (Gen. 10:13; 1 Chr. 1:11). Since the passage is basically ethnographic in character and concerned chiefly with the origin and classification of certain of the nations of the ancient world, Lud and Ludim are to be regarded as eponymous ancestors of two different nations (one Semitic and the other Hamitic) that continued to bear their names. (1) The identification of Ludim/Ludites with Lydia is ruled out on the basis of the close geographical and ethnic association of Ludim with Egypt. It is probably better to regard it as a nation now unknown. (2) Lud, on the other hand, is almost certainly Lydia in at least one passage where it appears in association with T_{ARSHISH}, T_{UBAL}, and G_{REECE} (Isa. 66:19), nations that were located along the N shores of the M_{EDITERRANEAN} Sea. See LYDIA (PLACE). The NIV also translates “Lydia” elsewhere (Jer. 46:9; Ezek. 27:20; 30:5; in this last passage, however, the association with E_{THIOPIA} and L_{IBYA} suggests an African nation).

Ludim, Ludites. See LUD; LYDIA (PLACE).

Luhith. loo’hith (Heb. lûḥîṭ H4284, “platform, terrace, shelf”). A city of MOAB, associated with H_{ORONAIM} (Isa. 15:5; Jer. 48:5). Refugees from ruined Moab are described as fleeing to ZOAR by the ascent of Luhith and in the way to Horonaim. Luhith may therefore have been on a hill a few miles SE of the D_{EAD} SEA, but the precise location is uncertain.

Luke. look (Gk. Loukas G3371, a name used in inscriptions as an affectionate form of Loukios [see LUCIUS], but some believe it should be connected with Lucanus or Lucianus). According to very ancient tradition, Luke was the writer of the third gospel (see LUKE, GOSPEL OF) and of the ACTS OF THE APOSTLES. From the latter book his association with PAUL is established. In four passages of varying length the author of Acts writes in the first person (Acts 16:10-17; 20:5-15; 21:1-18; 27:1—28:16). These so-called “we sections” constitute the major portion of the extant biographical material on Luke. Apart from this he is mentioned three times in the NT (Col. 4:14; Phlm. 24; 2 Tim. 4:11). From the first reference it is evident that Luke was a physician; from the last, that he was with Paul some time after he disappears from view at the end of the Acts of the Apostles. The context of the Colossians reference (see Col. 4:11) also suggests that Luke was a GENTILE.

It appears from Luke’s own writings that he was a man of education and culture. He begins his gospel with an elaborate paragraph, showing that he could write in the sophisticated tradition of the Hellenistic historians, and then lapses into a polished vernacular. He uses this speech with vigor and effectiveness. He is an accurate and able historian and has left some of the most powerful descriptive writing in the NT. His medical knowledge and his interest in seafaring are apparent from his writings. Whatever is said beyond this is tradition and conjecture. There is no solid support for the conjectures that Luke was Lucius of Cyrene (Acts 13:1), or one of “the Seventy” (Lk. 10:1; NIV, “seventy-two”), one of the Greeks of Jn. 12:20, or one of the two disciples of EMMANUEL (Lk. 24:13).

Some evidence supports other conjectures and traditions. That he knew MARY, MOTHER OF JESUS is fairly clear from the earlier chapters of his Gospel, and the period of acquaintance may have been during Paul’s incarceration at CAESAREA. Eusebius and Jerome say that Luke was a Syrian of ANTIOCH, and he does seem to have a close knowledge of the church there. On the other hand, certain features of the account of Paul’s visit to PHILIPPI suggest that Luke had an intimate knowledge of that city and no little loyalty toward it. Here, too, on two occasions, he appears to have joined Paul’s party. This has given grounds for the contention that Luke was a Macedonian (perhaps even the one who appeared to Paul in a vision, Acts 16:9). Tradition and conjecture could be reconciled if Luke was an Antiochene of Macedonian origin who had studied at the medical school of Philippi and spent significant years in Macedonia. Luke must have been a person of singular sweetness of character to earn the apostle’s adjective “beloved” (Col. 4:14 KJV; NIV, “dear”). He was obviously a man of outstanding loyalty, of unusual capacity for research, and with the scholar’s ability to strip away the irrelevant and dispensable detail. A bare tradition states that he suffered martyrdom in Greece.

Latin MS of Luke with glosses or brief explanations (12th cent.).

Overview of LUKE

Author: Anonymous, but traditionally attributed to LUKE the physician.

Historical setting: Covers the period from the annunciation of JOHN THE BAPTIST to the ASCENSION OF CHRIST. The book was probably written in ROME c. A.D. 60, but some date it to the 70s or even later.

Purpose: To provide a full and orderly historical-theological account of the life of CHRIST that will reassure the reader concerning the certainty of the GOSPEL (Lk. 1:3-4), focusing on such themes as the universality of SALVATION (offered even to Gentiles and tax collectors), the HOLY SPIRIT, and PRAYER.

Contents: The nativity stories and Jesus' childhood (Lk. 1-2); the baptism and temptation, leading to ministry in GALILEE (3:1—9:50); journey to JERUSALEM, with much unique material, especially a number of PARABLES found only in this gospel (9:51—19:27); ministry in Jerusalem, leading to Jesus' death, resurrection, and ascension (19:28—24:53).

I. Authenticity. References to this gospel are frequent in the second century A.D. (Justin, Polycarp, Papias, Hegesippus, Marcion, Heracleon, the Clementine Homilies, Theophilus of Antioch). It is probable that Clement alludes to it (95). It is mentioned as the work of Luke by the Muratorian Fragment (170) and by Irenaeus (180). This testimony continues into the third century (Clement of Alexandria, Tertullian, Origen). Such a mass of evidence is quite decisive.

II. Date. Although uncertain, the date can be confined to fairly narrow limits. The abrupt termination of the Acts of the Apostles suggests that the author did not long survive his friend and associate PAUL. Nor is it likely to have been written after the fall of JERUSALEM in A.D. 70. The period of Paul's imprisonment in Caesarea saw Luke in Palestine, and this period (conjecturally 58-59) would presumably give abundant opportunity for the research that is evident in the record. Luke's Gospel is thus probably the latest of the Synoptic Gospels.

III. Historiography. W. M. Ramsay's work on the Acts of the Apostles has established the right of Luke to rank as a first-rate historian in his own capacity. He was demonstrated to have maintained a consistent level of accuracy wherever detail could be objectively tested, and the vividness of narration so evident in the second work is visible also in the gospel.

IV. Style. Luke's preface is in the elaborate style of ancient historians and demonstrates that Luke could write with facility in the literary tradition of his time. At Lk. 1:5 he moves into an easy vernacular, which he employs for his whole narrative. His language is the common dialect, but used with grace and vigor and with an educated man's skill in composition.

V. Unique features. Many incidents and much teaching are found only in Luke's Gospel. (1) The nativity section is fresh and different and seems to point to direct contact with Mary herself; the record of the birth of JOHN THE BAPTIST is especially noteworthy, as are the four psalms (Lk. 1:46-55, 68-79; 2:14, 29-32) that form a striking link between the hymnology of the OT and that of the NT. (2) The human genealogy (3:23-38) of Christ, traced to ADAM, is chosen in accordance with the cosmopolitan flavor of the gospel and the writer's conception of his writing as the first movement of the great historical process that took the faith from BETHLEHEM to ROME. (3) The childhood of Jesus is recorded in Jesus' visit to the temple (2:41-52); found only in Luke, this account also points to the probability that Mary was the chief authority. (4) Some of Jesus' discourses and sayings, together with their associated incidents, Luke alone records, especially those contained in the unique section from 9:51 to 18:14 (e.g., the rejection by the Samaritans, the sending out of the Seventy, etc.). (5) Parables and illustrative anecdotes that only Luke records are those of the two debtors (7:41-43), the good Samaritan (10:30-37), the persistent friend at night (11:5-8), the rich fool (12:16-21), the barren fig tree (13:6-9), the lost coin and the prodigal son (15:3-32), the unrighteous steward and the rich fool and Lazarus (16:1-12, 19-31), the wicked judge and the Pharisee and the tax collector (18:2-14), the ten minas (19:13-27). (6) Only Luke records the following miracles: the large catch of fish (5:1-11), the widow's son (7:11-14), the sick woman (13:11-13), the sick man (14:2-6), the ten lepers (17:12-19), the healing of Malchus in Gethsemane (22:51). (7) In the closing chapters of the gospel, the prayer on the cross (23:34), the penitent thief (23:39-43), the walk to Emmaus (24:13-35), and much of the ascension narrative are recorded only by Luke.

VI. Special characteristics. Apart from material content there are special characteristics of Luke's approach that should be noted. (1) As in the Acts of the Apostles, he exalts womanhood; apart from the nativity narratives, see, for example, Lk. 7:11-17; 8:1-3, 48; 10:38-42; 13:16; 23:28. (2) It is perhaps part of the universality of Luke's conception of the Christian message that he stresses the Lord's attitude toward the poor; see 6:20-25; 8:2-3; 12:16-21; 14:12-15; 16:13; 18:25. (3) The same notion of a universal evangel, natural in an associate of Paul, is found as vividly in Luke's completion of John's Isaian quotation ("And all mankind will see God's salvation," 3:6), as in Acts 17:27; note in the same connection the strain of racial tolerance illustrated by the tale of the good Samaritan, the word of praise for the grateful Samaritan leper, and the rebukes of Lk. 9:49-56. (4) Luke also gives prominence to prayer: he speaks of the Lord's prayer at his baptism, after cleansing the leper, before calling the Twelve, on the Mount of Transfiguration, on the cross, and at death; see also 11:8; 18:1; 21:36 and the parables in 11:5-13 and 18:1-8. (5) A kindliness of judgment pervades Luke's gospel as was proper in one who was not himself an associate of the Twelve: he gives a milder version of Peter's denial, touches the faults of the apostles with gentle hand, and omits the conversation on the leaven of the Pharisees and the ambitious request of James and John.

VII. Sources. Beyond the writer's own statement that he collected his material from eyewitnesses (Lk. 1:2), it is impossible to be dogmatic. From the first words of the Gospel it is evident that Luke had both written accounts and living witnesses to draw from. In parts he appears to have followed Mark or Mark's authorities and tradition. Mary could have supplied information regarding the nativity, and the unique material on the passion and resurrection had apostolic authority.

lust. This term (as a noun or verb), referring to an intense desire, most often has a negative connotation, being used especially of unrestrained sexual craving. English Bible translations use the term variously to render a number of words and expressions, in particular Greek epithymia G2123. This Greek noun (as well as the cognate verb epithymeō G2121) can refer to desire in a neutral or even positive context (e.g., Lk. 22:15; Phil. 1:23; 1 Thess. 2:17), but in the NT it is so frequently joined with such terms as “evil” (e.g., Col. 3:5) that the word by itself takes on a negative nuance (“covetousness, sinful passion,” etc.). The consequences of evil lust are not only privation of good, but also enslavement, suffering, and death.

lustration. A SACRIFICE or ceremony for the purpose of PURIFICATION. The word is not found in the English Bible, but other terms referring to purification are found in both Testaments often. See CLEAN; UNCLEAN lute. See MUSICAL INSTRUMENTS.

Luz. luhz (Heb. lûz H4281, “almond tree”). (1) The earlier Canaanite name of the city better known as BETHEL (Gen. 28:19; 35:6). It was changed to the latter (meaning “house of God”) by JACOB after the Lord appeared to him in a dream during his flight from home, and it became a holy place in the later history of Israel. The book of Joshua, in delineating the territories of EPHRAIM and MANASSEH, speaks of the boundary as going out “from Bethel to Luz” (Josh. 16:2), apparently regarding the two as distinct locations. The reference here is probably not to the city of Bethel but to a mountain range closely associated with the city which is mentioned as the previous boundary point (v. 1) and from which the line went out to Luz, that is, the city of Bethel (in 18:13, Bethel and Luz are regarded as identical).

(2) A town built in the land of the HITTITES by a former inhabitant of Luz #1, apparently named after the Canaanite city (Jdg. 1:26). The expression “land of the Hittites” probably refers to SYRIA, but the term Hittite is ambiguous, and some think that the phrase may designate the hill country W of Bethel (cf. Num. 13:29). The location of this town is unknown.

LXX. Abbreviation for SEPTUAGINT.

Lycaonia. lik'uh-oh'nee-uh (Gk. Lykaonia G3377; cf. Lykaonisti G3378, "in Lycaonian [language]"). A region in south central ASIA MINOR. Although its borders are not well defined, Lycaonia had GALATIA to the N, CAPPADOCIA to the E, CILICIA to the S, and PISIDIA to the W. It consisted for the most part of a high, treeless plateau, the land being fertile enough and productive where there was water, but good mainly for raising sheep and goats. The people who inhabited the region have been described as warlike and energetic. In NT times the region was administered by the Romans as part of their settlement in Asia, and from 25 B.C. onward became part of Galatia or Galatia-Cappadocia. The leading cities of Lycaonia were LYSTRA and DERBE. ICONIUM was evidently a Phrygian city (see PHRYGIA), for when the Jews stirred up trouble for PAUL and BARNABAS there, they fled to the Lycaonian cities for safety (Acts 14:5-6). As everywhere else in the Seleucid realm, the process of hellenization went on (see HELLENISM), but slowly in Lycaonia, for the people are described as being backward. The GREEK LANGUAGE was no doubt understood in the cities, but the people still retained their own speech, which they used in response to the miracle Paul worked upon the cripple in Lystra (Acts 14:11). They then proceeded to get ready to sacrifice to Paul and Barnabas as though they were gods, an act from which Paul barely restrained them. This whole incident indicates the strong hold of pagan religion upon the populace of the region.

Lycia. lish'uh (Gk. Lykia G3379). A mountainous country in SW ASIA MINOR. This territory of about 3,500 sq. mi. (9,000 sq. km.) protrudes southward into the MEDITERRANEAN Sea bounded on the NW by CARIA, on the N by PHRYGIA and PISIDIA, and on the NE by PAMPHYLIA. Lycia was shut in by rugged mountain ranges, and since the land jutted out into the sea, it would not have any important trade routes. Its climate rapidly fluctuated between the extremes of temperature. Its mountainous slopes afforded much excellent timber for the building of houses and ships, and were also suitable for grazing and for vineyards and olive farms. The valleys provided space for the cultivated grains.

Its main contact to the outside world was through its seaports, the main two being PATARA and MYRA. On the return of the third missionary journey, PAUL's ship stopped at Patara (Acts 21:1) and then sailed to PHOENICIA. On his journey to ROME, Paul's ship went along the coast of CILICIA and Pamphylia, and at Myra he and the other prisoners were put on another ship that had come from ALEXANDRIA and was sailing for Italy. Due to prevailing W winds, it was common for Alexandrian grain ships to travel N along the Syrian coast and then move slowly E along the coasts of Cilicia and Pamphylia. Myra was a natural place for the grain ships (cf. Acts 27:38) to harbor and to be serviced before their journey to Italy; and hence it would not be unusual for the centurion to find one here for Paul and the other prisoners.

Lydda. lid´uh (Gk. Lydda G3375). A town about 11 mi. (18 km.) SE of JOPPA where the apostle PETER healed a paralytic named AENEAS (Acts 9:32-35, 38). See LOD.

Lydia (person) lid´ee-uh (Gk. Lydia G3376). A business woman from THYATIRA; she lived in PHILIPPI and was PAUL’s first convert there (Acts 16:12-15, 40). Her name, while common for women, may be an adjectival form, “the Lydian [woman],” as indicating her origin, since Thyatira was in the region of Lydia. See LYDIA (PLACE). She is identified as “a dealer in purple cloth.” Her trade implies that she was a woman of some means. If a widow, she may have been carrying on the business of her deceased husband. Lydia is further described as “a worshiper of God,” the usual designation for a Jewish PROSELYTE. She probably had accepted the Jewish faith in her native city, for it had a strong Jewish colony. At Philippi she faithfully participated in the SABBATH services at the place of prayer by the riverside. After listening to Paul’s message there she was converted. After Lydia and her household (presumably her servants and their dependents) were baptized, she urged Paul and his coworkers to make her home their headquarters. Her home apparently became the meeting place of the local church (Acts 16:40). Lydia’s own hospitality doubtless did much to foster the unique financial relations between Paul and the Philippian church (Phil. 4:15-16).

Lydia (place). lid´ee-uh (Gk. Lydia). A large territory in NW ASIA MINOR, bounded on the N by MYSIA, on the S by CARIA, on the E by PHRYGIA, and on the W by the AEGEAN SEA. It is a land mostly of fertile river valleys. SARDIS served as Lydia’s capital. The earliest reference to Lydia is in Gen. 10:22 (cf. also 1 Chr. 1:17), where it refers to LUD as a son of SHEM; expounding on that passage, JOSEPHUS refers to the Lydians as Lud’s descendants (Ant. 1.6.4. §144). In Isa. 66:19 Lud is listed with TUBAL (in Asia Minor), GREECE, and “the distant islands” (or “coastlands”), a context that would fit with the location of Lydia. In Ezek. 27:10 and 30:5 Lud is listed as an ally with TYRE and with EGYPT respectively. Lydia is mentioned also in the Neo-Babylonian annals. In NT times, Lydia formed a part of the Roman province of ASIA and remained so until it became a separate entity in Diocletian’s reign (c. A.D. 316). The region was rich in natural resources, and its best-known industry was the manufacture of textile fabrics; along with this THYATIRA was well known for its dyeing processes. One of those in the industry was the Thyatiran woman who was converted to Christianity at PHILIPPI by PAUL (Acts 16:14). See LYDIA (PERSON). Also in Lydia was EPHESUS, the place where Paul spent nearly three years (Acts 19). Moreover, out of seven churches addressed by John in Rev. 2-3, five of them were in Lydia (see EPHESUS, SMYRNA, THYATIRA, SARDIS, PHILADELPHIA). However, the NT writers never address the above churches as being in Lydia, but rather in Asia, in accordance with the Roman provincial classification.

lye. KJV, “nitre.” An alkaline substance used for cleansing purposes; it refers either to sodium carbonate, found in certain places as an incrustation on the ground or in certain saline lakes, or to potassium carbonate, which was obtained by leaching wood ashes or other vegetable matter. Both possess excellent detergent qualities. The term is used by the NRSV several times (Jer. 2:22 [NIV, “soda”]; Job. 9:30 [NIV, “soap”]; Isa. 1:25 [NIV differently]). See SOAP.

lying. See LIE, LYING.

lyre. See MUSIC AND MUSICAL INSTRUMENTS.

Lysanias. li-say’nee-uhs (Gk. Lysanias G3384). The TETRARCH of ABILENE at the beginning of JOHN THE BAPTIST’s ministry (Lk. 3:1), probably in A.D. 26. There is no satisfactory explanation of the inclusion of this obscure non-Jewish ruler in the dating list, but epigraphical evidence frees the historian from the old allegation that he confused the tetrarch with an earlier ruler.

Lysias. lis’ee-uhs (Gk. Lysias G3385). (1) A prominent Syrian general and official who served under ANTIOCHUS IV Epiphanes and Antiochus V Eupator. He is given considerable attention in 1 and 2 Maccabees and in JOSEPHUS (e.g., 1 Macc. 3:32-38; 6:17; 7:1-4; 2 Macc. 10-11; Jos. Ant. 12 §§295-98, 313-15, 361, 367).

Lystra. lis'truh (Gk. Lystra G3388, construed both as fem. sg. and neut. pl.). A town in the central region of S ASIA MINOR (Acts 14:6, 8, 21; 16:1-2; 2 Tim. 3:11). Lystra is an ancient village of the district of LYCAONIA that was c. 24 mi. (39 km.) S of ICONIUM (in PHRYGIA). Lystra was built upon a small hill suddenly rising above the surrounding plain located on the E of the mountain ranges that form the Pisidian triangle (see PISIDIA). It is probable that the territory of Lystra was bounded in the N by Iconium, in the W by the mountains, and in the S by Isauria Vetus. The plain surrounding Lystra was fertile, with two small rivers passing by the village's mound. On the first missionary journey, PAUL and BARNABAS arrived at Lystra (c. A.D. 49), having fled the hostility of the Jews at Iconium (Acts 14:6). Upon arrival, Paul healed a man who had been lame from birth and the crowd concluded that the apostles were the gods HERMES and ZEUS (vv. 6-18; on an earlier occasion, the same two gods, as the local legend relates, had come to that region to visit an aged and pious couple). Afterward the Jews from ANTIOCH of Pisidia and Iconium came and influenced the people against Paul and consequently stoned the apostle dragging him out of the city as dead. Probably it was this visit of Paul during which TIMOTHY was converted and undoubtedly helped to establish the infant church at Lystra (2 Tim. 3:10-11). Paul and Barnabas went on to DERBE but later on their return visited Lystra (Acts 14:19-23). On his second missionary journey Paul traveled through SYRIA and CILICIA (c. A.D. 50) and revisited the churches of Derbe and Lystra (Acts 15:41—16:2). A visit to Lystra on the third journey (c. A.D. 53) is implied in Acts 18:23.

M

M. The symbol used to designate material peculiar to Matthew; for some scholars, the symbol represents an independent literary source used by this evangelist. See GOSPELS; MATTHEW, GOSPEL OF.

Maacah (person). may'uh-kuh (Heb. ma'ākāh H5082, perhaps “dull” or “oppression”). KJV also Maachah; TNIV Maakah. At least nine OT figures, both male and female, have this name. (1) Son of NAHOR by his concubine Reumah; nephew of ABRAHAM (Gen. 22:24). He may have been the ancestor of the people who inhabited a region by the same name. See MAACAH (PLACE). Some have thought that this Maacah was a daughter, not a son, of Nahor.

(2) Sister or wife of MAKIR son of MANASSEH (1 Chr. 7:15-16). The passage appears to speak of two different women named Maacah, one of whom was Makir's sister (v. 15) and another one his wife (v. 16). Some interpret (cf. KJV) or emend the Hebrew text so that it refers to only one woman named Maacah, Makir's wife, who bore him two sons, Peresh and Sheresh.

(3) Second concubine of CALEB son of Hezron (1 Chr. 2:48). His first concubine was EPHAH (v. 46).

(4) Wife of JEIEL, who was a descendant of BENJAMIN and the “father” (i.e., founder or a civic leader) of GIBEON (1 Chr. 9:35; the name Jeiel is missing from the MT of the parallel passage, 8:29, but most versions insert it).

(5) Daughter of TALMAI king of GESHUR; she became a wife of DAVID and bore ABSALOM during David's reign at HEBRON (2 Sam. 3:3; 1 Chr. 3:2). Absalom fled for safety to his mother's homeland after he killed his half-brother AMMON (2 Sam. 13:37-38).

(6) Father of Hanan; the latter was one of David's mighty warriors (1 Chr. 11:43).

(7) Father of Shephatiah; the latter was an officer over the tribe of SIMEON during the reign of David (1 Chr. 27:16).

(8) Father of the PHILISTINE king ACHISH (1 Ki. 2:39). Many believe this Maacah is the same as MAOCH (1 Sam. 27:2; the two forms may be variant spellings of the same name); others question this identification, since it would mean that the reign of Achish lasted at least forty years.

(9) Daughter of Abishalom (ABSALOM), favorite wife of REHOBAM, and mother of Abijah (ABIJAH; 1 Ki. 15:2; 2 Chr. 11:20-22). Elsewhere she is called “Micaiah daughter of Uriel of Gibeah” (2 Chr. 13:2 NRSV), but the name MICAIAH may be a scribal error or an alternate form of Maacah (cf. NIV), while the word “daughter” here may mean “granddaughter” (cf. NIV mg.). Another difficulty is raised by 1 Ki. 15:10, which says with respect to ASA, Abijah’s son, that “his mother’s name was Maacah daughter of Abishalom” (NRSV; cf. also v. 13). Perhaps a different Maacah is involved, but more likely “mother” here means “grandmother” (cf. NIV). In any case, the biblical writer tells us that Asa deposed his grandmother (or mother!) Maacah from her royal position because of her IDOLATRY (v. 13).

Maacah (place). may’uh-kuh (Heb. ma ʿākāh H5081 [ma ʿākāt in Josh. 13:13b], perhaps “dull” or “oppression”; gentilic ma ʿākātī H5084, “Maacathite” [KJV, “Maachathi” and “Maachathite”]). KJV Maachah; TNIV Maakah; NRSV also Maacath (only Josh 13:13b). A small ARAMEAN state SE of Mount HERMON. It bordered GESHUR on the S and may have crossed the JORDAN to ABEL BETH MAACAH on the W. JAIR son of Manasseh made conquest of the land (Deut. 3:14; Josh. 12:5), and it was assigned to the half tribe of MANASSEH (Josh. 13:29-30). However, both the original Maacathites and the neighboring Geshurites remained in occupancy of their lands after Jair’s conquest (Josh. 13:13; 2 Sam. 10:6-8; 1 Chr. 19:6-7). Maacathites are mentioned elsewhere (2 Sam. 23:34; 2 Ki. 25:23 = Jer. 40:8; 1 Chr. 4:19).

Maacath, Maacathite. See MAACAH (PLACE).

Maachah, Maachathi, Maachathite. See MAACAH (PERSON) and MAACAH (PLACE).

Maadai. may’uh-di (Heb. ma ʿāday H5049, short form of MOADIAH, “ornament of Yahweh”). One of the sons of Bani who gave up their foreign wives in the time of EZRA (Ezra 10:34).

Maadiah. may’uh-dī’uh. See MOADIAH.

Maai. may'i (Heb. mā'ay H5076, derivation uncertain). A priestly musician who participated in the dedication of the rebuilt wall of JERUSALEM under EZRA (Neh. 12:36).

Maakah. may'uh-kuh. TNIV form of MAACAH.

Maaleh-acrabbim. may'uh-leh-uh-krab'im. See AKRABBIM.

Maarath. may'uh-rath (Heb. ma'ārāt H5125, possibly “barren [field]”). A town in the hill country of the tribe of JUDAH (Josh. 15:59). Maarath is listed between GEDOR and BETH ANOTH, so it was probably a few miles N of HEBRON, but its precise location is unknown. Some have thought it is the same as MAROTH (Mic. 1:12), but the context seems to place this town too far W.

Maareh-geba. may'uh-ri-gee'buh. Transliteration used by some versions (e.g., NJPS) to render the difficult Hebrew phrase ma'ārēh-gāba , referring to a place where the men of Israel lay in ambush and from which they rushed forth to attack the Benjamites (Jdg. 20:33; KJV, “the meadows of Gibeah”). On the basis of the SEPTUAGINT and the VULGATE, the NIV and other versions read ma'ārab-gāba , “west of Gibeah.”

Maasai. may'uh-si (Heb. ma'say H5127, short form of MAASEIAH, “work of Yahweh”). KJV Maasiai. Son of Adiel, listed among the first priests that returned from the EXILE and resettled in Jerusalem (1 Chr. 9:12). Because Maasai seems to correspond to AMASHSAI in a parallel passage (Neh. 11:13), some have argued that they are the same person and that the latter form is the result of scribal error.

Maaseiah. may'uh-see'yah (Heb. ma'āšêāhû H5129 [in 1-2 Chr.] and ma'āšêā H5128 [in Ezra, Neh., and Jer., except Jer. 35:4], “work of Yahweh”). (1) One of the LEVITES who played the lyre when the ARK OF THE COVENANT was brought to JERUSALEM (1 Chr. 15:18, 20).

(2) Son of Adaiah; he was one of the commanders under JEHOIADA who took part in the revolt against ATHALIAH (2 Chr. 23:1).

(3) An officer under King UZZIAH who took part in mustering the army (2 Chr. 26:11).

(4) Son of King AHAZ; all that is known about him is that he and two royal officials were assassinated by an Ephraimite warrior named Zicri (2 Chr. 28:7).

(5) The ruler of Jerusalem at the time of King JOSIAH; he was among those sent to repair the TEMPLE (2 Chr. 34:8).

(6) Father of the priest ZEPHANIAH; the latter figures in the ministry of JEREMIAH (Jer. 21:1; 29:25; 37:3). This Maaseiah is perhaps the same as the son of Shallum, a doorkeeper who had a room in the temple (35:4).

(7) Father of the false prophet ZEDEKIAH (Jer. 29:21).

(8-11) Four different men by the name of Maaseiah are listed among those who agreed to put away their foreign wives. Three of them—descendants of Jeshua, Harim, and Passhur respectively—were priests (Ezra 10:18-22); the fourth was a descendant of Pahath-Moab (10:30).

(12) Father of a certain Azariah who made repairs to the wall of Jerusalem in NEHEMIAH's time (Neh. 3:23).

(13) One of the prominent men who stood near EZRA when the law was read at the great assembly (Neh. 8:4); he is possibly the same as #11 above.

(14) A Levite who helped EZRA instruct the people in the law (Neh. 8:7).

(15) One of the leaders of the people who signed the covenant of Nehemiah (Neh. 10:25); he is possibly the same as #11 or #13 above.

(16) Son of Baruch and descendant of JUDAH through SHELAH; he was an inhabitant of Judah resident in Jerusalem in postexilic times (Neh. 11:5 [KJV has "Shiloni" instead of "Shelah"; NRSV, "the Shilonite"]); apparently the same as ASAIAH in 1 Chr. 9:5). See SHILONITE.

(17) Son of Ithiel and an ancestor of Sallu; the latter was a Benjamite who lived in postexilic Jerusalem (Neh. 11:7).

(18-19) Two priests who participated in the choirs at the dedication of the walls of Jerusalem (Neh. 12:41-42); the first of these played the trumpet. Either or both of these men are possibly to be identified with one or more of the priests mentioned above (##8-10).

(20) KJV form of MAHSEIAH (Jer. 32:12; 51:59).

Maath. may'ath (Gk. Maath G3399, possibly from Heb. maḥat H4744; see MAHATH). Son of Mattathias, included in the GENEALOGY OF JESUS CHRIST (Lk. 3:26).

Maaz. may'az (Heb. ma'az H5106, perhaps "angry"). Son of RAM, grandson of JERAHMEEL, and descendant of JUDAH (1 Chr. 2:27).

Maaziah. may'uh-zī'uh (Heb. ma'azyāhû H5069 and ma'azyâ H5068, "Yahweh is [my] refuge"). (1) A priest during the time of DAVID who was the leader of the twenty-third division (1 Chr. 24:18). Some scholars believe that Maaziah here is the family name of a later priestly group. See #2 below.

(2) One of the priests (or priestly families) who signed the covenant of NEHEMIAH (Neh. 10:8).

Macbannai. mak'buh-i (Heb. makbannay H4801, perhaps from a root meaning "wrap around"). KJV Machbanai, NRSV Machbannai; TNIV Makbannai. A Gadite who joined DAVID's forces at ZIKLAG (1 Chr. 12:13).

Macbenah. mak-bee'nuh (Heb. makbēnâ H4800, perhaps from a root meaning "wrap around"). Also Machbenah; TNIV Makbenah. Son of Sheva and grandson of CALEB, included in the genealogical list of JUDAH (1 Chr. 2:49). However, it may be the name of a town, and the expression "Sheva the father of Macbenah and Gibeon" probably indicates that Sheva was the founder of those two cities. Some identify Macbenah with CABBON (Josh. 15:40); others think it was a Calebite settlement in an unknown location S of HEBRON.

Maccabaeon, Maccabaeus. See MACCABEE.

Maccabee. mak'uh-bee. The name given to a Jewish family that initiated the revolt against ANTIOCHUS Epiphanes, the SELEUCID Syrian king who was forcing his hellenizing policies on Palestine. The term Makkabaios was a surname given to Judas son of Mattathias (1 Macc. 2:4 et al.); it was later applied to his brothers and, more generally, to the Hasmonean dynasty that followed. The name Maccabee is probably related to Aramaic maqḳābā , "hammer," referring either to Judas's crushing military exploits or to a physical characteristic. The story, as outlined below, is told in two independent narratives written by authors of different emphases and abilities, the First and Second Books of the Maccabees. The first book is an honest piece of historical writing, detailing with little adornment the events of a stirring struggle for freedom, though written to glorify the Maccabean heroes. The second book covers much of the same material but slants the account in the direction of religious instruction and admonition, focusing on the superiority of JUDAISM over pagan culture.

The uprising began in 168 B.C., when Mattathias, an aged priest in the village of MODEIN, struck down a royal commissioner and an apostate Jew who were about to offer pagan sacrifice in the town. Mattathias leveled the altar and fled to the hills with his sons. To his standard rallied the Hasidim or Hasideans (“the Pious”). The old priest died after a few months of guerrilla warfare, and the same early fighting claimed two of his sons, Eleazar and John. The remaining three sons—Judas, Jonathan, and Simon—each in turn led the insurrection; and all left a deep mark on Jewish history.

Judas was a fine soldier and patriot, with a clear policy of Jewish independence and religious reconstruction. Raising and organizing a fighting force of Galileans, he defeated major military expeditions sent against him in 166 and 165 B.C. In December of the latter year, Judas formally cleansed the TEMPLE of Syrian pollution and celebrated the occasion with a great festival. This festival (Hanukkah) became a permanent fixture, falling on December 25 and lasting eight days (1 Macc. 4:52-59; 2 Macc. 10:6; Jn. 10:22). See DEDICATION, FEAST OF.

For the next eighteen months, Judas campaigned E of JORDAN, while his brother Simon collected the Jews who were scattered through GALILEE into the comparative safety of JUDEA. Judas at this point lost some of the support of the Hasidim, whose ambitions were largely fulfilled by the reestablishment of the temple service. Religious division, the perennial problem of all the Jewish struggles for independence, was thus responsible for a weakening of Judas’s position. Lysias, the Syrian general whom Judas had signally defeated at Beth Zur in the autumn of 165 B.C., gained his revenge at Beth Zacharias. Judas was routed, and the Syrian garrison still holding out in the citadel of Jerusalem was relieved. Lysias was in control of Syria during the brief reign of Antiochus Eupator, a minor who succeeded Epiphanes in 163, and he was sensible enough to abandon Epiphanes’ attack on the religion of the Jews for the much more effective political policy of patronage. He set up a puppet high priest, Alcimus, who was accepted by the Hasidim. Judas was thus isolated but, on Lysias’s withdrawal, marched against Alcimus.

Demetrius I, the able and decisive ruler who succeeded Eupator in 162, sent a force under Nicanor to put down this new rebellion. Defeated by Judas, Nicanor retired to Jerusalem, but foolishly drove “the Pious” into renewed support of Judas by threatening reprisals against the temple. With the country again behind him, Judas defeated the Syrians at Adasa. Judas was now in control of the land and negotiated a treaty with ROME, in the terms of which Rome ordered Demetrius I to withdraw from Palestine. Judas’s move was a shrewd one, for since the Peace of Apamea (188) Syria had existed by Rome’s sufferance, and Demetrius had spent his youth as a hostage in Rome. Time was against Judas, for before the senate’s prohibition was delivered to the king, Judas was defeated and killed by the general BACCHIDES at Elasa (1 Macc. 3—9:22). The international policy, illustrated by the approach to Rome, had again alienated the fickle Hasidim; and the withdrawal of support fatally weakened Judas's power of resistance and led directly to his military defeat.

The high desert butte of Masada was once fortified by Jonathan Maccabee. (In this aerial view, looking N, the excavations reveal structures from the time of Herod.)

Jonathan succeeded his brother in 161 B.C., and the Maccabean revolt reverted to the guerrilla warfare with which it had begun. Dynastic troubles in Syria, however, played into Jonathan's hands. Alexander Balas, supported by PERGAMUM and EGYPT, aspired to the Syrian throne; and both Demetrius and Alexander thought it expedient to secure the support of so determined a fighter as the second Maccabee. Demetrius offered the control of all military forces in Palestine and the governorship of Jerusalem. Alexander added an offer of the high priesthood. Jonathan chose Alexander and thus became the founder of the Hasmonean priesthood. By skillful support of Demetrius II, who dethroned Alexander, Jonathan maintained and strengthened his position. The difficulties of the later Seleucid empire served his purposes well. Jonathan was even able to extend his power over the maritime plain, to fortify Jerusalem and other strong points in Judea, and to enter into treaty relationships with Rome. An army revolt in 143 unseated Demetrius II, and the young son of Alexander was enthroned as Antiochus VI. Power was in the hands of the generals, one of whom, Tryphon, laid hold of Jonathan by treachery and executed him (1 Macc. 9:23—12:54).

Simon, the third brother, inherited this critical situation. Simon was an able diplomat who carried on his brother's policy of profiting with some success by Syria's internal troubles. In 143 and 142 B.C. he succeeded in establishing the virtual political independence of Judea. In 141, at a great assembly of princes, priests, and elders of the land, Simon was elected to be high priest, military commander, and civil governor of the Jews, "for ever until there should arise a faithful prophet." The high priesthood was thus rendered hereditary in the family of Simon. He reestablished the treaty with Rome, which had proved a useful diplomatic advantage over Syria, whom Rome watched with some care and was not sorry to see embarrassed by her petty imperialism. Simon was murdered by his son-in-law at a banquet (1 Macc. 13:1—16:16).

Simon's son, the celebrated John Hyrcanus, inherited the political authority and held it for thirty years, during which time he achieved considerable territorial expansion. In 104 B.C. Hyrcanus was succeeded by his son Aristobulus, who assumed the royal title, but he died within a year. Aristobulus's brother, Alexander Jannaeus, ascended the throne and ruled as a tyrant for over thirty years. He was succeeded by his widow, Salome Alexandra, whose reign was characterized by peace and prosperity (76-67 B.C.). Upon her death, however, civil war broke between her two sons (Hyrcanus II and Aristobulus II), and the resulting instability provided Rome with the opportunity to intervene. In 63 B.C., POMPEY took Palestine. Although the heirs of the Hasmoneans continued to serve under the Romans for a few decades, Pompey's invasion brought the dynasty to a close. Macedonia.

Macedonia. mas'uh-doh'nee-uh (Gk. Makedonia G3423; gentilic Makedōn G3424, "Macedonian"). Also Macedon. In NT times a Roman senatorial PROVINCE encompassing much of what is now northern GREECE. Lying geographically between the Balkan highlands and the Greek peninsula, Macedonia was initially a Greek kingdom; it occupied a quadrangle of territory that formed only the eastern half of the Roman provincial unit. The province extended from the Aegean to the Adriatic, with ILLYRICUM to the NW, THRACE to the NE, and ACHAIA to the S. Culturally, Macedonia came under strong Athenian influence (see ATHENS) in the latter years of the fifth century before Christ and in the first half of the fourth century, the period between Euripides, who emigrated to Macedonia in 408 or 407 B.C., and Aristotle, who came to Macedonia as tutor to Alexander in 343 or 342 after the death of Plato. The population was Indo-European but of mixed tribal elements, of which the Dorian stock was probably a strong ingredient.

The history of the early kingdom is confused, and the tradition that Perdiccas I conquered the Macedonian plain in 640 B.C. probably marks the emergence of one dominant clan among an agglomeration of mountain tribes striving for the mastery of a significant area on an ancient invasion route. Until the reign of Philip II (359 to 336 B.C.), the kingdom was insignificant in Aegean history and was preoccupied with the continual tension of tribal war. By consolidation, conquest, pacification, and an enlightened policy of hellenization, carried out with the speed, precision, ruthlessness, and clear-headed determination that marked the man, Philip unified Macedonia and finally conquered all Greece. The orations of Demosthenes, directed against the Macedonian menace, are poignant documents of this day of the democratic decadence of Athens and the upsurge of Macedonian power that was to extend Greek rule to the east. It was the army created by Philip that followed ALEXANDER THE GREAT, his son, to the Ganges and overthrew the Persian empire.

The history of Macedonia from Hellenistic times to the Roman conquest and annexation (167 B.C.) is undistinguished. Macedonia was the first part of Europe to receive Christianity (Phil. 4:15). The “man from Macedonia” of Paul’s dream may have been LUKE, who, if not a native of PHILIPPI in Macedonia, was certainly long a resident there (Acts 16:9-12). PAUL was more than once in the province (Acts 19:21; 20:1-3; 1 Cor. 16:5; 2 Cor. 1:16). Some Macedonian believers were evidently close to the apostle; for example, Gaius and Aristarchus, Secundus, Sopater, and Epaphroditus (Acts 17:11; 20:4; Phil. 4:10-19; 1 Thess. 2:8, 17-20; 3:10).

Herod the Great built a prison and fortress at Machaerus (view to the W). It was probably here that his son Herod Antipas executed John the Baptist.

Machaerus. muh-kihr' uhs (Gk. Machairous). The name Machaerus does not occur in the NT, but JOSEPHUS (Ant. 13.5.2 §119) reports that JOHN THE BAPTIST was imprisoned and beheaded at this fortress. According to the account in the Gospels (Matt. 14:3-12; Mk. 6:17-29; Lk. 3:19-20), it was during the birthday celebration of HEROD Antipas that this ruler ordered the death of John. Machaerus (modern Mukawir) is located E of the DEAD SEA on a high mountain overlooking the sea. Antipas's father, Herod the Great, constructed an impressive palace on a hill opposite the fortification, and Antipas was given control of it when he received the territory of PEREA. The attractive view of the Dead Sea, the commanding position with HERODIUM and Alexandrium visible on the W bank, and the presence of hot springs nearby no doubt made this a delightful residence for the healthy and ailing Herods.

Machpelah. mak-pee´luh (Heb. makpēlâ H4834, always with the definite article, meaning “the double [cave]”). The burial place that ABRAHAM purchased of EPHRON, the HITTITE of HEBRON, now located under the Ḥaram el-Khalil in Hebron. The name does not occur outside GENESIS and always designates the sepulchres of the PATRIARCHS (Gen. 23:9 et al.; 25:9; 49:30; 50:13).

Macnadebai. mak-nad´uh-bi (Heb. maknadbay H4827, meaning unknown). Also Machnadebai; TNIV Maknadebai. One of the descendants of Binnui who agreed to put away their foreign wives (Ezra 10:40).

Madaba. See MADEBA MAP; MEDEBA.

Madai. may´di (Heb. māday H4512, meaning unknown). Son (or descendant) of JAPHETH and grandson (or more distant descendant) of NOAH (Gen. 10:2; 1 Chr. 1:5). The Hebrew term is elsewhere rendered “Medes” (e.g., 2 Ki. 17:6) or “Media” (e.g., Esth. 1:3). See MEDIA.

Madeba map. mad´uh-buh. An early Christian mosaic, set into the floor of a sixth century Greek Orthodox church in the town of Madeba, Jordan (see MEDEBA). Almost 40 ft. (12 m.) long, it is the earliest known map of the Holy Land.

Madmannah. mad-man´uh (Heb. madmannāh H4526, “dung place”). One of the “southernmost towns of the tribe of Judah in the Negev toward the boundary of Edom” (Josh. 15:31; cf. v. 21). Elsewhere a man named SHAAPH, one of the sons of CALEB, is described as “the father of Madman-nah” (1 Chr. 2:49), which probably means that he was the founder or civic leader of the town. Many scholars believe that Madmannah is the same as BETH MARCABOTH, a city taken from JUDAH’s allotment and transferred to the tribe of SIMEON. The town is identified by some with modern Khirbet Umm ed-Deimneh, and by others with nearby Khirbet Tatrit, both about 9 mi. (15 km.) NE of BEERSHEBA.

Madmen. mad´muhn (Heb. madmēn H4522, “dung place”). A town in MOAB against which JEREMIAH prophesied (Jer. 48:2). It is often identified with modern Khirbet Dimneh, some 10 mi. (16 km.) E of the DEAD SEA and 7.5 mi. (12 km.) N of KIR HARESETH. It is possible that the original reading was DIMON, corrupted either as a result of scribal error or for literary reasons (altering the spelling to mock the Moabites).

Madmenah. mad-mee'nuh (Heb. madmēnāh H4524, “dung place”). An unidentified place, apparently near ANATHOTH, mentioned in Isaiah’s description of the Assyrian advance upon JERUSALEM (Isa. 10:31).

madness. Insanity. See DISEASES.

Madon. may'don (Heb. mādôn H4507, “[place of] contention”). A royal city of the Canaanites in GALILEE whose king, JOBAB, joined JABIN king of HAZOR in his unsuccessful alliance against ISRAEL (Josh. 11:1 [LXX Marrōn]; 12:19 [cf. LXX in v. 20]). The proposal that Madon should be identified with modern Khirbet Madin (c. 10 mi./16 km. ENE of NAZARETH) has little in its favor other than name similarity. On the basis of the SEPTUAGINT (cf. also 11:5, 7), many scholars suspect textual corruption and identify Madon with MEROM (prob. some 20 mi./32 km. farther N), near which the battle took place. See also SHIMRON (PLACE).

Magadan. mag'uh-dan (Gk. Magadan G3400). A locality on the W shore of the Sea of Galilee to which Jesus came after feeding the 4,000. The name appears only in Matt. 15:39 (KJV, “Magdala,” following the Majority text), while the parallel passage reads DALMANUTHA (Mk. 8:10). Magadan and Dalmanutha may have been contiguous; and possibly Magadan was identical with, or at least included in, MAGDALA, the home of MARY Magdalene.

Magbish. mag'bish (Heb. magbîš H4455, possibly from a root meaning “to pile up” or “to be massive”). Either the ancestor of some Israelites who returned from EXILE or, more likely, a town in JUDAH resettled by them (Ezra 2:30; the name is omitted in the parallel list, Neh. 7:33). If it is a town, its location is unknown.

Magdala, Magdalene. mag'duh-luh, -leen (Gk. Magdala G3401 [not in NIV], prob. from Heb. migdāl H4463, “tower”; gentilic Magdalēnē G3402). The town of Magdala was apparently the home of MARY Magdalene, who is mentioned a number of times in the Gospels (Matt. 27:56 et al.). The name Magdala itself does not occur in any textually secure passage, although it is found in a few MSS at Mk. 8:10 (where the original reading is no doubt DALMANUTHA); it also occurs in many MSS, followed by the KJV, at Matt. 15:39 (where the earliest texts, as well as most modern versions, read MAGADAN). Magdala is sometimes linked with migdāl nûnayyā , “Fish Tower,” a place mentioned in the TALMUD as being close to TIBERIAS. It is also thought to be the same as Taricheas (Tarichea or Tarich[a]eae), “Fish-Salting,” an important town mentioned several times by JOSEPHUS (War 1.8.8 §180 et al.) and usually identified with modern Majdal, 3 mi. (5 km.) NW of Tiberias. Majdal (also Mejdel) stands at a strategic road junction, and so perhaps justifies the name—a tower or fortification, some strong point, perhaps, on a vital crossroad.

Magdiel. mag´dee-uhl (Heb. magdî ʾēl H4462, “gift of God”). Descendant of ESAU, listed among the clan chiefs of EDM (Gen. 36:43; 1 Chr. 1:54).

maggot. See ANIMALS.

Magi. may´ji (pl. form of Latin magus, from Gk. magos G3407, in turn a borrowing of Old Pers. maguš; cf. Heb. māg H4454, “official”). Originally a religious caste among the Persians. Their devotion to astrology, divination, and the interpretation of dreams led to an extension in the meaning of the word, and by the first century B.C. the terms “magi” and “Chaldean” were applied generally to fortune tellers and the exponents of esoteric religious cults throughout the Mediterranean world. Magus or “sorcerer” is the name given to SIMON in Acts 8:9 and to BAR-JESUS in 13:6 (ELYMAS, 13:8). The Magi of Matt. 2:1-12 (KJV, “wise men”) may have come from ARABIA Felix (S Arabia). Astrology was practiced there, and a tradition of Israelite messianic expectation may have survived in the region since the days of the Queen of SHEBA. Much early legend connects S Arabia with SOLOMON’S Israel. Ancient report, linked to later astrological study, may have prompted the famous journey. This, of course, can be no more than speculation. The legend of “the Three Kings” is late and medieval. The old Arabian caravan routes entered Palestine “from the East.”

magic. Originally the word meant the science or art of the MAGI, the Persian priestly caste, who, like the LEVITES, were devoted to the practice of religion. In time, however, the Greek term magos G3407 (Lat. magus) acquired broader significance. Thus magic came to mean all occult rituals or processes designed to influence or control the course of nature; to dominate people or circumstances by the alliance, aid, or use of supernatural powers; and generally to tap and to employ the forces of an unseen world. DIVINATION, the art of forecasting the future with a view to avoiding its perils and pitfalls, might be included under the same classification. Its methods were frequently “magic.” In lands ethnologically stratified, magic was often associated with the religion of a conquered or depressed class, or with imported faiths. Therefore magic was found frequently in the hands of foreign elements, was secret in its practice, and was often under official ban as antisocial and illicit. For this reason the Bible gives stern prohibitions against all forms of “wizardry” and “sorcery” (Exod. 22:18; Lev. 19:26; 20:27; Deut. 18:10-11), causing security precautions like those surrounding the royal visit to “the witch of Endor” (1 Sam. 28).

In the Mosaic law, contact with magic and its practitioners was strictly forbidden (e.g., Deut. 18:9-14). This is not only because it was typical of the abominations of the heathen that the people of God were to avoid and, indeed, destroy, but more particularly because it was a denial of the true function of prophecy and therefore of the way of faith. In a word, magic is an attempt to make the future secure, whether by trying to find out about it in advance or by casting spells so as to make things happen in a predetermined and favorable way. The Lord’s desire for his people is that they should recognize that his sovereignty has planned the future already, and that their part is, therefore, to walk trustfully into it. Furthermore, the voice of prophecy brings them all the immediate guidance and future knowledge that God thinks they need, and their task is to trust his trustworthiness.

Babylonian astrological tablet in cuneiform script, giving omens regarding lunar eclipses.

Magic was widely practiced in EGYPT (Exod. 7:11; 8:7, 18-19; 9:11) and in BABYLON (Dan. 1:20; 2:2). In both empires the craft and ritual of magic came long before the Persian religious caste whose practices provided the later name. Nonetheless, both before and after MOSES, the intrusion of such unhealthy beliefs may be detected in Hebrew history. The incident of the mandrakes found by REUBEN (Gen. 30:14) is a clear example, and perhaps also the obscure incident of JACOB's trickery with the rods at the waterhole (30:37). It is fairly evident that Jacob believed his knowledge of animal genetics was determining the breeding trend, but God revealed to him in a dream that it was the Lord, not his own manipulations, that caused the favorable results (30:10-12). Jacob's family was remote from the lofty MONOTHEISM of ABRAHAM, and the EUPHRATES Valley towns were devoted to magic, hence the TERAPHIM mentioned later in the account (Gen. 31:19; see also Jdg. 17:5; 1 Sam. 19:13; Ezek. 21:21-26; Zech. 10:2). These were household deities, crudely carved, like the Roman Lares and Penates. In popular religion their worship was a base addition to, or substitute for, the worship of the Lord. Similar in concept was the cult of the BAALS of the fields, whose corrupt worship in fertility rituals and sympathetic magic was fiercely castigated by the prophets for the obscene thing it was. In every revival of pure worship the teraphim were swept away with other forms of vicious paganism (e.g., 2 Ki. 23:24).

Magic practices are mentioned also in the NT. The reference to the pagans' "vain repetitions" (Matt. 6:7 KJV; e.g., see 1 Ki. 18:26 and Acts 19:28) may allude to the belief in the magic value of set formulas. Simon (Acts 8:9) and Elymas (13:8) are spoken of as practicing "sorcery." There is evidence that this tribe of charlatans was widespread and often Jewish in origin (e.g., "the Sons of Sceva" in Ephesus, 19:14). Emperor TIBERIUS had given much encouragement to "the Chaldeans and soothsayers" by his belief in magic. Juvenal pictures the old prince in retirement on Capri "with his wizard mob" (cum grege Chaldaeo). The senate, indeed, had more than once banished them, but a Roman weakness for the caster of horoscopes and the purveyors of superstition always ensured the return of the magicians, whom Tacitus bitterly describes as "a tribe faithless to the powerful, deceitful to those who hope, which will ever be banned among us—and ever tolerated." Sergius PAULUS, the governor of CYPRUS, seems to have held his Jewish soothsayer with a light hand and to have been quite convinced by the apostle's exposure of him. The record of the first Christian impact on the city of EPHESUS reveals the tremendous influence of magic among the populace at large. With the spread of Christian doctrine, those who practiced "curious arts" brought their books of incantations of magic formulas to burn. The early church in general did not dismiss magic as a delusion, but attributed its results to the work of malign and evil beings who were without power against a Christian.

magistrate. This English term, referring to an official entrusted with the administration of laws, is used to render two Aramaic terms in the OT (Ezra 7:25; Dan. 3:2-3). In the NT it renders Greek archōn G807, “ruler” (only Lk. 12:58), and especially stratēgos G5130 (Acts 16:20-38). The latter was a common term in classical Greek literature for a high military officer and is usually translated “general” or “captain” (e.g., 4:1). In the context in Acts 16, stratēgos is used as the title of the Roman official of the colony of PHILIPPI and probably stands for the Latin duumviri (also duoviri), referring to the magistrates of the colony. This Greek term, however, was used also of the much higher Roman official, the praetor. In the provincial colonial seats of the Roman empire there often were several of these officials whose power included paramilitary and police affairs as well as administrative and political functions. There were usually three to five such officials who levied taxes, commanded the Roman garrison, tried criminal cases, and kept civil order.

Magnificat. mag-nif´uh-kat. The title given to Mary’s psalm of praise (Lk. 1:46-55), drawn from the first line of the Latin VULGATE, “Magnificat anima mea Dominum” (“My soul magnifies the Lord”). The passage is similar to the prayer or song of HANNAH (1 Sam. 2:1-10) and contains allusions to it. It is one of the three psalms in Hebrew poetic style in this narrative of the birth of our Lord. The text makes a most fitting ending to the expectations of the OT COVENANT which looked forward to the consummation of the promised blessing to ABRAHAM through the MESSIAH. The utter humility of the means by which God is pleased to bring this grace to his people is glorified as a singular instance of his sovereign power.

Magog. may´gog (Heb. māgôg H4470, possibly from Akk. māt gugi, “land of Gyges”; Gk. Magōg G3408). In Ezek. 38:2 and 39:6, Magog is described as a land in which (or people over which) GOG acts as chief ruler. The name appears first in the Table of Nations for one of the sons (or descendants) of JAPHETH (Gen. 10:2; 1 Chr. 1:5), who are eponymous ancestors of national groups. JOSEPHUS (Ant. 1.6.1) identifies Magog with the SCYTHIANS of the far N. Resemblance of names has caused some to identify Gog with Gyges (Gugu) of LYDIA, and so Magog with Lydia. Ezekiel’s association of Gog and Magog with peoples at the extremities of the then known world (Ezek. 38:2) suggests that they might be interpreted in a representative and eschatological sense rather than identified particularly (Rev. 20:8 uses the terms this way). Ezekiel sees them as representing northern nations (Ezek. 38:14-16), who in the “latter days” come against Israel in battle and experience God’s wrath in defeat.

Magor-Missabib. may'gor-mis'uh-bib (Heb. māgôr missābîb H4474, “terror all around”). The name that JEREMIAH gave to PASHHUR, the priest who beat him and put him in stocks (Jer. 20:3-4). The TNIV renders, “Terror on Every Side.” In describing the coming of the Babylonian army, Jeremiah used the same phrase on a number of occasions to press home that terrible truth (6:25; 20:10; 46:5; 49:29; cf. Lam. 2:22). The phrase appears also in Ps. 31:13.

Magpiash. mag'pee-ash (Heb. magpî'āš H4488, derivation uncertain). An Israelite leader who sealed the covenant of NEHEMIAH (Neh. 10:20). Some think that the personal name Magpiash may have been derived from MAGBISH (Ezra 2:30) if the latter was the village settled by the family.

Magus. may'guhs. See MAGI; SIMON #8.

Mahalab. may'huh-lab (from a conjectured place name, mēhallēb). A border town within the tribal territory of ASHER, near ACZIB and the MEDITERRANEAN Sea (Josh. 19:29 NRSV). The MT, however, reads mēhebel, “from the territory” (cf. KJV, “from the coast to Achzib”; NIV, “in the region of Aczib”). If the conjecture Mahalab is correct, it may be the same as a town called Maḥalliba (in an inscription of SENNACHERIB) and probably should be identified with AHLAB (Jdg. 1:31), which in turn may be the same as modern Khirbet el-Maḥalib, some 4 mi. (6 km.) NE of TYRE.

Mahalah. See MAHLAH.

Mahalaleel. See MAHALALEL.

Mahalalel. may-hal'uh-luhl (Heb. mahālāl ʾēl H4546, “praise of God” or “God shines”; Gk. Maleleēl G3435). KJV Mahalaleel; KJV NT, Maleleel. (1) Son of Kenan and grandson of ENOSH in the line of SETH (Gen. 5:12-17; 1 Chr. 1:2); included in the GENEALOGY OF JESUS CHRIST (Lk. 3:37; NRSV, “Mahalaleel”).

(2) Descendant of PEREZ and ancestor of ATHAIAH, a postexilic Judahite who settled in JERUSALEM (Neh. 11:4).

mahalath, mahalath leannoth. may'huh-lath, may'huh-lath-lee-an'oth (Heb. māḥălat H4714 and lē'annôt H4361). Musical terms of uncertain meaning found, respectively, in the titles of Ps. 53 and 88. The first term is often interpreted as referring to a musical instrument, such as the flute; if so, the phrase could mean "[upon] a flute for singing." According to a different analysis, the phrase indicates a tune perhaps entitled "The Suffering of Affliction" (so NIV mg.)

Mahalath (person). may'huh-lath (Heb. māḥălat H4715, meaning unknown). (1) Daughter of ISHMAEL (Gen. 28:9). ESAU married her because his previous marriages to Canaanite women had displeased ISAAC (v. 8). Mahalath may be the same as the BASEMATH mentioned in 36:3, but some scholars argue that the two passages preserve conflicting traditions.

(2) Daughter of JERIMOTH and ABIHAIL, granddaughter of DAVID, and wife of REHOBAM (2 Chr. 11:18). She gave birth to three sons (v. 19).

Mahali. See MAHLI.

Mahanaim. may'huh-nay'im (Heb. maḥănayim H4724, "double camp"). A city in N TRANSJORDAN, important especially in the time of the monarchy. Mahanaim, according to Gen. 32:2, was named by JACOB after he left LABAN, his father-in-law, and met God's angels on the way back to CANAAN. This town was appointed as one of the CITIES OF REFUGE and was assigned to the LEVITES (Josh. 21:38; 1 Chr. 6:80). It was situated in GILEAD, on the boundary between the tribes of GAD and MANASSEH (Josh. 13:26, 30). After the death of SAUL, Mahanaim was made the capital of Israel for a short time (2 Sam. 2:8). DAVID, fleeing from ABSALOM, came to this place (19:32). SOLOMON's officer ABINADAB was stationed in this city (1 Ki. 4:14). There may be a mention of Mahanaim in Cant. 6:13 (NIV, "the dance of Mahanaim"; NRSV, "a dance before two armies"). The Bible gives little information to identify the site, apart from the deduction in Gen. 32:22 that it was N of the JABBOK River. Various proposals have been made, but the most likely site is Tell edh-Dhahab el-Gharbi, on the N bank of the Jabbok and some 7 mi. (11 km.) E of the JORDAN.

Mahaneh Dan. may'hun-uh-dan' (Heb. maḥănēh-dān H4723, "camp of Dan"). A place between ZORAH and ESHTAOL (therefore c. 15 mi./24 km. W of JERUSALEM) where "the Spirit of the LORD began to stir" SAMSON (Jdg. 13:25; KJV,

“the camp of Dan”). The area received its name because 600 Danites camped there before attacking the Ephraimites (18:12). The latter passage describes the place as being “west” (lit., “behind”) KIRIATH JEARIM, which seems inconsistent with 13:25. Some scholars suspect textual corruption in 13:25; others speculate that two different places had the same name; still others interpret “west of Kiriath Jearim” loosely. In any case, the precise location of Mahaneh Dan is unknown.

Maharai. may’huh-ri (Heb. mahray H4560, possibly “impetuous”). A warrior from the town of NETOPHAH who became one of DAVID’s Thirty (2 Sam. 23:28; 1 Chr. 11:30). Elsewhere he is identified as a descendant of ZERAH and as an army commander in charge of the division for the tenth month (1 Chr. 27:13).

Mahath. may’hath (Heb. maḥat H4744, perhaps “harsh”). (1) Son of AMASAI, descendant of KOHATH, and ancestor of the musician HEMAN (1 Chr. 6:35).

(2) Son of Amasai (prob. different from #1 above); this Mahath was a Kohathite LEVITE who assisted in the reforms of King HEZEKIAH (2 Chr. 29:12) and is probably also to be identified with the Mahath who was one of the supervisors of the temple offerings (31:13).

Mahavite. may’huh-vit (Heb. maḥāwîm H4687, derivation unknown). Epithet applied to ELIEL, one of DAVID’s mighty warriors (1 Chr. 11:46); it serves to distinguish him from the Eliel in the following verse. The term, which occurs only here, appears to be a gentilic, but its reference is unknown (many scholars emend the text to “Mahanite” [see MAHANAIM], or to “Maonite” [see BAAL MEON and MAON], but these forms too are unattested).

Mahazioth. muh-hay’zee-oth (Heb. maḥāzî’ôṭ H4692, prob. from a root meaning “vision”). Son of HEMAN, the king’s seer (1 Chr. 25:4). The fourteen sons of Heman, along with the sons of ASAPH and JEDUTHUN, were set apart “for the ministry of prophesying, accompanied by harps, lyres and cymbals” (v. 1). The assignment of duty was done by lot, and the twenty-third lot fell to Mahazioth, his sons, and his relatives (25:30).

Maher-Shalal-Hash-Baz. may’huhr-shal’al-hash’baz (Heb. mahēr šālāl ḥāš baz H4561, prob. “hurry [to seize] plunder, hasten [to seize] spoil”). A symbolic name given to one of the sons of ISAIAH to signify the speedy destruction of REZIN and PEKAH by the king of ASSYRIA (Isa. 8:1, 3). In this phrase, the two verbs are usually understood as imperatives, but it is possible to take them as participles (“the one who hurries...who hastens”).

Mahlah. mahˈluh (Heb. maḥlâ H4702, possibly “weak”). (1) The eldest of the five daughters of ZELOPHEHAD of the tribe of MANASSEH (Num. 26:33). Since Zelophehad had no sons, his daughters requested ELEAZAR the priest that they be allowed to inherit their father’s property, and the request was granted on condition that they marry into their father’s tribe (27:1-11; 36:11; Josh. 17:3-4). This decision was very important and became a precedent.

(2) Son (or daughter) of HAMMOLEKETH, who was apparently the sister of GILEAD; included in the genealogy of MANASSEH (1 Chr. 7:18). It is unclear why the name of Mahlah’s father is not given. See ABIEZER #1.

Mahli. mahˈli (Heb. maḥlî H4706, derivation uncertain; gentilic maḥlî H4707, “Mahlite”). (1) Son of MERARI and grandson of LEVI (Exod. 6:19; Num. 3:19; 1 Chr. 6:19, 29; 23:21; 24:26, 28; Ezra 8:18). His offspring, the Mahlites (Num. 3:33; 26:58), along with their brothers, the Mushites (see MUSHI), were responsible for carrying the frames of the TABERNACLE with its bars, pillars, bases, and all the accessories attached to these things (Num. 4:31-33). (There are some unexplained differences in the various lists.)

(2) Son of Mushi, grandson of Merari, and thus nephew of #1 above (1 Chr. 6:47; 23:23; 24:30). He is listed as an ancestor of ETHAN, one of the Levites that DAVID put in charge of the temple music (cf. 6:31, 44).

Mahlon. mahˈlon (Heb. maḥlôn H4705, possibly “sickly”). Son of ELIMELECH and NAOMI; first husband of RUTH (Ruth 1:2, 5; 4:10). He and his brother KILION, as well as their father, died in MOAB.

Mahol. mayˈhol (Heb. māḥôl H4689, “[round or circle] dance”). A term used to designate the father of four sages who are compared with SOLOMON for WISDOM (1 Ki. 4:31). Elsewhere, however, their father is said to be ZERAH (1 Chr. 2:6). Since the name means “dance,” and two of these sages, HEMAN and ETHAN, are ascribed authorship of one psalm each (Heman, Ps. 88; Ethan, Ps. 89), it is likely that “sons of Mahol” is an appellative expression indicating membership in a musical guild. These men apparently were dancers whose activity played an important role in religious exercises (cf. Ps. 149:3; 150:4).

Mahseiah. mah-see'yah (Heb. maḥsêâ H4729, “Yahweh is [my] refuge”). KJV Maaseiah. Father of NERIAH and grandfather of BARUCH and SERAIAH; the latter two men assisted the prophet JEREMIAH (Jer. 32:12; 51:59).

Young Palestinian maiden.

maid, maiden. The English term maid is a short form of maiden, both of which mean “unmarried young woman,” usually applied to virgins. The shorter form, however, often has the more specific meaning of “female servant,” its most common modern use. The KJV uses maid (in both the general and the specific meaning) over forty times to render several Hebrew and Greek words. Modern versions as a rule apply this term only to servants and thus employ it less frequently (similar terms used include maidservant and slave-girl; cf. also handmaid and handmaiden in the KJV).

The fuller term, maiden, occurs twenty-six times in the KJV as the translation of such words as Hebrew na ʿārāh H5855, “girl,” and bētûlâ H1435, “virgin” (cf. both terms in Gen. 24:16). In the NIV, maiden occurs sixteen times, usually as the translation of bētûlâ (e.g., Ps. 78:63), but a few times it renders ʿalmâ H6625 (Gen. 24:43; Ps. 68:25; Prov. 30:19; Cant. 1:3). The latter Hebrew term has proven controversial because of its use in Isa. 7:14. Following the SEPTUAGINT (which uses parthenos G4221 here [also in Gen. 24:43]), the KJV translates “virgin,” as does the NIV. Many scholars, however, argue that it should be rendered “young woman” (cf. NRSV). It is true that Hebrew ʿalmâ does not fully correspond to English virgin, but it may well indicate a marriageable young woman, who in that culture would have been presumed to be a virgin. In this respect, English maiden may be a close equivalent of this Hebrew word. See discussion under VIRGIN.

Makaz. may´kaz (Heb. māqa H5242, derivation uncertain). One of four towns within the second of the twelve districts that supplied provisions for SOLOMON and the royal household (1 Ki. 4:9); governed by BEN-DEKER, this district was apparently in the N SHEPHELAH, but the precise location of Makaz is unknown.

Makbannai. mak´bu-ni. TNIV form of MACBANNAI.

Makbenah. mak-bee´nuh. TNIV form of MACBENAH.

Makheloth. mak-hee´loth (Heb. maqhelôt H5221, “places of assembly”). A stopping place of the Israelites, between Haradah and Tahath, during their forty years of wilderness wanderings (Num. 33:25-26). The location is unknown.

Maki. may´ki (Heb. mākî H4809, possibly short form of MAKIR). Also Machi. Father of Geuel, who was one of the twelve spies sent out to reconnoiter the Promised Land; he represented the tribe of GAD (Num. 13:15).

Makir. may´kihr (Heb. mākîr H4810, prob. “bought”; gentilic mākîrî H4811, “Makirite”). (1) Son of MANASSEH (through an ARAMEAN concubine, 1 Chr. 7:14) and grandson of JOSEPH. Makir may have married a woman “from among the Huppites and Shuppites” (so NIV, v. 15, but NRSV has, “Machir took a wife for Huphim and for Shuphim” [similarly NJPS]). In any case, his wife MAACAH bore him two sons (Peshar and Sheresh, v. 16); his son GILEAD may have been borne by another wife. We read that the children of Makir “were placed at birth on Joseph’s knees,” apparently an adoption ritual (Gen. 50:23). A daughter of Makir married the Judahite HEZRON and bore him SEGUB, who became the father of JAIR (1 Chr. 2:21-23). Makir’s descendants, the Makirites, are at the head of the list of Israelites who came out of Egypt (Num. 26:29). Makir’s son Gilead gave his name to (or was named for?) the area in TRANSJORDAN that his family inhabited (Num. 27:1; 32:39-40). In addition, BASHAN was allotted to the Makirites because they were “great soldiers” (Josh. 17:1). Makir’s great-grandson, ZELOPHEHAD, had no sons and thus his daughters claimed the inheritance (Num. 27 and 31; cf. Josh. 13:29-31).

(2) Son of Ammiel and probably a descendant of #1 above. This Makir is identified as a citizen of LO-DEBAR in whose house MEPHIBOSHETH the son of JONATHAN stayed (2 Sam. 9:4-5). He subsequently helped DAVID when the latter went into exile (17:27-29).

Makkedah. muh-kee'duh (Heb. maqquḏâ H5218, possibly related to a root that in Aram. means “to be clean”). A Canaanite royal city taken by JOSHUA in his battle with the southern confederacy of five kings (Josh. 10:10-29). These kings, having been defeated at GIBEON, fled first eastward toward BETH HORON and then southward toward AZEKAH and Makkedah. The kings sought refuge, under pressure of Joshua's attack and God's rain of “stones,” in a cave near Makkedah. There Joshua killed them in the presence of his men. Then Joshua took the city of Makkedah nearby, killing the king (10:28). The town was in the SHEPHELAH and was later incorporated into the tribe of JUDAH, in the same district as LACHISH (15:41). Its precise location is uncertain, however.

Malachi, Book of. mal'uh-ki (Heb. mal'ākî H4858, “my messenger”). The last book among the twelve Minor Prophets. The traditional ascription of the prophecy to an individual named Malachi was derived from the opening words in Mal. 1:1. Some have thought that mal'ākî is a common noun, and indeed it is so rendered in 3:1 (cf. also the LXX at 1:1); but since the other prophetic books of the OT always begin by stating the prophet's name, it seems more likely that here, too, the name of the prophet is given. It is not unusual to have word-plays on the names of real people (Ezek. 3:8-9). Nothing more is known about the author of this book.

Malachi is believed to be one of the latest of the OT books. Since no statement as to its date is made in the book, one must seek to determine this by the nature of its contents. It is clearly postexilic. The TEMPLE had been completed and sacrifices were being offered (Mal. 1:7-10; 3:8). A Persian governor was ruling in JERUSALEM (the word for governor in 1:8 is a borrowed word, used for the Persian governors in Palestine in postexilic times). This indicates a date later than that of HAGGAI and ZECHARIAH.

It is also clear that the early zeal for the rebuilding of the temple had died out, and a situation of moral and religious declension had set in. Mixed marriages (Mal. 2:10-12), the failure to pay tithes (3:8-10), and the offering of blemished sacrifices (1:6-14) are conditions not unlike those referred to in the times of EZRA and NEHEMIAH (cf. Ezra 7; Neh. 13); and it would seem that Malachi's prophecy was given at about that time, or possibly shortly thereafter—about the middle or end of the fifth century B.C.

There are two principal themes in the book: the sin and apostasy of the people of Israel, emphasized in Mal. 1-2; and the judgment that will come on the faithless and the blessing in store for those who repent, predominating in chs. 3-4. A more detailed analysis follows:

(1) Title, 1:1.

(2) An argument for the love of God toward Israel as shown in the contrasted experiences of Edom and Israel, 1:2-5.

(3) A protest against the negligence of the priests in worship, 1:6—2:9.

(4) A condemnation of those who divorce their wives and marry foreign women, 2:10-16.

(5) An answer to those who complain that God is indifferent to injustice: a day of judgment is at hand, 2:17—3:5.

(6) A rebuke for the neglect of tithes and offerings, 3:6-12.

(7) A reply to doubters and a promise to the faithful, 3:13—4:3.

(8) A recall to the law and prophecy of the coming of Elijah, 4:4-6.

Overview of MALACHI

Author: The prophet Malachi.

Historical setting: The postexilic period in JERUSALEM, after the rebuilding of the TEMPLE (516 B.C.). Most scholars date the book c. 450 B.C.

Purpose: To condemn the negligence of the priests and the faithlessness of the people, and to announce “the great and dreadful day of the Lord” (Mal. 4:5).

Contents: After reminding the Israelites of their privileges (Mal. 1:1-5), God denounces the failures of the priests (1:6—2:9) and the unfaithfulness of the people (2:10—3:18), concluding with a warning about the coming of the DAY OF THE LORD (ch. 4).

The book of Malachi is characterized by several unique features. First, it uses the rhetorical question and answer as a method of communication. This device begins most of the eight sections referred to above. It anticipates the later catechetical method of teaching.

Second, Malachi evinces prophetic and priestly interests. It has been called “prophecy within the law.” Generally the prophets exhibit little interest in sacrifices and ceremonial laws, preferring to stress the more inward aspects of religious life. Malachi, however, sees the people's apostasy manifested by their carelessness in the sacrificial offerings (Mal. 1:6-14), the priests' neglect of their duties (2:1-9), and the failure of the people to pay their tithes and other offerings (3:7-12). This book is thus an antidote to the view commonly held today that the prophets did not believe in the necessity of the ritual law. Rather, they accepted the sacrificial system but often protested against its abuse that resulted from the people's failure to apprehend the necessity of inward faith and outward moral righteousness in addition to ritual cleanness.

Finally, the growing OT messianic expectation is witnessed to in the announcement of God's "messenger of the covenant," by whose coming Israel will be purified and judged (Mal. 3:1-5; cf. Matt. 11:10); and of the prophet ELIJAH who will announce the DAY OF THE LORD (Mal. 4:5-6; cf. Matt. 17:9-13).

Malcam. mal'kam (Heb. malkām H4903, from a root meaning "king"). KJV Malcham; TNIV Malkam. (1) Son of SHAHARAIM and descendant of BENJAMIN; a family head (1 Chr. 8:9). Malcam was one of seven children that were born to Shaharaim in MOAB by his wife HODESH after he had divorced Hushim and Baara (v. 8).

(2) The same Hebrew form occurs in the last phrase of Zeph. 1:5, which speaks of idolaters who swear both by Yahweh and by malkām. The SEPTUAGINT (Old Greek) translators, reading the same vowels as does the MT, analyzed the form as the noun melek H4889 plus the third masculine plural pronominal suffix, and rendered it tou basileōs autōn, "their king." These and other early translators, however, were working with an unvocalized Hebrew text (thus simply mlkm). The Lucianic recension of the Greek version, analyzing it as milkom (H4904), transliterates the word as Melchom (similarly the Syriac Peshitta and the Latin Vulgate). Most modern versions take this second approach (as they do also in Jer. 49:1, 3; and cf. 2 Sam. 12:30 = 1 Chr. 20:2; Amos 1:15). Many believe that MILCOM is an alternate name for MOLEK.

Malchus. malˈkuhs (Gk. Malchos G3438, prob. from an Arabic name meaning “king”). A servant of the high priest (CAIAPHAS); according to John, Simon PETER struck him with a sword and cut off his right ear when Jesus was arrested (Jn. 18:10). Although this incident is also recorded in the Synoptic Gospels (Matt. 26:51; Mk. 14:47; Lk. 22:50-51 [Luke adds the information that Jesus healed his ear]), John alone reports that his name was Malchus and that it was Peter who struck him.

malice. An evil desire to do harm to or act wickedly toward someone. This English term is used variously in Bible versions to render several terms for EVIL, such as Hebrew raʿ H8273 (Ps. 41:5 et al.) and Greek kakia G2798 (1 Cor. 5:8 et al.). It is obviously an internal feeling or attitude that Christians must put away (Eph. 4:31; 1 Pet. 2:1), for it is wholly opposed to the life in, and the fruit of, the indwelling Spirit of God. It belongs to the old nature, the FLESH that is under the domination of sin. The NIV uses the semi-technical English expression “malice aforethought” in several legal contexts to translate Hebrew śin ʾâ H8534, “hatred” (Num. 35:20 et al.).

Malkam. malˈkam. TNIV form of MALCAM.

Malkiel. malˈkee-uhl (Heb. malkîʾēl H4896, “God is [my] king”; gentilic malkîʾēlî H4897, “Malkielite”). Also Malchiel. Son of BERIAH, grandson of ASHER, and eponymous ancestor of the Malkielite clan (Gen. 46:17; Num. 26:45; 1 Chr. 7:31).

Malkijah. mal-kiˈjuh (Heb. malkiyyâ H4898 and malkiyyāhû H4899 [only Jer. 38:6], “Yahweh is [my] king”). Also Malchiah (nine times in KJV and three times in NRSV), Malchijah (six times in KJV, twelve times in NRSV), Melchiah (KJV only Jer. 21:1). The inconsistency in the English spelling has no textual basis; the NIV uses “Malkijah” throughout.

(1) Son of Ethni, descendant of LEVI, and ancestor of the musician ASAPH (1 Chr. 6:40).

(2) A priest who received the fifth lot of the twenty-four divisions in DAVID’s time (1 Chr. 24:9).

(3) A man identified as “the king’s son” (which prob. indicates that he was a royal official with police duties); he was owner of the cistern into which JEREMIAH’s enemies cast him while King ZEDEKIAH pretended to be powerless to stop them (Jer. 38:6). Some believe that this Malkijah is the same man identified elsewhere in Jeremiah as the father of PASHHUR (21:1; 38:1). It is also possible that he is the same Malkijah listed as an ancestor of ADAIAH, the head of a priestly family who resettled in Jerusalem after the EXILE (1 Chr. 9:12; a fuller genealogy is given in Neh. 11:12).

(4-6) In a list of Israelites who pledged themselves to put away their foreign wives, three are named Malkijah, two of whom were descendants of Parosh (Ezra 10:25, but NRSV emends the second to HASHABIAH on the basis of the SEPTUAGINT), and the third a descendant of Harim (10:31). This third Malkijah may be the same as the son of Harim who helped repair the wall of Jerusalem (Neh. 3:11).

(7) Son of Recab and ruler of BETH HAKKEREM; he was in charge of repairing the DUNG GATE (Neh. 3:14).

(8) A goldsmith who “made repairs as far as the house of the temple servants and the merchants, opposite the Inspection Gate, and as far as the room above the corner” (Neh. 3:31).

(9) One of the prominent men (not identified as priests) who stood near EZRA when the law was read at the great assembly (Neh. 8:4). If this Malkijah was a priest, he may be the same as #10 or #11 below.

(10) A priest who sealed the covenant of NEHEMIAH (Neh. 10:3). He may be the same as #11 below.

(11) A priest or LEVITE listed among those who assisted Nehemiah in the dedication of the rebuilt walls of Jerusalem (Neh. 12:42).

Malkiram. mal-ki’ruhm (Heb. malkîrām H4901, “[my] king is exalted”). Son (or descendant) of King Jeconiah, that is, JEHOIACHIN (1 Chr. 3:18).

Malki-Shua. mal'ki-shoo'uh (Heb. malkî-šûa ^c H4902, “[my] king is salvation”). KJV Melchi-shua (in 1 Sam.) and Malchi-shua (in 1 Chr.); NRSV, Malchishua. The third son of King SAUL (1 Sam. 14:49; 1 Chr. 8:33; 9:39). The PHILISTINES killed him at the battle of GILBOA (1 Sam. 31:2; 1 Chr. 10:2).

Mallothi. mal'uh-thi (Heb. mallôti H4871, from mālal H4910, “to speak”). Son of HEMAN, the king’s seer (1 Chr. 25:4). The fourteen sons of Heman, along with the sons of ASAPH and JEDU-THUN, were set apart “for the ministry of prophesying, accompanied by harps, lyres and cymbals” (v. 1). The assignment of duty was done by lot, and the nineteenth lot fell to Mallothi, his sons, and his relatives (25:30).

mallow. See PLANTS.

Malluch. mal'uhk (Heb. mallûk H4866, variant mallûkî H4868 [Neh. 12:14], from a root meaning “king”). TNIV Malluk. (1) Son of Hashabiah, descendant of LEVI through MERARI, and ancestor of the musician ETHAN (1 Chr. 6:44).

(2) One of the descendants of BANI who agreed to put away their foreign wives (Ezra 10:29).

(3) One of the descendants of HARIM who agreed to put away their foreign wives (Ezra 10:32).

(4) One of the priests who signed the covenant of NEHEMIAH (Neh. 10:4).

(5) One of the leaders of the people who signed the covenant of NEHEMIAH (Neh. 10:27). Possibly the same as #2 or #3 above.

(6) One of the priests (or priestly families) who returned from the EXILE with ZERUBBABEL (Neh. 12:2). He is probably the same person mentioned later, when a certain Jonathan is listed as the head of the family of Malluch (v. 14; KJV, “Melicu”; NRSV, “Malluchi”).

Malluchi. See MALLUCH #6.

Malluk. mal'uhk. TNIV form of MALLUCH.

Malta. mawl'tuh (Gk. Melitē G3514). A Mediterranean island lying between Sicily and Africa. The name occurs once in the NT as the place where PAUL was shipwrecked on his journey to ROME (Acts 28:1; KJV, “Melita”). The apostle and his fellow-travelers stayed in Malta three months (28:11). Its inhabitants treated the survivors with “unusual kindness” (v. 1; cf. v. 10). Soon after reaching the island, Paul was bitten by a snake, but nothing happened to him, so the islanders thought he was a god (vv. 3-6). The chief official, PUBLIUS, welcomed Paul and the others in his home. Publius’s father was sick and Paul healed him; as a result, “the rest of the sick on the island” came to the apostle, and they too were healed (vv. 7-9).

Located 90 mi. (145 km.) from Syracuse, the great commercial center of the W Mediterranean, Malta occupied a strategic position in the ancient world. Endowed with good harbors safe from the stormy waters of the sea, it offered a convenient haven for commercial traffic moving both E-W and N-S. Some 18 mi. long and 8 mi. wide (29 x 13 km.), it was barren and arid, with few natural resources other than building stone. The eastern half, however, was somewhat productive; olive oil, wool, and lapdogs are mentioned as commodities that were profitable. During the third century B.C., Carthage and ROME engaged in a series of wars for mastery of the W Mediterranean, and in the course of the struggle Malta passed into Roman hands (218 B.C.), though Carthaginian and Greek elements remained strong for a long time afterward. The Romans granted Malta the status of a municipium, which allowed them to control their own domestic affairs. Cicero and others speak of the beauty and elegance of the houses on Malta, and of the prosperity of the island, indicating a high degree of civilization and wealth. Under AUGUSTUS, the island was seemingly administered by an official who was known by the people of Malta as “chief” or “first man” of the island (Gk. ho prōtos, Acts 28:7). Tradition has it that Publius, who held this position when Paul was shipwrecked there, was the first Christian convert in Malta, and that from this time there developed a Christian community. Catacombs from the fourth and fifth centuries A.D. give evidence of Christian influence on the island.

mammon. mam’uhn. This term, derived from Greek mamōnas G3440 (via the Latin VULGATE) comes ultimately from ARAMAIC māmôn, “wealth,” the etymology of which is disputed (the equivalent Hebrew term appears in various postbiblical writings). In Matt. 6:24 and Lk. 16:13, the term is personified, and the NIV translates, “You cannot serve both God and Money” (NRSV, “wealth”). In Lk. 16:9, Jesus speaks of “the mammon of unrighteousness” (equivalent to “the unrighteous mammon,” v. 11), which the NIV renders as “worldly wealth” (more negative is the NRSV rendering, “dishonest wealth”). There has been much discussion of the implications of unrighteousness in connection with WEALTH, but the simplest explanation seems to be that material riches are a resource open to misuse and characteristically employed by unscrupulous people for wicked purposes. Yet it is possible for the true servants of God to use wealth for good and salutary purposes, and thus procure for themselves treasure in heaven such as money cannot buy.

Mamre (person). mam´ree (Heb. mamrē › H4935, derivation uncertain). An AMORITE, brother of ESHCOL and ANER, who apparently resided near HEBRON (Gen. 14:13, 24). All three were allies of ABRAHAM when LOT was rescued from KEDORLAOMER. The expression “the great trees of Mamre the Amorite” (v. 13; cf. 13:18) suggests that he owned the place that came to be known by his name. See MAMRE (PLACE). However, some scholars believe that there is confusion in the text and that the names of all three brothers refer to localities.

Traditional tomb of Isaac in the Machpelah (Hebron), near Mamre.

Mamre (place). mam´ree (Heb. mamrē › H4934, derivation uncertain). After LOT separated from Abram (ABRAHAM), the latter “moved his tents and went to live near the great trees of Mamre at Hebron, where he built an altar to the LORD” (Gen. 13:18). Abraham was still living there when he entertained the three heavenly visitors (ch. 18). It was in Mamre that he prayed for the deliverance of SODOM and GOMORRAH. After SARAH died, he bought a burial plot from EPHRON the HITTITE; thus Abraham came into possession of the field of MACHPELAH, which is E of Mamre, and there he buried his wife (23:17-20; cf. 23:19; 25:9; 49:30; 50:13). Through the centuries there have been several places vying for the site of Mamre and Abraham’s oaks. The most widely accepted site today is Ramat el-Khalil, “The high place of the friend (of God),” which is c. 2.5 mi. (4 km.) N of HEBRON. An enclosure of huge proportions built by HEROD is there; it may have marked where the site was thought to be in NT times. Chalcolithic and Early Bronze remains found in the vicinity show at least that it is an ancient site.

man. See ADAM; HUMAN NATURE; WOMAN.

man, new. The words eis hena kainon anthrōpon, literally rendered “into one new man,” occur in Eph. 2:15 with reference to the unity that Jews and GENTILES enjoy in Christ. In Eph. 4:24, ho kainos anthrōpos (“the new man”) is contrasted with ho palaios anthrōpos (“the old man,” v. 22). In Col. 3:10, instead of the adjective kainos G2785, PAUL uses the synonym neos G3742 (with anthrōpos G476 understood), also contrasted with palaios G4094 (v. 9). The NIV and the NRSV render both constructions as “the new self.” The phrase, in general terms, refers to human beings as changed by the HOLY SPIRIT through FAITH in Jesus CHRIST. Some believe that neos points to the idea in respect to its historical context, while kainos in respect to its quality of perennial newness. The distinction is blurred, however, by the fact that in these two passages the one idea is qualified by the other. See REGENERATION; SANCTIFICATION.

man, old. The expression ho palaios anthrōpos, literally rendered “the old man,” occurs three times in the NT and refers to the unregenerate nature and activities that characterized a person prior to new life “in Christ.” It is frequently translated “the old self” or “the old nature.” PAUL states in Rom. 6:6 that “our old self” was crucified with Christ, and exhorts Christians to live conscious of this fact. In Eph. 4:22 he urges his converts to “put off your old self, which is being corrupted by its deceitful desires,” and in Col. 3:9, similarly, he pleads for honesty on the basis of having “taken off your old self with its practices.” In this period in redemptive history between the finished work of Christ in the past and the consummation of God’s plan in the future, Christians live as citizens of two worlds who are constantly conscious of (1) the crucified nature of “the old self,” and yet (2) the need to deaden the effects of that depravity in their lives which will be eradicated finally when Christ comes again. This tension, experienced by all believers, provides the context for almost all of the exhortations in the NT. See MAN, NEW.

Man, Son of. See SON OF MAN.

Manaen. man’ee-uhn (Gk. Manaēn G3441, from Heb. mēnaḥēm H4968, “comforter” [see MENAHEM]). One of the five “prophets and teachers” listed as ministering in the church at ANTIOCH of Syria (Acts 13:1). The others were BARNABAS, Simeon NIGER, LUCIUS of Cyrene, and Saul (PAUL). Manaen's position indicates a man of spiritual power and influence. Nothing further is known about Manaen beyond Luke's designation of him as one "who had been brought up with Herod the tetrarch" (NRSV, "a member of the court of Herod the ruler").

Manahath (person). man'uh-hath (Heb. mānaḥat H4969, prob. "resting [place]"). Son of SHOBAL and grandson of SEIR the HORITE (Gen. 36:23; 1 Chr. 1:40); he was a chieftain living in EDOM (Gen. 36:21). See also MANAHATHITE.

Manahath (place). man'uh-hath (Heb. mānaḥat H4970, prob. "resting [place]"). A city to which certain sons or descendants of EHUD—described as heads of families among the Benjamites who lived in GEBA—were deported (1 Chr. 8:6). The town is usually identified with modern el-Malhah, about 4 mi. (6 km.) SW of JERUSALEM. It has also been argued, however, that Manahath should be sought in GILEAD and identified with modern Mahnah, about 8 mi. (13 km.) SE of JABESH GILEAD.

Manahathite. man'uh-ha'thit (Heb. mānaḥtî H4971, gentilic of mānaḥat H4969). KJV Manahethite. A clan descended from CALEB through HUR. According to 1 Chr. 2:54, the descendants of SALMA (son of Hur) included "half the Manahathites," while v. 52 says that the descendants of SHOBAL (another son of Hur) included "half of the Menuhoth" (NRSV, following the MT). Many scholars believe that in v. 52 "Menuhoth" must be a variant (or textual corruption) of "Manahathites" (so NIV; cf. KJV). It is uncertain whether this gentilic is derived from MANAHATH (PERSON) or from MANAHATH (PLACE).

Manahethite. See MANAHATHITE.

Manasseh (person). muh-nas'uh (Heb. mēnaššeh H4985, "one who causes to forget"; gentilic mēnaššî H4986, "Manassite"; Gk. Manassēs G3442). KJV NT Manasses. (1) The older of two sons born to JOSEPH and his Egyptian wife ASENATH (Gen. 41:50-51; 46:20). Joseph interpreted Manasseh's name by the statement, "God has made me forget all my trouble and all my father's household" (41:51). When Joseph brought his sons EPHRAIM and Manasseh to his father for his blessing, JACOB adopted them as his own, placing them on an equality with his own sons as progenitors of separate tribes (48:1-5). In blessing the two boys, Jacob subordinated Manasseh the elder to Ephraim the younger, who thus inherited the position of privilege, the blessing of the FIRSTBORN (48:13-14). Nevertheless, Manasseh was to be blessed by the Angel who had delivered Jacob from all harm (48:16) and was to become a great people (48:19). It was Manasseh's ARAMEAN concubine who gave birth to MAKIR, whose descendants became the tribe of Manasseh (1 Chr. 7:14). See MANASSEH (TRIBE).

(2) Son of HEZEKIAH and king of JUDAH from c. 696 to 641 B.C. (2 Ki. 21:1; 2 Chr. 33:1). Manasseh was only twelve years of age when he succeeded his father as king (according to a different system of CHRONOLOGY, Manasseh was coregent with his father for ten years). His reign of fifty-five years was the longest in Judah's history, and its events are recorded in 2 Ki. 21:1-18 and 2 Chr. 33:1-20. Judah, during practically the entire reign of Manasseh, was a tribute-paying province of the Assyrians. Second Chronicles describes the arrest of Manasseh and his deportation to BABYLON in chains by "the army commanders of the king of Assyria." The Chronicler declares that from the prophetic point of view Manasseh's arrest and deportation was the result of the judgment of God upon the king's wickedness (2 Chr. 33:9-11). In the course of his imprisonment, Manasseh repented of his sins and was restored to his kingdom (33:12-13). A penitential psalm attributed to Manasseh is included in the apocryphal Prayer of Manasseh, probably from the Maccabean period. It is an attempt to give expression to Manasseh's repentance and faith at the time of his arrest by the Assyrians. His religious reforms when he was restored were superficial, for he did not remove the HIGH PLACES of paganism (33:17). Upon his return from Babylon, Manasseh gave himself to a program of building, measures of defense, and administration besides the religious reforms. His reign was a period of great material prosperity due to his cooperation with the Assyrians. Assyrian records list Manasseh along with other subjects who paid tribute (33:12-19).

The reign of Manasseh is distinguished by his personal responsibility for the religious syncretism of his time, which gained him the reputation of being the typical evil king of Judah. According to the account in 2 Ki. 23:26-27, his was the most immoral reign of all the kings and was the reason for the ultimate collapse of the southern kingdom. The record in 21:1-18 and 24:3-4 emphasizes three degrading aspects of the regime of Manasseh: upon his accession to the throne he led in a reaction against the reforms instituted by his father Hezekiah; he accelerated the development of heathenism in the country; he instituted a bitter persecution of the prophetic party that opposed the popular syncretism led by the king. He "filled Jerusalem with innocent blood" (24:4), and the prophets were put to the sword (Jer. 2:30). Rabbinical literature places emphasis upon the idea that Manasseh was even more evil than Ahaz, and that he killed ISAIAH, who had fled and hidden in a tree, by sawing him asunder. When Manasseh's immediate successor, JOSIAH, came to the throne, the supreme need was religious revival (2 Ki. 23:26). Jeremiah said that Manasseh's sin had yet to be expiated (Jer. 15:4; cf. 2 Ki. 23:26). Manasseh is included in the GENEALOGY OF JESUS CHRIST (Matt. 1:10).

(3) Father of Gershom and grandfather of JONATHAN; the latter was a priest for the tribe of DAN (Jdg. 18:30 KJV, following the MT). The NIV and other versions, however, read MOSES instead of Manasseh. It is generally presumed that the reading in the MT is an intentional misspelling, since the Jonathan referred to is said to be a priest of the idolatrous shrine of MICAH. Thus Jonathan's grandfather was probably Moses, but his name was changed to Manasseh to avoid stigmatizing the revered name and sparing Moses the humiliation of having an idolatrous descendant. The change was accomplished by merely inserting the small Hebrew letter nun between the first two letters of the name for Moses. This not only removed the stigma but also gave to the man a name familiar to the Hebrews as an idolater.

(4) One of the descendants of PAHATH-MOAB who agreed to put away their foreign wives (Ezra 10:30).

(5) One of the descendants of HASHUM who agreed to put away their foreign wives (Ezra 10:33).

Manasseh (tribe). One of the twelve tribes of Israel descending from MANASSEH (PERSON), the grandson of JACOB through JOSEPH; the other Joseph tribe was EPHRAIM. At the time of the EXODUS, Manasseh numbered 32,200 (Num. 1:35; 2:21) while Ephraim had 40,500 (1:32, 33; 2:19). At the time of Israel's conquest of CANAAN forty years later, Manasseh had increased to 52,700 (26:34), while Ephraim had fallen to 32,500 (26:37). During the wilderness wanderings, each tribe through its leader presented an offering at the TABERNACLE. Gamaliel, the son of Pedahzur, offered on the eighth day for Manasseh (7:54). In the order of march Manasseh came in the eleventh place (10:23). In the layout of the camp Manasseh was on the W side in the third division (2:20).

Before the Israelites crossed over the JORDAN River into Canaan, half the tribe of Manasseh, along with the tribes of REUBEN and GAD, chose land E of the river, and MOSES assigned it to them (Num. 32:33). The descendants of MAKIR, son of Manasseh, conquered GILEAD and lived there. JAIR also captured other towns (32:39-41). The half-tribe of Manasseh was given the N half of Gilead, all of BASHAN, and the region of ARGOB (Deut. 3:13). This territory included sixty cities (Josh. 13:30). The rest of the tribe was given ten portions of land W of the Jordan, including areas for ZELOPHEHAD's daughters (17:1-6). This territory was situated between Ephraim on the S and ASHER, ZEBULUN, and ISSACHAR on the N. Its eastern border was the Jordan River and on the W was the MEDITERRANEAN Sea

(17:7-10). GOLAN, in the territory of the half-tribe E of the Jordan, was selected as one of the CITIES OF REFUGE (20:8). Thirteen cities of E Manasseh were assigned to the Gershonite clan of the LEVITES, and W Manasseh furnished ten cities to the Kohathites of the Levites (21:5-6). West Manasseh failed to drive the Canaanites out of the towns (Jdg. 1:27). GIDEON was of the tribe of Manasseh (6:15), so was Jair the Gileadite, who judged Israel twenty-two years (10:3). JEPHTHAH came from Gilead in E Manasseh (11:1). This half-tribe, with Reuben and Gad, fell into idolatry and was later carried away into captivity by ASSYRIA (1 Chr. 5:25-26) during PEKAH's reign over ISRAEL (2 Ki. 15:29).

The tribe of Manasseh joined DAVID while he was a fugitive from SAUL (1 Chr. 12:19-22). When David was made king at HEBRON, W Manasseh furnished 18,000 soldiers, and E Manasseh with Reuben and Gad provided 120,000 (12:31, 37). People from Manasseh and Ephraim joined with JUDAH in making a covenant to seek the Lord during the reign of ASA king of Judah (15:9-15). Certain pious souls from W Manasseh joined in the Passover during HEZEKIAH's reign (2 Chr. 30:10-22). When JOSIAH was king, he destroyed idols and purged altars in Manasseh's territory as well as elsewhere (34:6). The people of Manasseh contributed to an offering for the repairing of the TEMPLE in Josiah's time (34:9).

Mandean. man-dee'uhn. Also Mandaean. This term (from an Aram. word meaning "knowledge") refers to a member of Mand(a)eism, a religious community that claims to have originated in Palestine, with JOHN THE BAPTIST regarded as one of its prophets; its earliest extant writings (bowls with magical texts) are from fourth century MESOPOTAMIA. A number of Mandaean villages still survive today, mainly in S Iraq. The Mandaean religion is a form of GNOSTICISM, with complex myths based on a strong dualism between light (life, goodness, spirit) and darkness (death, evil, matter); it is also characterized by intricate rituals. The Mandaean language, usually referred to as Mandaic, is a form of EARAMAIC. See also MANICHEAN.

manger. A receptacle for feeding livestock. The NIV uses this term as the rendering of Hebrew ṣēbûs H17, “feeding trough” (Job 39:9; Prov. 14:4; Isa. 1:3; KJV and NRSV have “crib”), and most versions use it to translate Greek phatnē G5764 in the nativity story (Lk. 2:7, 12, 16). This Greek term sometimes has the broader meaning of “stall” or “stable” (cf. possibly 13:15). In the ANE, animals might be kept in outdoor enclosures with lean-to roofing, or in permanent shelters made of stone and mud-wall, or in cave stalls. When Joseph and Mary were unable to find room in the INN (prob. a private home or a public shelter), they sought refuge in some kind of stable, perhaps next to the inn, though it is not possible to ascertain what type of animal shelter this was.

Manichean. man’uh-kee’uhn. Also Manichaeen, Manichee. A follower of the teachings of Mani (also Manes). The term is sometimes applied more broadly to a believer in dualism. Born of PARTHIAN princely blood in A.D. 216, probably in Babylonia, Mani was under MANDEAN influence as a child, and claimed to have received his first revelation at the age of twelve. He first preached in India, but later, during the long and tolerant reign of Shapur (c. 242-273), he made numerous converts in Babylonia, Media, and Parthia. Upon the accession of Bahram I in 273, Zoroastrianism gained the upper hand; the Manicheans were persecuted, and Mani died in prison (prob. 276). Mani taught that Buddha, Zoroaster, and Jesus were great prophets, but that he was the last and greatest. His system was a dualism in which God opposed matter. See GNOSTICISM. The elect among his followers abstained from meat, all killing of animals and plants, and sexual relations. The influence of this teaching lasted over a millennium.

manna. man’uh. This term is a transliteration of Greek manna G3445, which is the usual SEPTUAGINT rendering of Hebrew mān H4942. When the Israelites saw the “thin flakes like frost” that God had miraculously provided as food (lit., “bread”) for them, they asked, mān hû ָ, “What is it?” (Exod. 16:15), and so they called the substance mān (v. 31). This food is also described as “white like coriander seed,” and we read that it “tasted like wafers made with honey” (v. 31). According to Num. 11:7-8, “The manna was like coriander seed and looked like resin. The people went around gathering it, and then ground it in a handmill or crushed it in a mortar. They cooked it in a pot or made it into cakes. And it tasted like something made with olive oil.” In Exod. 16:13-14, the manna is associated with the dew (cf. also Ps. 78:24-25). Some believe that the manna was a gum-resin, which exuded from trees such as Alhagi maurorum (called the prickly alhagi and sometimes the Sinai manna).

God provided the manna on a daily basis to the Israelites through all the years of their wanderings (Exod. 16:35; Josh. 5:12). They were told to take only one omer (about two liters) per person, but on the sixth day they were to take twice as much so that it would last them through the SABBATH (Exod. 16:16-30). Following the Lord’s command, MOSES instructed AARON to put some manna in a jar that was to be kept in the TABERNACLE as a memorial for future generations (vv. 32-34; cf. Heb. 9:4). Near the end of the Israelites’ wandering, Moses explained to them that the manna was part of God’s testing (Deut. 8:3; cf. v. 16; Neh. 9:20). The Lord Jesus alluded to the manna at the time of his TEMPTATION in the wilderness (Matt. 4:4; Lk. 4:4). Later in his ministry he claimed to be “bread from heaven” (Jn. 6:31-35, 41, 48-51, 58). And in the book of Revelation, the glorified Lord says to the church in PERGAMUM: “To him who overcomes, I will give some of the hidden manna” (Rev. 2:17), which probably refers to the eschatological fellowship believers will enjoy with Christ at the MESSIANIC BANQUET (cf. 19:9).

Manoah. muh-noh’uh (Heb. mānôḥa H4956, “[place of] rest”). The father of SAMSON. Manoah lived in ZORAH, a town in the tribal territory of DAN before the Danites moved N to take the city of LAISH. Manoah’s wife, who was sterile, received a message from the angel of the Lord, announcing the birth of a son, who was to be a NAZIRITE (Jdg. 13:2-21). Manoah responded with fear, but his wife, who remains nameless, seemed to have a better understanding of the divine will (vv. 22-23).

man of lawlessness, man of sin. See ANTICHRIST.

mansion. This term, which in present English usually refers to an imposing house, is used by the NIV a few times (e.g., for the expression “great houses,” Amos 3:15). The KJV uses it only once in the well-known words of Jesus, “In my Father’s house are many mansions” (Jn. 14:2), but the meaning here is certainly not “palatial residence.” The English term mansion used to mean simply “dwelling,” and thus in the seventeenth century it was an appropriate rendering of the Greek term here, monē G3665 (derived from the verb menō G3531, “to remain, dwell,” which is used frequently in Jn. 14-15). This noun occurs in only one other place in the NT—in this same chapter, where Jesus says, “If anyone loves me, he will obey my teaching. My Father will love him, and we will come to him and make our home [monē] with him” (14:23; here the KJV renders it “abode”). On this basis it has been argued that v. 2 does not refer (at least not exclusively) to HEAVEN, but to the presence of Christ in the believer’s heart.

manuscript. A handwritten document (from Latin manus, “hand,” and scriptus, “written”). Prior to the invention of printing, any document, whether a work of literature or a private writing, was written by hand and was thus a “manuscript” (although in present-day English the term is also used of typewritten compositions). See TEXT AND VERSIONS; WRITING.

Maoch. may’ok (Heb. mā’ôk H5059, derivation uncertain). TNIV Maok. Father of ACHISH, who was the PHILISTINE king of GATH with whom DAVID and his men took refuge when they were fleeing SAUL (1 Sam. 27:2; cf. 1 Ki. 2:39). See MAACAH #8.

Maok. may’ok. TNIV form of MAOCH.

Maon (person). may’on (Heb. mā’ôn H5062, “dwelling”). Son of Shammai, descendant of CALEB, and “father” of BETH ZUR (1 Chr. 2:45). The latter description means either that he was the ancestor of the people of Beth Zur or the founder of that city. It is also possible that the name in this passage is a collective for the people of the town of Maon, and that they were the ones who founded the city of Beth Zur. See MAON (PLACE); MAONITES.

Maon (place). may’on (Heb. mā’ôn H5063, “dwelling”). A town in the hill-country of JUDAH, in the same district as CARMEL and ZIPH (Josh. 15:55). It is identified with modern Khirbet Ma'in, situated on a hilltop about 8 mi. (13 km.) SSE of HEBRON. Hiding from SAUL, DAVID and his men took refuge in the Desert of Maon (1 Sam. 23:24-25), which was a wilderness area E and SE of the town. Maon was the residence of NABAL, whose widow ABIGAIL became the wife of David (25:1-2).

Maonites. may'uh-nits (Heb. mā'ôn H5062, “dwelling”). Name given to a group of people who were hostile to Israel (Jdg. 10:12; lit., “Maon”). They are probably not to be connected with the town of Maon; see MAON (PLACE). Perhaps these people are the same as the MEUNITES (1 Chr. 4:41; 2 Chr. 20:1; 26:7), but this identification is by no means established.

Mara. mair'uh (Heb. mārā H5259, “bitter”). The name that NAOMI chose for herself when she returned from MOAB to her native country, bereaved of her husband and sons. Earlier, Naomi had said to her daughters-in-law, “It is more bitter [mar H5253] for me than for you” (Ruth 1:13). When she arrived in BETHLEHEM, she asked the women of the town not to call her Naomi: “Call me Mara, because the Almighty has made my life very bitter [mārar H5352]” (v. 20).

This oasis may be the site of biblical Marah.

Marah. mair'uh (Heb. mārâ H5288, “bitter”). The name that the Israelites gave to a place (between ETHAM and ELIM) where they found water that was brackish and undrinkable (Exod. 15:23; Num. 33:8-9). When the people came to the spring and were unable to drink from it, they murmured against MOSES. Then the Lord showed Moses a piece of wood, which he threw into the water, thereby miraculously sweetening the spring (Exod. 15:24-25). The location of Marah is uncertain, but proposals include modern ʿAin Hawarah (some 47 mi./76 km. SE of Suez) and Bir Mara (much farther N, only 10 mi./16 km. E of Suez).

Maralah. mahr'uh-luh (Heb. mar ʿālâ H5339, possibly “mountain ledge”). A town on the W border of the tribal territory of ZEBULUN between SARID and DABBESHETH (Josh. 19:11; RSV, “Mareal”). Maralah was in the Valley of JEZREEL, but its precise location is uncertain. Possible identifications are modern Tell el-Ghaltah (about 7 mi./11 km. NNW of MEGIDDO) and, more likely, Tell Thorah (2 mi./3 km. closer to Megiddo).

maranatha. mair'uh-nath'uh (Gk. marana tha G3448, from Aram. māranā ʾtā ʾ, “our Lord, come!” or māran ʾaētā ʾ, “our Lord has come”). This term, which is a transliteration of two ARAMAIC words, occurs once in the NT (1 Cor. 16:22, after an ANATHEMA against anyone who does not love the Lord) and once in the APOSTOLIC FATHERS (Didache 10.6). Its precise meaning is disputed. The rendering “Our Lord has come” makes good sense, especially if a eucharistic background is assumed (the context in Didache 10.6 definitely centers on the Lord’s table). If so, the reference is either to the INCARNATION or to his presence at the EUCHARIST. Most scholars, however, prefer the meaning “Our Lord, come!” in view of the parallel expression, “Come, Lord Jesus” (Rev. 22:20). This rendering too is fitting to the LORD’S SUPPER, at which time Jesus’ death is proclaimed “until he comes” (1 Cor. 11:26), but a reference to the Eucharist remains speculative. If the imperative is preferred, the term maranatha would be a very early evidence of a prayer addressed to Jesus as Lord. The Aramaic form maran(a) bears witness in any case to the fact of a Palestinian recognition of Christ as LORD.

Marcheshvan. (marḥešwān, not found in the OT; prob. of Persian origin). The postbiblical name for the eighth month (October-November), corresponding to Canaanite BUL and Babylonian Arahsamna (“eighth month”). It is also known as Heshvan.

Marcion. mahr’shuhn (Gk. Markiōn). A native of Sinope in PONTUS, Marcion moved to ROME c. A.D. 140 and joined the church there but in 144 was excommunicated for his heretical opinions. The sect he founded spread widely and was for a time a serious menace to the church. Strongly anti-Jewish, he distinguished the merely just God of the OT from the loving God and Father of Jesus revealed in the NT, and accordingly rejected the OT altogether. He believed that only PAUL had truly grasped the contrast of law and gospel, so the Pauline letters (purged of what he considered Jewish accretions) formed the basis of his canon. See CANONICITY. Marcion’s Gospel was not an independent work, but an expurgated version of Luke, adapted to Marcion’s own doctrinal theories. Because Marcion’s edition of Luke and Paul is quoted extensively by other writers, these citations are an important source for the work of NT textual criticism. See TEXT AND VERSIONS (NT).

Marcus. See MARK, JOHN.

Marduk. mahr’dyook (Heb. mērōdāk H5281, from Akk. Mar(u)duk). A Babylonian deity (Jer. 50:2; KJV and other versions, MERODACH; cf. also the personal names EVIL-MERODACH, MERODACH-BALADAN, MORDECAI). Already known in SUMER in the third millennium B.C., Marduk became chief god of the Babylonian pantheon at the time of HAMMURABI. To him were transferred the functions and exploits of the storm-god and creator Enli. His principal temple was the Esagila (“the house that lifts up its head”) in BABYLON. In the myth and ritual of the Babylonian New Year Festival each spring, his victory as champion of the gods was celebrated. Marduk was given the title BEL (“Lord”) and eventually became known primarily by that name (cf. Isa. 46:1; Jer. 50:2; 51:44).

Marduk-Baladan. mahr’dyook-bal’uh-duhn. TNIV form of MERODACH-BALADAN.

Mareal. See MARALAH.

Mareshah (person). muh-ree’shuh (Heb. mārēšāh H5359, possibly “head place”). (1) Son of Mesha (or of Ziph), grandson (or great-grandson) of CALEB, and father of Hebron (1 Chr. 2:42 NIV). The MT appears to have suffered scribal corruption, and it is possible that “Mesha” in the first part of the verse should be “Mareshah” also (so LXX), in which case Mareshah was the firstborn of Caleb and the father of Ziph (cf. NRSV mg.). See HEBRON (PERSON) #2.

(2) Son of LAADAH and descendant of JUDAH (1 Chr. 4:21). However, in the phrase “Laadah the father of Mareshah,” father could mean “founder” or “civic head,” in which case the reference would be to MARESHAH (PLACE).

Mareshah (place). muh-ree’shuh (Heb. mārēšāh H5358, “head place, summit”). A town in the SHEPHELAH of JUDAH, in the same district as LIBNAH (Josh. 15:44). Mareshah is identified with modern Tell Sandahannah, about 3 mi. (5 km.) NE of LACHISCH. The town was strengthened by REHOBAM in the early ninth century B.C. (2 Chr. 11:8). ASA met a threateningly large Ethiopian army under ZERAH nearby in the Valley of ZEPHATHAH. Victorious by divine aid, Asa drove the enemy back to GERAR, c. 30 mi. (50 km.) SW of Mareshah (2 Chr. 14:9-15). A prophet from Mareshah, ELIEZER son of Dodavahu, foretold the failure of JEHOSHAPHAT’s naval expedition bound for TAR-SHISH, because of the unholy alliance with AHAZIAH of Israel (20:35-37). In a play on words, MICAH speaks of a conqueror (yōrēš) who will be brought against Mareshah (Mic. 1:15). During the EXILE, the Edomites infiltrated S Judah, and Mareshah—thereafter commonly known as Marisa—became a capital city.

Mari. mah’ree. An important ancient city of W MESOPOTAMIA, c. 7 mi. (11 km.) NW of modern Abu-Kemal at Tell Hariri. Its importance and its prosperity were due to its strategic location at the intersection of two caravan roads: one beginning on the MEDITERRANEAN coast and passing across the Syrian desert to the EUPHRATES, and the other beginning in N Mesopotamia and passing southward through the valleys of the Khabur and Euphrates Rivers. This strategic location is reflected not only in the fabulous wealth of the city but also in the truly international character of its population. It was the center of an influential AMORITE kingdom c. 1800-1700 B.C.

Excavations at Mari have yielded significant discoveries. The chief buildings were: (1) a temple dedicated to the goddess ISHTAR, (2) a ZIGGURAT or stage-tower, and (3) a 300-room palace at the center of the mound. In the palace area the excavators found c. 20,000 cuneiform tablets, most of which date from the reigns of Yasmakh-Adad (c. 1796-1780), under whose reign the palace was begun, and Zimri-Lim (c. 1779-1761), under whom it was finished. Both of these kings were contemporaries of HAMMURABI of Babylon (c. 1792-1750). Most of the documents were written in Akkadian, the E Semitic language spoken in BABYLON and ASSYRIA. Several rooms contained chiefly texts of an economic, administrative, or judicial nature, while others contained the royal correspondence. Several letters addressed to King Zimri-Lim concern prophetic utterances; these are instructive in their similarities and differences with biblical prophecy.

From a linguistic point of view the Mari texts have aided OT study in the wealth of Amorite personal names, many of which resemble those in the Hebrew Bible. Also of interest to OT students are the so-called “Yahweh names” of Mari. These names (Yawi-Addu and Yawi-El) are not only reminiscent of OT personal names like JOEL (= Yawi-El), but have raised the question of whether Yawi was a divine name at Mari. Opinions differ, but it seems unlikely in view of the fact that the word Yawi never occurs with the determinative for deity (i.e., ^DYawi). More likely yawi is a verb telling what the gods Addu and El had done or were expected to do. The OT name of Israel’s God, Yahweh, may indeed contain that same verb as a description of the unnamed God (cf. Exod. 3:14; see JEHOVAH). Another aid to OT study afforded by the Mari texts lies in the description of the customs of the nomadic peoples surrounding Mari, including a group known as “Benjaminites.” Even if that is a correct understanding of the Akkadian name (DUMU.MEŠ Yamina), the view that they were related to the OT tribe of BENJAMIN is very unlikely. Nevertheless, the customs held by all these nomadic groups provide interesting insights into certain OT practices of the Israelites.

Mariamme. (Mariam̄mē, from Heb. miryām H5319; see MIRIAM). Traditionally spelled Mariamne. A Hasmonean princess (see MACCABEE), famous for her beauty, who became the second wife of HEROD the Great. This marriage strengthened the position of Herod (a foreigner from IDUMEA) as ruler of the Jews. Mariamme bore him four children, but she was accused of unfaithfulness, and Herod, who was exceedingly jealous, had her executed (Jos. Ant. 15.2.5 §23; 15.2.9 §§81-87; 15.7.5 §§232-36). The name Mariamme was borne by another wife of Herod the Great, by Herod’s son Archelaus, and by others in the Herodian family.

mark. This English noun is used variously to translate a number of Hebrew and Greek words in the Bible. For example, Hebrew ʾôṭ H253 (more frequently translated SIGN) occurs with reference to the mark that God placed “on Cain so that no one who found him would kill him” (Gen. 4:15; the nature of the mark is not known). In the NT, PAUL uses Greek stigma G5116 when he refers to the scars he bears in his body as a result of his suffering for the sake of Jesus (Gal. 6:17). When the book of Revelation speaks of the “mark of the beast” (Rev.

16:2 et al.), which the ANTICHRIST will require of all people during his reign of terror in the tribulation period, the term used is charagma G5916.

Mark, Gospel of. The second account of the gospel of Jesus Christ, according to the present common order of listing in the NT canon. Being the shortest of the four Gospels, Mark contains relatively little of the teachings of Jesus and nothing at all about his birth and childhood. Starting with the ministry of JOHN THE BAPTIST, it moves immediately to the public ministry of CHRIST, ending with his death and resurrection.

Overview of MARK

Author: Anonymous, but traditionally attributed to John Mark.

Historical setting: Covers the period from the baptism to the resurrection of CHRIST. The book was probably written in ROME, and if it served as a literary source for Matthew and Luke, it may have been completed in the 50s, but many date it to the 60s or even later.

Purpose: To provide a brief historical-theological account of the ministry of CHRIST that focuses on his activity as evidence that he is the SON OF GOD.

Contents: After a short introduction (Mk. 1:1-13), the book focuses on Jesus' Galilean ministry, characterized by both popularity and growing opposition (1:14—9:50), followed by the briefer period in Perea and Judea (ch. 10), and then by passion week (chs. 11-15) and the resurrection (ch. 16).

I. Authorship. On two points the tradition of the early church is unanimous: the second gospel was written by John Mark (see MARK, JOHN) and presents the preaching of PETER. Papias (c. A.D. 140) is quoted by Eusebius as saying, "And John the presbyter also said this, Mark being the interpreter of Peter, whatsoever he recorded he wrote with great accuracy...he was in company with Peter, who gave him such instruction as was necessary, but not to give a history of our Lord's discourses" (Eccl. Hist. 3.39). This suggests that Mark has given us a summary of the message of Peter. Justin Martyr (c. A.D. 150) quotes Mk. 3:17 as from "Peter's Memoirs." Irenaeus (c. 185) writes that after the "departure" (prob. meaning "death") of Peter and PAUL from Rome, "Mark the disciple and interpreter of Peter, also transmitted to us in writing what had been preached by Peter" (Eusebius, Eccl. Hist. 5.8). Clement of Alexandria, however, affirms that the Gospel was written during Peter's lifetime. In spite of this minor confusion, the early church fathers, including specifically Tertullian (c. 200) and Origen (c. 230), unite in affirming that Mark's gospel gives us the preaching of Peter. Such strong tradition can hardly be discounted, though some recent scholars have sought to do so. The traditional authorship of the second gospel is accepted more generally today than is the case with any of the other three Gospels.

II. Date. Most scholars today believe that Mark is the earliest of the Gospels, and conservatives commonly hold to a date in the 50s. Mainstream scholarship places the writing of Mark between A.D. 65 and 70, and if one accepts the tradition that Mark wrote after Peter's death, the later date would have to be adopted.

III. Place of writing. About this there is little question. From the early church to the present it has been generally held that Mark's gospel was written at ROME. Several distinctive features point in this direction. Mark uses ten Latin words, some of which do not occur elsewhere in the NT. He explains Jewish customs because he is writing to GENTILES. To his Roman readers he presents Jesus as the mighty conqueror and the suffering servant of the Lord. Because of this purpose no genealogy nor infancy narratives are given. These are found only in Matthew and Luke.

IV. Character. In addition to those just mentioned, there are three main characteristics of this gospel. The first is rapidity of action: the narrative moves quickly from one event to the next; this probably reflects the impulsive personality of Peter. The second characteristic is vividness of detail: Mark often includes details omitted by the other Synoptics that make the narrative more alive; he gives special attention to the looks and gestures of Jesus. The third characteristic is picturesqueness of description: he describes, for instance, the 5,000 sitting "in groups on the green grass" (Mk. 6:39); perhaps Peter was impressed with the striking scene of the groups of people in brightly colored garments sitting on the green hillside, and Mark has preserved the picture for us.

Mark's is the Gospel of action. Only one long message of Jesus is recorded, the Olivet Discourse (Mk. 13). Mark includes eighteen MIRACLES of Jesus, about the same number as Matthew or Luke. In contrast he has only four of the PARABLES, compared with eighteen in Matthew and nineteen in Luke.

V. Content. The period of preparation (Mk. 1:1-13) for Jesus' public ministry is described very briefly. It consists of three items: the ministry of John the Baptist (1:1-8), the baptism of Jesus (1:9-11), and the temptation of Jesus (1:12-13). After an introduction of only 13 verses—in contrast to 76 in Matthew and 183 in Luke—Mark plunges immediately into the public ministry of the Master.

First comes the great Galilean ministry (Mk. 1:14—9:50). This is commonly thought to have lasted about a year and a half. It may be divided into three sections. The first period (1:14—3:12) was a time of immense popularity. Jesus called four fishermen to follow him—and later Levi—and engaged in a vigorous healing ministry. This was the time when large crowds thronged about him.

In the second period (Mk. 3:13—7:23) he appointed the twelve apostles, and opposition began to show itself. The PHARISEES clashed with Jesus over questions about SABBATH observance and ceremonial cleansing. He healed the Gerasene demoniac and the woman with the issue of blood and raised Jairus's daughter. He sent out the Twelve and fed the 5,000.

In the third period (Mk. 7:24—9:50) Jesus gave more attention to his disciples. Three times he is described as withdrawing from the crowd to teach the disciples. After Peter's confession at CAESAREA PHILIPPI he began a new phase of teaching: predicting his passion.

The great Galilean ministry was followed by the briefer Perean ministry (Mk. 10), and then by passion week (chs. 11-15) and the resurrection (ch. 16).

VI. Evaluation. In the early church the Gospel of Mark received the least attention of any of the four. This is not true today. The importance of Mark as giving us the basic message of the primitive church (cf. Acts 1:22; 2:22-24, 36) is increasingly recognized. The theological as well as historical value of this Gospel is widely appreciated. It is the logical place to start one's study of the four Gospels.

Mark, John. mahrk, jon (Gk. Markos G3453, from Lat. Marcus, “[large] hammer”; Iōannēs G2722 [see JOHN]). Son of a Christian woman named Mary (see MARY #2), cousin of BARNABAS, assistant to PAUL and Barnabas, and traditionally the author of the second gospel (see MARK, GOSPEL OF). John was his Jewish name, Mark (Marcus) his Roman. In Acts he is twice referred to simply as John (Acts 13:5, 13), once as Mark (15:39), and three times as “John, also called Mark” (12:12, 25; 15:37). In the Epistles he is uniformly (four times) called simply Mark (KJV calling him Marcus three times).

The first allusion to John Mark may be in Mk. 14:51-52. The most reasonable explanation for the passing mention of this incident is that it was a vivid personal memory in the mind of the author of the second gospel. The first definite reference to John Mark is Acts 12:12. Peter, when delivered from prison, went to the home of John Mark’s mother, where many believers were praying for him. When Barnabas and Saul returned to ANTIOCH from their famine visit at JERUSALEM (11:27-30), they took along John Mark (12:25). This opened the opportunity for him to accompany them on their missionary journey as “their helper” (13:5).

The missionaries first evangelized the island of CYPRUS. When they reached PERGA in PAMPHYLIA, John returned home to Jerusalem. Some have thought that this decision was due to homesickness or fear of perils in the mountainous country ahead. However, Paul must have regarded Mark’s action as desertion, for when the time came for the second journey and Barnabas desired that his younger cousin should accompany them again, Paul steadfastly refused (Acts 15:37-38). So sharp was the contention between the two elder missionaries that, in the end, Paul departed with SILAS while Barnabas took Mark and set sail for his native Cyprus. Paul’s firmness on this matter has led some scholars to believe that Mark may have earlier objected to the fact that the apostle became the leader of the expedition (13:13, “Paul and his companions”); due to Jewish scruples, he may have disapproved of the apostle’s distinctive mission to the Gentiles, that is, his gospel of freedom without the intermediary role of JUDAISM.

Mark next appears in ROME, where he is a fellow worker with Paul (Phlm. 24). Paul recommended him to the church at COLOSSE (Col. 4:10). Here he was called “the cousin of Barnabas.” That John Mark had fully reinstated himself with Paul is shown by the latter’s statement in 2 Tim. 4:11. Peter refers to him as “my son Mark” (1 Pet. 5:13). This may be a mere expression of affection, or it may indicate that Mark was converted under Peter’s ministry. An early tradition says that Mark founded the church in Alexandria, Egypt, but this is uncertain.

Mark, Secret Gospel of. In 1958, the well-known scholar Morton Smith (1915-1991) discovered a letter that purports to have been written by Clement of Alexandria (c. A.D. 150-215). This document refers to a “secret” and “more spiritual” gospel written by Mark intended only for “those who are being initiated into the great mysteries.” Although some have dismissed this letter as a forgery (no scholar other than Smith has seen it), many believe it is genuine. However, controversy has raged about the authenticity and significance of the gospel to which it refers. A few writers have accepted and developed Smith’s hypothesis that the Secret Gospel predates the canonical Gospel of Mark, but others are convinced that the work, if it existed at all, consisted of second-century apocryphal material.

market, market place. There is little mention of market places in the OT (cf. 1 Ki. 20:34 NIV; Ps. 55:11 NRSV). In the NT, however, the Greek term agora ^{G59} occurs eleven times, mainly in the Gospels, where the reference is to typically Eastern (rather than Greek) marketplaces, much like the bazaars of present-day oriental towns. Not only were they used for buying and selling of goods, but a variety of other activities centered there (Matt. 11:16; 20:3; 23:7; et al.). On the other hand, the two market places mentioned in Acts were in Greek cities and were typically Hellenic: surrounded by colonnades, temples, and public buildings, and adorned with statues, they were centers of public life, lending themselves to such uses as the holding of trials (Acts 16:19) and as centers for public disputation (17:17).

Maroth. mair’oth (Heb. mārôt ^{H5300}, prob. “bitter [things]”). An otherwise unknown town mentioned in a difficult passage that contains a number of wordplays (Mic. 1:11). The imprecations in the context are against the enemies of JUDAH and refer to places mostly in the SHEPHELAH, but the location of Maroth cannot be determined. Some have suggested it is the same as MAARATH, an unlikely identification.

marriage. The formalization and sanctification of the union of man and woman. Historically, as Hebrew society developed from nomadic to village settlement, complex customs and feasts became associated with the ceremony of marriage, and in the Christian era it became regarded as a SACRAMENT. Normally the bride left her family at marriage, and from that time she, and subsequently her children, became part of her husband’s family or clan (Gen. 24:58-61) and, as such, part of their responsibility also. There are some well-known instances in the OT of the bride continuing to live with her own family. After JACOB had worked for the agreed period of fourteen years in order to pay his father-in-law LABAN the required bride price for his daughters LEAH and RACHEL, he remained voluntarily with Laban for a further six years (Gen. 31:41). Laban considered that the children of the union belonged to him and were a part of his family (31:43). Similarly, GIDEON'S CONCUBINE and her son lived with her family (Jdg. 14:8; 15:1-2). These examples, however, are few, and neither Gideon, visiting a concubine rather than a wife, nor SAMSON, whose bride was a foreigner, was ever considered a part of the woman's family.

Marriage contracts appear to have originated in SUMER and soon became common features of life in MESOPOTAMIA and beyond. Indeed, according to the Code of HAMMURABI (§128), they were essential to a marriage, since they constituted the public attestation of the event. From Ugarit (RAS SHAMRA), evidence contained in contracts shows that marriages could be temporary or permanent, while tablets from NUZI mention a childless wife forced to secure a concubine for her husband, in order to safeguard the future of the family (cf. Code of Hammurabi §146). Egyptian marriages were often documented by means of contracts, and some contracts recovered from Elephantine, near Aswan, stated the terms of the union and made provision for divorce and the disposal of property in the event of the death of either partner.

Marriage was often a means of strengthening and promoting the fortunes of the family, quite aside from the prospect of producing children. A bride was more likely to be chosen because of the desirability of union with her family, or for her healthy physique and suitability for family life, rather than for other considerations. The father was responsible for finding a suitable bride for his son, and the wishes and feelings of the young people were largely irrelevant to this decision. On some occasions the bride's consent was asked for after the actual marriage arrangements had been made. Thus ISAAC'S marriage was arranged between his father's servant and his future wife's brother. She was then consulted (Gen. 24:33-53, 57-58), though perhaps only because her father was no longer living. On rare occasions, parental advice was either ignored, rejected, or not sought (26:34-35), and, in a most unusual initiative, MICHAL, daughter of SAUL, expressed her love for DAVID (1 Sam. 18:20).

In general, marriages were arranged with relatives or with those of the same clan. One might marry a member of the same tribe or possibly move outside this circle to marry within another Israelite tribe. Marriage to a foreigner was generally discouraged, though some Hebrews took wives from among those women captured in war, while others, such as Samson, received permission from their parents to marry a PHILISTINE woman (Jdg. 14:2-3). Concern was always expressed that marriage with a non-Israelite would dilute the covenantal faith by the introduction of ideas and practices concerning strange gods (1 Ki. 11:4).

Because marriages with close relatives were common, limits of consanguinity are recorded for the Israelites to follow (Lev. 18:6-18). Formerly, a man could marry his half-sister on his father's side (Gen. 20:12; cf. 2 Sam. 13:13), though this is forbidden in Lev. 20:17. Cousins—such as Isaac and Rebekah, as well as Jacob, Rachel, and Leah—frequently married, though a simultaneous marriage with two sisters was specifically forbidden (Lev. 18:18). The union between an aunt and her nephew produced MOSES (Exod. 6:20; Num. 26:59), though a marriage between such relatives was subsequently forbidden by the Mosaic law.

In the ancient world the primary purpose of marriage was procreation rather than companionship, and, as a result, large numbers of offspring were regarded as an asset. But an important secondary objective of marriage was the maintaining or increasing of family property, and in royal circles many marriages constituted the seal to what in fact were really political alliances. From the time of the PATRIARCHS, wealthy and powerful people were able to indulge in polygamy, but because of the bride-price there were comparatively few men who could afford more than two wives. One way of circumventing this problem, however, was for a man to have several concubines, and this custom seems to have had quasi-legal sanction in cases where the legitimate wife was barren. Thus the childless SARAH provided her handmaid HAGAR for her husband ABRAHAM (Gen. 16:3), as a woman in these circumstances would also have been required to do under the law Code of Hammurabi (§146). Jacob, already married to the two sisters Rachel and Leah, was also provided with the maid of each of his wives (Gen. 30:3-9), while his brother ESAU had three wives (26:34; 28:9; 36:1-5).

Less mention is made of polygamy after the patriarchal period ended, though Gideon is described as having “many wives” (Jdg. 8:30-31), and the practice was still popular in royal circles, where vast polygamous marriages for political reasons were common. SOLOMON is described as having had “seven hundred wives of royal birth and three hundred concubines” (1 Ki. 11:1-3). Individual preferences gave rise to strong rivalries between wives and children in such polygamous households (1 Sam. 1:6). Nevertheless, the law codes of ASSYRIA (about 2000 B.C.) and Hammurabi (about 1760 B.C.) both protected the rights of the wife, concubine, and children, and this precedent continued to be followed by the Israelites.

Despite these examples of polygamy, the most general and acceptable form of marriage was monogamy, which received the sanction of the Mosaic law (cf. Exod. 20:17; 21:5; Deut. 5:21; et al.). This followed the tradition of the instruction to ADAM and his descendants that “a man...shall cleave to his wife” (Gen. 2:24), and Adam’s fidelity to the one mate. In the postexilic period the emphasis that EZRA laid on the purity and integrity of the Jewish national stock reinforced the ideals of monogamy, against which the marital encounters of HEROD the Great stood out as a glaring exception. The teaching of Jesus on marriage stressed the lifetime nature of the commitment, and while recognizing that Moses had regularized an already existing practice of divorce “because of the hardness of your hearts” (Mk. 10:4-5), he taught the traditional Hebrew monogamy and added that the remarriage of a divorced person while the spouse was still alive constituted adultery (10:11-12).

The importance of maintaining and protecting the family name and property led to the institution of LEVIRATE MARRIAGE (from the Latin lēvir, “husband’s brother”). Where a man died without issue, it was the responsibility of the closest male relative, usually his brother, to marry the widow. The first baby born of this union would then be regarded as the child of the dead man and would be entitled to his name and the entire rights of his property. Even if the widow already had children, the male relative would still be expected to marry and support her on the theory that women needed to live under a protector all their lives. Before marriage, a woman was a member of her father’s household, and as such she was subject to his authority. At marriage, her husband became her protector, and on his death, through her levirate marriage, she found her new “redeemer.” Like many other Hebrew traditions, the levirate marriage was also known to the Canaanites, Assyrians, and Hittites. The best-known levirate marriage in the OT is that of RUTH the Moabitess, who married BOAZ after the next of kin refused to undertake the responsibility (Deut. 25:5-10; Ruth 4:1-12). See also KINSMAN.

In addition to finding a bride who was healthy and suitable for the family alliance, parents also had to be aware of the bride price that was payable to the girl’s father. However this is viewed, whether as a payment for the loss of her services to her own parents or simply as a gift, it still retains something of a stigma by implying that the exchange of gifts or money meant that, in fact, the bride had been sold by the father to her future husband. Under the Mosaic law a man’s wife, children, slaves, and animals were listed as his possessions (Exod. 20:17).

The sum of money payable for the bride price varied according to the “value” of the bride and the social position of the family (1 Sam. 18:23-25). Where it was thought desirable, jewelry, animals, goods, or service could be substituted for gold or silver (Gen. 34:12; 1 Sam. 18:25). In Lev. 27:4-5, ten to thirty shekels is mentioned as a price when people made special vows to the Lord, but whether the thirty shekels mentioned in connection with a woman was the same as the bride price is unknown. There is some reason for thinking that by the time of the second ^{TEMPLE} a sum of about fifty shekels was more usual as a bride price for a virgin, whereas a widow or a divorced woman was worth only half that amount. It was during this period that a marriage with a virgin bride normally took place in the middle of the week, so that if she were found not to be a virgin, her husband had time to take proof to court the following day, which was still prior to the ^{SABBATH}.

Traditions concerning the bride price show some variation. Often the bride price came to the daughter on the death of her father. Under Assyrian law it was paid directly to the bride, while the Code of Hammurabi specified that the sum had to be paid to the bride’s parents, with a penalty clause of double the amount if the engagement was broken off (§§160-61). The Babylonian tradition was for the bride’s father to bring gifts to the husband, similar to a dowry, for his use but not his ownership, since they reverted to the bride on the death of her husband. It was customary for the Hebrew groom to bring gifts for other members of the bride’s family, but these would rarely have been as valuable as those that Rebekah and her family received (Gen. 24:53).

The betrothal (Deut. 28:30; 2 Sam. 3:14) had a particular legal status attached to it that made it almost identical to marriage. The law required that a man committing adultery with a betrothed virgin should be stoned for violating his neighbor’s wife (Deut. 22:23-24). A one-year betrothal was considered normal, and it constituted a part of the permanent marriage relationship (Matt. 1:18; Lk. 1:27; 2:5). For one year after being married the groom was exempt from military service (Deut. 24:5) so that the marriage might be established on a proper footing. The bride’s father already used the term “son-in-law” from the time of the betrothal (Gen. 19:14), a custom that enhanced the concept of family solidarity.

There remained a distinction between betrothal and marriage, however, especially in the later periods of Jewish history; and although Mary and Joseph were betrothed, and in all other respects she was considered his wife, intercourse would not have taken place until after the marriage, and in this particular situation not until after the birth of Jesus. Following common practice in various cultures, sexual relations probably were not resumed until after the baby was weaned, at approximately three years of age.

CIRCUMCISION as an initiation rite before marriage was practiced from about 1500 B.C. in PALESTINE and SYRIA. The Hebrew tradition of circumcision was of an independent kind, however, since it signified the admission of the baby to the fellowship of the COVENANT nation. It was in this connection that God legislated for that event to occur for male children on the eighth day (Lev. 12:3). The events in Gen. 34:14-19 and Exod. 4:24-26 are of a different category, however, the former relating to adult males who, as uncircumcised persons, wished to enter the Hebrew community by marriage, while in the latter the child was uncircumcised, perhaps according to local custom.

The WEDDING ceremony itself was usually brief, but from early days it became surrounded by an elaborate tradition of ceremony and feasting that was very much in vogue in the time of Christ. Both bride and groom were attired in the finest, colorful clothing, the bride being especially resplendent in an elaborate dress. She had previously been washed, perfumed, and decked out with the gold and jewels of her family, together with any personal gifts that she had received. Toward sunset of the marriage day the groom would set out in procession with his friends, attendants, and musicians for the home of the bride's parents, where she would be waiting with her procession of friends and handmaidens. Then the marriage procession, with the attendant torchbearers, would pass through the village or town streets, to the accompaniment of shouts and singing. At the house where the groom's family lived the feasting, dancing, and entertainment would normally last for seven days, or occasionally for fourteen (Gen. 29:27; Jdg. 14:12; Tob. 8:20). The crowning of the bride and groom as king and queen of the nuptials dates from the Solomonic period and, with other accretions, also became part of the wedding tradition.

In the pre-Christian period, DIVORCE was an option that was always available to the husband and sometimes also to the wife. After the return from EXILE, wholesale divorce was required of those Hebrews who had married foreign wives. This provision was to ensure that the purity of the Hebrew religion would not be tainted by the influence of those who had grown up with the tradition of strange gods and idolatrous practices. Normally, however, there was a distinct tendency in Jewish tradition to discourage divorce, and, following Egyptian custom, a substantial fine of "divorce money" was levied as a deterrent. The status of the wife was not very high, however, and the bill of divorce could take the form of a simple repudiation by the husband. The role of the wife was always subservient to that of her husband. He was the provider, decision-maker, protector, and master. The wife was the legal mother of his sons and manager of his household. She obeyed his instructions, was his helper, and became his confidante. By Roman times the status of the wife had improved, particularly at the higher levels of society. In those households where menial tasks were performed by SLAVES, the Roman matron occupied a position of respect and was able to indulge in her own special way of life.

marrow. The soft tissue in the cavities of bones (Job 21:24; Heb. 4:12). The Hebrew term is used figuratively of richness (Ps. 63:5 KJV) and good things (Isa. 25:6 KJV).

Marsena. mahr-see'nuh (Heb. marsēnā 𐤓𐤕𐤔𐤍 H5333). One of “the seven nobles of Persia and Media who had special access to the king and were highest in the kingdom” (Esth. 1:14). Queen V_{ASHTI} was banished by Ahasuerus (X_{ERXES}) on their advice.

marsh. Because of the dryness of the climate, there are very few marshes in PALESTINE, except along the DEAD SEA. In Ezek. 47:11 the prophet foretells future blessings for Israel and writes that the marshes around the sea (prob. the Dead Sea) shall not be sweetened, but left as beds for digging salt. The references in Job 8:11 and 40:21 are probably to marshes in EGYPT, since there are many in the NILE delta.

marshal. A commanding officer. The term is used occasionally by the NRSV and other versions (e.g., Jdg. 5:14; Jer. 51:27). See CAPTAIN.

Mars' Hill. See AREOPAGUS.

Martha. mahr'thuh (Gk. Martha G3450, from Aram. mārēṭā , “lady, mistress, hostess” [fem. of mar, “lord, master”]). The sister of MARY and LAZARUS, all three being among the special friends of Jesus (Jn. 11:5). Their home is clearly stated by John to be in BETHANY in JUDEA (Jn. 11:1), but Luke does not name the village (Lk. 10:38). Martha appears three times in the gospel narratives (Lk. 10:38-42; Jn. 11:1-44; 12:2). The historical accuracy of the accounts in Luke and John is supported by the consistent characterization in these two independent records. In both, Martha is busy serving at table and tends to be outspoken, in contrast to Mary's quieter devotion to Jesus. Luke's statement that Martha received Jesus into her house (Lk. 10:38) implies that she was mistress of the house, probably being the elder sister. Jesus' affectionate rebuke (10:41-42) was evoked by Martha's failure to recognize the primary importance of his teaching. Her activity was not out of place but out of proportion. Jesus did not condemn Martha's work, but her excessive attention to material provision, which disturbed her peace of mind, prompted criticism of both Mary and Jesus, and robbed her of the benefit of receiving the Lord's instruction. Both Martha and Mary expressed the same faith in Jesus' power to save Lazarus from dying (Jn. 11:21, 32). The Lord would not have spoken to her the profound truth of 11:25-26 did he not know that she was sufficiently receptive to hear it. Her declaration of belief rose to the highest level (11:27), but her hesitancy of faith (v. 39) shows that she did not yet realize its full implications.

martyr. This English term derives (through Latin) from Greek martys G3459, meaning “a witness,” that is, someone who can assert what he or she has seen and heard. Because in the early church those who witnessed to CHRIST often gave their lives for their faith (cf. Acts. 22:20; Rev. 2:13), the sense of the term became specialized to mean “a person who suffers death for refusing to renounce a religion.” See also TESTIMONY.

marvel, marvelous. These English terms are used frequently in the KJV (where the adjective is spelled “marvellous”), almost always with reference to divinity. OT writers extolled God’s “marvelous works,” including his CREATION and his SALVATION (1 Chr. 16:24; Job 5:9 [NIV, “miracles”]; Ps. 96:3; 98:1; cf. 1 Pet. 2:9 [NIV, “wonderful”]). Prophets predicted his marvelous work of REDEMPTION through the MESSIAH (Ps. 118:23; Isa. 29:14 [NIV, “wonder”]; Zech. 8:6). Significantly, Jesus himself, his message, and his works were marvelous. “The child’s father and mother marveled at what was said about him” by SIMEON (Lk. 2:33). NICODEMUS, the Jews, and all the people marveled at his teaching (Jn. 3:7; 5:20, 28; 7:15, 21). Jesus’ works repeatedly made the crowds marvel (Matt. 8:27; Mk. 5:20; Lk. 8:25; 11:14). Jesus, in turn, marveled at the great faith of the centurion (Matt. 8:10), and at the unbelief of the Nazarene citizens (Mk. 6:6). In most of these NT passages the NIV uses various synonyms.

Mary. mair’ee (Gk. Maria G3451 [frequently in the form Mariam], from Heb. miryām H5319; see MIRIAM). The name was made famous by the sister of MOSES. Possibly its prevalence in NT times was due to the popularity of MARIAMME, the last of the Hasmoneans and wife of HEROD the Great. Six (or seven) women of this name are mentioned in the NT.

(1) MARY, MOTHER OF JESUS. See separate article.

(2) Mother of John Mark (see MARK, JOHN). Though mentioned only once by name in the NT (Acts 12:12), this Mary must have been prominent in the JERUSALEM church. She was related to BARNABAS (Col. 4:10), and her large home was used by the apostolic church for assembly (Acts 12:12; mention is made of servants, v. 13).

(3) Sister of LAZARUS and MARTHA, from BETHANY (Jn. 11:1). Jesus appreciated Mary of Bethany as a special friend and devoted follower. Jesus probably was entertained frequently in this home just outside Jerusalem, especially during the feast seasons. Three events reveal what is known of Mary. In the first one (Lk. 10:38-42) she appears as the contemplative type, sitting at Jesus’ feet and feeding on his words. Martha, in her frustration, objected to doing all the work, but Jesus complimented Mary’s sense of values. The second cluster of reactions relates to the death and restoration to life of Lazarus (Jn. 11:1-46). Mary and Martha first sent word to Jesus in PEREA of the illness of Lazarus (v.

3). When Jesus delayed his coming and Lazarus died, Mary was deeply affected. She sat still in the house among the comforters when Martha went to meet Jesus (v. 20). When Jesus sent for her, she came quickly (vv. 28-29). Faith and sorrow mingled in her words, “Lord, if you had been here, my brother would not have died” (v. 32). Throughout, Martha was still the manager and Mary was the sensitive, contemplative soul. The third event was a dinner, perhaps in gratitude for Jesus’ raising Lazarus (Jn. 12:1-8; cf. Matt. 26:6-10 and Mk. 14:3-9, where Mary is not named, and where the event is said to take place in the home of SIMON the leper). On this occasion contemplative Mary burst forth with an impulse that has been growing in her heart. Forgetting her reserve in the intensity of her act, she pushed past the reclining forms, broke an expensive jar and poured the oil on the head of Jesus. Recoiling from the gaze of the guests, no doubt, she pulled back from the center of attention, stopping at Jesus’ feet with the remainder of the perfume, dripping it on his feet and lovingly wiping the feet with her hair. To “practical” men, it was a stupid waste, but Jesus considered it a most beautiful tribute paid to him.

(4) Mother of James the younger and of Joseph/Joses (Matt. 27:56; 28:1 [“the other Mary”]; Mk. 15:40, 47). See JAMES #3 and JOSEPH #12. A problem arises in relation to the husband of this Mary. Most English versions mention “Mary the wife of Clopas” as present at the cross (Jn. 19:25; the Gk. reads simply, “Mary of Clopas”). But James the younger is regularly designated “son of Alphaeus” (Matt. 10:3; Mk. 3:18; Lk. 6:15). Is the same Mary wife of CLOPAS (to be distinguished from CLEOPAS) and of ALPHAEUS? That would be possible if Clopas and Alphaeus are names of the same person or if there was a second marriage. In any case, it is quite unlikely that this Mary should be identified with the sister of Mary in Jn. 19:25, since two sisters would not normally bear the same name. According to some scholars, “Mary of Clopas” (a description found only in Jn. 19:5) is not the same as the mother of James and Joseph/Joses, but altogether a different person, about whom nothing else is known. We do know that Mary the mother of James the younger and of Joseph/Joses was one of the Galilean women who, having been healed of evil spirits and infirmities, followed Jesus and supported him financially (Mk. 15:40; Lk. 8:2-3). It is interesting to note that two mothers with their sons thus joined the group and at least three of the four sons became apostles. According to the records, this Mary accompanied Jesus to Jerusalem (Matt. 27:56; Mk. 15:41), witnessed the crucifixion (Matt. 27:55, 56; Mk. 15:40; Lk. 23:49), observed the entombment (Matt. 27:61; Mk. 15:47; Lk. 23:55), joined in the securing of spices for anointing Jesus’ body (Mk. 16:1; Lk. 23:56), saw the empty tomb and heard the angelic announcement of Jesus’ resurrection (Matt. 28:1-7; Mk. 16:2-7; Lk. 24:1-7), reported to the apostles what she had seen and heard (Matt. 28:8; Lk. 24:9-11), and even saw the resurrected Jesus (Matt. 28:9-10).

(5) Mary Magdalene, so called after the name of her native city, MAGDALA, on the W bank of the Sea of Galilee, 3 mi. (5 km.) NW of TIBERIAS. Jesus had driven seven demons out of Mary Magdalene (Lk. 8:2; cf. Mk. 16:9). This obviously meant that she was a healed invalid, not a rescued social derelict. There is no evidence that she was promiscuous, much less a harlot for hire. That she was a person of means is evident from her ability to support Jesus from her means. She is mentioned more often than most of the other believing women, and usually first. A dozen references show her as healed of evil spirits or infirmities (Lk. 8:2), following Jesus from Galilee and ministering to him (Matt. 27:56), beholding the crucifixion from afar (Mk. 15:40), standing by the cross (Jn. 19:25), locating the tomb (Matt. 28:1; Mk. 15:47), watching the tomb (Matt. 27:61), coming early to the tomb with spices (Mk. 16:1; Jn. 20:1), being first to see the risen Lord (Mk. 16:9), and reporting the resurrection to the disciples (Lk. 24:10; Jn. 20:18).

(6) An early Christian who “worked very hard” for the church in Rome (Rom. 16:6). It is not possible to determine whether this Mary was a Jewish Christian or a Gentile (the Latin Maria, not as the Hebrew name but as the feminine form of Marius, was common in Rome).

Mary, mother of Jesus. mair’ee (Gk. Maria G3451 [frequently in the form Mariam], from Heb. miryām H5319; see MIRIAM). In the opinion of many Mary, like her husband JOSEPH, was descended from DAVID, because she was told that her son would receive the throne of his father David, also because Christ “as to his human nature was a descendant of David” (Rom. 1:3; Acts 2:30; 2 Tim. 2:8); in addition, it is possible that Luke’s GENEALOGY OF JESUS CHRIST is through his mother.

I. Mary in the infancy narratives (Matt. 1-2; Lk. 1-2). The source of these narratives is not known, but it is more than likely that LUKE’s account came from Mary herself, since she and her relatives figure so prominently in it, with special attention given to her personal reactions (Lk. 1:29; 2:19, 34, 48, 51). She was probably a cousin of ELIZABETH, the mother of JOHN THE BAPTIST (1:36), but the exact nature of their relationship is uncertain. Luke writes about Jesus’ birth from Mary’s standpoint, describing her maidenly fears (1:26-27), her humble submission to the will of God (1:38), and her hymn of praise to God for the favor accorded her in being the mother of the MESSIAH (1:39-55; see MAGNIFICAT). MATTHEW, on the other hand, writes from the standpoint of Joseph, describing his reaction when he found she was with child, his determination to protect her from shame and insult as much as possible, his obedience to God’s command that he marry Mary, and his taking her and Jesus to Egypt to escape the wrath of Herod. The two accounts harmonize and dovetail perfectly. In any case, Mary shows herself to be a woman with a quiet spirit, humble piety, self-control, and knowledge of the OT. It is apparent that neither she nor Joseph fully understood her son (2:50-51).

II. Mary at Cana in Galilee (Jn. 2:1-11). In this episode Mary seems to have some intimation that Jesus had more than natural powers. She may have needed some correction from him regarding her notion about the use of those powers, but it is wrong to think that Jesus sharply rebuked her. It must be kept in mind that he actually did exercise his power by relieving an embarrassing situation, as she had suggested. And his addressing her as “woman” (2:4) does not imply disrespect; he did the same from the cross when he tenderly commended her to the beloved disciple (19:26). His words to her were a gentle suggestion that it was not for her or any other human being to determine the course of action, for that was entirely in the Father’s hands.

III. Mary seeking Jesus (Matt. 12:46-50; Mk. 3:21, 31-35; Lk. 8:19-21). In this incident Jesus is informed, while teaching the multitudes, that his mother and brothers desire to see him. The reason for this desire is not stated; but it appears from the context in Mark’s account that they were concerned for his safety because of the bitter opposition of the authorities, who were accusing him of casting out demons in the power of BEELZEBUB; and they wanted to induce him to go into retirement for a time, until it was safe to teach in public again. Jesus’ words, “For whoever does the will of my Father in heaven is my brother and sister and mother,” are meant to teach that physical relationship to him conveys no special privilege, no right of interference with him—the same lesson he taught on a later occasion (Lk. 11:27).

IV. Mary at the cross (Jn. 19:25-27). In this incident we find Mary, who had come to Jerusalem for the Passover, watching the crucifixion with agony. Jesus shows his appreciation of the earthly filial relation by committing her to the trustworthy keeping of the apostle who was closest to him.

V. The scene in the upper room (Acts 1:14). After the RESURRECTION and ASCENSION of Jesus, Mary appears in the midst of the Christian community, engaged with them in prayer for the baptism of the HOLY SPIRIT, but without any discernible preeminence among them. This is the last mention of her in Scripture. It is not known how or when she died.

After Mary’s death, many legends grew up around her name, but none of them are trustworthy. The keen desire to know further particulars about her was partly satisfied by the writers of apocryphal gospels (see APOCRYPHAL NEW TESTAMENT). There is no direct evidence of prayer being offered to Mary during the first four centuries. Augustine was among the earliest of the church fathers who thought it possible that she had never committed actual sins, though he agreed that she shared the common corruption of humanity (this view led eventually to the promulgation of the Roman Catholic dogma of the Immaculate Conception of Mary in 1854). In the early centuries, with the development of the idea that the celibate and virgin state is morally superior to the married state, it was suggested that she was a perpetual virgin and that the “brothers” and “sisters” of Jesus mentioned in the Gospels were not her children at all, but were either Joseph’s children by a prior marriage or were the cousins of Jesus (see BROTHERS OF THE LORD). In 1950 Pope Pius XII declared the dogma of the Assumption of Mary; that is, that Mary’s body did not decompose in the grave but was reunited by God to her soul soon after she died.

Masada. muh-sah’duh (Gk. Masada, from Aram. mēšādā › [cf. Heb. mēšād H5171], “stronghold”). A natural fortress in the eastern Judean Desert on the western shore of the DEAD SEA, located some 50 mi. (80 km.) S of Khirbet Qumran (see DEAD SEA SCROLLS). The upper plateau of the boat-shaped rock covers 20 acres (8 hectares) and rises abruptly, almost perpendicularly 1,320 ft. (400 m.) above its surroundings. The natural advantages of this remote mountain were first recognized during the Maccabean period (see MACCABEE), when several structures and buildings were constructed, including four small palaces at the center. HEROD the Great kept his family at Masada during the years of his struggle for power in JUDEA. Subsequently he rebuilt it with casemate walls, towers, a palace, cisterns, and storerooms.

King Herod fortified the southern portion of his kingdom with various outposts including Masada.

At the beginning of the first war against the Romans (A.D. 66), Masada was taken by a group of Z^EALOTS (Jos. War 2.17.2). Herod's armories there were broken into and large quantities of weapons were taken to Jerusalem and distributed to the insurgents (War 2.17.8). For the six following years the community on Masada seems to have practiced a normal way of life without being seriously involved in the war with the Romans. This almost impregnable fortress, however, did not escape the fate that fell upon other parts of the country. Two years after the fall of JERUSALEM (A.D. 70) this last stronghold to survive the war with the Romans had to defend itself against a vast army. Eight Roman camps and a circumvallation wall were put up around the fortress. Access to the fortifications of Masada for heavy siege machines was provided by an extensive rampart erected on the western side of the rock (War 7.8.5). Masada was besieged and attacked for seven months during the autumn of A.D. 72 and the winter and spring of the following year. It was then that the Romans succeeded in creating a breach in the wall. Several attempts by the defenders to check the breach failed, and hopes to survive the Roman attack consequently faded. Their leader, Elazar Ben Yair, persuaded his 960 followers—men, women, and children—to take their own lives, and to die as free people rather than to be enslaved by the Romans. When the Romans entered the fortress the next day they encountered only seven survivors—two women and five children. All the others had taken their own lives after having burned their belongings (War 7.9.1-2).

maschil. See MASKIL.

Mash. mash (Heb. maš H5390 [not in NIV]). Son of ARAM and grandson of SHEM, listed in the Table of Nations (Gen. 10:23 KJV and most versions). On the basis of the parallel passage (1 Chr. 1:17), as well as the SEPTUAGINT reading in both passages, the NIV reads MESHECH (TNIV, Meshek).

Mashal. may'shuhl (Heb. māšāl H5443). See MISHAL (1 Chr. 6:74).

maskil. mas'kil. Transliteration of Hebrew maškil H5380 (in the title of fourteen psalms, beginning with Ps. 32). It derives from the common verb šākal H8505 (hiphil, “to understand,” but also “act devoutly”), and suggested meanings include “meditation” and “skillful poem.”

mason. See OCCUPATIONS AND PROFESSIONS.

Masorah. muh-sor'uh (postbiblical māsôrâ or massôrâ, from māsar H5034, “to select,” later “hand over, transmit”). Also Masora and Massora(h). A systematic collection of textual notes made by medieval Hebrew scholars, called the Masoretes. In their production of biblical MSS, they would place a small circle (later called a circellus) above or between the words that required comment. Placed usually to the side on the margin, the comment might give statistical information on the word (e.g., that it appears nowhere else in the Hebrew Bible), or indicate that a different word should be read (often the equivalent of a textual variant; see KETIB). Other types of information were also included. In order to preserve accurately the traditional pronunciation, the Masoretes also developed a very sophisticated system for indicating vowels (the Hebrew alphabet originally had only consonants) and cantillation (“accents”). At least two major Masoretic schools, the Eastern or Babylonian and the Western or Palestinian (Tiberian), can be traced back to about A.D. 500. Prior to the discovery of the DEAD SEA SCROLLS, all available copies of the Hebrew Bible were those produced by the Masoretes (thus the standard Masoretic text). See TEXT AND VERSIONS (OT).

Masoretic text. See MASORAH; TEXT AND VERSIONS (OT).

Masrekah. mas'ruh-kuh (Heb. mašrēqâ H5388, possibly “red” or “vineyard”). The royal city of SAMLAH king of EDOM (Gen. 36:36; 1 Chr. 1:47). The site is unknown, though some have proposed Jebel el-Musraq, about 20 mi. (32 km.) SW of Maʿan in TRANSJORDAN.

Massa. masʻuh (Heb. maśśā H5364, “burden”). Son of ISHMAEL and grandson of ABRAHAM (Gen. 25:14; 1 Chr. 1:30). Extrabiblical evidence supports the view that Ishmael’s descendants, including those of Massa, settled in NW ARABIA, not far from the homeland of their ancestor. Some scholars further identify or otherwise associate Massa with MESHĀ, a place “in the east country” (prob. Arabia) that, along with SEPHAR, served to delimit the territory occupied by the sons of JOKTAN, a descendant of SHEM through EBER (Gen. 10:30). According to the RSV (cf. also NJPS), both AGUR and LEMUEL were from Massa (Prov. 30:1; 31:1; the NIV and other versions understand maśśā H5363 here as a common noun, “burden, oracle”). If this rendering is correct, the two men may well have descended from the son of Ishmael; or perhaps they lived in an area associated with the Ishmaelite tribe.

Massah. masʻuh (Heb. massāh H5001, “testing, trial”). An unidentified place near REPHIDIM in the Desert of SINAI where the Israelites quarreled and tested God because of their thirst (Exod. 17:1-7). A very similar event (Num. 20:1-13) evidently took place some forty years later and in a different geographical location (KADESH BARNEA, in S Palestine). The place was also called MERIBAH (“contention”). The two names occur in combination once (Exod. 17:7) and in parallelism twice (Deut. 33:8; Ps. 95:8). The name Massah is mentioned by itself in two other passages (Deut. 6:16; 9:22), and “the waters of Meribah” more frequently (Num. 20:13, 24; Ps. 81:7; 106:32; Meribah Kadesh in Num. 27:14; Deut. 32:51; Ezek. 47:19; 48:28).

massebah. masʻuh-buh. Sometimes mazzebah. A transliteration of Hebrew maṣṣēbā H5167, “[cultic] stone” (Gen. 35:20 et al.), used especially by archaeologists with reference to a sacred PILLAR, that is, a stone monument set up as a memorial or as an object of worship.

Massorah, Massorete, Massoretic. See MASORAH.

master. This English term, meaning “lord, owner,” is used very frequently to translate a number of biblical words, especially Hebrew ʾādôn H123 (Gen. 18:12 et al.) and Greek kyrios G3261 (Matt. 6:24 et al.). See LORD. Other relevant terms include Greek despotēs G1305 (1 Tim. 6:1-2 et al.) and epistatēs G2181 (only in Luke, e.g., Lk. 5:5). The KJV uses master also in the sense of “teacher” to render Greek didaskalos (Matt. 8:19 et al.).

Mathusala. See METHUSELAH.

Matred. may´trid (Heb. maṭrēd H4765, possibly from a root meaning “to pursue, drive away”). Daughter of a certain Edomite named ME-ZAHAB (Gen. 36:39; 1 Chr. 1:50). Matrel’s daughter, Mehetabel, married Hadad (Hadar), king of EDOM; see HADAD (PERSON) #3. There is some versional support for the reading “son” instead of “daughter.”

Matri. may´tri (Heb. maṭrî H4767, lit., “Matrite,” the gentilic form of an unattested name related to the noun māṭār H4764 [“rain”] and possibly meaning “[born during] the rainy season”). Presumably, the head of a Benjamite family. When SAMUEL proceeded to choose a king for Israel, the lot fell on the tribe of BENJAMIN, then on “the Matrite family” (lit. rendering), and from within that clan, on SAUL (1 Sam. 10:21; KJV, “the family of Matri”; NIV, “Matri’s clan”). Nothing more is known about Matri or his family.

Mattan. mat´uhn (Heb. mattān H5509, possibly short form of MATTANIAH, “gift of Yahweh”). (1) A priest (perhaps the chief priest) of BAAL during the rule of ATHALIAH. At the time of the overthrow of her reign, the Israelites under the leadership of JEHOIADA the priest destroyed the temple of Baal with its altars and idols, and they also killed Mattan “in front of the altars” (2 Ki. 11:18; 2 Chr. 23:17).

(2) Father of SHEPHATIAH (Jer. 38:1); the latter was one of the officials who heard JEREMIAH preach and recommended that he be put to death (v. 4).

Mattanah. mat´uh-nuh (Heb. mattānāh H5511; a common word with the same form means “gift”). A camping place of the Israelites in TRANSJORDAN, near the end of their wilderness wanderings (Num. 21:18-19). Mattanah was evidently between BEER (v. 16) and NAHALIEL (possibly a tributary of the ARNON), but the precise location is unknown.

Mattaniah. mat'uh-ni'uh (Heb. mattanyâ H5514 and mattanyāhû H5515). A very common name, also attested (in full or abbreviated form) in various nonbiblical sources. (1) Son of HEMAN, DAVID's seer (1 Chr. 25:4). He and his thirteen brothers were set apart "for the ministry of prophesying, accompanied by harps, lyres and cymbal" (v. 1). When lots were cast to determine the duties of the Levitical singers, he, along with his sons and relatives, received the ninth lot (v. 16).

(2) A LEVITE, descendant of ASAPH and ancestor of JAHAZIEL son of Zechariah; Jahaziel was apparently a prophet in the court of King JEHOSHAPHAT (2 Chr. 20:14).

(3) A Levite, descendant of Asaph, who served during the reign of HEZEKIAH in the work of consecrating the temple (2 Chr. 29:13).

(4) Son of JOSIAH and last king of Judah (2 Ki. 24:17). See ZEDEKIAH.

(5-8) The name of four postexilic Israelites who agreed to put away their foreign wives. They were respectively descendants of Elam (Ezra 10:26), Zattu (10:27), Pahath-Moab (10:30), and Bani (10:37).

(9) Son of Mica and descendant of Asaph; he was one of the Levites who resettled in JERUSALEM (1 Chr. 9:15). When the TEMPLE was restored, Mattaniah became "the director who led in thanksgiving and prayer" (Neh. 11:17; 12:8). He may be the same person listed among the "gatekeepers who guarded the storerooms at the gates" (12:25). One of Mattaniah's descendants, Uzzi son of Bani, became chief officer of the Levites (11:22).

(10) Son of Micaiah, descendant of Asaph, and ancestor of Zechariah; the latter was a Levite who played the trumpet in the procession when the walls of Jerusalem were rededicated (Neh. 12:35).

(11) Grandfather of a certain Hanan who assisted in the distribution of supplies for priests and Levites (Neh. 13:13).

Mattatha. mat'uh-thuh (Gk. Mattatha G3477, from Heb. mattatâ [prob. short form of MATTITHIAH]). Son of NATHAN and grandson or descendant of DAVID (not mentioned in the OT); included in Luke's GENEALOGY OF JESUS CHRIST (Lk. 3:31).

Mattathah. See MATTATTAH.

Mattathias. mat'uh-thi'uh (Gk. Mattathias G3478, from Heb. mattityāhû H5525; see MATTITHIAH). (1) The priestly father of the famous Maccabean line (see MACCABEE), whose five sons carried on the fight for law and liberty after the father's death (1 Macc. 2:1 et al.). He descended from the clan of Joarib (prob. the same as JEHOIARIB, 1 Chr. 24:7). It was at MODEIN, W of Jerusalem, that the revolt against ANTIOCHUS Epiphanes began. Determined to eradicate Judaism, Antiochus abolished sacrifices, erected pagan altars, even one to ZEUS in the temple, and executed any who possessed the law. Mattathias defied the king, the climax coming when Greek officers under Apelles set up an altar at Modein, demanding sacrifice to heathen gods. Mattathias, refusing, killed the Jew who volunteered, and also the Greek officer, destroyed the altar, and fled to the hills with his followers. He conducted a guerrilla campaign, reversing his early refusal to fight on the SABBATH. At the end of one year (166 B.C.), he died (1 Macc. 2:14-70). In special Hanukkah prayers (see DEDICATION, FEAST OF), this patriot is remembered as the spearhead of the warfare for religious freedom.

(2-3) Two men included in Luke's GENEALOGY OF JESUS CHRIST; one is identified as the son of Amos (Lk. 3:25), and the other one as the son of Semein (v. 26).

Mattattah. mat'uh-tuh (Heb. mattattâ H5523, prob. short form of MATTITHIAH, "gift of Yahweh"). KJV Mattathah. One of the descendants of Hashum who agreed to put away their foreign wives (Ezra 10:33).

Mattenai. mat'uh-ni (Heb. mattēnay H5513, short form of MATTANIAH, "gift of Yahweh"). (1-2) The name of two Israelites who agreed to put away their foreign wives. One was a descendant of Hashum (Ezra 10:33); the other one a descendant of Bani (10:37).

(3) Head of the priestly family of JOIARIB in the days of the high priest JOIAKIM (Neh. 12:19).

Matthan. math'an (Gk. Matthan G3474, from Heb. mattān H5509 [possibly short form of MATTANIAH]). Son of Eleazar, father of Jacob, and grandfather of JOSEPH, included in Matthew's GENEALOGY OF JESUS (Matt. 1:15; cf. MATTHAT in Lk. 3:24).

Matthat. math'at (Gk. Maththat G3415, from Heb. mattat H5522, "gift"). (1) Son of Levi, father of Heli, and grandfather of JOSEPH, included in Luke's GENEALOGY OF JESUS CHRIST (Lk. 3:24). In Matthew's genealogy, Joseph's grandfather has the very similar name MATTHAN (Matt. 1:15), and many scholars have thought that both names refer to the same person, with various solutions (e.g., LEVIRATE MARRIAGE) offered to the problem that Joseph's father in Matthew is called Jacob, not Heli. Others argue that Matthan and Matthat are two different people.

(2) Son of a certain Levi, also mentioned in Luke's genealogy of Jesus (Lk. 3:29).

Matthew. math'yoo (Gk. Maththaios G3414, prob. from Heb. matta'y, short form of MATTHIAH, "gift of Yahweh"). A Jewish tax collector (see OCCUPATIONS AND PROFESSIONS) or revenue officer of CAPERNAUM, called to be a disciple of Jesus (Matt. 9:9; 10:3; Mk. 3:18; Lk. 6:15; Acts 1:13), identified with LEVI son of ALPHEUS (Mk. 2:14; Lk. 5:27-29), and traditionally thought to be the author of the first gospel. See MATTHEW, GOSPEL OF. Since double names were common among the Jews, there can be little doubt that Levi and Matthew were one and the same person. Levi possibly changed his name to Matthew when he became a disciple of Jesus.

The readiness with which Matthew answered Jesus' call seems to indicate that he had previously come into contact with the Lord and responded positively to his teachings. That Jesus should have chosen as his disciple a Jewish tax collector who was in the employ of the Roman government is indeed remarkable. Tax collectors were bitterly hated by their own countrymen and regarded as little more than traitors. However, Matthew's background and talents must have been of great value to Jesus. As a tax collector he was skilled at writing and keeping records. In addition, he must have been a man of deep spiritual convictions. This is revealed by his concern for his former colleagues whom he invited to a dinner at his own house (Lk. 5:29-32 makes it clear that it was Matthew's house), Jesus being the honored guest. No doubt Matthew's purpose was to win these men to Christ. Apart from the mention of Matthew in the lists of the apostles (Matt. 10:3; Mk. 3:18; Acts 1:13), no further notices of him are found in the NT.

View from the Mt. of Beatitudes toward the tree-covered hill of Gennesaret (looking W, with the Plain of Gennesaret, Arbel, and the Horns of Hattin in the background). Jesus called Matthew to ministry from his tax collection station, which may have been located on this hill.

Matthew, Gospel of. The first book of the NT. In the early church Matthew was the most highly valued and widely read of the four Gospels. This is revealed both by its position in the canon (it is found in first place in almost all the known lists) and by its widespread citation, for it is by far the most often quoted of the Gospels in the Christian literature before A.D. 180. Among the reasons for this popularity two are particularly important: (1) its apostolic authority and (2) its emphasis on Christ's teaching. A growing church needed the authoritative word of CHRIST both to instruct converts and to refute heresy.

I. Authorship. The first gospel, as is the case with the other three, is anonymous. Nevertheless, the church, from the early second century until the rise of modern critical studies, unanimously ascribed it to Matthew, one of the Twelve (Matt. 9:9; 10:3; Mk. 3:18; Acts 1:13), also called Levi (Mk. 2:14; Lk. 5:27), a tax collector by occupation. The results of source criticism, in particular the evident dependence of Matthew on Mark's gospel, have led many, but by no means all, biblical scholars to abandon Matthew's authorship. Why would an eyewitness to the life of Christ, as Matthew most certainly was, depend so heavily on Mark's account? On the other hand, how does one account for the early and unanimous tradition of Matthew's authorship? The answer of the consensus of modern biblical scholarship is that the first gospel was ascribed to Matthew, not because he wrote it, but because he was the author of one of its sources, namely, a sayings source, usually referred to as Q (from the German Quelle, "source").

Despite the results of source criticism, however, strong arguments persist for the traditional view: (1) Matthew's occupation as a tax collector qualified him to be the official recorder of the words and works of Jesus. His job accustomed him to note-taking and the keeping of records. Since shorthand was widely known in the ancient Hellenistic world, perhaps he kept a shorthand notebook record of Jesus' activities and teachings.

(2) There is a good historical tradition that Matthew actually wrote gospel material. This comes from Papias of Hierapolis as quoted by the church historian Eusebius: "Matthew wrote down the Logia in the Hebrew [i.e., Aramaic] language and everyone translated them as best he could" (Eccl. Hist. 3.39.16). Much uncertainty exists as to the meaning of this famous statement, but one of two explanations seems most likely: (a) the reference is to an ARAMAIC gospel, written by Matthew prior to the Greek gospel, for the Jewish-Christian community in Palestine, or (b) Papias's statement refers to an Aramaic compilation of the sayings of our Lord made by Matthew for the instruction of Jewish converts. In either case, the authorship by Matthew of our present Greek gospel is not excluded. If an Aramaic gospel preceded our Matthew, the publication of the Greek edition completely superseded the Aramaic, since no fragment of an Aramaic Matthew remains. A Greek edition is more likely than a Greek translation, since the Greek gospel does not, on the whole, give evidence of being a translation. If the second alternative is accepted—namely, that the LOGIA were a collection of our Lord's sayings—then it is possible that Matthew expanded these into a Greek gospel. It is a significant fact that the so-called Q material, with which Matthew's Logia is most often associated, shows signs of being a translation from Aramaic.

(3) It is more likely that the gospel would have taken its name from the person who put it in its Greek dress than from the author of one of its sources. The Greeks were not interested so much in who was the authority behind the sources of a book as in who made the book available in the Greek language. In this respect it is significant that although Peter is certainly the source of Mark's Gospel, it was not called the Gospel of Peter but of Mark.

Although certainty eludes us, there are cogent reasons for holding the traditional view that Matthew, the apostle and eyewitness to the events of Christ's life, wrote the first gospel. If he used other sources, in particular Mark, he added his own apostolic witness to that of Peter's, and by so doing may have contributed to the alleviation of tensions between Gentile and Jewish Christianity.

Overview of MATTHEW

Author: Anonymous, but traditionally attributed to the apostle Matthew/Levi.

Historical setting: Covers the period from the baptism to the resurrection of CHRIST. The book was probably written in ANTIOCH of Syria in the late 60s, but some date it to the 70s or even later.

Purpose: To provide a full historical-theological account of the ministry of CHRIST that focuses on his discourses; to show that Jesus is the fulfillment of the OT; to encourage Jewish Christians who are suffering persecution and are tempted to be lax in their discipleship.

Contents: Genealogy and nativity story (Matt. 1-2); the beginning of the Galilean ministry, followed by the Sermon on the Mount (chs. 3-7); the miracles of Jesus, followed by a discourse on mission

(chs. 8-10); growing opposition, followed by the parables of the kingdom (chs. 11-13); final stage of the Galilean ministry, followed by a discourse on humility (chs. 14-18); ministry in Perea and Judea, followed by a denunciation of Jewish leaders and by the Olivet Discourse (chs. 19-25); Jesus' passion, death, and resurrection (chs. 26-28).

II. Date and place of origin. We do not know precisely when Matthew was written. Its dependence on Mark and its failure to mention the destruction of JERUSALEM (especially in connection with Jesus' prediction of that event in Matt. 24) suggest a date shortly before A.D. 70. ANTIOCH of Syria is the most likely place of origin. Early in the second century Ignatius of that city refers to Matthew as "the Gospel." Also, the Gentile-Jewish character of the Antioch church accords well with the contents of the book.

III. Characteristics. Several features make the Gospel of Matthew distinctive. (1) Matthew is the teaching gospel par excellence. In this respect it greatly supplements Mark, which is more interested in what Jesus did than in what he said.

(2) Matthew is the gospel of the church. Matthew is the only evangelist who uses the word CHURCH at all (Matt. 16:18; 18:17). The first occurrence is in Jesus' response to Peter's confession. Here its use is clearly anticipatory. In 18:17 the context is church discipline and seems to indicate not only the existence of a church, but also the emergence of problems within it.

(3) Matthew is the gospel of fulfillment. It is especially concerned with showing that Christianity is the fulfillment of the OT revelation. The many OT proof texts cited by the use of the formula "that it might be fulfilled," the emphasis on the messiahship of Jesus, and the presentation of Christianity as a new "law," all reveal this basic concern of the author. It has been noted that Matthew sometimes suggests that events in the life of Jesus recapitulate the experiences of the Israelites (cf. Matt. 2:15).

(4) Matthew is the gospel of the King. The genealogy of Matt. 1 traces Jesus' lineage back to DAVID. At his birth the MAGI come asking, "Where is the one who has been born king of the Jews?" (2:2). Eight times the regal title "Son of David" is ascribed to Christ (1:1; 9:27; 12:23; 15:22; 20:30-31; 21:9, 15). The triumphal entry clearly has kingly significance (21:1-11). In the Olivet Discourse Jesus prophesied his future kingly reign (25:31). To PILATE's question, "Are you the king of the Jews?" Jesus gave the tacit answer, "Yes, it is as you say" (27:11). And over the CROSS were written these words: "This is Jesus the king of the Jews" (27:37). The climax comes at the very end of the gospel, where Jesus in the Great Commission declared: "All authority in heaven and on earth has been given to me” (28:18). There can be no doubt that the author of this gospel deliberately presents Jesus as the King.

IV. Structure. The arrangement of the material reveals an artistic touch. The whole of the Gospel is woven around five great discourses: (1) Matt. 5-7; (2) Matt. 10; (3) Matt. 13; (4) Matt. 18; (5) Matt. 24-25, each of which concludes with the refrain, “And it came to pass when Jesus ended these sayings...” In each case the narrative portions appropriately lead up to the discourses. The gospel has a fitting prologue (Matt. 1-2) and a challenging epilogue (28:16-20). The resulting outline is as follows:

Prologue: the birth of the King (chs. 1-2).

Narrative: the preparation of the King (chs. 3-4).

First discourse: the law of the kingdom (chs. 5-7).

Narrative: the power of the King (chs. 8-9).

Second discourse: the proclamation of the kingdom (ch. 10).

Narrative: the rejection of the King (chs. 11-12).

Third discourse: the growth of the kingdom (ch. 13).

Narrative: the mission of the King (chs. 14-17).

Fourth discourse: the fellowship of the kingdom (ch. 18).

Narrative: the King goes to Jerusalem (chs. 19-23).

Fifth discourse: the consummation of the kingdom (chs. 24-25).

Narrative: the death and resurrection of the King (26:1—28:15).

Epilogue: the great challenge of the King (28:16-20).

Matthew’s Bible. See BIBLE VERSIONS, ENGLISH.

Matthias. muh-thi’uhs (Gk. Matthias G3416, short from of MATTATHIAS, “gift of Yahweh”). The name of the “twelfth apostle,” chosen to take the place of JUDAS ISCARIOT, the traitor (Acts 1:23-26). Following PETER’s proposal (vv. 20-22), two men were put forward who were considered to have the necessary qualifications for apostleship, for they had been followers of Jesus since the time he was baptized by John. To make divine selection clear, the sacred LOTS were cast after prayer, as had been done frequently in OT days (e.g., 1 Sam. 14:42). Matthias is never mentioned again in the NT. Rival traditions say that he was either martyred in Judea or that he evangelized the Ethiopians. As usual with such shadowy figures, a “Gospel” and “Traditions” were later fathered on him.

Mattithiah. mat'uh-thi'uh (Heb. mattityāhû H5525 and mattityâ H5524, “gift of Yahweh”). (1) Son of JEDUTHUN; he and his brothers “prophesied, using the harp in thanking and praising the LORD” (1 Chr. 25:3). He was one of the LEVITE gatekeepers who played the harp when the ARK OF THE COVENANT was brought to JERUSALEM (15:18, 20; 16:5). Later he became the head of the fourteenth company of temple musicians appointed by lot under DAVID (25:1).

(2) Firstborn son of Shallum and descendant of LEVI through KORAH; he was a postexilic Levite responsible for baking the offering bread (1 Chr. 9:31).

(3) One of the descendants of Nebo who agreed to put away their foreign wives (Ezra 10:43).

(4) One of the prominent men (not identified as priests) who stood near EZRA when the law was read at the great assembly (Neh. 8:4). If he was a priest, he may be the same as #2 above.

mattock. A farming implement, with a blade at one end and usually a pick at the other, used to break up the soil. It was especially used on hills, where vines were often grown. The English term is used by modern versions in one passage (1 Sam. 13:20-21; KJV has “coulter,” but it uses “matlock” for a different Heb. word in this same passage, and for still other words in 2 Chr. 34:6 and Isa. 7:25).

maul. Originally a hammer such as used by coppersmiths. Today it refers to any smashing weapon like those carried by shepherds (Prov. 25:18 KJV; NIV, “club”).

maw. This English term is used by the KJV once with reference to the stomach of sacrificial animals (Deut. 18:3; NIV, “inner parts”). The Hebrew term (qēbâ H7687) occurs in one other passage, where it refers to a woman’s belly (Num. 25:8).

Mazzaroth. maz'uh-roth (Heb. mazzārôt H4666). Transliteration used by the KJV and other versions to render a Hebrew word that occurs only once (Job 38:32). The context (vv. 31-33) clearly has to do with the stars, and this term is used in parallel with a Hebrew word that probably refers to a constellation (either the Bear [Ursa Major] or the Lion [Leo]). If Mazzaroth is not a general term for “constellations” (cf. NIV), it may refer to a specific constellation or star cluster (one possibility is the Hyades). See ASTRONOMY III.

mazzebah. See MASSEBAH.

meadow. Defined as moist, low-lying grasslands, and associated with lush pastures, meadows are scarcely characteristic of hot, dry PALESTINE. Grassy meadows do occur, however, in rainier uplands as in GALILEE and LEBANON, and in damp patches near springs, wells, streams, and irrigation channels. The presence of the latter often is indicated by the occurrence of ʾābēl H64 in place names (e.g., ABEL MEHOLAH, “meadow of the dance,” Jdg. 7:22). English versions use the rendering “meadow” occasionally for other Hebrew words (e.g., NIV at Ps. 65:13 and Jer. 25:37).

Meah. See HUNDRED, TOWER OF THE.

meal. This English term has two distinct meanings, both of which are found in Bible versions. It most commonly refers to the time or act of eating, or more specifically to the portion of food eaten at such a time. For this sense, see MEALS. The second meaning is its reference to the coarsely ground grains of cereal grass. The KJV uses it in a number of passages where modern versions commonly have “[fine] flour” (Gen. 18:6 et al.). The NIV sometimes uses “ground meal” where other versions have “dough” (e.g., Num. 15:20-21). See also BREAD.

meal offering. See SACRIFICE AND OFFERINGS.

meals. In Bible times meals varied greatly in terms of eating, diet, and table customs. Two meals were generally served daily, though three were not uncommon. The time of these meals was not set as ours are today. The first meal of the day could be served at any time from early morning until noon (Prov. 31:15; Jn. 21:12, 15). The rank and occupation of a person caused the time of the noon meal to vary. It came after the work of the morning was completed (Mk. 7:4) or when the noonday heat made work too difficult (Ruth 2:14). The evening meal was not served at any set time, but came when the day’s work ended. This was usually the principal meal of the Hebrews (3:7), whereas the Egyptians served their main meal at noon (Gen. 43:16). Jesus fed the multitudes at the end of the day (Matt. 14:15; Mk. 6:35; Lk. 9:12).

The food of the Eastern peoples generally may be classified into four groups: grains, vegetables, fruits, and animal foods. Wheat, barley, millet, spelt, lentils, beans, cucumbers, onions, leeks, garlic, saltwort, pods of the carob tree referred to as “husks,” and wild gourds were all eaten. See PLANTS. The grain was often picked in the field, rubbed in the hands to separate it from the chaff, and eaten raw (Lk. 6:1). Sometimes it was crushed with mortar and pestle and made into a porridge or cakes (Num. 11:8; Prov. 27:22). More often the grain was ground between two stones. The grinding was usually done by women (Matt. 24:41) or by servants (Exod. 11:5; Jdg. 16:21).

No meal was considered complete without BREAD, which was prepared both leavened and unleavened. Sometimes honey and oil were mixed into the dough as it was being made in the kneading troughs or wooden bowls. In times of poverty bread was made from beans, millet, and spelt (Ezek. 4:9). Bread was usually eaten warm and seldom by itself, but was served with sour wine or meat gravy (Jn. 13:26; 21:13). Spices, used freely as flavors, consisted of cummin or dill, mustard or mint. Salt also became an important item in the diet of people in the biblical period.

Fruits grew in great abundance in Palestine and consisted of grapes, figs, olives, mulberries, pomegranates, oranges, lemons, melons, dates, almonds, and walnuts. Grapes were eaten as fresh food and dried as raisins. They were the chief source of the wines, which were used both sweet and fermented. Olives were eaten as food as well as used to make olive oil. There were two kinds of figs, early (Isa. 28:4) and late (Jer. 8:13). The late figs were dried and pressed into cakes. Dates were used both raw and dried.

A single bowl located in the center of a mat served as the common dish from which those at the meal would take their portions.

The bulk of the meat came from sheep, lambs, kids, and fatted calves. Pork was eaten, but not by the Hebrews. Some game such as the hart, gazelle, goat, antelope, and deer, as well as doves, turtledoves, and quails, formed part of the meat diet. Some eggs were used for food (Isa. 10:14). Locusts and fish were also eaten. The Hebrews used milk from cattle and goats for drinking. From this they made cheese and butter. Arabs drank camels' milk. Cheese was made from curdled milk, and after being salted and formed into small units was placed in the sun to dry. Some of this was later mixed with water to make a sour but cooling drink.

Knives, forks, and spoons were not used in eating. The hands were usually washed and a prayer was offered before the meal. Meat was cooked and placed with its gravy in a large dish on the table. The contents were taken either with the fingers or placed on bread and carried to the mouth. The Egyptians sat at a small round table for their meals. The early Hebrews sat, knelt, or squatted as they ate, but later they evidently reclined at meals, often using a couch that extended three sides around a table (triclinium), leaving the fourth side free to use in serving.

Mearah. mee-air'uh (Heb. mē ʿārâ [not in NIV]; cf. the noun mē ʿārāh H5117, “cave”). A Sidonian city, listed among the territories that the Israelites had not occupied (Josh. 13:4 KJV, NRSV). The site is unknown, and several emendations of the text have been proposed. The NIV, understanding the first consonant as a preposition, translates, “from Arah” (see A_{RAH}).

measure. See WEIGHTS AND MEASURES.

measuring line. This expression is used in many English versions as a rendering of two Hebrew phrases (Jer. 31:3; Zeph. 2:5). The word qāw H7742, “cord, line,” by itself can be rendered “measuring line” (cf. NIV, 2 Ki. 21:13; Job 38:5; et al.), and several passages speak of allotting or dividing up land with its synonym, ḥebel H2475 (Ps. 78:55; Amos 7:17; cf. also the beautiful metaphorical expression in Ps. 16:6). The use of a cord of definite length for measuring was common (cf. 2 Sam. 8:2; Isa. 44:13). See also MEASURING REED.

measuring reed (rod). This expression occurs six times in EZEKIEL as the prophet gives the dimensions of the future TEMPLE (Ezek. 40:3, 5; 42:16-18), and this use no doubt influenced the writer of Revelation (see Rev. 11:1; 21:15-16). Reeds were commonly used in the ANE as instruments of measurement. The length of such rods would have varied over any given period of time. See MEASURING LINE; WEIGHTS AND MEASURES.

meat offering. See SACRIFICE AND OFFERINGS III.D.2.

Mebunnai. mi-buhn'î (Heb. mēbunnay H4446, apparently from bānâ H1215, “to build”). A Hushathite (i.e., from HUSHAH) and one of the Thirty, DAVID’s elite guard (2 Sam. 23:27); because he is called SIBBECAI in the parallel passages (2 Sam. 21:18; 1 Chr. 11:29; 20:4; 27:11), some scholars suspect that the name Mebunnai is the result of textual corruption.

Mecherathite. See MEKERATHITE.

Meconah. mi-koh'nuh (Heb. mēkōnâ H4828, “foundation, abode”). KJV and TNIV Mekonah. A town in JUDAH, listed between ZIKLAG and EN RIMMON in a list of cities settled after the EXILE (Neh. 11:28). It was probably in the NEGEV, but the site is unknown.

Medad. mee'dad (Heb. mêdād H4773, “beloved”). An Israelite elder upon whom the Spirit of the Lord came, enabling him to prophesy (Num. 11:26-27). See ELDAD.

Medan. mee'dan (Heb. mēdān H4527, “strife”). Son of ABRAHAM and KETURAH and the founder of an Arabian tribe (Gen. 25:2; 1 Chr. 1:32). Medan is not mentioned anywhere else in the Bible or in any extrabiblical document and therefore remains unidentified.

Medanite. mee'duh-nit. According to the MT, the Medanites (Heb. mēdānîm) sold JOSEPH in Egypt (Gen. 37:36). This name is regarded as an alternate form or a misspelling of midyānîm, “Midianites” (cf. v. 28). See MIDIAN.

The Medeba (or Madeba) map, a mosaic that depicts the Holy Land, including a detailed representation of Jerusalem.

Medeba. med´uh-buh (Heb. mêdēbā [◦] H4772, perhaps “waters of strength”). An ancient town in MOAB, identified with modern Madeba in Jordan, on a tableland c. 16 mi. (26 km.) SE of the mouth of the JORDAN River and 6 mi. (10 km.) S of HESHBON. The first biblical reference to Medeba is found in a victory song over Moab (Num. 21:30), where Medeba is mentioned as one of the cities taken from SIHON, king of the AMORITES; afterwards, Medeba was assigned to the tribe of REUBEN (Josh. 13:9, 16). The claim to this land often was disputed. The AMMONITES, after the disgraceful treatment of DAVID’s messengers, united with the ARAMEANS in a campaign against JOAB and ABISHAI near Medeba, but they were defeated (1 Chr. 19:6-15). According to the MOABITE STONE, Medeba had belonged to OMRI and AHAB, but MESHA king of Moab captured it and had it rebuilt (ANET, 320, lines 8, 30). The prophet ISAIAH names Medeba in an oracle against Moab (Isa. 15:2). In the Byzantine period Medeba was apparently a wealthy city, for several of the mosaic pavements dating from this time are still partially preserved here. Today the fame of Medeba rests upon its mosaic map of the Holy Land, dating from the late sixth century, but first discovered in 1884. The Medeba (Madeba) Map in its original form is said to have been comprised of some 2 million mosaic pieces, stretching almost 40 ft. (12 m.) from N to S, having an E orientation, and featuring the JORDAN River and a very detailed JERUSALEM near its center. Unfortunately, large portions were damaged or destroyed during the construction of a new church on the old site.

Media. mee´dee-uh (Heb. māday H4512; this form, as well as mādî H4513 [only Dan. 11:1], is also used as a gentilic, “Mede[s]”; Aram. māday H10404; Gk. Mēdos G3597). The home of the Medes, an ancient Indo-European people of NW Iran who were absorbed by the rise of PERSIA in the seventh century B.C. The Hebrew name appears as MADAI, one of the sons of JAPHETH (Gen. 10:2; 1 Chr. 1:5); Madai is evidently regarded as the ancestor of the Medes.

The boundaries of Media have varied from time to time, but generally it was regarded as that land to the W and S of the Caspian Sea. It was bounded on the West by the Zagros Mountains, on the North by the Araxes and Cyrus rivers, on the E by Hyrcania and the great Salt Desert, and on the South by Susiana or Elam. It is shaped like a parallelogram with its longest portion extending about 600 mi. (960 km.) and its greatest width about 250 mi. (400 km.), thus making it a territory of some 150,000 sq. mi. (400,000 sq. km.). It had many natural barriers, making its defense easy. Its water supply was scant, and thus much of the land proved arid and sterile, though some of its valleys were abundantly productive. Irrigation for the most part was impractical, for some of its rivers were salty while others had worn such deep canyons as to make their waters useless for this purpose. Its few towns were scattered, since its people preferred to live in small groups. Its climate was varied, with some extreme temperatures in both directions. Minerals were many and animals and birds were plentiful. Eventually these factors led to luxurious living, spelling the downfall of the empire. It became famous for its horses, and at one time paid yearly tribute of 3,000 horses, plus 4,000 mules and almost 100,000 sheep.

The people of Media were warlike and skilled in their use of the bow. They were linked very closely in their background, linguistically and religiously, to the Persians, whom they antedate by several centuries and with whom they eventually united. While their early worship was polytheistic, there were some monotheistic leanings that were very significant. Their worship was conducted by priests and consisted of hymns, sacrifices—bloody and unbloody—and a ceremony in which the priests offered an intoxicating liquor to the gods and then consumed it until they were drunken. Their religion was a revolt against the nature worship about them. They believed in real spiritual intelligence divided into good and bad. At the head of the good beings was one supreme intelligence who was worshiped as supreme creator, preserver, and governor of the universe. He was called Ahura-Mazda and was the source of all good. Later, along with Zoroastrian dualism, there developed a worship of heavenly bodies.

The people were for a long period a strong power. SHALMANESER plundered several of their more important cities, evidently with the sole purpose of exacting tribute. They continued strong and were a menace to ASSYRIA's last king, ASHURBANIPAL, after whose death the Median king Cyaxares carried on an extensive campaign.

The more than twenty references to these people or their land in the Scriptures show their importance. Their cities are referred to in 2 Ki. 17:8; 18:11. Esther tells of the binding character of their laws (Esth. 1:19); Isaiah and Daniel speak of their power against Babylon (Isa. 13:17; Dan. 5:28). The last scriptural reference to them is in Acts 2:9, where Luke says that Medes were among those to whom PETER preached on PENTECOST.

mediator. One who acts as intermediary between parties to reconcile them. In a general sense it means one who interposes and, in so doing, gives some kind of guarantee. The word mediator occurs in the English OT once as the rendering of Hebrew mēlîš H4885 (Job 33:23; this Heb. word occurs also in Gen. 42:33; 2 Chr. 32:31; Isa. 43:27). In the NT it renders Greek mesitēs G3542, which is found six times, twice in connection with MOSES as the mediator of the LAW (Gal. 3:19 and 20), and four times regarding CHRIST (1 Tim. 2:5; Heb. 8:6; 9:15; 12:24; cf. also LXX Job 9:33 and note the verb mesiteuō G3541 in Heb. 6:17). Three facts regarding this divine ministry should be noted:

I. The grounds of mediation. Throughout the Bible the estrangement between the sinner and God is repeatedly set forth. God is the moral ruler; human beings, as his natural subjects, have violated his laws, hence have gone away from God. All people are thus alienated (Rom. 3:23) because they refuse to be led by the REVELATION that God made of himself (1:18-26). Since a person cannot keep the law perfectly from birth until death, it is evident that the law cannot save anyone from the curse of SIN (Jn. 7:19; Acts 13:39; Rom. 3:20; 8:3). The law, therefore, is the pedagogue, the servant of God, who, by making sinners aware of their estrangement from God, causes them to turn to Christ as mediator (Gal. 3:24-25).

II. Examples of mediatorial work. These can be found in the OT. JONATHAN was intercessor for DAVID before SAUL (1 Sam. 19:4). ABRAHAM made intercession on behalf of ABIMELECH (Gen. 20) and SODOM (18:23-33). MOSES was mediator on behalf of PHARAOH (Exod. 8:8-13; 9:28-33) and for ISRAEL (33:12-17). SAMUEL was middleman when Israel was given a king (1 Sam. 9:15-27) and when the nation became wicked (12:19).

III. Other agents of mediation. In addition to the intercessory work of such individuals as Moses, God dealt with Israel through other agents. There were ANGELS who acted as media through whom God's will was made known to human beings (Gen. 22:15; 24:40; 32:1; Jdg. 6:11). Because of the tendency of unthinking worshipers to put the mediating angel in the place of the promised MESSIAH, later Jewish scholars refused to recognize angels as mediators. At times God appeared in human form (Gen. 12:7; 17:1; 35:7, 9; Dan. 8:17). In some cases the "angel of the Lord" seems to have been a manifestation of God, perhaps a temporary appearance of Messiah (Gen. 16:7-13). As the revelation from God came to be more fully understood and the results of it more clearly seen, there came the priestly class between human beings and God (Lev. 1-7).

With the development of this class there arose the elaborate ritualistic rules for WORSHIP whereby God set forth the requirements for making ATONEMENT. From this ceremonial system developed a set of rules that tended to separate the people from God and made them feel wholly dependent on the prelates for contact with God. So, as the priests degenerated, the people likewise became more wicked. During days of captivity, when priests were not always at hand to serve, the longing of the people for the Promised One increased. And when Jesus did come, he broke down the middle wall of partition between sinners and the offended God (Eph. 2:14).

medicine. See DISEASES.

meditation. This English noun occurs a few times in the OT (Ps. 19:14; 104:34). More common is the verb meditate (Josh. 20:47; Ps 1:2; esp. in Ps. 119, e.g., vv. 15, 23, et al.). The KJV uses the verb in the NT as a translation of Gk. meletaō G3509, “to attend to, practice” (only in 1 Tim. 4:15; cf. also Lk. 21:14 KJV and RSV). To judge by the use of the terms, meditation seems to have been more a Hebrew than Christian practice. It is a most rewarding act of WORSHIP, of spiritual renewal, of mental refreshing, and of divine communion (see Job 15:4; Ps. 77:3, 6). The most familiar passage is Ps. 19:14, “May the words of my mouth and the meditation of my heart / be pleasing in your sight, / O LORD, my Rock and my Redeemer.” Also well known is the command given to JOSHUA to meditate on the Book of the Law “day and night” (Josh. 1:8, echoed in Ps. 1:2; cf. 119:97). The godly meditate also on God’s CREATION (Ps. 77:12; cf. 119:27; 145:5).

Mediterranean Sea. Because this body of water was the largest known to the Hebrews, it became known as the Sea. The Canaanites occupied the land from JORDAN to the Sea (Num. 13:29). It marked the end of the Promised Land (34:5). JOSHUA located it as “the Great Sea on the west” (Josh. 1:4). It was the utmost sea (Deut. 11:24) or western sea (34:2). It was known also as the Sea of the Philistines (Exod. 23:31). Cedar for the TEMPLE was shipped on the Mediterranean from TYRE to JOPPA (2 Chr. 2:16). This sea played a big part in NT days. PAUL’s missionary tours took him across the eastern half. If he did set foot in Spain, he saw most of this inland sea.

The sea was known and used by many early civilized people, and they had commercial dealings across PALESTINE with civilizations of the TIGRIS-EUPHRATES Valley. At one time it had been an open channel to the RED SEA. Drifting sands from the African desert and silt from the NILE River closed this and made a land route from Asia to Africa. The sea is 2,300 mi. (3,700 km.) long and more than 1,000 mi. (1,600 km.) across at its widest point. An elevated underwater area once reached from upper Tunisia in Africa east to Sicily. This now shallow area divides the sea into the eastern and western Mediterranean. Its northern shore is broken by the Greek and Italian peninsulas. The islands of CRETE and CYPRUS served as havens for shippers of ancient times. Paul was on both islands during his journeys (Acts 13:4; 27:7).

medium. See DIVINATION; FAMILIAR SPIRIT.

meekness. Mildness and gentleness of character; a quality often commended in Scripture. The word does not imply a weak, vacillating, or supine nature. Jesus pronounced a blessing on the meek, “for they will inherit the earth” (Matt. 5:5). Meekness is a fruit of the HOLY SPIRIT (Gal. 5:23). It is characteristic of Jesus (Matt. 11:29; 2 Cor. 10:1). Believers are commanded to be meek and to show a lowly spirit one to another (Eph. 4:2; Col. 3:12; Tit. 3:2). A teacher should be meek (2 Tim. 2:25). Meekness is a mark of true discipleship (1 Pet. 3:15).

Megiddo and the Jezreel Valley.

Megiddo lies at a key crossroads on what served as an international highway. (View to the NE.)

Megiddo. mi-gid'oh (Heb. mēgiddô H4459 and mēgiddôn H4461 [only Zech. 12:11], derivation uncertain). A major Bronze Age and Israelite city in the JEZREEL Plain. It commands the entrance to the Wadi ʿArah, which served in antiquity as the main pass on the VIA MARIS between the SHARON Plain and the Valley of Jezreel. Near the foot of Megiddo, that route branches out in three main directions: (1) NW past JOKNEAM to the Phoenician coast; (2) NE via HAZOR and thence to DAMASCUS; (3) E to BETH SHAN and from there to TRANSJORDAN. Throughout the three millennia of its existence, Megiddo was one of the most strategic points in Palestine: the pass it controlled was the channel for the flow of peaceful commerce and also the route by which the armies of antiquity marched. One of the best recorded and most interesting military operations of ancient times took place at Megiddo when THUTMOSE III defeated an Asiatic coalition headed by the king of KADESH ON THE ORONTES. The importance of the city is reflected in the statement of the Egyptian king that the capture of Megiddo was the capture of a thousand towns.

The first mention of Megiddo in the Bible is in the list of kings defeated by JOSHUA W of the JORDAN (Josh. 12:21). In the tribal allotments, Megiddo was in the territory of MANASSEH, but this tribe was unable to conquer Megiddo and the other fortress cities that rimmed the plain of ESDRAELON (Josh. 17:11; Jdg. 1:27). During the period of the judges, Israelite forces under DEBORAH and BARAK annihilated the army of SISERA in a battle that raged in part “by the waters of Megiddo” (Jdg. 5:19), the sources of the KISHON (see MEGIDDO, WATERS OF). Though the biblical record does not relate the circumstances under which Israel finally took the city, there are indications of the greatness of Megiddo during the Solomonic period. Megiddo is listed among the cities in the charge of BAANA, one of the twelve officers responsible in rotation for the monthly provisions of the king and his court (1 Ki. 4:12). It is also singled out as one of the cities to which SOLOMON assigned forced labor for construction (9:15); the text speaks of store cities and cities for chariots and horsemen (1 Ki. 9:19; cf. 2 Chr. 1:14; see below). The hard-driving JEHU killed King Joram (JEHORAM) with an arrow as that king fled in his chariot; Jehu also ordered the shooting of the Judean AHAZIAH, who was attempting to escape. Mortally wounded, Ahaziah went as far as Megiddo and died there (2 Ki. 9:27). In 609 B.C. NECO of Egypt marched N to aid the Assyrian remnant at CARCHEMISH; on his way he was opposed by JOSIAH king of Judah. In the brief battle that ensued in the Plain of Megiddo, Josiah was hit by Egyptian archers and soon died (2 Ki. 23:29-30; 2 Chr. 35:20-27).

The OT has only one reference to Megiddo in the prophetic writings: Zechariah mentions a heathen mourning that took place in the Plain of Esdraelon: "On that day the weeping in Jerusalem will be great, like the weeping of Hadad Rimmon in the plain of Megiddo" (Zech. 12:11). The single NT allusion is in the name ARMAGEDDON (prob. from a Heb. phrase meaning "mountain of Megiddo"), where "the battle on the great day of God Almighty" will be fought (Rev. 16:14, 16).

The modern name for the site of Megiddo is Tell el-Mutesellim. Excavations have provided much information about the history and culture of the city and considerable illumination of the biblical text. The more important discoveries include the city gate and wall, the governor's residence, and the stables of Stratum IV; the water system, the temples and palaces of earlier levels; and a remarkable find of ivories (early twelfth century B.C., Stratum VII). Stratum IV has been usually assigned to Solomonic times, though some recent scholars have argued that it should be dated to the time of AHAB. The stables for at least 450 horses do illustrate the statements of 1 Ki. 9:15-19 and 2 Chr. 1:14. Evidence of similar structures had been previously found elsewhere. An interesting feature of Stratum IV is the use of the three courses of hewn stone and a course of cedar beams, as described in the building process of Solomon at Jerusalem (7:12). The temples and shrines of the earlier levels and numerous cult objects from various periods shed light on the religious life of the city. Inscriptional material includes some Egyptian cartouches and titles, as well as seals with Hebrew inscriptions, one reading "[Belonging] to Shema, servant of Jeroboam." Innumerable small objects also contribute to the knowledge of the art, daily life, and commercial relations of Megiddo.

Megiddo, waters of. A place mentioned in the victory song of DEBORAH (Jdg. 5:19). The allusion is probably to the WADI draining the basin behind MEGIDDO, between it and the hills to the S. T_{HUTMOSE} III encamped beside that brook, which was called Qina, before attacking Megiddo. The biblical passage suggests that instead of dividing the spoil and receiving a reward for their services, which would have been done on the southern side of the J_{EZREEL} Valley in front of T_{AANACH} and Megiddo, the Canaanite kings were swept away by the torrent K_{ISHON} in the center of the plain.

Megilloth. mi-gil'oth. The plural form of Hebrew mēgillâ H4479, meaning “scroll” or “roll” (Jer. 36:28-29; Ezek. 3:1-3). The name Megilloth is given to a set of five short OT books, each brief enough to be read publicly at an annual religious festival. The order in some MSS and in editions of the Hebrew Bible follows that of the feasts throughout the year: Song of Songs (Passover), Ruth (Pentecost), Lamentations (the ninth of Ab, commemorating the destruction of the temple), Ecclesiastes (Tabernacles), and Esther (Purim).

Mehetabeel. See M_{EHETABEL}.

Mehetabel. mi-het'uh-bel (Heb. mēhêṭab ʿēl H4541, “God does good”). (1) Daughter of M_{ATRED} and wife of Hadad (Hadar) king of E_{DOM} (Gen. 36:39; 1 Chr. 1:50). See H_{ADAD} (PERSON) #3.

(2) Grandfather or ancestor of the false prophet Shemaiah (Neh. 6:10; KJV, “Mehetabeel”). See S_{HEMAIAH} #19.

Mehida. mi-hi'duh (Heb. mēḥîdā H4694, meaning unknown). Ancestor of a family of temple servants (N_{ETHINIM}) who returned from the E_{XILE} with Z_{ERUBBABEL} (Ezra 2:52; Neh. 7:54).

Mehir. mee'huhr (Heb. mēḥîr H4698, “bought [as slave]”). Son (or descendant) of Kelub, included in the genealogy of J_{UDAH} (1 Chr. 4:11). His place in the genealogy is unclear.

Meholah. See A_{BEL} M_{EHOLAH}.

Meholathite. mi-hoh'luh-thit (Heb. mēḥōlātî H4716, prob. gentilic of mēḥōlâ, “dancing”). A descriptive adjective given to A_{DRIEL} son of B_{ARZILLAI}, who married S_{AUL}'s daughter, M_{ERAB} (1 Sam. 18:19 [NIV, “of Meholah”]; 2 Sam. 21:8). He was probably an inhabitant of ABEL MEHOLAH, but some scholars, vocalizing the Hebrew word differently, read Mahlathite, that is, a descendant of MAHLAH, from the tribe of MANASSEH.

Mehujael. mi-hyoo´jay-uhl (Heb. mēhûyā ʾēl H4686, prob. “smitten by God”). Son of Irad and descendant of CAIN (Gen. 4:18).

Mehuman. mi-hyoo´muhn (Heb. mēhûmān H4540, possibly from Old Pers. vahumanah, “intelligent”). One of the seven EUNUCHS sent by Ahasuerus, king of Persia (i.e., XERXES, who reigned 486-465 B.C.), to bring Queen VASHTI to a royal feast (Esth. 1:10). Some have speculated that the name is a variant of MEMUCAN (see v. 14).

Mehunim. See MEUNIM.

Me Jarkon. mi-jahr´kon (Heb. mê hayyarqôn H4770, “waters of the Jarkon” or “pale waters”). A town (or river?) within the tribal territory of DAN (Josh. 19:46). The text is difficult, and some writers emend the text. Most scholars, however, associate the name with a stream called Nahr el-Auja, which flows into the MEDITERRANEAN a few miles N of JOPPA. The ancient Hebrew name “pale waters” may well reflect the considerable quantity of organic soil the river carries at certain times, giving it its greenish appearance. See also RAKKON.

Mekerathite mi-ker´uh-thit (Heb. mēkērātî H4841, gentilic of an otherwise unattested name, mēkērâ, meaning “plan”). A descriptive title given to HEPHER, one of DAVID’s mighty warriors (1 Chr. 11:36). It is not clear whether Mekerah was a place or an ancestor.

Mekonah. mi-koh´nuh. KJV and TNIV form of MECONAH.

Melatiah. mel´uh-ti´uh (Heb. mēlatyâ H4882, “Yahweh has delivered”). A man from GIBEON who helped rebuild the wall of Jerusalem under NEHEMIAH (Neh. 3:7). See comments under JADON.

Melchi. See MELKI.

Melchiah. See MALKIJAH.

Melchior. mel'kee-or. According to late Christian tradition, the name of one of the MAGI who traveled to BETHLEHEM (Matt. 2:1-12).

Melchisedec. See MELCHIZEDEK.

Melchi-shua. See MALKI-SHUA.

Melchizedek. mel-kiz'uh-dek (Heb. malkî-ṣedeq H4900, “king of righteousness”; Gk. Melchisedek G3519). KJV NT Melchisedec. A priest-king mentioned in three biblical books (Gen. 14:18-20; Ps. 110:4; Heb. 5:6-11; 6:20—7:28) and in several nonbiblical documents (e.g., in the DEAD SEA SCROLLS and in the writings of PHILO JUDAEUS). According to Genesis, Melchizedek went out to meet Abram (ABRAHAM) after the latter's return from the slaughter of KEDORLAOMER and the kings who were with him in the Valley of SIDDIM. He presented Abram with bread and wine and blessed him in the name of “God Most High, Creator of heaven and earth.” Abram gave him “a tenth of everything.” Melchizedek was evidently a monotheist and worshiped essentially the same God as Abram, who recognized him as a priest.

The reference in Ps. 110:4 reads, “You are a priest forever, / in the order of Melchizedek.” This psalm is of special interest because Jesus referred to it (Matt. 22:41-42; Mk. 12:35-36; Lk. 20:41-42), and it is regarded as one of the messianic psalms. The ideal ruler of the Hebrew nation would be one who combined in his person the role of both priest and king.

View of the Kidron Valley (looking S, with modern Silwan to left). This is probably the location of the Valley of Shaveh, where Melchizedek went out to meet Abram (Gen. 14:17-18).

The author of the letter to the HEBREWS uses Melchizedek (Heb. 5-7) in his great argument showing Jesus Christ as the final and perfect revelation of God because in his person he is Son and in his work he is Priest. The author cites Ps. 110:4, indicating that Jesus' priesthood is of a different order from the Levitical: it is "in the order of Melchizedek." Looking back on the history of his people, he comes to the conclusion that the Levitical priesthood proved to be a failure. It was incapable of securing victory over sin and full communion with God. Thus the ideal priest must belong to "the order of Melchizedek." To the author, Christ was the fulfillment of this prophecy, for he came out of JUDAH, a tribe with no connection to the Levitical priesthood. While the claims of the old priesthood were based on genealogy, Christ's were displayed in his power of an endless life. The claim of Jesus to be the real fulfillment of the psalmist's prophecy rested on the fact of his resurrection and the proof it gave that his life was indestructible. The psalmist had declared that the ideal high priest would be forever—and only one whose life could not be destroyed by death could be said to answer to the psalmist's ideal, a priest "in the order of Melchizedek."

Melea. mee'lee-uh (Gk. Melea G3507, perhaps from mēlē ᾗ H4852, "fullness"). Son of Menna, included in Luke's GENEALOGY OF JESUS CHRIST (Lk. 3:31).

Melech. mee'lik (Heb. melek H4890, "king," possibly short form of MALKIJAH, "Yahweh is [my] king"). TNIV Melek. Son of Micah and descendant of SAUL through JONATHAN and MERIB-BAAL, included in the genealogy of BENJAMIN (1 Chr. 8:35; also 9:41).

Melek. mee'lik. TNIV form of MELECH.

Melicu. See MALLUCH #6.

Melita. See MALTA.

Melki. mel'ki (Gk. Melchi G3518, from Heb. malkî, possibly short form of MALKIJAH, “Yahweh is [my] king”). The name of two men included in Luke’s GENEALOGY OF JESUS CHRIST: Melki son of Jannai and Melki son of Addi (Lk. 3:14, 28).

melon. See PLANTS.

Melzar. mel'zahr (Heb. melzar H4915). According to the KJV, Melzar was the name of the Babylonian official in charge of DANIEL and his friends (Dan. 1:11, 16). In fact, however, the term is a common noun (from Akk. maššāru) meaning “guard” or “warden.”

mem. maym (from mayim H4784, “water[s]”). The thirteenth letter of the Hebrew alphabet (מ), with a numerical value of forty. It is named for the shape of the letter, which in its older form seems to be a stylized picture of running water. Its sound corresponds to that of English m.

member. A body part; also, one of the persons that compose a group. In the NT, the term usually has a derived sense. The parts of the body are not to be an instrument of wickedness but of righteousness (Rom. 6:13, 19; cf. 7:5, 23; Jas. 4:1). The “members that are upon the earth” (NIV, “whatever in you is earthly”) are to be put to death (Col. 3:5). Even the tongue, though a “small member,” can be “a world of evil” (Jas. 3:5-6). A different metaphor is that of Christians viewed as members of the BODY OF CHRIST (cf. 1 Cor. 6:15; Eph. 4:25; et al.).

memorial. An object or a ceremony that commemorates an event or keeps its remembrance alive. That which qualifies for memorial is the worthily unusual—persons, incidents, or things, usually epoch-making. Memorials are direction markers in history, indicating trends in the course of events. When the Hebrews discovered that there was one living God who participated in human affairs, and with whom COVENANT could be made, his name became a memorial. An apocalyptic psalmist said, “O LORD, we wait for thee; thy memorial name [NIV, your name and renown] is the desire of our soul” (Isa. 26:8 RSV). Also, “the law of the LORD” was to be memorialized (Exod. 13:9). Great acts of God are preserved in memorials: the CREATION (20:11); the deliverance from Egyptian bondage (13:8); and Christ’s death on the cross (1 Cor. 11:24-26). True worship and good deeds were objects of memorials: Israelite worship (Lev. 2:2; Num. 31:54); MARY’s anointing Jesus (Matt. 26:13; Mk. 14:9); and CORNELIUS’s worship and neighborly service (Acts 10:4). These and others are recalled by the various memorials that perpetuate them.

Memphis. mem´fis (from Gk. Memphis; Heb. nōp H5862 and mōp H5132 [only Hos. 9:6]). KJV Noph (except. Hos. 9:6). A city of EGYPT, on the W bank of the NILE, some 13 mi. (21 km.) S of Cairo, in an area including the modern village of Mit Rahineh. Legend ascribes the founding of the city to Menes, the traditional first king. The original name of the city was “The White Wall.” Later it was called Men-nefer-Pepi, after the name of the pyramid of Pepi I of the 6th dynasty; it is from this name that “Memphis” is derived. The chief god of Memphis was Ptah; also prominent at Memphis was the worship of the Apis bull, whose famous burial place, the Serapeum, is located just to the W in the necropolis of Saqqarah. All of the biblical references to Memphis are in the Prophets. Hosea foretold a return of Israelites to Egypt and specifically to Memphis (Hos. 9:6). After the murder of GEDALIAH, a number of Jews fled from Palestine to Egypt (cf. Jer. 41:16-18), and Memphis is mentioned as a place of their residence (44:1). Both Isaiah and Jeremiah had seen the results of an Egyptian-Judean alliance and refer to Memphis (Isa. 19:13; Jer. 2:16). Jeremiah prophesied that Memphis would become a ruin (cf. Jer. 46:14, 19). Ezekiel declared that the Lord would “destroy the idols and put an end to the images in Memphis” (Ezek. 30:13) and spoke of coming distresses in that city (30:16). Today there is little for the casual visitor to see in the ruins of Memphis, and only the colossus of RAMSES II and the alabaster sphinx attract tourist attention.

Memucan. mi-myoo´kuhn (Heb. mēmûkān H4925, derivation uncertain). TNIV Mamukan. One of “the seven nobles of Persia and Media who had special access to the king and were highest in the kingdom” (Esth. 1:14, 16, 21). Memucan served as their spokesman, and Queen V_{ASHTI} was banished by Ahasuerus (X_{ERXES}) on their advice.

Panel depicting Tiglath-Pileser III (from Nimrud, c. 728 B.C.). Menahem king of Judah was forced to pay tribute to this Assyrian conqueror.

Menahem. men´uh-hem (Heb. mēnaḥēm H4968, “comforter”). Son of G_{ADI}; he usurped the throne and became one of the last kings of Israel (2 Ki. 15:14-22). He began his reign of ten years by killing his predecessor S_{HALLUM}. The biblical historian states, “He did evil in the eyes of the Lord” (v. 18). Through gifts collected from his subjects, he bribed the Assyrian king Pul (T_{IGLATH-PILESER} III) and was thereby able to retain his throne. In this restless period of the northern kingdom, with sinful men usurping the throne time and again, Menahem was the only king who died a natural death. His son P_{EKAHIAH} inherited the kingdom.

Menan. See M_{ENNA}.

mene, mene, tekel, parsin (upharsin). mee´nee, mee´nee, tek´uhl, pahr´sin, yoo-fahr´sin (Aram. mēnê mēnê tēqēl ûparsîn, from mēnê › H10428, tēqēl H10770, pērēs H10593). An inscription that appeared on the wall of the palace of B_{ELSHAZZAR} at B_{ABYLON} (Dan. 5:25-28). Belshazzar “gave a great banquet for a thousand of his nobles and drank wine with them” (5:1) out of the golden vessels taken by N_{EBUCHADNEZZAR} from the temple at J_{ERUSALEM} after its capture in 586 B.C. (2 Ki. 25:14-15). The king became terrified when he saw the writing.

“All the king’s wise men” failed to interpret the words, and DANIEL, at the suggestion of the queen, was called in to decipher the message.

There has been much discussion about the original form of the inscription and about its interpretation. The text could be understood as meaning, “Mina, mina, shekel, and half-shekels.” This series of WEIGHTS was approximately equivalent to our “pound, pound, ounce, half-ounce.” Such a reading must have offered many speculative possibilities to the Babylonians versed in arithmetical, algebraic, and astronomical methods, especially as numbers or words were sometimes used as symbols in certain types of omen texts. The “Peres” (pērēs, Dan. 5:28) is attested as a “half-shekel” both at Babylon and in the Alalakh tablets from SYRIA in the fourteenth century B.C. The form parsîn could be a plural (or even dual) referring to two half-shekels. (The u-represents the conjunction “and.”) Another reading would be, “Counted, counted, weighed, and assessed.” These words might be a popular proverbial saying involving wordplay on the former reading or even a technical legal phrase denoting the completion of a contract and the final demand for fulfilling its terms.

What Daniel had to deliver as the message by the mysterious writer was the fact that “God had numbered” the days of the kingdom; the king had “been weighed on the scales and found wanting”; his “kingdom is divided and given to the Medes and Persians.” There was not much time between interpretation and fulfillment, for “that very night Belshazzar, king of the Babylonians, was slain.”

Menelaus. men’uh-lay’uhs (Gk. Menelaos). A brother of Simon the Benjamite (2 Macc. 4:23) who usurped the high priesthood in the Maccabean era. See MACCABEE. In the reign of ANTIOCHUS Epiphanes, Menelaus was sent by the high priest Jason (who had himself undermined Onias) to ANTIOCH of Syria (171 B.C.) to carry promised tribute to the king; instead of executing his commission, however, he offered a higher bid for the high priesthood and was authorized to supplant Jason (2 Macc. 4:23-24.). Upon Menelaus’s return to JERUSALEM, Jason fled (4:25-26), but Menelaus, failing to pay Antiochus the money, was called to account (vv. 27-28). Reporting to Antioch, he did more bribing. Some time later, the reported death of Antiochus in Egypt brought back the fugitive Jason with allies who forced Menelaus to flee. When the king returned, he massacred Jerusalem’s citizens and plundered the temple with the aid of the scoundrel Menelaus (2 Macc. 5:5-23). Menelaus is later mentioned in a letter from Antiochus’s son and successor, Eupator (11:29, 32). In 162 B.C., apparently no longer high priest, he was condemned by Eupator. The death of Menelaus was as unique as his career was notorious: he was flung from the top of a tower into some ashes below (13:1-7).

Meni. muh-nee' (Heb. mēnî H4972, from mānāh H4948, "to count, consign"). The name of a pagan deity mentioned in Isa. 65:11, "But as for you who forsake the LORD / and forget my holy mountain, / who spread a table for Fortune [Gad] / and fill bowls of mixed wine for Destiny [Meni]." (The KJV renders the names as common nouns, respectively "troop" and "number.") See GAD (DEITY). In the rites referred to in this verse a table was spread, furnished with food as a meal for the gods. With a wordplay, the next verse says, "I will destine [Heb. mānîṭî] you for the sword." Gad and Meni were worshiped by apostate Jews. It is possible that they were Babylonian deities, but the evidence points to W Asia as the natural environment of this cult.

Menna. men'uh (Gk. Menna G3527). Son of Mattatha, included in Luke's GENEALOGY OF JESUS CHRIST (Lk. 3:31; KJV, "Menan").

menorah. muh-nor'uh. See LAMPSTAND.

Menuchah, Menuhah. See NOHAH #2.

Menuhoth. min-yoo'hoth (Heb. mēnuḥôṭ, "resting places"). A clan descended from CALEB through HUR (1 Chr. 2:52 NRSV). The name is probably a variant of MANAHATHITES (v. 54).

Meonenim, plain of. mee-on'uh-nim (Heb. mē'ônnîm, from 'ānan H6726, "to practice soothsaying"). A place mentioned once in the KJV (Jdg. 9:37). However, the reference is probably to a tree. See DIVINERS' OAK.

Meonothai. mee-on'oh-thi (Heb. mē'ônôṭay H5065, "my dwellings"). Son of OTHNIEL, nephew of CALEB, descendant of JUDAH, and father of OPHRAH (1 Chr. 4:13-14). The MT lacks the name Meonothai in v. 13, but the context seems to require it, and most versions supply it on the basis of the Lucianic recension of the SEPTUAGINT as well as the VULGATE.

Mephaath. mi-fay'ath (Heb. mêpa'at H4789, possibly "shining, radiant"). A town within the tribal territory of REUBEN, listed between KEDEMOTH and KIRIATHAIM (Josh. 13:18); it became one of the LEVITICAL CITIES assigned to the descendants of MERAR (Josh. 21:37; 1 Chr. 6:79). Apparently it was later conquered by MOAB (Jer. 48:21). The location of Mephaath is uncertain.

Mephibosheth. mi-fib'oh-sheth (Heb. mēpībōšet H5136, “from the mouth of shame”). (1) Son of SAUL by his concubine RIZPAH (2 Sam. 21:8). Saul had tried to exterminate the GIBEONITES (21:2), who had tricked JOSHUA into a pledge of protection when Israel had invaded Palestine (Josh. 9). In answer to DAVID's offer to atone for Saul's bloody deed in order to secure the Gibeonites' blessing on Israel, they demanded the hanging of seven of Saul's sons (2 Sam. 21:3-6). This Mephibosheth was one of the seven (21:8). Possibly his original name was Mephibaal; see #2 below.

(2) Son of JONATHAN and grandson of Saul (2 Sam. 4:4). In the Chronicler's genealogies he is called MERIB-BAAL (1 Chr. 8:34; 9:40), probably his original name (and perhaps also the original name of #1 above). When the name BAAL (meaning “lord”) took on pagan associations, the scribes apparently substituted it with the word bōšet H1425, meaning “shame” (see ISH-BOSHETH); but the change in the first element of the name is unexplained. After the disaster at Mount GILBOA, where both Saul and Jonathan were killed in the battle against the PHILISTINES (2 Sam. 1:4; 1 Chr. 10:1-8), Mephibosheth as a child of five was carried by his nurse to LO DEBAR in TRANSJORDAN, where they took refuge in the house of MAKIR son of Ammiel (2 Sam. 9:4). On David's accession to the throne, Mephibosheth was called back to JERUSALEM, given his father's inheritance, and allowed to eat at the king's table for the rest of his life. Saul's servant ZIBA was commanded to serve him. The servant, however, tried to ingratiate himself with David at the expense of his master by representing Mephibosheth as a traitor (16:1-4). David did not fully believe the servant's story, for later he received Mephibosheth in a friendly manner (19:24-30).

Merab. mee'rab (Heb. mērab H5266, possibly “abundance” or “chief”). Older daughter of king SAUL (1 Sam. 14:49). Merab was promised to DAVID (18:17), but when the time came for David to marry the girl, for some unknown reason she was given to ADRIEL the Meholathite (v. 19). Merab bore five sons to Adriel (2 Sam. 21:8, where the MT, surely by mistake, has MICHAL, the name of Saul's younger daughter; most modern versions read Merab, following some Heb. and Gk. MSS).

Meraiah. mi-ray'yuh (Heb. mērāyâ H5316, perhaps short form of AMARIAH, “Yahweh has said”). The head of the priestly family of Seraiah in the time of the high priest JOIAKIM (Neh. 12:12). EZRA belonged to the same family (Ezra 7:1).

Meraioth. mi-ray'yoth (Heb. mērāyôṭ H5318; possibly “obstinate”). (1) Son of Zerahiah, descendant of LEVI through ELEAZAR, and ancestor of ZADOK and EZRA (1 Chr. 6:6-7, 52; Ezra 7:3).

(2) Son of AHITUB and ancestor of Azariah and Seraiah; the latter two had supervisory responsibilities in “the house of God” (1 Chr. 9:11; Neh. 11:11).

(3) A priestly family in the days of the high priest JOIAKIM (Neh. 12:15 KJV and other versions, following MT; the NIV, on the basis of some Gk. MSS, reads MEREMOTH, as in v. 3).

Merari. mi-rah'ri (Heb. mērārî H5356, “bitter” or “strong” or “blessing”; the same form [mērārî H5357] is used as a gentilic, “Merarite,” in Num. 26:57 and perhaps elsewhere). Third son of LEVI and eponymous ancestor of the Merarites, an important Levitical family (Gen. 46:11; Exod. 6:16; 1 Chr. 6:16). He had two sons, MAHLI and MUSHI (Exod. 6:19; 1 Chr. 6:19; 23:21). The clans of the Mahlites and Mushites (Num. 3:20; 33; 26:58) were charged with carrying the frames, the bars, pillars, bases, and accessories of the TABERNACLE (Num. 3:36-37; 4:31-33; 7:8; 10:17; Josh. 21:7, 34, 40). After the conquest, the Merarites were allotted twelve LEVITICAL CITIES from the tribes of Reuben, Gad, and Zebulun (Josh. 21:7, 34-40; 1 Chr. 6:63, 77-81). Numerous references to Merari's family in the Chronicles show their importance as workers in the TEMPLE in late OT times (1 Chr. 6; 9; 15; 23; 24; 26; 2 Chr. 29; 34; cf. also Ezra 8:19).

Merathaim. mer'uh-thay'im (Heb. mērāṭayim H5361, dual [emphatic?] form derived from mārāh H5286, “to be obstinate”). A symbolic name for BABYLON in Jer. 50:21. Meaning something like “doubly bitter” or “twice rebellious,” the name appears to be a wordplay on nār marratum (“bitter river”), a large lagoon or marshy area formed by the convergence of the TIGRIS and EUPHRATES in S Babylonia. See also PEKOD.

merchandise. The goods or wares that are bought and sold in business. This term is used variously in the English versions to render a variety of Hebrew terms (Neh. 13:16; Ezek. 27:9-34). The KJV uses the term a few times in the NT to render, for example, Greek emporia G1865, “business” (Matt. 22:5) and gomos G1203, “cargo” (Rev. 18:11-12). See also MERCHANT; TRADE AND TRAVEL.

merchant. A trader; someone who buys and sells commodities for profit. The participle of the Hebrew verb sāḥar H6086 is used fifteen times, chiefly of international merchants (e.g., Gen. 37:28; Prov. 31:14), whereas the participle of rākal H8217, which occurs with similar frequency, seems to be a more general term (Neh. 3:31; Ezek. 17:4; Nah. 3:16). The term kēna ʿānî H4050 means “Canaanite,” but a different word with the same form (kēna ʿan H4051) clearly refers to traders in at least two passages (Job 41:6; Prov. 31:24; possibly also Zech. 14:21; note also kēna ʿan H4047 in Ezek. 16:29; 17:4; Hos. 12:7; Zeph. 1:11; kin ʿān H4048 in Isa. 23:8). The Canaanites, and in particular the Phoenicians, were so famous for their trading that the name for the inhabitants of Canaan took on this additional meaning (see CANAAN; PHOENICIA). In NEHEMIAH’s time different classes of merchants had their own quarters in JERUSALEM; thus goldsmiths and grocers had one location, and fishmongers another (Neh. 3:32; 13:16). The NT makes reference to merchants in a parable of Jesus and several times in Revelation (Matt. 13:45; Rev. 18:3 et al.). See also TRADE AND TRAVEL.

Mercurius. muhr-kyoor’ee-uhs. That is, Mercury. KJV rendering of Greek Hermēs G2259 (Acts 14:12). See HERMES (DEITY).

mercy. Compassion or leniency shown to another, especially an offender. In this sense, mercy has special reference to God’s act of FORGIVENESS by means of ATONEMENT. In a more general sense, mercy is the compassion that causes one to help the weak, the sick, or the poor. Showing mercy is one of the cardinal virtues of a true Christian (Jas. 2:1-13) and is one of the determinants of God’s treatment of us. Christian mercy is a “fruit of the Spirit” (Gal. 5:22-23), made up in part of love, longsuffering, kindness, gentleness, and goodness. God’s mercy toward sinners was shown most clearly and fully in his giving of his beloved Son to die in our stead; and our Lord’s mercy enabled him to make willingly the awful sacrifice (Rom. 5:8). See also LOVE; LOVINGKINDNESS.

mercy seat. See TABERNACLE.

Mered. mee’rid (Heb. mered H5279, “rebellious” or “daring”). Son of Ezrah, included in the genealogy of JUDAH (1 Chr. 4:17-18). Mered had two wives, one of them an unnamed Judean woman, and the other an Egyptian named BITHIAH, who is described as “Pharaoh’s daughter.” Each of his wives bore him three children.

Meremoth. mer'uh-moth (Heb. mērēmôt H5329, derivation uncertain). (1) Son of Uriah; he was a priest commissioned to handle “the silver and gold and the sacred articles” that EZRA brought to JERUSALEM (Ezra 8:33). He may be the same Meremoth—also described as son of Uriah (and grandson of Hakkoz), but not called a priest—who repaired a section of the wall adjacent to the house of Eliashib and a section next to the Fish Gate (Neh. 3:4, 21). This identification, however, seems to be at odds with the information that the descendants of Hakkoz were unable to find their names in the genealogical records and thus were excluded from the priesthood (Ezra 2:61-62; Neh. 7:63-64), and thus some scholars argue that the Meremoth who helped repair the wall was a different person, possibly a layman.

(2) A priest (or priestly family) who returned from Babylon with ZERUBBABEL (Neh. 12:3). Later, in the days of the high priest JOIAKIM, the head of Meremoth's family was Helkai (v. 15 NIV, following some Gk. MSS; the MT has MERAIOTH).

(3) One of the priests who sealed Nehemiah's covenant (Neh. 10:5); he is probably to be identified with #1 or #2 above.

(4) One of the descendants of BANI who agreed to put away their foreign wives (Ezra 10:36).

Merenptah. muhr'enp-tah'. Variant form of MERNEPTAH.

Meres. mee'reez (Heb. meres H5332, meaning uncertain). One of “the seven nobles of Persia and Media who had special access to the king and were highest in the kingdom” (Esth. 1:14). Queen VASHTI was banished by Ahasuerus (XERXES) on their advice.

Meribah. mer'i-bah (Heb. mērîbâ H5313, “contention”). A name applied to two different places where water was brought miraculously from rock to satisfy thirsty Israelites in the wilderness. The first place, which bears the double name “Massah and Meribah,” was near REPHIDIM and Mount HOREB in the Desert of SINAI, and the incident took place when Israel was less than two months out of Egypt (Exod. 17:7; the names Massah [“testing”] and Meribah [“contention”] are used in parallelism in Deut. 33:8 and Ps. 95:8). Another incident took place in S Palestine at KADESH BARNEA nearly thirty-nine years later; this place is referred to as “the waters of Meribah” (Num. 20:13, 24; Ps. 81:7; 106:32) or “the waters of Meribah Kadesh” (Num. 27:14; Deut. 32:51; Ezek. 47:19; 48:28; NRSV, “Meribath-kadesh”). See also MASSAH.

Meribath-kadesh. mer´i-buhth-kay´dish. See MERIBAH.

Merib-Baal. mer´ib-bay´uhl (Heb. mērib ba ʿal H5311, possibly “Baal is [my] contender [or advocate]”). Son of JONATHAN and grandson of SAUL (1 Chr. 8:34; 9:40). See MEPHIBOSHETH #2.

The Merneptah Stela, also known as the “Israel Stela” (from Thebes, c. 1230 B.C.). The inscription is a poetic eulogy of Merneptah’s victories and includes the statement, “Israel is laid waste; his seed is not.”

Merneptah. muhr´nep-tah´. Also Merenptah (and other spellings). Son and successor of RAMSES II. Although not mentioned in the OT, Merneptah is of significance for biblical studies. He ascended the throne of EGYPT when he was around sixty years old, c. 1224 (or 1213) B.C., and ruled ten years. Accordingly, some scholars who adopt a very late date for the Israelite EXODUS have regarded Merneptah as the PHARAOH who ruled Egypt at the time of this event. Among the items discovered in his mortuary temple, on the W bank at THEBES, is a large granite stela dated to his fifth year. This monument is often referred to as the Israel Stela because it refers to several victories in Canaan, including the claim: “Israel is laid waste; his seed is not” (ANET, 376-78). According to most scholars, this statement requires that the Israelites had occupied Palestine prior to the accession of Merneptah.

Merodach. mi-roh’dak (Heb. mērōdak H5281). Hebrew form of Akkadian MARDUK, the Babylonian god (Jer. 50:2 KJV and other versions). Merodach is the divine element in the names EVIL-MERODACH (2 Ki. 25:27; Jer. 52:31), MERODACH-BALADAN (2 Ki. 20:12; Isa. 39:1), and possibly MORDECAI (Ezra 2:2 et al.).

Merodach-Baladan. mi-roh’dak-bal’uh-duhn (Heb. mērōdak-bal ʾādān H5282, from Akk. Marduk-apla-iddin[na], “Marduk has given a son”). TNIV Marduk-Baladan. A Babylonian king at the time of King HEZEKIAH of JUDAH (2 Ki. 20:12 [KJV, “Berodach-baladan”]; Isa. 39:1). According to the biblical record, Merodach-Baladan sent an embassy to Hezekiah when the latter was sick, although probably his real motive was to encourage revolt against ASSYRIA. Merodach-Baladan claimed descent from Eriba-Marduk, king of BABYLON c. 800 B.C., and was first mentioned in the inscriptions of TIGLATH-PILESER III, king of Assyria. When the latter entered Babylon in 731, Merodach-Baladan brought gifts to him and supported the Assyrians. In 721, under the rule of another Assyrian king, SARGON II, Merodach-Baladan usurped the Babylonian throne. Although the Assyrians reacted, Merodach-Baladan stayed on the throne until 710, when Sargon entered Babylon unopposed. Even then, he remained as local ruler and did not oppose Sargon during the rest of his reign. After the death of Sargon, Merodach-Baladan again revolted and ruled for a short period in 703, but when SENNACHERIB seized Babylon, he retreated to his homeland. Sennacherib defeated the rebels and entered Babylon, where he placed Bel-ibni on the throne. Eventually this throne was occupied by Sennacherib’s son, Ashur-nadin-shumi. When Sennacherib attacked the coastal cities of ELAM, where Merodach-Baladan had fled, no mention was made of him, but his son Nabushumishkun was taken prisoner by Sennacherib in the battle of Halulê. Merodach-Baladan died in ELAM before Sennacherib entered the area in 694. This Babylonian king is remembered as a clever and ambitious ruler who bitterly opposed the influence of Assyria in Babylon.

Merom, Waters of. mee’rom (Heb. mērôm H5295, “high place”). A place near which the Israelites defeated the combined forces of the kings of GALILEE (Josh. 11:5, 7). Merom was most certainly a town in Upper Galilee, as evidenced by ancient extrabiblical sources, but the precise location is debated.

The frequent identification of Merom with the village of Meirun at the foot of the Jebel Jarmaq is problematic. More likely is Tell el-Khirbeh, an impressive site S of Jebel Marun on the Israel-Lebanon border; in this case, the Waters of Merom may be identified either with the perennial spring at the foot of the tell or, what is more likely, with the numerous wells in the several branches of the Wadi Farāh. Another proposal is Qarn Ḥaṭṭīn, 10 mi. (16 km.) ENE of NAZARETH. See also MADON.

Meronoth. mi-ron'oth. See MERONOTHITE.

Meronothite. mi-ron'oh-thit (Heb. mērōnōtî H5331, gentilic of the unattested name mērōnōt). The designation of two men in the OT: JEHDEIAH, a member of DAVID's household (1 Chr. 27:30), and JADON, who helped NEHEMIAH repair the wall of Jerusalem (Neh. 3:7; NIV, "of Meronoth"). The latter passage suggests that Meronoth was near GIBEON and that it was closely connected (or perhaps even an alternate name for) MIZPAH, but the exact location is unconfirmed.

Meroz. mee'roz (Heb. mērôz H5292, derivation uncertain). A place in or near the Valley of ESDRAELON. DEBORAH in her song of victory called a curse upon the town of Meroz for not sending help in the battle against SISERA (Jdg. 5:23). Because a Hebrew city would probably not have been cursed, since that implies extermination, some have suggested that it was a Canaanite town allied with one of the Israelite tribes. Although several identifications have been proposed, the location of Meroz is unknown; however, it must have been very near the scene of battle by the KISHON River.

Mesech. See MESHECH.

Mesha. mee'shuh (Heb. mêšā ᵐ H5392 [Gen. 10:30] and mêšā ᵐ H4791 [1 Chr. 8:9], derivation uncertain; mêša ᵐ H4795 [2 Ki. 3:4] and mêšā ᵐ H4796 [1 Chr. 2:42], "helper, savior"). (1) A place "in the east country" (prob. ARABIA) that, along with SEPHAR, served to delimit the territory occupied by the sons of JOKTAN, a descendant of SHEM through EBER (Gen. 10:30). Some have identified it with the MASSA of the Ishmaelite group (25:14).

(2) Firstborn son of CALEB and descendant of JUDAH (1 Chr. 2:42). The Hebrew text is difficult. See MARESHAH (PERSON).

(3) Son of SHAHARAIM and descendant of BENJAMIN; a family head (1 Chr. 8:9). Mesha was one of seven children that were born to Shaharaim in MOAB by his wife HODESH after he had divorced Hushim and Baara (v. 8).

(4) King of MOAB during the days of AHAB and his sons (2 Ki. 3:4, which also describes Mesha as a sheep breeder). In the famous MOABITE STONE, Mesha identifies himself as a Dibonite (see DIBON) and as the son of Chemosh[-yat], and says that his father had reigned thirty years before him (ANET, 320; the component -yat is restored from a fragmentary inscription found in KERAK). See CHEMOSH. From the time of DAVID (2 Sam. 8:2), Moab was subject to ISRAEL until the divided kingdom, when several peoples including Moab rebelled. But the mighty OMRI of the northern kingdom brought Moab again into subjection. After the country had been tributary to Israel for some forty years, the forceful King Mesha sought independence. The biblical record indicates that the tribute laid upon Mesha's people was exorbitant—an annual levy of 100,000 lambs and the wool of 100,000 rams (2 Ki. 3:4). According to the Moabite Stone, deliverance was effected after forty years of subjection to Israel, in the middle of the reign of Omri's son, meaning either AHAB or perhaps one of Omri's grandsons, AHAZIAH or Joram (JEHORAM). Whatever the exact date of Mesha's rebellion, it was during the reign of Ahab's second son, Joram, that the attempt was made to recover Moab to Israel (see 2 Ki. 1:17; 3:5). Joram secured the aid of JEHOSEPHAT of Judah, and the king of EDOM joined the two. The Moabites rushed to battle, but were repulsed with heavy loss, and took refuge in the strong city of KIR HARESETH. In desperate extremity, Mesha, having failed to break through the besiegers' lines, sacrificed his firstborn son. For an unrevealed reason, perhaps fearful for having occasioned human sacrifice, the allies retired, losing the fruits of victory (3:6-27).

Meshach. mee'shak (Heb. mêšak H4794 [Aram. H10415], derivation uncertain). A pagan name given to MISHAEL, one of DANIEL's companions taken by NEBUCHADNEZZAR to be trained in his palace as counselors to the king (Dan. 1:3-7 et al.). See ABEDNEGO.

Meshech. mee'shek (Heb. mešek H5434, meaning unknown; cf. Akk. Mušku). TNIV Meshek. (1) Son of JAPHETH and grandson of NOAH, included in the Table of Nations (Gen. 10:2; 1 Chr. 1:5); he became the eponymous ancestor of a people group in ASIA MINOR (Ps. 120:5; Ezek. 27:13; 32:26; 38:2-3; 39:1). Meshech is listed as the sixth son of Japheth, after TUBAL, and he is always associated with the latter in the book of EZEKIEL. The descendants of Meshech are identified with the Muškaya mentioned in Assyrian records (sometimes in association with the Tabalu) and with the Moschoi of the Greek tradition. They lived for several centuries in central Asia Minor, but were eventually pushed by their enemies into the mountainous area SE of the Black Sea. In Ezek. 38 and 39 the references to Meshech are especially interesting. Meshech and Tubal, now one people whose chief prince is GOG, seem to serve as some sort of symbol. As the dominant provinces in the land of M_{AGOG}, they represent all the anti-God forces in the world who are maliciously bent on destroying God's people. In apocalyptic fashion Ezekiel seems to be describing something that is to take place in the end time (Rev. 20:8).

(2) Son of A_{RAM} and grandson of S_{HEM}, included in the Table of Nations (Gen. 10:23 [so NIV, following LXX]; 1 Chr. 1:17). Many scholars, however, accept the MT reading (maš) in Genesis and emend 1 Chronicles accordingly. See M_{ASH}.

Meshek. mee'shek. TNIV form of M_{ESHECH}.

Meshelemiah. mi-shel'uh-mi'uh (Heb. mēšelemyâ H5452, "Yahweh repays [or replaces]"). Son of Kore, descendant of L_{EV}I through K_{ORAH} and A_{SAPH}, and head of a family of gatekeepers consisting of eighteen sons and relatives who are described as "able men" (1 Chr. 26:1-2, 9). Meshelemiah's firstborn, Z_{ECHARIAH}, had the distinction of being "the gatekeeper at the entrance to the Tent of Meeting" (9:21). Meshelemiah is elsewhere called S_{HELEMIAH} (26:14) and probably also S_{HALLUM} (9:19, apparently to be distinguished from the Shallum in vv. 17 and 31).

Meshezabeel. See M_{ESHEZABEL}.

Meshezabel. mi-shez'uh-bel (Heb. mēšêzab ʾēl H5430, "God delivers"). KJV Meshezabeel. (1) Father of Berehiah and grandfather of Meshullam; the latter is listed among those who made repairs to the wall of J_{ERUSALEM} (Neh. 3:4; cf. v. 30).

(2) One of the Israelite leaders who sealed the covenant with N_{EHEMIAH} (Neh. 10:21). He may be the same as #1 (note that the name of Z_{ADOK} is also mentioned in both passages).

(3) Descendant of J_{UDAH} through Z_{ERAH}; his son Pethahiah "was the king's agent in all affairs relating to the people" in the days of Nehemiah (Neh. 11:24).

Meshillemith, Meshillemoth. mi-shil'uh-mith, -moth (Heb. mēšillēmîṭ H5454 and mēšillēmôṭ H5451, “restitution”). (1) Son of IMMER and ancestor of MAASAI; the latter (apparently the same as AMASHSAI) was among the priests who resettled in JERUSALEM after the EXILE (1 Chr. 9:12; Neh. 11:13).

(2) Father of BEREKIAH; the latter was a leader in EPHRAIM during the reign of PEKAH who opposed the bringing of Judahite captives into SAMARIA (2 Chr. 28:12).

Meshobab. mi-shoh'bab (Heb. mēšôbāb H5411, prob. “brought back, restored”). A clan leader in the tribe of SIMEON (1 Chr. 4:34). He is listed first among those whose families increased greatly during the days of King HEZEKIAH and who dispossessed the Hamites and Meunites near GEDOR (vv. 38-41).

Meshullam. mi-shool'uhm (Heb. mēšullām H5450, “given as repayment” or “recompensed [by Yahweh]”). A very common name, especially after the EXILE. (1) Father of Azaliah and grandfather of SHAPHAN; the latter was secretary to King JOSIAH and brought to his attention the book of the law that HILKIAH the high priest had found in the temple (2 Ki. 22:3).

(2) Son of ZERUBBABEL and scion of the house of DAVID (1 Chr. 3:19).

(3) Son of Abihail; he was one of seven relatives from the tribe of GAD who occupied the region E of GILEAD (1 Chr. 5:13; cf. vv. 10, 14).

(4) Son of ELPAL, included in the genealogy of BENJAMIN (1 Chr. 8:17).

(5) Son (or descendant) of Hodaviah and father of SALLU; the latter is mentioned in a list of Benjamites who resettled in Jerusalem after the EXILE (1 Chr. 9:7). Elsewhere, in a similar list of Benjamites who apparently resettled in Jerusalem at a later time, Meshullam father of Sallu is identified as son (or descendant) of Joed (Neh. 11:7). It is possible that different people are meant; more likely, Sallu could be understood as an eponym or family name.

(6) Son of Shephatiah, listed among the Benjamites who resettled in Jerusalem (1 Chr. 9:8).

(7) Son of ZADOK and grandfather of AZARIAH; the latter is listed among the priests who resettled in Jerusalem and is described as “the official in charge of the house of God” (1 Chr. 9:11; Neh. 11:11 [the latter has SERAIAH instead of Azariah]). This Meshullam is probably the same as SHULLAM in the parallel lists (1 Chr. 6:12-13; Ezra 7:2).

(8) Son of Meshillemith and ancestor of Maasai; the latter is listed among the priests who resettled in Jerusalem (1 Chr. 9:12).

(9) A LEVITE descended from KOHATH who served as one of the overseers in repairing the house of the Lord during the reign of JOSIAH (2 Chr. 34:12).

(10) One of a group of leaders sent by EZRA to IDDO to get attendants for the house of God (Ezra 8:16).

(11) One of the men who apparently challenged Ezra's instruction that those who had married foreign women should divorce them (Ezra 10:15). The Hebrew text, however, can be understood differently. See comments under JAHZEIAH.

(12) One of the descendants of BANI who agreed to put away their foreign wives (Ezra 10:29).

(13) Son of Berekiah; he is mentioned as having made repairs to two sections of the wall of Jerusalem (Neh. 3:4, 30). Meshullam's daughter was given in marriage to Jehohanan son of TOBIAH, NEHEMIAH's opponent (6:18).

(14) Son of Besodiah; he and JOIADA son of Paseah repaired the Jeshanah Gate (Neh. 3:6). See OLD GATE.

(15) One of the prominent men who stood near EZRA when the law was read at the great assembly (Neh. 8:4).

(16-17) The name of one of the priests and of one of the lay Israelite leaders who signed the covenant of Nehemiah (Neh. 10:7, 20). Perhaps either of these men should be identified with one of the individuals mentioned above.

(18-19) The name of two heads of priestly families (respectively the family of Ezra and the family of Ginnethon) in the time of the high priest JOIAKIM (Neh. 12:13, 16).

(20) One of the Levitical "gatekeepers who guarded the storerooms at the gates" (Neh. 12:25).

(21) A leader of Judah who took part in the procession at the dedication of the wall (Neh. 12:34). Perhaps he should be identified with #17 above.

Meshullemeth. mi-shool'uh-mith (Heb. mēšullemet H5455, fem. of MESHULLAM). Daughter of HARUZ, from JOTBAH; she was married to King MANASSEH and gave birth to AMON (2 Ki. 21:19).

Mesobaite. See MEZOBAITE.

Mesopotamia. mes'uh-puh-tay'mee-uh (Gk. Mesopotamia G3544, "between rivers," used by the LXX to render aram nahārayim H808, "Aram of the [two] rivers,” and paddan ʾārām H7020, possibly “open country of Aram”). The land around and between the TIGRIS and EUPHRATES Rivers. This term is used in most English versions to render the name ARAM NAHARAIM (Gen. 24:10; Deut. 23:4; Jdg. 3:8; 1 Chr. 19:6; Ps. 60 [title]). It occurs also in the KJV and RSV at Jdg. 3:10, where the Hebrew has only the name ARAM; the context makes it clear, however, that this is the same place mentioned in v. 8. Mesopotamia could refer to anything from modern E Turkey to the Persian Gulf. When it is used in the Bible, usually the northern parts are understood.

According to Gen. 24:10, ABRAHAM’s servant went to Mesopotamia to find a wife for ISAAC and came to the town of Nahor, a place mentioned in the MARI texts and located near the Balikh tributary of the Euphrates (see NAHOR #3). BALAAM’s home town of PETHOR of Mesopotamia (Deut. 23:4) is in the same vicinity. The judgeship of OTHNIEL was occasioned by the aggression and oppression of CUSHAN-RISHATHAIM, a king of Mesopotamia (Jdg. 3:8). The king’s name has not yet been attested nor is any definition of his realm certain. Mesopotamia was the Ammonites’ source of chariots and horsemen when they battled with DAVID (1 Chr. 19:6-7). The context of the name Aram Naharaim in the title of Ps. 60 connects this passage with 2 Sam. 8:5.

Mesopotamia has gone under various names throughout its long history. In the beginning it was mostly SUMER in the extreme S, AKKAD in the middle, and Subartu in the NW. In the second millennium B.C., BABYLON was the power in the lower half and Mitanni in the N. With the turn of the millennium, ASSYRIA in the N gained control of the whole but lost it again to Neo-Babylonia in 587 B.C. This was followed by the Persian, Hellenistic, and Roman rules. The Greek name occurs twice in the NT (Acts 2:9; 7:2). Today most of Mesopotamia is in Iraq, with small parts in Syria and Turkey.

messenger. This English term is usually the rendering of Hebrew mal'āk H4855 and Greek angelos G34 or apostolos G693 (see ANGEL; APOSTLE). It may refer to a bearer of news, as when JOB was told of the disasters that fell on his property and family (Job 1:13-19) or when DAVID was notified of ABSALOM's rebellion (2 Sam. 15:13). A messenger may be a bringer of requests, as from MOSES to the king of EDOM (Num. 20:14) or to SIHON (Num. 21:21; Deut. 2:26) to go through their country, or from David when his men asked toll from NABAL for having protected him (1 Sam. 25:14). A messenger of God might be a teaching priest (Mal. 2:7). He is synonymous with a prophet in the summary of the divine appeal (2 Chr. 6:15-16), as was JOHN THE BAPTIST (Mal. 3:1 quoted in Matt. 11:10), though Christ is the messenger of the COVENANT (Mal. 3:1). A messenger might be an appointee of the churches, as in the collection for the Jerusalem saints (2 Cor. 8:23) or a church gift to the apostle (Phil. 4:18).

Messiah. muh-si'uh (Heb. māšīaḥ H5431, “anointed one”; almost always rendered by the LXX with christos G5986, same meaning; the Gk. NT, in addition, uses twice the transliteration Messias G3549 [Jn. 1:41; 4:25]). The KJV uses this term in only one passage in the OT (Dan. 9:25-26), and the variant form “Messias” in two NT passages that have the Greek transliteration Messias (Jn. 1:41; 4:25); the RSV and the NIV use “Messiah” only in the two verses in John. By contrast, such versions as the NRSV and TNIV use the term over sixty times in the NT to render Greek Christos, presumably when the translators believe that this Greek word functions as a title (e.g., Matt. 1:1; Mk. 14:61; Lk. 2:11; Jn. 1:20; Acts 2:31; Rom. 9:5; Rev. 11:15); the rendering “Christ” is then reserved for the many passages where it functions as a name. Drawing the distinction between these two senses is sometimes difficult. It is sometimes argued that even the combination Jesus Christ should always be rendered “Jesus the Messiah.”

In ancient ISRAEL both persons and things consecrated to sacred purposes were anointed by having OIL poured over them. See ANOINT. When the TABERNACLE was dedicated, the building, its various parts, and the holy vessels were anointed (Exod. 30:26-30; 40:9-11). Official persons were consecrated with oil. Sometimes PROPHETS were anointed when they were consecrated (1 Ki. 19:16). The statement in Isa. 61:1 “The LORD has anointed me to preach good news to the poor” is an allusion to this practice. PRIESTS were also anointed with oil for their office (Exod. 29:21; Lev. 8:30). The KINGS apparently were anointed regularly (1 Sam. 9:16; 16:3; 2 Sam. 12:7; 1 Ki. 1:34). The king was “the Lord’s anointed” in a special sense, and in the OT the primary significance of this expression refers to the earthly king who is reigning over the Lord’s people. It is a reference to the king’s close relationship to the Lord and to the sacral character of his position and person. The Israelites did not think of crowning a king but of anointing him when he was enthroned. The fact that he was anointed was the essential characteristic of the ruler.

Where such expressions as “the Lord’s anointed,” “my anointed,” “your anointed,” occur in the OT, the reference is not used as a technical designation of the Messiah, but refers to the king of the line of DAVID, ruling in JERUSALEM, and anointed by the Lord through the priest. ISAIAH uses the term only once, and then of the Persian CYRUS (Isa. 45:1). Later the expression “Son of David” was a synonym for “Messiah” (Matt. 21:9; Mk. 10:47-48). It is obvious that there must be some historical connection between the designation “the Lord’s anointed” (and similar expressions) and the title “Messiah.” The latter term apparently is a later expression and is an abbreviation of the fuller title “the Lord’s anointed.” It shows that the Messiah of Israel’s messianic hope derived his name from the sacral title of the kings of David’s line. With the possible exception of Dan. 9:25-26, the title “Messiah” as a reference to Israel’s eschatological king does not occur in the OT. It appears in this sense later in the NT and in the literature of JUDAISM. In the NT the Messiah is “the Christ,” its Greek equivalent.

Closely related to the eschatological character of the Messiah is his political significance. He will destroy the world powers in an act of judgment, deliver Israel from her enemies, and restore her as a nation. The Messiah is the king of this future kingdom to whose political and religious domination the other nations will yield. See KINGDOM OF GOD. His mission is the redemption of Israel and his dominion is universal. This is the clear picture of the Messiah in practically all of the OT passages that refer to him. The Messiah will put an end to war, for he is the Prince of Peace, and he will rule righteously over his people. He himself is righteous and is called the righteous Messiah or the Messiah of righteousness (Jer. 23:6). But this implies more than just a judgment and government of his people. The term RIGHTEOUSNESS when used in connection with the Messiah is inseparably related to SALVATION. The Messiah will establish the right of his people against any foe from without or within. He will establish this salvation and maintain it in the face of all opposing forces. Righteousness and salvation are the same because the Messiah's righteousness is declared in his saving acts. Jewish writers have made much of this with reference to Mal. 4:2. At the same time it is often emphasized that by his righteousness the Messiah will establish justice and righteousness, in the ethical sense, in the land. Sin will be rooted out, and Israel will become a holy people.

Perhaps the most profound spiritual work of the Messiah is seen in his position as the intermediary between God and the people by interceding for them. This is the Aramaic Targum's interpretation of Isa. 53, but this chapter is much more profound than the Jewish exegetes seemed to realize. It is true that the Targum on Isaiah identifies the SERVANT OF THE LORD with the Messiah and that it uses this expression as a title of the Messiah, but his suffering is interpreted merely as the danger and anxiety that are his lot in the war with the ungodly. There is no real distinction here between the suffering of the Servant and the suffering the prophets of Israel experienced in fulfilling their mission. But what Isaiah said of the suffering of the Servant of the Lord is infinitely more significant than this. In the Suffering Servant the Messiah is seen making vicarious atonement through his passion and death, which has a positive purpose in the plan of God for the salvation of sinful men. The Messiah as the Suffering Servant sums up the entire prophetic movement and constitutes a climax in OT prophecy.

The progress of prophetic revelation in history leads up to the idea of the innocent Suffering Servant of God, who in the redemptive purpose of his death reconciles sinners to God. In the Messiah's SACRIFICE of himself as an expiation for sin his priestly office is revealed and combined with his work as prophet and king. The redemptive work of the Messiah includes the restoration of the paradise that existed in the beginning but was lost through the fall of ADAM. Through the Messiah the kingdom of the end time will be established, the kingdom of God on earth, the restoration of Israel. As the Messiah was present from the first in the creation so he is also present as the central figure of the last events. He is declared to be the firstborn of creation and also the end and goal of creation (Jn. 1:1; Col. 1:15-17; Rev. 3:14).

The NT conception of the Messiah is developed directly from the teaching of the OT. The essential features of the OT picture of the Messiah are in the person of Jesus. The suffering, dying, and glorified Servant of the Lord of the OT is that same NT SON OF MAN who will return on the clouds of heaven. The Messiah, as the Son of Man, will suffer, die, and rise again on the third day, "according to the Scriptures." But even though Jesus was victorious over death in his resurrection and ascension, he did not yet reign in his full messiahship in his righteous kingdom. His ultimate victory is revealed to be in the future, and consequently he must come again in power to establish his messianic throne and kingdom. Jesus often used the phrase "the Son of Man" to express his interpretation of his nature and his part in the coming of God's kingdom. It seems that Jesus preferred this title in referring to himself. He did not use it primarily to express his humanity; on the contrary, it was a proclamation of the paradox that he, who appeared as an ordinary man, was at the same time the One in whom there are supernatural powers of the kingdom of God. He who took on himself the form of a man will some day be revealed as “the Son of Man” with power and glory. The title, then, is an expression for the triumphant Messiah who comes on the clouds in the majesty of his exaltation.

The expression “the Son of Man” used of the Messiah reflects the general picture in the NT of a more profound view of his person. The Messiah as the Son of Man is a preexistent heavenly being. Long before Abraham, Jesus said, the Son of Man was (Jn. 8:58; cf. Jn. 17:5; Col. 1:17). The origin of creation is linked with the Messiah Jesus in various Scriptures (1 Cor. 8:6; 2 Cor. 8:9; Col. 1:15-17). It is also as preexistent that Jesus is called “elect” (1 Pet. 2:6; NIV, “chosen”). God has prepared him to carry out his purpose in redemption and eschatological judgment. Furthermore, the Messiah is revealed to be the Son of Man in a unique sense (Jn. 1:1; Rom. 1:4). Jesus affirmed this in his conversation with the priests and elders. Jesus was asked to declare if he was “the Messiah, the Son of God” (Matt. 26:63-64; Mk. 14:61; Lk. 22:67-70), and his claim is clear. As the SON OF GOD, the Messiah possesses the power of God’s authority. It is as the Son of God that the divine nature of the Messiah is supremely revealed.

Messianic Banquet. A term used sometimes to refer to “the wedding supper of the Lamb” (Rev. 19:9) or more generally to the festivities of the end time, which are often symbolized by means of a meal. In the ANE, it was not uncommon for kings to celebrate a military victory by providing a great banquet (cf. 1 Chr. 12:38-40; 3 Macc. 6:30-41), and this notion was transferred to the gods in some myths. It was only natural that the symbol should be used to depict Yahweh’s eschatological celebration (Isa. 25:6, 8; cf. Rev. 21:4). The theme becomes prominent in APOCALYPTIC LITERATURE and is picked up in the NT. Jesus promises that those “who hunger now...will be satisfied” (Lk. 6:21); he also compares the kingdom of heaven to “a king who prepared a wedding banquet for his son” (Matt. 22:1; cf. Lk. 14:16). The imagery is especially prominent in the book of Revelation (see Rev. 19:6-7).

messianic secret. A term used in biblical scholarship to refer to those passages in the Gospels where Jesus tells his followers not to publicize his miracles (or other extraordinary details). This feature is especially prominent in Mark (e.g., Mk. 1:43-44; 5:43; 7:36; 8:30; 9:9), and it has led to considerable debate regarding its significance. The phrase is especially associated with Wilhelm Wrede, who in 1901 argued that the element of secrecy was invented and added to the tradition in order to account for the lack of evidence that Jesus had proclaimed himself as the MESSIAH. Although this theory was generally rejected in its original form, it has exerted profound influence in NT scholarship, mainly because it showed that the secrecy motif required some kind of theological explanation.

Messias. See MESSIAH.

metals. See MINERALS.

Metheg Ammah. mee'thig-am'uh (Heb. meteg hā'ammâ H5497, possibly “bridle of the forearm [or cubit]”). An otherwise unknown town that DAVID took from the control of the PHILISTINES (2 Sam. 8:1). Instead of this name, the parallel passage has “Gath and its surrounding villages” (1 Chr. 18:1), leading some to speculate that GATH was considered the “mother city” of the Philistines (cf. ASV, but the form ammâ never means “mother” in the OT). Some argue that the words should be translated as common nouns, referring to one cubit’s length of a bridle and symbolizing either friendship or surrender.

Methusael. See METHUSHAEL.

Methuselah. mi-thoo'suh-luh (Heb. mētûšelaḥ H5500, possibly “man of the javelin”; Gk. Mathousala G3417). Son of ENOCH, descendant of SETH, and grandfather of NOAH (Gen. 5:21-22, 25-27; 1 Chr. 1:3; included in Luke’s GENEALOGY OF JESUS CHRIST, Lk. 3:37). In the ANTEDELUVIAN age of unusual longevity, Methuselah lived 969 years, longer than any other (Gen. 5:27). Some believe that the second element in his name (šelaḥ) is a divine proper name indicating idolatry. In later APOCALYPTIC LITERATURE, Methuselah plays an important role.

Methushael. mi-thoo'shay-uhl (Heb. mētûšā'ēl H5499, possibly “man of God”). KJV Methusael. Son of MEHUJAEI, descendant of CAIN, and father of LAMECH (Gen. 4:18). Some have speculated that Methushael and METHUSELAH represent different traditions arising from the same name.

Meunim. mi-yoo'nim (Heb. mē'ûnîm H5064, apparently the gentilic pl. of a name such as mā'ôn H5062; see MAON). In the NIV, the Hebrew term is rendered “Meunim” only twice, namely, in parallel passages that list the descendants of temple servants (NETHINIM) who returned from the EXILE (Ezra 2:50 [KJV, “Mehunim”]; Neh. 7:52). Apparently, the NIV regards Meunim here as a personal name referring to the ancestor of that family. It is possible, however, that in these passages, as elsewhere, the name is that of a non-Israelite people group. See MEUNITES.

Meunites. mi-yoo´nits (Heb. mē ʿônîm H5064, apparently the gentilic pl. of a name such as mā ʿôn H5062; see MAON). Also MEUNIM (for no obvious reason, the NRSV has “Meunim” in 1 Chr. 4:41, but “Meunites” in 2 Chr. 20:1; 26:7). A minor desert tribe of uncertain origin. This people group occupied an area SE of the DEAD SEA on the eastern border of EDOM whose chief city was Maʿan (about 12 mi./19 km. SE of PETRA). The Meunites were not Edomites, but apparently had such close relations with the people of Mount SEIR that they were in danger of being identified with them. It is possible, but disputed by some, that the Meunites were the same as the MAONITES who oppressed the Israelites in the time of the judges (Jdg. 10:12).

The Simeonites seem to have dispossessed one group of the Meunites and occupied their territory (1 Chr. 4:41; the KJV here understands the name as a common noun, hammē ʿônîm, “the habitations”). On another occasion some of the Meunites joined forces with the Moabites and Ammonites to attack Judah (2 Chr. 20:1, where the MT reads “Ammonites” [cf. KJV], which seems redundant in context; most scholars emend to “Meunites” on the basis of the LXX and of 26:7 [KJV, “Mehunims”]). In the reign of King UZZIAH (c. 783-742 B.C.) the Meunites are mentioned, along with the PHILISTINES and ARABIANS, as being troublesome to Judah again (26:7). The passage records that Uzziah was successful in his campaign against them, and it is thought that he may have taken a number of them prisoners and given them to the temple priests as servants (cf. Num. 31:30; Josh. 9:27; Ezra 8:20; and see NETHINIM). This assumption would help to explain the presence of descendants from the Meunites among the temple servants who returned after the EXILE (Ezra 2:50; Neh. 7:52), although some think that the reference here is to descendants of CALEB associated with the town of Maon. See MAON (PLACE). In these passages, however, the NIV and the NRSV have “Meunim,” as though it were the name of an ancestor.

Me-Zahab. mee´zuh-hab (Heb. mê zāhāb H4771, “waters of gold”). Grandfather of MEHETABEL, who was the wife of Hadad (Hadar) king of EDOM (Gen. 36:39; 1 Chr. 1:50). See HADAD (PERSON). The name, however, would seem to refer to a place. The description of MATRED as the daughter of Me-Zahab might mean that the latter was Matred's native city.

Mezobaite. mi-zoh´bay-it (Heb. mēšōbāyâ H5168, derivation uncertain). KJV Mesobaite. A descriptive title identifying JAAZIEL, one of David's mighty warriors (1 Chr. 11:47). If the adjective is a gentilic of šōbâ H7420, the form is anomalous, so many scholars conjecture that the original was miššōbah, "from Zobah" (cf. 2 Sam. 23:36). Several of David's warriors in the latter part of the list seem to have come from TRANSJORDAN, so it is indeed possible that Jaaziel was an ARAMEAN from the kingdom of ZOBAB.

mezuzah. muh-zoo´zuh. Plural mezuzot. This term does not occur in English versions of the Bible. It is a transliteration of Hebrew mēzûzâ H4647 ("doorpost"), used, for example, for the doorframes of ordinary houses where the blood of the Passover sacrifice was sprinkled (Exod. 12:7, 22-23), or where the law was to be written (Deut. 6:9; 11:20; cf. Prov. 8:34; Ezek. 43:12). The doorposts of a building, like the THRESHOLD, evidently had a special significance, bordering on sacredness. In the course of time the term mezuzah came to mean the small container of portions of Scripture which orthodox Jews still attach to the doorposts of their home (Deut. 6:9; 11:20).

Miamin. See MIJAMIN.

Mibhar. mib´hahr (Heb. mibḥār H4437, "choice, special"). Son of Hagri; he is included in the list of DAVID's mighty warriors (1 Chr. 11:38). The name does not appear in the parallel passage (2 Sam. 23:36; see HAGRI).

Mibsam. mib´sam (Heb. mibśām H4452, "fragrant"). (1) Son of ISHMAEL and grandson of ABRAHAM (Gen. 25:13; 1 Chr. 1:29). The twelve sons of Ishmael became the eponymous ancestors of tribes in N ARABIA. See also below, #2.

(2) Son of SHAUL or, more likely, of SHALLUM; included in the genealogy of SIMEON (1 Chr. 4:25). Because the name MISHMA occurs in connection with both this Mibsam and #1 above, some scholars speculate that #1 and #2 refer to the same clan. According to this view, the Ishmaelite or Arabian clans of Mibsam and Mishma inhabited the NEGEV; when the tribe of Simeon occupied this region, these clans somehow became integrated into the Simeonite genealogy.

Mibzar. mib'zahr (Heb. mibṣār H4449, possibly “fortress”). Descendant of ESAU, listed among the clan chiefs of EDOM (Gen. 36:42; 1 Chr. 1:53). His name may have been preserved in an ancient locality known as Mabsara (a large village subject to PETRA); others have suggested BOZRA.

Mica. mi'kuh (Heb. mîkâ H4775, short form of mîkâyāhû H4780, “who is like Yahweh?”). KJV also Micha; TNIV Mika. (1) Son of MEPHIBOSHETH (2 Sam. 9:12). See MICAH #2.

(2) Son of Zicri (or Zabdi), descendant of ASAPH, and father of MATTANIAH; the latter is listed among the LEVITES who resettled in Jerusalem after the EXILE and is described as being responsible for leading in thanksgiving and prayer (1 Chr. 9:15 [KJV, “Micah”]; Neh. 11:17; in the latter reference, the name is spelled mîkâ). One of his descendants, UZZI son of Bani, became chief officer of the Levites (11:22). This Mica is probably the same as MICAIAH son of Zaccur, whose descendant, ZECHARIAH son of Jonathan, participated in the procession at the dedication of the wall (Neh. 12:35).

(3) A Levite who affixed his seal to the covenant of NEHEMIAH (Neh. 10:11). Because of the chronological differences, this Mica cannot be the same as #2 above.

Micah. mi'kuh (Heb. mîkâ H4777, short form of mîkâyāhû H4780, “who is like Yahweh?”). KJV also Michah. (1) An Ephraimite who set up an idolatrous shrine, and whose idols were used by the Danites when they resettled in LAISH (Jdg. 17-18). Micah had stolen 1,100 pieces of silver from his mother, who pronounced a curse on the thief. He then returned the money to her, and she used 200 pieces of the silver to make “a carved image and a cast idol” (17:3), which were put in Micah’s house. Micah also made an EPHOD and some TERAPHIM, and even made one of his sons priest of this shrine. Some time later, a Levite from BETHLEHEM became Micah’s priest. When five Danites in search of a new home for their tribe obtained a favorable oracle from the Levite, they returned with 600 armed men and offered him employment as priest in their new tribal territory. They took with them Micah’s ephod, teraphim, and the carved image. Micah was helpless to prevent this action. He pursued after them, but was warned that interference would cost him his goods and his life. Micah’s idols became a shrine in the city of Laish. See DAN.

(2) Son of MERIB-BAAH (MEPHIBOSHETH) and descendant of King SAUL through JONATHAN; he had four sons (1 Chr. 8:34-35; 9:40-41). He is also called MICA (2 Sam. 9:12).

(3) Son of Shimei, descendant of REUBEN through Joel, and ancestor of Beerah; the latter was a Reubenite leader who was taken into exile by the Assyrians under TIGLATH-PILESER (1 Chr. 5:4-6).

(4) Son of Uzziel and descendant of LEVI; he served during the latter part of DAVID's reign (1 Chr. 23:20; 24:24-25).

(5) Son of Imlah (2 Chr. 18:14 Heb.); see MI-CAIAH #2.

(6) Father of Abdon; the latter was one of JOSIAH's messengers to HULDAH (2 Chr. 34:20; also called MICAIAH, 2 Ki. 22:12).

(7) Son of Zicri (or Zabdi) and father of Mattaniah (1 Chr. 9:15 KJV; Neh. 11:17 Heb.); see MICA #2.

(8) Micah the MORASTHITE, prophet (Jer. 26:18; Mic. 1:1). See MICAHA, BOOK OF.

Micah, Book of. Sixth book of the Minor Prophets, dating from the late eighth century B.C. The book predicts the fall of SAMARIA, which occurred in 722, but concerns more especially the sins and dangers of JERUSALEM in the days of HEZEKIAH around 700. As the following outline shows, the message varies between condemnation for the present sins and God's purpose of ultimate blessing for his people.

I. Predicted desolation of Samaria and Jerusalem (Mic. 1:1—3:12)

II. Eventual blessings for Zion (4:1-8)

III. Invasion and deliverance by Davidic ruler (4:9—5:15)

IV. Condemnations for sins (6:1—7:6)

V. Eventual help from God (7:7-20)

In the opening portion of the book, Mic. 1:1—3:12, God's judgment is first announced on Samaria for her IDOLATRY. Micah's interest seems to lie chiefly in Jerusalem, however, whose desolation is announced in 3:12 in very similar terms. Chapters 2 and 3 are a catalogue of Judah's sins. Oppression of the poor was a characteristic, but another basic factor was the refusal to hear God's prophets. As in JEREMIAH's day, they preferred prophets who predicted peace (cf. 3:5 with Jer. 8:10-11; Ezek. 13:10). It is not improbable that Jeremiah and EZEKIEL took their texts on this subject from Micah. At least Micah's warnings of Mic. 3:12 were well known in Jeremiah's day (Jer. 26:18). Jeremiah's friends quote these words verbatim, ascribing them to the Micah of Hezekiah's time. Some critics point out that Jeremiah quotes Micah as a prophet of doom, and they conclude that no prediction of hope in Micah is genuine. The conclusion seems far-fetched. Jeremiah's friends quoted only that part of the book that was applicable to their situation. This argument need not be extended to the rest of the book.

The second section, Mic. 4:1-8, includes a passage that is practically identical with Isa. 2:1-4. Many have questioned whether Micah quoted Isaiah or vice versa, or whether both quoted a common oracle. But Isa. 2:1 calls this passage the word of Isaiah, which should decide the matter. Micah evidently uses Isaiah's promise and skillfully weaves it into his own composition.

The third section, Mic. 4:9—5:15, comes against the background of the wars of Hezekiah's day. The Assyrians had captured the fortified cities of JUDAH and received tribute from Hezekiah (2 Ki. 18:13-16), but God delivered Jerusalem (18:35). The "seven shepherds, even eight leaders of men" of Mic. 5:5 probably is merely a symbolic numerical way of saying "one great deliverer"—a numerical device that can be paralleled in old Canaanite literature. Yet in this section the EXILE and return from BABYLON are also predicted. Some scholars insist that similar passages in Isaiah (e.g., Isa. 48:20) are late and actually written after the events described. In their denial of supernatural prediction, they must also say that Mic. 4:10 is late. But according to Isa. 39:6 and also by Assyrian testimony, Babylon was a menace in Micah's own day; so these verses are quite appropriate. Against these dangers to Judah, God holds out that messianic hope of Mic. 5:2. The mention of BETHLEHEM Ephrathah identifies the MESSIAH as of DAVID's line (cf. Isa. 11:1; Jer. 23:5; Ezek. 37:24).

A general view of the region around Bethlehem, where Micah prophesied that Messiah would be born (Mic. 5:2).

Overview of MICAH

Author: The prophet Micah from the Judahite town of MORESHETH GATH.

Historical setting: A contemporary of ISAIAH, Micah received his revelations during the last decades of the eighth century B.C. and the early years of the seventh. Thus he lived through the decline and fall of the northern kingdom of ISRAEL, and prophesied during the reigns of JOTHAM, AHAZ, and HEZEKIAH, kings of JUDAH (Mic. 1:1). The composition of the book should probably be dated prior to the death of Hezekiah (c. 687 B.C. or perhaps ten years earlier).

Purpose: To denounce the sin and predict the destruction of both Israel and Judah, but also to announce the hope of messianic salvation.

Contents: Condemnation of SAMARIA and JERUSALEM (Mic. 1-3), followed by promises of restoration (chs. 4-5); God's complaints against Israel (6:1—7:7), followed by a psalm of hope and praise (7:8-20).

The condemnations of the fourth section (Mic. 6:1—7:6) include several references to the PENTATEUCH and other historical books (6:4-5, 16; cf. also 5:6 with Gen. 10:8-9). The response of Mic. 6:8 is famous. Some have argued that it teaches SALVATION apart from SACRIFICE. Actually, it alludes to Deut. 10:12 and involves Israel's duty to obey all the Mosaic injunctions. Christ probably refers to this verse in his condemnation of the PHARISEES (Matt. 23:23).

The book closes (Mic. 7:7-20) with the prophet's declaration of faith in the ultimate fulfillment of God's covenant of blessing for Abraham.

Micaiah. mi-kay'yuh (Heb. mîkāyâ H4779 [2 Ki. 22:12; Neh. 12:35, 41], mîkāyāhû H4780 [2 Chr. 17:7], elsewhere mîkāyhû H4781, "who is like Yahweh?"). KJV also Michaiah. (1) An Ephraimite (Jdg. 17:1, 4, Heb.); see MICAH #1.

(2) Son of Imlah, prophet (1 Ki. 22:8-26; 2 Chr. 18:7-25 [in v. 14 the Heb. has the short form mîkâ]). This man performed a deed which took great courage and unwavering faith in the Lord as God. King JEHOSHAPHAT, though a man of God, had made the mistake of associating with AHAB, the worst of all the kings of ISRAEL. (Contrast 2 Chr. 17:3-6 with 1 Ki. 16:30-33.) Ahab took advantage of Jehoshaphat's visit by asking his assistance in taking RAMOTH GILEAD from the ARAMEANS, whose king BEN-HADAD I had captured it from Ahab's father OMRI. Jehoshaphat, letting his courtesy overcome his good judgment, consented, asking only that the prophets be consulted. Four hundred of Ahab's false prophets said, "Go, for the Lord will give it into the king's hand" (1 Ki. 22:6). When Jehoshaphat showed his distrust in the prophets and asked if there was not a prophet of the Lord also, Ahab replied, "There is still one man through whom we can inquire of the LORD, but I hate him because he never prophesies anything good about me, but always bad. He is Micaiah son of Imlah” (22:8). A messenger was sent to bring Micaiah, who was told to prophesy favorably, but Micaiah replied that he could speak only what God would give him. At first Micaiah responded frivolously to Ahab’s question (22:15), but when the king demanded the truth, Micaiah told him how the hosts of heaven had planned to ruin Ahab by putting a false spirit in the mouth of all his prophets. Micaiah, after being insulted by the false prophet Zedekiah, was sent back to the city to be imprisoned and fed only bread and water until the king returned to deal with him. Micaiah boldly replied, “If you ever return safely, the LORD has not spoken through me” (22:28). Since Ahab partly believed this prophecy, he contrived a clever trick to get Jehoshaphat killed in his place. With a show of generosity he proposed that Jehoshaphat wear his kingly robes in the battle, but Ahab would disguise himself like a common soldier. The outcome was that Jehoshaphat cried out and escaped, but an Aramean drew his bow at random and the arrow killed Ahab (22:34-35).

(3) Mother of King ABIJAH of Judah (2 Chr. 13:2 NRSV; KJV, “Michaiah”; NIV, “Maacah,” following some versional evidence). See MAACAH #9.

(4) One of five officials sent by King JEHOSHAPHAT “to teach in the towns of Judah” (2 Chr. 17:7).

(5) Son of Zaccur and father of Mattaniah; his descendant, ZECHARIAH son of Jonathan, participated in the procession at the dedication of the wall (Neh. 12:35). See MICA #2.

(6) A priest who played the trumpet at the dedication of the wall (Neh. 12:41).

(7) Father of Acbor; the latter was one of JOSIAH’s messengers to HULDAH (2 Ki. 22:12); also called MICAHA (2 Chr. 34:20).

(8) Son of GEMARIAH, grandson of SHAPHAN, and a contemporary of JEREMIAH (Jer. 36:11, 13). Micaiah carried Jeremiah’s message to the princes gathered at the palace of King JEHOIAKIM. The princes then called for the sermon to be read to them. Some have proposed that this Micaiah is the same as #7 above.

Michael. mi'kay-uhl, mi'kuhl (Heb. mîkā ʾēl H4776, “who is like God?”; Gk. Michaēl G3640). (1) Father of Sethur, who was one of the twelve spies sent out to reconnoiter the Promised Land; he represented the tribe of ASHER (Num. 13:13).

(2) Son of Abihail; he was one of seven relatives from the tribe of GAD who occupied the region E of GILEAD (1 Chr. 5:13; cf. vv. 10, 14).

(3) Son of Jeshishai and ancestor of #2 above (1 Chr. 5:14).

(4) Son of Baaseiah, descendant of LEVI through GERSHON, and great-grandfather of ASAPH the singer (1 Chr. 6:40).

(5) Son of Izrahiah and descendant of ISSACHAR; a military chief (1 Chr. 7:3).

(6) Son of Beriah and descendant of BENJAMIN, listed among the heads of families living in postexilic Jerusalem (1 Chr. 8:16; cf. v. 28). His father and uncle, however, are described as “heads of families of those living in Aijalon and who drove out the inhabitants of Gath” (v. 13).

(7) One of several warriors from the tribe of MANASSEH who joined DAVID at ZIKLAG; they are described as “leaders of units of a thousand” (1 Chr. 12:20).

(8) Father of Omri; the latter was an officer over the tribe of ISSACHAR during the reign of David (1 Chr. 27:18).

(9) Son of JEHOSHAPHAT, king of Judah (1 Chr. 21:2). He and his brothers received a very generous inheritance (v. 3). Jehoshaphat’s firstborn, JEHORAM, killed all his brothers when he became king (v. 4).

(10) Descendant of Shephatiah; his son Zebadiah was one of the family heads who returned to Jerusalem with EZRA (Ezra 8:8).

(11) An angel. The book of DANIEL refers to Michael as a (great) prince (Dan. 10:13, 21; 12:1). The NT refers to him as “the archangel Michael” (Jude 9) and elsewhere speaks of “Michael and his angels” (Rev. 12:7). See ANGEL. PAUL does not expressly mention Michael but makes reference to “the archangel” (1 Thess. 4:16; the Bible never uses the pl. “archangels”). The Bible also names GABRIEL as an important angel (Dan. 8:16; 9:21; Lk. 1:19, 26). During Israel’s unprecedented “time of distress” (Dan. 12:1; cf. Jer. 30:7; Matt. 24:21), Michael will be active for her welfare when SATAN is seeking to destroy her (Rev. 12:7-9). Jude 9 speaks of Michael resisting the devil, but committing the judgment of him to the Lord. The dispute involved the body of MOSES, an incident nowhere mentioned in the OT.

Michah. See MICAH.

Michaiah. See MICAIAH.

Michal. mi'kuhl (Heb. mīkal H4783, “who is like God?”). Younger daughter of King SAUL (1 Sam. 14:49). Saul, insanely jealous of DAVID, desired to kill him but, finding it impossible to do so by his own hands (18:11), he tried trickery. He offered David his elder daughter MERAB for his service against the PHILISTINES, but changed his mind and gave her to another; then he learned that Michal loved David, so he offered her to David if he would give evidence of having killed a hundred Philistines. David killed two hundred and married Michal; but Saul hated him all the more. Once, when Saul sent some men to kill David, Michal helped him to escape (19:11-17), deceiving Saul’s officers by putting an idol in his bed. Though Michal truly loved David, she could not comprehend him, and so scoffed at him for rejoicing before the Lord (2 Sam. 6:16-23). As a result, she never had a child.

Michmas, Michmash. mik'mas, mik'mash. See MICMASH.

Michmethah, Michmethath. See MICMETHATH.

Michri. See MICRI.

michtam. See MIKTAM.

Micmash. mik'mash (Heb. mikmās H4820 [only Ezra 2:27; Neh.7:31] and mikmāś H4825, possibly “hidden place”). TNIV Mikmash; other versions have Michmas or Michmash (the final consonant in both Hebrew forms is properly represented in English with s and not with sh, but the latter has become traditional). The name of a town and of a pass c. 6 mi. (10 km.) SE of BETHEL within the tribal territory of BENJAMIN. The town apparently was not a large enough town to warrant mention in the list of Benjamite cities. Its only real claim to fame is in the battle that was fought there by SAUL and JONATHAN against the PHILISTINES (1 Sam. 13:1—14:35). The town does receive brief mention elsewhere (Isa. 10:28-29; Ezra 2:27; Neh. 7:31; 11:31). Biblical Micmash is modern Khirbet el-Hara el-Fawqa, just N of the Arab town of Mukhmas. On the S side of Mukhmas is the narrow canyon of the Wadi es-Suweini[†], a deep ravine that joins the Wadi Qelt and empties into the JORDAN near JERICHO. To the SW of Micmash is GEB^A, situated on another hill. A knowledge of this geography is helpful in understanding the battle of Micmash, when Jonathan took his armor-bearer, made his way across the pass, and scaled the precipitous N wall in front of the town. The two of them made a surprise attack on the garrison and killed twenty men (14:14). This threw the whole Philistine army into panic and they raced westward to escape. It was then that Saul and his men joined in the chase and “the LORD rescued Israel that day, and the battle moved on beyond Beth Aven” (14:23). There were Philistine casualties all the way from Micmash to AIJALON (14:31).

Micmethath. mik'mu-thath (Heb. mikmētāt H4826 [used with the definite article], meaning unknown). KJV Michmetha; NRSV Michmethath. A town or geographical feature that served to define the boundary between the tribes of EPHRAIM and MANASSEH (Josh. 16:6; 17:7). The latter passage locates Micmethath E of SHECHEM, but its location is uncertain.

Micri. mik'ri (Heb. mikrî H4840, perhaps “recompense”). Also Michri; TNIV Mikri. Descendant of BENJAMIN and grandfather (or more distant ancestor) of Elah; the latter is listed among the first Benjamites who resettled in Jerusalem (1 Chr. 9:8).

Middin. mid´uhn (Heb. middîn H4516, meaning unknown). A town allotted to the tribe of JUDAH in the desert (Josh. 15:61). It was apparently between BETH ARABAH and SECACAH, but its location is uncertain. Many identify it with modern Khirbet Abu Tabaq, some 10.5 mi. (17 km.) ESE of JERUSALEM, in el-Buqe^hah (the Valley of ACHOR). See SALT, CITY OF.

Middle Gate. A gate in JERUSALEM where the officials of NEBUCHADNEZZAR gathered after they had captured the city (Jer. 39:3; the LXX reads “Middle Gate” also in 2 Chr. 23:5, where the Heb. has FOUNDATION GATE). Nothing else is known about the Middle Gate, although its name possibly suggests that it was located at some point between the upper and lower sections of Jerusalem.

middle wall of partition. See WALL OF PARTITION.

Midian. mid´ee-uhn (Heb. midyān H4518, derivation unknown; gentilic midyānî H4520, “Midianite”). Son of ABRAHAM and KETURAH (Gen. 25:1-2; 1 Chr. 1:32), and eponymous ancestor of a people group that lived E and SE of CANAAN (cf. Gen. 25:6). Nothing else is known about the person Midian (see also MEDAN). The land claimed by the Midianites lay mostly E of the JORDAN and the DEAD SEA, then southward through the ARABAH and (in the time of MOSES) including the southern and eastern parts of the SINAI peninsula. Traders in the caravan that bought JOSEPH are called “Ishmaelites” (37:25) either because they descended from ISHMAEL or because the term could be used generally of desert people; the same traders are subsequently called “Midianites” (37:36) either because they descended from Midian or because they lived in the land known as Midian. When Moses fled from Egypt forty years before the EXODUS (Exod. 2:15-21), he helped the daughters of REUEL (or JETHRO) the priest of Midian, was invited to their encampment, and married ZIPPORAH, the priest’s daughter. Thus the descendants of Moses had Midianite as well as LEVITE ancestry. Jethro, though priest of Midian, acknowledged the God of Israel as supreme (18:11); but neither he nor his son HOBAB, though very friendly to Moses, could bring himself to join Israel (Num. 10:29).

Toward the end of the life of Moses, Midian had apparently become confederate with MOAB (Num. 22:4). Through the counsel of BALAAM, the Midianite women wrought much harm in Israel, and God commanded Moses to conquer the nation (25:16-18). Two hundred years later, in the days of GIDEON, God delivered Israel into the hand of Midian for seven years (Jdg. 6:1-6). They allowed the Israelites to plow and to sow the seed, but they (the Midianites) did the reaping. Gideon defeated them and killed their two kings ZEBAH AND ZALMUNNA (8:21) as well as two leaders, OREB AND ZEEB (7:25). Though the Midianites were nomads, they had great wealth in the time of Moses. They had not only 675,000 sheep, 72,000 oxen, and 61,000 donkeys, but also gold, silver, brass, iron, tin, and lead; all of which are mentioned in the booty taken by the men of Israel (Num. 31:22, 32-34). The Midianites have long since disappeared from the earth.

midrash. mid'rash. Plural midrashim. The Hebrew term midrāš H4535 (“study, writing, story”) occurs only twice in the OT. Reference is made to the midrash (NIV, “annotations”) of the prophet IDDO for additional information concerning ABIJAH (2 Chr. 13:22; NRSV, “story”) and to the midrash on “the book of the kings” (24:27; NRSV, “Commentary”). These midrashim may have been historical records themselves or commentaries on the historical narratives, but the precise meaning is debated. The term is very common, however, in rabbinic literature, where it refers to the elucidation and exposition of the Bible. The term midrash (esp. when capitalized) can also refer more specifically to a type of literature consisting of biblical exposition. Thus the Midrashim are rabbinic commentaries on the Bible. These works sometimes address detailed issues of exegesis, but their primary purpose is religious edification. See JUDAISM; TALMUD.

midwife. A woman who helps in childbirth. A midwife may often have been an older relative or friend of the family. Some of her duties included cutting the umbilical cord, washing the baby with water, rubbing it with salt, and wrapping it in swaddling clothes (cf. Ezek. 16:4). A midwife was with RACHEL at the birth of BENJAMIN (Gen. 35:17-18). When twins were born to TAMAR, the midwife put a scarlet thread on the firstborn so that it might be known which was the older (38:28). The pharaoh of Egypt ordered the midwives, Shiprah and Puah, to kill the Hebrew boy babies, but to let the girls live (Exod. 1:15-16). The midwives disobeyed the king, however. Midwives probably are referred to also in 1 Sam. 4:20 and Ruth 4:14-15.

Migdal Eder. mig'duhl-ee'duhr. See EDER (PLACE) #1.

Migdal El. mig'duhl-el' (Heb. migdal- ʾēl H4466, “tower of God”). A fortified city within the tribal territory of NAPHTALI (Josh. 19:38). It was apparently in the vicinity of IRON in N GALILEE, but its precise location is unknown.

Migdal Gad. mig'duhl-gad' (Heb. migdal-gad H4467, "tower of Gad [fortune]"). A town in the SHEPHELAH, within the tribal territory of JUDAH (Josh. 15:37). It is tentatively identified with Khirbet el-Mejdeleh, about 4 mi. (6 km.) SE of LACHISCH.

Migdol. mig'dol (Heb. migdōl H4465, "tower, fort"). A place name in the NE part of the NILE delta. Twice in Jeremiah, Migdol heads a short list of places in Egypt where Jews sought refuge (Jer. 44:1; 46:14); and twice in Ezekiel, Migdol is the N or NE extremity of Egypt, while Aswan (SYENE) marks its S limit (Ezek. 29:10; 30:6; KJV, "tower of Syene"), true to conditions in the 26th dynasty. This Migdol is the Magdolo of the Antonine Itinerary, being generally identified with Tell el Her, some 12.5 mi. (20 km.) NE of Qantara on the ancient road from Egypt to Palestine. In the PENTATEUCH, however, we read that the Israelites, after turning back from the wilderness, encamped "between Migdol and the sea" (Exod. 14:2; cf. Num. 33:7), and then crossed the latter from W to E into the wilderness again. This seems to require a Migdol differently sited from Tell el Her (which is E of all likely candidates for the RED SEA). It is, therefore, probable that Migdol here is simply another fort—migdāl H4463 is a common word—SE of Daphnai and W of the Red Sea (Lake Ballah region?). If so, it has not yet been identified in Egyptian sources. See also EXODUS.

mighty men. This expression is often used to render Hebrew gibbōrîm (pl. of gibbôr H1475, "strong, valiant; man, warrior, champion"). The word first appears in Gen. 6:4 with reference to the NEPHILIM (NIV and NRSV, "heroes"). It can be used of fighting men in general (e.g., 2 Sam. 10:7), but also more especially of warriors notable for their valor (17:8). The names and exploits of three such men and those of DAVID's "Thirty" are recorded in 2 Sam. 23:8-39 and 1 Chr. 11:10-47.

Migron. mig'ron (Heb. migrôn H4491, prob. "threshing floor"). A locality in the outskirts of GIBEAH where SAUL at one time camped under a pomegranate tree (1 Sam. 14:2). The Gibeah referred to in this passage is either the modern Tell el-Ful (3 mi./5 km. N of the temple terrace in JERUSALEM) or Jeba^c (an additional 2 mi./3 km. NE). A place by the name of Migron is mentioned also in Isa. 10:28 as being in the line of march of the Assyrian army, suggesting it is N of MICMASH. An unresolved question is whether these two Migrons are the same place; in any case, the precise location of Migron is unknown.

Mijamin. mij'uh-min (Heb. miyyāmîn H4785, “from the right” [i.e., “favored”] or perhaps “from the south”). KJV also Miamin. (1) A priest who received the sixth lot of the twenty-four divisions in DAVID’s time (1 Chr. 24:9).

(2) One of the descendants of Parosh who agreed to put away their foreign wives (Ezra 10:25).

(3) A priest who affixed his seal to the covenant of NEHEMIAH (Neh. 10:7).

(4) One of the priestly leaders who had returned from the EXILE with ZERUBBABEL (Neh. 12:5). He was possibly an ancestor of #3 above, and both of these priests may have belonged to the priestly order of #1 above.

Mika. mi'kuh. TNIV form of M_{ICA}.

Mikloth. mik'loth (Heb. miqlôth H5235, derivation uncertain). (1) Son of J_{EIEL} and descendant of B_{ENJAMIN}; his brother N_{ER} was the grandfather of S_{AUL} (1 Chr. 8:31; 9:37-38).

(2) The leader of a division in the army of D_{AVID} (1 Chr. 27:4). On the basis of the S_{EPTUAGINT}, and in conformity with the pattern in this passage, many scholars omit the reference to Mikloth (e.g., RSV, “Dodai the Ahohite was in charge of the division of the second month; in his division were twenty-four thousand”).

Mikmash. mik'mash. TNIV form of M_{ICMASH}.

Mikneiah. mik-nee'yah (Heb. miqnêāhû H5240, “possession of Yahweh”). A L_{EVITE} and one of the gatekeepers assigned to be a musician when D_{AVID} made preparation to transfer the A_{RK OF THE COVENANT} to Jerusalem (1 Chr. 15:18). He is called one of the brothers of the “second order” (NRSV; NIV, “next in rank”) who followed H_{EMAN}, A_{SAPH}, and E_{THAN}. Mikneiah and some others “were to play the harps, directing according to sheminith” (v. 21; see M_{USIC AND MUSICAL INSTRUMENTS}, VI).

Mikri. mik'ri. TNIV form of M_{ICRI}.

miktam. mik'tam (Heb. miktām H4846). Also michtam (sometimes capitalized). Apparently a musical (or liturgical) term found in the superscription of six psalms (Ps. 16 and 56-60). Some think it means nothing more than “inscription” or “epigram”; others relate it to a Semitic root meaning “to cover” and deduce that these psalms deal with A_{TONEMENT} for sin. An ancient proposal is that the term derives from a word meaning “gold” and that it refers either to a golden inscription or, figuratively, to the precious quality of the poem.

Milalai. mil'uh-li (Heb. milālay H4912, perhaps “Yahweh has spoken”). A priestly musician who participated in the dedication of the rebuilt wall of J_{ERUSALEM} under E_{ZRA} (Neh. 12:36).

Milcah. mil'kuh (Heb. milkā H4894, “queen, princess”). TNIV Milkah. (1) Daughter of HARAN, sister of LOT (and ISCAH), and wife of NAHOR, who was her uncle (Gen. 11:29; cf. v. 27). ABRAHAM was also Milcah’s uncle. Her offspring are mentioned in Gen. 22:20-23; one of them was BETHUEL, the father of REBEKAH and LABAN (22:22-23; 24:15, 24, 29, 47).

(2) One of five daughters of ZELOPHEHAD of the tribe of MANASSEH (Num. 26:33). Since Zelophehad had no sons, his daughters requested ELEAZAR the priest that they be allowed to inherit their father’s property, and the request was granted on condition that they marry into their father’s tribe (27:1-11; 36:11; Josh. 17:3-4). This decision was very important and became a precedent.

Milcom. mil'kuhm (Heb. milkōm H4904, “king”). The national god of the AMMONITES. Most scholars believe he is to be identified with MOLECH (cf. 1 Ki. 11:5 with v. 7). The Hebrew form milkōm occurs only three times (always rendered “Molech” by the NIV): (1) Milcom was one of the foreign gods for whom SOLOMON built a high place on the MOUNT OF OLIVES (1 Ki. 11:5); (2) he was worshiped by many Israelites (v. 33); (3) he was later desecrated by JOSIAH (2 Ki. 23:13). In addition, the form malkām (“their king”) occurs in the MT in some passages where most scholars believe that the context requires a reference to Milcom (2 Sam. 12:30 = 1 Chr. 20:2; Jer. 49:1, 3; Zeph. 1:5). See MALCAM #2.

mildew. A common species of fungus that attacked the crops of Palestine; it is produced by dampness. The Hebrew term yērāqôn H3766, in its meaning “rust” or “mildew,” always occurs in combination with šiddāpôn H8730, “blight, scorching.” These conditions were interpreted as God’s punishment upon the disobedient (Deut. 28:22; Amos 4:9; Hag. 2:17), and SOLOMON prayed for deliverance from them (1 Ki. 8:37; 2 Chr. 6:28). The NIV uses “mildew” also as the rendering of Hebrew šāraʿat H7669 (which refers to a variety of skin diseases), when this word occurs in connection with objects, such as clothing (Lev. 13:47-59) and walls (14:34-57).

mile. See WEIGHTS AND MEASURES.

Miletum. See MILETUS.

Miletus. mi-lee´tuhs (Gk. Milētos G3626). Also Miletos. Ancient and important Ionian city in ASIA MINOR, in the region of CARIA, on the shore of the MEDITERRANEAN near the mouth of the river Maeander. It was colonized first by Cretans, and later by Greeks (see CRETE; GREECE). During the great period of colonization (750-550 B.C.), Miletus was most active, being credited with the establishment of about ninety colonies and leading the way in the Greek penetration of Egypt. Situated favorably, with four good harbors, Miletus became a great sea power and dominated the Black Sea trade, from which it became exceedingly wealthy. The city was distinguished also for its literary and scientific accomplishments; for example, it was the home of the first Greek philosopher, Thales, and of his successors, Anaximander and Anaximenes. In the fifth century B.C. Miletus fell under PERSIA, but later it was conquered and rebuilt by ALEXANDER THE GREAT. Under the Hellenistic kings it retained some importance as a commercial town, and some great buildings were raised by these rulers. In 133 B.C. the city passed into Roman hands as part of the province of ASIA. The apostle PAUL stopped at Miletus on his journey from Greece to JERUSALEM, and spoke to the elders of the Ephesian church whom he asked to meet him there (Acts 20:15, 17). In 2 Tim. 4:20 (KJV, “Miletum”) he mentions leaving TROPHIMUS in Miletus to recover from an illness. The city, however, played little part in the history of Christianity, though it had a bishopric in the fifth century.

A basalt millstone typical of those found throughout the Holy Land.

mill, millstone. An apparatus used to grind any edible grain—wheat, barley, oats, rye, etc.—into flour. It consists of two circular stones, the lower one having a slightly convex upper surface to help the drifting of the broken grain toward the outer edge from which it drops. It is made of a hard stone, which after being shaped is scratched with curved furrows so as to multiply the cutting and grinding effect. The lower stone has a stout stick standing at its center, and the upper one (called the rider) has a hole at its center so that it can rotate around the stick, and a handle 8-10 in. (20-25 cm.) from the center by which it is turned. Generally it is worked by two women, facing each other, and each grasping the handle to turn the rider. One woman feeds the grain in at the center of the rider and the other guides and brushes the products into a little pile. The process is very ancient, for we read of “the slave girl, who is at her hand mill” in the days of MOSES (Exod. 11:5), and the process was no doubt already old at that remote time. Even the MANNA that fell in the wilderness was hard enough or tough enough so that the people used to grind it in mills or beat it in mortars before cooking it (Num. 11:7-8).

It is altogether probable that people pounded grain before they thought of grinding it, and so the mortar is probably more ancient even than the mill. Because people depended on flour as their “staff of life” and because they generally ground it only as needed, it was forbidden to take a millstone in pledge (Deut. 24:6). In Jer. 25:10 “the sound of millstones” is mentioned as a sign of happy prosperous life, but in Isa. 47:2 the prophet taunted the proud and delicate women of BABYLON with the thought that they would have to become slaves and labor at the mill. When the PHILISTINES blinded SAMSON (Jdg. 16:21), he had to grind in the prison, and this mill was probably a large one ordinarily turned by a blinded ox or donkey. ABIMELECH, usurping “king” of Israel, was killed by a woman who dropped a millstone on his head (9:53). Our Lord prophesied that at his coming “two women will be grinding with a hand mill; one will be taken and the other left” (Matt. 24:41). A millstone cast into the sea is a symbol of absolute destruction (Rev. 18:21).

millet. See PLANTS.

Millo. mil’oh (Heb. millô ᵐ H4864, “filling, mound”). (1) A fortification or citadel near JERUSALEM, constructed by SOLOMON with forced labor (1 Ki. 9:15, 24; 11:27). The NIV translates the Hebrew term as a common noun, “supporting terraces” (TNIV simply “terraces”). Apparently Solomon added to an existing Millo, for DAVID is said to have built the city of Jerusalem “around from the Millo inward” (2 Sam. 5:9 NRSV; cf. 1 Chr. 11:8). The Millo formed a prominent part of the works of defense set up by King HEZEKIAH for the protection of the city (2 Chr. 32:5). The BETH MILLO where King Joash (JEHOASH) was assassinated (2 Ki. 12:20; KJV and other versions have “the house of Millo”) is thought to have been some well-known building in this area.

(2) The place where ABIMELECH was crowned king is called “the house of Millo” in the KJV (Jdg. 9:6, 20). See BETH MILLO #1.

mind. The seat of the mental faculties; the part of the individual that thinks, reasons, and feels. Both OT and NT focus attention on the human being’s concrete and total relationship to God, and where psychological terms do appear their intention seems to be emphasis rather than a concern to divide or compartmentalize human activity. For this reason, no consistent pattern of terminology can be determined in the Bible. In some cases, our English versions idiomatically render the Hebrew text with the word “mind” even in passages where no Hebrew equivalent is found (cf. Gen. 37:11). Otherwise, it is used in the OT to render a variety of terms, such as Hebrew yēšer H3671, “thought, tendency” (Isa. 26:3), rûaḥ H8120, “spirit” (Num. 16:28 NIV), and especially lēb H4213 and lēbāb H4222, “heart” (Deut. 28:65; Ezek. 38:10). In the NT, the faculty of cognition or thought is variously referred to by such terms as nous G3808, “mind, intellect” (Rom. 7:25); kardia G2840, “heart” (in imitation of the Heb.; cf. Matt. 13:15, citing Isa. 6:10 LXX); psychē G6034, “soul” (Phil. 1:27); dianoia G1379, “thought, understanding” (2 Pet. 3:1); and others. See also HEART; SOUL; SPIRIT.

minerals. Mineralogists find it somewhat difficult to define the word mineral, but its scientific meaning can be clarified by the use of specific examples. A granite boulder belongs to the mineral kingdom as contrasted to the animal or vegetable kingdoms, but it is a rock and not a mineral. It is composed of a number of minerals most of which are of microscopic size. The minerals in granite, visible to the naked eye, are the clear, glassy particles of quartz, one or more of the white or pink feldspars, and the darker biotite or hornblende. Quartz is classified as a mineral for a number of reasons: it is formed in nature, it is not formed by plant or animal, it has a uniform composition throughout the particle, and it always crystallizes in a hexagonal system of crystals. Quartz is always composed of 46.7 percent silicon and 53.3 percent oxygen. The chemist may make silicon dioxide in the laboratory, which has the same percentage of silicon and oxygen as that of natural quartz, but it is not a mineral. It does not pass the test of having been formed in nature unattended by humans. It is referred to as a synthetic.

The present science of mineralogy with its names and exact terminology is a young discipline, younger even than physics, chemistry, astronomy, or mathematics. Mineralogy as a science certainly did not exist at the time the Bible was written. In many cases, minerals mentioned in Scripture cannot be identified with certainty. It is possible, however, to survey biblical minerals under three groups: precious stones, metals, and common minerals.

I. Precious stones. The reaction of the human race to beauty and to the things that endure does not change. We share certain criteria with the ancients for evaluating precious stones. There must be beauty of color, transparency, luster, and brilliance. There must be some degree of durability, at least if the gem is to be worn or handled. Selenite, a clear crystalline variety of gypsum, may be beautiful, but it is so soft that it can easily be scratched by the thumbnail. We now use a scale of hardness called the Mohs scale which rates the hardness of gems on the basis of the ease or difficulty of scratching. On this scale the hardness of thumbnail is 2.5.

The Mohs Scale of Hardness (H)

1. Talc
2. Gypsum
3. Calcite
4. Fluorite
5. Apatite
6. Orthoclase
7. Quartz
8. Topaz
9. Corundum
10. Diamond

The most precious stones are those that have a hardness of 7 or greater. All of these could easily scratch glass, which has a hardness of 5.5 to 6. Many of the precious stones of the Bible belong to the quartz or chalcedony family with a hardness of 7. Emerald is a green beryl (H 7.5 to 8); topaz has a hardness of 8; the ruby and sapphire, both forms of the mineral corundum, have a hardness of 9.

There are four principal lists of minerals recorded in the Scriptures. They are as follows: (1) the twelve precious stones of AARON's breastplate, each stone representing one of the tribes of Israel (Exod. 28:17-20; 39:10-13); (2) the stones that are unfavorably compared to ^{WISDOM} (Job 28:16-19); (3) the gems of the king of T_{YRE} (Ezek. 28:13); (4) the precious stones of the Holy City, one for each of the twelve foundations (Rev. 21:18-21). Many other passages mention individual precious stones.

A. Agate (Exod. 28:19; 39:12). This member of the chalcedony family, described below under chalcedony, was the second stone in the third row of the priest's breastplate.

B. Amethyst (Exod. 28:19; 39:12; Rev. 21:20). A purple to blue-violet form of quartz. This is one of the loveliest forms of quartz. Natural cubic crystals of fluorite in transparent blues and purples match amethyst for beauty, but this mineral has a hardness of only 4 and is easily split by the tap of a knife blade. Amethyst was the third stone of the third row of the priest's breastplate and will be the twelfth of the foundation stones of the Holy City.

C. Beryl (Exod. 28:17; 39:10; Ezek. 28:13; Rev. 21:20). A beryllium aluminum silicate. It is now mined and valued as a source of beryllium, a light metal unknown until A.D. 1828. A single crystal taken from the Black Hills of South Dakota weighed as much as 75 tons. Gem varieties include yellow or golden beryl; emerald, which is a highly prized translucent to transparent sea-green stone; aquamarine, which is blue; and morganite, a rose-red variety. Beryl was the third stone in the top row of the priest's breastplate, and will be the eighth of the foundation stones of the Holy City.

D. Carnelian (Rev. 4:3; 21:20). The sixth foundation stone of the Holy City. See below under chalcedony.

Entrances to horizontal mineshafts in Timnah. Copper was mined from these hills in the Desert of Paran.

E. Chalcedony (Rev. 21:19). The third foundation stone of the Holy City. Quartz and chalcedony are both composed of silicon dioxide, but chalcedony does not crystallize into the bold hexagonal forms taken by quartz. Any crystalline character that the various forms of chalcedony have is of microscopic size. The lighter colored varieties are named chalcedony in contrast to such names as carnelian and jasper. The following are some of the varieties of chalcedony.

1. Agate. This stone is chalcedony with colors unevenly distributed, often banded, with the bands curved. Petrified wood is often a form of agate in which the silicon dioxide has replaced the original wood. Agates are very common and many varieties exist. They have become one of the most popular minerals for cutting and polishing. The moss agates found along the Yellowstone River from Glendive, Montana, to Yellowstone Park are particularly well known. The “thunder eggs” of Idaho and Oregon may look like drab gray stones, but when sawed in two with a diamond saw, they may reveal a center of lovely agate.

2. Carnelian (sard, sardius, sardine). Chalcedony with colors usually clear red to brownish red; iron oxide imparts the color.

3. Chrysoprase. An apple-green variety of chalcedony, sometimes called green jasper; a small percentage of nickel may account for the green color. Beads of genuine chrysoprase dating to 1500 B.C. have been taken from an Egyptian grave.

4. Flint. Usually a dull gray to black form, not valued or classified as a precious stone, but highly prized by primitive peoples for arrowheads, spear points, skinning knives, etc.

5. Jasper. Jasper pebbles may be found in many gravel deposits (the petrified wood of Arizona is largely jasper). This mineral is hard, opaque, and takes a beautiful polish. It is sufficiently abundant so that it must have been used by ancient peoples as a gem stone. Although this gem has many shades, the chief colors are red, yellow, brown, and green. Green jasper is also known as chrysoprase. The colors largely result from the presence of iron oxide.

6. Onyx. This stone is similar to banded agates, except that the bands are flat. Specimens are usually cut and polished parallel to the layers, enabling cameo production. (Objects of Mexican onyx, beautifully cut and polished and available in a number of Mexican border cities, are really not onyx at all: the composition is calcium carbonate instead of silicon dioxide.)

7. Sardonyx. Merely onyx that includes layers of carnelian or sard.

F. Chrysolyte (Exod. 28:20; 39:13; Cant. 5:14; Ezek. 1:16; 10:9; 28:13; Dan. 10:6; Rev. 21:20). A yellow to greenish-yellow form of olivine; green olivine is known as peridot. The mineral is a silicate of magnesium and iron. In Rev. 21:20 it is the seventh foundation stone of the Holy City, and in Exodus it is the first gem in the fourth row of the priest's breastpiece.

G. Chrysoprase (Rev. 21:20). The tenth foundation stone of the Holy City. See above under chalcedony.

H. Coral (Job 28:18; Ezek. 27:16). When the writer of Job speaks of the priceless value of wisdom, he compares it to a number of precious stones and metals, one of them being coral; and in Ezekiel, coral is associated with turquoise and ruby. The inclusion of coral, which has its origin in the animal world and grows in the sea, is difficult to understand on the basis of modern classifications of precious stones. This indicates that in the ancient world other factors were taken into account in the classification of gem stones. Factors that contributed to the value of coral probably included its beauty; its use in the production of jewelry, creating an economic demand for it; and its workability.

I. Crystal (Job 28:17; Rev. 4:6; 21:11; 22:1). The term crystal in these passages is generally understood to refer to glass or clear quartz. This type of quartz is remarkably brilliant and beautifully shaped, even as it is found in nature. However, the word could connote other brilliant colorless minerals. The book of Job says that wisdom cannot compare with it. It is used in Revelation to depict the brilliance of the objects with which it is compared, such as the “sea” of glass (Rev. 4:6), the Holy City (21:11), and the water of life (22:1).

J. Emerald (Exod. 28:18; 39:11; Ezek. 28:13; Rev. 4:3; 21:19). The emerald is a transparent to translucent deep green form of beryl (beryllium aluminum silicate). The meaning of the Hebrew word is uncertain. It is probably derived from a root that means “to hammer” and may refer to the hardness of this gem. The Greek word connotes a light green gem and is almost certainly the emerald. The emerald was the last stone in the second row of the priest’s breastplate and is listed as the fourth foundation stone of the Holy City.

K. Flint (Exod. 4:25; Josh. 5:2-3; Isa. 5:28; 50:7; Jer. 17:1; Ezek. 3:9; Zech. 7:12). See above under chalcedony. In all the occurrences of flint in the Bible the emphasis is on its hardness and its ability to hold a sharp edge.

L. Jacinth (Exod. 28:19; 39:12; Rev. 21:20). Also hyacinth. In modern mineralogy the jacinth is the transparent red, yellow, orange, or brown form of the mineral zircon (zirconium orthosilicate). The meaning of the word in Hebrew is uncertain; it refers to the first stone in the third row of the priest’s breastplate. Because the Greek word seems to indicate a dark blue stone, some believe the reference is to the sapphire. It will be the eleventh foundation stone of the Holy City.

M. Jasper (Exod. 28:20; 39:13; Job 28:18; Ezek. 28:13; Rev. 4:3; 21:11, 18-19). Third stone in the fourth row of the priest’s breastplate and first foundation stone of the Holy City. See above under chalcedony.

N. Lapis lazuli. A gem of deep azure-blue; it is a soft stone composed of sodium aluminum silicate and was fashioned by the ancients into various types of ornaments. See below under sapphire.

O. Onyx (Gen. 2:12; Exod. 25:7; 28:9, 20; 35:9, 27; 39:6, 13; 1 Chr. 29:2; Job 28:16; Ezek. 28:13). Second stone in the fourth row of the priest's breastplate. See above under chalcedony.

P. Pearl (Gen. 2:12 mg.; Matt. 7:6; 13:45; 1 Tim. 2:9; Rev. 17:4; 18:12, 16; 21:21). Pearls, like coral, develop in the sea by the abstraction of calcium carbonate from sea water. The pearl develops around a bit of foreign matter within the shell of oysters or mussels. Like coral, it cannot be classed with the hard enduring precious stones. It is easily destroyed. A small amount of acid would convert it to nearly worthless calcium chloride, a water-soluble salt, and the gas carbon dioxide. The reference in Matt. 7:6 implies a fragile structure. Swine might step on rubies without harming them, but pearls would be crushed. They are not much harder than a fingernail. The references to pearls are found almost exclusively in the NT, and there is no reason to doubt the identity of this precious stone.

Q. Ruby (Exod. 28:17; 39:10; Job 28:18; Prov. 3:15; 8:11; 20:15; 31:10; Isa. 54:12; Lam. 4:7; Ezek. 27:16; 28:13). Corundum as a mineral usually occurs as a dull, unattractive but hard form of aluminum oxide, often crystallized in hexagonal forms. Corundum of a rich, clear, red variety is the ruby, whereas the other colors of gem-quality corundum account for the sapphires. The best source for the good rubies is Burma. The ruby was the first stone in the priest's breastplate.

R. Sapphire (Exod. 24:10; 28:18; 39:11; Job 28:6, 16; Cant. 5:14; Isa. 54:11; Lam. 4:7; Ezek. 1:26; 10:1; 28:13; Rev. 21:19). In these references, the TNIV translates "lapis lazuli." Sapphires, like rubies, belong to the corundum or aluminum-oxide family, with a hardness of 9, or next to diamond. True sapphires are blue; others are colorless, yellow, or pink. The sapphire is listed as the second of the foundation stones of the Holy City, and the second stone in the second row of the priest's breastplate. It is generally agreed that our modern lazurite (lapis lazuli) was called sapphire by the ancients. But we must remember that it is entirely possible that a variety of blue stones were termed sapphire. Lazurite does not seem to belong to the elite company of the most precious stones. For the greater part these most precious stones are noted for a rich purity of color, which lazurite does not have. Lazurite is beautiful but usually consists of a considerable mixture of minerals, including pyrite, calcite, muscovite, and pyroxene. In hardness it is softer than glass (H 5 to 5.5) In three of the references given above, there is a strong implication that the mineral referred to was blue (Exod. 24:10; Ezek. 1:26; 10:1). In Lamentations sapphire is linked to ruby, the other highly prized form of corundum.

S. Sardonyx (Rev. 21:20). The sardonyx is an onyx layered with red sard or carnelian. It is the fifth foundation stone in the Holy City.

T. Topaz (Exod. 28:17; 39:10; Job 28:19; Ezek. 28:13; Rev. 21:20). The modern topaz is an aluminum fluoro hydroxy silicate with a hardness of 8, thus harder than the quartz and chalcedony groups. The most highly prized is the yellow topaz; but colorless, pink, blue, and green varieties occur as well. The topaz was the second stone of the first row of the priest's breastplate and is listed as the ninth foundation stone of the Holy City.

U. Turquoise (Exod. 28:18; 39:11; 1 Chr. 29:2; Isa. 54:11; Ezek. 27:16; 28:13). A blue to bluish-green mineral which is a hydrous phosphate of aluminum and copper. It has a hardness of 5 to 6. The stone polishes well and is commonly fashioned into beads. It was the first stone in the second row of the priest's breastplate.

The upper register of this tomb painting from Egypt shows men smelting metal during the New Kingdom period (Tomb of Rekhmine near the Valley of the Kings, c. 1500 B.C.).

II. Metals. Of the more than 115 elements known today, over 90 are considered metals. Of these only gold, silver, iron, copper, lead, tin, and mercury were known to the ancients. A metal is an element with a metallic luster; it is usually a good conductor of heat and electricity. Metals such as gold, silver, and copper may occur in nature as the free recognizable metal; most metals, however, occur in compound form, chemically united with other elements in such a way that the ore appears dull and nonmetallic. Metallurgy is the science of separating the metal from its ore and the subsequent refining and treating for adapting it to its many and varied uses. The earliest reference to someone skilled in iron and bronze work is to TUBAL-CAIN (Gen. 4:22). Human progress in metal working has provided anthropologists and archaeologists with a chronological structure for dating various periods in ancient history. This structure includes the Chalcolithic or Copper Age (4000-3000 B.C.), the Bronze Age (3000-1200), and the Iron Age (1200-586). There is, of course, much overlapping, and none of these ages has really ended. In fact, when one considers the tonnages used, it should be apparent that we are still living in the Iron or Steel Age. The metals mentioned in the Bible are as follows.

A. Bronze. A metal alloy composed of varying amounts of copper and tin. It is generally believed that bronze had its origin in MESOPOTAMIA. The discovery and production of bronze marked a turning point in human history because of its degree of hardness. The softer copper, which continued to be used for some purposes, was replaced to a great extent by bronze in the production of utilitarian objects. However, nails, knives, statuettes, and other objects continued to be made of pure copper far into the Bronze Age. CYPRUS bronze usually contained from 2 to 4 percent tin, while a cup from NINEVEH, dated about 1000 B.C., tested over 18 percent tin. In the Bible bronze was used in ornamental construction (Exod. 25:3; 26:11; 27:2), and the manufacture of such utilitarian objects as pots (Lev. 6:28) and mirrors (Job 37:18). Cymbals of bronze were used in the temple for worship (1 Chr. 15:19). The use of bronze weaponry is found in the reference to the armament of the Philistine warrior GOLIATH (1 Sam. 17:5-38) and the shields made under the direction of REHOBAM (2 Chr. 12:10). However, the latter appear to have been primarily objects of decoration or value rather than weapons of war. Job 20:24 speaks of arrows tipped with bronze. The KJV uses the word brass, which at the time of its writing denoted any alloy of copper.

B. Copper. A heavy, reddish-yellow metal, copper is frequently found on or near the surface of the ground. Its malleability and accessibility account for its being one of the first metals to be used by early humans. In the Bible the presence of copper ore in Canaan is cited as one of the benefits of that land (Deut. 8:9). The process of smelting copper and other metals is used illustratively in its other references in the OT (Job 28:2; Ezek. 22:18, 20; 24:11). In the NT reference is made to the use of copper only in coinage (Matt. 10:9; Mk. 12:42; Lk. 21:2).

C. Gold. This precious metal was used freely and skillfully in the oldest of civilizations. A multitude of gold ornaments in the museums of the world verify this. The earliest evidence of gold mining (at least 2500 B.C.) may be found in rock carvings of Egypt, depicting the washing of gold sands and the melting of gold in a small furnace. The Greek historian Strabo describes the country of the Iberians (Spain) as full of metal such as gold, silver, copper, and iron. He tells of mining gold by digging for it in the usual way and also by washing for it (hydraulic mining). Pliny the Elder accurately described the occurrence of placer gold in stream beds, including the finding of nuggets. He also described the process of hydraulic mining. He claimed that a river was brought from a distance and from the heights, with enough fall to wash away whole mountain sides, leaving the gold in sluice baffles. Most surprising of all,

Pliny described in some detail the use of mercury to capture the gold from the ore by amalgamation.

Why is gold so highly valued? Gold is good and highly prized because it is warmly beautiful. It is enduring, for it never rusts or dissolves away. It retains its beauty. Of the common acids, only a mixture of concentrated nitric and hydrochloric acids (aqua regia) will dissolve it. Strong acid alone will have no effect. Gold is good also because it is so adaptable to shaping. It can be melted without harm; it can be hammered into thin leaves because it is extremely malleable. It may easily overlay large objects thus imparting beauty and protection to the whole. It may readily be alloyed with other metals with an improvement of the degree of hardness while still retaining the beauty of gold. In fact Pliny noted correctly that gold comes naturally alloyed with silver. Finally gold has been valued because of its scarcity. It seems reasonable to presume that if the core of the earth is largely iron, the free metals such as gold, platinum, and even cobalt and nickel have been depleted to a great extent because they have dissolved in this core.

Gold is mentioned very early in the Bible (Gen. 2:11-12). We are told that in the land of HAVILAH, in the vicinity of the Garden of EDEN, there was gold, and that the gold was good. Gold is also mentioned at the end of the Bible in Rev. 21:15, 18, 21. Here the most precious of metals is envisioned as constituting the Holy City and its streets. The rod used to measure the city was made of gold. There are numerous other references to this metal in the Bible. Exodus 37 describes the construction of the ARK OF THE COVENANT and other appointments of the TABERNACLE, all made of gold or overlaid with gold. When the writer of Job asks where wisdom can be found (Job 28:12), he responds by observing that wisdom is so priceless that gold, silver, and precious stones cannot buy it (28:15-19). It is worthy of note that gold is mentioned five times in this passage, whereas each of the other precious items is mentioned only once.

D. Iron. In spite of advances in the use of light metals such as aluminum, magnesium, and beryllium, we are still living in the Iron Age. No other metal rivals iron in the amount produced. The reason for this is that iron ores, chiefly the oxides and carbonates, are abundant in concentrated deposits, the metal is easily won from the ore and varies over a wide range in its properties. By removing impurities, by heat treatment, and by alloying, the strength, hardness, ductility, malleability, resistance to corrosion, appearance, and retention of temper may be varied. Iron does not occur free in nature. When it is so found it is on such a minute scale that it may be considered a curiosity. Terrestrial free iron is very likely secondary, having been formed from regular ores by hot carbon or carbon-containing materials, a process that is carried out in blast furnaces today.

It is clear that the ancients found meteoric iron and shaped it for utilitarian purposes. Iron beds taken from a grave in Egypt dating from about 4000 B.C. contain a nickel analysis corresponding favorably to that of meteorites. In fact, the Egyptians and people of other cultures referred to iron as the metal from heaven. In ancient religious literature the Egyptians claimed that the firmament of heaven was made of iron. An iron object dating to about 3000 was blasted out of the masonry at the top of the Great Pyramid of Giza and is now in the British Museum. No one knows who first discovered the way to reduce iron from ore in a furnace. Evidently the discovery was made in the undetermined past. Egyptian frescoes dated at about 1500 depict small furnaces with men operating bellows or mouth blowpipes. This is the essential principle of the modern blast furnace.

The first reference to iron in the Bible is found in Gen. 4:22 where Tubal-Cain is cited as a worker of iron. In other passages (Deut. 4:20; 1 Ki. 8:51; Jer. 11:4) there is evidence that the Hebrews were familiar with furnaces for the making of iron. As slaves in Egypt they probably had to work at these furnaces. Their lot must have been difficult. The smith and his forge were well known to Isaiah (Isa. 44:12; 54:16). The Philistines hindered the Hebrew occupation of the whole of Canaan because they were skilled in iron working. They prevented the Hebrews from making and maintaining their own tools and weapons by refusing to allow a single smith in all the land. The Israelites were forced to go to the Philistines to sharpen their plowshares, mattocks, axes, and sickles (1 Sam. 13:19-20). But the great victories of David ended all this. When David came to power, iron was used freely by the Israelites.

Additional items of iron not previously mentioned are as follows: (1) the huge bed of OG, the AMORITE king of BASHAN, was made of iron (Deut. 3:11); (2) the Israelites feared the Canaanites because they had iron chariots (Josh. 17:16, 18); (3) the spear shaft of Goliath weighed 600 shekels (roughly 15 lbs./ 7 kg., 1 Sam. 17:7); (4) there is ample evidence that many types of fetters and other implements for binding captives and slaves were made of iron. In addition to these references the term is used in a figurative sense (Ps. 2:9; 107:10; Jer. 28:13-14).

E. Lead. Free metallic lead is extremely rare. The chief ore is lead sulfide (galena), which often occurs as bright glistening clusters of cubic crystals. The metal is readily obtained from the ore and was known long before it came into common usage. The British Museum had a lead figure of Egyptian origin dated at about 3000 B.C. Lead plates and statuettes have been found in Egyptian tombs of 1200. The high density of lead is noted in Exod. 15:10. In Num. 31:22 lead is listed along with gold, silver, bronze, iron, and tin. Its use for lettering in rock is noted in Job 19:24. Jeremiah speaks of the use of bellows in the processing of the metal (Jer. 6:29). Lead is listed with copper, tin, and iron as metals melted in a furnace (Ezek. 22:18, 20), and again with silver, iron, and tin as metals used for monetary exchange (Ezek. 27:12; see also Zech. 5:7-8)

Sumerian silver lyre from Ur (c. 2600 B.C.). Silver covers the lyre itself and the bull's head.

F. Silver. At the present time much more silver is obtained as a by-product of the refining of copper and lead than by mining native silver or silver ore. The methods used in this refining were not available to the Hebrews, since it requires the extensive use of electricity, cyanide, zinc, and aluminum. However, silver is ten times as abundant in the crust of the earth as is gold, and much of it was mined by the ancients. Pliny says, “Silver is only found in deep shafts, and raises no hopes of its existence by any signs, giving off no shining sparkles such as are seen in the case of gold.” He describes its use for making mirrors and notes that “the property of reflecting is marvelous; it is generally agreed that it takes place owing to the repercussion of the air which is thrown back into the eyes.”

The shekel and talent of silver were used as mediums of exchange. At first this was done by weighing out the silver pieces. This is apparent in Job 28:15: “...nor can its price be weighed in silver.” Silver was used in conjunction with gold because of its beauty. A great many references to silver and gold are found in the Bible. Only occasionally are the terms reversed, as in Esth. 1:6, which refers to couches made of gold and silver. When Christ sent out the Twelve, he commanded them to carry neither gold nor silver nor brass in their purses (Matt. 10:9). Many objects made of silver are referred to in the Scriptures. The cup that JOSEPH had hidden in BENJAMIN’S sack of food was a silver cup (Gen. 44:2). DEMETRIUS, the silversmith of EPHESUS, made silver shrines for ARTEMIS (Acts 19:24).

III. The common minerals. Several of these are mentioned in Scripture.

A. Alabaster (Matt. 26:7; Mk. 14:3; Lk. 7:37). These passages refer to an alabaster box or jar used to contain a precious ointment. Modern alabaster is a form of gypsum (hydrated calcium sulfate). It is soft, with a hardness of 2, and may be scratched by the thumbnail. It is easily carved and many larger decorative articles like book ends, vases, and paper weights are made of this material. It is usually very light in color, but may be mottled or veined with various colors. The ancients may have used a calcite or aragonite mineral resembling our modern alabaster in its general appearance. A simple test with the thumbnail will distinguish between the two varieties. Calcite has a hardness of 3 and cannot be scratched with the thumbnail. Alabaster is usually formed by the process of water deposition in caves.

B. Glass (Rev. 4:6; 15:2; 21:18, 21). Glass is a product of the fusion of silicates, borates, or phosphates. Although its use appears to have been widespread in the ancient world, its place of origin is unknown. The ancient Egyptians were, to the best of our knowledge, the first to make small vessels of glass. It appears in the Bible only in the book of Revelation, which describes the appearance of the “sea” before the throne, and the purity and transparency of the gold of which the street and wall of the Holy City are made.

C. Marble (1 Chr. 29:2; Esth. 1:6; Cant. 5:15; Rev. 18:12). Marble is recrystallized limestone, capable of receiving a high polish. Limestone is somewhat impure calcium carbonate. Dolomitic marble contains a considerable amount of magnesium carbonate as well as the calcium compound. Marble is used for decorative purposes such as statuary, pillars, and walls of buildings. There is no reason to think that the marble of the Bible was different from the marble of modern times, except in the sense that marble from different quarries varies in color and texture.

D. Salt. An extremely abundant mineral. The evaporation of one cubic mile (4 cubic km.) of sea water would leave approximately 140 million tons of salts, most of which would be sodium chloride or common salt. The “Salt Sea” of the Bible (Gen. 14:3 et al.) was no doubt the DEAD SEA. In most of the many references to salt, either the preservative property or else the savor it adds to food is the point of interest. Jesus states that the children of the kingdom are the salt of the earth (Matt. 5:13). He uses the analogy of salt losing its “saltiness.” The implication is that Christians must not lose that which makes them distinctive. How could salt lose its “saltiness”? It has been suggested by some that as salt was stored it would eventually react chemically and be salt no more. Under any conditions salt would remain salt. But if stored salt was contaminated with other salts, such as magnesium chloride or sulfate, these salts would attract moisture. In due time enough salt might leach away to leave behind the less soluble contaminants, and this would result in a salt of much poorer quality. The container might then be emptied on a foot path to inhibit the growth of weeds.

E. Soda (Job 9:30; Prov. 25:20; Jer. 2:22). Soda is a term applied today to several forms of sodium. In the Bible it probably refers only to sodium carbonate, which forms a gas with vinegar and effervesces freely. It thus fits the description of the process described in Prov. 25:20. In Job 9:30 and Jer. 2:22 it is associated with SOAP. Sodium carbonate would be useful in washing with soap because it acts as a softener of water. It is used today in the making of soap. It is found either in solution in salty seas or in the mud that surrounds such seas.

F. Sulfur (Gen. 19:24; Deut. 29:23; Job 18:15; Ps. 11:6; Isa. 30:33; 34:9; Ezek. 38:22; Lk. 17:29; Rev. 9:17-18; 14:10; 19:20; 20:10; 21:8). In modern times most sulfur comes from deep deposits and is brought to the surface by hot water and compressed air. Sulfur deposits also may be found in the vicinity of volcanoes. Hot gases such as sulfur dioxide and hydrogen sulfide are emitted and deposit sulfur in the surrounding rock by chemical reaction. Sulfur deposits may also be found in the vicinity of some hot springs that are the relics of previous volcanic action. When sulfur is burned, it gives off a blue flame that forms a gas (sulfur dioxide). This gas is used as a bleaching agent. In the Bible sulfur is nearly always associated with fire and metaphorically with punishment or devastation. No natural product readily available to the ancients would so completely symbolize the awful punishment to be meted out to the wicked. The flame of burning sulfur is very hot, and the sulfur dioxide gas has a suffocating stench. Hot sulfur eventually turns to a bubbling, dark red, sticky liquid.

G. Water. This is the most marvelous and exciting mineral of the Bible. Every modern textbook of mineralogy includes a section on the oxides of nature such as those of silicon, copper, iron, aluminum, etc., but hydrogen oxide heads the list. This extremely abundant mineral is found either in liquid or in solid forms, such as snow and ice. As a chemical it is an unusual compound with unusual properties. When it freezes to ice it expands so that it floats. The chemist accounts for most of its odd properties by explaining that hydrogen bonds form between oxygen atoms holding particles together in a framework. Were it not for these hydrogen bonds water would boil away at 150 degrees Fahrenheit below zero.

There are more references to this mineral in the Bible than to any other. See WATER. In Genesis the condition that existed before God formed the earth is described as a watery mass. Water was important for various ceremonies of washing found in Leviticus. Elaborate cisterns and water systems may be found at the sites of certain ancient cities in Israel. The importance of water for LIFE is reflected in its metaphorical usage, such as the water of life in Rev. 21:6. Cleansing with water is also used to depict the process of REGENERATION (Eph. 5:26).

mines, mining. The extraction of MINERALS from the earth is an ancient human occupation. We read in the account of the antediluvian Cainite patriarchs that TUBAL-CAIN “forged all kinds of tools out of bronze and iron” (Gen. 4:22). In Job 28:1-11 there is mention of “a mine for silver and place where gold is refined. Iron is taken from the earth, and copper is smelted from ore.” This is followed by a poetic account of a man digging a mine. In SINAI are very ancient copper mines, worked by the Egyptians as early as the 4th dynasty (the great pyramid builders); and, at the head of the Gulf of AQABAH, at ELATH, are the remains of SOLOMON’s blast furnaces for copper. At this locality there is a constant strong N wind, and through openings and conduits this wind was used to form a draft for the furnaces. The great development of metalworking in Israel must have come between the time of SAUL and the time of Solomon. Compare 1 Sam. 13:19-22, where the PHILISTINES are in the Iron Age, which the Israelites had not yet reached, with the accomplishments of Solomon’s time (1 Ki. 7:13-50) only about a century later.

The Greeks and the Romans considered mining and metalworking as very ancient, for they pictured Hephaestus or Vulcan, son of ZEUS or Jupiter, as a metalworker. In the time of MOSES, the Midianites (see MIDIAN) had gold, silver, brass, iron, tin, and lead (Num. 31:22); and the Israelites knew how to cleanse them by fire. Moses described the Promised Land as “a land where the rocks are iron and you can dig copper out of the hills” (Deut. 8:9). Although shafts have been found in the “valley of the cave” in Sinai, they do not penetrate far, the reason probably being the inability of the ancients to ventilate their mines.

mingled people. See MIXED MULTITUDE.

Miniamin. min’yuh-min (Heb. minyāmîn H4975, “from the right” [i.e., “favored”] or perhaps “from the south”). (1) A LEVITE who faithfully assisted KORE in distributing the contributions made to the TEMPLE during the reign of HEZEKIAH (2 Chr. 31:15).

(2) The ancestor of a priestly family in the days of JOAKIM; both this family and that of MOADIAH were headed by Piltai (Neh. 12:17)

(3) A priest who played the trumpet at the dedication of the wall (Neh. 12:41).

minister. In modern religious usage, this noun refers to a member of the clergy, although the verb to minister can mean both “to officiate in religious service” and more generally “to provide service, give aid.” The KJV uses the noun in its older sense of “attendant, assistant,” for example, with reference to JOSHUA (Exod. 24:13; NIV, “aide”). The queen of SHEBA, visiting SOLOMON, was amazed at “the attendance of his ministers” (1 Ki. 10:5; NIV, “the attending servants”). In the NT certain governmental offices are called “God’s ministers” (Rom. 13:6; NIV, “God’s servants”). John Mark (see MARK, JOHN) is described as the minister of PAUL and BARNABAS (Acts 13:5; NIV, “helper”). In Christian thought, a more distinctive sense emerges. For example, Paul refers to himself as “a minister of Christ Jesus” (Rom. 15:16), using the Greek term leitourgos G3313, which has a cultic connotation (cf. Heb. 8:2 KJV). More frequent is the noun diakonos G1356 (from which the term DEACON derives), properly translated “minister” in several passages (e.g., Col. 1:7; 4:7; 1 Tim. 4:6). The cognate verb diakoneō G1354 (“to serve, render assistance”) is very frequent in the NT, and the functions implied by it are incumbent not only on those who hold special church offices but on all believers. The basic principle was stated by Christ himself, “For even the Son of Man did not come to be served, but to serve, and to give his life as a ransom for many” (Mk. 10:45). See also BISHOP; CHURCH; ELDER; WORSHIP.

Minni. min’i (Heb. minnî H4973, meaning unknown). A kingdom that, along with ARARAT (Uartians) and ASHKENAZ (prob. SCYTHIANS), was summoned by God to attack BABYLON (Jer. 51:27). Its people, identified as the Manneans (Mannaeans, Assyrian Mannai), occupied the area to the S of Lake Urmia in W Iran from the ninth to the seventh centuries B.C. They are mentioned as a warlike people in various Assyrian and Urartian inscriptions. According to the Babylonian Chronicle they sided with the Assyrians when the Babylonians attacked in 616 B.C. Four years later, when NINEVEH fell to the Babylonians, Medes, and possibly the Scythians, their territory became part of the Median dominion (see MEDIA), and they disappear from the record.

Minnith. min’ith (Heb. minnîth H4976, meaning unknown). Apparently one of the “twenty towns” of the AMMONITES which JEPHTHAH conquered (Jdg. 11:33). According to the description of Jephthah’s campaign, which took him from AROER “to the vicinity of [lit., till you come to] Minnith,” this city must have been the easternmost limit of his victories. Minnith was presumably not far from HESHBON, but the location is unknown. Ezekiel mentions the “wheat from Minnith,” suggesting its exceptional quality (Ezek. 27:17; cf. 2 Chr. 27:5).

minstrel. A term for “musician” used by the KJV in two passages (2 Ki. 3:15 [NIV, “harpist”]; Matt. 9:23 [NIV, “flute players”; TNIV, “people playing pipes”]).

mint. See PLANTS.

minuscule. A cursive writing style. The term is also applied to medieval MSS that use this type of writing. See TEXT AND VERSIONS (NT).

Miphkad. See MUSTER GATE.

miracles. A term commonly applied to extraordinary events that manifest God’s intervention in nature and in human affairs. It can be useful to describe miracles negatively as follows.

(1) Miracles should be distinguished from works of PROVIDENCE. We must recognize that in good use miracle has a metaphorical or hyperbolical meaning, such as when we say that every sunrise, every tree, every blade of grass is a “miracle.” But works of providence are, for Christians, the ordinary works of God through secondary causes. Unbelievers generally deny the supernatural cause of such events. However, in the biblical events strictly regarded as miracles, the adversaries of faith acknowledged the supernatural character of what took place. After the healing of the lame man at the temple, the Jewish leaders, “since they could see the man who had been healed standing there with them, there was nothing they could say” in response to Peter and John (Acts 4:14). But they later admitted to each other, “Everybody living in Jerusalem knows they have done an outstanding miracle [TNIV, a notable sign], and we cannot deny it” (4:16). In the case of the miracle at LYSTRA (14:8-23) the pagans said, “The gods have come down to us in human form!” With reference to the RESURRECTION OF JESUS CHRIST, Paul could ask a Roman court of law to take cognizance of an indisputable, publicly attested fact, for, he said, “it was not done in a corner” (26:26).

(2) Miracles are further to be distinguished from the type of answers to PRAYER that do not constitute “signs” or demonstrative evidence for unbelievers. When ELIJAH prayed for fire on the altar of the Lord (1 Ki. 18:17-46), God answered with a demonstrative miracle that convicted the priests of BAAL. In the experience of Christians, however, there are numberless events, constantly recurring, in which those who know the Lord can see the hand of God at work, but in which there is not the demonstrative “sign” element. It is a great mistake for Christians to distort their reports of answered prayer so as to make out “sign” miracles where nothing comparable to the biblical “signs” has occurred. God gives abundant evidence of his love and care without any exaggeration on our part.

(3) Miracles of God should also be distinguished from works of MAGIC. In magic the wonder-worker himself possesses a formula that causes the result. The alleged supernatural power is controlled by the performer (cf. Exod. 7:11; 8:7). In miracles of God the results depend wholly on the divine will, and the one who works the miracle is simply an agent for the Lord.

(4) Miracles of God must be distinguished from miracles of Satanic or demonic origin. Christ warned in his Olivet Discourse: “For false Christs and false prophets will appear and perform great signs and miracles to deceive even the elect—if that were possible” (Matt. 24:24). Paul foretells of the Man of Sin “in accordance with the work of SATAN displayed in all kinds of counterfeit miracles, signs and wonders” (2 Thess. 2:9; cf. Rev. 13:14; 16:14; 19:20).

(5) Miracles must also be distinguished from mere exotic occurrences. There are many events in nature that excite wonder, but such matters are evidences of nothing but oddity. Genuine miracles are always “signs” that teach a lesson. Every miracle of God is a part of God’s great integrated system of revealed truth.

I. Epochs. The majority of the miracles recorded in the Bible fall into three great epochs. First came the miracles associated with the EXODUS, including the BURNING BUSH, the TEN PLAGUES OF EGYPT, the numerous miracles between the parting of the RED SEA and the crossing of the JORDAN, the fall of JERICHO, and the battle of GIBEON. This first epoch of miracles came at a time of great spiritual depression. The people in slavery in EGYPT had forgotten the name of the Lord their God. Wholly by his grace God brought them out, amalgamated them into a nation at SINAI, and brought them into the Promised Land. In all subsequent history, God’s people have looked back to the miracles of the exodus as a type of divine salvation.

A view of the Bitter Lakes region in Egypt. The miraculous dividing of the water at the time of the exodus probably took place near this location.

There followed, after the first epoch of miracles, a long period of decline under the judges (see JUDGES, THE), and then a revival of godly faith under DAVID and SOLOMON. During all this time miracles were very few. God did not leave himself without a witness, but the working of miracles was not his chosen method. Then came a period of idolatrous compromise and “inclusive” religion. The names of the Lord and BAAL were brought together, and even the good king JEHOSEPHAT was badly mixed up with idolatrous AHAB (1 Ki. 21:25-26; 22:1-50). So God gave the second epoch of miracles, centering in the ministry of ELIJAH and ELISHA. By mighty “signs” and works of his grace, God restored and confirmed his pure worship. The miracle of JONAH and two notable miracles at the time of ISAIAH (2 Ki. 19:35; 20:9-11) were of outstanding significance, as were two or three special miracles in the experience of DANIEL. But from the epoch of miracles in the time of Elijah and Elisha until the time of Christ and the apostles, miracles were again very few. God worked through the prophets, through the providential discipline of the Babylonian EXILE, and in other ways. Enough REVELATION had been given by the time of MALACHI for the spiritual life of God’s people until the time of the coming of Christ. God’s faithful servants were sustained without demonstrative “sign” miracles.

The third epoch of miracles, the greatest in all recorded history, occurred in the ministry of CHRIST and his APOSTLES. It was, in a way, a time of low spirituality. The Jewish people read the Torah diligently, but they read with a dark veil of hardness over their eyes and hearts. They were so “religious” in their pride that they crucified the Lord of glory. It was to this kind of world that God sent his Son. Nearly forty demonstrative “sign” miracles wrought by Christ are recorded in the Gospels; but these are selected by the writers from among a much larger number. John says, “Jesus did many other miraculous signs in the presence of his disciples, which are not recorded in this book” (Jn. 20:30).

The ministry of the apostles after Christ’s ascension began with the miracle of “languages” on the day of PENTECOST. This miracle recurred until the CHURCH organization for this age was well established, and probably until the NT books were all put into circulation. There were numerous other demonstrative miracles. As the author of the letter to the Hebrews puts it, this “salvation, which was first announced by the Lord, was confirmed to us by those who heard him. God also testified to it by signs, wonders and various miracles, and gifts of the Holy Spirit distributed according to his will” (Heb. 2:3-4).

II. Purpose. The purpose of miracles is revelation and edification. After saying that there were many unrecorded miracles of Christ, John adds, “But these are written that you may believe that Jesus is the Christ, the son of God, and that by believing you may have life in his name” (Jn. 20:31). Christ several times expressed his purpose in working miracles. He rebuffed those who had only a desire to see the spectacular. “A wicked and adulterous generation asks for a miraculous sign!” This was not a complete rejection even of idle curiosity, for he followed his rebuke with a powerful reference to Jonah as a type of his own resurrection (Matt. 12:39-40; cf. also Lk. 23:8). To seek to see miracles is better than merely to seek free food (Jn. 6:26). His miracles were evidence of the genuineness of his message. “For the very work that the Father has given me to finish, and which I am doing, testifies that the Father has sent me” (5:36). He preferred that people would accept his message for its intrinsic worth, but to believe him because of his miracles was not wrong. “Do not believe me unless I do what my Father does. But if I do it, even though you do not believe me, believe the miracles, that you may know and understand that the Father is in me, and I in the Father (10:37-38).

III. The question of miracles today. This is a disturbing question to many. In the ancient church the Montanist party insisted that miracles and predictive prophecy must be perpetual gifts. Christ pointed out that miracles do not occur with any uniform regularity (Lk. 4:25-27). In fact, if miracles were regular occurrences, they would cease to be regarded as miracles. Paul’s rules for the restriction of the use of foreign languages (1 Cor. 14) might be applied by analogy to all miracles. Evidently the miracle of language that occurred on the day of Pentecost had been confused, in the minds of devout people in CORINTH, with mere ecstatic meaningless utterances. Paul points out, “Tongues, then, are a sign, not for believers but for unbelievers” (14:22). And he commands that in Christian assemblies not more than two or, at the most, three, in turn, should be allowed to speak in a foreign language, and “if there is no interpreter, the speaker should keep quiet in the church and speak to himself and God” (14:27-28). If analogous methods were used in examining reports of alleged miracles, genuine miracles would never be hindered, but would be the better attested. At the same time delusions and exaggerations would be prevented.

Some have sought to account for the occurrence or nonoccurrence of miracles on “dispensational” grounds. Accordingly, God’s dealings with and his gifts to his people have varied throughout history. Thus, perhaps God used miracles to initiate the present “age of grace” but has withdrawn any such special “gift” that some early believers possessed. It must be recalled, however, that the period of time between Sinai and Calvary is recognized by dispensationalists as one uniform age of “law.” Yet this “dispensation” included the epoch of miracles under Elijah and Elisha, as well as long periods during which no miracles were recorded.

From Bible history, and history since Bible times, the fact stands out that God does not choose to reveal himself by demonstrative miracles at all times. On the contrary, there have been long periods of history, even in Bible times, when God did not use miracles (except the “miracle of grace”) in his dealings with his people. The Bible does not specifically say that God cannot or that God will not work demonstrative “sign” miracles in our day. It is, however, a reasonable opinion, not controvertible by any clearly attested facts, that God generally ceased to work through “sign” miracles when the NT was finished; and that it is his will that the “miracle of grace,” the witness of the Spirit, answered prayer, and, supremely, the written Word shall be the chief sources of knowledge of himself for his people during this age. It should be clear to all that, except on extremely rare occasions, even the most godly, sacrificial, competent ministers, missionaries, and laymen today do not experience demonstrative “sign” miracles.

A healthy mind, full of faith in God’s power and in God’s wisdom, without denying that “sign” miracles may occur when God chooses to use them, expects to learn foreign languages by regular processes of study and hard work. A healthy Christian mind expects to observe the ordinary principles of bodily health and sanitation, using such physical provisions of food, shelter, and medicine as divine providence may make available. In spreading the gospel one does expect the convicting ministry of the Spirit and the evidence of transformed lives, but one does not expect, unless God should so choose, that the sudden healing of a man born with twisted feet and ankle bones will gather a crowd to hear the Word preached. One is prepared to serve the Lord, to experience wonderful answers to prayer, and to find that the Word does not return void, regardless of “signs and wonders.”

IV. Essential to Christianity. Miracles are an absolutely essential element in Christianity. If Jesus Christ is not God manifest in the flesh, our faith is a silly myth. If he did not arise from the dead in bodily form, the grave being empty and his appearance being recognizable, then we are yet in our sins and of all people most miserable. If the miracle of grace is not verifiable in the transformation of the life of the one who puts his faith in Jesus as his Lord and Savior, then our Christian gospel is a miserable fraud.

V. Rational. The rational nature of miracles has been misconstrued by the British philosopher David Hume and those who follow his positivistic methods. Miracles are not violations of natural law as Hume supposed; they are intelligent acts of a personal God. They are not erratic or exotic occurrences; they are reasonable parts and phases of a cosmic program of revelation and redemption. There is no greater logical problem in the act of God in raising the dead than there is in the act of a person in lifting his hand. We speak or signal to our children and our neighbors with appropriate gestures, and God reveals himself and his plan for us by “signs” or by other means according to his will.

Christianity is indeed a “supernatural” faith, but the distinction between the natural and the supernatural is only a convenient classification of events. From the point of view of the biblical writers it was perfectly natural for God to wrestle with Jacob or to roll back the Red Sea or to raise his Son from the dead. Consistent, miracle-believing, Christian theism is just as unified in rational thought, just as scientific in its attitude toward evidence and verification, as any laboratory technician who believes that natural law does not exclude intelligent, purposeful, personal causation.

Miriam. mihr’ee-uhm (Heb. miryām H5319, derivation disputed). (1) Daughter of AMRAM and JOCHEBED, and sister of MOSES and AARON (Num. 26:59; 1 Chr. 6:3). Miriam showed concern and wisdom in behalf of her infant brother Moses when he was discovered in the NILE by the Egyptian princess (Exod. 2:4, 7-8). Miriam first appears by name in Exod. 15:20, where she is called a prophetess and is identified as the sister of Aaron. After passing through the RED SEA, she led the Israelite women in dancing and instrumental accompaniment while she sang the song of praise and victory (15:20-21). In Num. 12:1 Miriam and Aaron criticized Moses for his marriage to a Cushite woman. Because of this criticism, Miriam was punished by the Lord with leprosy (12:9), but on the protest of Aaron and the prayer of Moses (12:11, 13) she was restored after a period of seven days, during which she was isolated from the camp and the march was delayed. Her case of leprosy is cited in Deut. 24:9. Miriam died at Kadesh and was buried there (Num. 20:1). Micah refers to her along with her brothers as leaders whom the Lord provided to bring Israel out of the Egyptian bondage (Mic. 6:4).

(2) Son of MERED (apparently by his wife BITHIAH, Pharaoh’s daughter) and descendant of JUDAH through CALEB (1 Chr. 4:17; note that NRSV, to clarify the sense, includes here part of v. 18). Some leave open the possibility that this Miriam too was a woman.

Mirma. See M_{IRMAH}.

Mirmah. mihr´muh (Heb. mirmāh H5328, possibly “deceit”). KJV Mirma. Son of SHAHARAIM and descendant of BENJAMIN; a family head (1 Chr. 8:10). Mirmah was one of seven children that were born to Shaharaim in MOAB by his wife HODESH after he had divorced Hushim and Baara (vv. 8-9).

Collection of copper mirrors from Egypt.

mirror. Any smooth or polished surface as of glass or of metal that forms images by reflecting light. The Israelite women who served at the entrance of the TABERNACLE used mirrors made of bronze (Exod. 38:8) and so could be used as material for the laver. ELIHU speaks of the sky as resembling “a mirror of cast bronze” (Job 37:18). He was, no doubt, thinking of the brightness of the sky as like that of polished metal. Of the inadequacy of these ancient mirrors PAUL says that “now we see but a poor reflection” (1 Cor. 13:12). JAMES compares a hearer of the word who is not also a doer to “a man who looks at his face in a mirror” (Jas. 1:23-24) and then forgets what he looks like. “Mirror” is a better translation than “glass” or “looking glass,” because the material was metal, not glass.

mischief. This English term occurs about fifty times in the KJV as a rendering of several Hebrew words (Gen. 42:4 et al.; in the NT only once, Acts. 13:10). It occurs much less frequently in the NRSV, and not at all in the NIV. Modern versions prefer such renderings as “harm, evil, injury, trouble,” and others.

Misgab. mis´gab. The KJV transliteration of Hebrew mišgāb H5369, treating it as the name of a place in MOAB (Jer. 48:1). It is more likely to be taken as a common noun meaning “stronghold” or “fortress.”

Mishael. mish'ay-uhl (Heb. mîšā ʾēl H4792, “who is like God?” or “who belongs to God?”). (1) Son of Uzziel and descendant of LEVI through KOHATH (Exod. 6:22). One of Uzziel’s brothers was AMRAM (father of MOSES), so Mishael was Moses’ first cousin. Mishael and his brother ELZAPHAN were called by Moses to carry out the bodies of NADAB and ABIHU after their sin and death (Lev. 10:4-5).

(2) One of the prominent men (not identified as priests) who stood near EZRA when the law was read at the great assembly (Neh. 8:4).

(3) The Jewish name of MESHACH, one of DANIEL’s three companions in Babylon (Dan. 1:6-7 et al.).

Mishal. mi'shuhl (Heb. miš ʾāl H5398, possibly “[place of] request, inquiry”). A town within the tribal territory of ASHER (Josh. 19:26 KJV, “Misheal”); it was one of the four towns allotted to the LEVITES descended from GERSHON (21:30-31). The town is called MASHAL in the parallel passage (1 Chr. 6:74). The site has not been positively identified, but one possibility is modern Tell Kisan, about 5 mi. (8 km.) SE of ACCO.

Misham. mi'shuhm (Heb. miš ʿām H5471, derivation unknown). Son of ELPAAL and descendant of BENJAMIN (1 Chr. 8:12).

Misheal. See MISHAL.

Mishma. mish'muh (Heb. mišmā ʿ H5462, possibly “hearing,” i.e., “obedient”). (1) Son of ISHMAEL and grandson of ABRAHAM (Gen. 25:14; 1 Chr. 1:30). See also MIBSAM.

(2) Son of SHAUL or, more likely, of Mibsam; included in the genealogy of SIMEON (1 Chr. 4:25).

Mishmannah. mish-man'uh (Heb. mišmannâ H5459, possibly “fat” or “noble”). A Gadite who joined DAVID’s forces at ZIKLAG (1 Chr. 12:10). The Gadites are described as “brave warriors, ready for battle and able to handle the shield and spear. Their faces were the faces of lions, and they were as swift as gazelles in the mountains” (v. 8).

Mishnah. See TALMUD.

Mishneh. See SECOND DISTRICT, SECOND QUARTER.

Mishraite. mish'ray-it (Heb. mišrā'î H5490, gentilic form of the unattested name mišrā'). The Mishraites were a Judahite clan descended from CALEB through HUR and SHOBAL; they made up one of several families associated with KIRIATH JEARIM (1 Chr. 2:53). Their name apparently derives from an otherwise unknown ancestor or place called Mishra.

Mispar. mis'pahr (Heb. mispār H5032, possibly from a word of the same form meaning “number”). An Israelite mentioned among leading individuals who returned from BABYLON with ZERUBBABEL (Ezra 2:2; called “Mispereth” in Neh. 7:7).

Mispereth. mis-pee'rith (Heb. misperet H5033). See MISPAR.

Misrephoth Maim. mis'ruh-foth-may'im (Heb. mišrēpôt mayim H5387, “burnings [i.e., limekilns] at the water”). A place in the vicinity of SIDON, mentioned in Josh. 11:8 in connection with Israel's defeat of the kings of N Canaan, and in 13:6 as one of the places still in the hands of the Canaanites. These passages suggest that Misrephoth Maim was on or near the S border of Sidon, but its location is uncertain. It is often identified with Khirbet el-Musheirefeh, just S of the promontory known as the Ladder of Tyre (Ras en-Naqura), though some have preferred a nearby collection of warm springs known as 'Ain Meshferi. It has also been suggested, however, that Misrephoth Maim is the same as the Litani River, which flows into the MEDITERRANEAN about 6 mi. (10 km.) NNE of TYRE.

mission. See ACTS OF THE APOSTLES; APOSTLE; EVANGELIST; GOSPEL.

mist. Water particles in the atmosphere near the earth. Mist is caused by water vapor filling the air until it is only partially transparent. Mist or fog is not common in PALESTINE and SYRIA at sea level, but occurs almost daily in the mountain valleys, coming up at night and disappearing with the morning sun. The rare Hebrew word ṣēd H116, which apparently means “stream” (Gen. 2:6), perhaps can also be rendered “mist” (Job 36:27 NRSV, NIV mg.). The usual word for “cloud,” ʿānān H6727, may in some contexts refer to the morning mist or fog (Hos. 13:3 et al.). In Acts 13:11, the Greek word for “mist,” achlys G944, describes incipient blindness, and has been so used since Homer. Human life is compared to a mist or vapor “that appears for a little while and then vanishes” (Jas. 4:14; Gk. atmis G874), while false prophets are compared to mists or clouds driven by the storm because of the confusion they bring to unwary believers (2 Pet. 2:17; Gk. homichlē G3920).

Mitanni. mi-tan´ee. An important kingdom in N MESOPOTAMIA that flourished during the period c. 1500-1340 B.C. The ruling class of this kingdom seems to have been Indo-Iranian; its capital, the ruins of which have not yet been identified, bore the name Washshukanni (some think it may have been located in what is now Tell el-Fakhariyeh near Gozan). They are thought to have introduced into the ANE at this time techniques for the training of chariot horses. The rank and file of Mitanni’s citizenry, on the other hand, were not Indo-Iranians, but HURRIANS, and it is the Hurrian and Akkadian languages that the Mitannian kings employ for official correspondence. At the height of Mitanni’s power it controlled Mesopotamia, SE ASIA MINOR (Kizzuwatna), all of N SYRIA, and most of S Syria. Mitannian princesses entered the harems of the pharaohs of Egypt and became quite influential in the Egyptian court. An end was put to the Mitannian kingdom as an independent state by the HITTITE emperor Suppiluliuma I (c. 1345 B.C.). The name Mitanni does not occur in the OT, but the Hurrians, who made up the majority of Mitanni’s citizens, also constituted a significant minority group in pre-Israelite Palestine.

mite. See MONEY.

Mithcah. mith´kuh (Heb. mitqâ H5520, “sweet [place]”). Also Mithkah. A stopping place of the Israelites during their wilderness journeys (Num. 33:28-29). It was between Terah and Hashmonah, but the location of these sites is unknown.

Mithkah. See MITHCAH.

Mithnite. mith´nit (Heb. mitnî H5512, gentilic form of an unattested name such as meten). A descriptive title applied only to a certain Joshaphat, one of DAVID’s mighty warriors (1 Chr. 11:43). It is not known whether the form Mithnite derives from an ancestor or a place name.

Mithradates. mith´ruh-day´teez. See MITHREDATH.

Mithraism. mith´ruh-iz´uhm. The cult of Mithras, a Persian sun-god, the worship of which reached Rome in or about A.D. 69, by the agency of the eastern legions who set up V^{ESPASIAN} as emperor. It is possible that the cult was known in the capital a century before, but it was the latter half of the first century of the Christian era that saw its strong dissemination in the West, and indeed its notable challenge to Christianity. Based on the trials, sufferings, and exploits of Mithras, the cult appealed to soldiers; and two shrines of Mithraism on H^{ADRIAN}'s wall, one excavated in 1948 at Carrawburgh, and another still covered at Housesteads, reveal the popularity of Mithraism with the British legions. There is a place of ordeal under the altar, for the initiate advanced through various grades by way of physical suffering and endurance. Archaeologists were able to establish the fact that chickens and geese were eaten at the ritual feasts and that pine cones provided aromatic altar fuel. December 25 was the chief feast of Mithras, and in fixing on that date for Christmas, the early church sought to overlay both the Mithraic festival and the Saturnalia. Christianity triumphed over Mithraism because of its written records of a historic Christ, and its associated body of doctrine adapted for preaching, evangelism, and the needs of every day.

Mithras. mith´ruhs. See MITHRAISM.

Mithredath. mith´ruh-dath (Heb. mitrēdāt H5521, from Pers., “gift of Mithras” [see MITHRAISM]). (1) The treasurer of King C^{YRUS} (Ezra 1:8).

(2) One of three Persian officials who wrote a letter of complaint against the Jews to King A^{RTAXERXES} (Ezra 4:7).

(3) Mithradates (from the Gk. form of Mithredath) was the name of seven P^{ARTHIAN} kings of the Arsacid dynasty. The Romans fought a series of three wars against Mithradates VI Eupator, called “the Great,” between 88-64 B.C. This war prohibited the Romans from taking effective control over Palestine until 63 B.C. Although Persian, the Mithradatid rulers were Hellenistic in outlook and preserved this way of life in Syria-Palestine for a century after the other Hellenistic kingdoms had fallen to Rome. See H^{ELLENISM}.

mitre. See D^{RESS}; P^{RIEST}, P^{RIESTHOOD}.

Mitylene. mit'uh-lee'nee (Gk. Mitylēnē G3639). Also Mytilene. Chief city of the island of Lesbos, a splendid port with a double harbor (Acts 20:14), and a center of Greek culture. It was the home of Sappho and Alcaeus, the early lyric poets, and a considerable maritime and colonizing power. Sigeum and Assos were Mitylene's foundations. The city's history forms the usual checkered story of a Greek state too weak for independence and torn between the demands of rival imperialists—PERSIA, ATHENS, and ROME.

mixed multitude. This phrase (also “mixt multitude”) is used by the KJV to render the Hebrew word ‘ēreb H6850 in two passages: in Exod. 12:38 (NIV, “other people”) it refers to the heterogeneous camp followers who escaped with the Israelites from Egypt but were not descended from JACOB; similarly, in Neh. 13:3 it refers to people “of foreign descent” (NIV, NRSV) who were excluded from Israel after the return from exile. The Hebrew word is also used of foreigners in Jeremiah, where the KJV renders it as “mingled people” (Jer. 25:20, 24; 50:37). In addition, the KJV uses the phrase “mixed multitude” to translate Hebrew ‘āšapsup H671, “rabble,” with reference to a group (apparently the same non-Israelites who left Egypt) that “began to crave other food” in the wilderness (Num. 11:4).

Mizar. mi'zahr (Heb. miš'ār H5204, “small”). The name of a mountain in the HERMON range (Ps. 46:2); alternatively, the word may be a common adjective, used to contrast the mighty Hermon with a small mountain. In either case, the precise site is not known.

Mizpah, Mizpeh. miz'puh, miz'peh (Heb. mišpâ H5207 and mišpeh H5206, “watchtower”). The KJV uses the form Mizpeh twenty-three times, whereas the NRSV uses it only when the Hebrew is mišpeh; for consistency, the NIV uses Mizpah throughout. See also RAMATH MIZPEH.

(1) One of three names given to the covenant heap of stones erected by JACOB and LABAN (Gen. 31:49; see GALEED). It was so named because Laban called on the Lord to watch between him and Jacob. Some believe that this place is the same as #2 below.

(2) A town in GILEAD where JEPHTHAH the judge lived (Jdg. 10:17; 11:11, 29, 34; cf. Hos. 5:1). Its location is uncertain, but some identify it with modern Khirbet Jal'ad, some 14 mi. (22 km.) S of the JABBOK River.

(3) A town in MOAB (1 Sam. 22:3). When DAVID was being pursued by SAUL, he took his parents there and left them with the king of Moab, while he returned to his followers in Judah. Since KIR HARESETH (modern Kerak) was at one time the capital of Moab, some have thought that Mizpeh is another name for Kir. Most scholars regard this place as unidentified.

(4) An area in the extreme N of GALILEE is called “the region [lit., land] of Mizpah” and “the Valley of Mizpah” (Josh. 11:3, 8). The precise identification is uncertain since the descriptive phrases are too vague. The first passage indicates that the HIVITES “below Hermon” lived there, while the second refers to it as the eastward terminus of JOSHUA’S pursuit of the Canaanites after his victory over them in the battle at the Waters of MEROM. It is not clear whether in these passages Mizpah might have been a town or only the name of a general area.

(5) A town in the SHEPHELAH of JUDAH (Josh. 15:38). It was in the same district as LACHISH, but its location is unknown.

Tell en-Naṣbeh, a widely favored identification of biblical Mizpah in the territory of Benjamin.

(6) The most important place bearing the name Mizpah was a town allotted to the tribe of BENJAMIN (Josh. 18:26). Scholars differ in its identification. Some favor Nebi Samwil, about 5 mi. (8 km.) WNW of JERUSALEM, though most scholars today prefer Tell en-Naṣbeh, 7.5 mi. (12 km.) NNW of Jerusalem. At Mizpah the Israelites gathered to consider the steps to be taken against GIBEAH in the case of the atrocity related in Jdg. 19 (cf. 20:1, 3; 21:1, 5, 8). Mizpah was one of the cities closely associated with SAMUEL, for he made the circuit of BETHEL, GILGAL, and Mizpah and judged Israel in those places (1 Sam. 7:16). At Mizpah, Israel came to meet with Samuel in repentance (7:5-16) and from there they went out to meet the attacking PHILISTINES and to gain the victory that was celebrated by the setting up of the EBENEZER memorial “between Mizpah and Shen.” ASA king of JUDAH fortified Mizpah with stones transported from the building venture of BAASHA king of Israel at RAMAH (1 Ki. 15:22; 2 Chr. 16:6).

After the destruction of JERUSALEM by NEBUCHADNEZZAR in 586 B.C., GEDALIAH was appointed governor of Judah. He located his headquarters at Mizpah (2 Ki. 25:22-23; Jer. 40:5-12), and the Jews who remained in the land gathered to him there. JOHANAN son of Kareah and the other military leaders came to Mizpah and warned Gedaliah of a plot against his life by ISHMAEL son of Nethaniah. Johanan volunteered to kill Ishmael, but Gedaliah rejected the offer (Jer. 40:16) and ignored the warning. Ishmael carried out his plot successfully, killing not only Gedaliah but also other Jews and Babylonian soldiers who were there (2 Ki. 25:25; Jer. 41:1-3). The following day a group of eighty men on a religious pilgrimage arrived from SHECHEM, SHILOH, and SAMARIA. Ishmael deceived the men, killed them, and threw them into a cistern, except for ten men who were able to buy their lives. Ishmael took captive the remainder of the people of Mizpah, but the captives made their escape when Johanan and others gave pursuit. The survivors then went to EGYPT, contrary to the command of the Lord (41:17—42:22). Mizpah also appears in the lists of rebuilders of the walls of Jerusalem (Neh. 3:7, 15, 19) and is mentioned by Hosea in his rebuke of Israel (Hos. 5:1).

Mizraim. miz-ray'im (Heb. miṣrayim H5213, possibly “[two] boundaries”). This English transliteration is used by the KJV and the NIV only with reference to one of the sons of HAM (Gen. 10:6, 13; 1 Chr. 1:8, 11; NJPS uses it also in 1 Ki. 10:28-29 and 2 Ki. 7:6, but the form does not occur at all in NRSV or TNIV). In the Hebrew Bible, however, miṣrayim occurs very frequently as the name for EGYPT and its people. Thus the man Mizraim is regarded as the eponymous ancestor of the Egyptians. The descendants of Mizraim, moreover, included several other important people groups, such as the PHILISTINES (Gen. 10:14; 1 Chr. 1:12).

Mizzah. miz'uh (Heb. mizzâ H4645, derivation uncertain). Son of Reuel and grandson of ESAU by BASEMATH; an Edomite clan chief (Gen. 36:13, 17; 1 Chr. 1:37).

Mnason. nay'suhn (Gk. Mnasōn G3643). A friend of PAUL mentioned only in Acts 21:16. Mnason was from CYPRUS, like BARNABAS, and probably a Jew, though bearing a common Greek name. Described as “one of the early disciples,” he may have been converted at PENTECOST or soon afterward. Mnason was evidently a hospitable person, welcoming Paul and his companions to his house.

Moab. moh'ab (Heb. mô ʾāb H4565 and H4566, derivation uncertain; gentilic mô ʾābî H4567, “Moabite”). A Transjordanian state, lying E of the DEAD SEA and occupying the plateau between the Wadis ARNON and ZERED. It was bounded on the S by EDOM. The area is about 3,200 ft. (975 m.) above sea level and is chiefly rolling country, well adapted for pasturage.

The ancestor of the Moabites was Moab, product of an incestuous union between LOT and his eldest daughter (Gen. 19:30-38); he is mentioned nowhere else in the Bible. The Moabites settled first at AR, just E of the southern part of the Dead Sea and quite close to the site of the destroyed cities of the plain. The Lord commanded MOSES not to vex them when ISRAEL passed through their vicinity on their way to the Promised Land. However, when Israel had almost reached their destination and were camped in the plains of Moab (Num. 22-24), BALAK, sensing that he could not save himself from Israel by force of arms, hired BALAAM to come and curse Israel. Balaam went to do so; but after being rebuked by the voice of a donkey for his sin, God permitted him to proceed on the condition that he would speak only the words God gave him to speak. As a result he prophetically gave blessing to Israel four times. However, he evidently suggested to the Moabites that though they could not conquer Israel by force of arms, they could seduce the nation (cf. Num. 31:16), for the Moabite women entered the camp of Israel and seduced the men (25:1-9). As a result God sent a plague that killed 24,000 men.

Moab.

Shortly before the Israelites entered CANAAN, Moses died on Mount Pisgah in the land of Moab. Nearly a century later, Israel was “subject to Eglon king of Moab for eighteen years” (Jdg. 3:12-14). Moab was able to gather the AMMONITES and the AMALEKITES against Israel, but when the children of Israel repented and prayed, God raised up EHUD, who killed EGLON and so subdued Moab (3:30). There seems to have been considerable travel between Moab and JUDAH, for in the days of the judges ELIMELECH of BETHLEHEM took his family to Moab to stay during a famine; there his two sons married and died, and RUTH the Moabite returned with NAOMI, married BOAZ, and became an ancestress of DAVID. David, when in difficulty with King SAUL, took his father and mother to the king of Moab for their protection (1 Sam. 22:3-4). Later MESHACH king of Moab paid heavy tribute to AHAB king of Israel (2 Ki. 3:4). After the death of Ahab, he rebelled, but Joram (JEHORAM) king of Israel with JEHOASHAPHAT of Judah thoroughly defeated him and, so far as possible, ruined his land.

From that time on, Moab gradually declined in accordance with the word of the Lord through his prophets. Amos 2:1-3 pronounces the death sentence on Moab; Isa. 15-16, “the prophecy against Moab,” gives in much detail the coming destruction of Moab, and this was fulfilled by SHALMANESER of ASSYRIA or by his successor S_{ARGON}. Isaiah points out the prevailing sin of Moab aside from their idolatry: “We have heard of Moab’s pride—her overweening pride and conceit, her pride and her insolence” (16:6); and Ezekiel and Jeremiah, a century and a half later, completed the picture. Moab and S_{EIR} were to be punished for likening the house of Judah to the other nations (Ezek. 25:8-11). Jeremiah 48 depicts both past and future judgments on Moab, and Zeph. 2:8-11 foretells utter destruction on Moab for their wicked pride.

Moabite Stone. An inscribed monument found in M_{OAB} and recording Moabite history. In 1868 F. A. Klein, a German missionary employed by the Church Missionary Society (Church of England), while traveling through the territory formerly occupied by the tribe of R_{EU}BEN E of the D_{EAD} SEA, was informed by an Arab sheik of a remarkable stone inscribed with writing and lying at D_{IBON}, near Klein’s route. The stone was bluish basalt, neatly cut into a monument about 4 by 2 ft. (120 x 60 cm.), with its upper end curved and a raised rim enclosing an inscription. Klein informed the authorities of the Berlin Museum, and meanwhile M. Ganneau of the French Consulate at Jerusalem and a Captain Warren made “squeezes” on the writing so as to secure roughly the text of the inscription. While the French and the Germans were bargaining with the Turks for the stone, the Arabs argued that if the stone as a whole was of value it would be far more valuable if cut to pieces, so they built a fire around it, poured cold water over it, and well-nigh destroyed it. However, their purpose was largely thwarted because the inscription had already been ascertained. The fragments of the stone were purchased and pieced together and are now in the Louvre in Paris.

The famous Moabite Stone mentions conflict between Mesha of Moab and the dynasty of Omri of Israel.

The writing consisted of thirty-four lines, in the Moabite language (very closely related to HEBREW), and it was authored by MESHA, king of the Moabites in the time of AHAZIAH and Joram (JEHORAM), the sons of AHAB. It gives his side of the account found in 2 Ki. 3. It reads, in part: “I, Mesha, king of Moab, made this monument to Chemosh to commemorate deliverance from Israel. My father reigned over Moab thirty years, and I reigned after my father. Omri, king of Israel, oppressed Moab many days and his son after him. But I warred against the king of Israel, and drove him out, and took his cities, Medeba, Ataroth, Nebo and Jahaz, which he built while he waged war against me. I destroyed his cities, and devoted the spoil to Chemosh, and the women and girls to Ashtar. I built Qorhah with prisoners from Israel. In Beth-Diblathaim, I placed sheep-raisers.” It seems strange that though Mesha names Omri who had long since died, he does not name his son Ahab, who reigned almost twice as long, and to whom Mesha had paid heavy tribute (2 Ki. 3:4). Perhaps he hated his very name. Neither does he mention the sons of Ahab, Ahaziah and Joram, though he warred against them. Probably he had the monument made before the time of his defeat by Joram and JEHOASHAPHAT.

Moadiah. moh'uh-di'uh (Heb. ma'adyâ H5050 [Neh. 12:5], “ornament of Yahweh”; the alternate form mô'adyâ H4598 [12:17], if genuine, perhaps means “assembly of Yahweh”). One of the priestly leaders who returned from the EXILE with ZERUBBABEL (Neh. 12:5 NIV; the KJV and other versions have “Maadiah”). Both his family and that of MINIAMIN were headed by Piltai (12:17). Some believe that Maadiah and Moadiah are two different individuals; if only one person is involved, the reason for the spelling variation is uncertain.

mocking. This English term and its cognates are used to render a variety of Hebrew and Greek words. Mocking may be harmless teasing, as the boy ISHMAEL with baby ISAAC (Gen. 21:9; the Heb. verb here is šāḥaq H7464, a play on Issac's name). Or it may be a lover's complaint, as of DELILAH with SAMSON (Jdg. 16:10, 13 KJV; NIV, “you have made a fool of me”). SANBALLAT and others “mocked and ridiculed” the Jews for rebuilding JERUSALEM (Neh. 4:1; cf. Ps. 80:6). Mocking may be biting sarcasm, as of ELIJAH against the prophets of the fertility god (1 Ki. 18:27 KJV; NIV, “taunt”). JEREMIAH felt scorn directed at him (Jer. 20:7; cf. Ps. 119:51). The psalmist says God holds all nations in derision (59:8), especially when they rebel against him (Ps. 2:4). God “mocks proud mockers” (Prov. 3:34).

In the NT, mocking may be public laughter at a failure, as in the parable of the unfinished tower (Lk. 14:29). Jesus foretold his own mockery by the Romans (Matt. 20:19), and it came to pass (27:29). Jesus also was mocked in the Jewish trial (Lk. 22:63), and it was repeated with the men of Herod Antipas (23:11) and by the soldiers at the cross (23:36). When the apostolic band spoke in tongues at PENTECOST, unbelievers mocked saying the disciples were drunk (Acts 2:13; NIV, “made fun of”). The members of the AREOPAGUS likewise mocked by gesture and word the message of the resurrection that PAUL brought (17:32). Dedicated Christians will constantly meet scoffers (Jude 18), especially when they speak of the second coming (2 Pet. 3:3). Sinners, thinking they can “get away” with their sins, turn up their noses at God and his laws, but they cannot outwit him (Gal. 6:7).

Modein. moh'deen (Gk. Modein). A town where MATTATHIAS and his sons initiated the Maccabean Revolt (1 Macc. 2:15 et al.). It is identified with modern Midyah (more specifically, el-Arba'in), about 17 mi. (27 km.) NW of JERUSALEM. See MACCABEE.

modernism. An approach that accommodates the Bible and theology to contemporary thought, devaluing traditional views of biblical authority and supernaturalism.

Moladah. moh'luh-duh (Heb. môlādâ H4579, from yālad H3528, “to give birth”). One of “the southernmost towns of the tribe of Judah in the Negev toward the boundary of Edom” (Josh. 15:26); also listed in the allotment to the Simeonites (Josh. 19:2; 1 Chr. 4:28). In the postexilic period Moladah was one of the villages where “the people of Judah” settled (Neh. 11:26). The town was evidently close to BEERSHEBA, but the precise location is uncertain. Many recent scholars identify Moladah with Khireibet el-Waṭen, some 5.5 mi. (9 km.) E of Beersheba. Since one of the descendants of JERAHMEEL bore the name MOLID (1 Chr. 2:29), some have speculated that Moladah was a part of the Jerahmeelite settlement, which is known to have been in the S of Judah (1 Sam. 27:10).

molding. This English term is used to render a Hebrew term that occurs with reference to a shaped rim around the ARK OF THE COVENANT (Exod. 25:11, 24-25; 37:2), a similar rim around the altar of INCENSE (30:3-4; 37:26-27), and still another one around the table for the showbread (37:11-12; see TABERNACLE). In all three cases the molding was of pure gold and was ornamental, giving a finished appearance to the objects.

Molech. moh'lek (Heb. mōlek H4891, prob. melek H4889, “king,” with the vowels of bōšet H1425, “shame”; Gk. Moloch G3661). Also Moloch (Amos 5:26 KJV; Acts 7:43 KJV, NRSV); TNIV Molek. A heathen god, especially of the AMMONITES, who apparently was worshiped with gruesome orgies in which children were sacrificed (although some scholars think that the relevant texts should be translated differently). The worship of Molech was known to Israel before they entered CANAAN, for MOSES very sternly forbade its worship (Lev. 18:21; 20:1-5). In spite of this prohibition, King SOLOMON, to please his numerous heathen wives, set up high places for CHEMOSH and for Molech on the MOUNT OF OLIVES (1 Ki. 11:7), though Molech's principal place of worship in and after MANASSEH's time was the Valley of Ben HINNOM (2 Chr. 33:6), a place of such ill repute that it became a type for hell (Matt. 5:29-30; see GEHENNA). Later Jews, after making sacrifices to Molech, would often go to worship in the house of the Lord (Ezek. 23:37-39), and this impiety was particularly offensive to the Lord (see Jer. 7:9-11; 19:4-13). Because of this heathen worship by Israel, God allowed her enemies to rule over her for many years (Ps. 106:35-42). See also MILCOM.

Molek. moh'lek. TNIV form of MOLECH.

Molid. moh'lid (Heb. môlîd H4582, “descendant” or “begetter”). Son of Abishur and descendant of JUDAH through PEREZ and JERAHMEEL; his mother’s name was Abihail (1 Chr. 2:29).

Moloch. See MOLECH.

molten image. This phrase is used by the KJV and other versions to render the Hebrew word massēkāh H5011 (from nāsak H5818, “to pour”); it is usually rendered “cast idol” by the NIV. The word refers first of all to an image of a god cut from stone, shaped from clay, or carved from wood, but it also includes images cast from metal (Lev. 19:4; Deut. 27:15). Such an image was made by pouring molten metal, gold, silver, iron, or bronze, over a prepared form or into a mold (Isa. 40:18-20). The term is used of the golden calf made by AARON (Exod. 32:4) and of the two calves set up at BETHEL and DAN by JEROBOAM (1 Ki. 14:9). See CALF WORSHIP; GRAVEN IMAGE; IDOLATRY.

money. Translators of the Bible have always had difficulty finding terms for the various kinds of money in the Bible that indicate their value or purchasing power in Bible times. Therefore, a knowledge of the nature and value of ancient money is very helpful to the Bible reader in understanding the Word today.

I. General. Money in the sense of stamped coins did not exist in ISRAEL, so far as is known, until after the EXILE. Before this time exchange of values took place by bartering, that is, trading one thing for another without the exchange of money. This method was followed by the WEIGHT system, later by minted coins and still later by paper money, until today we have the credit system by which one may live, buy, and sell without the physical transfer of money at all. WEALTH is first mentioned in the Bible in connection with ABRAHAM (Gen. 12:5, 16, 20; 13:2). Among the Romans the word for money was pecunia, which is derived from pecus, the Latin word for cow or cattle. Perfumes and ointments also had great value. Besides gold, the MAGI brought frankincense and myrrh to worship the newborn King.

Replica of stone carving on a funerary stela (Hungary, late 2nd cent. A.D.), depicting a money changer and his servant counting daily income.

II. The shekel. The first metal exchange was crude, often shapeless, and heavy so as to approximate the value of the item purchased in actual weight. The buyer usually weighed his “money” to the seller. The Jewish shekel was such a weight (the Heb. term šeqel H9203 is derived from the verb šāqal H9202, which means “to weigh”). It was based on the Babylonian weight of exchange, generally of gold, silver, bronze, and even iron. Among the Jews the shekel was used for the temple tax, the poll tax, and redemption from the priesthood (Exod. 30:11-16; 13:13; Num. 3:44-51). A piece believed to be from the days of the MACCABEES (2nd cent. B.C.), has on the obverse (front) a pot of manna (Exod. 16:33) with the inscription, “Shekel Israel.” On the reverse is Aaron’s budding rod (Num. 17:8) with the legend in Hebrew letters, “Jerusalem the Holy.” In NT times the value of a shekel was approximately a day’s wage for a laborer. It required 3,000 shekels to equal one talent of silver, which reveals that the 10,000 talents the unmerciful servant owed his master (Matt. 18:23-25) was an unpayable debt. The mina (Lk. 19:13; KJV, “pound”) was equivalent to fifty shekels, and sixty minas equaled one talent.

III. Beginning of the coin system. Most historians believe that the earliest money pieces were struck about 700 B.C. in the small kingdom of LYDIA in ASIA MINOR. These early Lydian “coins” were simply crude pieces of metal cut into small lumps of a standard weight and stamped with official marks to guarantee the value. The Egyptians also developed such a system. Later the quality of the metal and the image on the coin indicated the worth in buying power, much like today. It is believed that the Jews first became acquainted with the coinage of the Babylonians and Persians during the captivity and that they carried these coins with them when they returned to Palestine. Except for a few brief periods of independence, they were compelled to use the coinage of their pagan conquerors.

Silver shekels minted during the first Jewish revolt against Rome (A.D. 66-70).

IV. The drachma. After 330 B.C. the world-conquering Greeks developed the Persian and Babylonian coinage, and their own, into something of a fixed world system. Animals, natural objects, and the Greek gods were used as symbols on the coins. Each coin was made individually with hammer, punch, and die. The Greeks called these coins drachmas, of which there was a variety with about the same value. Later the terms drachma and shekel were used more or less interchangeably. The “lost coin” (Lk. 15:8) was a silver drachma equivalent to a Roman denarius, a day’s wages. The temple or half-shekel tax (Matt. 17:24) was a didrachma. Another drachma was the tridrachma of CORINTH, a silver coin about the size of our quarter with the head of Athena on one side and the winged horse Pegasus on the other. No doubt PAUL earned it making tents and used it for payment of passage on ships during his journeys. A Greek coin Paul also may have “spent” is the now-famous “bee coin,” a silver tetradrachma of EPHESUS dating back to 350 B.C. All these drachmas were about equal in value to the Jewish shekel.

V. The stater. The coin PETER found in the fish’s mouth was the Greek stater (Matt. 17:27). Since the temple tax was a half-shekel, the stater would pay for two. Many authorities believe that the stater really was the tetradrachma of ANTIOCH or TYRE since these coins were accepted at the temple. It is believed that the thirty pieces of silver (Matt. 26:15; 27:3-5) that bought the greatest betrayal in history were these large silver coins, tetradrachmas of either Tyre or Antioch from about 125 B.C. In Exod. 21:32 we read that thirty shekels was the price of a slave.

VI. The assarion. The Greek assarion is mentioned twice in the NT (Matt. 10:29; Lk. 12:6). In the Roman empire this Greek coin was small in both size and value, and translators usually render the term with “penny” (KJV, “farthing”) as a similar small coin with which English-speaking people would be familiar.

VII. Lepton and kodrantes (widow's mite). During pre-Roman times under the Maccabees, the Jews for the first time were allowed to issue money of their own. One such piece, as we have seen, was the shekel. Another piece was the lepton, a tiny bronze or copper coin, which we know as the “widow’s mite,” from the famous incident in Mk. 12:42 and Lk. 21:2 (NIV, “two very small copper coins”). The KJV uses the rendering “mites” because it was the coin of least value, as is clearly implied in Lk. 12:59 (here the NIV has “penny”). Even the metal was inferior and deteriorated easily. The coins, in contrast to those of pagan rulers, had pictures from their religious history and agriculture instead of gods and men, obeying the command, “You shall not make for yourself an idol in the form of anything” (Exod. 20:4). Mark specifies that two lepta were worth the same as one kodrantes (Mk. 12:42 [KJV, “farthing”]; cf. also Matt. 5:26).

VIII. The denarius. The most interesting coin of the Bible is the Roman denarius, known by collectors as the “penny” of the Bible because of this misleading translation in the KJV. Made of silver and resembling our modern dime in size, the denarius was the most common Roman coin during the days of Jesus and the apostles. Collectors have been able to obtain originals of all twelve Roman emperors (Augustus to Nerva) who reigned during the NT period. There were also gold denarii, but these were generally special issues and not nearly so numerous. The Romans as well as the Greeks struck mainly silver coins (alloys) and kept large government-owned silver mines throughout the empire (e.g., at Antioch and Ephesus).

The true value of the denarius may be seen in our Lord’s parable of the laborers in the vineyard: “He agreed to pay them a denarius for the day and sent them into his vineyard” (Matt. 20:2, 10). This was the normal rate, the equivalent of what a Roman soldier also received (cf. Rev. 6:6, where the NIV translates, “a day’s wages”). When the Samaritan (Lk. 10:35) gave the innkeeper two days’ wages and was willing to pay anything more above that amount to aid an unknown stranger, he showed how great his love for his neighbor was. The denarius is mentioned also in the miracle of feeding the 5,000 when PHILIP declared that it would take 200 denarii to give everyone in the crowd even a small amount (Jn. 6:7; NIV, “Eight months’ wages would not buy enough bread for each one to have a bite!”). Similar light is thrown on the generous act of MARY, who anointed Jesus with perfume that, according to Judas, could have been sold for 300 denarii (12:5; NIV, “It was worth a year’s wages”). See also the reference in Rev. 6:6.

The denarius was also the “tribute money” imposed by the Romans on the Jewish people. The “image” on the denarius handed our Lord in Matt. 22:19 was the head of either Caesar AUGUSTUS (43 B.C. to A.D. 14) or, more likely, that of TIBERIUS Caesar (A.D. 14-39). On it Caesar’s name was spelled out entirely to the right of the head, as in the case of a coin that has survived: CAESARAVGVSTVS. To the left of the head are the following Latin abbreviations, all run together: DIVIMPPATERPATRIAE. The abbreviation DIV means “divine,” IMP is “imperator,” PATER PATRIAE is Latin for “father of his country.” On the reverse one sees the figures of two Caesars, and above and around the figures this inscription: AVGVSPONCOSTRPGER. The abbreviation AVGVS is “Augustus”; PON is “pontifex maximus” (religious ruler or “highest priest”); COS is “consulship”; TRP is “tribuncia potestate,” tribune power, civil head of the state. Below the images is the word CAESARES, Latin for “Caesars.” From this coin alone one can discern that the Roman emperor was an absolute monarch, head of both state and religion.

To study and handle these coins, some over 2,000 years old, makes one feel close to the people who lived in Bible days, and helps us understand the times in which they lived. A study of the denarius reveals that this coin was not only a medium of exchange, but also a disseminator of information and propaganda for the emperor. This was an age without newspapers! The Roman emperors believed the people read the legends on the coins and went to much trouble to change them often, sometimes every year. The coins also yield much historical data, such as the dates of the emperors, and help to establish the historical setting of the Bible.

The value of coins fluctuated much in ancient times, making it difficult to state the exact value of each coin. The government issued money through moneychangers, and often the rate of exchange varied according to what a changer was willing to give on a certain day. The denarius became much less valuable after the second century of our era. To give the value of Bible coins in modern terms can be misleading. Many modern translators simply transliterate the Greek and Latin names (denarius, shekel, assarion, etc.), and allow Bible readers to interpret for themselves the value of the coins.

monotheism. The doctrine or belief that there is but one God. Atheism is the belief that there is no god; polytheism, that there is more than one god; monolatry, the worship of one god as supreme, without denying there are other gods; henotheism, belief in one god, though not to the exclusion of belief in others; pantheism, belief in a god that is identified with nature. There are three great monotheistic religions: Judaism, Christianity, and Islam, the latter two having their origin in the first. According to the Bible, humans were originally monotheistic. This has been denied by the school of comparative religion, which teaches that monotheism was a late development in human religious experience. It holds that the religion of ISRAEL was not originally monotheistic but that it gradually became so through the influence of the prophets. Others have shown, on the contrary, that polytheism was a late development. The Christian doctrine of the TRINITY does not conflict with the monotheism of the OT. Rather, the manifold revelation of God contained in the OT is crystallized in the NT into the supreme doctrine of the Three Persons. See also JEHOVAH.

monument. A MEMORIAL stone. Kings in the ANE often set up stelae with inscriptions boasting of their accomplishments. SAUL set up a memorial after his victory over the AMALEKITES (1 Sam. 15:12), and ABSALOM set up a PILLAR, which he called “Absalom’s Monument,” as a memorial for himself (2 Sam. 18:18). Stelae, some of them memorials, have been found in Canaanite sanctuaries, including one at HAZOR on which two arms with upraised hands are carved. A hand is carved also on many Carthaginian funerary stelae.

Morasthite. moh´ruhs-thit (Heb. môraštî H4629, gentilic of môrešet). A descriptive title applied to MICAH the prophet, according to the KJV and some other versions (Jer. 26:18; Mic. 1:1; the NIV and NRSV render “of Moresheth”). See MORESHETH GATH.

Mordecai. mor´duh-ki (Heb. mordoʿkay H5283, apparently based on the Babylonian name MARDUK). (1) An Israelite mentioned among leading individuals who returned from BABYLON with ZERUBBABEL (Ezra 2:2; Neh. 7:7).

(2) Son of Jair and descendant of BENJAMIN who lived in SUSA during the rule of the Persians (Esth. 2:5); his great-grandfather Kish was among those who had been deported from JERUSALEM to BABYLON by NEBUCHADNEZZAR (v. 6). Mordecai brought up his cousin ESTHER, whose parents had died (2:7). When Esther was taken into the royal harem, Mordecai forbade her to reveal her nationality (2:20); yet he remained in close connection with her. Mordecai discovered at the palace gate a plot against the king. By informing Esther of the plot, he secured the execution of the two eunuchs responsible (2:19-23). When HAMAN was made chief minister, Mordecai aroused his wrath by refusing to bow before him. To avenge the slight, Haman procured from the king a decree to destroy the Jews (ch. 3). Mordecai then sent Esther to the king to seek protection for her people (ch. 4). Haman meanwhile prepared a high gallows on which he planned to hang Mordecai (ch. 5). By a singular, highly dramatic series of events, Haman fell from favor and was hanged on the gallows he had prepared for Mordecai (ch. 7). Mordecai succeeded him as chief minister of the king (ch. 8). Thus the Persian officials everywhere assisted the Jews, who killed their enemies and instituted the feast of Purim to celebrate their deliverance (ch. 9). The book of Esther ends with an account of the fame and dignity of Mordecai (ch. 10). In the apocryphal additions to Esther, Mordecai is glorified still more. He is a favorite character in the rabbinical literature also.

The hill of Moreh. (View to the N from Mt. Tabor.)

Moreh. mor'eh (Heb. môreh H4622, “teacher”). (1) A place near SHECHEM. When Abram (ABRAHAM) first entered CANAAN, he “traveled through the land as far as the site of the great tree of Moreh at Shechem” (Gen. 12:6; NRSV, “the oak of Moreh”; KJV incorrectly, “the plain of Moreh”). There God revealed himself to Abraham with the promise to give Canaan to his descendants, whereupon Abraham responded by building his first altar to the Lord in Canaan. The phrase “the great tree of Moreh” may also be translated “the teacher’s [or diviner’s] tree” (prob. different from the DIVINERS’ OAK, or “soothsayers’ tree,” of Jdg. 9:37). It must have been a “holy” tree, and the place an old Canaanite sanctuary. Although it is difficult to understand Abraham’s motives for visiting this place, there is no reason to suggest that he recognized the sacred character of the place and willfully adapted himself to it. The reference merely serves to indicate the place where Abraham camped and built his own altar. Elsewhere, the expression “the great trees of Moreh” serves to indicate the general location of Mounts EBAL and GERIZIM (Deut. 11:30). Some have thought that there is a connection with “the oak at Shechem” (Gen. 35:4; cf. Jdg. 9:6).

(2) The “hill of Moreh” was a place near which the Midianites were camping when they were attacked by GIDEON (Jdg. 7:1). This hill was at the E end of the Valley of JEZREEL (6:33) and is generally identified with Jebel Nabi Dahi, about 8 mi. (13 km.) NNW of Mount GILBOA, and just S of NAIN.

Moresbeth. See MORESHETH GATH.

Moresbeth Gath. mor’uh-sheth-gath’ (Heb. môreshet gat H4628, “possession of Gath”). One of several towns in the SHEPHELAH of JUDAH that were going to be conquered (Mic. 1:14). The passage is full of wordplays, and some believe that this name alludes to a Hebrew word meaning “betroth”; if so, the figure is that of Judah having to part with one of its towns and giving a dowry besides. It is generally thought that the prophet MICAH’s gentilic, “the Morasthite” (KJV in 1:1 and Jer. 26:28, where the NIV and other versions say “of Moresbeth”), refers to Moresbeth Gath. The addition “Gath” is to define more precisely Moresbeth’s situation as in the vicinity of, or as belonging to, GATH. Some scholars have thought that it is the same as the better known city of MARESHAH (Mic. 1:15; Josh. 15:44; et al.), but most believe it was a distinct village and tentatively identify it with the modern Tell el-Judeideh, about 7 mi. (11 km.) SE of Gath.

Moriah. muh-ri’uh (Heb. mōriyyâ H5317, derivation uncertain; by popular etymology, “the place where Yahweh provides [or appears],” Gen. 22:14). (1) The region to which God instructed ABRAHAM to go so that he might offer up ISAAC on one of its mountains (22:2). The district may have received its name from the incident in which Yahweh provided a sacrifice and appeared to Abraham (22:8, 14). The SAMARITANS connected Moriah with MOREH (in the vicinity of SHECHEM) so as to identify it with GERIZIM. The precise location of the mountain is not given in Genesis beyond the statement that it was a three days' journey from BEERSHEBA (22:4).

(2) The rocky hilltop of JERUSALEM N of the City of David (see ZION) where Yahweh appeared to DAVID when he presented offerings on the threshing floor of ARAUNAH the Jebusite (2 Chr. 3:1). Some argue that the author of Chronicles is indirectly identifying this hill with the place where Abraham offered Isaac. Such an identification was widely accepted in ancient times. The Muslim mosque known as the Dome of the Rock presently sits on the site. Many modern scholars, however, regard this identification as unlikely or even impossible, and explain the connection between the two passages in other ways.

morning sacrifice. See SACRIFICE AND OFFERINGS.

morning star. This term is applied to Venus (occasionally to other bright planets) because it is often visible in the eastern sky before sunrise, heralding the appearance of the sun. The expression is used by the NIV to render Hebrew hêlêl H2122 (“shining one”), which occurs only once, in an oracle against the king of BABYLON (Isa. 14:12; NRSV, “Day Star”). See LUCIFER; SHAHAR. In the NT the phrase once renders Greek phōsphoros G5892 (lit., “light-bringer,” but a common term for Venus in Greek literature), which PETER uses as a symbol of Christ’s second coming (2 Pet. 1:19; KJV, “day star”). It also appears twice in Revelation as a literal rendering of the corresponding Greek phrase (Rev. 2:28; 22:16); in the second of these the reference to Jesus is explicit. All three NT passages seem to allude to the prophecy of BALAAM, “A star will come out of Jacob” (Num. 24:17).

morsel. This term is used a number of times in the KJV in the OT, especially in the expression “a morsel of bread” (e.g., Gen. 18:5, where the NIV has “something to eat”), and once in the NT (Heb. 12:16, where the Greek really means “one meal,” not “one piece of food”). The NIV uses the word only twice in the expression “choice morsels” (Prov. 18:8; 26:22; NRSV, “delicious morsels,” but KJV wrongly, “wounds”).

mortal. As an adjective (“subject to death”), this English term is used by the KJV once in the OT (Job 4:17) and several times in the NT (Rom. 6:12 et al.). See DEATH. As a noun meaning “human being,” the term mortal does not occur in the KJV, but is so used a number of times in the NIV, especially in Job (Job 4:17; 9:2; 10:4-5), and very frequently in other modern versions, including the TNIV.

mortal sin. This precise expression is not found in the Bible, though it is clear that SIN in itself, and therefore every manifestation of a depraved nature, issues unto DEATH (Rom. 6:23 et al.). In Roman Catholic theology, however, mortal sin is contrasted with “venial” sin, which is seen as less aggravated and therefore much less damaging to the soul than mortal sin. This distinction is not explicitly asserted in Scripture. In 1 Jn. 5:16-17, the apostle distinguishes between “sin unto death” and “sin not unto death” (the NIV renders, “sin that leads to death”). Inasmuch as he directs that no prayer should be offered for the former, this passage has been quite naturally related to Matt. 12:31-32 (and parallels); Heb. 6:4-6; 10:26-31 (sometimes also 2 Pet. 2:20-22). It is not certain that all of these passages refer to the same kind of transgression; but if this be so, the sin in view would appear to be the hardening of the heart against the offer of the divine light in its most unmistakable form.

mortar. This English term has two distinct meanings, both of which occur in the Bible. In the sense of “a utensil for pounding material,” especially for the purpose of crushing grain, it renders two different Hebrew words (Num. 11:8; Prov. 27:22). The second sense is “a substance used for uniting brick or stone in construction.” According to Gen. 11:3, the builders of the Tower of BABEL used “tar” in place of “mortar.” The use of BITUMEN (or asphalt) for mortar is attested in Babylonia by archaeological evidence; and its occurrence in the Valley of SIDDIM (14:10 NRSV) beside the JORDAN, near the DEAD SEA, renders its use in Palestine possible.

mortgage. This English term occurs just once in the Bible, in the context of a time of drought and want (Neh. 5:3). Although a specific reference to mortgaging real estate occurs nowhere else, there can be no question that mortgaging was a much-practiced mode of securing loans from the time of the Hebrew conquest and onward. According to the PENTATEUCH, one of the duties of the KINSMAN-redeemer was to purchase the mortgaged property of his indigent relative. This was one of the services performed by BOAZ for NAOMI, his dead kinsman’s widow (in addition to his LEVIRATE MARRIAGE with RUTH). See also BORROW.

mosaic. This English term refers to a surface ornamentation of designs or pictures, and sometimes inscriptions, made by inlaying in patterns small pieces of colored stone, glass, shell, or other material. (The word derives from Medieval Latin mūsāicum, “of the Muses”; it is therefore to be distinguished from Mosaic as an adjective derived from the name MOSES.) Although no Hebrew term in the OT specifically means “mosaic,” in Esth. 1:6 a pavement in the palace at SUSA is described as made of porphyry, marble, mother-of-pearl, and precious stones (the NIV and other versions regard this as a “mosaic pavement”). Mosaics were very ancient in MESOPOTAMIA; they are one of the most durable parts of ancient structures and often are the only surviving part. Mosaics have survived from ancient SUMER from as early as 2900 B.C. They were widely used in the early Christian and Byzantine buildings in Palestine, and remaining examples throw considerable light on ancient biblical customs and afford insight into early Christian beliefs and symbols. Very famous is the fine mosaic picture-map of Jerusalem from the floor of a church in MEDEBA, probably from the sixth century A.D. This is one of the earliest maps known from Palestine. The mosaics from the Arab palace at Khirbet al-Mafjar (near JERICHO) are among the most beautiful known.

Moserah, Moseroth. moh-see´ruh, -ruhth (Heb. môsērāh H4594, “bond,” also in the pl. form môsērôt H5035). A place where the Israelites encamped on their journey from Egypt to Canaan (Num. 33:30-31), and where AARON was said to have died (Deut. 10:6). The site is unknown, but it must have been near Mount HOR, by the border of EDOM. Some scholars regard the latter passage as a variant tradition, because elsewhere Aaron is said to have died at Mount Hor itself (Num. 33:38; cf. 20:22). One possible solution is to relate the two passages to different journeys.

Moses. moh´zis (Heb. mōšeh H5407, derivation uncertain, but by popular etymology, “drawn out [of the water]”; Gk. Mōysēs G3707). The national hero who delivered the Israelites from Egyptian slavery, established them as an independent nation, and prepared them for entrance into CANAAN. Exact dates for the life of Moses are dependent on the date of the EXODUS: he may have been born as early as 1520 B.C. or as late as 1225 B.C. According to Exod. 2:10, Moses received his name from PHARAOH’s daughter, who said, “I drew him out of the water” (the Heb. verb for “draw out” here is māšâ H5406). It is often thought, however, that the name is Egyptian, derived from the root mśy, “to bear,” a common component in theophoric names (e.g., THUTMOSE or Thutmosis, “[the god] Thoth is born”). Alternatively, if Moses was originally a Hebrew name, perhaps it was Pharaoh’s daughter who assimilated it to the Egyptian form. In any case, while the name occurs more than 750 times in the OT, no further explanation is given; and like the names of some other prominent OT characters, it is given to only one person, the great leader and lawgiver of Israel.

Moses was born of Israelite parents in the land of EGYPT (Exod. 2:1-10). Perilous times prevailed. Not only were the Israelites enslaved, but a royal edict designed to keep them in subjection ordered the execution of all Israelite male children at birth. Hidden among the reeds near the river's bank, Moses was discovered by Pharaoh's daughter. So favorably was she disposed toward this Hebrew babe that she requested Moses' mother to nurse him until he was old enough to be taken to the royal court, where he spent the first forty years of his life.

Basket coffin (Egypt, 1st-3rd dynasties). Moses' mother may have placed her son in a basket coffin like this one.

Little is narrated in the book of Exodus regarding the early period of the life of Moses. STEPHEN in his address to the SANHEDRIN (Acts 7:22) asserts that Moses was not only instructed in the science and learning of the Egyptians but also was endowed with oratorical ability and distinctive leadership qualities. The court of Egypt provided educational facilities for royal heirs of tributary princes from city-states of the Syro-Palestinian territory subject to the Egyptian rulers. Consequently Moses may have had classmates from as far N as the EUPHRATES River in his educational experiences in the Egyptian court.

Moses' first valiant attempt to aid his own people ended in failure. While trying to pacify two fellow Israelites, he was reminded that he had killed an Egyptian (Exod. 2:11-25). Fearing the vengeful hand of Pharaoh, Moses escaped to MIDIAN, where he spent a forty-year period in seclusion. In this land Moses found favor in the home of a priest named JETHRO (also known as REUEL). In the course of time he married Jethro's daughter ZIPPORAH. As shepherd of his father-in-law's flocks Moses gained firsthand geographical knowledge of the territory surrounding the Gulf of AQABAH. Little did he realize that through this area he would one day lead the great nation of Israel!

The call of Moses was indeed significant. Confronted with a BURNING BUSH, he was given a revelation from God, who commissioned him to deliver his people Israel from Egyptian bondage (Exod. 3). Fully acquainted with Pharaoh's power, Moses was assured of divine support in contesting the authority of the ruler of Egypt. He furthermore anticipated the lack of confidence and the reluctance of the Israelites to accept him as a leader. To counter this, God assured him that the great "I Am" was about to fulfill his promise made to the PATRIARCHS to redeem Israel from bondage and settle them in the land of Canaan (Gen. 15:12-21). In addition two miraculous signs were provided as evidence for the verification of divine authority: Moses' staff changed to a serpent and his hand became leprous and later was healed (Exod. 4:1-17). Finally, Moses was assured of Aaron's support in his divine commission to deliver the Israelites from the powerful clutch of Pharaoh. Accompanied by his wife Zipporah and their two sons, Moses returned to the land of Egypt.

In a series of ten plagues Moses and Aaron countered Pharaoh's attempt to retain Israel in bondage (Exod. 7-11). See PLAGUES OF EGYPT. As a whole these plagues were directed against the gods of Egypt, demonstrating God's power to the Egyptians as well as to the Israelites. Pharaoh immediately expressed his attitude of resistance, retorting, "Who is the LORD, that I should obey him and let Israel go? I do not know the LORD, and I will not let Israel go" (5:2). As Pharaoh continued to resist, his heart hardened. Finally the last plague brought judgment on all the gods of Egypt, as the FIRSTBORN sons were killed throughout the land. Then Pharaoh complied with Moses' demand and allowed the Israelites to leave.

On the eve of Israel's dramatic departure the Passover feast was initially observed (Exod. 12). Each family unit that followed the simple instructions—killing a year-old male lamb or goat and applying the blood to the doorposts and lintel of their home—was passed by in the execution of divine judgment. The directions given (12:3-4) for the choice of the Passover lamb stressed the equivalence that was to be made between the lambs and the people who would find shelter beneath the shed blood. This accords with the word spoken to Moses even before he entered Egypt: "Israel is my firstborn son" (4:22). Passover night saw the climax of the context of the firstborn sons. All the firstborn of Egypt died (12:29), but the Lord's firstborn was redeemed by the blood of the lamb. In a special sense it was the actual firstborn of every Israelite household that was spared this dreadful but still only token divine judgment. Therefore, the firstborn son of every Israelite family belonged to God. Immediately after the partaking of this Passover meal consisting of meat, unleavened bread, and bitter herbs, the Israelites left Egypt. The annual observance of the Passover on the fourteenth day of ABIB (later known as Nisan) was to remind each Israelite of the miraculous deliverance under Moses.

The exact route by which Moses led the Israelites, who numbered some 600,000 men, plus women and children, is difficult to ascertain. Succoth, Etham, Pi Hahiroth, Migdol, and Baal Zephon are place-names with imprecise meanings and whose geographical identifications are uncertain. When the Israelites reached the RED SEA (Sea of Reeds) they were threatened by the Egyptian armies from the rear (Exod. 14). As they appealed to Moses, divine protection was provided in the pillar of cloud that barred the Egyptians from overtaking them. In due time a strong east wind parted the waters for Israel's passage. When the Egyptian forces attempted to follow they were engulfed in a watery grave. MIRIAM, Moses' sister, led the Israelites in a song of victory (15:1-21).

Under divine direction Moses led Israel southward through the Desert of SHUR (Exod. 15:22-27). At MARAH bitter waters were sweetened, at ELIM the Israelites were refreshed by twelve springs of water and seventy palm trees, and in the Desert of SIN daily MANNA was supplied, solving the food problem for this great multitude throughout their years of desert wanderings until they reached the land of Canaan (ch. 16). At REPHIDIM Moses was commanded to strike the rock, which brought forth a gushing water supply for his people (17:1-7). Confronted by an AMALEKITE attack, Moses prevailed in intercessory prayer with the support of AARON and HUR, while JOSHUA led the armies of Israel in a victorious battle (17:8-16). In his administrative duties Moses appointed seventy elders to serve under him in accordance with Jethro's advice. In less than a three months' journey from Egypt the Israelites settled in the environs of Mount SINAI (Horeb), where they remained for approximately one year (chs. 18-19).

In this wilderness encampment Moses became the great lawgiver through whom Israel's religion was revealed. As a representative for his people Moses received the LAW from God. This law constituted God's COVENANT with his newly delivered nation. In turn the congregation ratified this covenant (Exod. 20-24), which included the Ten Commandments, also known as the Decalogue (see COMMANDMENTS, TEN). To enable the Israelites to WORSHIP their God properly Moses was given detailed instructions for the building and erection of the TABERNACLE. These plans were carefully executed under Moses' supervision. At the same time the Aaronic family, supported by the LEVITES, was designated for their priestly service and carefully equipped for their ministration (chs. 25-40). Details concerning various sacrifices, laws for holy living, and the observance of feasts and seasons were set forth through Moses as God's prescription for his people Israel (Lev. 1-27). In this manner the Israelites were distinctively set apart from the religious and cultural pattern of Egypt and Canaan.

Moses also supervised the military census and organization of the Israelites during this encampment in the Sinaitic peninsula. The tabernacle with its court occupied the central position. The Levites were placed immediately around the court, with Moses and the Aaronic family located at the E end before the entrance to the tabernacle. The other tribes were divided into four camps—each camp composed of three tribes—with the camp of Judah taking the place of leadership ahead of the priestly family.

Guidance and protection were provided for Moses and his people throughout this wilderness journey in the PILLAR OF CLOUD AND FIRE that was visible day and night. Representing the presence of God with his people, this cloud first made its appearance in preventing the Egyptians from overtaking them (Exod. 13:21-22; 14:19-20). During Israel's encampment the cloud hovered over the tabernacle. Efficient human organization and responsible leadership provided the counterpart to the divine guidance conveyed by the cloud. Silver trumpets were used to assemble the leaders as well as to alert the people whenever divine indication was given en route. An efficient organization was in evidence whether Israel was encamped or journeying. Law and order prevailed throughout (Num. 1:1—10:10).

In an eleven-day march northward from the Sinaitic peninsula to KADESH BARNEA, which was only about 50 mi. (80 km.) SW of BEERSHEBA, Moses not only encountered the murmurings of the multitude but was also severely criticized by Miriam and Aaron (Num. 11-12). The grumbling crowds who hungered for the meat they had eaten in Egypt were satiated to the point of sickness when quails were supplied in excessive abundance. Aaron and Miriam were likewise humiliated when the latter was temporarily subjected to leprosy. While at Kadesh, Moses sent out twelve representatives to spy out the land of Canaan (chs. 13-14). The majority report, given by ten spies, influenced the Israelites to demonstrate their unbelief. In open rebellion they threatened to stone JOSHUA and CALEB, the two spies who exercised faith and recommended that they should conquer and occupy the land promised to them. When God proposed to destroy the rebellious and unbelieving Israelites, Moses magnanimously responded with intercession in behalf of his people. The final verdict involved all of the people who had been twenty years of age and older at the time of the exodus: they were doomed to die in the wilderness. Joshua and Caleb were the only exceptions.

Aerial view of the Wilderness of Sinai. It was in desert terrain like this that the Israelites murmured against God and Moses.

Relatively little is recorded about Moses' leadership during the thirty-eight years of wilderness wandering (Num. 15-20). Not only was the political leadership of Moses challenged by DATHAN and ABIRAM, but also Korah and his supporters contested the position of Aaron and his family. In the course of these rebellions 14,000 people perished in divine judgment. Furthermore all Israel was given a miraculous sign when, among the twelve staffs representing the tribes of Israel, Levi's produced buds, blossoms, and almonds. With Aaron's name inscribed on this staff, the Aaronic priesthood was securely established.

The Israelites, denied permission to use the highway through the land of EDOM, were led from Kadesh to the Plains of MOAB by way of the Gulf of Aqabah. En route Moses himself forfeited entrance into the Promised Land when he struck the rock that he should have commanded to supply water for his people (Exod. 20). When a scourge of serpents caused many murmuring Israelites to die, Moses erected a bronze snake, which offered healing to all who turned to it in obedience (21:4-9). This incident was used by Jesus in explaining his own death on the cross and the simple principle of salvation involved (Jn. 3:14-16).

When Moses bypassed Moab and led the Israelites into the ARNON Valley, he was confronted by two rulers—SIHON, king of the AMORITES, and OG, king of BASHAN. Israel defeated both kings and as a result claimed the territory E of the JORDAN River, which was later allotted to REUBEN, GAD, and half of the tribe of MANASSEH. With this Amorite threat removed, the Israelites settled temporarily in the Plains of Moab, N of the Arnon River (Exod. 21:10-35).

BALAK king of Moab was so disturbed about Israel's encampment near his people that he chose a subtle way to bring about the ruin of God's covenant nation (Num. 22-25). He enticed BALAAM, a prophet from MESOPOTAMIA, with rewards of riches and honor, to curse Israel. Balaam accepted Balak's invitation. While en route he was vividly reminded by his donkey that he was limited in his oracles to speak only God's message. Although the Moabite leaders prepared offerings to provide an atmosphere for cursing, Balaam was restricted to pronounce blessings for Israel each time he spoke. God did not allow his chosen people to be cursed. When Balaam was dismissed, his parting advice to the Moabites and Midianites was to seduce the Israelites into immorality and idolatry. Incurring divine wrath by accepting invitations to these heathen festivities, thousands of Israelites died in a plague and many guilty leaders were executed. Moses led his people in a punitive war against the Midianites. In this battle Balaam was killed (31:16).

Moses once more ordered a military census. This was supervised by ELEAZER, Aaron's son, who had served as high priest since his father's death. The total count of Israel's military manpower was actually somewhat lower than it had been when they left Egypt (Num. 26). Joshua was appointed and consecrated as the successor to Moses. Inheritance problems and additional instructions for regular offerings, festivals, and vows were carefully delineated (chs. 27-30). Reluctantly Moses granted permission to the Reubenites, Gadites, and some of the Manasseh tribe to settle E of the Jordan, exacting from them the promise to aid the rest of the nation in the conquest of the land beyond the river (ch. 32).

Anticipating Israel's successful occupation of the land of Canaan, Moses admonished them to destroy the idolatrous inhabitants. He appointed twelve tribal leaders to divide the land among the tribes and instructed them to provide forty-eight cities throughout Canaan for the Levites with adequate pasture area adjoining each city. Six of these LEVITICAL CITIES were to be designed as cities of refuge where people might flee for safety in case of accidental bloodshed (Num. 34-35). Moses also provided solutions to inheritance problems when daughters inherited the family possessions (ch. 36).

The magnitude of Moses' character is clearly set forth in his farewell speeches to his beloved people. Even though he himself was denied participation in the conquest and occupation of the land, he coveted the best for the Israelites as they entered Canaan. His admonition to them is summed up in his addresses as given in the book of DEUTERONOMY. He reviewed the journey, beginning from Mount Horeb, where God had made a covenant with Israel. He pointed out especially the places where the Israelites had murmured, reminding them of their disobedience. Because of this attitude the generation that Moses had led out of Egypt had been denied entrance into the land that God had promised them for a possession. With that as the background Moses warned them to be obedient. For their encouragement he pointed to the recent victories God had given them over the Amorites. This experience provided a reasonable basis for the hope of victory under the leadership of Joshua as they actually entered the land of Canaan (Deut. 1:1—4:43).

In his second speech (Deut. 4:44—28:68) Moses emphasized that love as well as obedience is essential for a wholesome relationship with God. The Decalogue at Mount Sinai was repeated. Wholehearted love for God in daily life represented the basis for maintaining this covenant relationship in such a way that they could enjoy God's blessing. Consequently each generation was responsible for teaching the fear of the Lord their God to the next generation by precept and obedience. In this pattern of living they would be God's holy people in practice. Faithfully Moses delineated many of the laws already given, admonishing the people to be true to God, warning them against IDOLATRY, advising them in the administration of justice, and adding various civil and religious regulations. He concluded this speech with a list of curses and blessings that were to be read publicly to the entire congregation after they crossed the Jordan. In this manner he set before the Israelites the way of life and death. Moses provided a written record of the law as a guide for Israel.

At the close of Moses' career, Joshua, who had already been designated as Israel's leader, was ordained as successor to Moses. In a song (Deut. 32) Moses expressed his praise to God, recounting how God had delivered Israel and provided for them through the wilderness journey. Then, with the pronouncement of the blessing on each tribe, Moses departed for Mount Nebo (see NEBO, MOUNT), where he was privileged to view the Promised Land before he died.

Mot. The god of death in the Canaanite pantheon (cf. Heb. māwet H4638, construct form môt). He is regarded as the son (or the beloved) of EL and as the adversary of BAAL. Some biblical passages personify DEATH (e.g., Job 18:13; Hab. 2:5), but it is not certain whether these allude to the Canaanite deity.

mote. This English term, meaning “small particle,” is used by the KJV to render Greek karphos G2847 (“chip [of wood], piece [of straw], bit [of wool]” etc.), which occurs only in two passages in the metaphorical sense of a minor fault (Matt. 7:3-5; Lk. 6:41-42; modern versions typically use the term “speck”).

mount, mountain. These terms, along with hill, are roughly synonymous in the English Bible. Much of PALESTINE is hilly or mountainous. These elevations are not dramatically high but are old worn-down hills. A central hill country stretches N – S in Palestine, attaining its greatest elevations in GALILEE (nearly 4,000 ft./1,220 m. above sea level) and finally ending in the NEGEV. Much of TRANSJORDAN is high plateau land, although in SYRIA, N of Palestine, this section reaches a great height in Mount HERMON (c. 9,000 ft./2,740 m. above sea level), which is snow-covered throughout the year. Many ancient peoples considered mountains holy places. Mount SINAI (Deut. 33:2; Jdg. 5:4-5) and Mount ZION (Ps. 68:16) were specially honored by the Hebrews as the places of God’s revelation and abode. Mountains in Scripture are symbolic of eternity (Gen. 49:26) and of strength and stability, but God is infinitely strong and stable (Ps. 97:5; 121:1-2 RSV; Isa. 40:12). They also portray the difficult obstacles of life, but God will overcome these mountains for his people (Isa. 49:11; Matt. 21:21).

Church on Mount of Beatitudes.

Mount of Beatitudes. A slope on the NW shore of the Sea of Galilee where Jesus delivered the SERMON ON THE MOUNT, part of which consisted of the BEATITUDES (Matt. 5:3-12; Lk. 6:20-23). Apart from Matthew's statements that Jesus was on a mountain (Matt. 5:1; 8:1) and Luke's account that the sermon was on a level place (Lk. 6:17), the only other help in locating the site is the record that Jesus went from there directly to CAPERNAUM. The older suggested location was the Horns of Hattin (Qarn Ḥaṭṭīn), 7 mi. (11 km.) W of TIBERIAS. Now the more popular site is the slope up from the Sea of Galilee SW of Capernaum. There is a Catholic church in this place.

mourning. The ancient Hebrews placed a much greater emphasis on external symbolic acts than do modern Western people; people in the East today still carry on this respect for symbolic actions. Ceremonies for expressing grief at the death of a relative or on any unhappy occasion are referred to frequently in the Bible. One reared in the modern West must be careful not to view these public expressions as hypocritical; they were a natural valid manifestation of grief in that culture.

When bad news was received or when sudden calamity came, it was customary to tear the clothes (2 Sam. 1:2) and to sprinkle earth or ashes on the head (Josh. 7:6). Hair cloth ("sackcloth") was adopted as clothing in times of grief (Isa. 22:12). We read of covering the head in mourning (Jer. 14:3), and also the lower part of the face (Ezek. 24:17, 22). Among those who habitually wore some covering on the head it was a sign of mourning to let the hair go loose (Lev. 10:6), which normally (like that of a Greek Orthodox priest in the Near East) would be coiled up.

A death in the household set in motion an elaborate ceremony of mourning that lasted a week or more. The members of the family and their friends gathered around the corpse and indulged in lamentations bordering on hysteria. The rites mentioned above were observed, but in a more abandoned form than for other mourning. During the last century, W. M. Thomson saw a ceremony of mourning carried out by the Arabs of Palestine. He described the three concentric circles of mourners, slowly marching, clapping their hands, and chanting a funeral dirge. At times they stopped and, flinging their arms and handkerchiefs about in wild frenzy, screamed and wailed like maniacs.

Professional mourners were often called in for a funeral (Jer. 9:17-22; Amos 5:16; Matt. 9:23). In the earliest times these were probably to protect the living from the spirits of the departed, who were greatly feared. By Bible times, however, the mourning women served merely as another manifestation of grief for the departed. The OT contains warnings against pagan mourning rites (Lev. 19:27-28; Deut. 14:1-2). Israelite priests were not allowed to take part in any mourning or other funeral ceremonies (Lev. 21:1-4, 10-11).

JEREMIAH, the weeping prophet, made many references to mourning. He taught the mourning women their dirge (Jer. 9:17-22), heard the land lament because of the destruction by the Babylonians (9:10; 12:4, 11; 14:2; 23:10), and mentioned RACHEL's mourning (31:15-16). He urged Israel to mourn for its sins (4:8; 6:26; 7:29) and secretly mourned for the nation himself (9:1; 13:17).

mouth. Both Hebrew peh H7023 and Greek stoma G5125 are used literally (1 Sam. 1:12; Acts 23:2; et al.) as well as figuratively. Among the latter uses, the word "mouth" can refer to an entrance, such as of a cave (Josh. 10:27), the grave (Ps. 141:7), a sack (Gen. 42:27), and a well (29:10). It is used metaphorically to refer to the absolute sovereignty of God in the fiat of his words in judgment, as in the phrases "rod of his mouth" (Isa. 11:4) and "out of his mouth comes a sharp sword" (Rev. 19:15). Jesus taught that "the things that come out of the mouth come from the heart, and these make a man 'unclean'" (Matt. 15:18 and parallels; cf. also Rom. 3:14).

mow. To cut down the standing grass or other herbage. The Hebrew noun gēz H1600 (which twice refers to wool or fleece, Deut. 31:20; Job 31:20), is used of mown grass or a mown field in two passages (Ps. 72:6; Amos 7:1). In the latter, the phrase “the king’s mowings” (NIV, “the king’s share”) refers to the first cut of spring herbage, which was to be given as tribute to the kings of Israel to feed their horses; after that the owner of the field could have his portion. The word occurs in the NT once as the rendering of Greek amaō G286 (Jas. 5:4).

Moza. moh’zuh (Heb. môṣā H4605, “[act or place of] going out”). Some scholars believe that this is a place name, rather than a personal name, and that it possibly should be related to MOZAH. (1) Son of CALEB by Ephah his concubine, included in the genealogy of JUDAH (1 Chr. 2:46).

(2) Son of Zimri and descendant of SAUL through JONATHAN (1 Chr. 8:36-37; 9:42-43). Several of the names in this section of the genealogy correspond to towns within the tribal territory of BENJAMIN.

Mozah. moh’zuh (Heb. mōṣā H5173, perhaps “[water] source” or “[oil] press”). A town within the tribal territory of BENJAMIN (Josh. 18:26). Because the name is stamped on the handles of vessels excavated at JERICHO and Tell en-Naṣbeh (MIZPAH), it is thought that Mozah was a center for the manufacture of pottery. The town was evidently near such W Benjamite cities as Mizpah and KEPHIRAH, but its precise location is uncertain. Many scholars believe that the site is at or near the Arab village of Qaluniyeh (Qalunyah), about 5 mi. (8 km.) WNW of JERUSALEM on the road to Tel Aviv.

Muppm. muh’pim (Heb. muppîm H5137, derivation unknown). Son of BENJAMIN and grandson of JACOB (Gen. 46:21). This name does not occur in the other genealogies of Benjamin, although many scholars identify Muppm with SHEPHUPHAM (Num. 26:39 MT; KJV and NIV, “Shupham”), Shuppim (1 Chr. 7:12, 15; NIV, “Shuppites”), and Shephuphan (8:5). See also HUPPIM.

Muratorian Canon. myoor´uh-tor´ee-uhn. Also known as the Muratorian Fragment, this seventh/eighth-century Latin document provides a very early list of accepted NT books. It was discovered by L. A. Muratori (1672-1750) in the Ambrosian Library of Milan and published by him in 1740. Although some recent scholars have argued that the original Greek work from which it was translated may have been produced in Syria or Palestine as late as the fourth century, it is widely believed that the Muratorian Canon is the earliest existing list of its kind, composed originally c. A.D. 180-190 in or near Rome. For a discussion of its significance, see CANONICITY II.A.

murder. From the days of NOAH the biblical penalty for murder was death: “Whoever sheds the blood of man, by man shall his blood be shed” (Gen. 9:6). Throughout OT times, the ancient Semitic custom of the AVENGER of blood was followed: a murdered person’s nearest relative (the goel) had the duty to pursue the murderer and kill him (Num. 35:19). Since in the practice of avenging blood in this fashion people failed to distinguish between murder and manslaughter, and vicious blood feuds would frequently arise, the Mosaic law provided for CITIES OF REFUGE (ch. 35). To these cities a person pursued by the avenger of blood could flee. He would be admitted and tried; if judged guilty of murder, he would be turned over to the avenger; if judged innocent, he was afforded protection in this city from the avenger. It appears likely that the advent of the monarchy began a trend away from the ancient goel custom, for we find the king putting a murderer to death (1 Ki. 2:34) and pardoning another (2 Sam. 14:6-8).

In a murder trial, the agreeing testimony of at least two persons was necessary for conviction (Num. 35:30; Deut. 17:6). An animal known to be vicious had to be confined, and if it caused the death of anyone, it was destroyed and the owner held guilty of murder (Exod. 21:29, 31). The right of asylum in a holy place was not granted a murderer; he was dragged away even from the horns of the altar (Exod. 21:14; 1 Ki. 2:28-34). No ransom could be accepted for a murderer (Num. 35:21). When a murder had been committed and the killer could not be found, the people of the community nearest the place where the corpse was found were reckoned guilty. To clear them of guilt, the elders of that community would kill a heifer, wash their hands over it, state their innocence, and thus be judged clean (Deut. 21:1-9).

murrain. This English term, meaning “pestilence” or “plague,” is used once by the KJV to render the common Hebrew word deber H1822 (Exod. 9:3). See also PLAGUES OF EGYPT.

Mushi. myoo'shi (Heb. mûšî H4633, derivation uncertain; the same form [mûšî H4634] is used as a gentilic, “Mushite”). Son of MERARI and grandson of LEVI (Exod. 6:19; Num. 3:20; 1 Chr. 6:19, 47; 23:21, 23; 24:26, 30); eponymous ancestor of the Mushite clan of Levites (Num. 3:33; 26:58). It has been argued that the name is derived from mōšeh H5407 (MOSES), and some speculate that the Mushites constituted an early priesthood competing with that of AARON.

music and musical instruments.

I. Musical instruments

A. The bell. In Exod. 28:33-35, where the Lord prescribes the high priest's garments, he states: “Make pomegranates of blue, purple and scarlet yarn around the hem of the robe, with gold bells between them. The gold bells and the pomegranates are to alternate around the hem of the robe. Aaron must wear it when he ministers. The sound of the bells will be heard when he enters the Holy Place before the LORD and when he comes out, so that he will not die.” This custom typifies the ringing of the bell during the Roman Mass to call the attention of the worshipers to the sacred function in the sanctuary. Bells and jingles on the hem of garments not only were found in Israel but also are used by many primitive tribes in worship.

B. The cymbals. The only permanent percussive instrument in the TEMPLE orchestra was the cymbal. In the Holy Scriptures, the use of cymbals is solely confined to religious ceremonies: at the time when the ARK OF THE COVENANT was brought back from KIRIATH JEARIM (1 Chr. 15:16, 19, 28); at the dedication of SOLOMON's temple (2 Chr. 5:13); at the restoration of worship by HEZEKIAH (29:25); at the laying of the foundation of the second temple (Ezra 3:10); and the dedication of the wall of JERUSALEM (Neh. 12:27). In Ps. 150:5 reference is made to cymbals “of sound” and cymbals “of shout” (NIV, “clash of cymbals” and “resounding cymbals”). If two different types are meant, one possible distinction is between small cymbals that perhaps were held vertically, and large ones held horizontally. In the time of DAVID, much stress was laid on the cymbal and percussive instruments. His chief singer, ASAPH, was a cymbal player (1 Chr. 16:5). However, in the last century of the second temple the percussive instruments apparently were restricted to one cymbal, which was used to mark pauses only, not to be played while the singing and the playing were going on.

C. The harp and the lyre. Harps have the neck at an angle to the body, either arched (of the same piece as the body) or angular (neck fastened to body at near right angle), whereas lyres have a body with two arms joined by a crossbar, the strings going from body to crossbar. It is difficult to determine which Hebrew words refer to which of these stringed instruments. The NIV usually has “harp” for kinnôr H4036 and “lyre” for nēbel H5575, terms that are often found in the same context (e.g., 2 Sam. 6:5; 1 Ki. 10:12; et al.). Other translations, however, reverse these two words (e.g., TNIV, NRSV, NJPS). In the historical books, the SEPTUAGINT renders them by means of unhelpful loanwords, but in the poetic and prophetic literature it uses respectively kithara (a triangular lyre or lute with seven strings) and psaltērion (psaltery or a type of harp). The reference to a ten-string lyre or harp (Ps. 33:2; 144:9) probably indicates that normally a different number of strings was employed. It has been suggested that kinnôr refers to a “thin” lyre, consisting of no more than eight strings, whereas nēbel refers to a “thick” lyre, which can have as many as thirteen. In any case, these two instruments were the most important ones in the temple orchestra, without which no public religious ceremony could be held (cf. 1 Chr. 25:3). They also were used at secular festivities (cf. Isa. 5:12).

D. The lute. Lutes have strings stretched along a neck attached to a resonating body as in guitar-like and violin-like instruments. Although lutes are represented in Egyptian, Mesopotamian, and Hittite art, it is uncertain whether they are mentioned in the Bible. The English term is used by the NIV twice to render two different Hebrew words (1 Sam. 18:6; 2 Chr. 20:28), while the NRSV also uses it twice, but other Hebrew words occur (Ps. 92:3; 150:3; cf. also 1 Macc. 4:54). The simplicity of the lute (possibly originating from the hunting bow being plucked) should caution one against assuming that it did not exist in Israel.

E. The pipe and the flute. Reed pipes have either one or two reeds (as in the present-day clarinet and oboe, respectively) into which air is blown, while with flutes the air is blown against one edge of the mouth-hole. Flutes can be end-blown (vertical), cross-blown (hole in side, held transversely like the modern flute), or whistle flutes. Certain Hebrew terms designate instruments belonging to the general class of pipes, but it is difficult to be more specific. The ḥālîl H2720, translated “flute” in modern English versions (“pipe” in KJV), was probably a reed pipe, an interpretation that fits the context of lament in Jer. 48:36. Since in antiquity two reed pipes often were played simultaneously by the same person, this might also have been true of the ḥālîl (some believe that the word refers specifically to the double-pipe; the nēḥîlôt H5704, mentioned only in the title of Ps. 5, may have been another form of this instrument). Of the four occurrences of Hebrew ûgāb H6385, two passages indicate only that it is a musical instrument (Gen. 4:21; Ps. 150:4), and the other two imply that it is normally used to express rejoicing (Job 21:12; 30:31); the NIV renders this term “flute,” but the TNIV and other modern versions have “pipe” (KJV, “organ,” which is misleading).

F. The sistrum or rattle. The Hebrew word mēnaʿan ʿîm H4983 (from the root nûaʿ H5675, “to quiver”) occurs only in 2 Sam. 6:5 and apparently denotes an instrument that was shaken. The reference could be either to a rattle (e.g., beads in a hollow gourd; cf. NRSV, “castanets”) or to a sistrum (so Vulg.; cf. NIV). The latter, consisting of a small frame with metal pieces loosely attached, was more common, especially in Egypt.

G. The tambourine or timbrel. This instrument (Heb. tōp H9512) was evidently a small drum made of a wooden hoop and probably two skins, without any jingling contrivance like the modern tambourine. It was a rhythm-indicator and was used for dances and joyous occasions as well as religious celebrations. It was one of the instruments employed at the installation of the ark in Jerusalem (2 Sam. 6:5). It is not listed among the musical instruments either of the first or second temple, despite its being mentioned three times in the Psalms (Ps. 81:2; 149:3; 150:4). It appears that the instrument was played primarily by women (Exod. 15:20; Jdg. 11:34; 1 Sam. 18:6).

Jewish man blowing the shofar or ram's horn trumpet.

H. The trumpet. The Hebrew term šôpār H8795, usually translated “trumpet,” refers specifically to a “ram’s horn” used as a sound instrument for communicating signals and announcing important events (e.g., 1 Ki. 1:34). The characteristic of this animal horn is its curved shape and relatively wide, conical bore. The same instrument can be referred to with the word yôbēl H3413 (“ram” or “ram’s horn”), used either by itself (Exod. 19:13) or in combination with šôpār or qeren H7967 (Josh. 6:4-8, 13). On the other hand, the common term ḥăṣṣērâ H2956 (Num. 10:2 et al.), also translated “trumpet,” designates a tube of straight, narrow bore. The main difference between the two types of instrument was one of tone quality, but it is likely that a secondary difference was the often metallic construction of the ḥăṣṣērâ. For either instrument only a limited number of pitches (two or three) could be produced, so that they are far removed from the modern trumpet.

I. Nebuchadnezzar’s orchestral instruments. Finally, a word about the orchestral instruments of NEBUCHADNEZZAR king of BABYLON, as described by DANIEL: “As soon as you hear the sound of the horn, flute, zither, lyre, harp, pipes and all kinds of music, you must fall down and worship the image of gold that King Nebuchadnezzar has set up” (Dan. 3:5; cf. vv. 10, 15). Some of the Aramaic terms used in this verse are of uncertain meaning. For example, it has been suggested that the last item, sûmpônēyâ H10507, reflects Greek tympanon and thus designates a drum (cf. NRSV), but the word must rather represent symphōnia G5246, which can simply mean “music” (Lk. 15:25) or “in unison” or “musical band,” though here it may refer to a kind of bagpipe (thus NIV “pipes”) or to the double-flute. The second item in the list is mašrôqî H10446, which probably signifies some type of flute or whistle (the NRSV and other versions have “pipe”). Zithers have many strings stretched across a body, either struck (dulcimer) or plucked (psaltery); it is problematic whether such instruments are mentioned in the Bible, although both NIV and NJPS use “zither” in this verse to render Aramaic qîtrôs H10630 (from Gk. kithara). The fourth term here, šabbēkā H10676, is rendered “lyre” by the NIV, but “trigon” by the NRSV and NJPS (the KJV’s “sackbut,” referring to a medieval trombone, is wrongly based on the similarity of sound between the Aram. and Eng. words).

II. Music

A. The history of Hebrew music. The history of Israel's higher civilization in general and the organization of the musical service in the temple began with King David's reign. To him has been ascribed not only the creation and singing of the psalms, but also the provision (invention?) of musical instruments (1 Chr. 23:5; 2 Chr. 7:6). King David chose the Levites to supply musicians for the holy temple. Out of the 30,000 who were employed at this time, the impressive number of 4,000 was selected for the musical service. Years later, when King Solomon had finished all work for the temple and brought in all the things David his father had dedicated, the priest and the congregation of Israel assembled before the ark, and the musical service was begun by the Levites. The number of them who were instructed in the songs of the Lord was 288, divided into twenty-four classes (1 Chr. 25:6-7). On the day of the dedication of the temple, "all the Levites who were musicians—Asaph, Heman, Jeduthun and their sons and relatives—stood on the east side of the altar, dressed in fine linen and playing cymbals, harps and lyres. They were accompanied by 120 priests sounding trumpets. The trumpeters and singers joined in unison, as with one voice, to give praise and thanks to the LORD. Accompanied by trumpets, cymbals and other instruments, they raised their voices in praise to the LORD and sang: 'He is good; his love endures forever.' Then the temple of the LORD was filled with a cloud, and the priests could not perform their service because of the cloud, for the glory of the LORD filled the temple of God" (2 Chr. 5:12-14). When the king and the people had offered their sacrifices, the Levites began to play, "the priests blew their trumpets, and all the Israelites were standing" (7:6).

In Solomon's temple the choir formed a distinct body. They were furnished homes and were on salary. Ezekiel says they had chambers between the walls and windows with southern views (Ezek. 40:44). The choir numbered 2,000 singers and was divided into two choirs. The Psalms, according to the Mishnah (see TALMUD), were sung antiphonally. The first examples in the Bible of antiphonal or responsive singing are the songs of Moses and Miriam after the passage through the Red Sea (Exod. 15). There were three forms after which the Psalms and the prayers were rendered in the temple. First, the leader intoned the first half verse, whereupon the congregation repeated it. Then the leader sang each succeeding half line, the congregation always repeating the same first half line, which thus became a refrain throughout the entire psalm. Second, the leader sang a half line at a time, and the congregation repeated what he had last sung. The third form was responsive in the real sense of the word—the leader would sing the whole first line, whereupon the congregation would respond with the second line of the verse.

The orchestra and the choir personnel were greatly reduced in the second temple. The orchestra consisted of a minimum of two harps and a maximum of six; a minimum of nine lyres, maximum limitless; a minimum of two oboes and a maximum of twelve; and one cymbal. The second temple choir consisted of a minimum of twelve adult singers, maximum limitless. The singers, all male, were between thirty and fifty years of age. Five years of musical training was a prerequisite to membership in the second temple choir. In addition to the male adults, sons of the Levites were permitted to participate in the choir “in order to add sweetness to the song.”

The musical service in the temple at the time of Christ was essentially the same as that in King Solomon’s temple, with the exception of a few minor changes in certain forms of singing. There were two daily services in the temple—the morning and evening sacrifices. After the sacrificial acts, the trumpet was sounded, which was the signal for the priests to prostrate themselves, but for the Levites it marked the beginning of the musical service. Two priests would now take their stand at the right and left of the altar and blow their silver trumpets. After this, these two priests would approach the cymbal player and take their stand beside him, one on the right and one on the left. When given a sign with a flag by the president, this Levite sounded his cymbal, and this was the sign for the Levites to begin singing a part of the daily psalm accompanied by instrumental music. Whenever they stopped singing, the priests would again blow their trumpets, and the people would prostrate themselves. Not only psalms were sung but also parts of the Pentateuch. The psalm of the day was sung in three sections and at the close of each the priests would blow three fanfares on their silver trumpets, a signal for the congregation to bow down and to worship the Lord.

B. Music in the Psalms. The order of the Psalms in the daily service of the temple was as follows: On the first day of the week, Ps. 24: “The earth is the LORD’s” in commemoration of the first day of creation. On the second day they sang Ps. 48: “Great is the LORD, and most worthy of praise.” On the third day, Ps. 82: “God presides in the great assembly.” On the fourth day, Ps. 94: “O LORD, the God who avenges.” On the fifth day, Ps. 81: “Sing for joy to God our strength.” On the sixth day, Ps. 93: “The LORD reigns.” On the seventh day they sang Ps. 92: “It is good to praise the LORD.” With the singing of the daily psalm, the morning sacrifice came to a close. The evening sacrifice was identical to the morning sacrifice, with the exception that the incense offering followed the evening sacrifice, at sunset. Thus they began and ended the day with prayer and praise, of which the burning of incense was symbolical.

The real meaning of the headings of the various psalms is still veiled in darkness. Whether they indicate the names of the instruments employed in accompanying the psalms, or whether they refer to the tune to which they were sung, is still a problem for the musicologist. The word SELAH, which is found so frequently in the Psalms, is another expression that has not been satisfactorily explained. Whether it means an interlude, a pause, or a cadence, is not known. Many scholars believe it indicates a musical interlude by the temple orchestra.

C. The dance. This element was considered an integral part of the religious ceremonies in ancient Israel. Examples include the Israelite women led by Miriam after the crossing of the Red Sea (Exod. 15:20), Jephthah's daughter (Jdg. 11:34), and David himself (2 Sam. 6:14). Religious dancing is mentioned only twice in Psalms (Ps. 149:3; 150:4). On the Feast of Tabernacles, at the celebration of "water libation," prominent men would dance, displaying their artistic skill in throwing and catching burning torches. See also DANCING.

mustard. See PLANTS.

Muster Gate. A gate in JERUSALEM, not far from the TEMPLE. The Hebrew name šar hammipqād, which occurs only once in connection with NEHEMIAH's rebuilding of the wall of JERUSALEM (Neh. 3:31), is rendered "the gate Miphkad" by the KJV, "the Muster Gate" by the NRSV, and "the Inspection Gate" by the NIV. The Hebrew word mipqād H5152 can mean both "regulation, appointment" (cf. 2 Chr. 31:13) and "counting" (as when mustering troops, 2 Sam. 24:9 = 1 Chr. 21:5). The exact location of the Muster Gate is uncertain, but it was apparently opposite the temple on the NE part of the city, between the EAST GATE and the SHEEP GATE (Neh. 3:29, 32), and some identify it with the BENJAMIN GATE.

mute. See DISEASES.

Muth-labben. myooth-lab'uhn. The Hebrew musical term almût labbēn (in the superscription of Ps. 9) is rendered by the KJV and other versions as "upon [NRSV, according to] Muth-labben" (the NJPS has "almuth labben"). The meaning is obscure. Interpreting the phrase as a reference to a particular melody, the NIV renders, "To the tune of 'The Death of the Son.'" muzzle. The Israelites were commanded not to muzzle the ox when it was treading out the grain, that is, THRESHING (Deut. 25:4). The muzzle was a guard placed on the mouth of the oxen to prevent them from biting or eating. The threshing ox was to have ample opportunity of feeding, thus making the labor more agreeable. The injunction is in harmony with the spirit of the Deuteronomic exposition of the Mosaic law throughout. PAUL quotes this injunction to illustrate, with an appropriate light touch of humor, his view that it is proper to pay the minister for his work in the gospel (1 Cor. 9:8-11; 1 Tim. 5:17-18).

Myra. mi´ruh (Gk. Myra G3688, meaning uncertain). A city of LYCIA, in SW ASIA MINOR; modern Dembre. The apostle PAUL visited the town on his journey to ROME, and the fact that he changed ships there indicates its importance as a port (Acts 27:5). The origins of Myra are lost in antiquity; it was known as an ancient town, achieved some importance as the chief city of the Lycian district, and actually was called a metropolis. It is described by ancient writers as the “best and most sparkling” city of Lycia. Its public buildings were distinguished, and included a GYMNASIUM with an arcade furnished with recesses and seats, a theater, a bath, a stoa or roofed colonnade, a temple of Peace, and during the Christian era several churches.

Mysia. mis´ee-uh (Gk. Mysia G3695). A region in NW ASIA MINOR bounded by the Aegean, the Hellespont, the Propontis, BITHYNIA, PHRYGIA, and LYDIA; it includes the historic TROAS and the areas of Aeolian Greek settlement on the Aegean coast. In Greek times it shared the fortunes of the W stub of the peninsula, fell to the Romans in 133 B.C. as part of the royal legacy of Attalus III, and in Roman days was part of the province of ASIA. This is why Mysia, never itself an independent political entity, lacks precise boundaries. It was a mountainous and, in early times, well-forested region, traversed by some of the main trade routes. PERGAMUM lay within its somewhat vague boundaries. The early inhabitants of Mysia were probably of Thracian origin. Like the Trojans, who held their strategic foothold in Mysia near the entrance to the Hellespont, and the HITTITES, whose great empire at times held dominance this far, they probably were an Indo-European stock, an early wave of the great invasions of the peoples who, with their kindred dialects, were to settle all Europe. Mysia was traversed by PAUL in the course of his second journey (Acts 16:7-8), but no pause was made there save at Troas. There is evidence, however, of church foundations of a very early date.

mystery. In the NT, the Greek word mystērion G3696 refers to the counsel of God, unknown to human beings except by REVELATION, especially concerning his saving works and ultimate purposes in history. Among the Greeks, mystery meant not something obscure or incomprehensible, but a secret imparted only to the initiated, what is unknown until it is revealed. This word is connected with the MYSTERY RELIGIONS of Hellenistic times. The mysteries appealed to the emotions rather than the intellect and offered to their devotees a mystical union with the deity, through death to life, thus securing for them a blessed immortality. Great symbolism characterized their secret ritual, climaxing in the initiation into the full secret of the cult.

The chief use of the concept in the NT is by PAUL. As an educated man of his day, he knew well the thought world of the pagans and accepted this term to indicate the fact that “his gospel” had been revealed to him by the risen Christ. This fact could best be made clear to his contemporaries by adopting the pagan term they all understood, pouring into it a special Christian meaning. In a few passages the term refers to a symbol, allegory, or parable, which conceals its meaning from those who look only at the literal sense, but is the medium of revelation to those who have the key to its interpretation (cf. Mk. 4:11 [NIV, “secret”]; Eph. 5:32; Rev. 1:20; 17:5, 7).

The more common meaning of mystery in the NT, Paul’s usual use of the word, is that of a divine truth once hidden but now revealed in the GOSPEL. A characteristic usage is Rom. 16:25-26: “...my gospel and the proclamation of Jesus Christ, according to the revelation of the mystery hidden for long ages past, but now revealed and made known through the prophetic writings by the command of the eternal God, so that all nations might believe and obey him” (cf. Col. 1:26; Eph. 3:3-6). A mystery is thus now a revelation: Christian mysteries are revealed doctrines (Rom. 16:26; Eph. 1:9; 3:3, 5, 10; 6:19; Col. 4:3-4; 1 Tim. 3:16). Christianity, therefore, has no secret doctrines, as did the ancient mystery religions. To the worldly wise and prudent the gospel is foolishness (Matt. 11:25; 1 Cor. 2:6-9); although it is communicated to them, they do not have the capacity to understand it (2 Cor. 4:2-4). The Christian mystery, then, is God’s world-embracing purpose of REDEMPTION through Christ (Rom. 16:25).

mystery religions. A term applied in the Greek, the Hellenistic, and the Roman world to the cult of certain deities that involved a private initiation ceremony and a reserved and secret ritual. They were probably vestiges of earlier religions, maintaining themselves as secret societies after the introduction of the Olympian and other Indo-European deities, and ending after what seems a common social pattern, by winning their way with the conquering people. The deities with whose worship the Greek “mysteries” were principally connected were Demeter, whose cult was organized into the ceremonials of Eleusis, and Dionysus, a predominantly female cult. The worship of Demeter and Dionysus appears to have been in origin a nature worship, with a ritual symbolizing death and resurrection in a seasonal sequence, and a spiritual reference of this natural pattern to the experience of the soul.

Little is known about the rites of worship and initiation, for the initiates seem to have been faithful in the keeping of their vows of secrecy; but it is fairly certain that the worship had to do with notions of sin, ritual uncleanness, purification, regeneration, and spiritual preparation for another life. It is probable that their influence was widespread, and, on the whole, salutary in tranquility of spirit and uprightness of conduct. Besides the worship of the goddess and the god already named in connection with metropolitan Greece, there were other ancient deities whose cults can be properly named “mystery religions,” for example, the worship of Orpheus, Adonis or Tammuz, Isis, and especially Mithras. The triumph of Christianity over the powerful rivalry of the mystery cults, and especially MITHRAISM, was due principally to its possession of a historic Person as the center of its faith. PAUL adapted some of the vocabulary of the mystery cults to a Christian purpose, and his use of the word MYSTERY for a truth revealed but comprehended only by the “initiated,” is a clear allusion to them.

myth. This term (from Gk. mythos G3680, “story, fable”) is usually applied to traditional stories about gods, narrated in a communal setting and regarded as occurrences of permanent significance. The word occurs only in the Pastoral Epistles and in 2 Peter (1 Tim. 1:4; 4:7; 2 Tim. 4:4; Tit. 1:14; 2 Pet. 1:16). In every case myths are repudiated as profitless, but each passage adds particular characterizations or contrasts. Discussions about these allusions generally turn on (1) whether all have some connection with JUDAISM, or only the reference in Titus; (2) whether they can be directly associated with Gnostic speculations; (3) whether they might indicate a sincere but misguided attempt by Christians (or Jews) to allegorize pagan myths for homiletical purposes. Some think it probable that the Pastorals refer to an early form of GNOSTICISM that flourished on the soil of Hellenistic Jewish Christianity, in some ways comparable with what is reflected in COLOSSIANS. There is insufficient data, however, to allow firm conclusions

N

Naam. nay´uhm (Heb. na ʿam H5839, possibly short form of ELNAAM, “God is pleasantness”). Son of CALEB and descendant of JUDAH (1 Chr. 4:15).

Naamah (person). nay´uh-muh (Heb. na ʿāmāh H5841, possibly “pleasantness”). (1) Daughter of LAMECH and ZILLAH, sister of TUBAL-CAIN, and descendant of CAIN (Gen. 4:22). She is the only daughter named in the lineage of either Cain or ABEL (4:17—5:32).

(2) AMMONITE wife of SOLOMON and mother of REHOBAM (1 Ki. 14:21, 31; 2 Chr. 12:13). It is often assumed that Naamah was one of the many foreign women that Solomon married when his heart was turned away from God (cf. 1 Ki. 11:1-8), but Rehoboam’s age suggests that this marriage had taken place when Solomon was relatively young, and some have speculated that it was a diplomatic arrangement on the part of DAVID. It remains possible, however, that Naamah played a role in Judah’s apostasy under Rehoboam (14:22-24).

Naamah (place). nay´uh-muh (Heb. na ʿāmāh H5842, possibly “pleasantness”). A city in the SHEPHELAH allotted to the tribe of JUDAH (Josh. 15:41). It was apparently near MAKKEDAH, but its precise location is unknown. See also NAAMATHITE.

Naaman. nay´uh-muhn (Heb. na ʿāmān H5845, “pleasantness”; gentilic na ʿāmî H5844, “Naamite” or “Naamanite”). (1) Listed among the “sons” of BENJAMIN in Gen. 46:21, but elsewhere identified more specifically as a son of BELA and therefore as Benjamin’s grandson (Num. 26:40; 1 Chr. 8:4, 7 [the Heb. syntax in vv. 6-7 is ambiguous]). He became the eponymous ancestor of the Naamites (Num. 26:40; NJPS, “Naamanites”).

(2) The ARAMEAN commander who was cured of a skin disease by ELISHA (2 Ki. 5). Prior to this incident, the king of ARAM (SYRIA), probably BEN-HADAD II, had credited Naaman’s victories to his military genius (v. 1). To the successful record of his life, the Scriptures, however, add the pathetic phrase, “but he had leprosy” (a feared affliction of the skin, but apparently not the DISEASE called leprosy in modern times). A young girl, who had been taken captive in one of the Aramean raids into Israelite territory, served Naaman's wife. One day she said to her mistress, "If only my master would see the prophet who is in Samaria! He would cure him of his leprosy" (5:3).

Elisha directed Naaman to wash in the Jordan River in order to be healed from his leprosy.

After a fruitless visit at the court of the king of Israel, Naaman finally went to the prophet Elisha and was told to wash himself seven times in the river JORDAN, a suggestion that Naaman met with anger and contempt as he recalled the clear waters of the rivers of DAMASCUS (2 Ki. 5:12). Prevailed on, however, by his servants to heed the prophet, Naaman followed the prophet's instructions, "and his flesh was restored and became clean like that of a young boy" (5:14). Naaman's cure led to his acceptance of the God of Israel as the only God "in all the world." In Lk. 4:27 Jesus referred to this incident "in the time of Elisha the prophet" when he spoke in the synagogue at Nazareth.

The rest of the account (as told in 2 Ki. 5:15-19) shows how the people believed in henotheism—the view that nations had their individual gods. Naaman wanted some of Israel's soil to take home so that he could worship Israel's God even if it was in "the temple of Rimmon" where his official duties required him to be with his king. (RIMMON was the thunder-god of the Assyrians.) The great Omayyid Mosque at Damascus, today the city's most magnificent structure is, according to tradition, built on the site of the temple of Rimmon where Naaman deposited his load of soil from Israel.

Naamathite. nay'uh-muh-thit (Heb. na ʿāmātî H5847, "of Naamah"). Descriptive title of ZOPHAR, one of JOB's three friends (Job 2:11; 11:1; 20:1; 42:9). It evidently refers to his place of origin. The Judahite town of NAAMAH (Josh. 15:41) is almost certainly not in view. Since the other two friends (ELIPHAZ and BILDAD) apparently came from the Arabian desert, the term Naamathite may point to a place or clan in NW ARABIA.

Naamite. nay'uh-mit. See NAAMAN #1.

Naarah (person). nay'uh-ruh (Heb. na ʿārāh H5856, “young woman”). One of the two wives of ASHHUR, a descendant of JUDAH; she bore him four sons (1 Chr. 4:5-6).

Naarah, Naaran (place). nay'uh-ruh, -ruhn (Heb. na ʿārāh H5857, “watermill”; also na ʿārān H5860). A city listed as marking part of the SE border of the tribe of EPHRAIM (Josh. 16:7 [KJV, “Naarath”]; called Naaran in 1 Chr. 7:28). It is mentioned between ATAROTH and JERICO. A note from JOSEPHUS (Ant. 17.13.1) says that Archelaus (see HEROD), after rebuilding JERICO, “diverted half the water with which the village of Neara used to be watered,” thus locating Neara (Naarah) near Jericho and associating it with a good water supply. Most scholars identify Naarah with Tell el-Jisr, just below the springs ʿAin Duq and ʿAin Nuʿeimeh at the foot of the Judean hills, less than 2 mi. (3 km.) NW of Jericho.

Naarai. nay'uh-ri (Heb. na ʿāray H5858, possibly “young man [or attendant] of Yahweh”). Son of EZBAI, listed among DAVID’s mighty warriors (1 Chr. 11:37); in the parallel passage he is called “Paarai the Arbite” (2 Sam. 23:35). It is uncertain which of the two passages preserves the original name.

Naaran. nay'uh-ruhn. See NAARAH, NAARAN (PLACE).

Naarath. See NAARAH.

Naashon, Naasson. See NAHSHON.

Nabal. nay'buhl (Heb. nābāl H5573, “foolish,” possibly by popular etymology; the name originally may have derived from a root meaning “noble”). A wealthy descendant of CALEB who lived in MAON, some 8 mi. (13 km.) SSE of HEBRON (1 Sam. 25:2-3). He owned 3,000 sheep and 1,000 goats which he pastured in the vicinity of CARMEL (just N of Maon). He is described as “surly and mean” (v. 3). DAVID, a fugitive from SAUL, had been giving protection to Nabal’s flocks from marauding bedouins (vv. 15-16) and so sent ten of his men now to extend good wishes to Nabal, remind him of his service to him, and request a gift in return. Nabal showed his ungrateful character in not only refusing the reasonable request but also returning insulting remarks. Immediately David prepared with 400 men to bring retaliation, but Nabal's wife ABIGAIL, described as "intelligent and beautiful" (v. 3), came quickly to David to make amends, bringing a bountiful gift of food and making humble apology for her husband's conduct. When Abigail later told her husband of his narrow escape, "his heart failed him" (v. 37), and ten days later he died. David then made Abigail one of his wives.

Nabateans. nab'uh-tee'uhnz (Gk. Nabataioi). Also Nabataeans. Although this name does not occur in the OT or NT (but see 1 Macc. 5:25; 9:35), the Nabateans were an influential, ARAMAIC-speaking people who were active in the NW part of ARABIA and TRANSJORDAN from about the fourth century B.C. to the beginning of the second century A.D. In Hellenistic times they were a formidable foe to the Greek successors of ALEXANDER THE GREAT, their capital, PETRA, being inaccessible and impregnable. While their king Aretas I befriended the early MACCABEES, they were in conflict with the later Jewish rulers. By NT times their political domain extended at times W of Petra to the NEGEV and N as far as DAMASCUS. They lost Damascus when the Romans came to the aid of the Jews against them, but later recovered it, so that their king ARETAS IV controlled it when PAUL was there (2 Cor. 11:32). Aretas IV fought with the Romans against the Jews and was victorious over HEROD Antipas, who had divorced Aretas's daughter to marry HERODIAS. Nabatea was absorbed into the Roman province of Arabia in A.D. 106.

The Nabateans, a nomadic people, influenced by Aramean, Hellenistic, and Roman culture, developed skill in pottery, fine specimens of which have been recovered. The architecture of Petra, “the rose-red city,” is remarkable; its religious high places, pillars, and figures carved out of sandstone cliffs of a canyon are accessible only on foot or muleback. By 100 B.C. the Nabateans developed water storage and irrigation systems in the highlands of Transjordan, the remains of which are still impressive. Yet the Nabateans in the SINAI peninsula and other outlying districts remained nomadic. They were traders between Egypt and Mesopotamia, dealing also in wares from India and China, both by caravan overland and by sea from a port on the AQABAH.

Nabonidus. nab’uh-ni’duhs (from Akk. Nabū-na-id, “[the god Nabu] is to be revered”). The last king of Chaldean Babylonia, 556-539 B.C. See BABYLON. Nabonidus possibly was related to NEBUCHADNEZZAR through marriage so that Nabonidus’s son and coregent Bēl-šar-ušur (BELSHAZZAR) could claim to be a descendant of that illustrious monarch (so Dan. 5:11, 18). Nebuchadnezzar had been succeeded by a period of family strife during which the rulers were his son EVIL-MERODACH (for two years), his son-in-law Neriglissar (for four years), and another son, Labashi-Marduk, who was recognized as king only for two months, May-June 556 B.C., in part of Babylonia. Nabonidus, who was supported by other cities, was accepted as sole ruler by the end of June. Two years later Nabonidus entrusted the rule of Babylon to his son Belshazzar. He himself moved to Haran, where restoration work on the temple of the moon-god Sin, Ehulhul, was begun after its ruin by the Medes, as indicated to him in a dream. See HARAN (PLACE). From there he moved S to attack Adummu (EDOM) and the sheikh of Teima³ (TEMA) in NW ARABIA, who was killed.

In 545 B.C. Nabonidus returned to Babylon, where he carried out work on various shrines, including that of the sun-god Shamash at Sippar. The weakness of the state was evident in both its economy and defense. The Medes overran the zone E of the Tigris River, and the Elamites parts of S Babylonia. The Persians moved on Babylon in 539. The city was entered by a stratagem and without a battle on October 12. On that night Belshazzar was put to death (Dan. 5:30). Nabonidus, who had fled to Borsippa, reentered the city and was taken prisoner. According to one tradition, he died in exile in Carmania. Seventeen days later Cyrus himself entered the city and took over the throne. The political power at Babylon now passed from Semitic into Persian hands.

Nabopolassar. nab’uh-puh-las’uhr (Akk. Nabū-apla-ušur, “may [the god] Nabu protect the son!”). First king (626-605 B.C.) of the Neo-Babylonian (“Chaldean”) Dynasty, and the father of NEBUCHADNEZZAR II. See BABYLON.

Nabopolassar was originally a petty chieftain in S Babylonia, but at the death of King ASHURBANIPAL of ASSYRIA in 626 B.C., he became king of BABYLON and in a few years had control of all Babylonia. To bind a treaty made between Nabopolassar and Cyaxares, king of the Medes (see MEDIA), the latter gave his daughter Amytis in marriage to Nabopolassar's son, Nebuchadnezzar. Nabopolassar's army was well-trained in Assyrian methods of fighting, and eventually in 612 he and his ally took NINEVEH. This conquest meant that the Assyrian empire was divided, with the southern part falling to Nabopolassar. In 609 Haran, the last Assyrian stronghold, fell to the Babylonians. See HARAN (PLACE).

In 606 Nabopolassar took up the EUPHRATES front, where the Egyptian hold on CARCHEMISH posed a threat to the entire western part of his newly won empire. Pharaoh NECO II of Egypt had invaded PALESTINE and SYRIA in order to get his share of the fallen Assyrian empire, and it was Nebuchadnezzar, the crown prince, acting for his ailing father, who achieved the conquest of Carchemish and drove the Egyptian army back home in 605. King Nabopolassar had returned to Babylon in the spring of the same year, and died there on 15 August. Although Nabopolassar is not mentioned in the Bible, JOSIAH of Judah may have been friendly with him (as HEZEKIAH had been an ally of the Babylonians), for Josiah lost his life at MEGIDDO in a futile attempt to stop Pharaoh Neco II from going to the aid of the Assyrians (2 Ki. 23:29; 2 Chr. 35:20-27).

Naboth. nay'both (Heb. nābôt H5559, "growth, sprout," possibly short form of a theophoric name, such as "scion of Yahweh"). The owner of a vineyard desired by King AHAB because it lay near his alternate royal palace in JEZREEL (1 Ki. 21:1-29), probably on the E side of the city (2 Ki. 9:25-26). Ahab offered Naboth either money or the exchange of a better vineyard. Naboth refused on the valid ground that it was part of his paternal INHERITANCE. Patrinomies belonged to families, not individuals, and Naboth would have wronged his descendants by selling it, as well as having broken God's law (Lev. 25:23-28; Num. 36:7-9). Ahab himself, though angry and sullen, did not force the issue, but his wife JEZEBEL did by having Naboth falsely accused of blasphemy and stoned to death. When Ahab went to take possession of the vineyard, ELIJAH met him and pronounced judgment on him and his family. Ahab repented and a temporary stay was granted (21:27-29), but after further warning by MICAIAH the prophet, punishment fell on Ahab (22:24-40) as well as on Jezebel and their son Joram (JEHORAM, 2 Ki. 9:25-37).

Nabu. See NEBO (DEITY).

Nachon. See N_{ACON}.

Nachor. See N_{AHOR}.

Nacon. nay´kon (Heb. nākôn H5789, possibly “established”). KJV Nachon; TNIV Nakon. The owner of a threshing floor next to which UZZAH died because he touched the ARK OF THE COVENANT while it was being transported toward JERUSALEM (2 Sam. 6:6; the parallel passage in 1 Chr. 13:9 reads KIDON). Some have speculated that the form here is not a proper name and that the phrase should be rendered “a certain threshing floor” or “the threshing floor of striking” (i.e., destruction).

Nadab. nay´dab (Heb. nādāb H5606, possibly short form NEDABIAH, “Yahweh is willing”). (1) Eldest son of AARON and ELISHEBA (Exod. 6:23; Num. 3:2; 26:60; 1 Chr. 6:3; 24:1). He and his next younger brother, ABIHU, were permitted to accompany Aaron and seventy Israelite elders while ascending Mount SINAI to see a representation of God and to eat and drink in God’s presence (Exod. 24:1, 9-11). Nadab and his brothers, Abihu, ELEAZAR, and ITHAMAR, were admitted to priestly office with their father, Aaron (Exod. 28:1; Lev. 8:1-36). After several days of consecration, on the eighth day when official service began, Nadab and Abihu sinned in offering “unholy” (NIV, “unauthorized”) fire before the Lord, but the exact nature of the sin is not clear. They were immediately consumed in death by fire from the Lord (Lev. 10:1-2; Num. 3:4). To emphasize the seriousness of the sin, MOSES forbade Aaron and the two living sons to observe customary mourning ceremonies for them (Lev. 10:6). Both men died without offspring (Num. 3:4; 1 Chr. 24:2).

(2) Son of Shammai and descendant of JUDAH through JERAHMEEL (1 Chr. 2:28, 30).

(3) Son of JEIEL and descendant of BENJAMIN; apparently a great-uncle of King SAUL (1 Chr. 8:30-33; 9:35-39).

(4) Son of JEROBOAM I and king of ISRAEL about 910-909 B.C. (1 Ki. 15:25-31). His two years of rule (v. 25) were really only parts of two years (cf. vv. 25, 28, 33). While besieging the town of GIBBETHON, Nadab was killed by his successor, BAASHA, who exterminated the whole house of Jeroboam, thus fulfilling AHIJAH’s prophecy (14:10-11).

Naggai. nag'í (Gk. Nangai G3710). KJV Nagge. Son of Maath, included in Luke's GENEALOGY OF JESUS CHRIST (Lk. 3:25).

Nagge. See NAGGAI.

Nag Hammadi Library. nahg'huh-mah'dee. In 1945, a dozen Coptic MSS (plus part of a thirteenth) were accidentally discovered near the modern Egyptian town of Nag Hammadi. These leather codices were acquired by the Coptic Museum in Old Cairo. The significance of these MSS soon became clear when they were shown to date to the fourth century A.D. and to contain more than fifty tractates that give expression to what may be called Gnostic Christianity (see GNOSTICISM). It appears that these writings had originally been composed in Greek a century or two earlier. Prior to this discovery, our knowledge of Gnostic ideas in early Christianity had been largely limited to partial (and hostile) descriptions in the patristic literature. Now, however, it became possible to read firsthand, and in context, the writings associated with that movement. The various tractates are quite diverse in character: some have a strong tie to Jewish traditions, others reproduce non-Christian philosophical treatises, still others consist of HERMETIC texts. Many of the documents contain obscure myths, made even more difficult by their fragmentary nature and by the fact that in the course of transmission numerous copying and translation errors were introduced. Still, these writings have opened up a new world to students of early heterodox Christianity, shedding considerable light on religious developments after the apostolic period. In addition, some scholars have argued that a few of the texts provide a direct and independent link to the teachings of Jesus (see LOGIA; THOMAS, GOSPEL OF).

Nahalal. nay'huh-lal (Heb. nahālāl H5634, also nahālōl H5636 [Jdg. 1:30], "water place"). A city allotted to the tribe of ZEBULUN (Josh. 19:15; KJV, "Nahallal"), later given to the LEVITES descended from MERARI (21:35). Zebulun was unable to expel the Canaanite inhabitants who dwelt among them, but the latter became subject to forced labor (Jdg. 1:30; here the name occurs in the form "Nahalol"). Nahalal was evidently close to SHIMRON, but the precise location is uncertain.

Nahaliel. nuh-hay'lee-uhl (Heb. nahālî ʾēl H5712, "river [or palm-grove] of God"). A stopping place of the Israelites in TRANSJORDAN toward the end of their wanderings (Num. 21:19). Nahaliel was evidently between MATTANAH and BAMOTH, but the precise location of these sites is unknown. If the name alludes to a wadi, it might be one of the northern tributaries of the ARNON.

Nahallal. See NAHALAL.

Nahalol. See NAHALAL.

Naham. nay´ham (Heb. naḥam H5715, “comfort”). Brother of HODIAH’s wife, included in the genealogy of JUDAH (1 Chr. 4:19).

Nahamani. nay´huh-may´ni (Heb. naḥmānî H5720, “comfort,” possibly a form of NEHEMIAH, “Yahweh has comforted”). An Israelite mentioned among leading individuals who returned from BABYLON with ZERUBBABEL (Neh. 7:7; the name is omitted in the parallel in Ezra 2:2).

Naharai. nay´huh-ri (Heb. naḥray H5726, perhaps “diligent” or “gaunt”). A man from BEEROTH who served as armor-bearer for JOAB and who was included among DAVID’s mighty warriors (2 Sam. 23:37 [some eds. of KJV, “Nahari”]; 1 Chr. 11:39).

Nahari. See NAHARAI.

Nahash. nay´hash (Heb. nāḥāš H5731, “serpent,” or related to Akk. naḥāšu, “to be luxuriant”). (1) King of AMMON in the late eleventh century B.C. Soon after SAUL became king of Israel, Nahash besieged JABESH GILEAD and agreed to make a treaty with its inhabitants “only on the condition that I gouge out the right eye of everyone of you and so bring disgrace on all Israel” (1 Sam. 11:1-2). This incident caused Saul to prove himself as king in the way he rallied Israel against Nahash and defeated him (11:4-11; cf. 12:12). One of the DEAD SEA SCROLLS (4QSam^a) precedes this story with a paragraph that many scholars consider original; it indicates that the siege of Jabesh Gilead was only one (the last) in a series of repressive acts by Nahash against the Transjordanian tribes of GAD and REUBEN (see the NRSV, which includes the passage). According to 2 Sam. 10:1-2 (= 1 Chr. 19:1-2), after “the king of the Ammonites died,” DAVID said to himself, “I will show kindness to Hanun son of Nahash, just as his father showed kindness to me.” Many scholars assume that Nahash must have aided David when the latter was fleeing from Saul, their mutual enemy. The chronology is problematic, however; in addition, some have thought that the Nahash in the latter passage is a different individual altogether. It has also been suggested that the Nahash referred to in 2 Sam. 10:2 was a descendant of the one mentioned in 11:1, though the biblical text gives no indication that two different people are meant. See also #2 below.

(2) Father of ABIGAIL, the sister of ZERUIAH (2 Sam. 17:25). Both women are called sisters of David (1 Chr. 2:16), even though David’s father was named JESSE, not Nahash. Perhaps the best explanation is that Nahash was the first husband of David’s mother; if so, these two women were half-sisters of David and stepdaughters of Jesse. Some have argued that this Nahash is the same as #1 above, in which case David would have had a connection with the Ammonite royal family even before the conflicts between Saul and Nahash.

(3) Possibly the name of a town in Judah. See IR NAHASH.

Nahath. na’hath (Heb. naḥat H5740, possibly “rest” or “pure”). (1) Son of Reuel and grandson of ESAU by BASEMATH; an Edomite clan chief (Gen. 36:13, 17; 1 Chr. 1:37).

(2) Son of Zophai, descendant of LEVI through KOHATH, and ancestor of SAMUEL (1 Chr. 6:26; possibly the same as TOAH in v. 34 and TOHU in 1 Sam. 1:1, both of whom are identified as being a son of ZUPH).

(3) A Levite who, in the time of King HEZEKIAH, was a supervisor of the temple offerings (2 Chr. 31:13).

Nahbi. nah’bi (Heb. naḥbî H5696, possibly “timid”). Son of Vophsi, from the tribe of NAPHTALI; he was one of the twelve spies sent out by MOSES to reconnoiter the Promised Land (Num. 13:14).

Nahor. nay’hor (Heb. nāḥôr H5701, meaning uncertain; Gk. Nachôr G3732). KJV also Nachor (only Josh. 24:2; Lk. 3:34). (1) Son of Serug, descendant of SHEM, father of TERAH, and grandfather of ABRAHAM (Gen. 11:22-25; 1 Chr. 1:26); included in Luke’s GENEALOGY OF JESUS CHRIST (Lk. 3:34). After the birth of Terah in his twenty-ninth year, Nahor “lived 119 years and had other sons and daughters” (Gen. 11:25).

(2) Second son of Terah, and brother of Abraham and HARAN (Gen. 11:26-29; Josh. 24:2). A list is given of the twelve children of Nahor (Gen. 22:20-24), eight by his wife MILCAH, who was the daughter of his brother Haran (11:29;

24:15, 24, 47), and four by his concubine REUMAH. The contention that these “children” of Nahor must have represented the names of twelve Aramean tribes or places does not necessarily follow from the text. LABAN is once called the “son” of Nahor (29:5 NRSV) but the Hebrew word bēn H1201 can refer to a descendant, thus a grandson (cf. NIV). In concluding the covenant at MIZPAH, Laban called upon “the God of Abraham and the God of Nahor” (31:53).

(3) A city mentioned in Gen. 24:10. The reference may be either to a city called Nahor, or else it may be understood as the personal name, referring to #2 above; in the latter case, the passage may be rendered, “the city where Nahor lived,” that is, Haran. See HARAN (PLACE). The Akkadian name Naḥur, however, occurs frequently in the MARI texts, referring to a location in N MESOPOTAMIA. It must have been near to Haran (Gen. 27:43; 28:10; 29:4-5).

Nahshon. nah´shon (Heb. naḥšôn H5732, “little snake”; Gk. Naassōn G3709). KJV also Naashon (Exod. 6:23) and Naasson (Matt. 1:4; Lk. 3:32). Son of Amminadab, descendant of JUDAH, grandfather (or ancestor) of BOAZ, and ancestor of DAVID; included in the GENEALOGY OF JESUS CHRIST (Ruth 4:20; 1 Chr. 2:10-11; Matt. 1:4; Lk. 3:32). Nahshon was the leader of the tribe of Judah as they camped in the wilderness (Num. 2:3). As such, he assisted MOSES in taking a census of the Israelites (1:7) and brought offerings to the Lord on the first day of the dedication of the TABERNACLE (7:12-17). Since this tribe led the way when the whole nation moved, Nahshon was an important man (10:14). His sister ELISHEBA married AARON (Exod. 6:23).

Nahum. nay´huhm (Heb. naḥûm H5699, possibly “[God] comforts” or “comforter”; Gk. Naoum G3725). (1) An ELKOSHITE, author of a prophetic book (Nah. 1:1). See NAHUM, BOOK OF.

(2) Son of Esli, included in Luke’s GENEALOGY OF JESUS CHRIST (Lk. 3:25; KJV, “Naum”).

Nahum, Book of. The seventh book among the Minor Prophets. This short book is largely a poem, a literary masterpiece, predicting the downfall of NINEVEH, the capital of ASSYRIA. Nineveh was conquered by the Babylonians and their allies in 612 B.C. Nahum declared that Nineveh would fall as did THEBES, which the Assyrians themselves had conquered in 663. The book therefore was written between 663 and 612—in turbulent times. In 633 ASHURBANIPAL, the last great king of Assyria, died. Soon BABYLON rebelled, and the Assyrian power rapidly dwindled. In JUDAH the wicked MANASSEH reigned until about 641, followed by AMON's two-year reign and then the long reign of the good king JOSIAH (639-608). Perhaps it was in Josiah's day that Nahum prophesied the overthrow of the mighty nation that had so oppressed the Jews. ZEPHANIAH also predicted in Josiah's time the overthrow of Nineveh (Zeph. 1:1; 2:13).

A pedestal from Nineveh with mythological creatures (c. 2250 B.C.). Nahum prophesied against Nineveh, capital of the Assyrian empire.

Overview of NAHUM

Author: The prophet Nahum, an ELKOSHITE.

Historical setting: The focus of Nahum's prophecy is the nation of ASSYRIA prior to its fall (612 B.C.). The book was probably written sometime between 650 and 630 B.C.

Purpose: To announce the coming destruction of NINEVEH and thus to bring comfort to God's people.

Contents: After a psalm of praise to God (Nah. 1:1-11), the book promises deliverance to JUDAH (1:12-15) and proclaims judgments on Nineveh (chs. 2-3).

The book of Nahum is in two parts: first, a poem concerning the greatness of God (Nah. 1:2-15), then another and longer poem detailing the overthrow of Nineveh (2:1—3:19). The impassioned expressions of Nahum can be better understood when we remember how Assyria had overthrown the northern kingdom of Israel in 722 B.C. and had later taken forty cities of Judah captive, deporting over 200,000 people—according to SENNACHERIB's own boast in his royal annals (cf. 2 Ki. 18:13). The cruelty of the Assyrians is almost beyond belief. Their policy seems to have been one of calculated terror. Their own pictures show captives staked to the ground and being skinned alive. No wonder Nahum exulted at the overthrow of the proud, rich, cruel empire of Assyria.

Some modern critics take issue with Nahum's theology, saying that such vengeful expressions are far from the spirit of the gospel. Such views are usually based on a one-sided conception of NT teaching. In truth, Nahum declares, God is merciful, a statement similar to that found in Exod. 34:6 (Nah. 1:3). Nahum also quotes from ISAIAH the promise of good tidings of peace for his own (Nah. 1:15; cf. Isa. 52:7). But for Nineveh the cup of iniquity was full. A century and a quarter earlier, Nineveh had repented at the preaching of JONAH. But the repentance was temporary, and now a hundred years of savage cruelty and oppression of God's people must be paid for. Assyria, the pride of TIGLATH-PILESER, SARGON, Sennacherib, and Ashurbanipal, must be laid in the graveyard of nations.

The poem of Nineveh's doom (Nah. 2:1—3:19) is really quite remarkable. The figures of speech are bold and depict in staccato fashion the strokes of war. The glamour of the attack with whip and prancing horses and flashing swords suddenly gives way to the picture of the innumerable corpses that mark Nineveh's defeat (3:2-3). If it was wrong for Nahum to rejoice at Nineveh's fall, what shall be said of the heavenly throng of Rev. 19:1-6? Inveterate sin must at last bring well-deserved punishment. The death knell of all opposition to the gospel is here: "I am against you," declares the LORD Almighty" (Nah. 2:13; 3:5).

nail. The nails of the carpenter and cabinet maker were widely used from ancient times and differed little in size and shape from those used today. Made usually of bronze or iron (cf. 1 Chr. 22:3), they were hand-forged and tapered more gradually than the machined nails of today. Decorative nails with heads of gold (cf. 2 Chr. 3:9) or silver have been found. In the sense of the heath that protects the human finger, the term nail occurs only once: the end of mourning was marked by dressing the hair and cutting the nails (Deut. 21:12).

Nain. nayn (Gk. Nain G3723). During his great Galilean ministry, following the healing of the Roman CENTURION's slave in CAPERNAUM, Jesus journeyed about 25 mi. (40 km.) S to a city called Nain (Lk. 7:11-17). As he approached the city, he met the funeral procession of a widow's son, apparently a well-known person, since the procession consisted of a large crowd from the city. Touched by the desolate state of the widow, Jesus miraculously restored the young man to life to the astonishment and gratitude of the whole city and neighboring territory. Luke is the only evangelist to report this episode. Nain is identified with the modern village of Nein (c. 6.5 mi./10.5 km. SE of NAZARETH), which lies at the foot of the lower N slope of Mount MOREH. It is intriguing that on the S side of the same hill lies the OT town of SHUNEM, where ELISHA also restored a child to life (2 Ki. 4:8-37).

Naioth. nay'yoth (Heb. nāyôt H5766; in 1 Sam. 20:1 many MSS have the common noun nāwôt, “grazing place, township,” and this is the form preferred by some scholars). A place in RAMAH to which DAVID fled from SAUL (1 Sam. 19:18—20:1). When Saul went to this location, “the Spirit of God came even upon him, and he walked along prophesying until he came to Naioth. He stripped off his robes and also prophesied in Samuel’s presence” (19:23-24a). The site is unknown, however, and many believe that the word is not a proper name, but rather a common noun to be rendered “camps” or the like. Since SAMUEL lived in Ramah (c. 5 mi./8 km. N of JERUSALEM), some think that “the camps/dwellings at Ramah” described the domicile of Samuel and his school of prophets (v. 20).

nakedness. The first use of the word naked in the Bible gives insight into the meaning in many other contexts: “The man and his wife were both naked, and they felt no shame” (Gen. 2:25). In the unfallen state the exposure of the body would not provoke TEMPTATION. The sense of SHAME at nakedness is illustrated graphically in the account of NOAH’s drunkenness and the reaction of his sons to his consequent exposure (9:20-23). The expression “to uncover nakedness” is used to describe forbidden degrees of cohabitation (Lev. 18:6 et al.). The terms naked and nakedness are used figuratively in many ways. “To be naked” may mean to be without full covering (Jn. 21:7) or destitute (Job 22:6) or impoverished (Gen. 42:9). JOB used the word to indicate the transience of earthly possessions (Job 1:21). The expression “nakedness of the land” (Gen. 42:9 NRSV) indicates exposure and helplessness. The spiritual state of the church in LAODICEA was “wretched, pitiful, poor, blind and naked” (Rev. 3:17)—a vivid characterization of its utter bankruptcy.

Nakon. nay'kon. TNIV form of NACON.

name. In Bible times names had greater significance than they usually have today. A name was given only by a person in a position of authority (Gen. 2:19; 2 Ki. 23:34) and could signify that the person named was appointed to a particular position, function, or relationship (Gen. 35:18; 2 Sam. 12:25). The name given was often determined by some circumstance at the time of birth (Gen. 19:22); sometimes the name expressed a hope or a prophecy (Isa. 8:1-4; Hos. 1:4). When a person gave his own name to another, it signified the joining of the two in very close unity, as when God gave his name to Israel (Deut. 28:9-10). To be baptized into someone's name therefore meant to pass into new ownership (Matt. 28:19; Acts 8:16; 1 Cor. 1:13, 15). In the Scriptures there is the closest possible relationship between a person and his name, the two being practically equivalent, so that to remove the name was to extinguish the person (Num. 27:4; Deut. 7:24). To forget God's name is to depart from him (Jer. 23:27). The expression "the name of the LORD" could signify not simply the word by which he is called (see JEHOVAH), but more importantly the Lord himself in the attributes he had manifested—holiness, power, love, etc. Often in the Bible the name signified the presence of the person in the character revealed (1 Ki. 18:24). To be sent or to speak in someone's name meant to carry that person's authority (Jer. 11:21; 2 Cor. 5:20). To pray in the name of Jesus is to pray as his representatives on earth—in his Spirit and with his aim—and implies the closest union with Christ.

names. When God named what he had made, he described the essence of the thing (Gen. 1:5, 8, 10; 2:11-14). By allowing ADAM to give names, God enabled him to express relationships to his fellow creatures: Adam named the beasts (2:19-20) and woman (2:23). EVE's personal name is from her function as mother of all living (human) beings (3:20). CAIN's name is a play on two Hebrew words (4:1). SETH is a reminder that God "appointed" him instead of ABEL (4:25). "Men began to call on the name of the LORD" (4:26); did they possibly already at this time begin to recognize him by his revealed name, JEHOVAH (Yahweh)? God changed the name of Abram to ABRAHAM in view of his destiny (17:5). Names in Gen. 10 are of individuals (e.g., Nimrod) or nations (e.g., Egypt [= Mizraim], Jebusites, Canaanites), or eponymous ancestors or tribes descended from them. People were named for animals (Caleb, dog; Tabitha and Dorcas, gazelle), plants (Tamar, palm tree), precious things (Peninnah, coral or pearl), qualities (Hannah, grace; Ikkesh, perverse; Ira, watchful), historical circumstances (Ichabod, inglorious), or for relatives (Absalom named a daughter after his sister Tamar).

The significance of the names of the tribes of Israel is brought out in Gen. 48-49. Names compounded with EL (God) or Jeho- and -iah (Yahweh) became common. JACOB (supplanter) received the name ISRAEL (prince of God) and recognized God without learning his secret name (32:24-32). Prophets gave their children symbolic names (Isa. 8:1-4; Hos. 1:4-11). The MESSIAH was given significant names: IMMANUEL (God with us, Isa. 7:14; Matt. 1:23), JESUS (Yahweh saves, Matt. 1:21; Lk. 1:31). In his name (Acts 3:16) miracles were wrought, as he promised (Jn. 14:13-14). When we act in Jesus' name, we represent him (Matt. 10:42). Place-names are for natural features (Lebanon, white, because it is snow-capped; Bethsaida and Sidon from their fishing; Tirzah, pleasantness, for its beauty). By NT times both personal and family names were common (Bartimaeus) or descriptive phrases were added, as for the several Marys. Hybrid or duplicate names occur in a bilingual culture (e.g., Cephas/Peter). Patriarchal times saw names as indicators of character, function, or destiny. Soon names began to be given more hopefully than discriminatingly, until finally we are not sure whether the name tells us anything about the nature: Was Philip truly a “lover of horses”? The many genealogical tables in the Bible follow the practice of ancient historians, showing the importance of descent and of the relations thus established between individuals.

Naomi. nay-oh´mee (Heb. nā ʿoṣmî H5843, “pleasant[ness]”). Wife of ELIMELECH and mother-in-law of RUTH. Naomi and her husband, who were originally from BETHLEHEM, had two sons, MAHLON and KILION (Ruth 1:1-3). Because of a famine in JUDAH they moved to MOAB, and when Naomi was widowed, her sons married Moabite wives, namely ORPAH and Ruth (v. 4). When the two sons died, she returned to Bethlehem with Ruth. In her depression she said she should no longer be called Naomi, “pleasant,” but now more appropriately MARA, “bitter.” She advised Ruth in the steps that led to Ruth’s marriage to BOAZ (Ruth 3:1-6), and she nursed Ruth’s child (4:16-17).

Naphath, Naphath-dor. See NAPHOTH DOR.

Naphish. nay´fish (Heb. nāpîš H5874, derivation uncertain). Son of ISHMAEL and grandson of ABRAHAM (Gen. 25:15; 1 Chr. 1:31). His descendants became an Arabian tribe living in TRANSJORDAN and were among those defeated by the Reubenites, the Gadites, and the Manassites (1 Chr. 5:19; KJV, “Nephish”). Some scholars believe that the NEPHUSSIM, listed among postexilic temple servants (Ezra 2:50; Neh. 7:52; see NETHINIM), were descendants of prisoners of war from this tribe.

Naphoth. See NAPHOTH DOR.

Naphoth Dor. nay´foth-dor´ (Heb. nāpôt dôr H5869 [with variant spellings], possibly “heights of Dor”). Also Naphath-dor. A hilly region surrounding the city of DOR. The first element occurs in the plural form nāpôt H5868 only once (Josh. 11:2), while the singular construct nāpat is found twice (12:23; 1 Ki.

4:11). In addition, the word nepet by itself occurs once (in the pausal form hannāpet, Josh. 17:11); it is treated as a proper name by some versions (NIV, “Naphoth”; NRSV, “Naphath”), but as a common noun by others (KJV, “countries”; NJPS, “regions”).

The tribal territory of Naphtali.

© Dr. James C. Martin

Part of the tribal territory of Naphtali in Galilee (looking N from the Arbel cliffs toward Wadi ʿAmmud).

Naphtali. nafʹtuh-li (Heb. naptālî H5889, “[my] struggle”; Gk. Nephtalim G3750). KJV NT Nephthalim. Sixth son of JACOB, and his second by BILHAH, the handmaid of RACHEL (Gen. 29:29). Naphtali and DAN (Bilhah’s older son) usually are mentioned together in OT contexts. Of Naphtali himself practically nothing is known, and Jacob’s blessing for Naphtali was brief and noncommittal (49:21). He had four sons, and his descendants became one of the Israelite tribes.

The tribe of Naphtali appears in the lists of the book of NUMBERS as a tribe of moderate size. It furnished 53,400 soldiers at KADESH BARNEA (Num. 1:43) and 45,000 at the mustering of the troops across from JERICHO (26:50). In the wilderness organization, Naphtali was supposed to camp on the N side of the TABERNACLE under the standard of Dan, and this group of tribes brought up the rear in marching. Interestingly, they settled together in CANAAN. Naphtali's prince Ahira gave the last offering for the dedication of the altar (7:78). Naphtali received the next to the last lot in the final division of the land (Josh. 19:32-39), but in many ways its inheritance was the best.

The territory of Naphtali, as nearly as we can tell, included the fertile scenic area just W of the Sea of Galilee and the sources of the JORDAN. It reached from the lower limits of the Sea of Galilee almost up to a point opposite Mount HERMON. On the W it reached halfway to the MEDITERRANEAN, being bounded by the tribe of ASHER. The chief cities of Naphtali were HAZOR, KINNERETH, and KEDESH. The latter was the northernmost of the CITIES OF REFUGE in W Palestine; it was also the home of BARAK. Naphtali figured largely in DEBORAH's conquest of Hazor (Jdg. 5:18). Men from this tribe also assisted GIDEON (7:23). Naphtali is mentioned as one of SOLOMON's revenue districts (1 Ki. 4:15), and the collector was a son-in-law of the king.

Lying exposed in the N, the territory of Naphtali proved vulnerable. It was conquered by BEN-HADAD (1 Ki. 15:20), and the tribe was later deported after the first invasion of TIGLATH-PILESER about 733 B.C. (2 Ki. 15:29), who settled Gentiles in the territory. This event is mentioned in Isa. 9:1 with a prediction of the MESSIAH, who preached, as Matthew reminds us (Matt. 4:12-16), in this same region of Galilee of the Gentiles in fulfillment of the ancient prophecy.

Naphtuhim. See NAPHTUHITES.

Naphtuhites. naf'tuh-hits (Heb. naptuḥîm H5888, derivation uncertain). A people group that descended from MIZRAIM (NRSV, "Egypt"), the son of HAM (Gen. 10:13; 1 Chr. 1:11). Their identity is unknown, but because they are listed just before the PATHRUSITES, who lived in Upper (i.e., southern) EGYPT, some scholars have proposed that the Naphtuhites were associated with Lower Egypt, in particular the NILE delta. An alternate suggestion links the name with the Egyptian god Ptah and thus with the city of MEMPHIS in Middle Egypt.

napkin. See HANDKERCHIEF.

Narcissus. nahr-sis'uhz (Gk. Narkissos G3727). When writing to the church in ROME, PAUL sends greetings to “those in the household of Narcissus who are in the Lord” (Rom. 16:11). Evidently, the reference is to Christians among the slaves (or possibly freedmen) in this household. Why Narcissus himself is not greeted has been the subject of speculation. Had he died? Or did Paul know that he was absent from Rome at the time? Or perhaps Narcissus was not a believer?

nard. See PLANTS.

Nathan. nay'thuhn (Heb. nātān H5990, “gift,” or short form of a name such as ELNATHAN, “God has given”; Gk. Natham G3718). (1) Son of DAVID and BATHSHEBA (2 Sam. 5:14; 1 Chr. 3:5; 14:4). This Nathan was an older brother of SOLOMON, and his family is pictured as having a part in Israel’s future eschatological events (Zech. 12:12; some believe that the reference here is to #2 below, Nathan the prophet). He is also included in Luke’s GENEALOGY OF JESUS CHRIST (Lk. 3:31; in Matt. 1:6, the genealogy is traced through Solomon).

(2) A prophet at the royal court in JERUSALEM during the reign of David and the early years of Solomon. David consulted him regarding the building of the TEMPLE (2 Sam. 7; 1 Chr. 17). Nathan at first approved, but that same night he had a vision directing him to advise David to leave the building of the temple to the son who would succeed him. David humbly obeyed, expressing gratitude to God for blessings bestowed and others promised. Later Nathan rebuked David for adultery with Bathsheba (2 Sam. 12:1-25). David earnestly repented. The title of Ps. 51 links it with this incident. When ADONIJAH sought to supplant his aged father David as king, Nathan intervened through Bathsheba to secure the succession for her son Solomon (1 Ki. 1:8-53). Nathan wrote chronicles of the reign of David (1 Chr. 29:29) and shared in writing the history of the reign of Solomon (2 Chr. 9:29). He was associated with David and GAD the seer in arranging the musical services for the house of God (29:25).

(3) Father of IGAL, who was one of David’s mighty warriors (2 Sam. 23:36); the parallel passage, apparently as a result of later scribal corruption, identifies Nathan as brother of Joel (1 Chr. 11:38).

(4) The list of Solomon’s “chief officials” (1 Ki. 4:2) includes the following: “Azariah son of Nathan—in charge of the district officers; Zabud son of Nathan—a priest and personal adviser to the king” (4:5). It is often assumed that both Azariah and Zabud were sons of the same man. Many have thought that this Nathan should be identified with Solomon’s brother (#1 above); others have proposed Nathan the prophet (#2). In addition, some have wondered if there is a connection between Nathan father of Zabud and Nathan father of Zabad (see #5 below). None of these suggestions can be confirmed.

(5) Son of ATTAL, descendant of JUDAH through JERAHMEEL, and father of Zabad (1 Chr. 2:36).

(6) One of a group of leaders sent by EZRA to IDDO to get attendants for the house of God (Ezra 8:16). He is usually thought to be the same Nathan as the descendant of Binnui who agreed to put away his foreign wife (10:39).

Nathanael. nuh-than'ay-uhl (Gk. Nathanaēl G3720, from Heb. nētan ʾēl H5991, “God has given”). A disciple of Jesus, mentioned only in Jn. 1:45-51; 21:2. His home was in CANA of GALILEE (21:2) and he heard of Jesus from PHILIP (1:45). The circumstances surrounding his calling are somewhat striking, since Christ praises his integrity at their initial encounter and demonstrates to Nathanael his own foreknowledge by reference to the fig tree. Evidently Nathanael's knowledge of the Scripture was considerable because of the remarkable theological repartee that occurred between Christ and him (1:47-51). Because Nathanael is not mentioned in the Synoptic Gospels, efforts have been made to identify him with one of the apostles listed in Matt. 10:2-4 and parallels. A widely accepted suggestion since antiquity is that Nathanael was the same as BARTHOLOMEW. Though it is true that double names (even double Semitic names) were sometimes used, this proposal remains only a conjecture.

Nathan-Melech. nay'thuhn-mee'lik (Heb. nētan-melek H5994, “Melech [= king] has given,” possibly in reference to Yahweh or to MOLECH). TNIV Nathan-Melek. An official or chamberlain near whose quarters were kept “the horses that the kings of Judah had dedicated to the sun”; these horses were removed by King JOSIAH (2 Ki. 23:11).

nations. See GENTILE.

nature, natural. Both the OT and NT CREATION primarily as a backdrop to REDEMPTION. The closest one gets in Scripture to nature as a distinct entity is in three passages: the wording “all the host of them” in reference to the totality of God's creation (Gen. 2:1); PAUL's statement regarding the ungodly changing the course of “nature” (Gk. physis G5882, Rom. 1:26); and the apostle's appeal, “Does not the very nature of things teach you...?” (1 Cor. 11:14).

The emphasis in Scripture is on the following facts: (a) God the Father is Creator, Sustainer, and Ruler of all (Gen. 1-2; Isa. 44:24; Amos 4:13); (b) God is omnipresent in all he has created (Ps.139:7-12); (c) Christ the Son also must be spoken of in terms of Creator, Sustainer, and Ruler (Jn. 1:3; Col. 1:16-17; Heb. 1:10-12); (d) the order and beauty of the universe reflect and proclaim the existence, wisdom, and power of God (Job 38:4—39:30; Ps. 8:1-4; 19:1-6; 104:1-32; 136:6-9; Prov. 8:22-31; Rom. 1:19-20); and (e) one may learn from God's bounty and care in nature regarding God's provision and concern for human beings (Matt. 6:25-34; Lk. 12:22-31).

The Greek noun physis denotes (a) a condition, endowment, or status inherited from one's ancestors, as in reference to those who "by nature" are Jews (Gal. 2:15), heathen (Rom. 2:27), "children of wrath" (Eph. 2:3 NRSV), or the "natural" and "wild" branches of the olive tree (Rom. 11:21, 24); (b) innate characteristics and instinctive dispositions, as of false gods (Gal. 4:8), men (Rom. 2:14; Jas. 3:7b), or even God (2 Pet. 1:4); (c) the established order within nature, as of sexual relations (Rom. 1:26b) or decorum (1 Cor. 11:14); and (d) a creature or product of nature (Jas. 3:7a). The cognate adjective physikos G5879 is employed with reference to natural human instincts (Rom. 1:26-27), and in a deprecatory sense of only the natural instincts (2 Pet. 2:12). The adjective psychikos G6035 (see SOUL) signifies the life of the natural world and whatever belongs to it, always to be contrasted with the supernatural world and that which may be characterized as belonging to the HOLY SPIRIT (1 Cor. 2:14; 15:44-46; Jas. 3:15; Jude 19; see also SENSUAL). It is in this latter theological and ethical sense that the word comes to its distinctive expression in the Bible, identifying the state of human beings as they are "in Adam" and serving as a backdrop to God's complete redemption "in Christ."

nave. This English term is used by the NRSV and other versions to render Hebrew hêkāl H2121 (which usually means "palace" or "temple") in passages where the word refers to the larger room (NIV, "main hall") of the TEMPLE (e.g., 1 Ki. 6:3, 5; Ezek. 41:1-2; cf. also habbayit haggādôl, lit., "the big house," 2 Chr. 3:5).

navel. The Hebrew term šôr H9219 is used once in the sense "navel" (Cant. 7:2), once with reference to the navel cord (Ezek. 16:4), and once by synecdoche for the whole body (Prov. 3:8). (A similar word, šārîr H9235, which occurs only in Job 40:16, is rendered "navel" by the KJV, but its meaning is "muscle.") Another word for "navel" is ṭabbûr H3179, and in both of its occurrences it is constructed with ṣereṣ H824, yielding the metaphorical meaning of "the center of the land" (Jdg. 9:37; Ezek. 38:12).

Nazarene. naz'uh-reen (Gk. Nazarēnos G3716 and Nazōraios G3717, “of Nazareth”). In almost every occurrence, this name identifies Jesus on the basis of his long residence in NAZARETH; in one passage it serves to identify his followers (Acts 24:5). Used by friends, the term had a friendly meaning (Acts 2:22; 3:6; 10:38), and Jesus applied the title to himself (22:8). Used by his enemies, it was a title of scorn (Matt. 26:71; Mk. 14:67). It is not altogether certain what Matthew intended in the words, “So was fulfilled what was said through the prophets: ‘He will be called a Nazarene’” (Matt. 2:23). Most interpreters have thought that Matthew had in mind Isa. 11:1, in which the MESSIAH is referred to as a “branch” or “shoot” (Heb. nēṣer H5916) out of the roots of JESSE. Others have said that Matthew meant only that the MESSIAH would be a despised person (ch. 53) and not a prominent or accepted individual (Nazarenes apparently were despised by their neighbors in the first century; cf. Jn. 1:46). Still others have understood the verse only as a positive statement that pointed to a negative truth, namely that the Messiah would not be called a Bethlehemite, the place of his nativity, in order to avoid hostility. He, therefore, would be called something else, in fact, a Nazarene. In any case, Matthew sees a fulfillment of Isaiah’s prophecy when Jesus’ parents took up their residence in Nazareth.

Nazareth. naz'uh-rith (Gk. Nazareth G3714 [also Nazaret and Nazara]; meaning uncertain). A city in GALILEE, the home of Mary and Joseph, the human parents of Jesus (Lk. 1:26; 2:4). After their flight into EGYPT to escape the ruthless hands of HEROD the Great, the holy family contemplated returning to BETHLEHEM of JUDEA; but hearing that Herod’s son Archelaus was now reigning in Judea, they withdrew to Nazareth in Galilee (Matt. 2:13-23). Important as it may seem to have been in the NT, the town is not mentioned in the OT, the TALMUD, or the writings of JOSEPHUS. There is reason to believe that Nazareth was a rather insignificant town in Jesus’ day, overshadowed by the larger city to the N, SEPPHORIS. Nazareth is about halfway between the S end of the Sea of Galilee and Mount CARMEL. Situated in the hills to the N of the Plain of ESDRAELON, the site (modern en-Naṣīra) commands a good view of the ancient battlegrounds. To the N one also can see Mount HERMON; to the W, the MEDITERRANEAN; and to the E, BASHAN.

Nazareth.

Upon reaching the age of thirty and the beginning of his ministry, our Lord went from Nazareth to Judea to be baptized by JOHN THE BAPTIST. An interesting comment on Nazareth from the mouth of NATHANAEL appears in Jn. 1:46: “Nazareth! Can anything good come from there?” This question has been understood in many ways, but the most common is that Nathanael was casting an aspersion on the smallness of the town, perhaps viewing it as a rival to his own village of CANA (cf. 21:2). Luke records that Jesus was rejected by the people of Nazareth when he read from Isa. 61:1-2 at the synagogue and told the congregation that he was the fulfillment of that prophecy. Then he proceeded to illustrate from the lives of ELIJAH and ELISHA that prophets are rejected by their own people. In their anger the citizenry led him to the brow of the hill on which the city was built, that they might throw him over; but he escaped in the crowd (Lk. 4:16-30). Some see a second and later rejection of Jesus at Nazareth in the parallel accounts of Matthew and Mark (Matt. 13:54-58; Mk. 6:1-6a). Again, the people were offended at him when he read in the synagogue. Mark comments: “He could not do any miracles there, except lay his hands on a few sick people and heal them. And he was amazed at their lack of faith” (Mk. 6:5-6).

Nazareth Decree. An inscription cut on a slab of white marble, sent in 1878 from NAZARETH for the private collection of a German antiquarian named Froehner. It was not until 1930, when, on Froehner’s death, the inscription found a place in the Cabinet de Medailles of the Louvre, that the historian Michel Rostovtzeff noticed its significance. The decree states: “Ordinance of Caesar. It is my pleasure that graves and tombs remain undisturbed in perpetuity for those who have made them for the cult of their ancestors, or children or members of their house. If, however, any may lay information that another has either demolished them, or has in any other way extracted the buried, or has maliciously transferred them to other places in order to wrong them, or has displaced the sealing or other stones, against such a one I order that a trial be instituted, as in respect of the gods, so in regard to the cult of mortals. For it shall be much more obligatory to honor the buried. Let it be absolutely forbidden for anyone to disturb them. In the case of contravention I desire that the offender be sentenced to capital punishment on the charge of violation of sepulchre.”

Evidence suggests that the inscription falls within the decade that closed in A.D. 50. The central Roman government did not take over the administration of GALILEE until the death of AGRIPPA I in 44. This limits the date, in the opinion of competent scholarship, to five years under CLAUDIUS. This emperor’s interest in continuing the religious policy of AUGUSTUS led to a wide knowledge of the religions of the empire and prompted investigation in the courts of any case involving cults or religious beliefs. Nazareth having recently fallen under central control, Claudius proceeds to deal with the trouble on the spot. Inquiries are made in Palestine, and the local authority asks for directions. The result is a “rescript” or imperial ruling. Claudius wrote more than one long letter on religious matters (e.g., a notable letter to the Jews of Alexandria in A.D. 41). The decree set up at Nazareth may have been part of such a communication. If this hypothetical reconstruction is correct, it is in the words of an emperor that the twentieth century read the first secular comment on the Easter story, and legal testimony to its central fact.

Nazarite. See NAZIRITE.

Nazirite. naz’uh-rit (Heb. nāzîr H5687, “dedicated, withheld”). KJV Nazarite. A member of a Hebrew religious class, specially dedicated to God. The authorization for Nazirites appears in Num. 6:1-21 and was divinely revealed, through MOSES, shortly before Israel's departure from Mount SINAI (Num. 10:11; cf. Exod. 40:17). It would appear that the practice of separation for religious purposes is very ancient and was shared by a number of peoples. In Israel, however, it assumed unique proportions. There were two different types of Naziritism, the temporary and the perpetual, of which the first type was far more common. In fact, we know of only three of the latter class: SAMSON, SAMUEL, and JOHN THE BAPTIST.

The three principal marks that distinguished the Nazirite were (1) a renunciation of all products of the vine, including grapes; (2) prohibition of the use of the razor; and (3) avoidance of contact with a dead body. The OT nowhere explains why these three areas of prohibition were chosen as giving expression to the Nazirites' positive "separation to the LORD" (Num. 6:2), but there are some fairly obvious, even if speculative, lines of thought. Abstention from the fruit of the vine could point to the renunciation of earthly joys in order to find all joy in the Lord. Allowing the hair to grow must surely symbolize the dedication of personal strength and vitality to the Lord (at the end of the period of the vow the hair was shaved and cast into the fire of sacrifice, 6:18). The avoidance of contact with the dead symbolizes the primacy of the Nazirite's relationship to the Lord: no duty to others can take its place. It should be noted that Nazirites were not expected to withdraw from society, that is, to live a monastic type of life, nor to become celibate. The question has been raised whether the RECABITES of Jer. 35 were included within the Nazirite classification. It appears, however, that the Recabites had more the status of a (Hebrew) nomadic group, since they were not merely forbidden to drink wine but also to refrain from owning real estate (they lived in tents, Jer. 35:7, 10).

John the Baptist, the forerunner of Christ, was a Nazirite from birth (Lk. 1:15). The connection between John the Baptist and the Qumran community is rather tenuous, nor can it be proved that the men of Qumran were all Nazirites (see DEAD SEA SCROLLS). The case of PAUL and Naziritism has frequently elicited discussion. Although it cannot be established that the apostle assumed such vow, it is certain that he did assume the expenses of those who did (Acts 21:23-24). The court of Herod AGRIPPA supported a large number of Nazirites, according to JOSEPHUS.

The reasons for taking a Nazirite vow were numerous. A vow might be assumed by a parent before the birth of a child; by one in some sort of distress or trouble; or by a woman suspected by her husband of unfaithfulness in their marriage relationship until the suspicion could be removed. Women and slaves could take vows only if sanctioned by their husbands or masters. The period of time for the Nazirite vow was anywhere from thirty days to a whole lifetime.

There is only one clear-cut mention of the Nazirites by the prophets. The prophet AMOS voices a complaint of the Lord against the children of Israel that he had given to Israel the prophets and the Nazirites as spiritual instructors and examples, but that the people had given wine to the Nazirites and had offered inducements to the prophets to refrain from prophesying (2:11-12).

Neah. nee'uh (Heb. nē'â H5828, derivation unknown). A town on the N border of the tribal territory of ZEBULUN (Josh. 19:13). Neah was located between RIMMON (PLACE) and HANNATHON, but the site has not been identified.

A general view of modern Kavala, ancient Neapolis. (View to the W.)

Neapolis. nee-ap'uh-lis (Gk. Nea polis or Neapolis G3735, “new city”). A town on the N shore of the Aegean Sea (to be distinguished from Neapolis, modern Naples, in Italy). The best evidence places its site at the present Greek town of Kavala. The city belonged first to Thrace (see THRACIA), then became part of both the first and second Athenian Confederacy, during which time it was commended for its loyalty. It finally fell within the Roman province of MACEDONIA. Neapolis was the first point in Europe touched by PAUL and his companions when they came from TROAS (Acts 16:11). From here it was an easy journey to PHILIPPI (about 10 mi./16 km. inland). It is possible that the apostle passed through the town again when he revisited Macedonia (20:1); and it is almost certain that he embarked from Neapolis on his journey back to Troas (20:6).

Neariah. nee'uh-ri'uh (Heb. nē'aryâ H5859 “young man [or servant] of Yahweh”). (1) Son of Ishi and descendant of SIMEON during the reign of HEZEKIAH;

Neariah and his brothers led 500 Simeonites in an invasion of SEIR and wiped out the AMALEKITES (1 Chr. 4:42-43).

(2) Son of Shemaiah and postexilic descendant of DAVID through SOLOMON and ZERUBBABEL (1 Chr. 3:22-23). Some scholars believe he was the son of Shecaniah; see HATTUSH #1.

Nebai. nee`bi (Heb. nēbāy H5763, derivation uncertain). One of the leaders of the people who signed the covenant of NEHEMIAH (Neh. 10:19; the LXX and some modern versions follow the Ketib, “Nobai”).

Nebaioth. ni-bay`yoth (Heb. nēbāyôṭ H5568, meaning unknown). Firstborn son of ISHMAEL and grandson of ABRAHAM and HAGAR (Gen. 25:13; 28:9; 36:3; 1 Chr. 1:29). The name is used also of his descendants (Isa. 60:7), an E Semitic tribal people of ARABIA. The Nebaiothites (Nabaiateans) are mentioned in Assyrian records in connection with KEDAR (as in Isaiah). Moreover, the form nbyt occurs in N Arabian inscriptions with reference to a tribe hostile to Teima³ (TEMA). Attempts to equate Nebaioth with the historical NABATEANS have been widely rejected both on philological and historical grounds.

Neballat. ni-bal`uht (Heb. nēballāṭ H5579, possibly from a root blṭ, attested in Akk. balātu, “life”). A town overlooking the Plain of SHARON; along with HADID, ZEBOIM, LOD, and ONO, Neballat was settled by Benjamites after the EXILE (Neh. 11:34). It is identified with the modern Beit Nabala, c. 13 mi. (21 km.) ESE of JOPPA and less than 2 mi. (3 km.) NNE of Hadid.

Nebat. nee`bat (Heb. nēbāṭ H5565, possibly “[God] has looked at [i.e., approvingly]”). Father of JEROBOAM I, who was the first king of ISRAEL after the division of the kingdom (1 Ki. 11:26 et al.). Because Jeroboam’s mother is described as a widow, many infer that Nebat died while Jeroboam was still a child.

Nebiim, Neviim. nuh-bee`im, nuh-vi-eem` (Heb. nēbî`îm, pl. of nābî` H5566, “prophet”). A term applied to the second division of the OT Hebrew canon, and consisting of the Former Prophets (Joshua, Judges, Samuel, Kings) and the Latter Prophets (Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, and the Twelve). See CANONICITY.

Nebo (deity). nee´boh (Heb. nēbô H5550, from Akk. Nabû, prob. “one called [by god]”). Also Nabu. Name of a Babylonian deity mentioned only in Isaiah’s taunt song on the downfall of BABYLON (Isa. 46:1). Nebo was the god of wisdom and writing, and (alongside MARDUK) the patron-god of the Babylonian rulers. His center of worship was at Borsippa, SW of Babylon. The cult continued to flourish until the end of the neo-Babylonian period (612-538 B.C.) and survived in SYRIA for several more centuries. The name Nabu was commonly used as a component of personal names (NABONIDUS, NEBUCHADNEZZAR, and others; possibly also ABEDNEGO).

Nebo (person). nee´boh (Heb. nēbô H5551, “height”). Ancestor of some Israelites who agreed to put away their foreign wives (Ezra 10:43). Some believe that the name refers to the town from which the family came. See NEBO (PLACE) #2.

Nebo (place). nee´boh (Heb. nēbô H5550, “height”). (1) A town in MOAB near Mount Nebo (see NEBO, MOUNT), requested by the tribes of REUBEN and GAD (Num. 32:3). It was rebuilt by the Reubenites (Num. 32:38; 33:47; cf. 1 Chr. 5:8). The town was later retaken by MESHA, king of Moab, who recorded his victory on the MOABITE STONE. Nebo is mentioned also in prophetic oracles of judgment (Isa. 15:2; Jer. 48:1, 22). Its precise location is uncertain.

(2) A postexilic town in JUDAH, mentioned in a list just after BETHEL and AI (Ezra 2:29; called “the other Nebo” [prob. a scribal error] in Neh. 7:33). It is often, but tentatively, identified with Nuba, c. 7 mi. (11 km.) NW of HEBRON; some, however, think this Nebo is the same as #1 above. See also NEBO (PERSON).

(3) Traditional burial place of MOSES. See NEBO, MOUNT.

Nebo, Mount. nee´boh (Heb. har nēbô H2215 and H5549, “high mountain”). A mountain in TRANSJORDAN from which MOSES viewed the Promised Land. Mount Nebo is mentioned only twice (Deut. 32:49; 34:1). Some rather specific indications of its location are given in each passage. The first one records God’s command to Moses, “Go up into the Abarim Range to Mount Nebo in Moab, across from Jericho, and view Canaan, the land I am giving the Israelites as their own possession.” The second states that “Moses climbed Mount Nebo from the plains of Moab to the top of Pisgah, across from Jericho.” Today known as Jebel en-Neba (or Nabba), Mount Nebo is a spur of the plain of Moab, some 6 mi. (10 km.) NW of MEDEBA. It is almost opposite the N end of the DEAD SEA and therefore not due E of Jericho. It rises c. 4,000 ft. (1,220 m.) above the Dead Sea or c. 2,700 ft. (820 m.) above sea level. PISGAH, which is associated with Nebo in Deut. 34:1, may be another name for the same peak, or Nebo may be a part of Pisgah. Since several elevations in that same vicinity afford the same view, it is not certain whether the one bearing the name Neba is necessarily the one Moses climbed. A saddle connects it to Ras es-Siyaghah, which was revered by early Christians and is the site preferred by many scholars.

Nebo-Sarsekim. nee'boh-shar'suh-kim (Heb. nēbû śar-sēkîm H5552). One of NEBUCHADNEZZAR's officials who participated in the siege of JERUSALEM (Jer. 39:3 NIV; other versions translate differently). See comments under SARSECHIM.

Nebuchadnezzar, Nebuchadrezzar. neb'uh-kuhd-nez'uhr, neb'uh-kuhdrez'uhr (Heb. nēbûkadne 𐤢𐤠𐤏𐤕 H5556 and nēbûkadre 𐤢𐤠𐤏𐤕 H5557 [in Jeremiah and Ezekiel], with some spelling variations; from Akk. Nabû-kudurru-uṣur, "may [the god] Nabu protect [my] heir"; LXX, Nabouchodonosor; the spelling with n instead of r is often explained as the result of dissimilation). Son of NABOPOLASSAR and King of BABYLON, 605-562 B.C. Often referred to as Nebuchadnezzar II (to distinguish him from a king of the same name who ruled at the end of the twelfth century B.C.), it was he who carried away the people of JUDAH in the seventy-year Babylonian captivity. He figures prominently in the books of Jeremiah, Ezekiel, Daniel, and the later chapters of Kings and Chronicles.

Nebuchadnezzar's father, Nabopolassar, seems to have been a general appointed by the Assyrian king. However, in the later years of ASSYRIA he rebelled and established himself as king of Babylon in 626 B.C. The rebellion increased and finally Nabopolassar with the Medes (see MEDIA) and SCYTHIANS conquered NINEVEH, the Assyrian capital, in 612. The Medes and Babylonians divided the Assyrian empire, and a treaty was probably sealed by the marriage of the Median princess to the Babylonian prince, Nebuchadnezzar. In 607 the crown prince Nebuchadnezzar joined his father in the battle against the remnants of the Assyrian power and their allies, the Egyptians. In 605, when his father was in his last illness, he decisively defeated the Egyptians at CARCHEMISH and was able to take over all SYRIA and PALESTINE. Apparently JEHOIAKIM, king of Judah, who had been vassal to EGYPT, quickly did homage to Babylon and gave hostages (Dan. 1:1).

Nebuchadnezzar at this time got news of his father's death, and with a picked bodyguard he hastened home to secure his throne. On repeated occasions thereafter he struck toward the west. In about 602 B.C. Jehoiakim revolted (2 Ki. 24:1), probably with promise of Egyptian help, but was forced to submit. In 601 Nebuchadnezzar attacked Egypt itself but was defeated, as he frankly admits. Later, Pharaoh HOPHRA submitted to him. In 597 Jehoiakim rebelled again, and Nebuchadnezzar called out his troops for another western expedition. Jehoiakim died either in a siege or by treachery (Jer. 22:18-19), and his son JEHOIACHIN ascended the throne. But he lasted only three months until the campaign was over; he was taken as a hostage to Babylon, where he lived and finally was given relative freedom. Here the biblical account (2 Ki. 25:27-30) is confirmed by discovery of the Weidner Tablets.

Nebuchadnezzar installed Jehoiachin's uncle as puppet king, taking heavy tribute from Jerusalem. EZEKIEL was among the captives of that expedition. Nebuchadnezzar's chronicle agrees with the biblical account, telling how (in 597 B.C.) he "encamped against the city of Judah and on the second day of the month Adar [Mar. 15/16] he seized the city and captured the king. He appointed there a king of his own choice, received its heavy tribute and sent them to Babylon" (D. Wiseman, Chronicles of the Chaldean Kings [1956], 73). This discovery gives about the best authenticated date in the OT. The Chronicle tells of subsequent repeated expeditions of Nebuchadnezzar toward the W to collect tribute and keep the satellite kingdoms in line. Unfortunately, the present tablets do not go beyond 593, so they give no record of the final and brutal devastation of Jerusalem in 586 when ZEDEKIAH revolted.

Nebuchadnezzar is celebrated by the historians of antiquity for the splendor of his building operations as well as for the brilliance of his military exploits. The archaeological excavations in Babylon illustrate the histories. Still impressive are the remains of the Ishtar Gate and the processional street lined with facades of enameled brick bearing pictures of griffins (fabled monsters with eagle head and wings and lion body). The temple of Esagila was famous, as were also the ZIGGURAT, or temple tower, and the hanging gardens. These were regarded by the Greeks as one of the wonders of the world, though nothing certain of them has been excavated. According to legend, they were built for Nebuchadnezzar's wife, the Median princess Amytis, who was homesick for her mountains.

Historical records are brief and could hardly be expected to mention the incidents of Nebuchadnezzar's life detailed by DANIEL. As to the king's madness (Dan. 4), there is no historical account remaining for us, but it must be remembered that much of Nebuchadnezzar's reign is a historical blank. Among the DEAD SEA SCROLLS a fragment has been found, the Prayer of Nabonidus, that refers to an illness of King NABONIDUS for seven years that was healed by God after the testimony of a Jewish magician. Some now say that this is the source of the legend that in Daniel is misapplied to Nebuchadnezzar. This can hardly be proved or denied from historical evidence. It seems equally possible that the canonical record was duplicated and applied to the later king. Indeed, more than one king suffered from illness and from mental distress (Ashurbanipal and Cambyes may be mentioned). If truth is stranger than fiction, both Nebuchadnezzar and Nabonidus may have suffered in a somewhat similar way—the similarities being emphasized in the latter’s prayer. There is perhaps a bare possibility that the names are confused.

Of the death of Nebuchadnezzar we have no knowledge. He was succeeded by his son EVIL-MERODACH (Amil-Marduk), then by his son-in-law NERGAL-SHAREZER (Neriglissar), for brief reigns. Nabonidus, who followed after the short reign of Labashi-Marduk, was perhaps related. There is some evidence that Nabonidus’s mother was the daughter of Nebuchadnezzar by a second wife, Nitocris. With the passing of the brilliant Nebuchadnezzar, however, the Neo-Babylonian empire soon crumbled and fell an easy prey to the Persians under CYRUS.

Nebushasban. See NEBUSHAZBAN.

Nebushazban. neb’uh-shaz’ban (Heb. nēbûšazbān H5558, prob. from an unattested Akk. name, Nabū-šezibanni, “may [the god] Nabu deliver me”). KJV Nebushasban. An important official (see RABSARIS) of the Babylonian army; he was among those ordered to provide for the safety of JEREMIAH after the Babylonians took JERUSALEM (Jer. 39:13; on the basis of this verse, some scholars emend v. 3 so that it too refers to NERGAL-SHAREZER as Rabmag and to Nebushazban as Rabsaris).

Nebuzaradan. neb’uh-zuh-ray’duhn (Heb. nēbûzar ʾădān H5555, from Akk. Nabū-zēr-iddin, “[the god] Nabu has given offspring”). NEBUCHADNEZZAR’s officer in charge of the destruction of JERUSALEM after its capture. He carried out the burning and destruction of the city a month after its fall (2 Ki. 25:8-9), the deportation of the Jews to Babylonia (2 Ki. 25:11; Jer. 39:9; 52:15, 30), and the sending of the leading Jewish rebels to Nebuchadnezzar at RIBLAH for execution (2 Ki. 25:18-21; Jer. 52:24-27). He acted kindly toward JEREMIAH, entrusting him, together with royal princesses and other innocent people, to GEDALIAH, the Jewish noble he appointed as governor (Jer. 39:13-14; 41:10; 43:6).

Necho, Nechoh. See NECO.

neck. There are almost twenty passages in the Bible where people, usually the children of Israel, are called “stiff-necked” (e.g., Exod. 32:9; Deut. 9:6; Jer. 7:26; cf. Acts 7:51). In these contexts the word always is used to signify determination in an evil direction. This image is very apt, because when a person shows determination the muscles of not only the jaw but also the neck become tense. God says to the Israelites, “For I knew how stubborn you were; / the sinews of your neck were iron, / your forehead was bronze” (Isa. 48:4). The neck is used frequently as the part of the body bearing a yoke or burden (e.g., Gen. 27:40; Deut. 28:48; Isa. 10:27; Jer. 27:2, 8; 30:8; Acts 15:10). To fall on someone else’s neck was to put one’s arms about the neck or embrace (e.g., Gen. 33:4; 45:14; 46:29; Lk. 15:20; Acts 20:37).

necklace. See CHAIN.

Neco. nee´koh (Heb. nēkōh H5785 [in 2 Ki.] and nēkô H5786 [in 2 Chr. and Jer.], from Egyp. nkꜥw). Also Necho(h). Son of Psammetichus (Psamtik) I and the second king of the 26th, or Saite, dynasty of EGYPT (ruled 610-595 B.C.). Neco began his rule at a propitious time: the Assyrian empire was falling, and the Neo-Babylonian empire was emerging. He thus was able to gain and retain control over SYRIA for a number of years. Of particular interest to the reader of the Bible is JOSIAH’s defeat by Neco at the battle of MEGIDDO (2 Ki. 23:29; 2 Chr. 35:20-24). When Josiah died, JEHOAHAZ was made king, but Neco dethroned him and set up in his stead Jehoahaz’s brother JEHOIAKIM (2 Ki. 23:29-34; 2 Chr. 35:20-36:4). In 605 he was badly defeated by NEBUCHADNEZZAR at the battle of CARCHEMISH and lost all of his Asiatic possessions (2 Ki. 24:7).

necromancy. The practice of conjuring the spirits of the dead to inquire about the future. The Mosaic law sternly forbade such a practice (Deut. 18:10-11). The most familiar case in the Bible is that of King SAUL and the medium of ENDOR (1 Sam. 28:7-25). There are several quite legitimate interpretations of this admittedly difficult passage; perhaps the most feasible view is that God for his own purpose allowed Saul to converse with the deceased Samuel. See also DIVINATION.

nectar. The sweetish liquid of plants that is used by bees in making HONEY. This English term is used by the NIV once to render a Hebrew word that usually refers to grape juice (Cant. 8:2); it is also used once by the NRSV as the translation of a word that means “honey” (4:11).

Nedabiah. ned’uh-bi’uh (Heb. nēdabyā H5608, prob. “Yahweh is willing [or shows himself generous]”). Son of Jeconiah (JEHOIACHIN) and descendant of DAVID (1 Chr. 3:18).

needle. The use of needles and the art of sewing seem to have been among the earliest human accomplishments. ADAM and EVE sewed fig leaves together to cover their nakedness (Gen. 3:7). The basic design of needles has not changed at all through the millennia. Needles made from sharp pierced bones have been found dating as far back as the sixth millennium B.C. In the days of Israel’s history, needles were commonly made of BRONZE, either pierced or with a loop to form the “eye.” They have been found by archaeologists in the dust of ancient cities, made from ivory, bone, bronze, and iron, from 1.5 to 5.5 inches (4-14 cm.) in length. The only place in the Bible a needle is actually mentioned is in Jesus’ proverb that “it is easier for a camel to go through the eye of a needle than for a rich man to enter the kingdom of God” (Matt. 19:24; Mk. 10:25; Lk. 18:25). Some have speculated that Jesus was referring to a small gateway through which a large animal would have difficulty passing, but this and other explanations ignore the shock value of Jesus’ words. The expression is hyperbolic and refers to the impossibility of entering God’s kingdom by mere human effort. The disciples understood the point, for their reaction was to express doubt that anyone could be saved (Matt. 19:25). And Jesus responded, “With man [not just a rich man] this is impossible, but with God all things are possible” (v. 26).

needlework. See EMBROIDERY.

neesing. An archaic English word meaning “sneezing,” used once by the KJV (Job 41:18; NIV, “snorting”). As published in 1611, and for a century and a half after that, the KJV also had “neeeded” in 2 Ki. 4:35, but this was changed to “sneezed” in 1762.

Negeb. See NEGEV.

Negev. neg’ev (Heb. negeb H5582, meaning apparently “dry land”). Also Negeb. The name of the southern, desert region of PALESTINE (Gen. 12:9; Num. 13:17; Deut. 1:7; et al.); thus the term acquired the additional meaning “south” (e.g., Gen. 13:14; the Heb. term is usually so rendered in the KJV). The physical characteristics of the Negeb are the rolling hills that abruptly terminate in the desert region. This region is bounded on the E by the DEAD SEA and on the W by the MEDITERRANEAN. It is a land where the water supply is scarce because of a very meager amount of rainfall in the summer months. At other seasons of the year, however, it is used by the nomads for pasturage. In this territory the PATRIARCHS lived (Gen. 20:1; 24:62; 37:1), though for a period it was also inhabited by AMALEKITES (Num. 13:29). The Negev was considered to be the tribal territory of JUDAH, but some of it was allotted to SIMEON (Josh. 15:20-32; 19:1-9). Many of DAVID’s exploits during the reign of SAUL are described as happening in the Negev, centering on ZIKLAG and its environments (1 Sam. 27:5-10). After NEBUCHADNEZZAR sacked JERUSALEM in 586-585 B.C., a group of Jews retreated to the Negev, where they were harassed by the Edomites (see EDM) who sided with the Babylonians. Much of the area came to be known as IDUMEA.

Neginah, Neginoth. neg’i-nuh, -noth (Heb. nēgînâ H5593, pl. nēgînôt). KJV transliteration of a Hebrew musical term referring probably to string instruments (Ps. 4 title, et al.).

Nehelamite. ni-hel'uh-mit (Heb. nehēlāmî H5713, apparently the gentile form of an unattested name, nehēlām, meaning unknown). An epithet applied to SHEMAIAH, one of the false prophets who opposed JEREMIAH and whom he rebuked (Jer. 29:24, 31-32). The NRSV renders “of Nehelam,” but no such place name is found in the OT. It could be a family name.

Nehemiah. nee'huh-mi'uh (Heb. nēhemyâ H5718, “Yahweh has comforted”).
(1) An Israelite mentioned among leading individuals who returned from BABYLON with ZERUBBABEL (Ezra 2:2; Neh. 7:7).

(2) Son of Abzuk; he ruled part of BETH ZUR and helped repair the wall of JERUSALEM (Neh. 3:16).

(3) Son of Hacaliah (Neh. 1:1) and governor of the Persian province of JUDAH after 444 B.C.; known primarily as the rebuilder of Jerusalem after the EXILE. Virtually all that is known of him comes from the biblical book that bears his name (see NEHEMIAH, BOOK OF). His times, however, are illuminated by the rather considerable material found among the Elephantine papyri from EGYPT, which were written in the fifth century B.C. These documents come from a military colony of Jews residing on an island far up the NILE, opposite Aswan. They include copies of letters to and from Jerusalem and SAMARIA. They name several men who are also mentioned in the book of Nehemiah.

Nehemiah was a “cupbearer” to King ARTAXERXES (Neh. 1:11; 2:1). Inasmuch as some of the Elephantine papyri that are contemporary with Nehemiah are dated, we know that the king in question is Artaxerxes I, called Longimanus, who ruled 465-423 B.C. The title “cupbearer” clearly indicates a responsible office—not merely a servile position—for the king speaks to Nehemiah as an intimate and also indicates that he regards Nehemiah’s journey to Jerusalem only as a temporary leave from official duties (2:6). Furthermore, the credentials given Nehemiah by the king and also the office of governor entrusted to him show that the king looked on him as a man of ability. That a captive Jew should attain to such an office need not surprise us when we remember the examples of DANIEL, ESTHER, and others. Indeed some ancient courts made it a practice to train captive noble youths for service in the government (Dan. 1:4-5).

The Cyrus Cylinder, recording the conquest of Babylon by this Medo-Persian king in 539 B.C. Here Cyrus claims to have restored to their homes the gods and peoples of many towns. This text may provide the context for the return of the Jewish exiles to rebuild Jerusalem.

Nehemiah was an officer of the palace at SUSA, but his heart was in Jerusalem. Word came to him from Hanani, one of his brothers, of the ruined condition of Jerusalem. (It has been suggested that this Hanani is the same man mentioned in the Elephantine papyri as an official who seems to have gone into Egypt on a government mission.) Overcome with grief, Nehemiah sought the refuge of prayer—and God answered abundantly. Only about twelve years earlier, in Artaxerxes's seventh year (457 B.C.), EZRA had gone back to Jerusalem with about 1,750 men, besides women and children (Ezra 8:1-20) and treasure worth a king's ransom (8:26-27). But if we refer 4:6-23 to the days of Ezra himself, it appears that his adversaries had persuaded the king to stop Ezra's efforts at rebuilding. The city, therefore, lay unrepaired, needing a new decree from the king. This permission Nehemiah providentially secured, thanks to his position at the court. Nehemiah therefore appeared at Jerusalem with a royal commission to continue the work that Ezra had begun.

Nehemiah was a man of ability, courage, and action. Arriving at Jerusalem, he first privately surveyed the scene of rubble (Neh. 2:1-16), and he encouraged the rulers at Jerusalem with his report of answered prayer and the granting of the king's new decree (2:18). Then he organized the community to carry out the effort of rebuilding the broken-down wall. Courageously and squarely he met the opposition of men like SANBALLAT, TOBIAH, and GESHEM (who are all now known from nonbiblical documents); and at last he saw the wall completed in the brief span of fifty-two days (6:15). Nehemiah cooperated with Ezra in numerous reforms and especially in the public instruction in the law (ch. 8). However, he left for Persia, probably on official business, in 431 B.C. (13:6). Later he returned to Jerusalem, but for how long we do not know. Of the end of his life we know nothing. The Elephantine papyri indicate that a different man, Bagohi, was governor by 407 B.C.

Nehemiah, Book of. One of the last historical books of the OT, recounting the history and reforms of NEHEMIAH the governor from 444 to about 420 B.C. In the Hebrew Bible, EZRA and Nehemiah are considered two parts of one book. Nehemiah may be outlined as follows.

- I. Nehemiah travels to Jerusalem (Neh. 1:1—2:20).
- II. Building despite opposition (3:1—7:4).
- III. Genealogy of the first returning exiles (7:5-73 [= Ezra 2:2-70]).

IV. The revival and covenant sealing (8:1—10:39).

V. Dwellers at Jerusalem and genealogies (11:1—12:26).

VI. Final reforms (13:1-31).

Nehemiah's great work of restoring the wall of JERUSALEM depended basically on securing permission from the king. Ezra had returned to Jerusalem with a sizable group of people and much gold and silver only a dozen years previously, but had been hindered in his work by adverse royal decrees secured by his enemies. In God's providence Nehemiah secured the restoration of royal favor.

The actual building of the wall was parceled out among different leaders. Various cities of the province of Judea sent contingents of workers, and we can here learn something of the extent of Nehemiah's domain. The rapidity of building may have been due to preliminary work that Ezra might have accomplished. Most of the gates and sections of the wall mentioned in Neh. 3 cannot be identified with certainty. Perhaps the wall enclosed only the eastern hill of Jerusalem.

The opposition to Nehemiah by SANBALLAT and others combined ridicule, threat, and craft. Sanballat is called the governor of Samaria in the Elephantine papyri. He was apparently not anxious to see a rival province strengthened, and there was religious antagonism as well to Nehemiah's strict reform program. Internal difficulties also developed. The rich charged interest of 1 percent (per month, apparently, Neh. 5:10), whereas the Mosaic law required outright charity to the poor. But against all opposition the wall was built by Israelites who used both sword and trowel in the work of the Lord.

The genealogy of Neh. 7, which is a duplicate of the list in Ezra 2, is of interest. There are unimportant differences between the lists such as might be expected in the copying of detailed data like this. It is instructive to note that the record of ZERUBBABEL's returnees that Nehemiah used was a written record—not preserved by oral tradition as many have suggested was the method used for the passing on of Israel's histories.

Overview of NEHEMIAH

Author: Most of the narrative is written in the first person by Nehemiah himself, but Jewish tradition attributed the composition of the book as a whole (as well as Chronicles and Ezra) to the priest EZRA, while many modern scholars ascribe final authorship to a later, unknown editor.

Historical setting: The book was written possibly c. 430-400 B.C., but many date it a century later. In any case, the setting is postexilic JUDEA under Persian jurisdiction.

Purpose: To recount the reforms of Nehemiah as governor in JERUSALEM, particularly in rebuilding the wall of the city, and thus to encourage the returnees to continue the work of restoration.

Contents: Nehemiah secures permission to travel to Jerusalem (Neh. 1:1—2:8); the wall of the city is rebuilt, and more exiles return (2:9—7:73a); the COVENANT is renewed and the wall is dedicated (7:73b—12:47); Nehemiah brings reforms to the community (ch. 13).

Nehemiah's reform involved the teaching of Moses' law by Ezra and others at the Feast of Tabernacles (as commanded in Deut. 31:10). This led to the great prayer of confession of Neh. 9, redolent with quotations from and allusions to the PENTATEUCH. A covenant was solemnly sealed to walk in the Law of the Lord as given by Moses (10:29). Nehemiah's final reform included the removal of TOBIAH from the temple precincts. Tobiah had entered through friendship with ELIASHIB the high priest while Nehemiah was back in PERSIA. Also a grandson of Eliashib had married Sanballat's daughter (13:28).

Nehiloth. nee'huh-loth (Heb. nēḥîlôt H5704, meaning uncertain). KJV transliteration of a Hebrew musical term referring possibly to a type of flute (only in Ps. 5 title).

Nehum. nee'huhm (Heb. nēḥûm H5700, "[God] comforts" or "comforter"). An Israelite mentioned among leading individuals who returned from BABYLON with ZERUBBABEL (Neh. 7:7); this name is likely a scribal error for REHUM, the form found in the parallel passage (Ezra 2:2).

Nehushta. ni-hoosh'tuh (Heb. nēḥušṭā H5735, possibly "abundant, luxuriant" or "bronze"). Daughter of Elnathan, wife of King JEHOIAKIM, and mother of King JEHOIACHIN; she was a native of JERUSALEM (2 Ki. 24:8). NEBUCHADNEZZAR deported her, Jehoiachin, and other members of the royal family and court to BABYLON in 597 B.C. (24:12, 15).

Nehushtan. ni-hoosh'tuhn (Heb. nēḥuštān H5736, “bronze [statue],” apparently a play on the words nāḥāš H5729, “serpent,” and nēḥōšet H5733, “bronze, copper”). Name given to the bronze snake that MOSES had made in the wilderness (2 Ki. 18:4). The origin of this statue is described in Num. 21:4-9. It was made out of copper or bronze and elevated upon a standard; and anyone who had been bitten would live by looking at it. To its contemporaries, the bronze serpent therefore symbolized a looking to God in faith for salvation; and into the future it typified Christ's being lifted up on the cross, “that everyone who believes in him may have eternal life” (Jn. 3:15; cf. Lk. 23:42-43). With the passage of time, however, Israel lost sight of the symbolical and typical function of the statue. By the later eighth century, the Israelites were burning INCENSE to it, as if it were in itself a deity (2 Ki. 18:4). As a part, therefore, of HEZEKIAH's overall campaign against the HIGH PLACES and their idolatrous objects, begun in the first year of his reign (2 Chr. 29:1), the king broke the serpent into pieces (2 Ki. 18:4). It was apparently at this time that the name Nehushtan was assigned to it, probably in disparagement: it was not “the serpent,” but simply “the bronze thing.”

Neiel. ni-i'uhl (Heb. nē'î'ēl H5832, derivation unknown). A town that served to mark the SE border of the tribal territory of ASHER (Josh. 19:27). It is generally identified with modern Khirbet Ya'nin, about 8.5 mi. (14 km.) ESE of ACCO.

neighbor. The duties and responsibilities towards one's neighbor are varied. In the OT, injunctions are given more in the negative than in the positive. The tenth commandment (see COMMANDMENTS, TEN) is directed toward the protection of the neighbor's property (Exod. 20:17); the commandment immediately preceding, toward the protection of a neighbor's reputation (20:16). CITIES OF REFUGE were appointed for one who killed his neighbor accidentally (Deut. 19:4). The book of Proverbs is replete with admonitions concerning one's neighbor, of which the following may be regarded as the epitome: “He who despises his neighbor sins” (Prov. 14:21). Due regard for one's neighbor is expressed in the great OT and NT precept, “Love your neighbor as yourself” (Lev. 19:18; Matt. 19:19). The parable of the Good Samaritan (Lk. 10:30-37) was given in answer to the question, “And who is my neighbor?” (10:29). From the lips of the questioner, neighbor excluded all Gentiles, but Christ's corrective expanded the meaning by criticizing the wording of the question. The proper emphasis would be, “To whom am I neighbor? Whose claim on neighborly help do I recognize?” It is not a question of how narrowly we can restrict our neighborhood, but rather how broadly we can enlarge our devotion to others.

Nekeb. See ADAMI NEKEB.

Nekoda. ni-koh´duh (Heb. nēqôdā › H5928, “speckled”). (1) Ancestor of a family of temple servants (NETHINIM) who returned to JERUSALEM after the Babylonian captivity (Ezra 2:48; Neh. 7:50).

(2) Ancestor of a family of returned exiles who were unable to prove their Israelite descent (Ezra 2:60; Neh. 7:62).

Nemuel. nem´yoo-uhl (Heb. nēmû ʾēl H5803, derivation uncertain; gentilic nēmû ʾēlî H5804, “Nemuelite”). (1) Son of SIMEON, grandson of JACOB, and eponymous ancestor of the Nemuelite clan (Num. 26:12; 1 Chr. 4:24); called JEMUEL in the parallel passages (Gen. 46:10; Exod. 6:15).

(2) Son of Eliab and descendant of REUBEN (Num. 26:9). Nemuel’s brothers, DATHAN and ABIRAM, were among the leaders who joined the Levite KORAH in his rebellion against MOSES and AARON in the wilderness and subsequently suffered judgment (Num. 16).

Nepheg. nee´fig (Heb. nepeg H5863, meaning uncertain). (1) Son of IZHAR and great-grandson of LEVI through KOHATH (Exod. 6:21).

(2) Son of DAVID, listed among the children born to him in JERUSALEM (2 Sam. 5:15; 1 Chr. 3:7; 14:6).

nephew. No Hebrew word in the OT or Greek word in the NT means specifically “nephew” (the KJV uses this English term in its obsolete sense of “descendant” several times: Jdg. 12:14; Job 18:19; Isa. 14:22; 1 Tim. 5:4). In some OT passages, however, one finds the expression “brother’s son” or the like, which may be properly rendered “nephew” (Gen. 12:5; 14:12; Ezra 8:19).

Nephilim. See GIANT.

Nephish. See NAPHISH.

Nephishesim. See NEPHUSSIM.

Nephisim. See NEPHUSSIM.

Nephthalim. See NAPHTALI.

Nephtoah. nef-toh´uh (Heb. neptôaḥ H5886, perhaps “opening”). In the descriptions of the N boundary of JUDAH and the S boundary of BENJAMIN, reference is made to “the spring of the waters of Nephtoah” (Josh. 15:9; 18:15). The place is generally identified with modern Lifta, c. 3 mi. (5 km.) NW of JERUSALEM. Some believe that the MT reading should be modified slightly so that it reads, “the spring of [Pharaoh] MERNEPTAH,” referring to a site mentioned also in Egyptian documents.

Nephushesim. See NEPHUSSIM.

Nephusim. See NEPHUSSIM.

Nephussim. ni-fyoo´sim (Heb. nēpûsîm H5866 [Ezra 2:50; Ketib, nēpîsîm] and nēpûšsîm H5867 [Neh. 7:52; Ketib, nēpîšsîm], derivation uncertain). KJV, TNIV, and other versions, Nephusim. Ancestor or clan name of a family of temple servants (NETHINIM) who returned from the Babylonian exile (Ezra 2:50 [NRSV, “Nephisim”]; Neh. 7:42 [KJV, “Nephishesim”; NRSV, “Nephushesim”]). Some believe that the Nephussim were descendants of prisoners of war related to the Ishmaelite tribe of NAPHISH.

Ner. nuhr (Heb. nēr H5945, “light, lamp,” possibly short form of nēriyyāhû H5950, “Yahweh is [my] light”). (1) Son of JEIEL, descendant of BENJAMIN, father of KISH, and grandfather of King SAUL (1 Chr. 8:30 [NIV, following LXX], 33; 9:36, 39). Some believe that the genealogy here is not accurate and that this Ner should be identified with #2 below.

(2) Son of ABIEL, descendant of Benjamin, uncle of Saul, and father of ABNER (1 Sam. 14:50-51 NIV; the Heb. can be understood to mean that Saul’s uncle was Abner rather than Ner). Elsewhere his name occurs only in the phrase “Abner son of Ner” (26:5 et al.). See also comments under KISH.

Nereus. nee´ri-yoos (Gk. Nēreus G3759, in Gk. mythology the name of a sea-god). A Roman Christian who, along with his unnamed sister, was greeted by PAUL (Rom. 16:15). His name, common among slaves, suggests that Nereus was a Gentile freedman.

Nergal. nuhr´gal (Heb. nērgal H5946, from Akk. Nergal). A Mesopotamian god of the underworld worshiped in CUTHAH; when some of the inhabitants of that city-state were resettled by the Assyrian empire, they brought their cult to the province of SAMARIA (2 Ki. 17:30). According to Babylonian tradition, he was the consort of Ereshkigal, queen of the underworld. Nergal was regarded also as a god of pestilence, disease, and various calamities, but he could be appeased by incantations. Nergal became a theophoric element found in personal names, such as NERGAL-SHAREZER.

Nergal-Sharezer. nuhr´gal-shu-ree´zuhr (Heb. nērgal śar-ʾešer H5947, from Akk. Nergal-šar-ušur, “may [the god] NERGAL protect the king”). Name of a senior official (see RABMAG) with the Babylonian army at JERUSALEM in 587 B.C. (Jer. 39:3). Because the name occurs twice in this verse, some believe that the first mention refers to a different person who was ruler of SAMGAR (Sinmagir), but the Hebrew text is difficult: the NIV has “Nergal-Sharezer of Samgar, Nebo-Sarsekim,” whereas the NRSV renders, “Nergal-sharezer, Samgar-nebo, Sarsechim.” In any case, when a breach was made in the city’s defenses, he was among the officials who occupied the MIDDLE GATE. Later, he and other officers had JEREMIAH taken out of prison and entrusted to GEDALIAH (39:13-14). Nergal-Sharezer has often been identified with Neriglissar, a private citizen who was, according to Berossus, a son-in-law of NEBUCHADNEZZAR; after disposing of his brother-in-law, EVIL-MERODACH, Neriglissar ruled BABYLON for a few years (560-556).

Neri. nee´ri (Gk. Nēri G3760, from Heb. nēr H5945; see NER). Son of Melki, included in Luke’s GENEALOGY OF JESUS CHRIST (Lk. 3:27). In this passage, Neri appears as the father of SHEALTIEL, but elsewhere Shealtiel’s father is said to be Jeconiah, that is, JEHOIACHIN (1 Chr. 3:17; Matt. 1:12). Attempts to explain the discrepancy are often tied to Jer. 22:30. Some think, for example, that Luke omits Jeconiah as legally unfit to be part of the messianic line.

Neriah. ni-ri´uh (Heb. nēriyyâ H5949 and nēriyyāhû H5950, “Yahweh is [my] light”). Son of Mahseiah; he was the father of BARUCH (Jer. 32:12 et al.) and SERAIAH (51:59-64). Baruch was JEREMIAH’s friend and scribe, while Seraiah served as staff officer for King ZEDEKIAH and on one occasion acted as messenger for Jeremiah. It is likely that Neriah himself held a significant position in society or at the court.

Neriglissar. See NERGAL-SHAREZER.

Nero. nihr'oh. Nero Claudius CAESAR Drusus Germanicus was the fifth emperor of ROME (A.D. 54-68). He was a son of the first marriage of Julia Agrippina, daughter of Germanicus; Nero's father was Cnaeus Domitius Ahenobarbus, who had been consul in the year 32. Named L. Domitius Ahenobarbus at birth in the year 37, he acquired the name Nero at the age of twelve, when he was adopted by CLAUDIUS. His mother was Agrippina, who cared little for her son's morals but was interested only in his temporal advancement.

The first years of Nero's reign were quite peaceful and gave promise of good things to come. Nero himself could boast that not a single person had been unjustly executed throughout his extensive empire. During these "rational years," the apostle PAUL, in compliance with his own expressed appeal (Acts 25:10-11), was brought before Nero as the reigning CAESAR (c. A.D. 63). We can hardly do otherwise than infer that Paul was freed of all charges to continue his labors of evangelization.

Nero's marriage to Poppaea opened the second period of his reign. He killed his mother, his chief advisers Seneca and Burrus, and many of the nobility to secure their fortunes. In A.D. 64 a large part of ROME was destroyed by fire. Whether or not Nero actually ordered the burning of the city is very controversial. However, justly or not, the finger of suspicion was pointed in Nero's direction. A scapegoat was provided in the Christians. Even the Roman historian Tacitus, who certainly cannot be given the name "Christian," bears testimony as to the severity of the sufferings inflicted on them. "Their death was made a matter of sport; they were covered in wild beast's skins and torn to pieces by dogs or were fastened to crosses and set on fire in order to serve as torches by night Nero had offered his gardens for the spectacle and gave an exhibition in his circus, mingling with the crowd in the guise of a charioteer or mounted on his chariot. Hence,...there arose a feeling of pity, because it was felt that they were being sacrificed not for the common good, but to gratify the savagery of one man" (Tacitus, Annals 15, 44).

Marble bust of Emperor Nero.

Nero's private life was a scandal. Surrendering himself to the basest of appetites, he indulged himself in the most evil forms of pleasure. Conspiracies and plots dogged his latter years. He was advised to destroy himself, but could not find the courage to do so. Learning that the senate had decreed his death, Nero's last cruel act was to put many of the senators to death. He finally died by his own hand in the summer of A.D. 68. Thus perished the last of the line of Julius Caesar. Both Paul and P_{ETER} suffered martyrdom under Nero.

Nerva. nuhr'vuh. Emperor of ROME, A.D. 96-98. Marcus Cocceius Nerva was born c. A.D. 35. He became a confidant of NERO and was subsequently appointed CONSUL on two occasions: by VESPASIAN in 71 and by DOMITIAN in 90. After the assassination of Domitian, the conspirators placed Nerva on the throne. The new emperor was genuinely interested in freedom and justice, but he was unable to restore political stability, and in any case his health quickly failed. Some months before his death he adopted T_{RAJAN}, who succeeded him as emperor in 98.

nest. The nests of birds differ from species to species (Ps. 104:17; Jer. 22:23; 48:28; Ezek. 31:6). Many are built high (Job 39:27; Jer. 49:16; Obad. 4; Hab. 2:9). Mosaic law forbade one who found a bird's nest with the mother and her brood from harming the mother bird (Deut. 22:6). Semite people in general view with extreme disfavor anyone who willfully disturbs a bird in the nest. Isaiah compares the despoiling of Israel by the Assyrians to the robbing of a bird's nest (Isa. 10:14). Jesus contrasts birds having nests with his having no home (Matt. 8:20; Lk. 9:58).

net. This term can refer to a lattice utilized in furniture and architectural design (e.g., Exod. 27:4-5; 38:4; see NETWORK). But it is mostly in contexts of hunting and fishing that nets are mentioned in the OT. These activities were pursued not so much for sport as for livelihood. Nets were particularly needed in fishing, because sufficient quantities for commercial purposes could not be caught in any other way. Fishing was limited to the inland bodies of water in Bible history, since the Mediterranean did not offer convenient opportunities. The casting net (Matt. 4:18), when thrown out over the water, assumed a circular shape as it fell upon the surface of the water. Immediately the weighted perimeter would sink rapidly to the bottom, causing the net to assume a shape variously described as conical, bell-like, or pear-shaped. Thus would be trapped all the fish below the net. The dragnet, in contrast, was supported on one side at the water's surface by floats, while the other side was kept at the lake's bottom by weights. Thus was formed a vertical wall of netting between its two ends. If one end of the net were secured at the shore, a boat would carry the other in a great semicircular arc and drag along all underwater life in its path, until all was swept ashore. On the other hand, if both ends were secured to boats, the boats would be maneuvered so as to form a circular shape with the net, which would then be dragged ashore with the catch. Dragnets often were immense in size, and the term could be used figuratively of vastness and all-inclusiveness. They retrieved all types of fish, large and small, choice and worthless, living and dead. How appropriate that the Lord should choose this method to describe a gathering for judgment in the kingdom of heaven (Matt. 13:47).

Netaim. ni-tay'im (Heb. nēṭā'îm H5751, "plantings"). An otherwise unknown place, probably in the SHEPHELAH of JUDAH, where some royal potters lived (1 Chr. 4:23; KJV has "plants and hedges" for "Netaim and Gederah"). See also GEDERAH.

Nethaneel. See NETHANEL.

Nethanel. ni-than'uhl (Heb. nētan'ēl H5991, "God has given"; cf. NATHANAEL). KJV Nethaneel. (1) Son of Zuar; he was a leader from the tribe of ISSACHAR, heading a division of 54,500 (Num. 2:5-6; 10:15). Nethanel was among those who assisted MOSES in taking a census of the Israelites (1:8) and who brought offerings to the Lord for the dedication of the TABERNACLE (7:18-23).

(2) Fourth son of JESSE and older brother of DAVID (1 Chr. 2:14).

(3) One of the priests appointed to blow the trumpet when David transferred the ARK OF THE COVENANT to Jerusalem (1 Chr. 15:24).

(4) Father of Shemaiah; the latter was a LEVITE and scribe in David's organization of the priestly service (1 Chr. 24:6).

(5) Third son of OBED-EDOM, included in the list of divisions of the Korahite doorkeepers in the reign of David (1 Chr. 26:4).

(6) One of five officials sent by King JEHOASHAPHAT "to teach in the towns of Judah" (2 Chr. 17:7).

(7) A leader of the Levites during the reign of King JOSIAH; along with his brothers CONANIAH and SHEMAIAH, Nethanel provided 5,000 offerings (lambs) and five head of cattle for the renewed celebration of the PASSOVER (2 Chr. 35:9).

(8) One of the descendants of PASHHUR who agreed to put away their foreign wives (Ezra 10:22). Some think he may be the same as #10 below.

(9) The head of the priestly family of JEDAJAH in the time of the high priest JOIAKIM (Neh. 12:12).

(10) A priestly musician who participated in the dedication of the rebuilt wall of Jerusalem under EZRA (Neh. 12:36).

Nethaniah. neth'uh-ni'uh (Heb. nētanyâ H5992 and nētanyāhû H5993, "Yahweh has given"). (1) Son of Elishama and father of ISHMAEL; the latter murdered GEDALIAH, who had been made governor by NEBUCHADNEZZAR (2 Ki. 25:23, 25; Jer. 41:1-2; et al.). The family was of royal blood.

(2) One of the sons of ASAPH who assisted their father in the prophetic ministry of MUSIC; he was the head of the fifth company of TEMPLE musicians appointed by lot under DAVID (1 Chr. 25:2, 12).

(3) One of five officials sent by King JEHOASHAPHAT "to teach in the towns of Judah" (2 Chr. 17:8).

(4) Son of Shelemiah and father of JEHUDI; the latter was an official under King JEHOIAKIM who was sent to BARUCH so that the latter might read the prophecies of JEREMIAH to the princes of Judah (Jer. 36:14).

Nethinim. neth'in-im (Heb. nētînm, pl. of nâtîn H5987, "given, donated"). The KJV uses the improper transliteration Nethinims (Nethinim itself is a plural form) to represent a postexilic Hebrew term that modern versions render with "temple servants" (1 Chr. 9:2; Ezra 2:43 et al.; Neh. 3:26 et al.). Ezra 8:20 gives the most specific clue to the origin of the Nethinim. That DAVID should have given them to assist the LEVITES is in keeping with the general account of David's organization (1 Chr. 23-24) in preparation for the TEMPLE. Nethinim means "those who are given." Just as the Levites as a whole were "wholly given" to the Lord from among the people of Israel (Num. 8:16), so the Levites were given as "gifts" to AARON and his sons (v. 19). David appears to have followed this pattern in assigning another group to assist the Levites. The order listed in 1 Chr. 9:2 and Neh 11:3 is, "Israel, priests, Levites, and Nethinim" (the latter passage adds, "descendants of Solomon's servants"; the singling out of such a hereditary group makes a natural parallel to the group originating with David). Some have thought that the GIBEONITES were the original Nethinim (Josh. 9:27). After the killing of the Gibeonites by SAUL (2 Sam. 21:1), additional Nethinim were given by David for special service. Perhaps they were slaves acquired in war.

Netophah. ni-toh'fuh (Heb. nēṭōpâ H5756, from nāṭap H5752, "to drip, pour"; gentilic nē-ṭōpātî H5743, "Netophathite"). A town of JUDAH, mentioned after BETHLEHEM in a postexilic list (Ezra 2:22); the parallel combines the inhabitants of Netophah and Bethlehem (Neh. 7:26). The actual town plays no part in the biblical narrative, but individual Netophathites are mentioned in a number of OT passages. Two were among DAVID's elite group of mighty warriors (2 Sam. 23:28-29; 1 Chr. 11:30); two others were included among his twelve monthly divisional army commanders (1 Chr. 27:13, 15); another one was an army officer named SERAIAH who supported GEDALIAH in 586 B.C. (2 Ki. 25:23; but see Jer. 40:8); finally, one was the grandfather of a leading LEVITE who resettled in Jerusalem (9:16). In addition, there were fifty-six people from Netophah who returned to Palestine with ZERUBBABEL in 537 (Ezra 2:22; cf. Neh. 7:26); and the Levitical singers who participated in the dedication of the walls of Jerusalem in 444 are said to have come "from the villages of the Netophathites" (Neh. 12:28). The precise location of Netophah remains uncertain, but a probable location is Khirbet Bedd Faluh, 3 mi. (5 km.) SE of Bethlehem, where the biblical name is still preserved in the nearby spring, 'Ain en-Naṭuf.

network. This English term is used in most Bible versions primarily to render Hebrew śēbākâ H8422, which serves to describe the network of bronze that hung upon the capitals of the two great bronze pillars, JAKIN AND BOAZ, in front of the TEMPLE of SOLOMON (1 Ki. 7:17-20, 41-42; 2 Chr. 4:12-13; Jer. 52:22-23). The same word is used for the lattice of the upper room of AHAZIAH through which he fell and was mortally hurt (2 Ki. 1:2). A different term, rešet H8407, is used with reference to the grating of the ALTAR of burnt offering (Exod. 27:4-5; 38:4). This is conceived by some to be a grate running through the altar, and by others a step running around the altar, faced with a grille of bronze. (The KJV use of “network” in Isa. 19:9 reflects a misunderstanding of an unusual Heb. word that probably refers to white cloth or linen.)

new, newness. The common OT Hebrew word for “new” is ḥādāš H2543, which has the sense of “recent” or “fresh”; this adjective may connote newness in both qualitative and chronological aspects. It occurs in such expressions as new king (Exod. 1:8), offering of new grain (Lev. 23:16), new house (Deut. 20:5), new heavens and new earth (65:17; 66:22); new COVENANT (Jer. 31:31), and so on. From these examples, the difficulty of making a distinction between quality and time is apparent; for often, if something is new in kind, it is also recent in appearance.

In the NT, the two common Greek words are kainos G2785 and neos G3742. It has often been thought that the first of these is used regularly to emphasize qualitative newness, and that the latter indicates chronological newness in the sense of modernity or youthfulness. Others deny the distinction based on the seemingly interchangeable use of the two words in the NT. Matthew speaks of new wine with neos (Matt. 9:17), while in a different context he refers to new wine as kainos (26:29). PAUL in Eph. 4:24 commands the Christian to put on the kainos man, while in Col. 3:10 he speaks of the neos man. The writer to the Hebrews refers to “the new covenant” but uses both adjectives (Heb. 9:15; 12:24). Furthermore, the papyri seem to use the two words practically synonymously. See also NEW COMMANDMENT; REGENERATION.

new commandment. This phrase first appears in words attributed to Jesus in the upper room discourse reported by the fourth evangelist (Jn. 13:34). In an apparent reference to the Decalogue (see TEN COMMANDMENTS) Jesus said, “A new command I give you: Love one another.” Of course, the commandment to LOVE God and one’s neighbor was not new, for it is emphasized in the PENTATEUCH and the Prophets (esp. Hosea), and restated by Jesus as a summation of the TORAH (Deut. 6:5; Hos. 11:4; Matt. 22:37; cf. Rom. 13:9; Gal. 5:14; Jas. 2:8). Jesus did however give this command fresh emphasis, bringing it into sharper perspective: a discriminating love resulting from choice. The newness consists in the source and nature of this love; it is the supreme criterion of one's relationship to God (1 Jn. 5:3; cf. Lk. 10:27).

New Gate. The book of JEREMIAH speaks twice of “the New Gate of [the house of] Yahweh” (Jer. 36:10; 26:10). The entrance of this gate was the setting for a royal inquiry into the preaching of Jeremiah (26:7-16). Here also was the room belonging to the secretary GEMARIAH son of Shaphan (36:10). This verse also indicates that the gate was in the upper (inner) courtyard of the TEMPLE, leading some to infer that “New Gate” was the name given to the UPPER GATE after it was rebuilt by King JOTHAM (2 Ki. 15:35; 2 Chr. 27:3). It may have been S of the inner court, but its precise location is unknown (it is not to be confused with the New Gate built in modern times on the NW wall of Jerusalem).

New Testament. A collection of twenty-seven documents, the second part of the sacred Scriptures of the Christian church, the first part being called by contrast the OLD TESTAMENT. In the name “New Testament,” apparently first given to the collection in the latter half of the second century, the word “testament” represents Greek diathēkē G1347, variously translated “testament,” “settlement,” “covenant” (the last of these being on the whole the most satisfactory equivalent). The new COVENANT is the new order or dispensation inaugurated by the death of Jesus (compare his own designation: “the new covenant in my blood” in Lk. 22:20; 1 Cor. 11:25). It was so called because it fulfilled the promise made by God to his people in Jer. 31:31-34 that he would “make a new covenant” with them whereby the desire and power to do his will would be implanted within them and all their past sins would be wiped out (cf.

The next twenty-one documents take the form of LETTERS written to communities or individuals. Thirteen of these bear the name of PAUL as writer, one the name of JAMES, two of PETER, and one of JUDE (Judas). The others are anonymous. One of these, the letter to the HEBREWS, is more properly described as a homily with an epistolary ending; its authorship remains a matter of conjecture to this day. The three that we know as the letters of JOHN THE APOSTLE are so called, not because they bear John's name, but because it is plain from their contents that they are closely associated with the fourth gospel (which, though itself anonymous, has from early times been known as John's). First John is an exhortation in which the writer impresses on his readers (whom he calls his "dear children") the practical implications of some of the leading themes of John's gospel. In 2 and 3 John the writer refers to himself as "the elder."

The last book of the NT bears some features of the epistolary style in that it is introduced by seven covering letters addressed to churches in the Roman province of Asia; but for the most part it belongs to the class of literature to which it has given its own name ("apocalyptic," from "Apocalypse" or "Revelation"). In APOCALYPTIC LITERATURE the outworking of God's purpose on earth is disclosed in the form of symbolical visions. Written probably between A.D. 69 and 96, when the Flavian dynasty ruled the Roman empire, Revelation aims to encourage persecuted Christians with the assurance that they are on the winning side; that Jesus, and not the Roman emperor, has won the victory that entitles him to exercise sovereignty over the world and control its destiny. See REVELATION, BOOK OF.

II. Order of writing. Although the four Gospels deal with events of the first thirty years of the Christian era and the NT letters belong to the remaining two-thirds of the first century, several of the letters were in existence before even the earliest of the Gospels. With the possible exception of James, the earliest NT documents are those letters that Paul composed before his two years' detention in Rome (A.D. 60-62). Therefore, when one of Paul's earlier letters mentions an action or saying of Jesus, that mention is our first written account of it. For example, Paul's account of the institution of the LORD'S SUPPER (1 Cor. 11:23-25) is earlier by several years than the account of it given in our oldest gospel (Mk. 14:22-25).

Jesus himself wrote no book, but he gave his teaching to his disciples in forms that could be easily memorized and enjoined them to teach others what they had learned from him. There is good reason to believe that one of the earliest Christian writings was a compilation of his teaching, arranged according to the chief subjects he treated, though this document has not been preserved in its original form but has been incorporated into some of the existing NT books.

The necessity for a written account of the life of Jesus was not felt acutely in the earlier years of the Christian mission. In those years, when there were so many eyewitnesses of the saving events who could testify to what they had seen and heard, their testimony was regarded as sufficient, and the gospel material circulated far and wide by word of mouth. But even in those early years the necessity arose for an apostle to give instruction in writing to people from whom he was separated at the time. While ministering in EPHESUS, Paul heard disturbing news of the state of affairs in the church he had founded three or four years previously in CORINTH. He was unable just then to visit Corinth in person but sent his converts in that city a letter conveying much the same message as he would have given them orally had he been with them. Again, a few years later, he proposed to visit Rome and thought it wise, during a brief stay in Corinth, to prepare the Roman Christians for his coming, especially as he had never been in their city before. So he sent them a letter in which he took the opportunity of making a full-length statement of the gospel as he understood and preached it. In such “occasional” circumstances the NT letters were first written. Yet Paul and the other writers were conscious of the fact that they expressed the mind of Christ, under the guidance of his Spirit. Their letters are therefore full of teaching, imparted to the first readers by apostolic authority, which retains its validity to the present day, and have by divine providence been preserved for our instruction.

The Gospels began to appear about the end of the first generation following the death and resurrection of Jesus. By that time the eyewitnesses were being removed by death, one by one, and before long none of them would be left. It was desirable, therefore, that their testimony should be placed on permanent record, so that those who came after would not be at a disadvantage as compared with Christians of the first generation. About the middle sixties, then, we find gospel writing first undertaken. Mark provided the Roman church with an account of Jesus’ ministry, from his baptism to his resurrection, which is said by Papias and other second-century writers to have been based in large measure on the preaching of Peter.

In the following years Matthew provided the Christians of ANTIOCH and the neighborhood with an expanded version of the life of Jesus, including a systematic presentation of his teaching. Luke, Paul’s companion and dear physician, having traced the course of events accurately from the beginning, set himself to supply the “most excellent Theophilus” with an ordered narrative of Christian origins that not only related “all that Jesus began to do and to teach until the day he was taken up” (Acts 1:1-2), but went on to tell what he continued to do after that, working by his Spirit in his apostles. Then, toward the end of the century, John recorded Jesus’ life in a different way, bringing out its abiding and universal significance, so that his readers might apprehend the glory of Jesus as the Word that became flesh, and by believing in him might have life in his name. These four records are not biographies in the ordinary sense of the term; they are concerned rather to perpetuate the apostolic witness to Jesus as Son of God and Savior of the world.

III. Early collections of writings. For some time these four evangelic records circulated independently and locally, being valued, no doubt, by those for whom they were primarily written. But by the early years of the second century they were gathered together and began to circulate as a fourfold record throughout the Christian world. When this happened, Acts was detached from Luke's gospel, to which it originally formed the sequel, and set out on a new, but not insignificant, career of its own.

Paul's letters were preserved at first by those to whom they were sent. At least, all that have come down to us were so preserved, for here and there in his surviving correspondence we find reference to a letter that may have been lost at a very early date (cf. 1 Cor. 5:9; Col. 4:16). But by the last decade of the first century there is evidence of a move to bring his available letters together and circulate them as a collection among the churches. Thus Clement of Rome, writing as foreign secretary of his church to the church of Corinth about A.D. 96, was able to quote freely, not only from Paul's letter to the Romans (which would naturally be accessible to him) but also from 1 Corinthians and possibly from one or two of his other letters. What provided the stimulus for this move to collect Paul's letters, or who began to collect them, can only be a matter of speculation. Paul himself had encouraged some interchange of his letters (cf. Col. 4:16), and one or two of them may have been from the start general or circular letters, not to be confined to one single group of recipients. By the first or second decade of the second century, at any rate, a Pauline collection was in circulation—first a shorter collection of ten letters, and then a longer collection of thirteen (including the three “pastoral letters,” those addressed to Timothy and Titus).

From the time when the first collection of Paul's letters began to circulate, the letters appear to have been arranged mainly in descending order of length. That principle is still apparent in the arrangement most familiar today: Paul's letters to churches come before his letters to individuals, but within these two groups the letters are arranged so that the longest comes first and the shortest comes last. (There is one inconspicuous exception to this rule: Galatians, which is slightly shorter than Ephesians, comes before it, and has had this position since the second century. There may have been some special reason for this.)

IV. Canon of the NT. The circulation of two collections—the fourfold gospel and the Pauline corpus—did not constitute a NT, but it marked a stage toward that goal. About A.D. 140 the Gnostic leader Valentinus, according to Tertullian, accepted practically the whole NT as it was recognized toward the end of the second century. It is not certain, however, whether Valentinus knew the NT as a closed canon or simply quoted as authoritative most of the documents that Tertullian acknowledged as making up the NT.

The church was stimulated to define the NT limits more precisely, not by the main Gnostic groups, but by MARCION. Marcion came to Rome about A.D. 140 from Asia Minor, where he had tried unsuccessfully to press his views on leading churchmen. He rejected the OT altogether, as reflecting the worship of a different God from the God whom Jesus revealed as Father, and he held that the writings of all the apostles except Paul had been corrupted by an admixture of Judaism. He promulgated a Christian canon comprising (1) “The Gospel” (an edition of Luke’s Gospel edited in accordance with his own viewpoint) and (2) “The Apostle” (ten letters of Paul, excluding the Pastorals, similarly edited). Paul, in Marcion’s eyes, was the only faithful apostle of Christ, all the others having Judaized; but even Paul’s letters had been tampered with by Judaizing scribes or editors and required correction back to their original form.

The publication of Marcion’s NT, with its restricted number of documents, was a challenge to the leaders of Christian orthodoxy. If they refused Marcion’s canon, it was incumbent on them to define the canon they accepted. They replied to his challenge by saying, in effect, that they did not reject the OT. They accepted it as Holy Scripture, following the example of Christ and the apostles. Along with it they accepted the NT writings—not one Gospel only, but four (one of the four being the authentic text of the Gospel that Marcion issued in a mutilated form); not ten letters only of Paul, but thirteen; not letters of Paul only, but of other apostolic men as well.

They also accepted the Acts of the Apostles and appreciated as never before its crucial importance as the “hinge” of the NT. Acts links the fourfold Gospel with the apostolic letters because it provides the sequel to the former and supplies a historical background for much of the latter. Moreover, it provides irrefutable independent evidence of the sound basis for the authority that Paul claims in his letters. Tertullian and others were not slow to expose the folly of those Marcionites who asserted the exclusive authority of Paul while rejecting the one document that supplied objective testimony to his authority. The Marcionites, indeed, had no option but to reject Acts, as it also bore witness to the authority of Peter and the other apostles, whom they repudiated. But the very fact that Acts attested the authority both of Paul and of Peter and his colleagues gave it all the greater value in the eyes of orthodox churchmen. From this time on it was called “The Acts of the Apostles.” Indeed, toward the end of the second century one zealously anti-Marcionite work, the Muratorian list, goes so far as to call it “The Acts of All the Apostles.” That was a great exaggeration, but Acts does at least record something about most of the apostles or apostolic men to whom are ascribed the letters the catholic church came to acknowledge as canonical.

Another factor that made it advisable to define what was, and what was not, the Word of God was the rise of the Montanists from the mid-second century onward. They claimed to announce further revelations by the Spirit of prophecy; it was helpful, therefore, to appeal to a recognized standard by which such claims might be evaluated; and such a standard was provided by the canon of Scripture.

From the second half of the second century, then, the church came to acknowledge a NT of the same general dimensions as ours. For a considerable time there was some questioning about a few of the books at the end of our NT, and arguments were occasionally put forward for the recognition of books that did not ultimately maintain their place within the collection. But after some generations of debate about the few “disputed” books in relation to the majority of “acknowledged” books, we find the twenty-seven books that make up our NT today listed by Athanasius of Alexandria in A.D. 367, and not long after by Jerome and Augustine in the West. These leaders did not impose decisions of their own but published what was generally recognized. It is unhistorical to represent the limits of the NT as being fixed by the verdict of any church council. When first a church council did make a pronouncement on this subject (A.D. 393), it did no more than record the consensus of the church in East and West.

The invention of the codex, or leaf-form of book, made it a practicable matter to bind the NT writings, or indeed the whole Bible, together in one volume—something that could not have been done with the older scroll-form of book. The earliest comprehensive codices known to us belong to the fourth century, but already in the third century, and possibly even in the second, groups of NT books were bound together in smaller codices. The Chester Beatty biblical papyri (early 3rd cent.) include one codex of the four Gospels and Acts, one of ten Pauline letters and Hebrews.

V. Authority of the NT. The authority of the NT is not based on archaeological evidence or on any other line of comparative study. By such means we can confirm the historical setting of the record in the first century and provide ourselves with an illuminating commentary on it. The value of this should not be underestimated, but the essential authority of the NT derives from the authority of Christ, whether exercised in his own person or delegated to his apostles. The NT documents are the written deposit of the apostles' witness to Christ and of the teaching they imparted in his name. When we emerge from the "tunnel" period, which separates the apostolic age from the last quarter of the second century, we find the church still attaching high importance to apostolic authority. The apostles are no longer there, but the apostolic faith is confessed, the apostolic fellowship is maintained, and apostolic church order is observed. We find too, that the apostolic writings, whether penned directly by apostles or indirectly by their associates ("apostolic men"), are available in the NT canon to serve as the church's rule of faith and life—the criterion by which it may be determined whether doctrine or fellowship or anything else that claims to be apostolic really is so. And from those days to our own, it is the NT that, from time to time, has called Christians back to the ways of apostolic purity, to the truth as it is in Jesus. Reformation is not something that the church needed once for all in the sixteenth century; true "reformation according to the word of God" is an abiding need of the church. And where the NT is given its proper place in the church's belief and practice, true reformation goes on continually.

Not only in his works and words during his earthly ministry, but also in the continuing ministry that he has exercised since his exaltation, Jesus reveals God to human beings. Therefore not only the Gospels, which record the revelation given in the days of his flesh, but also the other NT books, which record the further outworking of that revelation, are accepted by the church as her normative documents. The HOLY SPIRIT, who came to make the significance of Jesus plain to his followers and to lead them into all the truth, still performs these services for his people; and the NT writings are his primary instrument for their performance. How else could the Spirit take the things of Christ and declare them to men and women today if these writings were not available as a basis for him to work on? The Spirit who was imparted in fullness to Jesus and who worked through the apostles is the Spirit under whose direction the Christians of the earliest centuries were enabled to distinguish so clearly the documents that bore authoritative witness to Jesus. He is also the Spirit by whose illumination we today may appropriate that witness for our own and others' good.

In all this the place of the OT as an integral part of the Christian Scriptures is not ignored. The two Testaments are so organically interwoven that the authority of the one carries with it the authority of the other. If the OT records the divine promise, the NT records its fulfillment; if the OT tells how preparation was made over many centuries for the coming of Christ, the NT tells how he came and what his coming brought about. If even the OT writings are able to make the readers "wise for salvation through faith in Christ Jesus" and equip them thoroughly for the service of God (2 Tim. 3:15-17), how much more is this true of the NT writings! Our Lord's statement of the highest function of the earlier Scriptures applies with at least equal force to those of the NT: "These are the Scriptures that testify about me" (Jn. 5:39).

new year. See FEASTS.

Neziah. ni-zi'uh (Heb. nēṣi'ah H5909, possibly "faithful" or "famous"). Ancestor of a family of temple servants (NETHINIM) who returned from the EXILE in Babylon (Ezra 2:54; Neh. 7:56).

Nezib. nee'zib (Heb. nēṣib H5908, "pillar[s]" or "garrison"). A town in the SHEPHELAH allotted to the tribe of JUDAH (Josh. 15:43). It is identified with modern Khirbet Beit Neṣib esh-Sharqiyeh, some 7 mi. (11 km.) NW of HEBRON and 9 mi. (15 km.) ENE of LACHISH.

Nibhaz. nib'haz (Heb. nibḥaz H5563, derivation uncertain). An idol of the Avvites (see IYVAH); Nibhaz, along with TARTAK, was introduced by them into SAMARIA when they were relocated there by SARGON after 722 B.C. (2 Ki. 17:31). The names Nibhaz and Tartak are not attested elsewhere, and various explanations have been proposed, such as the view that they refer to Ibnahaza and Dirtak, gods worshiped in ELAM. None of the suggestions can be verified.

Nibshan. nib'shan (Heb. nibšān H5581, derivation uncertain). A city in the wilderness of JUDAH listed between SECACAH and the City of Salt (Josh. 15:62; see SALT, CITY OF). It is tentatively identified with Khirbet el-Maqari (in the Buqei'ah Valley), some 10 mi. (16 km.) SE of JERUSALEM.

Nicanor. ni-kay'nuhr (Gk. Nikanōr G3770, “conqueror”). (1) Son of Patroclus (2 Macc. 8:9); he was a general of the SELEUCID army who warred against Judas MACCABEE (1 Macc. 3:38-39 et al.). He is described as an able man “among the Friends” of ANTIOCHUS Epiphanes (3:38). In 166-165 B.C. Nicanor, along with two other generals, was assigned by Antiochus’s regent, LYSIAS, to destroy Judah and Jerusalem (3:38-42). They took up their positions at EMMAUS, just a few miles from Jerusalem, but were badly routed by Judas and his forces (4:3-14), forcing the Syrian generals and their army to flee into PHILISTINE towns nearby (4:15). A few years later Nicanor was sent on a similar mission, but Judas won a decisive victory and Nicanor was slain. After mutilating his body, the Jews displayed it in Jerusalem (1 Macc. 7:47; 2 Macc. 15:33), and set aside the thirteenth of ADAR as “Nicanor’s Day” in honor of their great victory over him on that day (1 Macc. 7:48-49; 2 Macc. 15:36).

(2) One of the seven men appointed by the early church to serve tables and thereby relieve the apostles for other duties (Acts 6:5). See also DEACON; STEPHEN.

Nicanor Gate. See BEAUTIFUL GATE.

Nicodemus. nik'uh-dee'muhs (Gk. Nikodēmos G3773, “conqueror over the people”). A leading PHARISEE, “a ruler of the Jews,” and a member of the SANHEDRIN. Perhaps from curiosity, and possibly under conviction, but certainly led of God, he came to Jesus by night (Jn. 3:1-14). He must have thought of himself as quite condescending to address Jesus, the young man from GALILEE, as RABBI, but Jesus, instead of being puffed up by the recognition, quickly made Nicodemus aware of his need by announcing the necessity of a new birth (see REGENERATION) in order “to see the kingdom of God.” Nicodemus did not then understand but was deeply touched, though he had not yet the courage to stand out for the Lord. Later, when at the Feast of Tabernacles (7:25-44) the Jewish leaders were planning to kill Jesus, Nicodemus spoke up, though timidly, in the Sanhedrin, suggesting their injustice in condemning a man without a fair trial (7:50-51). After the death of Jesus, however, Nicodemus came boldly with JOSEPH of Arimathea (19:38-42), provided a rich store of spices for the embalmment, and assisted in the burial of the body. After that he is not mentioned in Scripture.

Nicolaitan. nik'uh-lay'uh-tuhn (Gk. Nikolaitēs G3774). Name given to a heretical group in the early church, mentioned only twice in the book of Revelation, in the messages to the churches of EPHESUS and PERGAMUM (Rev. 2:6, 15-16). In the latter passage the Nicolaitans are associated closely with certain people who held the teaching of BALAAM (2:14), and some scholars have argued that Nicolas and Balaam would then be regarded as Greek-Hebrew equivalents, alluding in each instance to an evil teacher who had influence over the people and brought them into bondage to heresy. These people apparently used Christian liberty as an occasion for the flesh (cf. Paul's warning in Gal. 5:13). The enticement to such a course of action was the pagan and often immoral society in which Christians lived. The Nicolaitans were judged by the author of Revelation to be most dangerous, because the result of their teaching would have conformed Christianity to the world rather than have Christianity change the world. According to some ancient Christian writers, the Nicolaitans were (or claimed to be) disciples of NICOLAS of Antioch, a proselyte who was among the seven men chosen to serve the Jerusalem congregation (Acts 6:5) and who allegedly had forsaken true Christian doctrine. There is, however, no concrete evidence for this claim.

Nicolas. nik'uh-luhs (Gk. Nikolaos G3775, "conqueror of the people"). Also Nicolaus. A PROSELYTE from ANTIOCH OF SYRIA chosen as one of the seven men to serve the church in Jerusalem (Acts 6:5; see DEACON). Evidently he was a GENTILE who had become a convert to JUDAISM and subsequently to Christianity. Nothing more is known about Nicolas, though he was thought by some church fathers to have been the founder of the heretical sect known as the NICOLAITANS (Rev. 2:6, 15). Clement of Alexandria (Miscellanies 2.20.118) excused him from responsibility for this by indicating that it was a perversion of his teaching that had produced the Nicolaitans.

Nicolaus. See NICOLAS.

Nicopolis. ni-kop'uh-lis (Gk. Nikopolis G3776, "city of victory"). A city selected by Octavian (later AUGUSTUS) and built as the capital of Epirus, an area in NW GREECE. He built the city on a promontory of the Ambracian Gulf (Gulf of Arta) to celebrate his decisive victory over Mark Antony. It is likely that this Nicopolis was the rendezvous that the apostle PAUL planned to use as a base from which to evangelize in Epirus (Tit. 3:12). Although there are other towns that bear the same name, none of them would have warranted Paul's intention to spend a whole winter in it. Nicopolis has extensive ruins (just N of modern Preveza), including two theaters.

Niger. nī'guhr (Gk. Niger, from Lat. niger, “black”). The surname of Simeon, one of the five “prophets and teachers” listed as ministering in the church at ANTIOCH of Syria (Acts 13:1). Because the name may suggest that he was African in origin (though this inference is hardly necessary), some have speculated that he was the same as SIMON of CYRENE (Lk. 23:26 and parallels), but the latter need not have been dark-skinned, and in any case this identification is unlikely, since Luke himself says nothing about it.

Nile. nīl. The main river, not only of EGYPT, but of AFRICA as well. In terms of length of the main stream, it is the longest of all rivers, covering some 4,160 mi. (6,700 km.) from its sources in equatorial Africa to its delta on the MEDITERRANEAN. Rising in a region of mountains, lakes, and seasonal rains, it traverses marshy and tropical areas and eventually threads its way through rocky desert wastes, where its waters have afforded the sole basis for the existence of living things. It is in the latter reaches that the Nile fostered in Egypt one of the oldest and most long-lived civilizations of the world. To the ancient Egyptians the Nile was Hapi, which was also the name of the river-god. It was also simply itrw, “river,” from which the Hebrews apparently derived the term yē ʾōr H3284, “river,” the name for the Nile in the Hebrew Bible (to be distinguished from “the river of Egypt”; see EGYPT, RIVER OF). The ultimate origin and meaning of the name Nile (from Gk. Neilos; Lat. Nilus) are unknown.

The “White” Nile, flowing N from Lake Victoria on the equator, has a fairly even flow northward till it is joined by the “Blue” Nile at modern Khartoum in the Sudan. This stream and the other affluents that join the Nile from the E, rise in the mountains of ETHIOPIA and are fed by the torrential rains of the springtime. They fluctuate greatly and provide the annual inundation that for thousands of years has flooded and fertilized Lower (northern) Egypt. The ancient mythological belief was that the goddess Isis annually shed a tear into the Upper (southern) Nile, and the resulting flood that is so great a blessing that Egypt has been called, from the time of Herodotus onward, “the Gift of the Nile.”

Near the end of June the water at Cairo and onward takes on a greenish tinge and an unpleasant taste because of the vast multiplication of the algae; then about the beginning of July the life-giving inundation begins so that the delta region overflows and the stream deposits the rich gift of sediment brought down from the mountains. During an average year, the vast delta seems almost like a sea with islands protruding here and there. If the inundation is unusually deep, many houses are destroyed and loss ensues, while if it is much below the average level, famine follows. A failure of this inundation for seven successive years (Gen. 41) was used by God to work a great but peaceful revolution in Egypt in which JOSEPH bought up for the PHARAOH practically all private property except that of the priests and brought the Israelites into Egypt for a stay of several hundred years.

From the days of ABRAHAM, who as Abram went down into Egypt (Gen. 12:10), until the infancy of our Lord Jesus Christ (Matt. 2:14), Egypt and the Nile were well known by the Hebrews and exerted a strong effect on the civilization of ISRAEL. In describing the Promised Land, MOSES (Deut. 11:10-12) emphasized its difference from Egypt “where you planted your seed and irrigated it by foot” (i.e., by irrigating furrows manipulated, and then altered from time to time, by foot power); and the prosperity or poverty of Egypt at various periods was in proportion to the ingenuity and faithfulness of the people in spreading the water of the Nile on their plants. The rise and fall of the Nile is very regular, but there have been times (e.g., A.D. 1877) when an unusually feeble flood led to widespread famine and many deaths. It was, no doubt, a series of these dry years in the days of Joseph that caused the seven years of famine (Gen. 41) and that led, under God, to the descent of Israel into Egypt.

A view of the Nile River. (Near the Valley of the Kings, looking W.)

When the Egyptians later feared the resident Israelites, it was commanded that every Israelite male child that was born should be thrown into the river (Exod. 1:22). JOCHEBED, the mother of MOSES, saved her son by placing him in a water-proofed basket of bulrushes and concealing him in the reeds along the water's edge (2:3), where the king's daughter discovered the child when she came to the river to bathe (v. 5). When the Lord commissioned MOSES, one of the signs he gave to confirm his appointment was the turning of the Nile water into blood (Exod. 4:9; cf. also 7:15, 17-24; 8:3-11, 20; 17:5; Ps. 78:44). In the prophecy of AMOS there are references to the Nile and its rising and falling (Amos 8:8; 9:5). The river is mentioned elsewhere in other prophetic writings (Isa. 19:7 et al.; Jer. 46:7-8; Ezek. 29:3, 9; Zech. 10:11). The biblical writers were well aware of the importance of the Nile to Egypt and they practically identified the country with its river.

Nimrah. See BETH NIMRAH.

Nimrim. nim'rim (Heb. nimrîm H5810, derivation uncertain). A locality in MOAB. Both Isaiah and Jeremiah declared, "The waters of Nimrim are dried up" (Isa. 15:6; Jer. 48:34). The former passage (Isa. 15:5-7) seems to trace the Moabites' flight downstream from HORONAIM, and then S across the Ravine of the Poplars (i.e., the ZERED). If so, then Nimrim would probably be Wadi (Seil) en-Numerah, a stream-oasis near the SE tip of the DEAD SEA.

Nimrod. nim'rod (Heb. nimrōd H5808, derivation uncertain). Son of CUSH and grandson of HAM; an early warrior and hunter who founded a kingdom in MESOPOTAMIA (Gen. 10:12; 1 Chr. 1:10). That he was "a mighty hunter before the LORD" may be a way of expressing "a renowned hunter." His rule included such great cities as BABEL (BABYLON) and ERECH (Warka) in the land of SHINAR. From that land he went out to ASSYRIA and built NINEVEH and other cities; this area is called "the land of Nimrod" by Micah (Mic. 5:6). Archaeological support for the presence of southerners in prehistoric and Sumerian times is found in the lower levels of these sites. Various attempts have been made to identify Nimrod with figures mentioned in extrabiblical documents (e.g., the Akkadian god Ninurta, the Babylonian hero Gilgamesh, the Assyrian king Tukulti-Ninurta I of Assyria [c. 1244-1208 B.C.], and so on), but none of these proposals is convincing.

Nimrud. nim'rood. See CALAH.

Nimshi. nim'shî (Heb. nimšî H5811, derivation uncertain). Grandfather of King JEHU (2 Ki. 9:2, 14). Elsewhere Jehu is identified as “son of Nimshi” (1 Ki. 19:16; 2 Ki. 9:20; 2 Chr. 22:7), but in these passages the Hebrew word for “son” (bēn H1201) probably means “descendant.”

Nineve. See NINEVEH.

Nineveh. nin'uh-vuh (Heb. nînwēh H5770, from Akk. Ninu(w)a; in the NT, gentilic Nineuitēs G3780, “Ninevite”). KJV NT Nineve. One of the most ancient cities of the world, founded by NIMROD (Gen. 10:11-12) and enduring till 612 B.C. Nineveh lay on the banks of the TIGRIS above its confluence with the Greater Zab, one of its chief tributaries, and nearly opposite the site of the modern Mosul in Iraq. It was for many years the capital of ASSYRIA, and its fortunes ebbed and flowed with the long strife between this empire and BABYLON. Of the two kingdoms, or empires, Babylonia was the more cultured, but Assyria the more warlike. The kingdom over which Nineveh and its kings long ruled was N of Babylon and in the hills, and these facts made more for warlikeness than the more sedentary culture of a warmer climate. Babylon was the more important from ABRAHAM's time to DAVID's; then from David's time to that of HEZEKIAH and MANASSEH, Nineveh and its kings were paramount; then still later, from the time of King JOSIAH to that of DANIEL, Babylon was again at the head.

Among the great rulers of Assyria may be mentioned Tiglath-Pileser I, who made conquests about 1100 B.C., and Ashurnasirpal and SHALMANESER III, who inaugurated a system of ruthless conquest and deportation of whole populations, which greatly increased the power of Assyria and the influence of Nineveh. It was this latter king who defeated HAZAEL of SYRIA and boasted of receiving tribute from JEHU of ISRAEL. The Assyrians, instead of numbering their years, named them from certain rulers; and lists of these “eponyms” have been found, but with a gap of fifty-one years around the beginning of the eighth century, due no doubt to some great calamity and/or the weakness of her kings. It was in this space of time that JONAH was sent of the Lord to warn the people of Nineveh: “Forty more days and Nineveh will be overturned” (Jon. 3:4), but God gave Nineveh a respite for nearly two hundred years.

ESARHADDON, the great king of Assyria from 680-668 B.C., united Babylonia to Assyria and conquered lands as far away as EGYPT (Isa. 19:4) and N ARABIA. He was succeeded by his greater son ASHURBANIPAL, who presided over Assyria in its brief climax of power and culture; but NABOPOLASSAR of Babylon, who reigned from 625 to 605, freed it from Assyria and helped to bring about the destruction of Nineveh in 612. About 623 Cyaxares, king of the Medes (see MEDIA), made his first attack on Nineveh, and this was probably the occasion of NAHUM's prophecy.

For many centuries the very location of Nineveh was forgotten, but it was discovered in the nineteenth century, and among its buried ruins the great palace of SARGON, with its wonderful library of cuneiform inscriptions and its still-striking wall ornamentation, has been exhumed.

Nippur. ni-poor'. An ancient city in MESOPOTAMIA, known today as Nuffar, about 100 mi. (160 km.) S of Baghdad or 50 mi. (80 km.) SE of Babylon. It was founded by the Ubaid people c. 4000 B.C. Although the city wielded no political power, it was the undisputed religious and cultural center from the early third millennium until the days of HAMMURABI, when it yielded to BABYLON as a religious and cultural center—though it continued to be an important city down to Parthian times. Nippur was the seat of the cult of ENLIL, and the ancient renown of this god insured his city the continued care on the part of the Babylonian kings. Excavators found some 50,000 tablets and fragments at Nippur, and about one tenth of these are inscribed with Sumerian works. Various temples and other important buildings have also been unearthed.

Nisan. ni'san, nee'sahn (Heb. nîsân H5772, from Akk. Nisannu). The first month in the Jewish religious CALENDAR (corresponding to March-April), during which the Passover took place. This name appears twice in the Bible, and only in postexilic writings (Neh. 2:1; Esth. 3:7); it was earlier known as ABIB.

Nisroch. nis'rok (Heb. nîsrōk H5827, derivation uncertain). TNIV Nisrok. An Assyrian deity worshiped at NINEVEH. After SENNACHERIB, the Assyrian king, returned from his loss near JERUSALEM, he was murdered by his two sons ADRAMMELECH and SHAREZER while he was worshiping in the house of Nisroch, his god. Sennacherib was apparently “smashed with statues of protective deities” (ANET, 288) as well as being slain “with the sword” (2 Ki. 19:37; Isa. 37:38). Since the name Nisroch is completely unknown in the source material for Mesopotamian religion, a textual corruption or an intentional scribal modification is suspected. Perhaps the reference is to some well-known deity (such as MARDUK or Nusku), but the problem remains unexplained.

Nisrok. nis'rok. TNIV form of NISROCH.

No. noh (Heb. nō ᵎ H5530, from Egyp. nwt). KJV transliteration of the Hebrew name for the city of T_{HEBES} (Jer. 46:25; Ezek. 30:14-16; Nah. 3:8).

Noadiah. noh'uh-di'uh (Heb. nô adyâ H5676, possibly “Yahweh has met”).
(1) Son of Binnui; he was a LEVITE and one of four men designated as final custodians of the treasure that EZRA brought back from EXILE (Ezra 8:33).

(2) A prophetess who allied herself with TOBIAH and SANBALLAT against NEHEMIAH at the time of the rebuilding of the walls of JERUSALEM (Neh. 6:14). Nothing else is known about her.

Noah (man). noh'uh (Heb. nōaḥ H5695, possibly from nûḥa H5663, “to rest,” but in Gen. 5:29 explained [by popular etymology?] with reference to nāḥam H5714, “to comfort”; Gk. Nōe G3820). KJV NT Noe. Son of LAMECH and descendant of SETH; the last of the ten ANTEDILUVIAN patriarchs listed in Genesis (5:28-29). He received this name because Lamech foresaw that through him God would comfort the race and partially alleviate the effects of the Edenic curse. Noah was uniquely righteous (6:1-13). When he was 480 years old, 120 years before the FLOOD (6:3), he was warned of God that the world would be destroyed by water (Heb. 11:7). He was then given exact instructions for building the ark (Gen. 6:14-16). While engaged in this colossal task, he warned his contemporaries of the coming catastrophe, as a “preacher of righteousness” (2 Pet. 2:5), while God in longsuffering waited for them to repent (1 Pet. 3:20). Noah’s three sons—SHEM, HAM, and JAPHETH—were not born until he was 500 years old (Gen. 5:32). One week before the flood, God led Noah and his family into the ark and supernaturally directed the animals also to enter. When all were safely inside, God shut the door (7:16).

The flood came in Noah's 600th year, increased steadily for 40 days, maintained its mountain-covering depth for 110 more days, and then subsided sufficiently for Noah to disembark in the mountains of ARARAT after another 221 days. During all this time, "God remembered Noah and all the wild animals... in the ark" (Gen. 8:1), implying that the Lord did not leave the task of caring for these creatures entirely to Noah. To determine whether it was safe to disembark, Noah sent forth first a raven and then a dove at regular intervals (8:6-10). The freshly plucked olive leaf proved to him that such sturdy plants had already begun to grow on the mountain heights. God commanded him to disembark, and Noah built an altar and offered clean beasts as burnt offerings to God. The Lord then promised never to send another universal flood, confirming it with the RAINBOW sign (8:21-22; 9:9-17). God blessed Noah and his family and commanded them to multiply and fill the earth (9:1).

Among the things preserved in the ark was sinful human nature. Noah became a husbandman, planted a vineyard, drank himself into a drunken stupor, and shamefully exposed himself in his tent (Gen. 9:20-21). Ham, presumably led by his son CANAAN, made fun of Noah. For this foul deed, Canaan was cursed and Ham received no blessing (9:25-27). On the other hand, Shem and Japheth showed due respect to their father (9:23) and received rich blessings for their descendants. Noah lived 350 years after the flood, dying at the age of 950 (9:29).

In the Babylonian flood account (the Gilgamesh Epic), Noah's counterpart is Utnapishtim. He likewise received divine warnings of the flood, built a huge ark, preserved human and animal life, sent out birds, and offered sacrifices. However, the gross polytheism and absurdities of the Babylonian account demonstrate that it suffered from a long oral transmission and that it did not influence Genesis in any way.

Noah (woman). noh'uh (Heb. nō'â H5829, derivation uncertain). One of five daughters of ZELOPHEHAD of the tribe of MANASSEH (Num. 26:33). Since Zelophehad had no sons, his daughters requested ELEAZAR the priest that they be allowed to inherit their father's property, and the request was granted on condition that they marry into their father's tribe (27:1-11; 36:11; Josh. 17:3-4). This decision was very important and became a precedent.

No-Amon. noh-am'uhn. See THEBES.

Nob. nob (Heb. nōb H5546, derivation unknown). A town NE of JERUSALEM. Nob is described as “the town of the priests” (1 Sam. 22:19), near SAUL’s capital of GIBEAH, to which the TABERNACLE came to be transferred after the destruction of SHILOH (14:2-3; cf. Jer. 7:14). At the time of DAVID’s flight from Saul, c. 1015 B.C., the high priest AHIMELECH provided David at Nob with SHOWBREAD and the sword of GOLIATH (1 Sam. 21:1-9). Vengefully, Saul subsequently slew eighty-five of the priests and put the city to the sword (22:11-19). Three centuries later the town was described as a halting place for the Assyrians as they arrived from the NE; from Nob they could “shake their fist at the mount of the Daughter of Zion” (Isa. 10:32). It suggests the identification of Nob with Ras Umm et-Ṭalaʿ (the eastern slope of Mount Scopus, on the N part of the Olivet ridge) or some other nearby site. Such a general location for Nob is confirmed by 2 Sam. 15:32, which speaks of David’s coming to the top of the ascent of the Mount of OLIVES “where people used to worship God,” and by Neh. 11:31-32, which lists Nob as a Benjamite town between ANATHOTH and ANANIAH (= NT BETHANY, modern el-ʿAzariyeh).

Nobah (person). nohʾbuh (Heb. nōbah H5561, apparently from nābah H5560, “to bark”). One of the descendants of MANASSEH who conquered GILEAD and drove the AMORITES from the area; he “captured Kenath and its surrounding settlements and called it Nobah after himself” (Num. 32:42). See JAIR; KENATH; NOBAH (PLACE).

Nobah (place). nohʾbuh (Heb. nōbah H5562, apparently from nābah H5560, “to bark”). A town in GILEAD that was in the neighborhood of JOGBEHAH, W of a Transjordanian caravan route (Jdg. 8:11). It was on that route, in the city of KARKOR (v. 10), that GIDEON fell upon a Midianite army and captured the kings ZEBAH AND ZALMUNNA (v. 12). This Nobah is probably the town that was originally known as KENATH and later renamed by a Manassite (Num. 32:42); see NOBAH (PERSON). Some, however, argue that a different Nobah is in view and that it should be identified with modern Tell Ṣafut, a short distance NW of Jogbehah.

noble, nobleman. The Hebrew term hōr H2985, indicating free or noble birth, is used as a noun, occurs only in the plural, and is especially frequent in the book of Nehemiah (1 Ki. 21:8, 11; Neh. 2:16; 4:14; et al.). The adjective addîr H129, “majestic, splendid,” can also be used as a noun with reference to nobles and chieftains (Jdg. 5:13; 2 Chr. 23:20; et al.). Another adjective, nādîb H5618, means “willing,” but when applied to someone who is willing or generous, it too can be rendered “noble [one]” or even “prince” (Num. 21:18; 1 Sam. 2:8; et al.). Several other Hebrew words can occasionally be used in this sense in particular contexts (e.g., Esth. 1:3; Job 29:10; Jon. 3:7).

In the NT, the Greek adjective eugenēs G2302 indicates nobility in the sense of being “well-born” or “of noble race” (Lk. 19:12; 1 Cor. 1:26), but it can also refer to nobility of mind (e.g., the Bereans in Acts 17:11). Another adjective, kalos G2819, “good,” can be properly rendered “noble” in certain contexts (e.g., 1 Tim. 3:1). The same is true of some other terms (cf. Rom. 9:21 NIV; Acts 24:3 KJV; et al.).

Nod. nod (Heb. nôd H5655, apparently from nûd H5653, “to wander”). A district E of E_{DEN} to which CAIN went to live after he had killed his brother ABEL (Gen. 4:16). The location of Nod is unknown, and some argued that the name is symbolic of Cain’s judgment as a fugitive.

Nodab. noh´dab (Heb. nôdāb H5656, perhaps “[God] has incited”). The name of an Arabian (less likely, Aramean) tribe in TRANSJORDAN, mentioned with JETUR and NAPHISH as allies of the HAGRITES (1 Chr. 5:19). This coalition was defeated and dispossessed by the tribes of REUBEN and GAD and the half-tribe of MANASSEH (vv. 18, 20-22), apparently during the time of SAUL (v. 10).

Noe. See NOAH.

Nogah. noh´guh (Heb. nōgahh H5587, “brightness, splendor”). Son of DAVID, listed among the children born to him in Jerusalem (1 Chr. 3:7; 14:6). This name, like that of ELIPHELET #2, is missing in the parallel list (2 Sam. 5:14-15).

Nohah. noh´hah (Heb. nôḥâ H5666, “rest”). (1) Third son of BENJAMIN (1 Chr. 8:2). This name, which curiously is feminine in form, does not appear in the other lists of Benjamin’s sons (Gen. 46:21; Num. 26:38-40; 1 Chr. 7:6). Some have thought that Noah and RAPHAH in 1 Chr. 8:2 were alternate names of SHUPHAM (SHEPHUPHAM) and HUPHAM (who occupy the same places on the list at Num. 26:39). Other views have been proposed. See also comments under AHIRAM.

(2) According to Codex Vaticanus (LXX^B), followed by the NRSV and other versions, Nohah was also the name of a place from which the Israelites pursued the men of Benjamin (Jdg. 20:43, where the MT has mēnûḥâ, of uncertain meaning).

noise. This English term is used by the KJV almost ninety times, but it occurs with much less frequency in modern versions, which often use synonyms (e.g., “sound,” as in Isa. 24:18) or alternate expressions (e.g., “the noise of the shout” in 1 Sam. 4:6 KJV becomes simply “the uproar” in NIV). Many references to noise occur in the context of God’s predicted judgment, either direct or indirect, against the earth’s inhabitants (Isa. 29:6; 33:3; Jer. 4:29; 47:3; 50:22; Ezek. 26:10; Rev. 6:1; 8:5; 9:9; 11:19; 16:18). The psalmist’s admonition to “make a joyful noise” to God is rendered by the NIV, “shout with joy” or the like (Ps. 66:1; 95:1; 98:4, 6; 100:1). A roaring noise is associated with a jubilant throng (Isa. 24:8), enemy hordes in their attack on Israel (25:5), and the waves of the sea (Jer. 51:55).

nomad. Nomads are wandering groups of individuals who change area of residence, usually according to a seasonal pattern, within a larger area that is their home territory. Some nomads are characterized by hunting and collecting its immediate needs, with little concern for surplus or organized divisions of labor. Other groups are pastoral in nature and are characterized by following a consistent pattern of grazing, regulated by the seasons and nature of the herd or flock. A third type is characterized by agricultural ties; they stay in one spot until the crop is exhausted, then move on to new land.

Certain values arise from the demands of nomadic life. The need for mobility results in reduction of property—the wealth of the group being often largely limited to livestock. The mutual dependence of members of the tribe, together with consciousness of common descent, leads to solidarity and to such concomitant practices as blood revenge. Most present-day nomads are camel nomads who also possess the horse. The donkey played a significant role in the patriarchal narrative (Gen. 22:3; 24:35; 30:43; 32:5). When ABRAHAM undertook his travels he began a nomadic life that continued for ISAAC and JACOB before the children of Israel settled in Egypt. The prophecy of ISHMAEL’S future suggests a nomadic life (16:11-12), and later references reflect this nomadic state (37:25). The KENITES and Midianites (see MIDIAN) seemed to be tent-dwelling nomads (Jdg. 5:24; 6:4-5). In the wilderness wandering, Israel was again a seminomadic people moving with their cattle from oasis to oasis (Num. 10:31; 33:1). The TABERNACLE was especially suitable for a people with such a nomadic tradition.

noon. See TIME.

Noph. See M_{EMPHIS}.

Nophah. noh´fuh (Heb. nōpaḥ H5871, perhaps related to nāpaḥ H5870, “to blow”). An unknown city of M_{OAB}, mentioned only in a poem: “We have demolished them as far as Nophah, / which extends to Medeba” (Num. 21:30). The Hebrew text, however, presents textual problems, and other renderings are possible. For example, the ESV translates, “we laid waste as far as Nophah; fire spread as far as Medeba”; the RSV and NRSV, in addition to accepting the reading “fire,” delete the reference to Nophah and translate simply, “we laid waste until fire spread to Medeba.”

north. The Hebrew term šāpôn H7600 designates one of the four cardinal points of the compass and is often so used in the OT (Gen. 13:14 et al.). The prophets also use this term to refer generally to identifiable countries lying NE, or even due E of P_{ALESTINE}. Usually these are references to foes who, because of the sea on the W and the Arabian desert on the E, were forced to enter Palestine from the N. As a result, even B_{ABYLON}, lying due E of Palestine, was spoken of as being N (Jer. 1:14-15; 6:1, 22; et al.). The many references in Dan. 11 to “the king of the North” probably are references to the S_{ELEUCID} kings of S_{YRIA} as opposed to “the king of the South” (i.e., Ptolemies of Egypt). The Greek term borras G1080 appears twice in the NT and in both instances means “north” as the cardinal compass point (Lk. 13:29; Rev. 21:13). See also E_{AST}; S_{OUTH}; W_{EST}.

northeast, southeast. See N_{ORTHWEST}, S_{OUTHWEST}.

northwest, southwest. These words occur only in Acts 27:12, which says that Phoenix was “a harbor in Crete, facing both southwest and northwest.” The RSV, however, translates “looking northeast and southeast.” See discussion under P_{HOENIX}.

nose, nostrils. It is not hard to see why the nose (Heb. ṣappayim, dual of ṣap H678, “face”) should be regarded as the organ of ANGER in the body. DAVID, in telling of God’s power and in particular his anger, says, “Smoke rose from his nostrils; / consuming fire came from his mouth, / burning coals blazed out of it” (2 Sam. 22:9; cf. Job 41:20 [Heb. v. 12], where a different term is used). The Hebrews did not consider the respiratory system any further than its entrance, and so the nose (rather than the lungs) was regarded as containing the breath of life (Gen. 2:7; 7:22). The term can thus be used to indicate passion (e.g., Job 27:3). See also FLAT NOSE.

nose jewel. See DRESS.

Not my people, Not pitied. See LO-AMMI; LO-RUHAMAH.

novice. This English term is used by the KJV to render Greek neophytos G3745 (lit., “newly planted”), which occurs only once (1 Tim. 3:6; NIV and NRSV, “recent convert”). In his instruction to TIMOTHY, PAUL wrote that if any man desires the office of a BISHOP, he must not be new to the Christian faith, “or he may become conceited and fall under the same judgment as the devil.”

number. Before the EXILE, the Hebrew spelled the numbers out in full, as is seen in the present text of the Hebrew Scriptures, in the SILLOAM inscription, and on the MOABITE STONE. Subsequently, some of the Jews employed such signs as were used among the Egyptians, the Arameans, and the Phoenicians—an upright line for 1, two such lines for 2, and so on; there were also special signs for 10, 20, 100. At least as far back as the reign of Simon MACCABEE (143-135 B.C.), the consonants of the Hebrew alphabet began to be used as numbers (ALEPH for 1, BETH for 2, etc.); the letters of the Greek alphabet were used in the same way.

Numbers were used conventionally and symbolically. Certain numbers and their multiples had sacred or symbolic significance: 3, 4, 7, 10, 12, 40, 70. For example, three expressed emphasis, as in “A ruin! A ruin! I will make it a ruin!” (Ezek. 21:27). From early times seven was a sacred number among the Semites (Gen. 2:2; 4:24; 21:28). Ten was regarded as a complete number. Forty was often used as a round number with special significance (Exod. 24:18; 1 Ki.

19:8; Jon. 3:4). Some of the higher numbers also seem sometimes to have been used as round numbers: 100 (e.g., Gen. 26:12; Lev. 26:8; 2 Sam. 24:3), 10,000 (e.g., Lev. 26:8; Deut. 32:30).

Some later rabbis developed the theory that all numbers have secret meanings and all objects their fundamental numbers, and elaborate mathematical rules were devised to carry out these concepts. The system came to be known as gematria (from Gk. geōmetria). It is often thought that an example of this approach is found in Rev. 13:18, which gives the number of the Beast as 666 (“Nero Caesar” in Heb. can be spelled qsr nrwn, and the numerical values are: $q = 100$, $s = 60$, $r = 200$, $n = 50$, $r = 200$, $w = 6$, $n = 50$). Numbers, Book of. The fourth book of the Bible and traditionally one of the five books of MOSES (the PENTATEUCH or TORAH). The English title is a literal translation of the title in the SEPTUAGINT and reflects the censuses of Num. 4 and 26. Some have proposed that this title was chosen by someone with a superficial knowledge of the book, since the censuses appear to have so little to do with its major thrusts. The usual Hebrew title, bēmīdbar, “in the wilderness” (based on the fifth word of 1:1), seems much more apt. However, the two censuses do relate directly to the overall themes of the book. The first represents the organization of the people for the impending journey and the occupation of the land that was intended to follow shortly. The second census and its accompanying reorganization was necessitated by the people’s failure to obey God at KADESH BARNEA, the resulting death of that generation in the wilderness, and the preparation of the new generation to possess the land at last.

Exception has been taken to the large number of Israelites—totaling an estimated two million or more. Some say the territory could not sustain so many people. This is true if the Israelites traveled as a closely knit group seeking forage in a limited radius. But if they fanned out with their flocks over a wide area, they could sustain themselves as did the large NABATEAN kingdom in the same area in Roman times. Furthermore, God specially and miraculously fed and sustained Israel. The size of the Israelite nation was surely great or JOSHUA would never have been able to conquer and occupy the land of Palestine as he clearly did. Large and well-fortified cities were conquered in the area from LACHISH in the S to HAZOR in the N, as well as the territory in TRANSJORDAN. Six hundred thousand men, not all active, would not have been too large a force to accomplish such a feat. David in later days of prosperity called up an army of 1,300,000 (2 Sam. 24:9). (Because such large figures seem disproportionate to what is otherwise known of populations in the ANE, alternate interpretations have been suggested, such as the view that the Heb. word translated “thousand” may refer to one military unit of undetermined size.)

Overview of NUMBERS

Author: Anonymous, but comments elsewhere in the Bible seem to support the traditional view that MOSES is responsible for the PENTATEUCH as a whole.

Historical setting: The initial composition of the book must have taken place at the end of the wilderness wanderings (either late in the 15th or early in the 13th cent. B.C.; those who reject Mosaic authorship usually date the book after the EXILE, while acknowledging that much of the material is several centuries earlier).

Purpose: To provide a historical-theological account of the Israelite wanderings, beginning with their departure from SINAI, stressing their unfaithfulness in the wilderness, and ending with their arrival in the plains of MOAB; to encourage the new generation to remain faithful to God and thus to prepare themselves to conquer the Promised Land.

Contents: Organization of the people for their march into the wilderness (Num. 1-4); sanctification of the people and beginning of their march (chs. 5-10); complaints and rebellion of the people (chs. 11-19); events during the last stage of the wanderings (chs. 20-25); preparation of the new generation to possess the Promised Land (chs. 26-36).

An aerial view of the Desert of Zin. The Israelites lived for thirty-eight years around this wilderness.

The body of Numbers up to Num. 10:11 gives additional legislation and the organization of the host. From 10:11 to 12:16 is recorded the march from Sinai to Kadesh Barnea. Then comes the debacle at Kadesh recorded in chs. 13 and 14. The three leaders of this occasion—Joshua and Caleb, the believing spies, and Moses the intercessor—are forever memorialized as among God’s great men. The next section (15:1—21:11) records the repeated faithlessness on the part of the people. Apparently during much of the forty years, according to Amos 5:25-26 and Josh. 5:2-7, the people wandered far away from God, and even their national unity may have lapsed temporarily. The forty years are treated very briefly.

From Num. 21:11 on, the accounts of the conquest of Transjordan and the preparations to enter the land are given. SIHON and OG of the northern territory were conquered in swift moves detailed more extensively in DEUTERONOMY. Then Numbers portrays the very interesting activity of BALAAM, the hireling prophet who was supernaturally restrained from cursing Israel (chs. 22-24). These chapters are now studied with new interest because they appear to show a very early type of Hebrew. Final material includes Joshua’s installation (ch. 27), the summary of the journeys (ch. 33), and the provision of cities of refuge (ch. 35).

nun (letter). nuhn (from nûn [attested in the Bible only as a personal name], “fish”). The fourteenth letter of the Hebrew alphabet (נ), with a numerical value of fifty. It is named for the shape of the letter, which in its older form was thought to be a stylized picture of a fish; more likely, however, the letter originally depicted a snake. Its sound corresponds to that of English n.

Nun (person). nuhn (Heb. nûn H5673 [variant nôn only 1 Chr. 7:27], “fish”). KJV also Non (1 Chr. 7:27). The father of JOSHUA (Hoshea, Jeshua), and therefore an Ephraimite (Exod. 33:11; Num. 11:28; 13:8; et al.). Nothing more is said about him.

Nunc Dimittis. noonk´di-mit´is. The title given to SIMEON’s prayer (Lk. 2:29-32), drawn from the first line of the Latin VULGATE, “Nunc dimittis servum tuum, Domine” (“Now, O Lord, let your servant go”). The poem declares that God’s promises, as prophesied by ZECHARIAH in his BENEDICTUS (1:68-79), have “now” been fulfilled. The description of Jesus as “a light of revelation to the Gentiles and for glory to your people Israel” (2:32) is a clear allusion to Isaiah’s prophecies concerning the SERVANT OF THE LORD (cf. esp. Isa. 42:6; 46:13; 49:6).

Nuzi. noo´zee. A town occupied by HURRIANS in the second millennium B.C. The importance of Nuzi for the Bible student results from the fact that the 4,000 clay tablets found there probably give a fuller picture of the life of the individual citizens than can be gained for any other town in the ANE, with the possible exception of MARI. However, at Mari most of the tablets deal mainly with the royal family and its political activities, while at Nuzi there were found records of the life and activity of hundreds of ordinary citizens. Still more important to the Bible student is the fact that at many points the customs evidenced in these tablets show a remarkable similarity to those described in the book of GENESIS. Thus the Nuzi material is valuable for corroborating the accuracy of Genesis and also for giving a better understanding of its meaning. This article will pass over the many references to features of life that probably were common in most parts of the ANE at that time, but will note particularly a few that are valuable for throwing special light on the book of Genesis.

For example, dozens of adoption tablets have been found at Nuzi. Israelite law, so detailed on many subjects, contains no regulations for ADOPTION, and the history of the Hebrews in Palestine after the conquest, as recorded in the OT, contains no evidence of such a practice. But at Nuzi it was customary for a man, if he had no children, to adopt someone to carry on his name and inherit his property. This seems to be reflected in the statement of ABRAHAM, before ISAAC was born, that unless the Lord should give him a child, ELIEZER of Damascus would be his heir (Gen. 15:2).

Similarly, the incident of the TERAPHIM (31:17-35) was extremely puzzling before the discovery of the Nuzi documents. When JACOB determined to leave his uncle LABAN, RACHEL stole Laban's teraphim. Laban became anxious not simply because his daughters and his son-in-law had left without notice, nor because of the great amount of property that they had taken with them, but primarily because of the loss of the household gods. Why such concern? The tablets from Nuzi show that according to Hurrian custom at that early time, if a man desired to appoint a son-in-law as his principal heir he would turn over to him his household gods. Rachel was trying to secure all of Laban's property for her husband, and Jacob was rightfully indignant at being accused of attempting such an underhanded trick. The whole incident becomes understandable in the light of these facts, and it becomes clear why Laban, still suspicious, desired that a boundary stone be put up at MIZPAH, and that Jacob should swear that he would not pass over this boundary in order to do him harm (Gen. 31:44-53, esp. v. 52). The Nuzi tablets make it clear that a great part of Laban's reason for this was his desire that at his death the remainder of his property should go to his own sons and not be taken away from them by Jacob.

Nympha. nim'fuh (Gk. Nympha G3809, "bride, young woman, nymph"; possibly masc. Nymphas, short form of Nymphodōros, "gift of the nymphs"). KJV Nymphas. A Christian woman (or man?) in whose house the believers had meetings, and to whom PAUL sent greetings (Col. 4:15). Apparently she lived in LAODICEA, although some have argued that the language is ambiguous and that her home may have been either in COLOSSE or in HIERAPOLIS. Nympha must have been a woman of means, possibly a widow. Many have inferred that she did not merely host the Christian assembly, but that she was also a leader in the local church. It is not certain, however, whether a man or a woman is referred to (the accusative form found in the text can be accented either as a feminine, Nymphan, or as a masculine, Nymphan, and according to some MSS, the personal pronoun in the context is "his" rather than "her").

Nymphas. nim'fuhs. KJV form of NYMPHA.

oath. An appeal to God to witness the truth of a statement or of the binding character of a promise (Gen. 21:23; 31:53; Gal. 1:20; Heb. 6:16). Two varieties of the oath are found in the OT—a simple one for common use and a more solemn one for cases of greater solemnity. Oaths played a very important part not only in legal and state affairs, but in the dealings of everyday life. A number of formulas were used in taking an oath, such as “the LORD is witness between you and me forever” (1 Sam. 20:23) and “as the LORD who rescues Israel lives” (14:39). Certain ceremonies were observed in taking an oath—in ordinary cases the raising of the hand toward heaven (Gen. 14:22; Deut. 32:40), and in some cases the putting of the hand under the thigh of the one to whom the oath was made (Gen. 24:2; 47:29). Sometimes one taking an oath killed an animal, divided it into two parts, and passed between the pieces (15:8-18). Swearing was done by the life of the person addressed (1 Sam. 1:26), by the life of the king (17:55), by one’s own head (Matt. 5:36), by the angels, by the temple (23:16), by Jerusalem (5:35), and by God. It was forbidden to swear by a false god (Josh. 23:7). A virgin could take an oath if her father did not disallow it; and a married woman, if her husband permitted it (Num. 30:3-15). By the time of Christ the OT law regarding oaths (Exod. 22:11) was much perverted by the scribes, and our Lord therefore condemned indiscriminate and light taking of oaths, saying that people should be so transparently honest that oaths between them are unnecessary. The lawfulness of oaths is recognized by the apostles, who called on God to witness to the truth of what they said (2 Cor. 11:31; Gal. 1:20).

Obadiah. oh´buh-di´uh (Heb. ʿōbadyāhû H6282 and ʿōbadyâ H6281, “servant [i.e., worshiper] of Yahweh”). (1) Son of Izrahiah and descendant of ISSACHAR; a military chief (1 Chr. 7:3).

(2) A Gadite who joined DAVID's forces at ZIKLAG (1 Chr. 12:10). The Gadites are described as "brave warriors, ready for battle and able to handle the shield and spear. Their faces were the faces of lions, and they were as swift as gazelles in the mountains" (v. 8).

(3) Father of Ishmaiah; the latter was an officer over the tribe of ZEBULUN during the reign of David (1 Chr. 27:18).

(4) Son of Azel and descendant of SAUL through JONATHAN (1 Chr. 8:38; 9:44).

(5) An official of King AHAB who was in charge of the palace and who risked his life to save a hundred of the prophets when they were being hunted by JEZEBEL. During a time of famine, he was instructed by the king to go through the land and find grass for the animals. As he was walking, the prophet ELIJAH met him and gave him a message for the king (1 Ki. 18:3-16). Jewish tradition identifies him with the prophet Obadiah, but there is no evidence to support this suggestion.

(6) One of five officials sent by King JEHOSEPHAT "to teach in the towns of Judah" (2 Chr. 17:7).

(7) Descendant of LEVI through MERARI and an overseer of the workmen who repaired the temple in the reign of King JOSIAH (2 Chr. 34:12).

(8) A prophet (Obad. 1). See OBADIAH, BOOK OF.

(9) Postexilic descendant of David in the line of ZERUBBABEL (1 Chr. 3:21). His place in the genealogy is uncertain. The NRSV and other versions, following the SEPTUAGINT, understand Obadiah to be the son of Arnan and the grandson of Rephaiah (see comments under REPHAIAH #1).

(10) Son of Shemaiah; a postexilic LEVITE (1 Chr. 9:16). He is commonly identified with Abda son Shammua (Neh. 11:17).

(11) Son of Jehiel and descendant of Joab; he was head of a large family who returned to JERUSALEM from BABYLON with EZRA (Ezra 8:9). Some believe he is the same as #12 below.

(12) One of the priests who signed the covenant with NEHEMIAH (Neh. 10:5).

(13) A Levitical gatekeeper in charge of the storerooms in the time of Nehemiah (Neh. 12:25).

Overview of OBADIAH

Author: The prophet Obadiah.

Historical setting: Uncertain. The prophecy may have taken place as early as the ninth century B.C. or as late as the sixth.

Purpose: To denounce the nation of EDOM, predicting its destruction, and thus to reassure the nation of JUDAH that God will bring deliverance.

Contents: The book consists of a series of condemnatory statements against the Edomites (Obad. 1-16), followed by a promise that the Hebrew nation will experience triumph (vv. 17-21).

Obadiah, Book of. The shortest OT book, fourth among the Minor Prophets. It is directed against EDOM; from time immemorial the Edomites were hostile to Israel. The principal clue to the date of its writing is in Obad. 11, 14. If “the day you stood aloof” alludes to the events of 2 Ki. 8:20-22 and 2 Chr. 21:16-18, when the Edomites and others rebelled against King JEHOAM in the ninth century B.C., the book probably would be dated quite early; but if the reference is to other events (cf. Ps. 137:7; 2 Chr. 36:20; Ezek. 25:13-14), the prophecy would be late, subsequent to 586 B.C. Most scholars date the book after the EXILE, but the more likely view is that 2 Chr. 28:16-18 is the apposite reference and that the time was late in the eighth century, during the reign of AHAZ of JUDAH. At that time Edom and the PHILISTINES were associated in warfare against Judah, and the names of the two nations are again coupled in Obad. 19.

Obadiah 1-9 is very similar to Jer. 49:7-22 in pronouncing punishment on Edom. Apparently either Jeremiah or Obadiah made use of the other, or both made use of a common source that is no longer available. In Obad. 10-14 Edom is arraigned for its guilt in standing with the enemies of Israel in the time when Judah and Jerusalem were in deep distress. In vv. 12-14 the prophet exhorts Edom to quit its evil association with the enemies of Jerusalem. In vv. 15-16 the DAY OF THE LORD, that is, a time of awful judgment, is proclaimed as being “near for all nations,” and national annihilation is predicted for those peoples who fight against the Lord—they will “be as if they had never been.” To this point in Obadiah, the Lord has been addressing Edom in the second person singular, but in the closing paragraph, he speaks of a coming restoration of Israel when Zion will be holy and God will use Israel as a flame to destroy Esau. The people of the NEGEV (the southern part of Judah) are to possess the land of Edom; Israel will greatly enlarge its borders (vv. 19-21). The principal message of Obadiah to the peoples of today seems to be the proclamation, not only of the danger of fighting against God, but also of the peril of fighting his people.

Not even these inaccessible mountains in Edom could save its inhabitants from the judgment announced by Obadiah.

Obal. ohˈbuhl (Heb. ʕōbāl H6382, derivation uncertain). Also EBAL. Son of JOKTAN and descendant of SHEM (Gen. 10:28). In the parallel passage (1 Chr. 1:22), the MT has “Ebal” (cf. NRSV and other English versions), but some Hebrew and Greek MSS, as well as the Syriac, read “Obal” (cf. NIV). Obal/Ebal was presumably the eponymous ancestor of a S Arabian tribe, perhaps to be identified with the Banū ʕUbal in Yemen.

Obed. ohˈbid (Heb. ʕōbēd H6381, possibly short form of OBADIAH, “servant [i.e., worshiper] of Yahweh”; Gk. Iōbēd G2725). (1) Son of BOAZ and RUTH (Ruth 4:17, 21-22; 1 Chr. 2:12); included in the GENEALOGY OF JESUS CHRIST (Matt. 1:5; Lk. 3:32).

(2) Son of Ephlail and descendent of JUDAH in the line of JERAHMEEL (1 Chr. 2:37-38).

(3) A member of DAVID’s elite corps of mighty warriors (1 Chr. 11:47).

(4) Son of Shemaiah, grandson of OBED-EDOM, and a gatekeeper from the Korahites (1 Chr. 26:7; cf. v. 1). See KORAH. Obed and his brothers are described as “leaders in their father’s family because they were very capable men” (v. 6).

(5) Father of Azariah; the latter was a military commander who assisted the high priest JEHOIADA in the successful overthrow of the apostate queen ATHALIAH (2 Chr. 23:1).

Obed-Edom. ohˈbid-eeˈduhm (Heb. ʕōbēd-ʔēdôm H6273, “servant [or worshiper] of Edom,” where Edom may refer to a Canaanite deity). (1) A “Gittite” in whose house King DAVID deposited the ARK OF THE COVENANT after the death of UZZAH (2 Sam. 6:10). Obed-Edom guarded the ark for three months, and the Lord blessed him and his household (vv. 11-12; cf. 1 Chr. 13:13-14; 15:25). Because the term Gittite normally refers to an inhabitant of GATH (2 Sam. 15:18; 21:19), many scholars believe that Obed-Edom was a PHILISTINE living in Israel, presumably a convert to Yahweh. Others argue that Gittite could refer to a native of some Israelite town (such as GATH HEPHER and GATH RIMMON), that Obed-Edom was a name borne by several LEVITES (see below), and that the narrative in Chronicles suggests that Obed-Edom the Gittite was a Levitical gatekeeper and musician (1 Chr. 15:18-25; 26:4-8, 15; but see below, ##2 and 3).

(2) Son of JEDUTHUN #2 (1 Chr. 16:38). He was a Levite who may have served both as a gatekeeper for the ark (15:18, 24) and as a musician (15:21; 16:5). He may be the same as #1 above. According to some, however, a distinction is intended between the Obed-Edom mentioned in 16:38a (presumably the musician) and the Obed-Edom mentioned in 16:38b (the gatekeeper, here identified as son of Jeduthun and thus distinguished from the previous one; cf. the renderings in the NRSV and NJPS). Similarly, it may be that the Chronicler distinguishes between the Obed-Edom in 15:21 and the one in 15:24.

(3) A descendant of KORAH who is listed, along with his sons and descendants, as belonging to a division of gatekeepers (1 Chr. 26:4-8). He was responsible for the South Gate, and his sons for the storehouse (v. 15). This Obed-Edom may have been a son of Kore (cf. v. 1). Because we are told that “God had blessed Obed-Edom” (v. 5), he is probably being identified with #1 above.

(4) A Levite who was in charge of “all the gold and silver and all the articles found in the temple of God” during the reign of AMAZIAH king of Judah (2 Chr. 25:24). When JEHOASH king of Israel sacked the temple, Obed-Edom may have been one of the hostages he took to Samaria.

obedience. The Bible, by exhortation and commandment, requires submission and obedience to six principal authorities: (1) parents (Eph. 6:1; Col. 3:20; 1 Tim. 3:4), (2) teachers (Prov. 5:12-13), (3) husbands (Eph. 5:21-22, 24; Col. 3:18; Tit. 2:5; 1 Pet. 3:1, 5-6), (4) masters—today, employers—(Eph. 6:4; Col. 3:22; Tit. 2:9; 1 Pet. 2:18), (5) government (Rom. 13:1-2, 5; Tit. 3:1; 1 Pet. 2:13), and (6) God (Gen. 26:5; Eph. 5:24; Heb. 5:9; 12:9; Jas. 4:7). When there is a clear conflict regarding obedience to authority, Christians are to obey God, not human beings (Acts 5:29). The supreme test of faith in God is obedience (1 Sam. 28:18); the Bible often links obedience to faith (Gen. 22:18; Rom. 1:5; 1 Pet. 1:14). Jesus’ obedience to the Father (Phil. 2:8) is the supreme example for Christians, who are to be “obedient children” (1 Pet. 1:14).

obeisance. This English term, indicating a bow as a token of respect or reverence to a superior, is used occasionally (in the phrase “do/make obeisance”) by the KJV and other versions to translate selected instances of the frequent Hebrew verb ḥāwāh H2556 (Gen. 37:7 et al.), which is often rendered “to bow down.” When used of homage given God, it is commonly rendered “to worship” (22:5 et al.). See WORSHIP.
