Letter from the Library Director

With the increase of stress and anxiety in our modern lives, the importance of mental health and well-being has never been more clear. Public libraries across the country are committed to supporting wellness in their communities through informative programs, helpful resources, and engaging initiatives, and the Glenview Public Library is no different. This quarter, I am particularly proud to highlight our team's efforts to focus on mental well-being through carefully curated programs and resources.

Our offerings include a wide range of programs and workshops designed to address different aspects of mental health. These include sessions on recognizing and coping with Seasonal Affective Disorder (SAD), practicing qigong and meditation, and understanding Obsessive-Compulsive Disorder (OCD).

We are focusing on nurturing the mental well-being of our young community members through creative and mindfulness-based activities. Programs include crafting fidget toys and exploring mindfulness techniques together with adults.

Our library also serves as a hub for community engagement and support, with events such as the Community Mental Health Fair and workshops on collaborating with schools to support children's mental health needs.

In addition to our programs, the Glenview Public Library provides a range of resources and a welcoming environment for everyone, making our library a place where individuals can find information, relax, and participate in activities that promote mental well-being.

By offering these services and resources, we aim to create a supportive community where everyone feels valued and understood, fostering both mental health and overall wellness. For more information about our programs, please visit our website or continue reading this edition of Spark to learn more. Together, we can build a healthier, more connected community.

COMING THIS FALL! Currents: A Community Art Project

Between political polarization, cultural shifts, economic inequality, and media influence, it's no secret that our world feels divided at times. As an institution that strives to promote a culture of inclusion, kindness, and respect, the Library envisioned a participatory art installation to encourage dialogue about conflict, division, peace, and unity. We enlisted the help of local artists and educators Deb Anderson and Mary Tapia to help bring this vision to life. We asked them to share what drew them to the project.

Mary Tapia:

"My work as an installation artist and educator has centered around communicating a message that represents a community of people. The process of gathering opinions, thoughts, and ideas and merging them into a work of art is exciting to me."

Deb Anderson:

"Visual art can be a way of exploring challenging topics. When I feel stuck, I find that getting something out on canvas or paper can affect my mind and feelings in surprising ways. I love connecting with people through art, so the opportunity to make a project like this together with the community is really valuable."

Through facilitated sessions at the Library and in the community, participants will be asked to respond to a series of questions designed to spark reflection and curiosity. The responses will be incorporated into an art installation this fall. "There is space for everyone's point of view. In fact, the artwork could not be as impactful without hundreds of responses!" says Mary.

The public is invited to contribute responses at Library programs this fall and view the installation from Oct 28-Jan 17. Join us for a reception on Nov 14, from 6-7 PM.
