Hudson River Painters - An artistic landscape fraternity

The Hudson River School was America's first true artistic fraternity, dating back to the 1820s. This loosely organized group of painters focused on capturing the unique natural beauty of the American continent. During this time of significant social, political, and economic change in American history, the paintings of the Hudson River School reflected a sense of hopefulness and a deep appreciation for the untouched American landscape. As time passed, their artwork also began to convey a sense of sorrow for the changing landscape.

Join me for an exciting illustrated presentation that delves into the storied lives, locations and symbolism of these visionary painters. They fearlessly blended realism with fantasy on canvas to create stunning images of America the Beautiful.

Thomas Hart Benton - An American artist that chronicled American culture in the 20th century

With a unique and captivating style, Thomas Hart Benton documented the American landscape from the 1930s through the 1970s. He is widely recognized as one of the most prominent American muralists, with his smaller paintings and prints also receiving high praise. Trained professionally in both America and France, Benton rose to fame by portraying the people and culture of the American Mid-west in his artwork. He dedicated extensive time to researching his commissioned pieces, particularly when historical elements were involved. Unafraid to confront historical truths, Benton was not hesitant to challenge art critics and defend his work. His most famous pupil, Jackson Pollock, even posed for several of Benton's paintings.

Back in 1903, the world was abuzz with excitement as inventors raced to create the first piloted, powered, heavier-than-air flying machine. The competition was fierce, with everyone vying to be the first to achieve controlled flight. The definition of a successful first flight was up for debate, but one thing was certain - the future of aviation was being shaped before our very eyes.

As these daring individuals pushed the boundaries of what was possible, the term "aeroplane" was coined to describe these miraculous flying machines. The skies were a battleground, with birds and humans alike vying for dominance in the air. It is a time when dreams took flight and the impossible became reality.

Their creative endeavors would produce gravestones that are as much a reflection of their personal identity as of the deceased, their family's pride, social status, and moral virtues. In this 50-minute presentation, John Cilio will introduce many stone cutters and their artistry. He will highlight some of the background stories to how these men undertook their profession, how the craft began to organize beyond local training in the mid-1700s, and some of the regional variations that arose outside of New England.
