Tech Talk

— with Brian —

We've all been there.

You're sewing along and all of a sudden, out of nowhere, your machine jammed. You got a bird's nest. You clear the jam, try again, and it jams again.

It's frustrating. It drives you nuts. It was working fine just a minute ago!

It's OK. Take a deep breath. Take a quick break if you need to.

There are any number of things that can cause a thread jam, and you'll have to do some troubleshooting to resolve it.

Here's a quick guide on what I do.

1. Check your spool.

Be sure your thread hasn't looped around your spool spindle. Be sure you're using the correct spool cap. Make sure the thread has not snagged the edge of the spool.

2. Check your take up lever.

If your thread came out of your take up lever, it's going to jam again.

3. Check your bobbin.

If the thread has come out of the bobbin tensioner, you'll get crazy loops underneath and your machine can jam.

4. RETHREAD both the top thread and the bobbin, even if you cannot see anything obvious. Think of it like restarting your computer. This fixes the vast majority of your thread jam issues. Take out the top thread and the bobbin, then rethread both.

5. If it jams again, inspect your bobbin.

Be sure your bobbin has not deformed. A bobbin that was accidentally wound too tightly can actually expand or even break. Make sure you have the correct bobbin. Just because the bobbin drops in doesn't automatically mean it's the correct one. Some bobbins are taller than others and will catch the thread.

6. Make sure your needle is fully inserted.

Every now and then, your needle may not seat fully when you change it. Remove it and reinsert it to be sure.

7. Try a new needle.

Some machines are very finicky about the needle condition. If a needle is very slightly bent, even to the point you can't see it, it can allow jams.

This is a comprehensive checklist of how to try resolving this issue.

If you are still having thread jams, you might be having a mechanical issue.

Perhaps your machine needs a spa day. Having it checked out is the next logical step.

— Take a breath. You've got this. —
