8th-VE Day

Victory in Europe Day marks May 8th, 1945, on which day the second world war Allies formally accepted an unconditional surrender by the armed forces of Germany and the end of Adolf Hitler's Third Reich, after six years of the bloodiest conflict in human history.

In the United Kingdom, a crowd of 50,000 packed Piccadilly Circus waving flags.

A national holiday was declared and there was dancing in the street and singing. At 3pm Prime Minister Winston Churchill broadcast from the War Cabinet Office to tell the nation war was over. It was the same room Neville Chamberlain had announced that the country was at war in 1939.

King George VI also spoke to the nation on the radio, paying tribute to those who “laid down their lives” during the war. The Royal Family made eight appearances during the day, waving to crowds on the balcony at Buckingham Palace. The two young princesses - Elizabeth and Margaret – even slipped out of the palace to join the crowds.

Winston Churchill raised up and giving his famous V for Victory sign, joining the huge crowd celebrating VE Day 8 May 1945 in the London streets near Whitehall
