CHAPTER SEVENTEEN

they were soaring back into the present again. The soft golden light in Dumbledore's office seemed to dazzle Harry's eyes after that impenetrable darkness.

"Is that all?" said Harry at once. "Why did it go dark, what happened?"

"Because Morfin could not remember anything from that point onward," said Dumbledore.

"When he awakes alone, Marvolo's ring is gone, and his wand is broken. Meanwhile, along the coast, a Muggle man is lying in the driveway, his mother and father's names were perplexed. As far as I am aware, no one knows to this day how the Riddles died, for the Avada does not usually leave any sign of damage. . . . The other hand, knew at once that a convicted Muggle-hater

A SLUGGISH MEMORY

All that disturbed him was the fact that his father's ring had disappeared. "He'll kill me for losing it," he told his captors over and over again. "He'll kill me for losing his ring." And that, apparently, was all he ever said again. He lived out the remainder of his life in Azkaban, lamenting that Marvolo's last heirloom, and is buried in the prison, along with the other poor souls who have expired within its walls.

"So Voldemort stole Marvolo's wand and used it?" said Harry, sitting up straight.

"That's right," said Dumbledore. "We have no memories to go by, but I think it can be fairly sure what happened. His uncle, took his wand, and proceeded across the valley to the big house over the way. There he murdered the Muggle man who had abandoned his witch mother, and, for good measure, his Muggle grandparents, thus obliterating the memory of the unworthy Riddle line and revenging himself upon the man who never wanted him. Then he returned to the Chamber of Secrets, formed the complex bit of magic that was necessary to put the memory in his uncle's mind, laid Marvolo's wand in the pocket of the Muggle-hater
